Between an Israelite and a Foreigner. The only distinct prohibition in the Mosaic law refers to the Canaanites, with whom the Israelites were not to marry, on the ground that it would lead them to idolatry (Ex. 34:15-16; Deut. 7:3-4). The legal disabilities resting upon the Ammonites and the Moabites (23:3) totally forbade marriage between them and Israelite women but permitted that of Israelites with Moabite women (Ruth 1:4). The prohibition against marriages with the Edomites and Egyptians was less stringent, as a male of those nations received the right of marriage on his admission to full citizenship in the third generation of proselytism (Deut. 23:7-8). Thus the prohibition was total in regard to Canaanites on either side, total on the side of males in regard to the Ammonites and Moabites, and temporary on the side of males in regard to the Edomites and Egyptians. In the case of wives, proselytism was not necessary, but it was so in the case of husbands.

Between Israelites and Israelites. The law began (Lev. 18:6-8) with the general prohibition against marriage between a man and "any blood relative." This was followed by special prohibitions against marriage with a (1) mother, (2) stepmother, (3) sister or half-sister, (4) granddaughter, (5) daughter of a stepmother, (6) aunt, (7) wife or uncle on the father's side, (8) daughter-in-law, (9) brother's wife (unless he died childless; see Marriage, Levirate), (10) a woman and her daughter, whether both together or in succession, or a woman and her granddaughter, (11) two sisters at the same time, (12) mother-in-law. The case of a daughter being taken in marriage is not mentioned, simply because it was regarded as unlikely to occur; that of a full sister is included in no. 3, and of a mother-in-law in no. 10. Breaches of nos. 1, 2, 3, 8, and 12 were to be followed by the death or extermination of the offender (Deut. 27:20, 22-23), whereas the threat held out against nos. 6, 7, and 9 was that the guilty parties should "bear their sin" and "die childless" (Lev. 20:19-21). These prohibitions were based upon moral propriety, heathen practices, and social convenience.

In addition to the above, there were special prohibitions: (1) The high priest was forbidden to marry anyone except a virgin selected from among his own people (Lev. 21:13-14). (2) The priests were forbidden to marry prostitutes and divorced women (21:7). (3) Heiresses were prohibited from marrying outside of their own tribe (Num. 36:5-9; cf. Tobit 7:10). (4) Persons defective in physical powers were not to intermarry with Israelites (Deut. 23:1). A wife divorced by her husband and married to another man, if her second husband died or divorced her, could not revert to her first husband (Deut. 24:1-4). Such a marriage would lower the dignity of the woman and make her appear too much like property. Such prohibition was also intended to prevent a frivolous severance of the marriage tie and to fortify the marital bond. In the Christian church we find that bishops and deacons are prohibited from having more than one wife, probably referring to a second marriage of any kind. A similar prohibition applied to those entered upon the church records as widows (which see). They must have been the wife of one man, that is, probably, not remarried.

Marriage Customs.

Age of Marriage. With regard to age, no restriction is pronounced in the Bible. Early marriage is spoken of with approval in several passages (Prov. 2:17; 5:18; Isa. 62:5), and, in reducing this general statement to the more definite one of years, we must take into account the early age at which persons arrive at puberty in oriental countries. The Talmudists forbade marriage in the case of a man under thirteen years and a day, and in the case of a woman under twelve years and a day. The usual age appears to have been higher, about eighteen years.

Selection of Bride. Perhaps in imitation of the Father of the universe, who provided Adam with a wife, fathers from the beginning considered it their duty and prerogative to secure wives for their sons (Gen. 24:3–4; 38:6; etc.). In the absence of the father the responsibility of selection was passed to the mother (21:21). In some cases the proposal was made by the father of the girl (Ex. 2:21). Occasionally the whole business of selecting the wife was committed to a friend.

The Betrothal. The selection of the bride was followed by the espousal, which was not altogether like our “engagement” but was a formal proceeding, undertaken by a friend or legal representative on the part of the bridegroom and by the parents on the part of the bride. It was confirmed by oaths and accompanied with presents to the bride. These presents were described by different terms, that to the bride by “a dowry” (Heb. mōhar) and that to the relatives by “a present” (Heb. mattān). Thus Shechem offered “ever so much bridal payment and gift” (Gen. 34:12), the former for the bride and the latter for the relatives. It has been supposed, indeed, that the mohar was a price paid to the father for the sale of his daughter. Such a custom undoubtedly prevails in certain parts of the East at the present day, but it does not appear to have been the case with free women in patriarchal times. It would undoubtedly be expected that the mohar should be proportioned to the position of the bride and that a poor man could not on that account afford to marry a rich wife (1 Sam. 18:23). A “settlement,” in the modern sense of the term, that is, a written document securing property to the wife, did not come into use until the post-Babylonian period: the only instance we have of one is in Tobit 7:14, where it is described as an “instrument.” The Talmudists called it a ketubah and have laid down minute directions as to the disposal of the sum secured in a treatise of the Mishna expressly on that subject. The act of betrothal was celebrated by a feast, and among the more modern Jews it is the custom in some parts for the bridegroom to place a ring on the bride’s finger. Some writers have endeavored to prove that the rings mentioned in the OT (Ex. 35:22; Isa. 3:21) were nuptial rings, but there is not the slightest evidence of this. The ring was nevertheless regarded among the Hebrews as a token of fidelity (Gen. 41:42) and of adoption into a family (Luke 15:22).

Marriage Ceremonies. Before the time of Moses, when the proposal was accepted, the marriage price paid, and the gifts distributed, the bridegroom was at liberty to move the bride at once to his own home (Gen. 24:63–67). Isaac and Rebekah’s experience was an unusual case, because of the bride’s being secured at a distance, while the bridegroom remained at home. Usually the marriage took place at the home of the bride’s parents and was celebrated by a feast to which friends and neighbors were invited and which lasted seven days (Gen. 29:22, 27). The word wedding does not occur in the OT; but it is probable that some ratification of the espousal with an oath took place (see Prov. 2:17; Ezek. 16:8; Mal. 2:14) and that a blessing was pronounced (Gen. 24:60; Ruth 4:10–12). But the essence of the ceremony consisted in the removal of the bride from her father's house to that of the bridegroom or his father. There seems, indeed, to be a literal truth in the Heb. expression "to take" a wife (Gen. 21:21; 24:3, 38; 26:34; see marg.), for the ceremony appears to have mainly consisted in the taking. After putting on festive dress, placing a "garland" on his head (Isa. 61:10; "crown," Song of Sol. 3:11, marg., "wreath"), the bridegroom set forth from his house, attended by his groomsmen (cf. Judg. 14:11; Matt. 9:15), preceded by a band of musicians or singers (Gen. 31:27; Jer. 7:34; 16:9; 1 Macc. 9:39), and accompanied by persons bearing lamps (2 Esd. 10:2; Matt. 25:7; cf. Jer. 25:10; Rev. 18:23). Having reached the house of the bride, who with her companions anxiously expected his arrival (Matt. 25:1, 6), he conducted the whole party back to his own or his father's house, with every demonstration of gladness (Ps. 45:15). On their way back they were joined by a party of young girls (virgins), friends of the bride and bridegroom, who were in waiting to catch the procession as it passed (Matt. 25:6). The inhabitants of the place pressed out into the streets to watch the procession (Song of Sol. 3:11). At the house a feast was prepared, to which all the friends and neighbors were invited (Gen. 29:22; Matt. 22:1–10; Luke 14:8; John 2:2), and the festivities were protracted for seven or even fourteen days (Judg. 14:12; Tobit 8:19). The guests were provided by the host with wedding clothes (Matt. 22:11), and the feast was enlivened with riddles (Judg. 14:12) and other amusements. The bridegroom now entered into direct communication with the bride, and the "friend of the bridegroom ... rejoices greatly" at hearing the voice of the bridegroom conversing with her (John 3:29), which he regarded as a satisfactory testimony of the success of his share in the work. The last act in the ceremony was the conducting of the bride to the bridal chamber (Heb. heder, Judg. 15:1; Joel 2:16), where a canopy, named a hūppâ, was prepared (cf. Ps. 19:5; Joel 2:16). The bride was still completely veiled, explaining the deception practiced on Jacob (Gen. 29:23, 25). A newly married man was exempt from military service, or from any public business that might draw him away from his home, for the space of a year (Deut. 24:5). A similar privilege was granted to one who was betrothed (20:7).

Marriage Relation. In considering the social and domestic conditions of married life among the Hebrews, we must, in the first place, take into account the position generally assigned to women in their social scale. There is abundant evidence that women, whether married or unmarried, went about with their faces unveiled (Gen. 12:14; 24:16, 65; 29:11; 1 Sam. 1:13). Women not infrequently held important offices. They took their part in matters of public interest (Ex. 15:20; 1 Sam. 18:6–7); in short, they enjoyed as much freedom in ordinary life as the women of our own country. If such was her general position, it is certain that the wife must have exercised an important influence in her own home. She appears to have taken her part in family affairs and even to have enjoyed a considerable amount of independence (2 Kings 4:8; Judg. 4:18–22; 1 Sam. 25:14, 18–37; Prov. 31:10–31; etc.).

Dependence of the Wife. And yet the dependence of the wife on her husband is shown by the Heb. appellation for husband (ba'al, Ex. 21:3, 22), lit., "lord, master," and is seen in the conduct of Sarah, who speaks of her husband Abraham as "my lord" (Gen. 18:12). From this mastery of the husband over the wife arose the different standard of virtue that existed in married life. The wife, subject to her husband as master, was obliged to regard the sanctity of the marriage relation, and any unchastity on her part was visited with death. The husband could take any unmarried woman he chose and violate the laws of chastity, as we understand them, with impunity (38:24). This absolute sanctity of marriage on the part of the wife was acknowledged by other nations of antiquity, such as Egypt (12:15–19) and Philistia (20:1–18; 26:7–11). Arising from the previously existing inequality of husband and wife and the prevailing notion that the husband was lord over his wife, Moses could neither impose the same obligation of fidelity nor confer the same rights on both. This is evident from the following facts: (1) The husband in the case of the wife's infidelity could command her death as well as that of her lover (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:22; Ezek. 16:38–41; John 8:3–5). (2) If he became suspicious of his wife he could bring her to the priest and have administered to her the "water of bitterness" (Num. 5:12–31). But if the husband was guilty of criminal intercourse with an unmarried woman, no statute enabled the wife to arraign him for a breach of marriage or infringement of her or their rights. Should he sin with a married woman, it was the injured husband that could demand the death of the seducer, not the wife of the criminal. (3) If the wife vowed anything to the Lord, or imposed upon herself voluntary obligations to Jehovah, her husband could nullify them (Num. 30:6–8). (4) The husband could divorce his wife if it so pleased him (Deut. 24:1–4).

Protection of the Wife. The woman was protected by the following laws: (1) The daughter of an Israelite sold by her father as a maidservant (i.e., housekeeper and concubine), who did not please her master, was not to be treated as were menservants, namely, be sent away free at the end of six years; but she was provided for as follows: She could be redeemed, that is, another Israelite could buy her for a concubine, but she could not be sold to an alien (Ex. 21:7–8). She might be given to her purchaser's son, in which case she was to be treated as a daughter. If he gave the son an additional wife, he was not to "reduce her food, her clothing, or her conjugal rights" (vv. 9–10). If these three things were not provided, then she was to "go out for nothing, without payment" (v. 11). (2) If her husband maliciously charged a newly married woman with lack of chastity, he was to be scourged and lost his right of divorce (Deut. 22:13–19). (3) If she had children they were to render equal obedience to her as to the father (Ex. 20:12; Deut. 27:16). (4) As has already been stated, the husband was not to vex his wife by marrying her sister (Lev. 18:18). (5) The husband was forbidden to transfer the primogeniture from the son of a less beloved wife to the child of his favorite wife. (6) If her husband disliked her, he was not arbitrarily to dismiss her but to give her a "certificate of divorce" (Deut. 24:1). (7) If divorced, or if her husband died, the woman was free and at liberty to marry another (Deut. 24:2).

Social and Domestic Conditions. In early times the oriental woman appears to have enjoyed much freedom. She, whether married or single, went about with her face unveiled (Gen. 12:14; 24:16, 65; 29:11; 1 Sam. 1:13); she might meet and converse with men, even strangers, in a public place (Gen. 24:24–25, 45–47; 29:9–12; 1 Sam. 9:11–13); she might be found alone in the country without any reflection on her character (Deut. 22:25–27), or she might appear in a court of justice (Num. 27:1–2). If such was her general position, we can readily accord her a considerable amount of independence and influence at home. Thus we find her entertaining guests (2 Kings 4:8), sometimes in the absence of her husband (Judg. 4:18), and even against his wishes (1 Sam. 25:14, 18–19); she conferred with her husband respecting the marriage of her children (Gen. 27:46) and even sharply criticized his conduct (1 Sam. 25:25; 2 Sam. 6:20). The ideal relations between husband and wife appear to have been those of tenderness and affection, frequent reference being made to his love for her (Gen. 24:67; 29:18). The wife was the husband's consolation in bereavement (24:67), and her grief at his loss presented a picture of the most abject woe (Joel 1:8). Polygamy, of course, produced jealousies and quarrels (Gen. 30:1–24; 1 Sam. 1:2, 6), and the purchase of wives and the small liberties allowed daughters in the choice of husbands must have resulted in many unhappy unions. In the NT the mutual relations of husband and wife are a subject of frequent exhortation (Eph. 5:22–33; Col. 3:18–19; Titus 2:4–5; 1 Pet. 3:1–7).

Duties. In a Hebrew household the wife had general superintendence of the domestic arrangements, such as cooking (Gen. 18:6; 2 Sam. 13:8–9), the distribution of food at the meals (Prov. 31:15), and the manufacture of cloth and clothing (31:13, 21–22).

Figurative. Marriage is illustrative of Jehovah's relation with Israel (Isa. 54:5; 62:4–5; Jer. 3:1; Hos. 2:16–20). In the NT the image of the bridegroom is transferred from Jehovah to Christ (Matt. 9:15; John 3:29) and that of the bride to the church (2 Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:23–24, 32; Rev. 19:7; 21:2, 9; 22:17).

MARRIAGE, CHRISTIAN. Christianity confirms, simplifies, and vindicates from abuse the original and sacred ordinance of marriage. The stability and purity of the church and state have been proportionate to the popular and legal stability of the marriage relationship. The original appointment of monogamy is confirmed (Matt. 19:6; Mark 10:6–8). The presence of Jesus at the wedding in Cana happily illustrates the feeling and teaching of Christianity respecting marriage. Christ taught the divine origin and sacredness of this institution. It is more than filial duty; it is unifying. The husband and wife become one through the purity and intensity of mutual love; common interests are necessitated by common affection (Matt. 19:5–6; Eph. 5:31), only one ground for divorce being lawful (Matt. 19:9). The utmost that may be inferred from the expression “who made themselves eunuchs for the sake of the kingdom of heaven” (19:12) is that marriage is not binding upon every member of the race, and that devotion or discretion may make it expedient to renounce or defer it. The example of Peter (Matt. 8:14; Mark 1:30; Luke 4:38) and the express teaching of NT writers (1 Tim. 4:3; 5:14; Heb. 13:4) are in harmony with the conduct of Christ respecting the sanctity of the marriage relationship. The counsel of Paul to the Corinthian church (1 Cor. 7), evidently in reply to their request, is entirely consistent with the general doctrine of the NT. He guards marriage so carefully that even to those who are joined to unbelievers the advice is given not to disturb their relationship except by mutual consent and for mutual good. “According to the principles thus laid down, marriage is not merely a civil contract; the Scriptures make it the most sacred relation of life; and nothing can be imagined more contrary to their spirit than the notion that a personal agreement, ratified in a human court, satisfies the obligation of this ordinance.”

Matrimony was elevated to the dignity of the sacrament in the Roman Catholic church mainly on the ground of the apostle's words “This mystery is great; but I am speaking with reference to Christ and the church” (Eph. 5:32); in the Vulg. the Gk. being rendered sacramentum. However “it is not this that is conveyed by the passage, as indeed, in general, marriage ‘has from Christ neither a sacramental institution, nor form, nor substance, nor end,’ but it is rather the sacredly ideal and deeply moral character, which is forever assured to marriage by this typical significance in the Christian view” (Meyer, Com., ad loc.; Pope, Christian Theology, 3:237–43, 308).

MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE (from Lat. levir, a “brother-in-law”). The marriage of a man with his deceased brother's widow, in the event of the brother's dying childless. The first instance of this custom occurs in the patriarchal period, where Onan is called upon to marry his brother Er's widow (Gen. 38:8). The Levirate marriage was not peculiar to the Jews; it has been found to exist in many Eastern countries, particularly in Arabia and among the tribes of the Caucasus. The Mosaic provision was as follows: If brothers (on the father's side) lived together, that is, in the same place, and one of them died childless, the wife was not to go outside and marry a stranger; but the surviving brother was to take her as his wife. The firstborn son by her took the name of the deceased, thus continuing his name in the family register, that it might not perish out of Israel. In case the brother-in-law did not wish to marry the widow, she might cite him legally before the elders of the place. If, after conference with them, he still persisted in declaring his unwillingness, he was not compelled to do the duty of a brother-in-law. But he was obliged to submit to the humiliation of having his sandal pulled off by his sister-in-law in the presence of the elders and of having his face spat upon. The one act denoted that he thus gave up all claim to his deceased brother's estate; the other was an act expressive of contempt (Deut. 25:5–10). From Ruth 4:1–10 it would appear that in the case of the refusal of the brother-in-law to take the widow, then the next male relative had the right to do so. The divine sanction that the Mosaic law gave to Levirate marriage is not to be regarded as merely an accommodation to a popular prejudice. Such marriage was not strictly commanded, but it was considered a duty of love, the nonfulfillment of which brought reproach and ridicule on the man and his house. It did not abolish the general prohibition of marriage with a brother's wife but proceeded from one and the same principle with it. By the prohibition the brother's house was preserved in its integrity; by this command it was raised to a permanent condition. In both cases the dead brother was honored and fraternal love preserved as the moral foundation of his house. Based upon such a marriage as this was the ground for the question asked of our Lord by the Sadducees (Matt. 22:23–30). The rabbis taught that in the next world a widow who had been taken by her brother-in-law reverted to her first husband at the resurrection. Christ answered both parties by the declaration that “in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage.”

MARROW. The soft oily substance contained in the hollow bones of animals (Heb. mōāh, Job 21:24; Gk. muelos, Heb. 4:12).

Figurative. “Choice pieces with marrow” (Isa. 25:6; NIV, “best of meats”) is an expression symbolizing the full enjoyment of blessedness in the perfected kingdom of God. “Marrow” in Heb. 4:12 is used figuratively for the most secret thoughts of a person.

MAR'SENA (mar'se-na; cf. Avestan marshanā, “forgetful man”). Perhaps nobleman, one of the “seven princes [satraps or viziers] of Persia and Media” in the time of Ahasuerus (Esther 1:14), about 479 B.C.

MARSH (Heb. gebe, a “reservoir,” Ezek. 47:11). A swamp or wet piece of land. The place referred to by Ezekiel is the “Valley of Salt,” near the Dead Sea; for there the Kidron, the course of which the prophet describes the holy waters as following, empties.

MARS' HILL (Gk. Aries Pagos, “hill of Aries,” the Greek god of war, Roman Mars, Acts 17:22, KJV). Another name for the Areopagus (which see).

MAR'THA (mar'tha; Gk. from Aram., "lady, mistress"). The sister of Lazarus and Mary, who all resided in the same house at Bethany (Luke 10:38–41; John 11:1–39; 12:2). Martha appears to have been at the head of the household (Luke 10:38) and from that circumstance has been thought to have been a widow. This is, however, uncertain, and it is generally supposed that the two sisters (unmarried) managed the household for their brother. The incident narrated by Luke (10:38–42) shows that Jesus was intimate with the family and was at home in their house. It also brings out the contrary dispositions of the two sisters. Martha hastens to provide suitable entertainment for their friend and His followers, while Mary sits at His feet listening to His gracious discourse. The busy, anxious Martha, annoyed at the inactivity of Mary, complains impatiently to Jesus, "Lord, do You not care that my sister has left me to do all the serving alone? Then tell her to help me." This brought from the Master the often-quoted reply, "Only a few things are necessary, . . . for Mary has chosen the good part, which shall not be taken away from her." At the death of Lazarus their respective characters are portrayed: Martha active, Mary meditative; Martha reproachful and objecting, Mary silent but immediately obedient to the summons of Jesus; Martha accepting Jesus as the Christ and sharing in the belief of a resurrection but not believing, as Mary did, in Jesus as "the life." All that is recorded of Martha in addition is that at a supper given to Jesus and His disciples at Bethany, at which Lazarus was present, she, as usual, busied herself with serving. BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. MARTYR (Gk. martus, so rendered only in KJV, Acts 22:20; Rev. 2:13; 17:6; and in the NIV only in Acts 22:20). A witness (which see), and generally so given. The meaning of the word martyr, which has now become the most usual, is one who has proved the strength and genuineness of his faith in Christ by undergoing a violent death. Stephen (which see) in this sense was the first martyr, and the spiritual honors of his death tended in no small degree to raise to the most extravagant estimation, in the early church, the value of the testimony of blood. Eventually a martyr's death was supposed, on the alleged authority of the following texts, to cancel the sins of the past life (Mark 10:39; Luke 12:50), to answer for baptism, and at once to secure admission into paradise (Matt. 5:10–12).

MA'RY (mā'ri; Gk. Maria or Mariam; from Heb. miryām, "obstinacy, rebellion").

The Mother of Jesus. Mary was the daughter of Eli or Heli, of the tribe of Judah and of the lineage of David, hence in the royal line (Luke 3:23).

The Annunciation. In the summer of the year known as 5 B.C. Mary, a virgin betrothed to Joseph, was living at Nazareth. At this time the angel Gabriel came to her with a message from God and announced that she was to be the mother of the long-expected Messiah—that by the power of the Holy Spirit the everlasting Son of the Father should be born of her (Luke 1:26–38; cf. Rom. 1:3).

Visit to Elizabeth. Informed by the angel that her cousin Elizabeth was within three months of delivering a child, Mary set off to visit her, either at Hebron or Juttah. Immediately upon her entrance into the house "Elizabeth heard Mary's greeting, the baby leaped in her womb; and Elizabeth was filled with the Holy Spirit. And she cried out with a loud voice, and said, 'Blessed among women are you, and blessed is the fruit of your womb!'" Mary stayed with her cousin about three months, then returned to her own house (1:36–56).

Married to Joseph. In a few months Joseph found that Mary was with child, and he determined to "put her away secretly" (see Deut. 24:1) instead of yielding her up to the law to suffer the penalty he supposed she had incurred (22:23–24). But being assured of the truth by an angel, he took her as his wife (Matt. 1:18–25).

Mother of Jesus. Soon after Joseph and Mary went to Bethlehem to be enrolled for the taxing, and while there Jesus was born and laid in a manger (Luke 2:1–7). On the eighth day Jesus was circumcised. On the fortieth day after the nativity—until which time Mary could not leave the house (Lev. 12:2–4)—she presented herself with her baby for their purification in the Temple. The poverty of Joseph and Mary is alluded to in the mention of their offering, “a pair of turtle-doves, or two young pigeons.” There she met Simeon and the prophetess Anna and heard their thanksgiving and prophecy (Luke 2:21–38). Returning to Bethlehem, Mary and Joseph were warned of the purpose of Herod and fled to Egypt. Returning the next year, they went to Nazareth (Matt. 2:12–23). At the age of twelve Jesus accompanied His family to Jerusalem, and Mary was temporarily separated from Him (Luke 2:42–50), A.D. 8. Jesus continued to increase “in wisdom and stature,” and Mary “treasured all these things in her heart.”

Was Mary the Mother of Any Children Other Than Jesus? The question whether or not Mary was the mother of any children other than Jesus has caused almost endless controversy. Of course, the advocates of her perpetual virginity assert that she was not. From the accounts in Matt. 13:55–56 and Mark 6:3, it would seem more than likely that she had a number of children. This presumption is increased by the fact that the persons named as the “brothers” of Jesus are mentioned in connection and in company with His sisters and mother. Indeed, the denial of the natural interpretation of these passages owes its origin, in all probability, to the tradition of perpetual virginity, the offspring of the false notion of the superior sanctity of celibacy.

Subsequent Mention of Mary. Mary is mentioned only four more times after our Lord’s ministry commenced. These four occasions are: the marriage at Cana, where Jesus solemnly withdraws Himself from her authority (John 2:1–4); at Capernaum, where at a public gathering Mary desires to speak to Jesus, and He seems to refuse to admit any authority on the part of His relatives, or any privilege on account of their relationship (John 2:12; Matt. 12:46–50); at the crucifixion, where Christ, with almost His last words, commends His mother to the care of the disciple whom He loved, and from that hour John assures us that he took her into his home (John 19:25–27); after the ascension, engaged in prayer in the upper room in Jerusalem, with other faithful followers of the Lord (Acts 1:14).

Tradition. Tradition and Roman Catholic speculation have viewed Mary as guarded from actual sin by divine grace. This notion, which prevailed from the twelfth century, was developed into a papal decree of December 8, 1854. On November 1, 1950, the bull Munificentissimus Deus declared the dogma of the Assumption of Mary. This dogma asserts “that the Virgin Mary, the Immaculate Mother of God, when the course of her life was finished, was taken up, body and soul, into the glory of heaven” (Acta Apostolicae Sedis, 32 [1950], pp. 753–73).

Character. “Her faith and humility exhibit themselves in her immediate surrender of herself to the divine will, though ignorant how that was to be accomplished (Luke 1:38); her energy and earnestness in her journey from Nazareth to Hebron (v. 39); her happy thankfulness in her song of joy (v. 48); her silent, musing thoughtfulness in her pondering over the shepherds’ visit (2:19), and in her keeping her Son’s words in her heart (v. 51), though she could not fully understand their import. In a word, so far as Mary is portrayed to us in Scripture, she is, as we should have expected, the most tender, the most faithful, humble, patient, and loving of women, but a woman still” (Smith, Dict.).

Mary Magdale’ne (mag-da-lē’ne, or commonly mag’da-len; “of Magdala”).

Name. Of this there are four explanations: (1) The most natural is that she came from the town of Magadan (which see; the name of the town is frequently given as Magdala; it means “tower,” or “fortress”), probably situated on the western shore of Lake Tiberias, and the same as that of the modern village of El-Mejdel. (2) The Talmudists make mention of a Miriam Megaddela: “Miriam with the braided locks,” which Lightfoot considers as identical with “the woman who was a sinner” (Luke 7:37). (3) Jerome sees in her name and that of her town the old Migdol (“watchtower”) and says that the name denotes the steadfastness of her faith. (4) Origen, taking the more common meaning of gādal (to “be great”), “sees in her name a prophecy of her spiritual greatness as having ministered to her Lord and been the first witness of the resurrection.”

Personal History. Mary Magdalene enters the gospel narrative, with certain other women, as ministering to Jesus “out of their private means” (Luke 8:2–3); all of them being moved by gratitude for their deliverance from “evil spirits and sicknesses.” Of Mary it is said that “seven demons [daimonia] had gone out” of her (v. 2; Mark 16:9). This life of ministration brought Mary Magdalene into companionship of the closest nature with Salome, the mother of James and John (15:40), and also with Mary the mother of the Lord (John 19:25). They “were standing at a distance, seeing these things” (Luke 23:49), during the closing hours of Christ’s agony on the cross. The same close association that drew them together there is seen afterward. She remained by the cross till Jesus’ death, and she waited till the body was taken down and wrapped in the linen cloth and placed in the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea (Matt. 27:61; Mark 15:47; Luke 23:55). She, with Salome and Mary, the mother of James, “brought spices, that they might come and anoint” the body (Mark 16:1). The next morning, accordingly, in the earliest dawn (Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:2), they came to the tomb. Mary Magdalene had been to the tomb, had found it empty, and had seen the angels (Matt. 28:5; Mark 16:5). She went with her cry of sorrow to Peter and John (Luke 24:10; John 20:1–2) and, returning with them, tarried after they went back. Looking into the tomb, she saw the angels, and she replied to their question as to her reason for weeping, “They have taken away my Lord, and I do not know where they have laid Him.” Turning back, she saw Jesus, but did not at first recognize Him. Recalled to consciousness by His utterance of her name, she exclaimed, “Rabboni” (Teacher) and rushed forward to embrace His feet. Jesus’ response was to teach her a spiritual dependence upon Christ that could live without His visible presence: “Stop clinging to Me, for I have not yet ascended to the Father.” Mary then went to the disciples and told them what she had seen and heard (John 20:11–18).

Mary Magdalene has long been in popular tradition equivalent to “Mary the sinner” and has been identified with the penitent woman who anointed Jesus. There were probably two anointings recorded in the gospels, the acts of two different women: one in some city unnamed, during our Lord’s Galilean ministry (Luke 7:37–38), and the other at Bethany, before the last entry into Jerusalem (Matt. 26:7; Mark 14:3; John 12:3), by the sister of Lazarus. There is no reliable evidence to connect Mary Magdalene with either anointing. (1) When her name appears in Luke 8:2 there is not one word to connect it with the history immediately preceding. (2) The belief that Mary of Bethany and Mary Magdalene are identical is more startling. The epithet Magdalene, whatever may be its meaning, seems chosen for the express purpose of distinguishing her from the other Marys. No one evangelist gives the slightest hint of identity. Nor is this lack of evidence in the NT itself compensated by any such weight of authority as would indicate a really trustworthy tradition (Smith, Dict., s.v.).

Mary, Sister of Lazarus. The facts about her are few. She and her sister Martha appear in Luke 10:38–42 receiving Christ in their house. Mary sat listening eagerly for every word from the divine Teacher and was commended by Jesus as having “chosen the good part,” the one thing necessary, while “Martha was distracted with all her preparations.” The next mention of Mary is in connection with the raising of Lazarus (John 11:1–45). She sat still in the house until Martha came to her secretly and said, “The Teacher is here, and is calling for you.” She arose hastily to go to meet Him. At first she gave way to complaint: “Lord, if You had been here, my brother would not have died.” But her great joy and love revived upon her brother’s return to life, and found expression in the anointing at the last feast of Bethany (Matt. 26:6–13; Mark 14:3–9; John 12:1–8). Matthew and Mark do not mention her by name. Of her subsequent history we know nothing; the ecclesiastical traditions about her are based on the unfounded hypothesis of her identity with Mary Magdalene.

Mary, the Wife of Clopas (Gk. Maria hē tou Klōpa, KJV “of Cleophas”). In John’s gospel we read that “there were standing by the cross of Jesus His mother, and His mother’s sister, Mary the wife of Clopas, and Mary Magdalene” (John 19:25). The same group of women is described by Matthew as consisting of “Mary Magdalene, along with Mary the mother of James and Joseph, and the mother of the sons of Zebedee” (Matt. 27:56) and by Mark as “Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the Less and Joses, and Salome” (Mark 15:40). From a comparison of these passages it appears that Mary of Clopas and Mary the mother of James the Less and Joseph are the same person and that she was the sister of Mary the mother of Jesus. In answer to the alleged improbability of two sisters having the same name, it may be said that Miriam, the sister of Moses, may have been the holy woman after whom Jewish mothers called their daughters. This is on the hypothesis that the two names are identical, but on a close examination of the Greek text we find that it is possible that this was not the case. The virgin Mary is Mariam; her sister is Maria. Mary of Clopas was probably the elder sister of the Lord’s mother. She is brought before us for the first time on the day of the crucifixion—in the parallel passages already quoted from Matthew, Mark, and John. In the evening of the same day we find her sitting desolately at the tomb with Mary Magdalene (Matt. 27:61; Mark 15:47), and at the dawn of Easter morning she was again there with sweet spices, which she had prepared on Friday night (Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:1; Luke 23:56), and was one of those who had “a vision of angels, who said that He was alive” (Luke 24:23). It is probable that Clopas was dead and that the two widowed sisters lived together in one house.

Mary, Mother of Mark. Also sister to Barnabas (cf. Col. 4:10). It would appear from Acts 4:37 and 12:12 that while the brother disposed of his property for the benefit of the church, the sister gave up her house as one of the places of meeting. The fact that Peter went to that house on his release from prison indicates that there was some special intimacy between them, and this is confirmed by the language he uses toward Mark as being his “son” (1 Pet. 5:13). “It has been surmised that filial anxiety about her welfare during the persecutions and the famine that harassed the church at Jerusalem was the chief cause of Mark’s withdrawal from the missionary labors of Paul and Barnabas.”

A Christian woman at Rome to whom Paul sent greetings, as to one “who has worked hard for you” (Rom. 16:6).

MASH (mash). One of the sons of Aram, the son of Shem (Gen. 10:23). In 1 Chron. 1:17 (and in Gen. 10:23 in the NIV) the name appears as Meshech.

MA´SHAL (ma´shal). A Levitical town in Asher (1 Chron. 6:74). It was assigned to the Gershonite Levites. Called Mishal in Josh. 19:26 (NASB and NIV; KJV is Misheal); 21:30 (NASB, KJV and NIV).

MAS´KIL (mas´kil). Appears in the titles of Pss. 32, 42, 44, 45, 52–55, 74, 78, 88, 89, 142; meaning uncertain.

MASON. See Handicrafts: Builder; Stoneworker; and also the article House.

MAS´REKAH (mas´re-ka; “vineyard”). A city in Edom, and the native place of Samlah, an Edomite king (Gen. 36:36; 1 Chron. 1:47). It is Jebel el-Mushrak, twenty-two miles SW of Ma´an.

MAS´SA (mas´a; “burden”). A son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:14; 1 Chron. 1:30). His descendants were not improbably the Masani, who are placed by Ptolemy E of Arabia, near the borders of Babylonia. The Assyrian inscriptions name Massa with Tema and Nebaioth.

MAS´SAH (mas´a; “trial, temptation”). A name given to the place where the Israelites murmured for want of water (Ex. 17:7; Deut. 6:16; 9:22; 33:8); called also Meribah (which see).

MAST. See Ship.

MASTER.

1. A man who rules, governs, or directs. A possessor, owner (Heb. ʾādôn), e.g., the “owner” of the hill of Samaria (1 Kings 16:24); a master of servants (Gen. 24:14, 27; 39:2, 7); of kings, as lords of their subjects (Isa. 26:13); also rendered “lord,” as of a husband as lord of a wife (Gen. 18:12) or a ruler to whom honor is due (45:8); or one to whom respect is due, as a brother (Num. 12:11).

2. Gk. kurios, one who is “supreme” in authority, as in “no one can serve two masters” (Matt. 6:24; Mark 13:35; Luke 14:21–23; 16:13; Acts 16:16, 19; etc.), elsewhere rendered lord (which see).

3. A superintendent or overseer in a general sense, rendered by the Gk. epistatēs, “appointed over.” This expression is used for rabbi (which see) by the disciples when addressing Jesus (Luke 5:5; 8:24; 9:33, 49; 17:13).

MASTICH. See Vegetable Kingdom.

MA´TRI (ma´trī). See Matrite.

MA´TRITE (ma´trīt; “rainy”).

Benjamite family to which Saul the king of Israel belonged (1 Sam. 10:21), considerably before 1020 B.C.

MAT´TAN (mat´an; a “gift”).

1. The priest of Baal slain before his altars in the idol temple at Jerusalem (2 Kings 11:18; 2 Chron. 23:17), 836 B.C. He probably accompanied Athaliah, the queen mother, from Samaria.

2. The father of Shephatiah, one of the officials who charged Jeremiah with treason and afterward cast him into prison (Jer. 38:1–6), before 588 B.C.

MAT´TANAH (mat´a-na; a “gift”). The fifty-third station of Israel, on the N side of Arnon (Num. 21:18–19). Probably to be identified with Khirbet el-Medeiyineh.

MATTANI'AH (mat-a-nī'a; "gift of Jehovah").

1. The original name of Zedekiah (which see), king of Judah, which was changed when Nebuchadnezzar placed him on the throne instead of his nephew Jehoiachin (2 Kings 24:17).

2. A Levite singer of the family of Asaph residing at Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:15), about 440 B.C. He is described as the son of Mica (Neh. 11:17; 12:35) and after the return from Babylon lived in the villages of the Netophathites (cf. 1 Chron. 9:16; Neh. 12:28), which the singers had built in the neighborhood of Jerusalem (12:29). As leader of the Temple choir after its restoration (11:17; 12:8) in the time of Nehemiah, he took part in the musical service that accompanied the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (12:35). We find him among the Levites of the second rank, who were gatekeepers (12:25).

3. One of the fourteen sons of Heman, whose office it was to blow the horns in the Temple service as appointed by David. He had charge of the ninth division of musicians (1 Chron. 25:4, 16), about 975 B.C. He is possibly the same as the father of Jeiel, descendant of Asaph and ancestor of Jahaziel the Levite in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 20:14).

4. A descendant of Asaph, the Levite singer, who assisted in the purification of the Temple in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:13), c. 715 B.C.

5. An Israelite "of the sons of Elam" who divorced his Gentile wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:26), 456 B.C.

6–8. Three Israelites—one a descendant (or resident) of Zattu (Ezra 10:27), another "of the sons" (i.e., inhabitants) of Pahath-maob (10:30), and still another a descendant (or resident) of Bani (10:37)—who put away their Gentile wives after the captivity, 456 B.C.

9. A Levite, father of Zaccur and grandfather of Hanan, the latter of which had charge of the offerings for the Levites in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 13:13), considerably before 444 B.C.

MAT'TATHA (mat'a-tha; "gift of Jehovah"). The son of Nathan and grandson of David, among the ancestry of our Lord (Luke 3:31).

MAT'TATHAH. See Mattatha; Mattattah.

MATTATHI'AS (mat-a-thī'as). Gk. form of Heb. Mattathiah ("gift of Jehovah").

1. The son of Amos and father of Joseph, in the genealogy of our Lord (Luke 3:25).

2. The son of Semein in the same catalog (Luke 3:26). "As no such name appears in the parallel passages of the Old Testament, and would here unduly protract the interval limited by other intimations of the generations, it is probably interpolated from No. 1" (Strong, Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels, p. 16).

MAT'TATTAH (mat'a-ta). An Israelite of the "sons" (inhabitants) of Hashum who put away his foreign wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:33; "Mattathah," KJV), about 456 B.C.

MATTENA I (mat-te-nī; "liberal," probably a contraction of Mattaniah).

1, 2. Israelites, one a son (or citizen) of Hashum (Ezra 10:33), and the other of Bani (10:37), who put away their foreign wives after the captivity, 456 B.C.

3. A priest of the family of Joiarib, who lived in the time of Joiakim the son of Jeshua (Neh. 12:19), after 536 B.C.

MAT'THAN (math'an). The son of Eleazar and father of Jacob, which last was father of Joseph, "the husband of Mary" (Matt. 1:15–16), considerably before 40 B.C.

MAT'THAT (math'at; "gift," i.e., "of God").

1. The son of Levi and father of Eli, who was the father of the virgin Mary (Luke 3:24), before 22 B.C.

2. The son of another Levi and father of Jorim (Luke 3:29).

MATTHEW (math'ú; contraction of Mattathias, "gift of Jehovah"). The son of a certain Alphaeus, surnamed Levi (Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27). It is not known whether his father was the same as the Alphaeus named as the father of James the Less, but he was probably another.

Residence and Profession. Matthew's residence was at Capernaum, and he was a publican or "tax-gatherer." There was at that time a large population surrounding the Lake of Gennesaret; its fisheries supplied a source of livelihood, and its surface was alive with busy navigation and traffic. A customhouse was established at Capernaum by the Romans, where Matthew was tax collector. The publicans proper were usually Romans of rank and wealth, who farmed out the business of collecting to resident deputies called portitors. It was to this class that Matthew belonged.

Call. While Matthew was thus occupied, "sitting in the tax office," Jesus said to him, "Follow Me!" He probably already knew Jesus, for he immediately "rose, and followed Him" (Matt. 9:9; Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27–28). Shortly after this Matthew "gave a big reception for Him in his house" (Luke 5:29; cf. Matt. 9:10; Mark 2:15) and perhaps as a farewell to his old associates, for "many tax-gatherers and sinners came and were dining" (Matt. 9:10). After this we find no mention of him except in the catalogs of the apostles (Luke 6:15) and his presence in the "upper room" in Jerusalem after our Lord's ascension (Acts 1:13). The gospel that bears his name was written by this apostle, according to the testimony of all antiquity. Tradition relates that Matthew preached in Judea after the ascension for twelve or fifteen years and then went to foreign nations.

MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF. The first book of the NT. It was undoubtedly placed first in the category of the four gospels because at an early date it was received as authentic and presented the life of Jesus Christ particularly as it affected Jews converted to Christianity.

Theme. The subject of the book is outlined in the first verse. The gospel of Matthew is "the book of the genealogy of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham" (Matt. 1:1). In this introduction our Lord is related to two of the most important OT covenants, the Davidic (2 Sam. 7:8–16) and the Abrahamic (Gen. 15:18). Matthew, accordingly, describes Jesus Christ in this twofold character. In line with the scope indicated in v. 1 of chap. 1 he sets forth first the King the son of David, then the son of Abraham in His obedience unto death. In this book the covenant King of Israel, David's "righteous Branch" (Jer. 23:5; 33:15) is presented. The first twenty-five chapters deal with the King of the Davidic covenant; His royal birth in Bethlehem, fulfilling Mic. 5:2; the ministry of John the Baptist, the King's forerunner, fulfilling Mal. 3:1; the ministry of the King Himself, His rejection by the nation Israel, and His predictions of His second coming in power and great glory. S. Lewis Johnson says, "The theme of Matthew, then, is the presentation of the King and His kingdom to the nation in fulfillment of the OT prophecy" (Bibliotheca Sacra 112 [April 1955]: 144). Not until the closing part of the book (chaps. 26–28), does Matthew revert to the Abrahamic covenant. He then records the propitiatory death of the son of Abraham. To determine the "structure" and purpose of the gospel, one must take this division in 1:1 into consideration. The book is peculiarly the gospel for Israel, but as proceeding from the atonement of Christ, a gospel of world outreach.

Outline.

- I. The King, the son of David, offered to Israel (1:1–25:46)
 - A. The genealogy and birth of the King (1:1–25)
 - B. The infancy and concealment of the King (2:1–23)
 - C. The kingdom presented to Israel and rejected (3:1–11:1)
 - D. The revelation of the King's new program (11:2–13:52)

- E. The ministry of the rejected King (13:53–23:39)
- F. The rejected King’s promise to return in power and glory (24:1–25:46)
- II. The King, the son of Abraham, put to death and raised again (26:1–28:8)
- III. The King in resurrection ministry to His disciples (28:9–20)

Author. This gospel was incontestably written by the apostle Matthew, whose original name was Levi. He was a Jew whose father’s name was Alphaeus. As he was a tax collector under the Romans at Capernaum and thus a hated publican, it is unthinkable that his name would have been attached to the first gospel had he not been the actual writer of it. Moreover, seventeen independent witnesses of the first four centuries attest its genuineness.

Original Language. Despite the critical claim that Matthew originally wrote the gospel in Aram., this contention has never been proved. If there was an Aram. original, it disappeared at an early date. The Gk. gospel, which is now the church’s heritage, was almost beyond doubt written in Matthew’s lifetime. The Jewish historian Josephus furnishes an illustration of the fate of the Heb. original of Matthew, if such ever existed. The celebrated historian himself tells us that he penned his great work “The History of the Jews’ Wars” originally in Aram., his native tongue, for the benefit of his own nation and that he subsequently rendered it in Gk.

Date. The book of Matthew, like the other synoptics and the book of Acts, does not report the fall of Jerusalem and the Temple but describes these events as still future. These books had been written either before this tragedy or a long time after it. It would be indeed rash to put them long after A.D. 70. Therefore, they must have been penned before that date. Since Luke’s gospel is earlier than Acts, and Matthew is certainly earlier than Luke, it seems entirely probable that if he wrote an Aram. original he did so around A.D. 40–45. This would place the Gk. Matthew around the middle of the first century A.D.

Purpose. Matthew seems definitely to have written to confirm persecuted Jewish believers in their faith and to reconcile them in their thinking that the gospel was not a rejection of OT prophecies but rather an outworking of the great promises of the Abrahamic and Davidic covenants. The Jews needed clear demonstration of the Messiah’s Person and work and to have objections removed that hindered unbelieving Jews. The writer accomplishes this purpose by proving the kingship of the predicted divine-human Messiah; that He fulfilled OT predictions in His Person and work; that He produced the credentials of Israel’s King and announced teachings of the kingdom; and His Person and work were rejected by the nation; that He announced a new program, His death, resurrection, and second advent; and that after this present age of His building the church, He will return to set up His kingdom. It is thus uniquely the gospel for the Jews. M.F.U.

MATTHI’AS (ma-thi’as; evidently a variant of Mattathias, “gift of Jehovah”). Of the family of Matthias no account is given, and of his life we have no account, excepting the incident narrated in Acts 1:15–26, where he is chosen as an apostle. The 120 were assembled at Jerusalem, waiting for the advent of the Holy Spirit and, at the suggestion and under the supervision of Peter, proceeded to fill the place among the twelve left vacant by the defection and death of Judas Iscariot. Peter laid down the essential qualification for the apostolic office—his having been one of the companions of Christ from His baptism by John till His ascension—and declared the object of the election to be “a witness with us of His resurrection” (1:21–22). Two such men were chosen, but the ultimate decision was referred to God Himself by the sacred trial of the lot, accompanied by prayer. The two were Joseph, called Barsabbas, and surnamed Justus; and Matthias, upon whom the lot fell. He was immediately numbered among the apostles. Nothing reliable is recorded of his later life. He is not mentioned again in the NT. Eusebius and Epiphanius believed him to be one of the seventy disciples. One tradition says that he preached the gospel in Judea and was then stoned to death by the Jews. Others make him a martyr—by crucifixion—in Ethiopia or Colchis. An apocryphal gospel was published under his name, and Clement of Alexandria quotes from the Traditions of Matthias (Kitto; Smith).

The Lot. According to Grotius, this was taken by means of two urns. In one they placed two rolls of paper, with the names of Joseph and Matthias written within them, and in the other two rolls, one with the word “apostle” and the other blank. One roll was drawn from each urn simultaneously. Clarke (Com.) believes that the selection was by ballot, the Lord directing the mind of the majority to vote for Matthias. In the case of selection by lot there was no chance, for “the lot is cast into the lap [properly urn], but its every decision is from the Lord” (Prov. 16:33).

MATTHITHI’AH (mat-i-thī’a; “gift of Jehovah”).

1. A Levite, the eldest son of Shallum the Korahite, who had charge of the baked offerings, “things which were baked in pans” (1 Chron. 9:31), probably after the Exile, about 445 B.C.

2. One of the sons of Jeduthun, a Levite appointed chief of the fourteenth division of the Temple musicians by David (1 Chron. 25:3, 21). He is probably the same as the one appointed to assist in the musical service at the removal of the Ark to Jerusalem and to act as gatekeeper (15:18, 21; 16:5), about 988 B.C.

3. An Israelite, of the “sons” (residents) of Nebo, who put away his Gentile wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:43), 456 B.C.

4. One of those who stood at the right hand of Ezra when he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), about 445 B.C.

MATTOCK. An agricultural implement like a pickax, with a wide point for grubbing up and digging out roots and stones (1 Sam. 13:20–21). Until the time of Saul, the Philistines had a monopoly on the smelting of iron, and Israelites had to take their tools to them for sharpening.

Although the mattock appears in the KJV, the NIV, and the NASB, different Heb. words are behind the term in the three versions. See Coulter; Plowshare.

MAUL. A club (so NASB and NIV, Prov. 25:18).

MAW. The stomach of a sacrificial animal (so NASB, Deut. 18:3).

MAZ’ZAROTH (maz’a-rōth). Only in Job 38:32, KJV (marg., NASB; the NIV reads “morning star,” marg.), and referring to the twelve signs of the zodiac, which were imagined as menazil, i.e., lodging houses, or burug, strongholds, in which, one after another, the sun lodges as it completes the circle of the year. The question, “Can you lead forth a constellation [mazzaroth] in its season?” means, Can you lead forth the zodiacal sign for each month, so that it becomes visible after sunset as it is visible before sunset? To these signs priests offered incense and were abolished by Josiah (2 Kings 23:5).

ME JARKON. See Me-Jarkon.

ME-ZAHAB. See Mezahab.

ME´AH. See Hundred, Tower of the.

MEAL.

1. (Heb. qemah, “marrow”). The fatness of wheat, or barley, i.e., its ground substance (Num. 5:15; 1 Kings 4:22; etc.).

2. Fine meal (Matt. 13:33; Luke 13:21), the finest portion of flour (which see).

MEALS, MEALTIME. See Food.

MEA´RAH (me-a´ra; a “cave”). A place between Tyre and Sidon (Josh. 13:4). Possibly only a cave, although extensive ruins are thought by Robinson possibly to be those of “Mearah of the Sidonians.” The NIV renders “from Arah,” taking the me as the prefixed preposition, “from.” See Arah.

MEASURE. See Metrology.

MEASURING LINE. See Metrology: Linear Measures.

MEASURING ROD OR REED. See Metrology: Linear Measures.

MEAT. This word does not appear in the KJV in the sense of animal food, which is denoted uniformly by “flesh.” Perhaps “savory meat” (Gen. 27:4) and “corn and bread and meat” (45:23) would be exceptions (the NASB renders “savory dish” and “grain and bread and sustenance”). The only real and inconvenient ambiguity caused by the change that has taken place in the meaning of the word is in the case of the “meat-offering,” which consisted solely of flour and oil, sacrifices of flesh being confined to the other offerings. The NASB and NIV read “grain offering” (Lev. 6:14).

Several other words, distinct in the original, are rendered “meat” in the KJV; these are generally replaced in the NASB and NIV by “food.” None presents any special interest except Heb. terep (something torn). This word is rendered “food” in the NASB, with a marginal reading of “prey.” In the NT a variety of Gk. words are rendered “meat” in the KJV; in the NASB and NIV such expressions as “at the table,” “something to eat,” and “food” are used instead.

MEAT OFFERING. A KJV expression referring to a particular grain offering, the NASB and NIV rendering of the Heb. See Sacrifices.

MEBUN´NAI (me-bun´i; “built, constructed”). In this form appears, in one passage only (2 Sam. 23:27), the name of one of David’s guard, who is elsewhere called Sibbecai (21:18; 1 Chron. 11:29; 20:4; 27:11).

MECHE´RATHITE (me-ke´rath-īt), Meke´rath-ite (NIV). A native or inhabitant of Mecherah (1 Chron. 11:36); from 2 Sam. 23:34 it would appear to be a corruption for Maacathite.

MECO´NAH (me-kō´na; “a base or foundation”; “Mekonah,” KJV). A town situated near Ziklag in the south of Palestine and inhabited by men of Judah after the captivity (Neh. 11:28).

ME´DAD (mē´dad; “beloved, friend”). One of the seventy elders chosen to assist Moses in the government of the people. He and Eldad remained behind in the camp and were not among the rest of the seventy at the Tabernacle. When the Spirit came upon these, He descended also upon Medad and Eldad, so that they prophesied. A lad reported the matter to Moses, who did not forbid them, as requested by Joshua, but replied, “Would that all the Lord’s people were prophets” (Num. 11:26–29), c. 1441 B.C.

ME'DAN (mē'dan). The third son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chron. 1:32), after 2050 B.C.

MED'EBA (med'ē-ba; “water of quiet”). A city of great antiquity in Moab (Num. 21:30), belonging to Reuben (Josh. 13:16). It was a sanctuary of the Moabites in the days of Ahaz and is named as one of the cities of Moab in the prophetic curse recorded in Isa. 15:2. When the Ammonites were defeated by Joab they found refuge in Medeba (1 Chron. 19:1–15). The ruins, about eighteen miles E of the Dead Sea, were fairly extensive in the nineteenth century, but little remains today. Most important of the antiquities is a sixth-century Byzantine floor mosaic discovered in the Greek Orthodox church at Medeba late in the nineteenth century when a new church was being constructed at the site. Though much of it was destroyed, the section representing Jerusalem is virtually intact; the map has now been incorporated into the pavement of the church. See M. Avi-Yonah, The Madaba Mosaic Map, Israel Exploration Society, 1954.

MEDES (mēds). Inhabitants of Media (which see; 2 Kings 17:6; 18:11; Isa. 13:17; Dan. 5:28, 31).

ME'DIA (mē'di-a). An ancient Asiatic country situated S of the Caspian Sea, N of Elam, E of the Zagros Mountains, and W of Parthia. It extended about 150,000 square miles, being about 600 miles in length and 250 miles in breadth. In the heyday of its power it stretched far beyond these confines. The country was noted for its horses. Its original inhabitants were subjugated by an Indo-European race called in the Heb. māday (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5). The country is called Media (Esther 1:3, 14, 18; 10:2; Isa. 21:2; Dan. 8:20). Darius is referred to in 5:31 as “the Mede.” Ezra 6:2 also refers to Media; as elsewhere “the Medes” are alluded to. Media comes into historical perspective in the ninth century B.C., being encountered in the inscriptions of Shalmaneser III (c. 836 B.C.), who conducted a campaign against these peoples in the Zagros Mountain region. The “Amadai” (Medes) are listed among those who paid tribute to the Assyrian Shamshi-Adad (825–812 B.C.). Adad-Nirari III (812–782 B.C.) continued contact with these people. The mighty Tiglath-pileser III (745–727 B.C.) invaded Media and added districts of it to the Assyrian Empire. Sargon II, after capturing Samaria (721 B.C.), deported Israelites into the towns of the Medes (2 Kings 17:6; 18:11). Later, around 710 B.C., Sargon more completely subdued the Median people and forced them to pay tribute in the form of horses. Sargon’s successor, Sennacherib, likewise put the Medes under heavy tribute.

In the succeeding years the Medes increased in power. About 614 B.C. they advanced down the Tigris and captured Asshur, the ancient capital of Assyria. In 612 B.C., Cyaxares, in an alliance with the Chaldeans under Nabopolassar and the Scythian hordes, captured Nineveh. This great event marked the crash of the Assyrian Empire. Cyaxares received as his part of the victor’s spoil Assyria proper and the neighboring countries toward the N and NW. Nabopolassar’s son Nebuchadnezzar married Cyaxares’ daughter. This event strengthened the alliance between Media and Babylonia. It was in the era of Nebuchadnezzar (c. 605–562 B.C.) that the Median kingdom reached the apex of its power. In this period the empire included what is today part of Iraq, Iran, Anatolian Turkey, and Armenia. It embraced Ecbatana, present-day Hamadan, and Rhagae, modern Tehran.

Persia was dominated by Media until the rise of Cyrus II, founder of the mighty Persian Empire. About 549 B.C. he subdued Media, establishing his capital in Pasargadae. Under the Persians, however, Media remained an important province and the dual name Medes and Persians long described the empire (Dan. 5:28; Esther 1:19). The expression “the laws of the Medes and Persians” was reminiscent of the unchangeable character of Median law, which even a king could not alter without the consent of his government. Medo-Persia, in a sense a dual nation, became a mighty empire that lasted until the conquests of Alexander the Great (330 B.C.). After Alexander's decease, it became a part of Syria (1 Macc. 6:56), or the Seleucid Empire. Subsequently it was part of the Parthian and Bactrian empires, and of the Neo-Persian Empire of the Sassanids (A.D. 226–641). M.F.U.; H.F.V.

ME'DIAN (mē'di-an). Darius, "the son of Ahasuerus, of Median descent" (Dan. 9:1), also called "the Mede" (5:31; 11:1).

MEDIATION, MEDIATOR. A term, the proper use of which in theology refers to the work of Christ in establishing the gospel dispensation, and in its continuance to the end.

Scriptural Basis. In several passages Christ is called the Mediator, i.e., "the mediator of a new covenant" (mesitēs, "middleman, mediator"; see 1 Tim. 2:5; Heb. 8:6; 9:15; 12:24). The Scriptures present Christ as the One through whom is effected reconciliation between God and men, and through whom the moral and spiritual harmony of the world, broken by sin, shall ultimately be restored (e.g., 2 Cor. 5:18–20; Col. 1:21–22; Heb. 2:17; 1 Cor. 15:24–28).

Theological. The following features of doctrine are of chief importance: (1) The necessity for mediation arises from the holiness of God and the sinfulness of man. The reconciliation wrought by Christ, therefore, is represented as having two phases, that of God to man, and that of man to God (see 2 Cor. 5:18–20). It should always be borne in mind, however, that the whole provision of the mediatorial economy arises from the love of God (John 3:16; Rom. 5:8). (2) Christ is the only Mediator (in addition to Scriptures above cited, see Acts 4:12; Gal. 2:12; 3:21). In His work of mediation His atoning death is central (see Matt. 20:28; 26:28; Rom. 5:6; 1 Cor. 1:18; 2:2; 1 Pet. 2:24; 3:18; etc.). But more generally the whole work of Christ as Prophet, Priest, and King is embraced in His own work of mediation. The teachings of the Scriptures leave no room for the Roman Catholic view that priests and saints and angels, and especially the virgin Mary, are mediators, a view that is based upon a false doctrine of the prerogative of the priesthood and also a false conception of human merit. But still it is admissible and proper to recognize the real, though subordinate, sense in which all believers are members of "a royal priesthood" (1 Pet. 2:9). The mediation of Christ, however, is supreme, and in its principal features stands entirely alone. (3) In Christ are found the necessary qualifications for this work. (1) He is the God-man. It was essential that the mediator should be divine; otherwise His sacrifice could not have availed to take away sins; He could not be the perfect revelation of God to men, or be the source of spiritual and eternal life to believers, or control all events for the final consummation of His kingdom (Heb. 9:14; Rom. 8:3; John 10:10; 1 Cor. 15:25). It was necessary that He should also be human; otherwise He could not have died to redeem us, or stood as our representative before God's law, or partaken in human experiences, or be united with us in a common nature (Heb. 2:11–16; 4:15; Rom. 8:3; Phil. 2:7). (2) He was without sin. As under the law the sacrifice laid upon the altar must be without blemish, so the "Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world" (John 1:29) must Himself be free from sin, otherwise His sacrifice would not have been acceptable; He could not have access to God or be the source of holy life for His people (Heb. 7:26; 4:15–16; 1 Pet. 1:19; 2:22). MEDITATION. “A private devotional act, consisting in deliberate reflection upon some spiritual truth or mystery, accompanied by mental prayer and by acts of the affection and of the will, especially formation of resolutions as to future conduct” (Cent. Dict., s.v.).

Meditation is a duty that ought to be attended to by all who wish well to their spiritual interests. It should be deliberate, close, and continuous (Pss. 1:2; 119:97). The subjects that ought more especially to engage the Christian mind are: the works of creation (19:1–6); the perfections of God (Deut. 32:4); the character, office, and work of Christ (Heb. 12:2–3); the office and operations of the Holy Spirit (John 15–16); the dispensations of Providence (Ps. 97:1–2); the precepts and promises of God’s words (Ps. 119); the value, powers, and immortality of the soul (Mark 8:36); the depravity of our nature, and the grace of God in our salvation, etc.

MEGID'DO (me-gid'ō; “place of troops”). One of the royal cities of the Canaanites (Josh. 12:21), first assigned to Issachar (17:11) but afterward belonging to Manasseh (Judg. 1:27). Megiddo did not become firmly occupied by the Israelites until the time of Solomon, who placed one of his twelve deputies over Taanach and Megiddo (1 Kings 4:12) and erected some costly works there (9:15). The valley of Megiddo was a part of the Plain of Esdraelon. It figured as a battlefield, and here Barak (which see) gained a notable victory over the king of Hazor, whose commanding general was Sisera (Judg. 4:15). To this place Ahaziah king of Judah fled, and there he died (2 Kings 9:27). But the chief historical interest of Megiddo is concentrated in the death of Josiah. He endeavored to stop Pharaoh Neco of Egypt, while the Egyptian was passing through the glens of Carmel into the plain of Megiddo. He was defeated, as he fled was shot by the Egyptian archers and died on the road to Jerusalem (23:29–30; 2 Chron. 35:20–24; Zech. 12:11). In the last passage the mourning mentioned is on account of Josiah’s death.

Megiddo is marked by the modern site Tell el Mutesellim. It has been extensively excavated and forms one of the most important archaeological sites of Palestine. In 1903–5 its remarkable archaeological history began when G. Schumacher of the Deutsche Orientgesellschaft first began examining it. However, by far the greatest work on the site was done by the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago. Begun under the direction of Clarence S. Fisher in 1925, this work was continued in subsequent years by P. L. O. Guy and Gordon Loud. The site was occupied in the late Stone Age, long before 4500 B.C. Around 3500 B.C. the first city at this site, commanding the strategic Plain of Esdraelon, was built. This city was surrounded by a massive wall originally some thirteen feet thick and later buttressed to twice that thickness. A brick wall and gate of c. 1880 B.C. are known. Thutmose III of Egypt captured the Canaanite city c. 1468 and held it briefly, but the Canaanites held the important strategic center until dispossessed by the Israelites (c. 1100 B.C.). It is not known whether or not David erected any construction at Megiddo. Solomon, however, reconstructed the city as one of his chariot towns (1 Kings 9:15; cf. 10:26–29). He also made it the center of one of his administrative districts. Shishak of Egypt (1 Kings 14:25; 2 Chron. 12:9), who overran Jerusalem and Judea in the fifth year of Rehoboam, apparently took Megiddo c. 925 B.C. He left evidence in an inscribed stela.

University of Chicago teams continued to excavate at Megiddo from 1925 to 1939, according to a plan to strip the entire mound down to bedrock. They took away a Persian town from Stratum I, an unwalled town of the time of King Josiah in the seventh century B.C. (Stratum II), an Assyrian governor's headquarters of the same century (Stratum III), and uncovered Stratum IV, which they identified as Solomonic. In that level they found two great stable compounds, a governor's palace, walls, and the city gate. Then in 1960 Yigael Yadin of the Hebrew University worked at Megiddo and modified the Chicago conclusions, assigning the walls, the city gate, and the palace to the time of Solomon and the stables to the days of Ahab. Moreover, the great water system, formerly dated to the twelfth century, Yadin reassigned to Solomon's day. Yadin's reinterpretations have generally been followed, but Yohanan Aharoni of Tel Aviv University defended the University of Chicago dating of Stratum IV as Solomonic. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

MEHET'ABEL (me-het'a-bel; "God benefits").

1. The daughter of Matred and wife of Hadad (or Hadar), the last named king of Edom (Gen. 36:39; 1 Chron. 1:50). See Hadad.

2. The father of Delaiah and grandfather of Shemaiah, which latter had been hired by Tobiah and Sanballat to intimidate Nehemiah (Neh. 6:10; "Mehetabeel," KJV), before 445 B.C.

MEHI'DA (me-hī'da). A person whose descendants (or a place whose inhabitants) were among the Temple servants who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:52; Neh. 7:54), before 536 B.C.

ME'HIR (me'hēr; "hire, price"). The son of Chelub and father (founder?) of Eshton, of the family of Judah (1 Chron. 4:11).

MEHO'LAH. See Meholathite.

MEHO'LATHITE (me-hō'la-thīt). Probably a native of Abel-meholah (which see; 1 Sam. 18:19; 2 Sam. 21:8).

MEHU'JAEL (me-hū'ja-el). The son of Irad (grandson of Cain) and father of Methushael (Gen. 4:18).

MEHU'MAN (me-hū'man; perhaps "faithful"). One of the seven eunuchs whom Ahasuerus commanded to bring Queen Vashti into the royal presence (Esther 1:10), about 478 B.C.

ME-JAR'KON (me-jar'kon; "waters of yellowishness"). A town near Joppa in the tribe of Dan (Josh. 19:46), which probably received its name from a nearby spring.

MEKO'NAH. See Mecō'nah.

MELATI'AH (mel-a-ti'a; "Jehovah has delivered"). A Gibeonite who assisted in repairing the wall of Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. 3:7), 445 B.C.

MEL'CHI (mel'ki; "my king"), Mel'ki (NIV).

1. The son of Jannai and father of Levi, fourth in ascent from the virgin Mary (Luke 3:24), much before 22 B.C.

2. The son of Addi, in the same genealogy as no. 1 (Luke 3:28).

MELCHI'AH. See Malchijah.

MELCHIS'EDEC. See Melchizedek.

MELCHI-SHUA. See Malchi-shua.

MELCHIZ'EDEK (mel-kiz'e-dek; "king of righteousness"). The king of Salem (i.e., Jerusalem) and "a priest of God Most High," who went out to congratulate Abraham on his victory over Chedorlaomer and his allies. He met him in the "valley of Shaveh (that is, the King's Valley)." Melchizedek brought bread and wine for the exhausted warriors and bestowed his blessing upon Abraham. In return the patriarch gave to the royal priest a tenth of all the booty taken from the enemy (Gen. 14:17–20), about 1970 B.C. Giving the tenth was a practical acknowledgment of the divine priesthood of Melchizedek, for the tenth was, according to the general custom, the offering presented to Deity. Melchizedek is mentioned in Ps. 110:4, where it is foretold that the Messiah would be "a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek," and in Heb. 5:7, where these two passages of the OT are quoted and the typical relation of Melchizedek to our Lord is stated at great length. "According to the order of Melchizedek" (Ps. 110:4) is explained by Gesenius and Rosenmüller to mean "manner," i.e., likeness in official dignity—a king and priest. The relation between Melchizedek and Christ as type and antitype is made in the epistle to the Hebrews to consist in the following particular: each was a priest (1) who is not of the Levitical tribe; (2) who is superior to Abraham; (3) whose beginning and end are unknown; (4) who is not only a priest, but also a king of righteousness and peace. "Without father," etc. (Heb. 7:3), refers to priestly genealogies. Melchizedek is not found on the register of the only line of legitimate priests; his father's name is not recorded, nor his mother's; no evidence points out his line of descent from Aaron. It is not affirmed that he had no father or that he was not born at any time or died on any day; but these facts were nowhere found on the register of the Levitical priesthood. Melchizedek offers an expressive type of Christ, the King-Priest, especially of the Messiah's work in resurrection, inasmuch as the ancient character offers bread and wine, memorials of sacrifice. The writer to the Hebrews beautifully describes the everlasting continuance and kingly authority of Christ's high priesthood by the phrase "according to the order of Melchizedek" (6:20; cf. 7:23–24). The priesthood, as handed down through the line of Aaron, was often set aside by death. The Melchizedek aspect of Christ's priesthood portrays Christ in the perpetuity of His priestly office. "He always lives to make intercession" (7:25). Although the Aaronic priesthood could typify Christ's priestly work, it was limited in portraying the full scope of His priestly ministry. The Melchizedek type supplements the Aaronic type. As "king of righteousness" and "king of ... peace" (Heb. 7:2; cf. Isa. 11:4–9), Christ will in the coming Kingdom age assume both offices in His Person. The prophet Zechariah graphically sets this forth in the symbolic crowning of Joshua (Zech. 6:9–15). This significant event foreshadowed the millennial period when Messiah the Branch will "sit and rule on His throne. Thus, He will be a priest on His throne, and the counsel of peace will be between the two offices" (v. 13); that is, both kingship and priesthood will be united in one Person. M.F.U.

MEM (מ) (mām). The thirteenth letter of the Heb. alphabet, corresponding to Gk. mu (μ), Lat. and English m. In Ps. 119 it stands before the eighteenth section, in which each verse of the Heb. begins with this letter.

MEMBER (Gk. melos, a “limb”). A portion of the human body (Job 17:7; Rom. 6:13, 19; etc.).

Figurative. True believers are spoken of as being members of Christ’s mystical Body, the church, and therefore of each other (Eph. 4:25; 5:30).

MEMORIAL. That by which the memory of any person or thing is preserved. Thus the feast of the Passover was a memorial of Jehovah’s sparing the firstborn of Israel in Egypt (Ex. 12:14); the heap of stones left in the bed of the Jordan was a memorial of the Israelites’ crossing it (Josh. 4:7); the two engraved stones upon the shoulder pieces of the high priest’s ephod were “for a memorial” (Ex. 28:12), as were also the names engraved upon the jewels of his breastplate (v. 29). The sacrifice in the case of jealousy was called a memorial because it brought iniquity to remembrance (Num. 5:15). A memorial was also a record (Ex. 17:14; “book of remembrance,” Mal. 3:16). The act of Mary in anointing the feet of Jesus was to be spoken of in “memory of her” (Matt. 26:13; KJV and NIV, “memorial”; Mark 14:9; cf. Acts 10:4).

MEM'PHIS (mem'fis). An important ancient Egyptian capital situated on the Nile River some fifteen miles S of Cairo. The Hebrews were acquainted with Memphis under the name Noph (Isa. 19:13, KJV) and Moph (Heb. text of Hos. 9:6). The city goes back to the time of Menes, founder of the First Dynasty (c. 3100 B.C.). Herodotus asserts that Menes built the city on a strip of land reclaimed from the Nile. Manetho considered Dynasties III-V and VII-VIII to be Memphite. King Djoser embellished the city, and Imhotep, his renowned architect, constructed a step pyramid, a splendid monument in the Memphis acropolis at Saqqarah. This famous funerary structure is accounted the oldest extant stone structure in Egypt. Ptah was adored at this city. Memphis continued to be a famous metropolis even after the rise of Thebes and did not lose its importance until overshadowed by Alexandria, Alexander the Great’s brilliant city. Memphis existed down to the Middle Ages, but the ruins of its ancient buildings were carried away to build Cairo. Practically all that remains now of importance are a score of pyramids and the celebrated Sphinx, mute memorials of Memphis’s ancient glory. Jeremiah refers to the city’s outrages (Jer. 2:16). The weeping prophet also predicted Nebuchadnezzar’s Egyptian victories and that the people of Israel residing in Memphis would be carried away as captives (46:14–19). The prophet Ezekiel also made predictions concerning the city (Ezek. 30:13, 16).

Memphis was a huge metropolitan complex in its heyday. Besides its residential quarters, it had numerous temples and palaces and commercial districts with wharves, warehouses, workshops, and business establishments. It may have extended as much as twelve miles along the Nile and apparently consisted of residential complexes built around the royal palaces, with suburbs inhabited by populations of various origins. A clue to the size of greater Memphis may be derived from the sprawling chain of pyramids and mastabas that stretch for about twenty miles along the Nile W of the ancient site. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

MEMU'CAN (me-mū'kan). One of seven princes, or royal counselors, at the court of Ahasuerus, at whose suggestion Queen Vashti was divorced (Esther 1:14, 16, 21), about 478 B.C.

MEN'AHM (men'a-hem; "comforter"). The seventeenth king of the Northern Kingdom, Israel. He was the son of Gadi, and probably one of the generals of King Zechariah. When he heard of the conspiracy of Shallum, his murder of the king, and his usurpation of the throne, he went up from Tirzah and killed the usurper in Samaria. Menahem in turn usurped the throne and reduced Tiphshah because it refused to recognize him as king. He continued the calf worship of Jeroboam and contributed to the ungodliness, demoralization, and feebleness of Israel, a melancholy picture of which has been left by the contemporary prophets Hosea and Amos. During his reign the hostile forces of Assyria first appeared on the NE frontier of Israel. Tiglath-pileser III (Pul) received from Menahem a gift of one thousand talents of silver, exacted from Israel by an assessment of fifty shekels a head, and became his ally. Menahem's reign lasted ten years, about 752–742 B.C. He left the throne to his son Pekahiah (2 Kings 15:14–22).

ME'NAN. See Men'na.

ME-NE, ME-NE, TE-KEL, UPHAR-SIN. The words of an inscription supernaturally written upon the wall in Belshazzar's palace (Dan. 5:5–28). The words are Chaldee, and their meaning is given in the text; mēne, "numbered"; tēqēl, "weighed"; ûparsîn, from pāras, "divided," i.e., "dissolved, destroyed." "In all the three words there lies a double sense, which is brought out in the interpretation.... Daniel interprets mene: thus God had numbered thy kingdom, i.e., its duration, and has finished it, i.e., its duration is so counted out that it is full, that it now comes to an end.... The interpretation of tekem presents this double meaning: Thou art weighed in the balances and found too light, i.e., deficient in moral worth. In upharsin, 'thy kingdom is divided,' the meaning is not that the kingdom was to be divided into two equal parts; but peras is to divide into pieces, to dissolve the kingdom" (Keil, Com., ad loc.).

It is recorded that the wise men could not "declare the interpretation of the message" and that it must have required a supernatural endowment on the part of Daniel—a conclusion confirmed by the exact coincidence of the event with the prediction.

ME'NI (mē'nī). See Gods, False.

MEN'NA (men'a). The son of Mattatha and father of Melea in the ancestry of Jesus (Luke 3:31; "Menan," KJV).

MEON'ENIM, PLAIN OF. The NASB of Judg. 9:37 replaces the KJV expression with "the diviners' oak," marg. "terebinth." The NIV has "soothsayers' tree."

MEON'OTHAI (me-on'o-thī; "my dwellings"). Apparently the brother of Hathath, the son of Othniel, and father of Ophrah (1 Chron. 4:14), after 1440 B.C.

MEPH'AATH (mef'a-ath; "illuminative"). A Levitical city (Josh. 21:37; 1 Chron. 6:79) in the tribe of Reuben (Josh. 13:18). According to Eusebius, a garrison was stationed here as a defense against the inhabitants of the desert. It seems originally to have been a dependency of the Amorites (Num. 21:26) but afterward to have belonged to Moab (Jer. 48:21). Perhaps Tell Jawa, six miles S of 'Amman.

MEPHIB'OSHETH (me-fib'o-sheth; "exterminator of shame," i.e., "idols").

1. The son of Saul by his concubine Rizpah, the daughter of Aiah. He and his brother Armoni were among the seven victims who were surrendered by David to the Gibeonites and by them slain before Jehovah, to avert a famine from which the country was suffering (2 Sam. 21:8–9), about 996 B.C.

2. The son of Jonathan, and grandson of Saul. When his father and grandfather were slain at Gilboa, Mephibosheth was a child five years of age, living under the care of his nurse, probably at Gibeah. When the tidings of the disaster came to the royal household the nurse fled, carrying the child upon her shoulder. In her haste she let him fall, and Mephibosheth was crippled for life in both feet (2 Sam. 4:4), about 1000 B.C.

After the accident Mephibosheth seems to have found a refuge in the house of Machir, a Gadite sheikh at Lo-debar, near Mahanaim, by whom he was brought up (Josephus Ant. 7.5.5). He married and was living there when David, having conquered his enemies, had leisure to make endeavors to fulfill his oath to Jonathan by the stone Ezel that he would not cut off his loving-kindness from his house forever (1 Sam. 20:15). From Ziba he learned of the existence and whereabouts of Mephibosheth, and brought him and his son Micah (2 Sam. 9:1–5; cf. 1 Chron. 9:40) to Jerusalem. The interview was characterized by fear and reverence on the part of Jonathan's son and by kindness and liberality on that of David. All the property of his grandfather was conveyed to Mephibosheth, and Ziba was commanded to cultivate the land in his interest. Mephibosheth took up his residence in Jerusalem and was a daily guest at the royal table (2 Sam. 9:6–13), about 984 B.C.

The next mention of Mephibosheth respects his behavior upon the revolt of Absalom. Of this there are two accounts—his own (2 Sam. 19:24–30) and that of Ziba (16:1–4)—and they naturally differ. Ziba, because of his loyalty and kindness, was rewarded with the possessions of his master. Mephibosheth met David a few days after and told his story, namely, that he had desired to flee with his benefactor but was deceived by Ziba, so that he was obliged to remain behind. He had, however, done all that he could to evidence his sympathy with David, having gone into the deepest mourning for his afflicted friend. From the day the king left he had allowed his beard to grow ragged, his feet to be unwashed, and his linen unchanged. David doubtless believed his story and revoked his judgment given to Ziba so much as to have the land divided between the two. Mephibosheth's answer was, "Let him even take it all, since my lord the king has come safely to his own house," 967 B.C. We hear no more of Mephibosheth, except that the king did not let him be included in the vengeance that the Gibeonites were allowed to execute upon the house of Saul (21:7).

ME'RAB (me'rab; "increase"). The eldest daughter of King Saul (1 Sam. 14:49), whom, in accordance with the promise made before the death of Goliath (17:25), Saul had betrothed to David (18:17), about 1015 B.C. David's hesitation looks as if he did not much value the honor—at any rate, before the marriage Merab's younger sister, Michal, had displayed her attachment for David, and Merab was then married to Adriel the Meholathite, to whom she bore five sons (2 Sam. 21:8), who were given up to the Gibeonites by David.

MERA'IAH (mer-ī'ya; "rebellion"). A chief priest contemporary with the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:12).

MERA'IOTH (mer-ī'oth; "rebellious").

1. The son of Zerariah, a high priest of the line of Eleazar (1 Chron. 6:6–7, 52; Ezra 7:3). Lightfoot (Temple Service, 4:1) thinks that he was the immediate predecessor of Eli in the office of high priest and that at his death the high priesthood changed from the line of Eleazar to that of Ithamar. The same person is doubtless meant in 1 Chron. 9:11; Neh. 11:11, but placed by copyist's mistake between Zadok and Ahitub, instead of before the latter.

2. A chief priest whose house was represented in the time of Joiakim by Helkai (Neh. 12:15). The NIV renders the name Meremoth.

MERA'RI (mer-a-ri; "bitter, sad"). The third named of the sons of Levi, probably born in Canaan (Gen. 46:11; Ex. 6:16; Num. 3:17; 1 Chron. 6:1, 16, 19; etc.), about 1890 B.C. All that is known of his personal history is the fact of his birth before the migration of Jacob to Egypt and of his being one of the seventy persons who accompanied him there (Gen. 46:8, 11). He became the head of the third division of the Levites, that is, the Merarites.

MERA'RITES (me-ra'rits). See Levites.

MERATHA'IM (mer-a-thā'im; "twofold" or "double rebellion," Jer. 50:21). The name given to Babylon. "The dual expresses intensity, without two rebellions of Babylon being supposed. The allusion is to rebellious defiance of the Lord (v. 24). The summons is addressed to the avenger described in v. 3" (Orelli, Com., ad loc.).

MERCHANDISE, MERCHANT. See Commerce.

MERCURY. See Hermes.

MERCY (Heb. hesed, "kindness"; Gk. eleos, "compassion"). "Mercy is a form of love determined by the state or condition of its objects. Their state is one of suffering and need, while they may be unworthy or ill-deserving. Mercy is at once the disposition of love respecting such, and the kindly ministry of love for their relief" (Miley, Systematic Theology, 1:209–10). Mercy is a Christian grace and is very strongly urged toward all men (Matt. 5:7; 23:23; James 3:17; etc.). See Grace; Love.

MERCY SEAT. See Tabernacle.

ME'RED (me'red; "rebellion"). The second son of Ezrah, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:17–18).

MER'EMOTH (mer'e-mōth; "heights," i.e., "exaltations").

1. A priest, son of Uriah (Urijah), who was appointed to weigh and register the gold and silver vessels brought to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:33), about 457 B.C. He repaired two sections of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:4, 21), 445 B.C.

2. A layman of the "sons" (inhabitants?) of Bani, who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:36), 456 B.C.

3. A priest, or a family of priests, who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:5). The latter supposition is more probable, as in 12:3 the name occurs among those who returned with Zerubbabel a century before.

4. The NIV reading for Meraioth, no. 2 (which see). The NIV thus identifies this Meremoth with that of Neh. 12:3.

ME'RES (me'rez). One of the seven princes of Persia and Media in the days of Ahasuerus (Esther 1:14), about 478 B.C.

MER'IBAH (mer'i-ba; "quarrel, strife").

1. The latter of two names that Moses gave to a fountain because of the complaints of the people of Israel. It was near Rephidim, in the wilderness of Sin, probably in the Wadi Feiran on the western gulf of the Red Sea (Ex. 17:1–7), and called also "Massah" (v. 7).

2. There is another Meribah near Kadesh (Num. 27:14, Meribah of Kadesh; Deut. 32:51, Meribah-kadesh), generally distinguished from the first by adding the word "waters" to it (Pss. 81:7; 106:32, "waters of strife"; 95:8, "provocation"). It was at this place that Moses struck the rock and offended God by his impatience (Num. 20:10–13), near the close of the desert wanderings (Deut. 32:51).

MER'IBAH-KA'DESH (mer'i-ba-ka'desh; Deut. 32:51). See Meribah, no. 2.

MER'IB-BA'AL (mer'ib-ba'al; “contender with Baal”). The son of Jonathan (1 Chron. 8:34; 9:40), who in 2 Samuel is called Mephibosheth (which see) by substitution of Heb. bōshet (“shame”) for the false god.

MERO'DACH (me-ro'dak). See Gods, False.

MERO'DACH-BAL'ADAN (me-ro'dak-bal'a-dan; Akkad. “Marduk has given a son”). The name of a king of Babylon, contemporary with Hezekiah king of Judah (Isa. 39:1). He is mentioned also with the name Berodach-baladan (2 Kings 20:12), which form is due to a confusion of two Heb. characters that are much alike in their old forms.

Leader of the Chaldeans. Merodach-baladan was by race a Chaldean, and though the Chaldeans were almost certainly Semites they were nevertheless quite a distinct people (see Chaldeans). The Chaldeans were divided into a number of small tribes settled, for the most part, about the head of the Persian Gulf. They all envied the Babylonians their superior position and their vastly greater wealth, and again and again made efforts to win ascendancy and secure political control in the Euphrates valley. Had all these separate Chaldean tribes been united under one leader this might have been achieved long before the eighth century. The leadership was not secured until Merodach-baladan had made himself chief of the tribe of Bit Yakin, which had its seat in the marshes close by the head of the Persian Gulf. Even under so masterful a spirit as his, the Chaldeans would hardly have united but for his success in winning power in Babylonia. The prize of power in Babylonia had long been so highly esteemed among the Chaldeans that whoever won it was sure of leadership in all the Chaldean tribes as well as in his own. If the chief of the tribe of Bit Yakin became lord of Babylon he was certain to be called lord of the tribes of Bit Dakkuri, Bit Amukkani, and of every other Chaldean clan. In the year 732, Ukinzir, prince of the tribe of Amukkani, made himself king of Babylon in defiance of the Assyrian king who had been the ruler of Babylonia. That made him a sort of leader of all the Chaldeans, though they were not yet united enough to support him to the bitter end when the Assyrians were ready to attack him. When Tiglath-pileser III (see Tiglath-pileser) came into Babylonia to reconquer it, the Chaldean states submitted one after another without a struggle. Of all those chiefs who thus sent presents and acknowledged themselves as subjects of the Assyrians there was none so significant as Merodach-baladan, who presented (729 B.C.) an immense gift of gold, precious stones, choice woods, embroidered robes, cattle, and sheep. It was the first time that he had ever made submission to the Assyrians. The submission was for a time only—he would soon be in the full tide of rebellion. During the short reign of Shalmaneser V no attempt appears to have been made by Merodach-baladan or by any other Chaldean prince to gain ascendancy in Babylonia, or even complete freedom from Assyrian overlordship. But as soon as he was dead, in 722, the opportunity came and was speedily embraced. The successor of Shalmaneser was Sargon II, who had tremendous difficulties to face in the far west and would therefore presumably have but little time or energy to devote to Babylonia.

King of Babylon. Without any great difficulty Merodach-baladan took southern Babylonia and then the city of Babylon itself. On New Year's Day in 721 he was proclaimed the ruler of Babylon. That he dared this much is proof of the stuff of which he was made. Sargon, of course, had to meet this challenge and immediately entered Babylonia with his army. At Dur-ilu he met Merodach-baladan accompanied by Elamite allies. In later inscriptions Sargon claims a victory—that was the usual custom of writing royal documents—but it is perfectly clear from the sequel that it must have been a very small victory indeed. Merodach-baladan was left in possession of the city of Babylon, where he had enough wealth to satisfy him for the present and enough difficulties with priests and people to tax his highest powers. He was not likely to attempt to conquer northern Babylonia under the conditions that now prevailed, and Sargon let him operate freely, while he went to meet continually recurring rebellions elsewhere.

Merodach-baladan was now practically king of Babylon and naturally also head of all the Chaldean states. He had achieved much indeed, but he was left in a position of enormous difficulty—a position that would test his qualities of statesmanship, without which no king becomes really great.

Reverses. His statesmanship was not equal to his generalship, and he was soon in a turmoil. His Chaldean followers wanted plunder, as did his Aramaean and Elamite allies, and all these were consumed with mutual jealousies. He doubtless desired to govern well, for by so doing it was possible to win cordial allegiance from the Babylonian people and a firm hold upon the throne. But some concession had to be made to his hungry followers, so he gradually ventured on a career of plunder. The chief property owners of Sippar, Nippur, Babylon, and Borsippa were moved into Chaldea, and their possessions handed over to his followers. This act lost for him the allegiance of the priesthood and of the wealthy classes, and these now turned longingly to Sargon as a possible deliverer from the rapacious Chaldean. An army was dispatched southward from Assyria, which soon cut off Merodach-baladan from his Elamite allies. He was powerless to meet this Assyrian army and therefore had to flee into the land from which he had come, after ruling Babylon for eleven years. Sargon pursued him into Chaldea, where he was wounded and fled into Elam. There he waited for a favorable opportunity, which did not come until Sargon was dead and Sennacherib was on his throne.

King for the Second Time. Then came a rebellion in Babylonia against him under the leadership of a certain Marduk-zakir-shumu, who is called the son of a slave. When he had reigned only one month Merodach-baladan appeared and in 702 was again proclaimed king of Babylon. It was probably at just this time that Merodach-baladan sent his embassy to Hezekiah (2 Kings 20:12–19; 2 Chron. 32:31; Isa. 39:1–8), though the date of it is obscure and doubtful. This embassy was sent nominally to congratulate Hezekiah upon his recovery from illness but was probably an attempt to get Hezekiah to join in a rebellion in the west against the Assyrian king. Such a diversion as that would have greatly helped Merodach-baladan's position in Babylonia. The plan failed, for Sennacherib invaded Babylonia, and Merodach-baladan saved his life only by precipitate flight into his old homeland.

Final Reverses. Sennacherib then attacked the west, and while thus engaged, a new rebellion began in Babylonia in which, naturally enough, Merodach-baladan was ready to participate. It was, however, of very short duration, for Sennacherib entered the land again. Once more Merodach-baladan had to flee. He put his goods, his people, and his gods upon boats, floated them down the Euphrates to the Persian Gulf, and settled on its eastern shores in a part of Elam, where Sennacherib dared not follow. There in exile he soon died. His career is without a parallel among his people. It was filled with contradictions. No man before him of that race had held power so great for so long a time. He had failed ultimately, but his followers would in a later day succeed far beyond his dreams. R.W.R.; M.F.U.

ME'ROM (me'rom; "height, or upper waters"). Often identified with Lake Huleh, this is a triangular-shaped body of water, about 4½ miles in length by 3½ wide. It is 270 feet below the level of the Mediterranean Sea. The Jordan passes through it, and it was where Joshua won a great victory over the Canaanites (Josh. 11:5–8). It is in the upper part of Palestine, in a level plain at the foot of the hills of Naphtali that touch the roots of Hermon, itself 10,000 feet in height. Most of the Huleh region has now been drained by Israeli engineers, and it has been converted to productive farmland. The only reference to Merom in Scripture (Josh. 11:5–9) gives it as the scene of the third and last great victory gained by Joshua over the Canaanites. Some scholars, however, identify Merom with present-day Meiron, located at the base of Jebal Jermak W of Safed, where there is an important spring. Thutmose III (c. 1480 B.C.) refers to Mrm. Other scholars would locate Merom at Khirbet el-Bijar near Marun er-Ras, where there is also an abundance of spring water. H.F.V.

MERON'OTH. See Meronothite.

MERON'OTHITE (me-ron'o-thīt). The native of a place probably called Meronoth, of which, however, no further traces have yet been discovered. Two Meronothites are named in the Bible: (1) Jehdeiah, who had the charge of the royal donkeys of King David (1 Chron. 27:30); and (2) Jadon, one of those who assisted in repairing the wall of Jerusalem after the return from the captivity (Neh. 3:7).

ME'ROZ (mē'roz). A place in northern Palestine, referred to in Scripture in connection with a curse in the song of Deborah (Judg. 5:23; cf. 21:8–10; 1 Sam. 11:7). It would seem as if its people might have helped in the campaign against Sisera but failed to do so. It has been satisfactorily identified with Khirbet Mārūs some 7½ miles S of Kadesh of Naphtali.

ME'SECH (Ps. 120:5, KJV only). See Meshech, no. 1.

ME'SHA (mē'sha).

1. A place in Arabia, the western limit of the children of Joktan (Gen. 10:30) and possibly identical with Massa and Mash. However that may be, there is frequent mention of the latter country in the cuneiform inscriptions. It corresponds roughly with the Arabia Petraea of the geographers. It was the desert district that stretched away westward and southward of Babylon.

2. King of Moab and tributary to Ahab. At the death of Ahab (c. 853 B.C.) Mesha endeavored to shake off the yoke of Israel and free himself from the burdensome tribute of 100,000 lambs and the wool of 100,000 rams. When Jehoram became king he secured the assistance of Jehoshaphat in reducing the Moabites to their former condition of tributaries. The two armies marched by a circuitous route around the Dead Sea and were joined by the forces of the king of Edom. The Moabites were defeated and driven from their stronghold, from which the king and 700 fighting men made an attempt to break through the besieging army. Beaten back, he withdrew to the wall of the city, upon which he offered up his firstborn son and heir to the kingdom as a burnt offering to Chemosh, the fire god of Moab. His bloody sacrifice had the effect of inducing the besiegers to retire, with much spoil, to their own land (2 Kings 3:4–27), c. 851 B.C. The exploits of “Mesha, son [i.e., “votary”] of Chemosh, king of Moab,” are recorded in the inscription on the Moabite Stone, discovered by M. Ganneau at Dibon in Moab.

3. The eldest son of Caleb (brother of Jerahmeel and son of Hezron) and “father” (founder) of Ziph (1 Chron. 2:42), about 1390 B.C.

4. A son of the Benjamite Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (1 Chron. 8:9).

ME'SHACH (mē'shak). The name given to Mishaël, one of the companions of Daniel, by the commander of the officials of the Babylonian court. He and Daniel and two other captive youths were selected to be trained as personal attendants and advisers of the king (Dan. 1:7; etc.), about 604 B.C. See Shadrach.

ME´SHECH (mē’shek).

1. A Japhetic people alluded to in Gen. 10:2. Ezekiel refers to them as allied with Tubal and associated with Gog, “the prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal” (Ezek. 32:26; 38:2–3; 39:1). Ezekiel also mentions them as engaged in commerce in the emporia of Tyre, dealing in slaves and bronze vessels (27:13). In the records of Tiglath-pileser I (c. 1110 B.C.) and Shalmaneser III (860–825 B.C.) the land of Musku (Meshech) is mentioned and situated in the mountains on the northern boundary of Assyria and bordering on Tabal, biblical Tubal, in the west. The Moschoi and Tibarenoi are referred to by Herodotus as living in the mountains SE of the Black Sea (3.94; 7.78). Both Strabo and Pliny refer to Moschoi.

2. Another name (1 Chron. 1:17) for Mash (which see). M.F.U.

MESHELEMI´AH (me-shel-e-mī’a; “Jehovah remunerates”). A Levite of the family of Kore. He and his seven sons and brothers were gatekeepers of the Tabernacle in the time of David (1 Chron. 9:21; 26:1–2, 9), before 975 B.C. They were all assigned to the E gate, except Zechariah (v. 14), who had the N gate.

MESHEZ´ABEL (me-shez’a-bel; “God delivers”). The grandfather of Meshullam, who assisted in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:4), and one of the “leaders of the people” who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (10:21), and father of Pethahiah the Zerahite of Judah (11:24), before 445 B.C. Probably the same person is referred to in all the passages.

MESHIL´LEMITH (me-shil’e-mith; 1 Chron. 9:12). See Meshillemoth.

MESHIL´LEMOTH (me-shil’e-mōth; “deeds of recompense”).

1. A priest, the son of Immer and father of Meshullam (1 Chron. 9:12, where he is called Meshillemith). He is said (Neh. 11:13) to be the son of Immer and father of Ahzai, before 440 B.C.

2. The father of Berechiah, one of the leaders of Ephraim who protested against the attempt of the Israelites to make slaves of their captive brothers of Judah (2 Chron. 28:12), before 735 B.C.

MESHO´BAB (me-shō’bab; “returned, restored”). A leader of the tribe of Simeon, whose family so increased that he migrated to Gedor in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:34), about 719 B.C.

MESHUL´LAM (me-shul’am; “repaid, rewarded”).

1. The grandfather of Shaphan, the scribe who was sent by King Josiah to take charge of the money collected for the repairs of the Temple (2 Kings 22:3), before 639 B.C.

2. The eldest named of the children of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:19), about 536 B.C.

3. A Gadite, and one of the leaders of the tribe residing in Bashan, whose genealogies were taken in the time of Jeroboam and of Jotham (1 Chron. 5:13), 783–738 B.C.

4. A Benjamite, and one of the descendants of Elpaal living in Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 8:17).

5. A Benjamite, son of Hodaviah (1 Chron. 9:7), or Joed (Neh. 11:7), and father of Sallu, who resided at Jerusalem after the captivity, before 445 B.C.

6. Another Benjamite (son of Shephatiah) who lived at Jerusalem after the Exile (1 Chron. 9:8), about 445 B.C.

7. A priest (son of Zadok) whose descendants lived in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 9:11; Neh. 11:11), before 445 B.C. He is probably the same as Shallum (which see).

8. The son of Meshillemith and ancestor of Maasai (1 Chron. 9:12), or Amashsai (Neh. 11:13), long before 445 B.C.

9. A Levite of the family of Kohath and one of the overseers of the Temple repairs in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. 34:12), 639 B.C.

10. One of the “leading men” sent by Ezra to Iddo to gather together the Levites to join the caravan about to return to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:16), about 557 B.C.

11. A leader in the time of Ezra, probably a Levite, who assisted Jonathan and Jahzeiah in abolishing the marriages that some of the people had contracted with foreign wives (Ezra 10:15), 457 B.C. He is probably the Temple gatekeeper mentioned in Neh. 12:25, which last is also called Meshelemiah (1 Chron. 26:1), Shelemiah (v. 14), and Shallum (Neh. 7:45).

12. One of the “sons” (descendants) of Bani who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:29), 456 B.C.

13. The son of Berechiah who repaired a portion of the walls of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 3:4, 30), 445 B.C. It was his daughter who married Jehohanan, the son of Tobiah the Ammonite (6:18).

14. The son of Besodeiah; he, with Joiada, repaired the Old Gate of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:6), 445 B.C.

15. One of the principal Israelites who stood at Ezra’s left hand when he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), about 445 B.C. He is, perhaps, one of those who signed the sacred covenant (10:20).

16. One of the priests who signed the covenant made by Nehemiah and the people to serve the Lord (Neh. 10:7).

17. A priest in the days of Joiakim, the son of Jeshua, and representative of the house of Ezra (Neh. 12:13), after 536 B.C.

18. A priest at the same time as no. 17 above, and a son of Ginnethon (Neh. 12:16).

MESHUL’LEMETH (me-shul’e-meth; form of Meshullam (which see). The daughter of Haruz of Jotbah, wife of Manasseh, king of Judah, and mother of his successor, Amon (2 Kings 21:19), about 690 B.C.

MESI’AS. See Messiah.

MESO’BAITE. See Mezobaite.

MESOPOTA’MIA (mes-ō-po-tā’mi-a). “The country between the rivers,” the ordinary Gk. rendering of the Heb. Aram-naharaim, meaning “Aram,” or “Syria of the two rivers” (Gen. 24:10; Deut. 23:4; Judg. 3:8, 10; see Roger T. O’Callaghan, Aram-Naharaim [1948]). Mesopotamia is now known as Iraq. The two great rivers of the region are the Tigris and Euphrates. The term Mesopotamia refers to the upper part of the valley of the two rivers known today by Arabs as Al Jazira, or “the island.” In modern usage Mesopotamia embraces also the lower part of the valley. The Tigris and the Euphrates were the lifeblood of this region in antiquity. These mighty rivers, which cradled ancient civilization, have their sources in the 10,000-foot peaks of the Armenian mountains. Here they gain sufficient water from melting snows to feed streams that flow through the arid regions to the south. The silt-retaining waters of these rivers built the plain of Babylonia over the millennia and produced a region of extreme fertility that, with irrigation, produces wheat, barley, figs, dates, pomegranates, corn, and many other commodities. A network of irrigation canals honeycombed this region in antiquity, and it was capable of supporting a dense population and a very high degree of civilization. Great kings like Rim-Sin of Larsa and Hammurabi of Babylon took pride in their great irrigation projects, as did many other of those early rulers. Today this region lies scorched and almost uninhabitable with blistering heat and fine wind-driven sand. This territory was overrun by Muslims in the seventh century A.D. and the Mongols in the thirteenth, and its vast irrigation culture vanished. It was under Turkish rule until 1917, when the British took Baghdad. Since then British rule has been succeeded by the Iraqi government. Efforts are currently being made to restore the irrigation network of ancient times. These efforts are doomed to limited success because of the increasing salinity of the soil. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

MESS, MESSES (from Heb. maśat, a “raising”). The Heb. denotes the uplifting of hands in prayer (Ps. 141:2), the rising of a flame (Judg. 20:38, 40), or a “portion” (NASB and NIV) or “mess” (KJV) of food (Gen. 43:34; 2 Sam. 11:8).

MESSI’AH (Heb. māshîah, “anointed”; rendered in the LXX by the Gk. equivalent Christos). The word Christ is therefore almost invariably used instead of Messiah in the NT as the official designation of our Lord. In the OT priests are referred to as the “anointed” (e.g., Lev. 4:3; 8:12; Ps. 105:15), as are kings (e.g., 1 Sam. 24:7–11; 2 Sam 23:1; 1 Kings 19:16). We also read (19:16) of anointing to the office of prophet. But along with these subordinate uses of the term, which undoubtedly foreshadowed the three great offices of Christ as Prophet, Priest, and King, its highest use was employed to designate the One promised of God as the great Deliverer, and who was to be in a preeminent and altogether unique sense the Anointed, or the Messiah, of God. The subject is therefore extensive, and offers to the student an immense field for investigation not only in the OT and NT Scriptures but also in Jewish and Christian literature.

The Messianic Idea. The OT messianic revelation appears not merely in particular predictions. The whole of the OT is rather to be looked upon as bearing a prophetic character. The idea underlying the whole development of these Scriptures and the life dealt with therein is that of God’s gracious manifestation of Himself to men and the establishment of His kingdom on the earth. This idea becomes more and more distinct and centralizes itself more and more fully in the Person of the coming King, the Messiah. The creation and Fall of man and the growing sinfulness of the race make clear the need for deliverance. The preservation of a part of mankind from the Flood, and the continuance of human history, have great suggestion of promise. The call of Abraham, with the promise “in your seed all the nations of the earth shall be blessed” revealed the divine purpose, which had been previously indicated, yet more distinctly (see Gen. 22:18; cf. 12:3; 9:26; 3:15). The founding of the Jewish nation, its theocratic character, its institutions, its ritual, and its history all center on this one idea. The sinfulness of sin, the possibility of a divinely appointed method of deliverance from sin, and the realization of a kingdom of righteousness lie at the very basis of the Jewish economy. Moreover, the chosen nation bore its peculiar character not merely for its own sake, but also for the sake of the world. Upon condition of fidelity to the covenant the promise was given: “You shall be to Me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation” (Ex. 19:6). The devout wish of Moses was significant also in the same direction, “Would that all the Lord’s people were prophets” (Num. 11:29). But the highest glory of Israel was that from the nation One was to come in whom these noble relations to God and man, only to a large extent symbolized by the nation itself, should be perfectly fulfilled. The actual “Son” and “Servant” of God, the true Prophet, Priest, and King, was to be the Messiah. This is the key to the whole body of the OT Scriptures.

Designations. That various designations were given to the Messiah was only natural, and to have been expected. Among them are the “seed” of Abraham, “son of David,” “Son of Man,” “My Son,” “My Servant,” “My chosen one,” “the Branch,” “Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God, Eternal Father, Prince of Peace” (see Gen. 22:18; 2 Sam. 23:5; Ps. 2:7; Isa. 9:6–7; 42:1; Zech. 3:8; 6:12; Dan. 7:13–14; 10:16–18).

Prophetic Passages. The number of passages in the OT regarded by the Jews in pre-Christian times as prophetic of the Messiah is much larger than that of the special predictions to which Christians have commonly appealed. It is stated by Edersheim to be more than 456, of which 75 are from the Pentateuch, 243 from the Prophets, and 138 from the Hagiographa. “But comparatively few of these,” he adds, “are what would be termed verbal predictions.” This harmonizes, however, with what has already been said with regard to the general character of the OT revelation. (For a complete list of passages messianically applied in the rabbinic writings, see Edersheim’s Life and Times of Jesus, Appendix 9.) The predictions to which Christians as well as Jews have attached special importance embrace the following: Gen. 3:15 (the protoevangelium); 9:27; 12:3; 22:18; 49:8, 10; Deut. 18:18; 2 Sam. 7:11–16; 23:5; Pss. 2, 16, 22, 40, 110; Isa. 2, 7, 9, 11, 40, 42, 49, 53; Jer. 23:5–6; Dan. 7:27; Zech. 12:10–14; Hag. 2:9; Mal. 3:1; 4:5–6. For an exposition of these and other passages, reference may profitably be made to the OT commentaries, both Jewish and Christian.

Jewish Views of the Messiah. Two questions can be asked of the Jews: What Messiah did they expect? and, What should the OT revelation have led them to expect? While Jewish expectation had been deepening and in some respects becoming more definite and true during the centuries preceding the Christian era, so that at the time of our Lord’s appearing it seemed to await its immediate fulfillment, yet the Jewish people were not prepared to recognize Jesus as the Christ. The reason is found in the rabbinical and popularly received ideas of the Messiah. The fatal mistake of the Jews was not in rejecting the Scriptures but in giving to them a narrow and unspiritual interpretation. Jesus truly said, “You search the Scriptures, because you think that in them you have eternal life; and it is these that bear witness of Me; and you are unwilling to come to Me, that you may have life” (John 5:39–40). Their interpretation was far from being wholly false, as Edersheim shows with reference to the list of rabbinic interpretations noted above. It embraced “such doctrines as the premundane existence of the Messiah; his elevation above Moses, and even above the angels; his representative character; his cruel sufferings and derision; his violent death, and that for his people; his work in behalf of the living and of the dead; his redemption and restoration of Israel; the opposition of the Gentiles, their partial judgment and conversion; the prevalence of his law; the universal blessings of the latter days; and his kingdom.” But this same interpretation left out certain elements of greatest and governing importance. The doctrines of original sin, and of the sinfulness of man’s whole nature, were greatly reduced from their Scripture meaning and were practically omitted from the prevalent Jewish teaching. Consequently the deepest thought of the messiahship, the salvation of the world from sin, was lacking. In keeping with this, the priestly office of the Messiah was also lost sight of, as was the prophetic office of the Messiah. The all-absorbing ideas were those of kingship and deliverance. And these were chiefly of national significance. The restoration of national glory was the great hope of Israel. All else was subordinate to that. Of modern Jewish views our space permits only a few observations. Although the denial has been constant that Jesus is the Christ, and although during many centuries the Jews almost universally continued to look for their national deliverer (and their hope was again and again stimulated and disappointed by the appearance of more than a score of false Messiahs), marked changes have taken place within recent years in Jewish opinions and belief upon this subject. (1) The relatively small and diminishing class known as Orthodox Jews adheres to the ancient expectation. (2) The Reform Jews, embracing many of the most learned and influential, have laid this expectation aside. With this class the whole conception of the Messiah has become dim and confused. It is doubted as to whether the Messiah refers to a person or a time; also as to whether or not the person or time has arrived. (3) The main body of modern Jews still looks forward to the ingathering of the Jews and their restoration to national glory in the land of their forefathers, and along with this they expect an era of universal peace and harmony among men. But still there is great diversity of opinion as to the method and means by which these results are to be accomplished. The Messiah may mean a particular person born of the Jewish race, or the term may stand for a conjunction of events brought about by the Jewish people. A feature made prominent at present in Jewish denial of the messiahship of our Lord is that, in their view, the OT prophecies predict the full and blessed results of the messianic reign as coming at once with the advent of the Messiah, and such results have not come; and they can find no prediction of a second advent. To us as Christians this objection has no force, in view of the comprehensiveness and, at the same time, the gradual and incomplete development of OT prophecy. The prophecies of the old dispensation do indeed look forward to the ripened results of Christ's reign. But the prophecies of the NT supplement those of the OT in unfolding the gradual methods by which these results are to be reached, and in predicting the final glorious coming of Christ.

The Messianic Realization. The question, Is Jesus the Christ? is plainly of greatest importance, not to Jews only but to all races of mankind. This question is answered affirmatively because Jesus distinctly claimed to be the Messiah, a claim reconcilable with His character only upon the supposition that His claim was valid. The conception of messiahship that Jesus held and promulgated was unspeakably above the prevailing Jewish conception, and yet in reality was that of OT prophecy. The gospel of Matthew gives important revelation concerning the Messiah's kingdom. The phrase "kingdom of heaven," literally, "of the heavens," is peculiar to Matthew and denotes the messianic rule on the earth of Christ as the son of David. The designation is appropriate because it is the rule of the heavens over the earth (Matt. 6:10). The phrase is derived from the OT (Dan. 2:34–36, 44; 7:23–27), and it is said that the "God of heaven" will set up this kingdom covenanted to David's posterity (2 Sam 7:8–16) after the destruction of Gentile world powers by the returning Christ, the stone "cut out without hands." This kingdom was confirmed in regard to the Son of God through the angel Gabriel (Luke 1:31–33). In Matthew's gospel the kingdom of heaven is described in three ways: (1) as being at hand, from the beginning of John the Baptist's preaching (Matt. 3:2) to the rejection of the King and the announcement of His new message (12:46–50), (2) in the seven "mysteries of the kingdom of heaven" now being consummated in this present age, and (3) in the future prophetic aspect when the kingdom will be established at the return of Christ in glory (Matt. 24–25; Acts 15:14–18). Of this future messianic glory our Lord had full consciousness in His earthly public ministry. See Prophecy; Christ; Son of Man.

METALS. All the principal metals were familiar to the Hebrews and are mentioned in Scripture. For knowledge of metals in the ancient world, see Handicrafts: Goldsmith; Metalworker; Mineral Kingdom.

METALWORKER. See Handicrafts.

METEYARD. A linear measure. See Metrology.

ME'THEG-AM'MAH (me'theg-am'a; "bridle of the mother," i.e., "mother city"). The figurative term for a chief city of the Philistines, namely, Gath. To give up one's bridle to another is equivalent to submitting to him (2 Sam. 8:1), and "bridle of the mother city" means the jurisdiction or power of the metropolis. The NASB replaces Metheg-ammah with "chief city."

METHU'SAEL. See Methushael.

METHU'SELAH (me-thū'ze-la; "man of the dart"). The son of Enoch and grandfather of Noah. At the age of 187 he became the father of Lamech, after whose birth he lived 782 years and died at the advanced age of 969 (Gen. 5:21–22, 25–27; 1 Chron. 1:3).

METHU'SHAEL (me-thū'sha-el; "man of God"). The son of Mehujael and father of Lamech, of the family of Cain (Gen. 4:18; "Methusael," KJV).

METRETES. A foreign measure of capacity. See Metrology.

METROLOGY. The science of weights and measures.

Linear Measures. The names of the most common smaller linear measures are taken from members of the human body, because, in nearly all nations, these were at first used to measure lengths. As men's bodies differed in size these measures varied. But the progress of art and commerce gradually brought them to a uniform standard. The linear measurements were:

Finger or Digit (Heb. ʾešbaḥ). The smallest measure among the Hebrews, and equal to the breadth of the human finger (about 0.75 inch). We find the thickness of the solid parts of Solomon's pillars measured by fingers (Jer. 52:21).

Handbreadth (Heb. ṭepaḥ, between three and four inches, 2 Chron. 4:5; Ps. 39:5; ṭōpaḥ, Ex. 37:12). The width of the four fingers closely pressed together. The handbreadth was in common use in early Hebrew times (25:25; 1 Kings 7:26; etc.). It is used as an architectural term (1 Kings 7:9, "coping") and is thought to mean the corbels upon which the roof beams rest.

Span (Heb. zereth). The width from the end of the thumb to that of the little finger, when these were extended. This measure was in use among the Hebrews in very early times (Ex. 28:16; see 39:9; 1 Sam. 17:4). It was about nine inches.

Cubit (Lat. cubitum, "elbow, cubit"; Heb. ʾammâ; Gk. pēchus, the "forearm"). An important and constant measure among the Hebrews (Ex. 25:10, 17, 23; etc.; 1 Kings 7:24, 27, 31; etc.; Ezek. 40:5; etc.), and other ancient nations. It was commonly reckoned as the length of the arm from the point of the elbow to the end of the middle finger, about eighteen inches.

Egyptian Cubit. This was six handbreadths or palms, about 17.72 inches, but the royal Egyptian cubit was a palm longer (20.67 inches), evidence for this being found in measuring sticks recovered from tombs.

Babylonian Cubit. Herodotus states that the "royal" exceeded the "moderate" cubit by three digits. The majority of critics, however, think that Herodotus is speaking of the ordinary Greek cubit, though the opposite view is affirmed by Grote. Bockh estimates the Babylonian royal cubit at 20.806 inches.

Hebrew Cubit. The Hebrews, like the Egyptians and Babylonians, had two cubits, the common and apparently older cubit (Deut. 3:11; 2 Chron. 3:3), and a cubit that was a handbreadth longer (Ezek. 40:5; 43:14). The common Hebrew cubit was 17.72 inches and the long cubit 20.67 inches, apparently the same as the Egyptian royal cubit.

Pace (Heb. ša'ad, 2 Sam. 6:13). Equal to a “step,” and so translated elsewhere. The above passage is the only one in which the term can be used as a measure of distance and, if so, would answer to our yard.

Measuring Rod or Reed (Heb. qāneh, “reed”). Properly the calamus, or sweet cane, which, probably from its shape and length, came to be used for a measure (Ezek. 40:3, 5; 42:16–19). Its length is given (40:5) as six times a cubit, plus six handbreadths, nearly eleven feet.

Furlong. See Mile, below.

Mile (Gk. milion, Matt. 5:41). Equal to 1,618 English yards, and thus 142 yards less than the English statute mile. The mile was derived from the Roman system of measurement and was in common use in our Lord’s time. The Gk. stadion, “established,” rendered “mile,” is rendered “furlong” in the KJV and was 600 Greek feet, or 625 Roman feet, i.e., 606.75 English feet.

Sabbath Day’s Journey (Gk. sabbatou hodou, Acts 1:12). A very limited distance, such as would naturally be regarded as the immediate vicinity of any locality. It is supposed to have been founded on the command “Let no man go out of his place on the seventh day” (Ex. 16:29). This measure was fixed by the Jewish legislators at 2,000 cubits. It is supposed to have been suggested by the space between the Ark of God and the people (Josh. 3:4), or the extent of the suburbs of Levitical cities (Num. 35:5). The strict observance of the Sabbath day’s journey was evaded by the “connection of boundaries.” He who desired to go farther than 2,000 cubits had only, before the beginning of the Sabbath, to deposit somewhere within this limit, and therefore perhaps at its end, food for two meals. He thus declared, as it were, that here would be his place of abode, and he might then, on the Sabbath, go not merely from his actual to his legal abode, but also 2,000 cubits from the latter. Even such particular preparation was not necessary in all cases. If, for example, anyone should be on the road when the Sabbath began, and see at a distance of 2,000 cubits a tree or a wall, he might declare it to be his Sabbath home and might then go not only 2,000 cubits to the tree or wall, but 2,000 cubits farther (Schürer, History of the Jewish People, div. 2, 2:121–22).

Some Distance (Heb. kibrat-hā'āreš, Gen. 35:16; 48:7; 2 Kings 5:19). This seems to indicate some definite distance, but it is impossible to state with precision what that distance was. The LXX renders it “a horse’s race,” i.e., as the Arabs inform us, a parasang (thirty furlongs), about four English miles.

Day’s Journey (Heb. derek yôm). The most usual method of calculating distance in traveling in the East (Gen. 30:36; 31:23; Ex. 3:18; etc.; once in NT, Luke 2:44). Of course, it was not an exact measure, varying as the journey would according to the circumstances of the travelers, the country traveled, and so on. The ordinary day’s journey among the Jews was twenty to thirty miles, but when traveling in company, only ten miles.

Meteyard (mēt;yard; Heb. middâ). A general term for measure, archaic for measuring stick (Lev. 19:35, KJV). The term does not appear in the NASB and NIV.

Dry Measures of Capacity. Dry measures of capacity are given below in ascending order of size. Note that some dry measures are also used as liquid measures.

Handful (Heb. qōmeš, Lev. 2:2; 5:12). Probably never brought to any greater accuracy than the natural capacity of the human hand. It was also used as a liquid measure.

Kab (Heb. qab, “hollow,” 2 Kings 6:25). This was, according to the rabbis, equal to one-sixth of a seah (see below). It is equal to about two quarts.

Omer (Heb. ōmer, a “heap,” Ex. 16:16–36; “sheaf,” Lev. 23:10). An ancient Hebrew measure. Its relative value was one-tenth of an ephah (Ex. 16:36), and it held about 5.1 pints. It contained the portion of manna assigned each individual for his daily food (16:16–20).

Seah (Heb. śāḇā, “measure”; rendered “measure” in Gen. 18:6; 1 Sam. 25:18; 2 Kings 7:16, 18; ephah, Judg. 6:19). It was a common household measure. According to the rabbis, it was equal to one-third of an ephah and was, perhaps, identical with “measure,” śhālīsh, in Isa. 40:12.

Ephah (Heb. ēpā). A measure of Egyptian origin and in very common use among the Hebrews. It contained ten omers (Ex. 16:36), about three pecks and three pints, and was equivalent in capacity to the liquid measure, bat. According to Josephus (Ant. 8.2.9), the ephah contained seventy-two sextarii.

Bushel. Though the bushel appears in the KJV, NIV, and NASB, there was no exact equivalent to the bushel in ancient times. The term appears in the NASB of Amos 8:5 to replace KJV “ephah.” It appears in the KJV of Matt. 5:15; Mark 4:21; Luke 11:33, and in those verses is replaced in the NASB with “peck-measure.” It appears in the NIV in Luke 16:7 in place of NASB “measures.” See Homer.

Homer (Heb. hōmer, “heap,” Lev. 27:16; Num. 11:32; Ezek. 45:13; kōr, 1 Kings 4:22; 5:11; 2 Chron. 2:10; 27:5; Gk. koros, “measure,” Luke 16:7, see marg.). According to Fuerst, the homer was originally a donkey load and hence a measure of like capacity. It was supposed to have been called kor because of its being a circular measure. The homer contained ten ephahs (Ezek. 45:11), nearly eight bushels. The half-homer was known as lēthēk (see Hos. 3:2).

Liquid Measures of Capacity. The liquid measures of capacity given below are in ascending order of size.

Log (Heb. lōg, “hollow,” Lev. 14:10; etc.). This term originally signified a basin. The rabbis reckoned it equal to six hen’s eggs, their contents being measured by the amount of water they displaced, thus making it the one-twelfth of a hin.

Hin (Heb. hîn, of Egyptian origin, Ex. 29:40; 30:24; Num. 15:4, 7, 9; Ezek. 4:11; etc.). This held one-sixth bath, nearly six pints.

Bath (Heb. bat, “measured”). This was the largest of the liquid measures; first mentioned in 1 Kings 7:26; equal to the ephah, and so to one-tenth of a homer (Ezek. 45:11). Its capacity would thus be seven and a half gallons.

Foreign Measures of Capacity. In the NT we find the following foreign measures, given in ascending order of size.

Sextarius or Xestes (Gk. chēstēs). A Greek measure with no Hebrew equivalent, holding about a pint (Josephus Ant. 8.2.9). Also any small vessel, such as a cup or pitcher, whether a sextarius or not (Mark 7:8; KJV, “pot”).

Choenix (Gk. choenix, only in Rev. 6:6, NASB and NIV, “quart”). A dry measure, containing two sextarii, or about one quart.

Modius (Gk. modius). A dry measure holding sixteen sextarii, i.e., about one peck. It occurs three times in the NT and is rendered “peck-measure” (Matt. 5:15; Mark 4:21; Luke 11:33). In each case it is accompanied by the Gk. article, intimating that it was in use in every household.

Saton (Gk. saton, Matt. 13:33; Luke 13:21, “peck”). A dry measure, supposed to be identical with the Hebrew seah, and to contain one peck.

Metretes (Gk. metrētēs, “measure,” John 2:6, see marg.). Known as amphora, it was used for measuring liquids and contained seventy-two sextarii (see above), or somewhat less than nine English gallons.

Coros (Gk. koros, Luke 16:7, “measure”; NIV, “bushel”). The same as the homer.

Measures of Weight. The Jewish rabbis estimated weights according to the number of grains of barley, taken from the middle of the ear, to which they were equivalent. In describing the weights used by the Hebrews we begin with the shekel, because it is the base of all the calculations of these weights.

Shekel (Heb. sheqel, “weight”). Equal to twenty gerahs (Ezek. 45:12) or ten English pennyweights. Of all the Jewish weights none is so accurately marked as the shekel, from the fact that half a shekel was ordered by God to be paid by each Israelite as a ransom for his soul (Ex. 30:13). The circumstances of the captivity do not warrant the idea that the Hebrews lost their knowledge of their weights, least of all the shekel. The poorer classes were left in Canaan (2 Kings 24:15–16; 25:11–12), and they probably continued the use of the ancient weights and money; while the upper classes, who were carried into captivity, would likely have retained some of them, especially the shekel. Then, too, we find the shekel in use in Jerusalem in the time of Zerubbabel. Although in very early times there may have been but one shekel (Gen. 23:15), it appears certain that from the period of the Exodus there were at least two shekels—one used in all ordinary transactions (Ex. 38:29; Josh. 7:21; 2 Kings 7:1; Amos 8:5; etc.); the other used in the payment of vows, offerings, and for other religious purposes (Ex. 30:13; Lev. 5:15; Num. 3:47) and called the “shekel of the sanctuary.” It is a matter of much conjecture as to what, if any, difference existed between these two shekels, and also the shekel “by the king’s weight” (2 Sam. 14:26). Jahn (Biblical Archaeology, sec. 116) identifies the common and sacred shekels and thinks that “the king’s shekel” did not “amount to more than a fourth, perhaps not to more than the fifth or sixth part of the legal shekel.” Keil (Biblical Archaeology, 2:231) thinks there was a common shekel, which was only the half of the holy one, or equal to the beka (Ex. 38:26). He arrives at this conclusion by comparing 1 Kings 10:17 with 2 Chron. 9:16, according to which 3 minas equal 300 common shekels; i.e., the mina contained 100 shekels, whereas it contained only 50 holy, or Mosaic, shekels. He also identifies the shekel “by the king’s weight” with the “shekel of the sanctuary.” After the captivity, the probability is that only the holy shekel was in use. The passage in Ezek. 45:12, written when a considerable portion of the captivity was passed, directs that on the return home there should be but one uniform standard. That standard was to be the holy shekel, being composed of 20 gerahs (Ex. 30:13). Other evidence of this is furnished in the fact that whereas in the earlier Scriptures reference was made to a difference of standard, no such distinction occurs after the captivity; the shekel coins of that period were all nearly of a weight.

Beka or Half shekel (Heb. beqa, a “fraction”; mentioned only twice, Gen. 24:22; Ex. 38:26). In the latter passage it is said to equal one-half of a holy shekel. It was the weight in silver that was paid for each Israelite numbered (Ex. 38:26) and was equal to the tribute (cf. Matt. 17:24).

Gerah (Heb. gērâ, “kernel,” a “bean” or “grain”). The smallest of the Hebrew weights, and the equivalent of the twentieth part of the holy shekel (Ex. 30:13; Lev. 27:25; Num. 3:47; 18:16; Ezek. 45:12).

Mina (Heb. māneh, a “portion,” the original of the Lat. moneta and our money; 1 Kings 10:17; Ezra 2:69; Neh. 7:71–72; Ezek. 45:12, “maneh”; Gk. mna, Luke 19:13–25). From Ezek. 45:12 it appears that there were 60 holy shekels in a mina, whereas from the passages in Kings and Chronicles it is evident that a mina was equivalent to 100 shekels. These latter Keil thinks were the common shekels, 100 of which would make only 50 holy (i.e., Mosaic) shekels. Sixty minas formed a talent.

Talent (Heb. kikkār, “circle”; Gk. talanton, a “balance”). The name given to this weight, perhaps from its having been taken as “a round number” or sum total. It was the largest weight among the Hebrews, being used for metals, whether gold (1 Kings 9:14; 10:10; etc.), silver (2 Kings 5:22), bronze (Ex. 38:29), or iron (1 Chron. 29:7). The talent was used by various nations and differed considerably. It is perhaps impossible to determine whether the Hebrews had one talent only or several of different weights. From Ex. 38:24–29 we infer that the talent of gold, silver, and bronze was a talent of the same weight, and the evidence favors but one weight of that denomination, which contained 3,000 shekels. Estimating a shekel at 10 pennyweight, the talent would be equal to 93 pounds 12 ounces avoirdupois, or 125 troy weight. A talent seems to have been a full weight for an able man to carry (2 Kings 5:23). In the NT the talent occurs in a parable (Matt. 25:15) and as the estimate of a stone’s weight, “about one hundred pounds each” (Rev. 16:21, see marg.).

In addition to the above, which we can with certainty call Hebrew weights, both the OT and NT refer to other weights, probably introduced from foreign nations. Of these we give the following brief account:

Daric or Drachma (Heb. ṣḏarkôn, 1 Chron. 29:7; Ezra 8:27; dark□môn, Ezra 2:69; Neh. 7:70; etc.). Thought by some to be identical to each other. Others conclude from 1 Chron. 29:7 that the ṣḏarkôn was less than three-tenths of a shekel.

Pound (Gk. mna, “mina,” Luke 19:13, NASB and NIV; Gk. litra, “pound,” John 12:3; 19:39, KJV, NASB; “pint,” NIV). Probably a Greek weight, used as a money of account, of which 60 went to the talent. It weighed 100 drachmae, or 15 ounces 83¾ grains. The “pound” in John 12:3; 19:39 (Gk. litra) refers to a Roman pound of 12 ounces.

The expression “ten pounds” appears in the KJV of Luke 19:13, but it is replaced in the NASB and NIV by “ten minas.”

Measures of Value, or Money. The necessity of some kind of money arose very early in civilization. The division of labor required some measure of value; and commerce took a more convenient, if more complicated, form by making this common measure to serve as a circulating medium. Men decided early that the precious metals formed by far the most convenient material for such a medium, although it is probable that they were first introduced in their gross and unpurified state. Money in ancient times was both uncoined and coined.

It is well known that ancient nations that were without a coinage weighed the precious metals, a practice represented on the Egyptian monuments, on which gold and silver are shown to have been kept in the form of rings. It is uncertain whether any of these rings had a government stamp to denote their purity or value. Gold when brought as tribute was often in bags, which were deposited in the royal treasury. Though sealed and warranted to contain a certain quantity, they were weighed unless intended as a present or when the honesty of a person was beyond suspicion. The Egyptians had also unstamped copper money called "pieces of brass," which, like the gold and silver, continued to be taken by weight even in the time of the Ptolemies. Gradually the Greek coinage did away with the old system of weighing. The gold rings found in the Celtic countries have been thought to have had the same use.

The pecuniary transactions recorded in the Bible were all, we can scarcely doubt, effected by bullion. Silver was weighed out by the patriarchs, who used it not only to buy grain from Egypt (Gen. 42:25–28; 43:15, 18–23; 44:1–8), but land from the Canaanites (23:15–16). The narrative of the purchase of the burial place from Ephron gives us further insight into the use of money at that time (23:3–16). Here a currency is clearly indicated like that which the monuments of Egypt show to have been there used in a remote era. A similar purchase is recorded of Jacob, who bought a parcel of a field at Shalem for a hundred "pieces" (kesitahs) of money (33:18–19). Throughout the history of Joseph we find evidences of the constant use of money in preference to barter (43:21; 47:13–17). Under the Mosaic law it was in silver shekels that money was paid to the sanctuary for the ransom of male Israelites (Ex. 30:13–16), compensations and fines (21:22; Lev. 5:15; Deut. 22:19, 29), and the priestly valuations (Lev. 27:3–25; Num. 18:16), and all exchange and sales reckoned. Half shekels are mentioned (Ex. 30:13, 15), which were called bekas (38:26), as well as quarter shekels (1 Sam. 9:8).

Very large sums were reckoned by the largest weight of the Israelites, the talent, a round thing, a name that indicates that there were lumps of silver in the form of thick round discs or rings, weighing 3,000 shekels. We may thus sum up our results respecting the money mentioned in Scripture written before the return from Babylon. From the time of Abraham silver money appears to have been in general use in Egypt and Canaan. This money was weighed when its value had to be determined, and we may therefore conclude that it was not of a settled system of weights. Because the money of Egypt and that of Canaan are spoken of together, we may reasonably suppose they were of the same kind. It is even probable that the form in both cases was similar or the same, since the ring money of Egypt resembles the ordinary ring money of the Celts, among whom it was probably first introduced by Phoenician traders.

Coined money was invented by the Lydians in Anatolia. Taking advantage of the abundance of gold and silver in their country, they turned out a great deal of coined currency. By the end of the seventh century B.C. coined money was plentiful in the Aegean world. Cyrus the Great, who conquered the fabulously opulent Croesus and his capital city of Sardis by 546 B.C., introduced coins into the mighty Persian Empire that he founded. Darius the Great (522–486 B.C.) made extensive use of this notable aid to commerce. He coined silver and gold and this, with many other commercial advantages, was the explanation of the might and grandeur of Persian power. The discovery of coinage was a great stride in commercial progress. It seems such a simple thing and doubtless Egyptians and Greeks, who came in contact with it through the Anatolian Lydians, must have wondered why they had not hit upon this brilliant idea earlier. M.F.U.

The earliest coins mentioned in the Bible are the gold coins called drachmas, 538 B.C. It is thought by some that Jewish silver shekels and half shekels were introduced under Ezra (about 458 B.C.); but it is most probable that they were issued under Simon Maccabaeus (see 1 Macc. 15:6), and copper coins were struck by the Hasmonaean and Herodian family, 140 B.C. The following alphabetic list embraces all the denominations of money mentioned in the OT and the NT.

Beka (Heb. beqa, a “half”). A Jewish weight of a half shekel’s value (Ex. 38:26). As a coin it may have been issued at any time from Alexander until the earlier period of the Maccabees. See Shekel.

Bronze. (1) Heb. n̄hōshet, “copper”; Ezek. 16:36, “lewdness.” In the expression “Because your lewdness was poured out,” n̄hōshet probably means bronze or copper in the general sense of money. The only objection raised to this is that the Hebrews had no copper coin. But all that can be affirmed with certainty is that the use of copper or bronze as money is not mentioned elsewhere in the OT. We cannot infer with certainty from this that it was not then in use. As soon as the Hebrews began to stamp coins, bronze or copper coins were stamped as well as the silver shekels, and specimens of these are still in existence from the time of the Maccabees. Judging from their size, these coins were in all probability worth a whole, a half, and a quarter gerah. (2) In Matt. 10:9 (Gk. chalkos, rendered “money” in Mark 6:8; 12:41, see marg.) “copper” is used, apparently of a small Roman or Greek copper coin, of about the value of one-half cent. The copper coins of Palestine are so minute, and so irregular in their weight, that their value, like that of the English copper coinage of the present day, was chiefly legal, or conventional, and did not represent the relative value of the two metals—silver and copper.

Cent. Two names of coins in the NT are rendered by this word. (1) Gk. kodrantēs; Lat. quadrans (Matt. 5:26; Mark 12:42), a coin current in Palestine in the time of our Lord. It was equivalent to two lepta (KJV, “mites”). The name quadrans was originally given to the quarter of the Roman as, or piece of three unciae, therefore also called teruncius. The value was what one might earn in ten or fifteen minutes of work. Its value was about 3.8 mills. (2) Gk. assarion (Matt. 10:29; Luke 12:6), properly a small as, assarium, but in the time of our Lord used as the Gk. equivalent of the Lat. as. The rendering of the Vulg. in Luke 12:6 makes it probable that a single coin is intended by two assaria. The assarion is what one might earn in an hour or less.

Daric or Drachma (Heb. šdarkôn, 1 Chron. 29:7; Ezra 8:27; dark̄môn, Ezra 2:69; Neh. 7:70–72). The daric is usually thought to mean the daric of the Persians and seems to be etymologically connected with the Greek drachma. The drachma is of interest as the earliest coined money that we can be sure was known to and used by the Jews. It must have been in circulation among the Jews during the captivity and was extensively circulated in Greece. The coin was stamped on one side with the figure of a crowned archer, with one knee bent; on the other side a deep, irregular cleft. The two darics in the British Museum weigh 128.4 grains and 128.6 grains respectively.

The drachma, as a silver coin (Luke 15:8–9, see marg.), was very common among the Greeks and Hebrews. At the time of Luke’s writing this Greek coin was of about the same weight as the Roman denarius (see below) and was almost superseded by it. The author of the Chronicles uses the words that in his time designated the current gold coins. He did not intend to assume that darics were in use in the time of David. Probably the sum in darics is the amount contributed in gold pieces received as coins, whereas the talents represent the weight of the vessels and other articles brought as offerings.

Denarius (Gk. dēnarion, Matt. 18:28; 20:2, 9, 13; 22:19; Mark 6:37; 12:15; 14:5; Luke 7:41; 10:35; 20:24; John 6:7; 12:5; Rev. 6:6). This was a Roman silver coin, in the time of Jesus and the apostles. It took its name from its being first equal to ten “donkeys,” a number afterward increased to sixteen. The earliest specimens are from approximately the start of the second century B.C. From this time it was the principal silver coin of the commonwealth. In the time of Augustus eighty-four denarii were struck from a pound of silver, which would make the standard weight about sixty grains. This Nero reduced by striking ninety-six from the pound, which would give a standard weight of about fifty-two grains, results confirmed by the coins of the periods, which are, however, not exactly true to the standard. In Palestine, in the NT period, evidence points to the denarii as mainly forming the silver currency. The denarius was the daily wage of a laborer. The only way to compute the value of NT coins in current values is to consider what a laborer might earn in a day in various countries of the world (see Matt. 20:2, 4, 7, 9, 10, 13).

Didrachma. See Tribute Money in the general listing.

Fourth of a Shekel (Heb. rebāc, “fourth,” 1 Sam. 9:8). The money that Saul’s servant gave to Samuel as a present.

Gerah (Heb. gērâ, a “kernel,” Ex. 30:13; Lev. 27:25; Num. 3:47; 18:16; Ezek. 45:12). The smallest weight and also the smallest piece of money among the Hebrews. It represented the twentieth part of a shekel, weighed 13.7 Paris grains, and was worth less than one-fifth of a day’s wage.

Gold. There is no positive mention of the use of gold money among the Hebrews; it probably was circulated by weight (1 Chron. 21:25). The gold coinage current in Palestine in the NT period was the Roman imperial aureus, which passed for twenty-five denarii.

Half of a Shekel. See Beka.

Mina (Gk. mina, Luke 19:13–25). A value mentioned in the parable, as is the talent in Matt. 25:14–30. The reference appears to be to a Greek pound, a weight used as a money of account, of which 60 went to the talent, the weight depending upon the weight of the talent. The mina contained 100 drachmas.

Piece of Money. This expression represents two kinds of money in the OT: (1) Kesitah (Gen. 33:19). “The kesitah was a weighed piece of metal, and to judge from Gen. 23:16; Job 42:11, of considerably higher value than the shekel; not an unstamped piece of silver of the value of a lamb,” as supposed by the old interpreters (Keil, Arch., 2:24). These silver pieces, with their weight designated on them, are the most ancient money of which we have any information. It is clear that they circulated singly, because the worth of the article bought was given in the number of them. (2) Stater (see below).

Piece of Silver. Generally speaking, the word has been supplied for a word understood in the Heb. The phrase is always “a thousand” or the like “of silver” (Gen. 20:16; 45:22; etc.). In similar passages the word “shekels” occurs in the Heb., and there is little if any doubt that this is the word understood in all these cases. There are, however, two exceptional passages where a word equivalent to “piece” or “pieces” is found in the Heb. The first occurs in 1 Sam. 2:36, where “piece” is the rendering of the Heb. šāgôrâ, something “gathered.” It may be the same as the gērâ (see above). The second is in Ps. 68:30, “Trampling under foot the pieces of silver.” “Pieces” here is the translation of the Heb. rāš, which occurs nowhere else in Scripture. Gesenius thinks pieces of uncoined silver is meant. In the NT “pieces” is the rendering of the Gk. argurion (Matt. 26:15; 27:3, 5–6, 9) in the account of the betrayal of our Lord for “thirty pieces of silver.” These are often taken to be denarii, but on insufficient ground. The parallel passage in Zechariah (11:12–13) is rendered “thirty shekels of silver.” This was the sum payable as compensation for a slave that had been killed (Ex. 21:32), and also the price of a bondsman (Hos. 3:2). By paying thirty shekels (about ninety denarii) they therefore gave him to understand that they did not estimate his services higher than the labor of a purchased slave. These shekels were probably tetradrachms of the Attic standard of the Greek cities of Syria and Phoenicia. These tetradrachms were common at the time of our Lord, and of them the stater was a specimen. The value put upon the conjuring books, doubtless by the conjurers themselves, was 50,000 pieces of silver (Acts 19:19). The Vulg. has accurately rendered the phrase denarii, as there is no doubt that these coins are intended.

Shekel (Heb. sheqel, “weight”). The shekel was properly a certain weight, and the shekel weight of silver was the unit of value through the whole age of Hebrew history down to the Babylonian captivity. It is now generally agreed that the oldest Jewish silver coins belong to the period of Simon Maccabaeus, 140 B.C. They are the shekels and half shekels, weighing 220 and 110 grains, with several pieces in copper. The shekel presents on the obverse the legend SHEKEL OF ISRAEL; a cup or chalice, above which appears the date of Simon’s government in which it was struck. On the reverse side appears JERUSALEM THE HOLY, with a triple lily or hyacinth. It is generally believed that the devices on this coin are intended to represent the pot that held manna and Aaron’s rod that budded. The half shekel resembles the shekel, and they occur with the dates of the first, second, third, and fourth year of Simon. The value of the gold shekel is about 55 denarii, $5; the silver about 3.67 denarii. Of copper, we have parts of the copper shekel—the half, the quarter, the sixth.

Small Copper Coin (Gk. lepton, Mark 12:42; Luke 12:59, “cent”; 21:2). A coin current in Palestine in the time of our Lord. It seems in Palestine to have been the smallest piece of money, being the half of the kodrantēs or quadrans (see Cent). From Mark’s explanation, “two small copper coins, which amount to a cent” (12:42), it may perhaps be inferred that the cent or quadrans was the more common coin. In the Greco-Roman coinage of Palestine, the two smallest coins of which the assarion is the more common, seem to correspond to these two coins, the larger weighing about twice as much as the smaller.

Stater (Gk. statēr). (1) The term stater is held to signify a coin of a certain weight, but perhaps means a standard coin. The gold staters were didrachms of the later Phoenician and the Attic talents, which in this denomination differ only about four grains troy. Of the former talent were the Daric staters or darics; of the latter, the stater of Athens. The electrum staters were coined by the Greek towns of the W coast of Asia Minor. They were three parts of gold to one of silver. Thus far the stater is always a didrachm. In silver the term is applied to the tetradrachms of Athens, which was of the weight of two gold staters of the same currency. There can therefore be no doubt that the name stater was applied to the standard denomination of both metals and does not positively imply either a didrachm or a tetradrachm. (2) In the NT the stater is mentioned once as a “two-drachma” (Matt. 17:24–27). The stater must here mean a silver tetradrachm; and the only tetradrachms then current in Palestine were of the same weight as the Hebrew shekel. And it is observable, in confirmation of the minute accuracy of the evangelist, that at this period the silver currency in Palestine consisted of Greek imperial tetradrachms, or staters, and Roman denarii of a quarter their value, didrachms having fallen into disuse (Smith, Dict.).

Talent (Heb. kikkār, a “circle”; Gk. talanton, a “balance”). The largest weight among the Hebrews, the talent was used for metals, whether gold, silver, and so on. In the NT this word occurs (1) in the parable of the unmerciful servant (Matt. 18:24); (2) in the parable of the talents (25:14–30). At this time the Attic talent prevailed in Palestine; sixty minas went to the talent and fifty shekels to the mina.

MEU'NIM (me-ū'nim; Neh. 7:52). See Meunites.

MEU'NITES (me-ū'nīts). Plural of the gentilic adjective mānī, “from Maon,” referring to the people of Maon. A people who lived in Mt. Seir (2 Chron. 20:1), they evidently had their capital at Ma'on, a dozen miles SE of Petra. The Simeonites near Gedar attacked them as foreigners (1 Chron. 4:39–41). Second Chron. 26:7 mentions them with the Philistines and the Arabians. After the captivity, some of their descendants served as servants in the Jerusalem Temple (Ezra 2:50; Neh. 7:52), where they are called “the sons of Meunim.” They are identified by the Gk. version with the Minaeans. If such an identification is correct, they formed probably the northernmost section of that S Arabian people.

MEZ'AHAB (mez'a-hab; “water of gold”), Me-Zahab (NIV). The father of Matred and grandfather of Mehetabel, who was the wife of Hadar, or Hadad, the last named king of Edom (Gen. 36:39; 1 Chron. 1:50).

MEZO'BAITE (me-zō'bīt). A designation of Jaasiel, the last named of David's heroes (1 Chron. 11:47; “Mesobaite,” KJV), probably meaning “from Zobah.”

MI'AMIN. See Mijamin.

MIB'HAR (mib'har; “elite, choice”). The son of Hagri, and one of David's heroes (1 Chron. 11:38).

MIB'SAM (mib'sam; “sweet odor, balsam”).

1. The fourth named of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. 25:13; 1 Chron. 1:29).

2. The son of Shallum and grandson of Shaul, the sixth son of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:25).

MIB'ZAR (mib'zar; “fortress”). One of the chiefs of Edom descended from Esau (Gen. 36:42; 1 Chron. 1:53).

MI'KA (mī'ka; “who is like Jehovah?”; “Micha,” KJV).

1. A son of Mephibosheth (2 Sam. 9:12), given in 1 Chron. 8:34–35 as Micah (which see).

2. The son of Zabdi and father of Mattaniah, of the family of the Levite Asaph (Neh. 11:17, 22), and probably the same one who joined in the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (10:11), about 445 B.C. See Micah.

MI'CAH (mī'ka; a contraction of Micaiah, “who is like Jehovah?”).

1. A man of Mt. Ephraim who lived, probably, in the time of the elders who survived Joshua, about 1360 B.C. He had stolen 1,100 shekels of silver from his mother; but, impelled by the fear of her curse, he had confessed and restored the money. Thereupon she put 200 shekels into a goldsmith's hands to make an image (or images) for the semi-idolatrous establishment set up by Micah. At first Micah installed one of his sons as priest but afterward appointed a wandering Levite named Jonathan at a yearly stipend (Judg. 17:1–13). When the Danites were on their journey northward to settle in Laish they took away both the establishment and priest of Micah, who, upon overtaking the Danite army, found it too powerful for him to attack and returned to his home (18:1–26).

2. The son of Shimei, father of Reaiah, and one of the descendants of Joel the Reubenite (1 Chron. 5:5), before 782 B.C.

3. The son of Merib-baal (or Mephibosheth) and grandson of Jonathan (1 Chron. 8:34–35; 9:40–41), after 1000 B.C.

4. The first in rank in the Kohathites of the family of Uzziel, as arranged by David (1 Chron. 23:20), about 966 B.C. His son's name was Shamir, and a brother Isshiah is mentioned (24:24–25).

5. The father of Abdon (2 Chron. 34:20). See Micaiah, no. 2.

6. A prophet, a native of Moresheth of Gath (Mic. 1:1, 14–15). He is thus distinguished from a former prophet, Micaiah (1 Kings 22:8). The period during which Micah exercised the prophetic office is stated in the superscription to his prophecies (1:1) to have extended over the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, about 738–690 B.C. This would make him contemporary with Hosea, Amos, and Isaiah. One of his prophecies (Jer. 26:18) is distinctly assigned to the reign of Hezekiah and was probably delivered before the great Passover that inaugurated the reform in Judah. Very little is known of the circumstances of Micah's life. He was probably of the kingdom of Judah. For rebuking Jehoram for his impieties, Micah, according to Pseudo-Epiphanius, was thrown from a precipice and buried at Morathi, in his own country, near the cemetery of Enakim.

MICAH, BOOK OF. One of the books of the minor prophets, named after the prophet Micah, Heb. mīkā, an evident shortening of Mikayahu, signifying “Who is like the Lord?” The LXX renders his name Michaias and the Vulg. Michaeas.

The Prophet. Micah was a native, apparently, of Moresheth (Mic. 1:14), a Judean town near Gath, and at intervals a dependency of the Philistines. His prophetic ministry flourished in the reigns of Jotham (750–732 B.C.), Ahaz (c. 735–715), and Hezekiah (c. 715–686). He was a simple villager, but a prophet of social righteousness. Like Amos, the herdsman, he defended the cause of the poverty-stricken masses. Like Hosea, Amos, and Isaiah, Micah foretold the fall of the Northern Kingdom and the taking of Samaria (1:5–7), and he warned of the coming desolation of Judah (vv. 9–16). His prophetic oracles had special reference to Judah; nevertheless he envisioned all Israel (vv. 1, 5–7).

Outline.

- I. Prediction of approaching judgment (1:1–2:13)
 - A. Upon Samaria (1:2–8)
 - B. Upon Judah (1:9–16)
 - C. Upon cruel oppressors (2:1–11)
 - D. Upon a remnant (2:12–13)
- II. Prediction of the messianic kingdom (3:1–5:15)
 - A. Preliminary judgments (3:1–12)
 - B. Description of the kingdom (4:1–5)
 - C. Establishment of the kingdom (4:6–13)
 - D. Rejection of the King at His first coming (5:1–2)
 - E. Interval between the royal rejection and return (5:3)
 - F. The Messiah's second coming (5:4–15)
- III. The divine controversy and final mercy (6:1–7:20)
 - A. The people's ingratitude and sin (6:1–7:6)
 - B. Prophetic intercession (7:7–20)

Prophetic Style. Micah writes in simple yet eloquent language. He is outspoken and fearless in denouncing iniquity (cf. 1:5; 2:1–2). He is logical in his development but often abrupt in transition from one subject to another. He makes considerable use of metaphor (1:6; 3:2–3, 6; 4:6–8, 13; 6:10–11) and paronomasia, or play upon words (cf. chap. 1), and is fond of rhetorical interrogation (cf. 1:5; 2:7; 4:9; etc.). He shows how God requires justice and loves mercy but requires these characteristics also in His followers.

Literary Composition. Negative criticism has attacked the unity of Micah. Robert Pfeiffer is characteristic of modern criticism. According to him the first three chapters are authentic; however, section 4:1–5:15 is regarded as an interpolation, whereas 6:1–7:6 is said to be a later anonymous prophet's work, having its own editorial appendix (7:7–20). However, the expression "hear" (1:2; 3:1; 6:1) is an element of style suggesting unity of authorship. Moreover, there are a number of parallels in chaps. 4–7 with writings contemporary with Micah or written near his time (see R. K. Harrison, Introduction to the Old Testament [1969], p. 924). Critics claim that the argument of the book is not closely knit. The fact that the book consists of various discussions delivered by the prophet over an extended period of time and under various circumstances is sufficient explanation of its lack of logical order. Critical views against Micah are weakened by the unsound theory of the evolutionary development of religious concepts in Isaiah, Micah's contemporary. This view erroneously insists that certain theological ideas found in Micah did not come into developed form until a later date. This is purely supposition. There is no objective evidence to prove that such ideas, particularly concerning salvation, had not crystallized in Micah's day.

MICAIAH (mi-ka'ya; "who is like Jehovah?").

1. The son of Imlah, a prophet of Samaria, who, in the last year of the reign of Ahab king of Israel predicted his defeat and death, 853 B.C. Three years after the great battle with Ben-hadad, Ahab proposed to Jehoshaphat that they should jointly go up to battle against Ramoth-gilead. Jehoshaphat consented but suggested that they should "inquire first for the word of the Lord." Ahab gathered together four hundred prophets in an open space at the gate of the city of Samaria, who gave the unanimous response "Go up, for the Lord will give it into the hand of the king." Among them Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah made horns of iron as a symbol and announced, as from Jehovah, that with those horns Ahab would push the Assyrians until he consumed them. Jehoshaphat was dissatisfied with the answer and asked if there was no other prophet of Jehovah at Samaria. Ahab replied that there was still one—Micaiah, the son of Imlah; but he added, "I hate him, because he does not prophesy good concerning me, but evil." Micaiah, however, was sent for and urged to agree with the other prophets "and speak favorably." He at first expressed an ironical concurrence and then openly foretold the defeat of Ahab's army and the death of Ahab himself. He declared that the other prophets had spoken under the influence of a lying spirit. Upon this Zedekiah struck Micaiah upon the cheek, and Ahab ordered him to be taken to prison and fed bread and water until his return (1 Kings 22:1–28; 2 Chron. 18:2–27). We hear nothing further from the prophet in the sacred story, but Josephus narrates that Micaiah was already in prison when sent for to prophesy before Ahab and Jehoshaphat; that it was Micaiah who had predicted death by a lion to the son of a prophet, under the circumstances mentioned in 1 Kings 20:35–36; and that Micaiah had rebuked Ahab, after his brilliant victory over the Syrians, for not putting Ben-hadad to death.

2. The father of Achbor, which latter was sent by Josiah to consult with the prophetess Huldah (2 Kings 22:12; “Michaiah,” KJV). In the parallel passage (2 Chron. 34:20) he is called Micah (which see).

3. The mother of King Abijah (2 Chron. 13:2; “Michaiah,” KJV; “Maacah,” NIV); elsewhere (2 Chron. 11:20) called Maacah (which see).

4. One of the princes of Jehoshaphat, whom he sent to teach the law of Jehovah in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:7; “Michaiah,” KJV), about 870 B.C.

5. A priest of the family of Asaph, whose descendant Zechariah took part in the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 12:35), before 445 B.C.

6. One of the priests who took part in the same ceremony (Neh. 12:41; “Michaiah,” KJV), 445 B.C.

7. The son of Gemariah, and the person who, having heard Baruch read the terrible predictions of Jeremiah, went and declared them to all the officials assembled in King Jehoiakim’s house (36:11–13; “Michaiah,” KJV); and the officials immediately sent for Baruch to read the prophecies to them (37:11–14), about 606 B.C.

MI’CHAEEL (mī’kel; “who is as or like God?”).

1. “One of the chief princes” or archangels (Dan. 10:13; cf. Jude 9), described (Dan. 10:21) as the “prince” of Israel and (12:1) as “the great prince who stands” in time of conflict “over the sons of your people.” As special guardian of the Jews, Michael will defend them in their terrific time of trouble (Jer. 30:5) during the Great Tribulation when the remnant will be delivered and established in the millennial kingdom. As Gabriel represents the ministration of the angels toward men, so Michael is the type and leader of their strife, in God’s name and His strength, against the power of Satan. In the OT, therefore, he is the guardian of the Jewish people in their antagonism to godless power and heathenism. In the NT (Rev. 12:7–9), he fights in heaven against the dragon—“the serpent of old who is called the devil and Satan, who deceives the whole world,” and so takes part in that struggle that is the work of the church on earth. There remains still one passage (Jude 9; cf. 2 Pet. 2:11) in which we are told that “Michael the archangel, when he disputed with the devil ... about the body of Moses, did not dare pronounce against him a railing judgment, but said, ‘The Lord rebuke you.’” The reference seems evidently to be to Moses’ appearance in glorified form on the mount of transfiguration (Matt. 17:1–8) as the representative of the redeemed who have passed through death into the kingdom (13:43; Luke 9:30–31).

2. The father of Sethur, which latter represented the tribe of Asher among the explorers of Canaan (Num. 13:13), 1440 B.C.

3. A leader of the tribe of Gad, mentioned among those who settled in the land of Bashan (1 Chron. 5:13).

4. Another Gadite and ancestor of Abihail (1 Chron. 5:14). Perhaps the same as no. 3.

5. The son of Baaseiah and father of Shimea, and a Gershonite Levite among the ancestors of Asaph (1 Chron. 6:40).

6. One of the four sons of Izrahiah, a descendant of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:3).

7. A Benjamite of the sons of Beriah (1 Chron. 8:16).

8. A captain of the “thousands” of Manasseh who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:20).

9. The father of Omri, whom David appointed leader of the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 27:18).

10. One of the sons of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, whom he portioned before his death and who were slain by their brother Jehoram upon his accession (2 Chron. 21:2–4), 850 B.C.

11. A “son” (or descendant) of Shephatiah, whose son Zebadiah, with eighty-two males, came with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:8), before 457 B.C.

MI´CHAL (mī´kal; evidently a shortened form of Michael, “who is like God?”). Saul’s younger daughter (1 Sam. 14:49), probably by Ahinoam (v. 50). After David had slain Goliath, Saul proposed to give him his eldest daughter, Merab, but when the time arrived for the marriage she was given to Adriel the Meholathite (18:17–19). The pretext under which Saul broke his promise is not given, but it appears to have been that Merab had no love for David.

Marriage. It was told Saul that his daughter Michal loved the young hero, and he seized the opportunity of exposing David to the risk of death. He asked no dowry of him save the slaughter of a hundred Philistines. Before the appointed time David doubled the number of victims, and Michal became his wife (18:20–28), about 1010 B.C.

Saves David’s Life. Another great defeat inflicted by David upon the Philistines so excited the jealousy of Saul that he endeavored to kill David. Failing in the attempt, he sent watchers to David’s house to put him to death in the morning. Michal aided David’s escape by letting him down through a window, and then dressed the bed as if still occupied by him. She took the household idol (teraphim), laid it upon the bed, its head enveloped with a goat’s hair netting, as if to protect it from gnats, and the rest of the figure covered with clothes. Saul’s messengers forced their way into the room, despite Michal’s declaration that David was sick, and discovered the deception. When Saul was informed he was so enraged that Michal fabricated the story of David’s threatening to kill her (19:11–17).

Second Marriage. Saul probably doubted Michal’s story of David’s escape, and when the rupture between the two men became incurable, Michal was married to Palti (or Paltiel) of Gallim (25:44; 2 Sam. 3:15).

Restored to David. When Abner revolted to David, the king consented to make a league with him only on this condition: “But I demand one thing of you, namely, you shall not see my face unless you first bring Michal, Saul’s daughter, when you come to see me.” Ish-bosheth was requested to deliver up Michal, and, having done so, she was taken to the king by Abner, who ordered her weeping husband to return to his home (2 Sam. 3:13–16).

Rupture with David. On the day of David’s greatest triumph, namely that of bringing the Ark of the Lord to Jerusalem, the king appeared in the procession, dancing and leaping. When he returned to his own house, Michal, who had seen him from her window, met him with scornful words. She was offended that the king had lowered himself to the level of the people. She availed herself of the shortness of the priest’s shoulder dress to make a contemptuous remark concerning David’s dancing. David’s retort was a tremendous one, conveyed in words that once spoken could never be recalled. It gathered up all the differences between them that made sympathy no longer possible, and we do not need the assurance of the sacred writer that “Michal . . . had no child to the day of her death,” to feel quite certain that all intercourse between her and David must have ceased from that date (2 Sam. 6:16–23), 992 B.C. In the KJV her name appears once again (21:8) as the mother of five sons, but the probable presumption is that Michal has been, by the mistake of the transcriber, substituted for Merab, the wife of Adriel. The NASB and NIV read “Merab.”

MICH'MAS (mik'mas), Mich'mash, Mic'mash (mik'mash; "something hidden"). A town of Benjamin about seven miles NE of Jerusalem. Here Saul and the Philistines contended for the upper hand, Saul taking his position with 2,000 men and placing the other 1,000 at Gibeah with his son Jonathan. Jonathan struck the Philistine garrison that was at Geba, and the Philistines hastened to avenge the defeat. They collected an innumerable army of foot soldiers, besides 30,000 chariots and 6,000 horsemen, and encamped before Michmash. Saul retreated down the valley to Gilgal, near Jericho, to rally the Israelites (1 Sam. 13:1–7). Jonathan resolved to attack the outpost of the Philistines at the pass of Michmash, and God gave him a great victory (14:1–14). Michmas is mentioned as the place whose inhabitants returned from captivity (Ezra 2:27; Neh. 7:31; 11:31). It is the present Mukhmas, a village in ruins on the northern ridge of the Wadi Suweinit (cf. Isa. 10:28).

MICH'METHATH (mik'me-tha), Mic'methath (NIV). A town on the border of Ephraim and Manasseh, W of the Jordan (Josh. 16:6; 17:7), present Khirbet Juleijil.

MICH'RI (mik'ri), Mic'ri (NIV). Ancestor of Elah, one of the heads of the fathers of Benjamin after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:8), before 536 B.C.

MID'DIN (mid'in). A town W of the Dead Sea, mentioned only in Josh. 15:61. Its location is unknown.

MIDDLE WALL. See Dividing Wall, Barrier of.

MID'IAN (mid'i-an; "strife"). The fourth named of the six sons of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chron. 1:32). Beyond the fact of his having four sons (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chron. 1:33), nothing is recorded concerning him.

MID'IANITES (mid'i-an-īts). A race dwelling S and E of Palestine, in the desert N of the Arabian peninsula. There are no trustworthy accounts of Midian outside the Bible. In Scripture, Midian appears in connection with (1) Abraham, (2) Joseph, (3) Moses, (4) Balaam, and (5) Gideon.

1. In Gen. 25:1–2 Midian is the fourth son of Abraham by Keturah, and evidently one of those who were sent away into the east country with gifts by Abraham during his lifetime (v. 6). According to the Arab account, "Medyen are the offspring of Shu'eyb, and are the offspring of Medyán (Midian), son of Abraham, and their mother was Kantoor Ga, the daughter of Yukt Aan (Joktan) the Canaanite." "Medyen is the city of the people of Shu'eyb," who is "generally supposed to be the same as Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses," though some deny it.

2. In the time of Joseph we find the Midianites associated with the Ishmaelites so closely that it is hard to define their relationship; perhaps there was a company of Midianite merchantmen in the Ishmaelite caravan (Gen. 37:25, 27–28, 36). In all likelihood the descendants of Ishmael, and Midian, as well as of other exiled children of Abraham, had intermarried. In Judg. 8:24 the Midianites seem to be called Ishmaelites. But this latter term may have come to be applied generally to traders of that particular kind, such as Canaanite (which see), which came to mean merchant.

3. In the early life of Moses (Ex. 2:15) after killing the Egyptian he fled for refuge to the land of Midian. Here he married the daughter of Jethro, the priest of Midian, whose sheep he kept for forty years (2:16–21; 3:1; Acts 7:29). At the time of his call he was at Horeb, in the peninsula of Sinai (Ex. 3:1). As the Midianites were mostly nomads, this peninsula can have been only a temporary station for pasturage, unless, as is quite possible, it was then more fertile than now. But, according to the Arabians and Greeks, the city of Midian was on the Arabian side of the Arabian Gulf, where in all probability lay the true land of Midian.

4. In the time of Balaam, Moab (then ruled by Balak son of Zippor) conferred with the elders of Midian in regard to Israel, and the resulting embassy to Balaam consisted of elders both of Moab and Midian (Num. 22:1–7). In the chapters that relate the prophecies of Balaam (23–24) only Moab is mentioned. In 25:1 it is the daughters of Moab who entice Israel; but in 25:6–15 it is Midian, and in vv. 16–18; 31:1–12 vengeance is executed on Midian. In 31:8–9 it is among the Midianites that Balaam perishes. We may therefore conclude that Midian had a prominent part in the transaction. (For connection of Moab with Midian, see Moabites.)

5. In the time of Gideon, Midian appears again (Judg. 6:1–8:28), but not as an organized army of warriors or as a nation powerful enough to bring the Israelites under its despotic sway. Israel by idolatry lost the divine protection and the national cohesion that would have protected the nation against such marauders. The Midianites united with the Amalekites and the sons of the east—men, women, and children, as we suppose—with their belongings and certainly with their cattle (6:5), forming an innumerable horde of camel-riding nomads. They apparently were the first people to employ the domesticated camel on a large scale. This gave them greatly increased desert mobility, c. 1150 B.C. They oppressed Israel, not by a strong military despotism backed by chariots of iron, as did Jabin and Sisera (4:2–3), but by coming up when the harvest was ripe, “like locusts,” destroying “the produce of the earth.” The story is best read in the inimitable language of the Bible itself. The whole account, from the Midianite invasion at the beginning, to the panic and rout, to their final disappearance at the end, is the story of a mob, formidable from its numbers and its hunger. This ends the story of Midian. Henceforth it is hardly mentioned, except as a historical reminiscence (but see Isa. 60:6; Hab. 3:7). Certainly Midian is never again mentioned as a source of terror. It is probable that from the beginning they had intermarried with the Ishmaelites and that in the end they were merged with the roving peoples of the northern part of the Arabian desert, under the general name Arabs. Midian has been called the Judah of the Arabians. W.H.; M.F.U.

MIG´DAL E´DER (mig´dal ē´der). See Eder.

MIG´DAL-EL (mig´dal-el; “tower of God”). A fortified city that fell to Naphtali (Josh. 19:38). A number of places are claimed as the original site. Possibly Mujeidil about twelve miles NW of Kades (Kedesh) is the location.

MIG´DAL-GAD (mig´dal-gad; “tower of fortune”). A town in the plain of Judah, between the hilly region and the territory held by the Philistines (Josh. 15:37). Its site is not positively known, but it is in the Shephelah (which see), perhaps near Lachish. Possibly it is to be located at Mejdad, twenty-four miles W of Hebron.

MIG´DOL (mig´dol).

1. This was the encampment of Israel during the Exodus from Egypt. It was near the Red (Reed) Sea (cf. Ex. 15:4, 22; Deut. 11:4). It is also said to be before Pi-hahiroth and before Baal-zephon (Ex. 14:2; Num. 33:7). Since Migdol is the ordinary Canaanite word for “watchtower,” this site may have been a military outpost. The place is an example of Canaanite names in the Delta. An extended Semitic occupation of the NE Delta before the New Egyptian Empire (c. 1546–1085 B.C.) is indicated from other such Canaanite place names as Succoth (Ex. 12:37), Baal-zephon (14:2), Zilu (Tell Abu Seifah), and most likely Goshen itself (8:22; 9:26) (W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity [1940], p. 184).

2. A place referred to in Jer. 44:1; 46:14. Here Jews fled to Egypt and took up their residence after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. The place was in the north of Egypt and is probably to be equated with the Magdali of the el-Amarna Tablets. It is modern Tell el Heir, almost a dozen miles S of Pelusium. In Ezek. 29:10, cf. 30:6, the expression occurs “from Migdol to Syene and even to the border of Ethiopia,” evidently indicating extreme limits N and S in Egypt. M.F.U.

MIGHTY MEN (Heb. gibbōr, “powerful”; sometimes “mighties,” KJV). The title given to the three great captains of David and meaning “warrior,” i.e., leader in war (2 Sam. 23:8–9, 16–17, 22; 1 Chron. 11:10–12, 24).

MIGRATION OF BIRDS. See Animal Kingdom: Bird.

MIG´RON (mig´ron; “precipice”). A town of Benjamin, apparently on the route of the invading Assyrian army southward (Isa. 10:28). From Michmash a narrow valley extends northward out of and at right angles to what has been identified as the passage of Michmash (which see). Saul was stationed at the further side of Gibeah, “under the pomegranate tree which is in Migron” (1 Sam. 14:2). Gibeah is at Tell el-Ful.

MIJ´AMIN (mij´a-min; “from the right hand,” i.e., the side of good luck).

1. The head of the sixth division of priests in the time of David (1 Chron. 24:9), before 960 B.C.

2. A layman of Israel, of the family of Parosh, who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:25; “Miamin,” KJV), 456 B.C.

3. One of the priests who signed the covenant made by Nehemiah and the people to serve Jehovah (Neh. 10:7), 445 B.C. It is probable that he is the same as no. 4 below. See Miniamin, no. 2.

4. One of the priests who came to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:5), about 536 B.C. He is probably the same person who is called Miniamin in v. 17, and thus may be the same as no. 3 above.

MIKH´TAM (mik´tam; a “writing,” especially a “psalm”). This word occurs in the titles of six psalms (16, 56–60; “Michtam,” KJV; “Miktam,” NIV), all of which are ascribed to David. Meaning uncertain.

MIK´LOTH (mik´lōth; “rods”).

1. One of the sons of Jeiel, “the father” (or head) of Gibeon, and father of Shimeah (or Shimeam). He was one of the Benjamite residents of Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:29, 32; 9:35, 37–38), about 536 B.C.

2. The chief officer of the second division of the army under Dodo, in the reign of David (1 Chron. 27:4), after 1000 B.C.

MIKNE´IAH (mik-ne´ya; “possession of Jehovah”). A Levitical gatekeeper of the Temple and one of the musicians “with lyres tuned to the sheminith” appointed by order of David (1 Chron. 15:18, 21), about 966 B.C.

MILALA ʾI (mil-al-ī; “eloquent”). One of the priests’ “kinsmen” who took part in the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:36), about 536 B.C.

MIL´CAH (mil´ka, “counsel, advice”).

1. The daughter of Haran, and the wife of Nahor, by whom she had eight children. One of these, Bethuel, was the father of Rebekah (Gen. 11:29; 22:20, 23; 24:15, 24, 47), about 1950 B.C.

2. The fourth named of the five daughters of Zelophehad of the tribe of Manasseh, to whom, as they had no brothers, an inheritance was given in the division of the land (Num. 26:33; 27:1; 36:11; Josh. 17:3), about 1375 B.C.

MIL´COM (mil´kom). A false god (Zeph. 1:5; NIV marg., “Malcom”). See Gods, False.

MILDEW. Properly a species of fungus or parasitic plant generated by moisture and corrosive of the surface to which it adheres. In Arabia the mildew of grain is produced by a warm wind, by which the green ears are turned yellow, so that they bear no grain (Deut. 28:22). See Vegetable Kingdom.

MILE. See Metrology: Linear Measures.

MILE´TUS (mī-lē´tus). A town on the coast of Asia Minor, thirty-six miles S of Ephesus. It was the most important of the Ionian cities and became a great center of culture during the sixth century B.C. For example, Thales of Miletus around 600 B.C. led in the development of philosophy. Miletus led an Ionian revolt against the Persians in 499 B.C. When the Persians subjugated the area once more, they destroyed Miletus as a punishment for her rebelliousness. The famous Hippodamus of Miletus laid out the new city on the grid plan, with streets intersecting at right angles. The “Hippodamian” plan has been used in many places in many eras ever since. The city was a great and prosperous center in Hellenistic and Roman times. Theodor Wiegand launched a Berlin Museum excavation at Miletus in 1899 and continued the work until 1914. Prof. Karl Weichert supervised another dig there in 1938 and returned from 1955 to 1957. In 1959 Prof. G. Kleiner took charge of the excavations, and currently the work is conducted by Prof. Müller-Wiener, director of the German Archaeological Institute in Istanbul. Gradually a picture of the magnificence of Miletus is emerging. Its great theater with seating for 15,000, its council chamber, baths, agoras, gymnasium, harbor facilities, stadium, and much more have been uncovered. Paul stopped at Miletus on his third missionary journey and addressed the people (Acts 20:15–17). Some think the Miletus where Paul left Trophimus sick (2 Tim. 4:20) was in Crete, but there seems to be no need for such a conclusion. MILK. The rendering of two Heb. words and one Gk. word:

Sweet Milk (Heb. ḥālāb, “fat”; Gk. gala). This was in extensive use among the Hebrews, as well as other nations. They used not only the milk of cows but also that of sheep (Deut. 32:14), of camels (Gen. 32:15), and of goats (Prov. 27:27). It was not regarded as a mere adjunct in cooking but as substantial food adapted to all ages and classes. The Scriptures frequently mention it in connection with honey as a delicacy (Ex. 3:8; 13:5; Josh. 5:6; Jer. 11:5).

Curdled Cheese (Heb. ḥem-â). This seems to mean both butter and curdled milk. Curdled sour milk still forms, after bread, the chief food of the poorer classes in Arabia and Syria. Nor is it wanting on the tables of the well-to-do and is brought to market in large quantities. It is carried by travelers, mixed with meat and dried, and then dissolved in water to make a refreshing drink. It was this curdled milk that Abraham set before the angels (Gen. 18:8) and Jael gave to Sisera (Judg. 4:19). If kept long enough in this state it acquired a slightly intoxicating property. It is rendered “curds” (Isa. 7:22), and its use in connection with honey is figurative of scarcity. Bread and wine would be unattainable, so thickened milk and honey would be eaten instead. A very striking allusion to milk is that which forbids a kid to be boiled in its mother’s milk (Ex. 23:19; 34:26; Deut. 14:21). See Kid.

Figurative. Milk occurs as a sign of abundance (Gen. 49:12; Ezek. 25:4; Joel 3:18; etc.), but more frequently with honey. “Milk and honey” is a phrase that occurs about twenty times in Scripture. Milk is also illustrative of the blessings of the gospel (Isa. 55:1; Joel 3:18), the first principles of God’s Word (1 Cor. 3:2; Heb. 5:12; 1 Pet. 2:2), edifying discourse (Song of Sol. 4:11), and the wealth of the Gentiles (Isa. 60:16).

MILL. See Millstones.

MILLENNIUM. From Lat. mille, “thousand,” annum, “year”; a theological term based upon Rev. 20, indicating the thousand-year period of Christ’s future reign on the earth in connection with the establishment of the kingdom over Israel (Acts 1:6). Basically, however, it is more accurate to employ the term kingdom, which has far-reaching roots in the OT, rather than a term signifying merely a time during which the kingdom continues. Three common millennial views are held: postmillennialism, amillennialism, and premillennialism.

Postmillennialism. This interpretation maintains that present gospel agencies will root out evils until Christ will have a spiritual reign over the earth, which will continue for 1,000 years. Then the second advent of Christ will initiate judgment and bring to an end the present order. This theory, largely disproved by the progress of history, is no longer popular, but it has enjoyed some resurgence in recent years. Postmillennialism was promulgated by the teaching in England of Daniel Whitby, 1638–1726.

Amillennialism. Advocates of this view maintain that no Millennium is to be looked for except that which, it is claimed, is in progress now in this gospel age. This theological interpretation spiritualizes or, rather, gives a mystical meaning to the vast kingdom promises in the OT. Zion is construed not to mean Zion but to refer to the Christian church. It makes no trenchant differentiation between Israel and the church, a distinction that evidently underlies John the Baptist’s prophecy of the baptism of the Spirit and Jesus’ reference to this in Acts 1:5. This spiritual ministry formed the church (Acts 2; cf. 1 Cor. 12:13). The apostle Paul apparently makes a clear distinction between Israel and the church in 10:32, and he also outlines a future for Israel in Rom. 11. Amillennialism does not seem to take full account of these facts. Moreover, the view contends that Satan is at present bound, a position that premillennialists maintain is hardly justified by conditions in the present age.

Premillennialism. This interpretation teaches that the age will end in judgment at the second coming of Christ, who will restore the kingdom to Israel and reign for at least 1,000 years. The criticism that such a view of the Millennium is based on an obscure passage in Rev. 20 is not allowed by premillennialists since this reference, they say, embraces all the kingdom promises of the OT as well as the Day of the Lord, which is prominent in Scripture and connects with the kingdom, or Millennium. Most of the opposition to premillennialism comes from the assumption that an earthly kingdom with Israel at the head would involve a retrogression from the spirituality brought in by Christ through His death, resurrection, and ascension. But premillennialists hold that the promise of the fulfillment of the covenants and promises to Israel in the OT demand such an earthly kingdom. The Millennium will be the last of the ordered ages of time. Eternity will not dawn until the Millennium is complete (Isa. 65:17; 66:22; 2 Pet. 3:13; Rev. 21:1). The Millennium will be characterized by the binding of Satan and the severe limitation of sin. The perfect sinless state, however, will occur in the eternal state after the Millennium. M.F.U.

MILLET. See Vegetable Kingdom.

MILLO (Heb. “the filling”). Always with an article, evidently a rampart consisting of two walls with the space between them filled in.

1. In the KJV of Judg. 9:6, 20, the name of the citadel of Shechem, the garrison of which joined in proclaiming Abimelech as their king. The NASB reads, “Beth-millo,” and the NIV, “Beth Millo.”

2. The Millo at Jerusalem (which see) was such a fortification, the definite article before the name indicating that it was a well-known fortress, probably one that had been built by the Jebusites. “And David built all around from the Millo [NIV, “terraces”] and inward” (2 Sam. 5:9; 1 Chron. 11:8), as did Solomon (1 Kings 9:15; 11:27). It formed a prominent part of the fortifications by which Hezekiah prepared for the approach of the Assyrians (2 Chron. 32:5). The same place is likely meant by “the house of Millo” (NIV, “Beth Millo”) where Joash was killed (2 Kings 12:20–21). Jebusite, Davidic, and Solomonian Jerusalem have been explored. Masonry at the N end of the city of David on Ophel apparently corresponds to MILLSTONE. The mill for grinding grain had not wholly superseded the mortar (which see) in the time of Moses (Num. 11:8); but fine flour, i.e., meal ground or pounded fine, is mentioned as early as the time of Abraham (Gen. 18:6); hence mills and mortars must have been previously known. The mills of the ancient Hebrews probably differed but little from those in present use in the East. These consist of two circular stones, about eighteen inches or two feet in diameter, the lower of which is fixed and has its upper surface slightly convex, fitting into a corresponding concavity in the upper stone. The latter, called by the Hebrews rekeb, “chariot,” and by the Arabs rekkab, “rider,” has a hole in it through which the grain passes, immediately above a pivot or shaft that rises from the center of the lower stone, and about which the upper stone is turned by means of an upright handle fixed near the edge. It is worked by women, sometimes singly and sometimes two together, who are usually seated on the bare ground (Isa. 47:1–2), “facing each other; both have hold of the handle by which the upper is turned round on the ‘nether’ millstone. The one whose right hand is disengaged throws in the grain as occasion requires through the hole in the upper stone. The proverb of our Saviour (Matt. 24:41) is true to life, for women only grind. I cannot recall an instance in which men were at the mill” (Thomson, Land and Book, chap. 34). The labor is very hard, and the task of grinding in consequence is performed only by the lowest servants (Ex. 11:5) and captives (Judg. 16:21; Job 31:10; Isa. 47:1–2; Lam. 5:13). So essential were millstones for daily domestic use that they were not to be taken in pledge (Deut. 24:6; Josephus Ant. 4.8.26) in order that a man’s family might not be deprived of the means of preparing their food. The hand mills of the ancient Egyptians appear to have been of the same character as those of their descendants and, like them, were worked by women. They also had a large mill on a very similar principle, but the stones were of far greater power and dimensions, and this could only have been turned by cattle or donkeys, like those of the ancient Romans and of the modern Cairenes. It was the millstone of a mill of this kind, driven by a donkey, that is alluded to in Matt. 18:6. With the movable upper millstone of the hand mill the women of Thebez broke Abimelech’s skull (Judg. 9:53).

MINA. The rendering in Luke 19:13 of Gk. mna, which was both a weight and a unit of money. See Metrology.

MINCING (Heb. tāpap, Isa. 3:16). To take short steps, just putting the heel of one foot against the toe of the other. The women whom the prophet Isaiah rebuked could take only short steps because of the chains by which the costly foot rings worn above the ankles were connected. Tripping is a child's step. Although well versed in sin and old in years, the women of Jerusalem tried to maintain a youthful, childlike appearance. They therefore tripped along with short, childlike steps.

MINERAL KINGDOM. For the sake of continuous study we give the different objects in the mineral kingdom in alphabetical order. See also Metals; Precious Stones.

Adamant. See Diamond.

Agate (Gk. achatēs, from the river of that name in Sicily; Heb. shōbō; kadkōd). This name is applied to those varieties of semitransparent quartz (chalcedony) that have the general character of being clouded, banded, or lined in several shades or colors. When the layers are even, and black and white, the quartz is properly called onyx; and when red and white, sardonyx, though the terms are often used somewhat loosely. In these latter cases the cutting down from one layer to another gives the beautiful cameo effect of a raised device of one color upon a ground of another. All the agates were favorite stones with the ancients and are abundant in collections of classical and oriental jewelry, being hard enough to take and retain a high polish and not too hard to be cut and engraved readily by means of corundum points.

The term appears four times in the KJV and twice in the NASB and NIV. In the KJV, NIV, and NASB of Ex. 28:19; 39:12 it is the rendering of Heb. shōbō in the accounts of the breastpiece made for Aaron. The LXX gives achtēs and may be taken as correct in the modern sense.

In the other two appearances of the term in the KJV, Isa. 54:12 and Ezek. 27:16, "agate" is the rendering of Heb. kadkōd, "striking fire, sparkling," and is probably incorrect. The NASB and NIV of the two passages give "rubies."

Alabaster (Gk. alabastron, Matt. 26:7; Mark 14:3; Luke 7:37; Heb. shēsh, shayish, 1 Chron. 29:2; Song of Sol. 5:15, NASB, but "marble" in the KJV and NIV). Identified with the substance now called oriental (or Egyptian) alabaster, also "onyx marble" and "Mexican onyx," this is a variety of carbonate of lime, usually stalagmitic in origin, with a layered structure due to its deposition from water, giving it a banded aspect of slightly varying shades and colors, often very delicate and beautiful. This banded character has led to its frequently being called onyx among the ancients, and onyx marble and Mexican onyx among ourselves, although it is very different from true onyx, which is a variety of agate and very hard. Today the name alabaster is applied to a still softer stone, the compact variety of gypsum, or sulphate of lime, used for small statuettes, paper weights, and little ornaments of no great value. The alabastrites of Theophrastus, Pliny, and the ancients generally was largely quarried and worked at Alabastron, a well-known locality near Thebes, and was the favorite material for the little flasks and vases for ointment and perfumery that are so abundant in Egyptian tombs and almost all ancient collections. Such articles were called alabastra; but by a frequent change of usage the word was transferred to any perfume flask, or the like, without special regard to its material or to its source; as "a piece of delft" or "china" (originally Delft ware or China ware) now signifies any article of crockery (cf. the LXX of 2 Kings 21:13).

Horace (Odes 4.12.17) uses onyx for a perfume flask, and other classical writers do the same thing.

Amber. A KJV term from Heb. hashmal (LXX ēlektron). It appears only in Ezek. 1:4, 27; 8:2. The NASB and NIV render “glowing metal,” with NASB marg. electrum.

Amethyst (Heb. ahlāmā; Gk. amethystos, the Gk. name alluding to a notion that the amethyst prevented intoxication; used only in Ex. 28:19; 39:12; Rev. 21:20). This is one of the few cases in which there is little doubt as to the correctness of the rendering, the name having been used from Theophrastus’s day to the present for the purple or violet variety of quartz. It was a favorite stone among the ancients, often finely cut or carved in intaglio. Though not rare enough to be of great value, it is still used in fine jewelry because of its rich and almost unique color; there are few purple gemstones. The Heb. name signifies “dream stone,” as though it was supposed to induce, or to interpret, dreams.

Bdellium (Heb. bādōlāh; Gen. 2:12; Num. 11:7). A fragrant gum obtained from a tree found in Arabia, Babylonia, Media, and India. It is said to have had the same color as manna (Num. 11:7). In Gen. 2:12 it is listed with gold and the onyx stone, or beryl, as products of the land of Havilah. The LXX renders it anthrax (carbuncle or ruby) in Gen. 2:12 and krystallos, rock crystal, in Num. 11:7. The NIV translates “aromatic resin” in Gen. 2:12 and “resin” in Num. 11:7. M.F.U.

Beryl (Gk. bērullos, Rev. 21:20, for Heb. tarshîsh). The modern name designates the pale-colored varieties of silicate of glucina, the deep-green variety being emerald. In Rev. 21:20 beryl is no doubt correct, but in the OT all is uncertain. The NASB gives “beryl” in repeated instances; but in some of these, at least, this rendering cannot be correct. Tarshîsh occurs in Ex. 28:20, in which there appears to be some confusion as to the places of the stones in the breastplate; in Song of Sol. 5:14; Ezek. 1:16; and Dan. 10:6, it is rendered without translation by the LXX (English “beryl”; marg. of Dan. 10:6 gives “yellow serpentine”). In the NASB of Ezek. 10:9, the wheels in the vision of the cherubim are said to appear “like the gleam of a Tarshish stone” (marg. “beryl”); and in both 10:9 and 28:13 the LXX gives lithos anthrakos as anthrax. Here there is a strange confounding of this with a deep-red stone such as anthrax (or carbuncle), as appears also in regard to emerald (which see), indicating the uncertainty of the Greek translators as to the meaning of tarshîsh; as does also their merely transliterating the word in other cases, as noted above. But Jerome’s rendering of Ezek. 1:16—“quasi visio maris” (Vulg.), almost establishes the impression of a green or blue-green stone like beryl, or, as Luther suggests, turquoise, rather than anything red or yellow. The NIV translates Heb. bāreqet as “beryl” in Ex. 28:17; 39:10; Ezek. 28:13. It renders tarshish as “chrysolite” (which see). The NASB takes bāreqet to be “emerald” (which see). See Emerald.

Brass. See Bronze.

Brick. See article Brick in the general listing.

Brimstone (Heb. goprît, from gōper, “gopher wood,” Gen. 6:14). At first sight the connection of brimstone and the gopher tree seems farfetched, but if gōper means resinous trees, their inflammable yellow exudations may not inaptly be compared with sulfur or brimstone.

In the OT brimstone is repeatedly used to convey the idea of barrenness and desolation, evidently from its association with the Dead Sea; so, definitely, Deut. 29:23, also Isa. 34:9, and probably Job 18:15. The NIV invariably uses “sulfur” rather than “brimstone.” Tristram, Lynch, and others describe its occurrence around the lake and in the valleys leading into it, and also on both sides of the Jordan Valley, where there are many hot sulfurous springs. These springs deposit sulfur, and pieces of it are scattered over the flats around portions of the lake. In some places it occurs with tar, for which the Dead Sea region is noted from very early times (Gen. 14:10)—an unusual association, but known also near Bologna, Italy. Some of the hot sulfur springs in Judea have been much esteemed for the treatment of rheumatic diseases, and so are to this day; some show ruins of Roman baths. Sulfur also occurs in connection with bands of gypsum (sulfate of lime) in the cliffs and terraces along the lower Jordan Valley, which go back to a former period of much greater height and extension of the Dead Sea. Sulfur is also referred to in the OT in the combination “fire and brimstone” in connection with violent storms (Gen. 19:24; Ps. 11:6; Ezek. 38:22). The idea here has, no doubt, been justly interpreted as referring to lightning—as is clear in Isa. 30:33—perhaps from the popular idea, alluded to even by Pliny and Seneca, of a sulfurous odor (probably the ozone odor) after a discharge of lightning. The same combination (pur kai theion) recurs in the NT (Luke 17:29; Rev. 9:17; 14:10; 19:20; 20:10; 21:8), the translation of a familiar Heb. phrase.

Bronze (Heb. nāḥōshet; Gk. chalchos; Lat. aes). Bronze, the alloy of copper and tin, was used to an enormous extent in ancient times. It was the principal material for all manner of articles, both of ornament and use, as far back as the Chalcolithic Age (3500–3000 B.C.), a period characterized by the transition from stone to copper. Great interest has arisen as to the source of the tin so largely used in the manufacture of the ancient bronzes, as tin occurs in but few localities. Most of it is understood to have been brought from the great tin mines of the Cornwall peninsula and the Scilly Islands by the Phoenicians, who maintained for many centuries steady commerce by sea. The bronze articles then manufactured in the Punic cities and colonies were exported all over the world in exchange for the products of every region, to enhance the wealth of Tyre and Carthage. The bronze, however, varied a great deal in composition, and some contained an admixture of zinc, approaching brass. Such may have been the “fine shiny bronze, precious as gold” (Ezra 8:27, NASB; 1 Esd. 8:57). The zinc mines at Laurium, in Greece, were extensively worked in ancient times; and it seems probable that various proportions of the three metals were employed, giving alloys all the way from bronze to brass; but the former is much the more ancient and frequent. See Tin.

Palestine archaeology distinguishes several Bronze Ages: Early (3000–2000 B.C.); Middle (2000–1500 B.C.); and Late Bronze Age (1500–1200 B.C.), followed by the Iron Age (1200–300 B.C.). Bronze was thus abundant among the Hebrews and their neighbors from early times (Ex. 38; 2 Sam. 8:8; 1 Chron. 18:8; 22:3, 14; 29:7, “brass”). The last passage is interesting as showing that in David’s time iron was yet more abundant and that the “bronze age” was entirely past before 1000 B.C. so far as Palestine was concerned. The NIV, however, never translates nāḥōshet as “brass” but always “bronze.” The word occurs in both a literal and figurative sense. As in Ezra 8:27, so in 1 Kings 7:45; 2 Chron. 4:16; Ezek. 1:7; and Dan. 10:6 it seems probable that brass is meant. To the many other passages describing various objects such as mirrors (Ex. 38:8), weapons and armor (1 Sam. 17:5–6, 38; 2 Sam. 8:8, 10; 21:16; etc.), the “bronze serpent” (Num. 21:9; 2 Kings 18:4), or the furnishings of the Tabernacle (Ex. 26:11, 37) or Temple (1 Kings 7:14; 2 Chron. 4; Jer. 52:17, 22); etc., the preceding remarks as to bronze and mixed alloys will apply.

In the NT the word chalkolibanon (Rev. 1:15; 2:18) is much disputed as to its meaning. There seems to be an evident reference to Dan. 10:6 or to Ezek. 1:7, 27, but the term itself is obscure to us, though doubtless familiar at the time. Very probably it was the name for some bright-colored alloy, bronze or brass, employed for handsome articles and highly esteemed. It may be a reference to orichalcum, the alloy of copper and gold; or to electrum, gold and silver, which is the LXX rendering of hashmal of Ezek. 1:4, 27; 8:2. See Copper.

Figurative. The word appears in many metaphors, such as for a hot, rainless sky (Deut. 28:23) or parched soil (Lev. 26:19); for baseness as contrasted with the precious metals (Isa. 60:17; Jer. 6:28—here also with the opposite idea of value, as compared with wood); and constantly to express conceptions of physical strength, power, durability, etc. (Job 6:12; 40:18; 41:27; Ps. 107:16; Isa. 45:2); or of moral qualities, such as firmness (Jer. 1:18), obstinacy (Isa. 48:4), and the like.

Carbuncle. The term carbuncle, which appears in the KJV as the translation of the Heb. terms bāreqet and ʾeqdāh, does not appear in the NASB or NIV but is instead replaced by crystal and emerald, respectively.

Chalced´ony (kal-sēdʰo-ni; Gk. chalkedōn, occurring only in Rev. 21:19). The modern chalcedony—light-colored, noncrystalline quartz—was probably the ancient iaspis (see Jasper). King’s chalcedonius was a blue-green stone, not readily identified by us; he speaks of it as resembling callais, i.e., turquoise, and as found at certain copper mines at Chalcedon; which points together suggest the modern chrysocolla—silicate of copper.

Chalk Stones (Heb. ʾabnê-gîr, “stones of boiling,” Isa. 27:9, lit., “stones of lime,” i.e., limestone, from an obsolete root, gîr, to “boil, effervesce,” such as lime in slaking). The making of lime by roasting limestone in kilns, and preparing mortar, cement, and whitewash from it, is one of great antiquity. Palestine is largely a country of limestone, chiefly cretaceous; and there are gypsum beds along portions of the Jordan Valley (see Brimstone); so that material for both lime and plaster was abundant. Tristram describes the extensive use of these substances in the East for lining cisterns, tombs, etc.—the former fairly honeycombing some portions of the country, especially among the hills, and fed by gutters or channels of cement laid along the edges of the terraces. The material remains hard and waterproof even after 3,000 years. The ancient limekiln was a pit or depression three or four feet deep, like a saucer in form, wherein were placed alternate layers of fuel (brushwood, etc.) and lime rock, broken up small by a wheel like that of an oilpress (alluded to in Isa. 27:9). The fuel was then kindled and the pit covered with sod, much as we do a charcoal heap, leaving only an opening for draft. See also Plaster.

Figurative (Isa. 27:9). The sense of the passage is given thus by Delitzsch—that Israel’s repentance would be shown by the destruction of idolatrous altars, the stones of which would be broken to pieces, calcined, and slaked for mortar. In Amos 2:1 the burning of human bones into lime is denounced as an act of sacrilege on the part of Moab (cf. also the defiling of the idolatrous altars in this manner by Josiah, 2 Kings 23:16, 20; 2 Chron. 34:5, as predicted in 1 Kings 13:2). See Lime.

Chrys´olite (krīsoʰlīt; “gold stone”). It was plainly our topaz. The Gk. name is definite as to color and included not only yellow topazes, but other gems of similar tint, such as the occasional yellow or “golden” beryls, some zircons, etc. The only distinct reference is Rev. 21:20; but the LXX employs the word for tarshîsh (Ex. 28:20; 39:13; indefinitely Ezek. 28:13). This word and topazion have changed meanings between the Gk. and the English, the ancient topaz being our chrysolite, and vice versa. The modern chrysolite—silicate of magnesia with some iron—is a rich yellow-green gem, also called olivine and peridot, but in nowise described as “golden.”

Chrysoḡrase (kris-op'race; Gk. chrysoḡrasis, "greenish yellow," only in Rev. 21:20). The identity is entirely uncertain. The modern chrysoḡrase, a light green chalcedony, was probably included in the ancient iaspis (see Jasper), and does not agree with the classical descriptions of the stone then so called. Pliny's account of chrysoḡrasus—bright green with gold spots—fails to correspond with any mineral that we know; and the attempt to identify this stone must be altogether conjectural.

Clay. This term is applied differently in scientific and in popular usage. In the former it denotes a definite compound, chiefly silicate of alumina, arising from the decomposition of certain feldspathic rocks and forming whitish chalky-looking beds. In this pure condition it is highly valuable for fine grades of pottery. But it is generally much contaminated with other substances; all ordinary clays contain more or less oxide of iron, which causes pottery and bricks made from them to be yellow or red after burning. Most clays also contain silica and other foreign materials and so graduate into common soil, or earth. To all of these impure mixtures the term clay is applied, in distinction from sandy, gravelly, or calcareous soils. Two Heb. words occur in the OT for clay:

1. Ṭīṭ, rendered "mire," "mud," for the fine deposit left from the evaporation of water (Ps. 69:14; Jer. 38:6) or washed up on the shore (Isa. 57:20) is used in the sense of clay for bricks or pottery (Isa. 41:25; Nah. 3:4).

2. Ḥōmer is properly clay for bricks or pottery (Isa. 29:16; 45:9; Jer. 18:4; etc.). In Job 4:19 ḥōmer seems to indicate a mud hut, from the idea of being perishable. The distinction seems usually to be in the thought of the material as wrought or unwrought, though this is not always borne out (see 30:19; Isa. 10:6, where the word is rendered "mire" or "mud"), but its usual meaning is in connection with human arts or processes (Job 10:9; 38:14, and passages cited above).

3. Pēlos is the NT Gk. word used in all the meanings for clay (John 9:6, 11, 14–15; Rom. 9:21). The passage "But we have this treasure in earthen vessels" (2 Cor. 4:7) is a striking allusion to the custom of keeping gold or silver in earthen jars, contrasting the precious contents with the humble receptacle.

Vessels and utensils of baked clay are, of course, often alluded to (2 Sam. 17:28; Jer. 18:3–4; 19:1), and fine pottery was made in Mesopotamia and Egypt from before 5000 B.C. onward. Pottery remains in ancient excavated biblical sites constitute the greatest ally of the scientific archaeologist for recognizing and dating ancient cultures.

Figurative. Clay is often used as a type of fragility (Ps. 2:9; etc.). The words usually employed are Heb. klī yōḡṡēr, "earthenware," marg. "potter's ware."

Besides being used for making pottery and brick (which see), clay has been employed in Palestine and throughout the East for sealing doors and earthen jars (cf. Jer. 32:14) in order to secure them. Sepulchers were thus sealed, as our Lord's probably was (Matt. 27:66). Another important use of clay in the East was for tablets and cylinders used for records (Ezek. 4:1) and even for ordinary correspondence. Quantities of these have been found in Assyria and Babylonia, and their cuneiform writings interpreted. The Chaldean traditions of the creation, the Fall, and the Flood have thus been recovered. Great discoveries of cuneiform literature inscribed on clay tablets include the Amarna Letters (1886), the Hittite monuments at Boghaz-Keui (1906), the Ras Shamra Tablets (1929–37), the Mari Letters, and the Lachish Ostraca (on pottery; 1935–38).

Copper (Heb. nḡḥōshet). This metal, though abundantly familiar to the Hebrews, is seldom named in the KJV, the word being generally translated "bronze." It is correctly rendered “copper” in Deut. 8:9 and Job 28:2. Copper was known and worked in the Orient very early. For the most part it was alloyed with tin to form bronze and probably later to some extent with zinc to form brass, the favorite modern alloy. Its use preceded that of iron, as is clearly shown in prehistoric archaeology and asserted by Hesiod and Lucretius. Homer describes it in connection with the shield of Achilles (Illiad 18.474); and at ancient Troy Schliemann found both copper and bronze objects, with the stone molds used in casting them. In the Near East copper was introduced c. 4500 B.C., with the Chalcolithic (copper-stone) Age c. 4500–3000 B.C., the Early Bronze Age c. 3000–2000 B.C.; Middle Bronze Age c. 2000–1500 B.C., and Late Bronze Age c. 1500–1200 B.C. The Iron Age dates c. 1200–300 B.C. Up until the Iron Age (1200–300 B.C.) copper was the most practical metal in the OT era, as bronze was used for all kinds of utensils, weapons, and knives (cf. Ex. 38:3; Num. 16:39; Jer. 52:18). Deuteronomy 8:9 gives a graphic picture of the iron-and-copper-rich Arabah: “A land where you shall eat food without scarcity, in which you shall not lack anything; a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills you can dig copper.” Nelson Glueck uncovered copper smelting and mining centers in the Arabah region in the 1930s, and Benno Rothenberg worked there in the 1960s. Copper was also a well-known metal in Egypt, and Egyptians worked the copper mines of the Sinai Peninsula and the Arabah.

It is impossible to determine the exact meaning of nḥōshet in its many OT occurrences; the word was applied to copper and to its alloys, bronze and brass, so far as the latter was known. As to the abundance of it among the Hebrews, see Bronze; also the interesting records of the source, use, and final disposal of the Tabernacle bronze (1 Chron. 18:8; 2 Chron. 4:9–18; also 1 Kings 7:13–47 and 2 Kings 25:13–17). The sources of the great amount of copper used for the ancient bronzes, etc., are vaguely known. The mining of copper is mentioned in the OT (Deut. 8:9; Job 28:2; and probably Gen. 4:22). The Egyptians obtained it from Arabia, in the Sinaitic peninsula. Modern travelers have described the vestiges still remaining of extensive and very ancient operations, especially at and near the place known as Wadi Maghâra: these include shafts in the sandstone rock and ruins of reservoirs for water, of miners’ settlements, of furnaces, with heaps of slag, etc., and hieroglyphic inscriptions going back as far as the Fourth Dynasty. By Homer’s time, and doubtless long before, the copper mines of Cyprus identified with the very name of the island were familiar and celebrated. In the Odyssey (1.181), Athéné appears in the disguise of a merchant, taking iron to Temese, in Cyprus, to exchange for copper. Many accounts in classical authors allude to the importance and value of the copper of Cyprus, to the mines as a source of revenue to Cypriote kings, and of gifts from them to other monarchs or to temples, etc. They were worked extensively until recent years. Eusebius refers to copper mines in Palestine, saying that under Diocletian’s persecution Christians were sentenced to labor in them (8.15.17) at a place called Phreno, which Jerome locates in Idumea, between Petra and Zoar. In the NT the Gk. word chalchos is rendered “copper” in one instance (Matt. 10:9); elsewhere “money” (Mark 6:8; 12:41).

Figurative. This word is translated “lewdness” (Ezek. 16:36), as referring to the preceding verses (33–34) for disgraceful pay or hire; somewhat like the more general idea of aischrokerdēs (1 Tim. 3:3, 8), as applied to “sordid gain.”

Coral (Heb. rāmâ, Job 28:18; Ezek. 27:16, KJV, NIV, and NASB; “corals” from Heb. pnîṇîm, Lam. 4:7, NASB). The Heb. term rāmâ, something “high” in value, is rather obscure, but the idea of something high (growing upward) is strongly suggestive of coral. The Heb. term pnîṇîm is translated “rubies” in the KJV (Job 28:18; Prov. 3:15; 8:11; 31:10; Lam. 4:7), but as “corals” (Lam. 4:7), “jewels” (usually marg. “corals,” Prov. 3:15; 8:11; 20:15; 31:10), or “pearls” (Job 28:18) in the NASB. The NIV renders all the preceding Proverbs passages with “ruby” or “rubies.” The passage in Lam. 4:7 is the only one that indicates redness; the others denote merely beautiful and precious objects, are employed solely for comparison, and are in every case plural. From these facts, and from the resemblance to the Arab. name, the suggestion is strongly in favor of pearls as the meaning of pnînm. The rendering “red coral” is favored by Gesenius and others and is compared with the Arab. panah, a “branch”; but this is vague. An apt suggestion has been made in connection with the fact that pink pearls are occasionally obtained from the Red Sea shell known to naturalists as pinna. These pink pearls are highly prized and, doubtless, have been so from antiquity. If these were meant in the passage in Lamentations, the various renderings would be greatly harmonized. Possibly too, the name may have included not only pearls but beads of coral, red carnelian, garnet, etc., or strung gems in general (see Pearls). The red coral of the Mediterranean and the Red Sea has been gathered and valued from the earliest times and is frequent in Egyptian jewelry. The small branches, polished, with beads made from it, have been used for ages, as they are today. Coral is, of course, not a precious stone, but is the calcareous skeleton or framework secreted by a connected community of small polyps, which enclose and conceal it entirely during life. Coral fishery is still an important industry of the eastern Mediterranean.

Crystal (Gk. krystallos, “ice”; Heb. zkûkîl, KJV and NIV; gābîsh, qerah, ʔeqdāh, Isa. 54:12, NASB). This word, among the ancients and even down to recent times, has been used simply to denote any hard material of great transparency and without marked color. Thus it was applied to glass and to the clear colorless varieties of quartz now designated as rock crystal. This latter substance was largely regarded by the ancients as a permanently solidified form of water and was prized and admired for articles of ornament, as it is by the modern Europeans and Japanese, whose “crystal balls” and carved objects of vertu are so much valued in our art collections. The scientific application of the word is wholly different, modern, and technical, denoting the geometrical forms assumed by various substances in passing into the solid state and with no reference to transparency. Of course the Scripture use of the word is entirely in the former sense, being of some clear and brilliant substance like ice or glass. Cf. Job 28:18; Ezek. 1:22 where the Heb. words gābîsh and qerah both denote “ice” or “crystal” (although the KJV of Job 28:18 renders “pearls” for gābîsh). In Isa. 54:12 Heb. ʔeqdāh is given as “crystal” in the NASB, “sparkling jewels” in the NIV, “carbuncle” in the KJV. The NIV translates “crystal” only once in the OT, a rendering of zkōkîl (Job 28:17).

Diamond, Adamant. With regard to these words there is little reason to think that the diamond was known to the Hebrews or even to the ancient Greeks. The first definite reference to it is apparently found in the Latin poet Manilius, about A.D. 12; Pliny describes it unmistakably in his great work on natural history, which appeared some two years before his death, A.D. 79. The stone that the Greeks, and after them the Romans, called adamas, “the invincible,” as being harder than anything else, was probably some of the forms of corundum, the next hardest of minerals. Diamond, or adamant, in the OT is represented by two distinct Heb. words, which divide themselves into two sets of three each; the first set relates to some stone of value and brilliancy and the second to something very hard. In the two descriptions of the breastplate (Ex. 28:18; 39:11), and in Ezekiel’s account of the Tyrian treasures (Ezek. 28:13), the word is yahālōm (which can be rendered “jasper” or “precious stone”; see also Emerald). The other three passages represent the word shāmîr, a hard “point.” The reference in Jer. 17:1, “The sin of Judah is written down with an iron stylus; with a diamond point,” is of course a simple figurative expression in which a stylus tipped with some hard mineral is contrasted with one of iron or steel. The substance employed for such engraving on stone was doubtless a small flake or pointed chip of corundum in some of its forms, which would easily cut or drill into any other mineral. This “adamantine claw,” as the LXX gives it, was no doubt perfectly familiar to those for whom Jeremiah wrote. The passage “Like emery harder than flint I have made your forehead” (Ezek. 3:9, marg. “corundum”; “firmer than a rock”; cf. Isa. 50:7), is even more completely figurative. The third passage, “They made their hearts like flint” (Zech. 7:12, marg. “corundum”) is not rendered by any noun in the LXX, “they adamantized their hearts.” In all these cases the allusion is undoubtedly to corundum as the hardest substance known to the ancients and used for all purposes of drilling and engraving other stones; and it is of interest to notice the widespread use of a similar word in other languages for the same idea.

Dross. This general term includes, in the OT, several distinct kinds of impurities present in metals and necessary to be removed in order to obtain them in a useful and valuable state. The admixtures may be either: (1) mechanical, of rocky or earthy material intermingled with the ore; (2) chemical, the substances united with the metal in the ore; or (3) other metallic elements present as alloys. Three words are employed in the Heb.; of these the most frequent is sīg (Ps. 119:119; Prov. 25:4; Isa. 1:25; Ezek. 22:18–19; etc.). In other cases ereš, “earth,” is employed, as in Ps. 12:6, where Gesenius well explains the phrase lā-āreš in the sense of “from,” or “as to,” earth, i.e., earthy mixture. A third word is bdīl, properly and usually tin but employed in the sense (no. 3) above, for a metallic admixture or alloy (Isa. 1:25), and there to be rendered, not tin, but alloy, a common impurity in silver, often removed by cupellation, of which there seems to be a hint in Jer. 6:29.

Emerald. With regard to this word the confusion seems absolutely hopeless. The stone itself was of course well known and highly valued, as it has been among almost all peoples from the remotest times. It is familiar in early Egyptian jewelry, and the ancient mines where it was procured have been rediscovered in Upper Egypt, at Mt. Zabarah. The Hebrews, of course, must have known it in their Egyptian sojourn, and would have carried away emeralds with them among the “spoil” of jewelry given them at their departure. But what word represents this gem in the OT is extremely doubtful.

As a consequence of this confusion, the emerald, carbuncle, and turquoise are closely related in the KJV, NIV, and NASB. In the KJV, Heb. nōpek is rendered “emerald,” whereas in the NASB and NIV the same Heb. word is translated “turquoise” (which see). Similarly, except for Isa. 54:12, where a different Heb. word is involved, KJV “carbuncle,” from Heb. bārequet is regularly replaced in the NASB by “emerald,” and in the NIV by “beryl.”

The situation is simpler in the NT. The Gk. word smaragdōs denotes our emerald, from the time that Theophrastus so fixed its use; but it also comprises other precious stones of similar color—e.g., the deeper varieties of beryl, which graduate into true emerald; also green tourmalines, peridots, malachite, etc. It is curiously confused in the LXX, however, with anthrax, which like its Lat. equivalent carbunculus, a glowing coal, denotes a red gem with deep fiery reflections. Both anthrax and carbunculus included true ruby (so far as it was known), spinel ruby, several varieties of red garnet, and other gems of similar crimson color, such as occasional red tourmalines, zircons, etc. Theophrastus speaks of engraving upon anthrax, which suggests garnet, a favorite engraved stone among the ancients. In the two passages (Rev. 4:3; 21:19), the original is smaragdōs, and the English translation “emerald” is without question correct. The same is true for passages in the Apocrypha.

Flint. This term is often loosely applied to any very hard, compact rock; in strictness it belongs only to the fine-grained and nearly opaque varieties of noncrystalline or cryptocrystalline quartz or silica, of dull color and luster, that occur, not as forming rock masses themselves, but in nodules and concretions in other rocks, especially limestone and chalk. But, as stated above, it is commonly used in a general sense, implying hardness and fine texture. In the OT it is thus represented by the word ḥallāmîsh, perhaps “hardness,” of rather obscure derivation, which appears in such passages as Deut. 8:15; 32:13; Ps. 114:8; and figuratively in Isa. 50:7. In 5:28; Ezek. 3:9, the word rendered “flint” is šûr, “rock,” and in Zech. 7:12 shāmîr, elsewhere “diamond” or “adamant” (so KJV), is rendered “flint.” Flint proper was the material employed almost everywhere in early prehistoric time for edge tools and weapons, prior to the use of metals. Its hardness, and the peculiar sharpness of its edges when broken or “flaked,” rendered it all-important for such purposes; and hence the science of prehistoric archaeology has dealt very largely with the study of flint implements in their wide distribution, their varied forms, and their stages of development from ruder to more finished types. All this lies back of any OT references; but a persistence in the use of stone implements for certain sacred purposes, long after metal tools were in common use, is alluded to by classical writers and appears in Ex. 4:25 and Josh. 5:2–3 (“flint knives,” NASB and NIV). For further information on this subject see introductory remarks on Metals.

Glass. See article on Glass in the general listing.

Gold. A precious metal widely used in the ancient world and obtained in the OT from Havilah (Gen. 2:11); Sheba (1 Kings 10:1, 2); and Ophir (9:28). Several Heb. and Gk. terms are employed to name it.

1. Zāhāb (“yellow, golden”), from unused roots having the idea of shining, being bright (Gen. 2:11–12). In Job 37:22 it is used figuratively for a brilliant sky, “golden splendor”; possibly there may be a reference to the aurora borealis, a rare phenomenon in the latitude of Palestine, but one that might occasionally be seen and would produce a strong impression. In Zech. 4:12, “golden oil,” it is applied to a clear yellow liquid. The root ideas are of luster and color.

2. Beşer (“clipping, dug out”), properly metal in a crude state, “golden ore.” In Job 22:24, the righteous man shall prosper temporally and acquire gold and silver in abundance, but his richest possession, his treasure (v. 25) and his delight (v. 26), shall be in God Himself. In 28:19 it is again rendered gold. Beşer seems to stand in contrast with pāz (no. 3), as implying native gold, whether found in placer deposits, in grains and nuggets, or as occurring in rocks, to be smelted out; whereas the other word has the idea of gold that has been refined.

3. Pāz (to “separate, purify,” as metals from the ore). This noun occurs in Pss. 19:10; 21:3; 119:127; Prov. 8:19; Song of Sol. 5:11; Isa. 13:12; and Lam. 4:2. It is usually rendered “fine gold,” “much fine gold,” etc. In Ps. 19:10 the familiar line of Watts “gold that has the furnace passed” is probably exact, although the LXX renders the word by Gk. lithos timios and chrusion apuros as though native gold, a signification that belongs more properly to the preceding noun.

4. S□gôr (“closed, shut up,” i.e., a thing kept closed, a treasure), means treasured or precious gold (1 Kings 6:20–21; 7:49–50; 10:21; 2 Chron. 4:20, 22; 9:20; Job 28:15).

The above four Heb. terms, therefore, present the idea of gold as (1) the bright yellow metal, which is (2) gathered from the soil or taken from the rock, in a condition in which it may be used to some extent as it is, either hammered or melted, but is (3) purified and refined for choicer purposes, while in any of its forms it is (4) treasured with care. Two other Heb. words occur that are poetical in their use.

5. Kethem (“golden store,” or “hoard”), kindred in meaning to no. 4. This root idea appears in Job 31:24; but usually the word seems to have only the general sense of gold (28:16, 19; Ps. 45:9; Prov. 25:12; Lam. 4:1; Dan. 10:5). In Song of Sol. 5:11, it is joined with no. 3, in the phrase kethem pāz, “a store of gold.”

6. Hārûs. The word is frequent as a simple name for gold (Ps. 68:13, “glistening gold”; Prov. 3:14; 8:10; 16:16; Zech. 9:3 render “choice,” “fine,” etc.).

7. Gk. chrusos occurs in many NT passages.

Gold, from its color, its malleability, its durability, and its occurrence native in the metallic state was doubtless the first metal to attract the attention of early man. In prehistoric archaeology, however, it does not appear much, or at all, until well into the Bronze Age. But once within the historic period it assumes great prominence, both in early remains and later in the accounts of ancient writers, and seems to have been long used with an abundance unknown to the modern world. A large part of the gold now known exists in the form of coin or bullion and is thus withdrawn from use in the arts; anciently it was not so much employed as the “medium of exchange,” but rather as an article of value and beauty. Gold coinage, in our sense, is late. Egyptian representations show gold as weighed out in the form of rings (1 Chron. 21:25; Ezra 8:25–26) and make many similar references to payment by weight, both in gold and silver. Genesis 13:2; 24:22; etc., give us early references to wealth in gold. In Ex. 12:35; 32:3–4; 35:22; chap. 37; Num. 31:50–54; etc., we see great abundance of gold jewelry and other objects at later periods; in the time of David and Solomon the accounts are surprising (1 Kings 6:21–22; chap. 10; 1 Chron. 22:14, 16; 2 Chron. 1:15; chaps. 3, 9), but not more so than those given by classical authors as to the enormous amounts of gold possessed by ancient monarchs, and the lavish use of it for decorations and furniture in the temples and palaces. With the accounts of Solomon and the queen of Sheba may be compared that of the funeral pyre of Sardanapalus, as given by Athenaeus, which was made of perfumed woods, with enormous quantities of gold, and kept burning for fifteen days. Exploration is constantly bringing to light treasures of goldwork throughout the ancient lands of the East, besides all that is already preserved in museums and collections and all that has been captured, destroyed, and remelted through centuries of war and pillage. See Handicrafts: Goldsmiths.

The gold of the ancient world must represent, in the first place, a great amount of “placer” deposits, accumulated during Tertiary and Quaternary time, from the erosion of rock sources, perhaps not very rich but sufficient to yield considerable amounts at many points by this natural process of concentration long undisturbed. Most of these deposits must have been worked out at an early day; others lasted down to classical times but have now long been exhausted. At present, the regions covered by the ancient civilizations yield but the merest fraction of the world’s supply of gold, which comes chiefly from the Americas and Australia, and next from South Africa, the Urals, and Siberia. These latter lands may have yielded, at times, portions of their gold to the ancient world; Herodotus refers to it among the Scythians, an indefinite term for the peoples of N and W Asia. The biblical sources—Sheba, Ophir, Uphaz, etc.—have been endlessly discussed; and though good arguments exist for both India and Arabia, there can be little doubt that Ophir was in the former, from the thoroughly East Indian character of the associated products mentioned as brought from there in 1 Kings 10:11, 22; and 2 Chron. 9:10, 21 (almug or algum being generally regarded as sandalwood), and from the length of the time occupied by the trips made, which suggests a much farther country than the neighboring Arabia. On the other hand, Sheba is SW Arabia, a region that yielded many rich products in ancient times. Both Diodorus and Strabo refer to Arabia as furnishing gold, though it is not found there now; the placers are doubtless exhausted, and their sources undiscovered or lost. Diodorus (3.12, 14) describes the gold mines at a place known as Eshuranib, in the Bisharee District, worked by captives and convicts under strict military guard. Here the process was much the same as our quartz mining, but with very simple appliances; the rock was broken into small pieces with hammers, pounded in stone mills or troughs with iron pestles, then washed on inclined tables, and the gold thus separated was afterward refined in crucibles. The OT has much to say of “beaten” gold, “hammered” gold, and “overlaying” with gold. The ancients knew the art of gilding, much like ours; but we find many articles of Assyrian and other work that are heavily plated with gold; and there are objects of later Indian manufacture now in England that show this same style, e.g., a life-size tiger’s head, part of a support of a throne belonging to Tippoo Saib, made of wood and covered with thick, hammered gold, now in Windsor Castle (cf. Solomon’s lion throne, 1 Kings 10:18–20; 2 Chron. 9:17–19). So the great image in the plain of Dura (Dan. 3:1) must evidently have been “golden” only in thin exterior plating, probably over wood. This idea was afterward taken up in Greece by Phidias and applied to his celebrated works. That such was the usual construction of smaller “golden” and “silver” idols also is implied in Isa. 41:7; 44:12–13 and repeatedly stated in the “Epistle of Jeremiah” (Baruch 6:39, 50, 57, 70), in the vivid account given there of the Chaldean images of the gods.

Hyacinth. See Jacinth.

Iron (Heb. barzel). This word is undisputed and is, of course, frequent, both literally and in metaphors of strength, etc. In its first occurrence (Gen. 4:22) the reference is in all probability to meteoric iron. This seems an inescapable conclusion in the light of the immense priority of the use of copper and bronze to that of iron, as clearly shown in prehistoric archaeology. But the expression is simple enough in its general sense, describing Tubal-cain as the pioneer in metallurgical arts, without implying his personal acquaintance with their later advances. Iron was apparently known and worked to a small extent long before it became frequent in the Iron Age, 1200–300 B.C. The readiness with which iron perishes by oxidation would obliterate the evidences of its earlier limited use. Iron was familiar to the civilized nations of the ancient world. Homer has many references to it, though with an association of value that indicates it as still somewhat rare and choice. It was freely used among the Etruscans, Egyptians, and Assyrians, as shown by explorations, and among the Canaanites, as seen in the OT records. Layard found Assyrian articles of iron coated with bronze, which generally crumbled on exposure to the air. It would seem that its use was especially for tools and weapons of attack, whereas bronze and the copper alloys were for defensive armor and objects that did not need hardness and sharpness of edge and point. Thus Goliath was clad in bronze armor, like Homer’s Achaioi Chalkochitōnes, but his spearhead was of iron (1 Sam. 17:5–7). By the time of David’s later years it was not only abundant (1 Chron. 22:3; 29:2) but had come to be more so than bronze (29:7; Isa. 60:17). This was due to Saul and David’s conquests over the Philistines, who held the secret of smelting iron (1 Sam. 13:19–22). The Philistines probably obtained the secret from the Hittites, whose monopoly on this important metal was not broken till about 1200 B.C. Sir Flinders Petrie found abundant confirmation of Philistine domination of iron smelting at Gerar, where iron furnaces and iron instruments were recovered. The industrial revolution of the Davidic-Solomonic era was due in large part to the “steel boom” in Israel. In Isa. 44:12, and more fully detailed in Eccles. 10:10, we find vivid and familiar pictures of the forge and the smith. The OT references to iron are varied; thus it appears in general among the spoils of war (Num. 31:22; 2 Sam. 8:8), for chariots—probably sheathed or plated with it (Josh. 17:16, 18; Judg. 1:19; 4:3, 13)—King Og’s bedstead (Deut. 3:11), the huge spearhead of Goliath (1 Sam. 17:7), for axes and axheads (Deut. 19:5; cf. Num. 35:16; 2 Kings 6:5–6, see marg.; Isa. 10:34), for stonecutting tools (Deut. 27:5), saws, harrows, etc. (2 Sam. 12:31); Tabernacle vessels (Josh. 6:19, 24); idols (Dan. 5:4), a stylus for engraving (Job 19:24; Jer. 17:1), and often for bonds or fetters (Pss. 105:18; 107:10, see marg.; 149:8); also as a figure of strong dominion, an iron scepter or mace (2:9), etc. In these latter and other similar passages, such as Deut. 28:48, the literal and figurative uses of the word blend into each other so as not always to be readily distinguished. Thus it is not clear whether the “iron furnace” (4:20; 1 Kings 8:51; and Jer. 11:4) has an actual or metaphorical reference to the servitude in Egypt.

Archaeologists are of the opinion that the earliest iron in Bible lands was meteoric, containing a small amount of nickel. Both the Egyptian name of iron and the cuneiform ideogram suggest that it was a “metal of heaven.” This may be the explanation of the reference to iron among the descendants of Cain in Gen. 4:22. Moreover, excavations have shown that iron ores were occasionally smelted in Mesopotamia at an early date. At Tel Asmar (ancient Eshnunna) Henri Frankfort unearthed evidence of an iron blade from an occupational level belonging to c. 2700 B.C. (Oriental Institute Commissions 18, pp. 59–61). A small steel ax has also been recovered from Ur (Millar Burrows, What Mean These Stones? [1951], p. 158). However, for some inexplicable reason the discovery of iron was not pursued and did not come into general use on an industrial scale, as we have seen, until after 1200 B.C. M.F.U.

Figurative. In clearly figurative uses it is often applied to ideas of physical strength, endurance, etc. (Deut. 33:25; Mic. 4:13; Job 40:18; Dan. 7:7, 19), and in mixed symbols (1 Kings 22:11; 2 Chron. 18:10; and the striking similes of Dan. 2:32–45); and likewise to purely moral qualities, in either good or bad senses—firm, unyielding (Jer. 1:18; Isa. 48:4); with the last compare the epithet so frequently applied to Israel, “an obstinate [stiff-necked] people” (Ex. 32:9; 33:3, 5; Deut. 9:6, 13; 2 Chron. 30:8; etc.). In Deut. 28:23 it is used with great vividness to depict the parched and hardened ground in a protracted drought, and so of a rainless sky (Lev. 26:19). In Ezek. 4:3 the “iron plate” to be used by the prophet as a sign against Jerusalem of the coming siege is compared with the portable screens for archers, etc., represented on Assyrian sculptures.

Jacinth, Hyacinth. This name is now applied to the orange-red and red-brown varieties of zircon (silicate of zirconia); but the classical huakinthos (Rev. 21:20; huakinthinos, Rev. 9:17, “hyacinth”) appears rather to have been our blue sapphire. Yet there is some uncertainty regarding it, as Pliny speaks of it as golden-colored; generally, however, the classical hyacinthus was blue. In Rev. 21:20 (Gk. huakinthos) it no doubt means sapphire. In the NASB and NIV (Ex. 28:19; 39:12) it is used instead of KJV “ligure” for Heb. leshem in the account of the breastpiece, and in these cases apparently a deep yellow gem is meant, possibly our zircon-hyacinth. Yet as the LXX uses huakinthos (for t□kēlet) in all the descriptions of the Tabernacle furnishings, where blue is employed in the English versions, and evidently meant, and as various ancient writers mention the hyacinthus as being some shade of blue, there can be little question of its being our sapphire. See also Sapphire.

Jasper (Heb. yāsh□pēh; Gk. iaspis). Great uncertainty surrounds the meaning of the word iaspis among the ancients. The name is now limited to the richly colored and strictly opaque varieties, many of which are fine ornamental stones and were largely used for seals, cylinders, etc., by the ancients, but are totally remote from any idea of great preciousness or great brilliancy. As near as we can gather from Pliny's descriptions, the stone that he called iaspis—following Theophrastus—seems to have included several kinds of delicately colored translucent varieties of quartz (the chalcedonies); he especially mentions blue, green, and rosy tints. If so, what is now called chrysoprase would be included here. But these also, however beautiful, are lacking in the elements of brilliancy and rarity. Probably some other minerals were also classed by Pliny as iaspis, perhaps the delicate green jades and other semitransparent stones of rich, light colors. Doubtless we should translate the phraseology of John in Rev. 21:11, 18 not as a specific assertion of certain optical properties belonging to the stone named, but rather as an attempt to illustrate from various combined sources conceptions too glorious for description. "Her brilliance was like a very costly stone, as a stone of crystal-clear jasper"—a light more beautiful than words can depict, with the rich sky-blue (or green or rosy or mingled opaline) hues of an iaspis and the transparency of crystal.

Lapis Lazuli. See Sapphire.

Lead (Heb. ōperet). The Heb. term very plainly indicates this metal, from its heaviness (Ex. 15:10) and its ready dissipation by oxidizing at high temperatures (Jer. 6:29; cf. Ecclus. 22:14 and 47:18); a very heavy metal, less valuable than tin. It was used for weights (Zech. 5:7–8) and for filling in inscriptions cut in rock (Job 19:24; also Num. 31:22; Ezek. 22:18, 20; 27:12). The word translated "plumb line" (Amos 7:7–8) is ānāk and like the English rendering implies a probable, though not necessary, idea of lead as the material of the weight. In Zech. 4:10 the word "plumb line" is eben bdīl, a weight of tin, literally, "stone of tin"; whereas in Zech. 5:8 the "lead weight" is eben hāōperet, "stone of lead." It is needless to seek specific details of composition in such references. Any heavy substance may thus be employed; but it is interesting to remember that the most common ores of these two metals, cassiterite or tinstone (oxide of tin) and galena (sulfide of lead), are very heavy minerals, and a piece of either of them would serve well to suspend a plumb line. But the use of eben, "stone," in the sense of a weight, is early and familiar in Heb.; thus Isa. 34:11, "plumb line of emptiness" (marg. "stones of void"), and better rendered by Gesenius as "plummet of desolation," and so in various references. Other ancient uses of lead were for making solder (41:7), for tablets for writing, and, in very early buildings, for fastening or filling in between rough stonework, so noted at Nineveh by Layard. Oxide of lead has also been found in the glaze upon both Egyptian and Assyrian pottery, as among the moderns. Lead is a metal of somewhat frequent occurrence, the only workable ore being the sulfide galena. Lead mines at Jebel e' Rossas, near the Red Sea, between Kosseir and Berenice, were well known.

Lime (Heb. šîd, to “cover” or “plaster” with lime). In Deut. 27:2, 4 to “coat” with lime is mentioned (cf. Josh. 8:32); in Isa. 33:12 and Amos 2:1 lime is referred to as the substance bones turn into after being burned. The process of burning lime (see Chalk Stones) was familiar; but it is not possible to say just what the Hebrew modes of using it were or how far they distinguished lime from other substances, such as plaster. Our modern chemistry enables us to understand the nature and behavior of these substances, theoretically, far better than the ancients; but they certainly knew them practically and used them well. Carbonate of lime (limestone), when heated, loses its carbonic acid and passes to caustic or unslaked lime (calcium oxide); this, on contact with water, combines with it with great heat, forming calcium hydrate (slaked lime), which gradually takes up carbon dioxide again from the air and passes back to carbonate. If slaked lime is mixed with sand, mortar results, which hardens into an artificial stone consisting of grains of sand embedded in a mass of carbonate of lime—very hard and enduring. Sulfate of lime (gypsum, alabaster) contains a quantity of water held in the condition known as “water of crystallization”; by heating, this water is driven off, and the anhydrous sulfate may then be pulverized, this being plaster; on contact with water the latter is again taken up, and the material suddenly solidifies or “sets.” Various combinations and applications of these two great lime products have been used for ages and in many lands. Admixtures of clay with mortar yield certain forms of cement, and the hydraulic cement used for masonry under water is made from argillaceous limestone. Stucco consists essentially of a mixture of plaster with pulverized marble and becomes hard and capable of polish far beyond simple plaster. Whitewash is slaked lime (hydrate) mixed with a large quantity of water, so as to be spread thinly and evenly over walls, etc. Probably all these materials were known to the Hebrews; but it does not appear possible to distinguish any precise terms for them.

Lye. See Niter.

Marble (Heb. shēsh, shayish, “white”; Gk. marmaros; Esther 1:6; Rev. 18:12). The term marble is used loosely for any fine-grained building or ornamental stone, not very hard, white or of delicate color, and taking a handsome polish. Strictly, it refers to crystalline limestones possessing these qualities, but other varieties and even other stones are often included in the term. Palestine is a limestone country; and the word, as used in the Bible, has its ordinary meaning and requires no discussion. From 1 Kings 5:15, 18; 7:10 it would seem as though the material was the white or cream-colored Jurassic limestone of Lebanon, of which the sun temple at Baalbek is constructed. In Herod's Temple true white crystalline marble was largely employed. In the passage in Esther 1:6, several other words are also used, including porphyry and alabaster.

Mortar. This term for building is distinguished from the apparatus for grinding (Heb. hēmar, Gen. 11:3; Ex. 1:14; etc. The root (hāmar) is properly to “boil” or “foam,” though it has some secondary meanings; but this primitive sense vividly suggests the slaking of lime in our ordinary making of mortar. In ancient buildings we find some without any fastening material at all, the stones merely fitted together accurately; in some cases lead was used and in others iron clamps; but most frequently we find either tar (Gen. 11:3, and many existing ruins in Mesopotamia), clay, or some form of cement or mortar prepared for the purpose, and often mixed with straw, as we use hair. Other references to the mixing or “treading” of mortar, in this case plainly not our lime mortar, are Isa. 41:25 and Nah. 3:14; here hōmer has apparently its frequent meaning of clay, and the rendering “mortar” in our versions is not applicable.

Another word, ḥāpār, properly “dust” or “dry earth” (so KJV, Lev. 14:41), is in some places rendered “mortar” (KJV) or “plaster” (NASB), especially Lev. 14:42, 45, and refers to clay (so NIV) used for filling interstices in walls or for coating them. In Ezek. 13:10–15; 22:28 the word mortar (KJV, from Heb. ḥāpār) or whitewash (NASB and NIV, from Heb. tāpēl) may imply some form of stucco or cement, used to protect adobe houses from the action of the weather. See Brick, in the general listing; Lime; Plaster, in this article.

Figurative: See Mortar in general listing.

Niter (Heb. neter; Gk. nitron). A term found in the KJV but not the NASB and NIV. It is a name for native carbonate of soda, or natron, including also the closely related minerals thermonatrite and trona. The name niter is now applied to an entirely different substance—saltpeter or nitrate of potash. Natron occurs in nature only in solution; it contains ten molecules (more than 60 percent) of water, and is essentially the same material as that commonly known as “washing soda.” By exposure to the air and by heat more or less of this water is lost, and several other sodium carbonates are thus produced, with varying proportions of water, and even the anhydrous salt. Thermonatrite and trona (abbreviated from natrona) are compounds of this kind, containing about 14 and 20 percent of water respectively, and occurring in the evaporated crusts and deposits from alkaline lakes in dry regions. The principal ancient source was at the “soda lakes” of Egypt, described by Pliny and Strabo, as well as by explorers. There are nine of these lakes, the largest being about five miles long and a mile and a half wide, others much smaller; they are situated some sixty miles NW of Cairo, in the desert of St. Macarius. Beneath the general surface of sand lies a heavy bed of dark clay impregnated with salt, gypsum, and carbonate of lime; the water leached from this clay is strongly charged with salt and with sulfates and carbonates of soda. In the dry season the smaller lakes evaporate to solid crusts, the larger concentrate and deposit beds of these salts, variously mixed in composition but rich in sodium carbonates. The crusts are dug and broken with spades and poles, dried in the sun on the banks, taken to the Nile—some thirty miles—and there shipped on boats to Alexandria. Large amounts are sent to Crete for use in soap making, and the material is also widely employed in the East to soften the hard limestone waters for drinking. Similar deposits occur in other regions of the Old World, and largely in Nevada and California, especially Mono Lake and Owen’s Lake. At the latter important soda works have been established.

The ancients employed these natural carbonates for washing, mixed with oil so as to form a true soap; and this primitive though effective method is still in use. They also made artificial vegetable alkalis of the same kind by burning plants and leaching the ashes with water; these were designated in Heb. as bōr and bōrît; so Mal. 3:2. The effect of pouring acid upon such a carbonate, producing violent effervescence, was evidently familiar, from Prov. 25:20, where the rendering of neter in the NASB and NIV is “soda” in place of KJV “nitre”—a vivid comparison to the revulsion of one in sorrow against untimely mirth. The two words neter and bōrît occur together in Jer. 2:22, where the former is rendered “nitre” in the KJV, “soda” in the NIV, and “lye” in the NASB, and the latter is given as “soap” in all three versions. Lye and soap appear elsewhere in the Bible, “lye” being the rendering in the NASB and “soda” in the NIV of Heb. bōr in Job 9:30, and “soap” being the rendering of Heb. bōrît in the KJV, NIV, and NASB of Mal. 3:2. See also Soap, below.

Onyx (Gk. onux, generally for Heb. shōham). This term probably in most cases is the stone still so named (Gen. 2:12; Ex. 25:7; etc.). The word denotes the varieties of that stone that show somewhat even bands or layers of black or dark tints, and white. When cut parallel to the layers the semitransparent white bands show the darker bands through them, and suggest the fingernail, whence the name onux. The same word has also been used, both anciently and among us, for other translucent banded stones, such as “Mexican onyx” (see Alabaster). The word shōham occurs quite often and is variously rendered by the LXX, indicating great uncertainty as to its meaning. References to the Arab. sahum, “paleness,” and sachma, “blackness,” made by various writers, give little aid, though strongly against any of the bright-colored stones above named. Josephus, however, states clearly that the stone on the breastplate was onyx and the shoulder-pieces of the ephod sardonyx—the variety of onyx with bands of dark red (sardine or sardius). This testimony, from one personally familiar with the priestly vestments, is incontestable and goes far to establish the same meaning for the other cases in which shōham occurs. See Agate.

Pearls. These cannot be strictly classed among precious stones, yet they have always been associated with gems in connection with jewelry and so may be treated here. Pearls are formed by secretion in the bodies of many kinds of molluscan shellfish and consist of the same material and possess the same color as the interior layers of the shell in which they occur. This material is partly mineral matter (carbonate of lime) and partly organic matter. Most commercial pearls are yielded by the so-called “pearl oysters,” which occur widely distributed along all the shores of the Indian and South Pacific oceans. The scientific name of the chief pearl-yielding species is Meleagrina margaritifera. The ancient pearl fisheries were chiefly in the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf; the latter still retain great importance, but the former have ceased to be worked for a long time. Ceylon and the north Australian coast now furnish large quantities.

The references to pearls in the Scriptures are curiously few, and in the OT uncertain, although we know from ancient jewelry that pearls were familiar from very early times. Those in Egypt are presumably from the Red Sea, where they were sought and found as late as the Roman period. In the Red Sea occurs also the large delicate pinna, or “wing shell,” which occasionally yields translucent pink pearls, greatly prized for their beauty and rarity. It seems probable, partly from the resemblance to the Arab. name and partly from the manner of expression, that the Heb. word pnîmîm—always plural and variously rendered by OT translators (in the NASB OT, “jewels,” Prov. 3:15; 8:11; 20:15; 31:10; “corals,” Lam. 4:7; “pearls,” Job 28:18; in the KJV OT appearing but once [Job 28:18], and then as the translation of Heb. gābîsh; see Crystal; in the NIV OT, “ruby”)—actually refers to Pearls. This is the view of the rabbis and many commentators, yet the passage in Lamentations (4:7) implies redness and has made the rendering problematical. Gesenius would adopt pearls but for this, and he inclines to the meaning red coral, deriving the word from pārad, to “divide” or “separate” (as in branching corals). But the precious pink pearls yielded by the Red Sea pinnae, Gk. pinna, would seem to solve the apparent difficulty. The very name in the Gk. is almost identical, and perhaps the derivation may be found in connection with pnîmâ and pnîmî, “within, inner,” formed in and taken from the interior of a shellfish. It is also possible, as the LXX and Vulg. renderings of the passages in Proverbs would suggest, that this word may have possessed an indefinite meaning, including pearls and strung jewels or beads, such as of red coral, garnet, carnelian, etc. A feminine singular form, pīninnâ, occurs once (1 Sam. 1:2, 4) as the name of the other wife of Elkanah, just as we use Pearl, and many European nations Marguerite, etc. The same name is still in use among Arabic-speaking people, in almost the identical form of 1 Sam. 1.

The NT references (Matt. 13:45; Rev. 17:4; 21:21) are perfectly simple renderings of Gk. margaritēs, a “pearl.”

Pitch. The rendering of two (NASB) or three (KJV) Heb. terms. In the NASB, NIV, and KJV Heb. kōper (Gen. 6:14) and zēpet (Ex. 2:3; Isa. 34:9) are translated “pitch.” In the KJV an additional Heb. word, kāpar, from kōper, is also given as “pitch,” although the NASB renders “cover.” Isaiah 34:9 shows the use of zēpet for mineral pitch (asphalt) to depict a barren, desolate region, like the shores of the Dead Sea.

Mineral pitch or asphalt was of great utility in sealing objects against water and moisture. It was employed to caulk the seams of boats, notably Noah’s ark (Gen. 6:14), which was significantly covered with pitch. It is noteworthy that kappēr is the same expression rendered “atonement” in Lev. 17:11; etc., for it is atonement that keeps out the waters of judgment and makes the believer’s position “in Christ” safe. The ark is typical of the place of the believer “in Christ” (Eph. 1:1–14) and constitutes a type of our Lord as the refuge of His people from judgment (Heb. 11:7). Pitch was also used to cover the basket in which the baby Moses was concealed among the reeds of the Nile (Ex. 2:3). Ancient deposits of pitch existed at Hit on the Euphrates River above Babylon, and other places in Mesopotamia. It was widely used in ziggurat construction, as in the Tower of Babel (which see; Gen. 11:3), in Babylonia, and also in constructional decoration to hold tablets of limestone or lapis lazuli, as these recovered architectural embellishments attest. See also Tar. M.F.U.

Plaster. Plaster, made from gypsum by heating it and mixing the dehydrated and powdered product with water, must have been known to the Hebrews, as gypsum occurs in the terraces along the Jordan and Dead Sea valleys. The Egyptians seem to have used it freely, with colors, and overlaid it with varnish in their interior wall paintings. Several Heb. terms are given as “plaster” in the KJV, NIV, and NASB.

1. In Deut. 27:2, 4, the noun šîd, from šîd, “to cover with lime,” is rendered “plaster” in the KJV and NIV, but it is plainly lime, from Isa. 33:12 and Amos 2:1, and is so translated in the NASB.

2. Another more general word, tūah, appears in Ezek. 13:12 and is translated as “daubing” in the KJV, “whitewash” in the NIV, and “plaster” in the NASB. The Heb. term is derived from the word tūah, given as “plaster” (KJV and NIV) and “replaster” (NASB) in Lev. 14:42, 43, 48 (cf. 1 Chron. 29:4 for the use of tūah to refer to the “overlay” of silver plating on the walls of the Temple).

3. The word āpār, “powdered,” appears in Lev. 14:41, 45, where it is rendered “dust” and “mortar” in the KJV and “plaster” in the NASB and NIV (see also Gen. 2:7, and elsewhere, for the use of the Heb. term with the sense of “dust”).

4. In Dan. 5:5 the Heb. word for plaster is gūrā, Aram. form for ordinary Heb. gūr, properly lime, here probably stucco (“plaster,” NIV) gypsum slabs (alabaster) were probably much used for wall facings at Nineveh, but not so much at Babylon, where the scene referred to occurred. See also Lime; Mortar.

Figurative. See Mortar in the general listing.

Ruby, Rubies. The English term ruby, from Heb. ōdem, does not appear in the KJV, though it is present in the NASB and NIV (Ex. 28:17; 39:10; Ezek. 28:13). The KJV gives sardius (which see).

The term rubies appears in the KJV, NIV, and the NASB but not for the same Heb. words. In the KJV and NIV, “rubies” is the rendering for Heb. pnînm in Job 28:18 (“pearls,” NASB) and Lam. 4:7 (“corals,” NASB). In the NASB and NIV, “rubies” is the translation of Heb. kadkōd, “striking fire, sparkling,” and appears in Isa. 54:12 and Ezek. 27:16 (both “agate,” KJV).

Salt (Heb. melaḥ, powder; hals). This is the common substance—sodium chloride—familiar in various applications, in the Bible as with us. Beds of rock salt occur at many points around the Dead Sea, called the “Salt Sea” (Heb. yām hammelaḥ, Gen. 14:3; Num. 34:12; Deut. 3:17; Josh. 3:16; 12:3; 15:2, 5; 18:19), the Mediterranean being the “Great Sea” (Josh. 15:12) or the “sea.” The flats at the southern end of the Dead Sea are coated with salt in the dry season; these or similar spots are alluded to (Deut. 29:23; Zeph. 2:9; and Jer. 17:6); and some locate here the “Valley of Salt” (2 Sam. 8:13; 2 Kings 14:7; Ps. 60, title). The waters of the Dead Sea are intensely salty and bitter from the large amount of magnesium salts that they contain, having the composition of “a half-exhausted mother-liquor” (Le Conte) from which most of the sodium salts have been deposited, as well as the lime salts, during a long and extreme concentration since the time when the lake extended over the greater part of the Jordan Valley to hundreds of feet above its present level. The preserving properties of salt were well known; its use by the Phoenicians in curing fish is plain from Neh. 13:16; this salt they evidently made from Mediterranean water, as they had doubtless done for ages.

Figurative. In the East salt has long been regarded as possessing a certain sacred character, so that partaking of it together was regarded as a pledge of friendship and faithfulness (2 Chron. 13:5); this idea appears in a strictly religious sense, as between God and men (Num. 18:19), and hence in the offering of all sacrifices salt was essential (Lev. 2:13; Ezra 6:9; Ezek. 43:14; and Mark 9:49).

In a figurative sense for purifying and preserving influences, it is spoken of in Matt. 5:13; Mark 9:50; Luke 14:34; Col. 4:6. In these references there is an allusion to a popular belief that salt can lose its virtue; Pliny seems to recognize this idea (31.39, 44) in speaking of sal tabescens. This belief might arise from the use of impure rock salt or mixed saline and earthy deposits from the Dead Sea flats, etc., from which the salt would dissolve out, leaving only a tasteless and useless residue.

In Judg. 9:45 is a reference to the custom of strewing salt over the ruins of a captured town, thus figuratively devoting it to desolation. In 2 Kings 2:20–21 the idea of purification is again seen in Elisha’s “healing” of the spring. These two symbolic acts illustrate two contrasted associations connected with salt in the Eastern mind.

Sapphire (Heb. sappîr; Gk. sappeiros). The sapphires of the ancients was not our sapphire, the transparent blue corundum, but usually the opaque stone known to us as lapis lazuli (so NASB of Lam. 4:7; Ezek. 1:26; 28:13; elsewhere KJV, NASB, NIV, “sapphire”), varying from ultramarine to dark violet blue. With this were doubtless included some other blue stones, especially the rich blue chalcedony now called sapphirine quartz and perhaps occasionally cyanite and even possibly some true sapphires. Lapis lazuli is frequent in ancient Egyptian and Babylonian jewelry and was evidently familiar and highly prized. Sapphirine quartz was much employed for Babylonian cylinder seals. Both of these stones are good material for engraving upon, whereas true sapphire is too hard for any ordinary tools. The objection raised by some that the remarkable passage in Ex. 24:10—the vision of God as seen by Moses and the elders of Israel—implies transparency, does not apply to “a pavement of sapphire, as clear as the sky itself.” The words are plainly an attempt to describe an intense depth and beauty of color resembling, but surpassing, that of the sky; and there is no more implication from this comparison that the sapphire was a transparent stone than there is regarding gold in the similar case in Rev. 21:21 where John describes the heavenly city as “pure gold, like transparent glass.”

As far as we can judge, the modern sapphire was the hyacinth (or jacinth) of the ancients. Greek mythology tells of Hyacinthus, who was transformed into a flower bearing his name. This was not our hyacinth, but apparently the blue reed; or, some have thought, the larkspur. The name was then transferred to a clear blue gem; and hence we may so understand the biblical hyacinth or jacinth—certainly at least in Rev. 21:20. The stone now so called is entirely different, comprising the orange-red and red-brown varieties of zircon. See Jacinth.

Sardine, Sardius, Sardonyx (Heb. ōdem; Gk. sardios). The name sard, derived from Sardis in Lydia, is applied to the deep red or brownish red varieties of carnelian (i.e., chalcidony, which see), which have always been favorite stones for engraving seals and like purposes, examples being abundant in collections of ancient gems. The sardius (sardonyx, NIV) of Rev. 21:20 doubtless means this stone; the lithos sardinus of Rev. 4:3 is less certain. In the OT sardion and lithos sardiou are used variously, but always implying red gems. In Ex. 25:7 and 35:9, where the LXX uses this word for shōham (onyx), it seems probable that sardonyx (which see) was included under shōham on the one hand and sardiou on the other.

Sardonyx (Gk. sardonux). The variety of onyx in which some of the layers are of red carnelian (sard). The name has long been used with little change. The stone was a favorite among the ancients, as it still is, for the cameo effects produced by cutting designs in one layer with a background of another differently colored. In Rev. 21:20 this is doubtless the stone meant. In the OT it is probable (as suggested above) that it is included in some of the references to both onux and sardios. Josephus says that the shoulder clasps of the ephod were sardonyxes, adding that these are “needless to describe, as being known to everyone” (Ex. 28:9). As these were engraved with the names of the tribes (six upon each), they were doubtless large red-and-white sardonyx plates, perhaps two inches long, with the names cut in intaglio in the contrasted colors. This particular account of the engraving, with Josephus’s statement, disposes of the idea that shōham can mean beryl or emerald, which could rarely furnish pieces of such size or be carved advantageously in such ways.

Silver. This precious metal was employed as a medium of commercial exchange from early antiquity (Gen. 23:16; 37:28). It was not coined until the time of Croesus of Lydia and the introduction of coinage into the Persian Empire by Cyrus the Great in the sixth century B.C. In early times it was weighed out in lumps (Job 28:15; Isa. 46:6). It was used in patriarchal times for personal ornaments (Gen. 24:53 and later Ex. 3:22; Song of Sol. 1:11). Royal crowns (Zech. 6:11), musical instruments, i.e., trumpets (Num. 10:2), and drinking cups of the nobility (Gen. 44:2) were made of it. The metal was used extensively in the Tabernacle and Temple for sockets (Ex. 26:19), hooks, fillets of the pillars (Ex. 27:10; 38:19), platters, and bowls (Num. 7:13). Idols were made of silver (Ps. 115:4; Acts 19:24). Silver was used by the Sumerians in the third millennium B.C.; the artisans of Ur fashioned many silver art objects and silver jewelry. Egyptians knew the metal in the Old Kingdom. Silver was especially prominent under the New Empire after 1450 B.C. Great quantities of silver jewelry and other objects from this period show that the Egyptians evidently imported large quantities at this time. Centuries before this, silver figures prominently in the Joseph narratives (cf. Gen. 44:2, 5, 12, 16; 45:22). The refining of silver is often referred to in the OT (Prov. 17:3; Isa. 48:10; Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:3; etc.). An exquisite silver Persian bowl, now in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, comes from the reign of Artaxerxes I (464–424 B.C.).

Homer describes elegant articles of silver work, e.g., the crater, offered as a prize by Achilles at the funeral games of Patroclus (Iliad 22.704–45), “which was unrivaled on earth for beauty,” wrought by Sidonians and brought by Phoenician merchants as a present to Thoas; and also a similar crater, given to Menelaus by a Sidonian king (Odyssey 4.615; 15.115). From these and many other ancient references we learn of great use of silver for articles of value and elegance; but little has come down to us. Greek objects in silver are rare and were so even in Roman times. Pliny and others give accounts of celebrated Greek silversmiths; but the few examples of their work then existing were of extreme value. Their favorite style was that of designs embossed on bands of silver, which were then soldered on the vase or patera itself. The work was so delicate and elaborate that it could not be molded for casts; and in his time, Pliny says, there were no artists capable of reproducing it. The designs were largely mythological or Homeric, occasionally of domestic life. We have some fine specimens of Phoenician and Cypriote silver work of early date, such as those found among the Curium treasures in Cyprus (Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York—Cesnola collection), but all darkened and altered so as to possess none of their original beauty. The Phoenician work is widely distributed in the ancient world, and it is easily recognized by experts from its conventional and nonoriginal character—Egyptian and Assyrian patterns and motifs being constantly and curiously mingled. The Phoenicians were great imitators, adapters, and traders and possessed fine mechanical skill, but lacked originality. Their style of work was largely a combination of repoussé with chasing, the patterns being first hammered into relief from below and then finished with a graver on the outer or upper side.

Among the many OT references to silver only a few distinctions need be made. It is spoken of literally in several ways:

1. As a precious metal for objects of beauty or value (see Joseph’s cup, Gen. 44:2); for royal or sacred vessels, especially in connection with the Tabernacle or the Temple (see Ex. 26:19, 21; 1 Chron. 18:10; 28:14–17; 29:2–5; 2 Chron. 24:14; Ezra 1:6, 11; 5:14; 8:26; Dan. 5:2); of dishes (Num. 7); often as the material of idols, either cast or plated (see Gold; also Ex. 20:23; Judg. 17:3; Pss. 115:4; 135:15; Isa. 2:20; 31:7; Hos. 13:2; Jer. 10:9), imported in plates or sheets for overlaying images.

2. As metal being “smelted or wrought” (Job 28:1; Ps. 12:6; Prov. 17:3; 25:4; Ezek. 22:18–22).

3. As “money,” in payment of fines, tribute, gifts, etc., weighed out by shekels or talents (Gen. 23:15–16; Lev. 27:3, 16, 25; Deut. 22:19, 29; Judg. 17:2, 4, 10; 2 Sam. 18:11–12; 1 Kings 20:39; 2 Kings 5:22–23; 15:20; Jer. 32:9–10; Amos 8:6, marg.).

The word keseḥ is simply rendered “money” in many passages, such as Gen. 42:25–35; 43:12–23; Ex. 21:34; 22:7; 30:16; Num. 3:48–51; Jer. 32:25, 44; and so generally, also with frequent allusions to its estimation by weight. Coins were not known among the Jews until late (cf. 1 Macc. 15:6); the earlier forms must have been more like our bullion, small bars or flat pieces, or perhaps the ring money depicted upon some of the Egyptian remains, as weighed in scales.

The NT references are simple and need little comment. By that time coins were familiar (Matt. 26:15; 27:3–9—“pieces of silver,” argurion, a silver coin), rendered “silver coins” in Luke 15:8 for drachmē, perhaps an allusion to the almost universal custom among Eastern women of wearing coins as ornaments on headdresses, bracelets, etc.—at times imitated among ourselves. In many cases argurion is simply rendered “money” (Matt. 28:12; Mark 14:11; Luke 9:3; 22:5; Acts 24:26); while it is translated “silver” in 8:20; 20:33; 1 Pet. 1:18. Conversely, arguros, the general name for the metal or treasure consisting of it (so Acts 17:29; James 5:3; Rev. 18:12) is used for silver coins in Matt. 10:9.

The sources of ancient silver are but little known. Diodorus speaks (1.33) of mines on the island of Meroe, together with gold, copper, and iron. An important source was Spain (cf. 1 Macc. 8:3); Strabo and others speak of it as yielding large amounts, chiefly from Tartessus and Carthago Nova. Jeremiah’s statement (Jer. 10:9) may have a like reference, if Tartessus is the same as Tarshish, as has been often supposed.

Figurative. Silver is used figuratively of God’s words (Ps. 12:6); the tongue of the just (Prov. 10:20); saints purified by affliction (Ps. 66:10; Zech. 13:9); “rejected silver,” i.e., impure, as compared to wicked men (Jer. 6:30); also the dross of silver (Isa. 1:22; Ezek. 22:18). Wisdom is declared to be more valuable than silver (Job 28:15; Prov. 3:14; 8:10, 19; 16:16).

Slime. See Pitch; Tar.

Soap (Heb. bōrît). The Heb. bōrît is a general term for any substance of cleansing qualities. As, however, it appears in Jer. 2:22, in contradistinction to Heb. nether, which undoubtedly means “natron” (mineral alkali), it is fair to infer that bōrît refers to vegetable alkali or some kind of potash, which forms one of the usual ingredients in our soap. It occurs in Mal. 3:2, but there is nothing to tell us whether it was obtained from the vegetable or mineral kingdom. But bōr (Job 9:30, “lye,” NASB; “washing soda,” NIV) denotes a vegetable alkali used for washing. Numerous plants, capable of yielding alkalies, exist in Palestine and the surrounding countries; we may notice one named Hubeibeh (the Salsola kali of botanists) found near the Dead Sea, the ashes of which are called el-Kuli, from their strong alkaline properties; and the Ajram, found near Sinai, which, when pounded, serves as a substitute for soap. Modern travelers have also noticed the Saponaria officinalis and the Mesembryanthemum nodiflorum, both possessing alkaline properties, as growing in Palestine. See Niter, above.

Soda. See Niter.

Steel. See Iron.

Sulfur. See Brimstone in this article; and also Sodom; Gomorrah in the general listing.

Tar (Heb. hēmār, “boiling up,” to be “red”; Gen. 11:3; 14:10; Ex. 2:3; zepet, “flowing” or “fluid,” Ex. 2:3; Isa. 34:9). Much of the tar or asphalt of ancient times came from the Dead Sea, which was called Lacus Asphaltites. The use of it as a cement for bricks at Babylon is described by Herodotus and other ancient writers, and may be seen in great ruins to this day, e.g., the so-called wall of media, not far from Babylon.

Tin (Heb. bdîl; Gk. kassiteros). This metal, though rare in its occurrence, was very early discovered and smelted and played a most conspicuous part in the art and commerce of the ancient world. It is a remarkable fact that though its only ore, cassiterite or tinstone (the oxide), has no metallic aspect and occurs at but few and remote points, tin should have become known so early and its alloy with copper (bronze) become the great metal for all purposes of arts, arms, and ornaments during the entire extent of the Bronze Age of archaeology—3000–1200 B.C. The source of the main supply is judged to have been Cornwall, where the Phoenicians procured it through many centuries (see under Bronze), but its use was widespread even in far earlier times. Stone molds are found at many points in Europe, showing that bronze articles were cast as well as procured by commerce. Either reduced tin, therefore, or the ore itself must have been a very early article of trade throughout prehistoric Europe. There are tin mines in both Saxony and Bohemia and a few in the Iberian peninsula, but otherwise we know of no Old World sources between Cornwall and Malacca. To these extreme points of the Eurasian continent we must look for the main supply. There are evidences of important Phoenician tin traffic by sea with Cornwall, but the prehistoric use of bronze must probably go back to Indian sources and to the earliest migrations from eastern and southern Asia, while Europe was yet in the Neolithic Age. Arrian found tin abundant in Arabia, but Smith has shown that at that period it came there from Egypt and not from the East. After the time of Julius Caesar, British tin was brought overland via Marseilles.

The OT references are Num. 31:22; Ezek. 22:18, 20; 27:12. In Isa. 1:25, the rendering “alloy” (NASB; “tin,” KJV; “dross,” NIV) should be lead, frequently in connection with silver ores; and this passage, together with Zech. 4:10 (see under Lead), shows that the word bdîl was used rather loosely. Ecclesiasticus 47:18 gives tin a rank above lead in value: “You gathered gold like tin and amassed silver like lead.”

Classical references are frequent, so Homer, in the Shield of Achilles (Iliad 18.474) and elsewhere in the Iliad. Pliny seems to have designated lead and tin respectively as plumbum nigrum and plumbum candidum; whereas his stannum was apparently an alloy of the two metals (Beckmann), a sort of hard pewter. It seems probable that tin and lead were not very clearly discriminated by the ancients, as indicated in the passages cited above from Isaiah and Zechariah.

Topaz (Gk. topazion, for Heb. pitdâ, a “gem”; Ex. 28:17; 39:10; Job 28:19; Ezek. 28:13). This word has changed meanings exactly with chrysolite in ancient and modern usage. (See Chrysolite.) The Gk. topazion was apparently our chrysolite—the yellow-green gem called by jewelers peridot and by mineralogists olivine. Some of these are very rich olive greens and have even been confounded with emeralds, though of a different shade; such are the reputed emeralds in the chapel of the Three Magi in the cathedral of Cologne. The history of these splendid peridots is not known, but they are thought to have been brought from the East at the time of the Crusades. The “topaz” of Rev. 21:20 is probably a peridot, and the OT references, though less certain, may be fairly taken as the same.

Turquoise (Heb. nōpek; Ex. 28:18; 39:11; Ezek. 28:13, all NASB and NIV; KJV, “emerald”). The turquoise does not appear in the KJV, nor is it recognizable among the descriptions of Theophrastus, though plainly in Pliny, as callais and callaina. But as a peculiarly oriental gem from Khorassan and Turkestan, anciently from Arabia, and largely used in Egyptian jewelry from very early times, it must have been well known to the Hebrews; and there can hardly be any doubt that some of the obscure and disputed names of the OT must refer to turquoise. Famous Egyptian turquoise mines were located at Serabit in the Sinai Peninsula, where this blue or blue-green mineral containing copper and iron was obtained. As early as the Third Dynasty and again during the strong Twelfth Dynasty and particularly during the period of the New Empire (c. 1550–1230 B.C.) the Serabit mines yielded turquoise for jewelry, amulets, and sumptuous household furnishings. At Serabit El-Khadem Sir Flinders Petrie discovered important alphabetic inscriptions (1904–5).

MINES, MINING. It is evident from many allusions to it that mining was familiar to the Hebrews (see the remarkable description of ore mining in Job 28:1–11). Mining has been carried on from an early date in the Sinaitic peninsula. The Monitu, who frequented this region from the dawn of history, discovered at an early period in the sides of the hills rich veins of metals and strata bearing precious stones. From these they learned to extract iron, oxides of copper, and manganese, and turquoises which they exported to the Delta. (See Turquoise.) The fame of these riches excited the pharaohs, who fitted out expeditions that established themselves by main force in the districts where the mines lay. In the Wadi Magharah (“the Valley of the Cave”) are still traces of the Egyptian colony of miners who settled there for the purpose of mining copper and left their hieroglyphic inscriptions upon the face of the rock. The ancient furnaces are still to be seen, and on the coast of the Red Sea are found the piers and wharves from which the miners shipped their metal in the harbor of Abu Zelimeh.

The copper mines of Phaeno in Idumea, according to Jerome, were between Zoar and Petra, in which during the persecution of Diocletian the Christians were condemned to work. There are traces or records of gold-working in Egypt. Those in the Bisháree desert have been discovered. Ruins of the miners’ huts still remain at Serabit el-Khadem. Copper and iron were both native products of Palestine and were worked also in the island of Meroe, at the mouth of the Nile. The island of Cyprus is also mentioned as a source of copper.

MINGLED PEOPLE (Heb. ēreb, “mixture”). The non-Egyptian settlers in the land, e.g., Phoenicians, especially Greek, Ionian, and Carian troops who had been settled there since the days of Psammetichus, father of Neco (Jer. 25:30; Ezek. 30:5).

The “mingled people” in the midst of Babylon (Jer. 50:37, KJV) were probably the foreign soldiers or mercenary troops, who lived among the native population, as the Targum takes it.

MIN'AMIN (min'ya-min; “from” the “right” hand).

1. One of the Levites who had charge of the distribution to his brothers of the sacred offerings in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:15), 715 B.C.

2. One of the priests who came from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:17), and perhaps one of the trumpeters at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (12:41; “Mijamin,” NIV), 536–445 B.C. The name is elsewhere given as “Mijamin” (10:7; 12:5; both NASB and NIV) or Miamin (12:5, KJV).

MINISTER. This term is used to describe various officials of a religious and civil character.

Old Testament. In the OT two terms are used.

1. Heb. māshārēt, which is applied to the attachés of a royal court (2 Chron. 22:8; cf. Ps. 104:4); to the priests and Levites (Isa. 61:6; Ezek. 44:11; Joel 1:9, 13; Ezra 8:17; Neh. 10:36). Elsewhere rendered “servant.”

2. Heb. pālāh, to “serve,” appears in Ezra 7:24 with reference to those who served in the house of God. The KJV reads “ministers,” the NASB and NIV, “servants.”

New Testament. In the NT we have three terms, each with its distinctive meaning:

1. Leitourgos, a “public servant,” answers most nearly to the Heb. māshārēt and is usually employed in the LXX as its equivalent. It speaks of a subordinate public administrator (Rom. 15:16; Heb. 8:2) and in Rom. 13:6 it is rendered “servants.” In all these instances the original and special meaning of the word as used by the Athenians, one who performs certain gratuitous public services, is preserved.

2. Hupēretēs differs from the two others in that it contains the idea of actual and personal attendance upon a superior. Thus it is rendered “attendant” in Luke 4:20, where it refers to the chazen of the Talmudists whose duty it was to open and close the synagogue, to produce and replace the books employed in the service, and generally to wait on the officiating priest or teacher. The idea of personal attendance comes prominently forward in Acts 26:16, as well as in Luke 1:2, where it is rendered “servants.” In all these cases the etymological sense of the words hupo eretēs (lit., a “sub-rower,” one who rows under command of the steersman) comes out.

3. Diakonos is usually employed in relation to the ministry of the gospel: its application is twofold, in a general sense to indicate ministers of any order, whether superior or inferior, and in a special sense to indicate an order of inferior ministers (see Deacon). Our Lord Himself is called a minister, with reference to the holy service He had to perform as the Great High Priest of His people’s profession (Heb. 8:2).

MIN’NI (min’i). A kingdom named (Jer. 51:27) along with Ararat and Ashkenaz, “the Minyai of Nicholas of Damascus (Josephus Ant. 1.3.8); the Mannai of the inscriptions. Shalmaneser III of Assyria overran the country of the Minni in 830 B.C. In 715 the king of Minni revolted but was subdued to the Assyrian yoke. The Minni gave Ashurbanipal (669–626) a great deal of trouble, till they finally sided with the Medes and others to bring about the fall of Nineveh and the Assyrian Empire (612 B.C.). The territory of the Minni was in Armenia in the Lake Van and Lake Urmia region.”

MIN’NITH (min’ith). An Ammonite town E of the Jordan, to which the terrible carnage of Jephthah reached (Judg. 11:33); celebrated for its excellent wheat, which was exported to the markets of Tyre (Ezek. 27:17). It was probably located about four Roman miles E of Heshbon, where there are traces of terraces and walls.

MINSTREL (Heb. mānaggēn, one “striking” the lyre). This word occurs twice in the KJV (2 Kings 3:15; Matt. 9:23), once in the NASB (2 Kings 3:15), and not at all in the NIV. In the NASB and NIV the expression in Matthew is changed to “flute-players.” In 2 Kings 3:15 Elisha, in the presence of the confederate kings of Judah, exclaims, “But now bring me a minstrel.” The NIV translates “harpist.” It may be that through the music he expected “to collect his mind from the impressions of the outer world, and by subduing the self-life and life in the external world to become absorbed in the intuition of divine things” (Keil, Com., ad loc.). The word “flute-players” (Gk. aulētēs; Matt. 9:23) refers to a dirge or lament for the dead daughter of the ruler of the synagogue. Minstrels were common in royal courts at Babylon and in Assyria, Egypt, and Palestine.

MIPHKAD. See Inspection Gate.

MIRACLES (Lat. miraculum, from mirari, to “wonder”). Wonderful events, distinguished from events that only seem to be, or are merely, wonderful. The term miracle is etymologically inadequate and indicates only one, and that not the most important, feature of the proper conception. In general terms miracles may be defined as supernatural manifestations of divine power in the external world, in themselves special revelations of the presence and power of God; and in connection with other special revelations to which they are subservient, as aiding in their attestation, establishment, and preservation.

Biblical Doctrine. The Scripture representations of miraculous events in the OT and NT furnish the primary grounds for their consideration.

Biblical Names of Miracles. Of deepest significance among these are the words that literally mean “powers” and “signs” (e.g., Mark 9:39; Acts 2:22; 19:11, cf. Ex. 9:16; 15:6; Luke 23:8; John 2:11, cf. Num. 14:22; Deut. 11:3). Miracles are also called “wonders” (e.g., Ex. 15:11; Dan. 12:6). It is to be noted, however, that in the NT they are never referred to simply under that name; some other term, such as “signs,” is used to bring out the deeper meaning (e.g., John 4:48; Acts 4:30; 2 Cor. 12:12). As “wonders,” miracles are out of the ordinary course of events. They produce astonishment as being outside the ordinary operations of cause and effect. Thus far the aspect is chiefly negative. But miracles are also “powers” (often translated “mighty works,” “wonderful works,” “miracles”). As such they are manifestations of the power of God. Whoever the agent is in their accomplishment, the power is of God. They are wrought by “the Spirit of the Lord”; in them is seen “the finger of God” (Luke 4:18; 11:20; cf. Acts 3:12). As “signs,” miracles point to something beyond themselves. They indicate the near presence of God. They reveal the connection of the one who works them with the spiritual world and are thus seals attending his authority as a messenger from God (John 2:18, 23; 3:2; Matt. 12:38; Acts 14:3; 2 Cor. 12:12).

Another name of beautiful significance is that which the apostle John applies to the miracles of the Lord. He frequently uses simply the term “works,” not indeed exclusively with reference to the miracles of Christ and yet often with particular reference to them, as if miraculous works were only the natural and appropriate works of one who was Himself miraculous (John 5:36; 7:21, see marg.; 10:25, 32, 38; 14:11–12; 15:24). (For full discussion of this part of the subject see Trench, Notes on the Miracles, Preliminary Essay.)

Supernatural Character of Miracles. The Bible recognizes a divinely established order in nature (Gen. 8:22; James 5:7), but also a special series of facts brought about by the direct intervention of God; and such facts are miracles (Deut. 11:13–17). The Bible does not, however, represent nature or natural law as something independent or separate from God. The universe is not a vast mechanism that God has created and left to itself. The power that continually works therein is His power. What we call natural law, according to the biblical conception, is only the order of God’s ordinary working in the natural world (Pss. 19:1–6; 104; John 5:17; Heb. 1:3). A miracle, therefore, is a putting forth of the same power in the natural world in an extraordinary or supernatural manner. Thus we see why and in what sense miracles are “wonders.” They are such not because the usual exhibitions of God’s power in the natural world are in themselves less wonderful but because of their unusual and supernatural character. In the biblical view the whole world is wonderful (Job 26; etc.). To him who has eyes to see, nature everywhere is full of marvels. And therefore it is sometimes said that in the sense of being wonderful the whole system of things is miraculous, and accordingly we have no right to distinguish any fact or event as being in any special sense a miracle. And thus, to say everything is miraculous often becomes only another way of saying “nothing is miraculous.” A miracle is not only wonderful, but it is so in the sense of being a “new thing” (Num. 16:30) and therefore peculiarly fitted to awaken the feeling of wonder. And further, miracles are “powers” not in the sense of being greater, but different, manifestations of divine power than are usually exhibited. They are special acts of power and therefore have special impressiveness. To produce a harvest implies power as great as to feed a multitude with a few loaves and fishes. But the manifestation is different. In the one case the power is often overlooked; in the other it is recognized (Rom. 1:20; Acts 14:17; Luke 9:43; John 6:14). Likewise miracles are “signs” in the sense of being supernatural indications of the near presence and power of God. They declare the supremacy and perfect freedom of God even in the natural world. They are also “signs” of special grace from God because of their essential connection with that special revelation that centers in Jesus Christ, whose mission it is to release and restore the world from the disorder and dominion of sin.

It is not in place, nor is it practicable, to discuss here philosophically the relation between the natural and supernatural and the meanings to be attached to these terms. But it should be said that to speak of miracles as contrary to nature is not to speak in harmony with the Scriptures. Nietzsche properly says “miracles belong to the higher order of things, which is a higher nature also.” We may say that they lie beyond or outside the ordinary method of God’s working in the natural world to which our observation is confined; but still we must think of them as having their appropriate place in the one great plan and purpose of Him whose will is law and who fills the universe with His presence.

Purpose. The end for which miracles are wrought has already in some measure been indicated. But further statement and illustration are necessary.

The miracles of the Bible serve the great end of God’s gracious revelation. They are revelations in themselves but are inwrought with the history of special revelation. Accordingly we find them confined to the great epochs or critical periods of that history.

The theophanies of ante-Mosaic times were not strictly miracles; i.e., they are to be distinguished from miraculous works wrought by the instrumentality of man. They were divine manifestations but not authentications of God’s messengers. Moses appears in the OT as the first great miracle worker. And the reason for that is evident when we remember his unique position in the religious history of mankind, the greatness of his work, and the obstacles he encountered (Ex. 10:1–2; 14:21–31; 20:1–21; etc.). One common purpose unites and explains all the miracles in connection with the deliverance of the chosen people from the land of bondage and their secure settlement in the land of promise; that is the founding of a monotheistic religion, the worship of the true God in the midst of an idolatrous world. The next great displays of miraculous power were centuries later and gathered about the persons of Elijah and Elisha when the cause of true religion was threatened with destruction. And again, after a long interval came another, and in some senses remarkable, renewal of miracles with new messages from God to revive the sinking faith of the chosen nation during the captivity.

The coming of Christ marked the greatest of all epochs in religious history. The revelation He brought, which centered in Himself, was that for which all preceding revelations were preparatory. Coming to offer such new matters for faith, and to ask from men such complete submission to His authority and such complete trust in His power and grace, it was necessary that He should exhibit the signs of His character and mission. All that was miraculous in His history and activity was subservient to the great purpose of His coming. And these signs of His heavenly nature were all the more essential because of the state of humiliation into which He had entered. The NT Scriptures, therefore, especially abound in miracles. Chief among them is the resurrection of our Lord. Space does not here permit comparison between the miracles of Christ and the miracles of the OT. But it should be noted that as a whole His were upon a grander scale, and, with a single exception, never works of judgment and destruction. The withering of the barren fig tree was the destruction of an insensate object, and the underlying purpose of even that act was merciful. The power to work miracles was given to the apostles and was exercised by them for the purpose of carrying forward the work of establishing Christianity, committed to them by the ascended Lord (Rom. 15:18–19; 2 Cor. 12:12).

Thus throughout the Bible record we find the same end in view. Miracles are to arrest the attention of men and aid in winning their acceptance of revealed truth. And so far as the sacred record shows us they were wrought only when most needed—in the great crises of revealed religion.

Bible Criteria of Miracles. The Scriptures are careful to note the distinction between true miracles and those that are false and to furnish the tests by which judgment is to be formed. At many times in the past, men have appeared who have professed to work miracles and have exhibited marvelous powers. Such was the case in the contests between Moses and the Egyptian magicians (Ex. 7–8) and between the apostles and Elymas and Simon Magus (Acts 13:6–12; 8:9–24), not to specify others of later date. Christ and the apostle Paul both left their predictions that deceivers of this kind would arise “with all power and signs and false wonders” (2 Thess. 2; cf. Matt. 24:24); the “false wonders” in many cases were, no doubt, mere tricks of expert jugglers. And yet in some instances it would be consistent with the view of the Scriptures to regard them as worked by the aid of evil spiritual powers, Satan and his angels. Thus Trench regards the works wrought by the Egyptian magicians and others referred to in Acts 13:8; Matt. 24:24; 2 Thess. 2:9; Rev. 13:13. In any event, it is a matter of great importance to distinguish between such acts of deception and actual miracles—i.e., works wrought by the power of God in connection with the history of revelation. See C. F. Dickason, Angels, Elect and Evil (1975) for the role of Satan and demons in miracle and deception.

The tests presented by the Scriptures are mainly two, namely, the character of the agent and the end for which the supernatural event is wrought. False prophets can work no true miracles, and the wonders they may work are to be tried also by the teaching they seek to establish (Deut. 13:1–3; Matt. 24:24; 2 Thess. 2:9). This is not, as may seem if viewed superficially, circular. It simply takes cognizance of the fact that man is a moral being and has in him some measure of power to at least intuitively recognize truth. True miracles appeal not merely to the senses but also to the heart and conscience. And besides that, there are some events—the resurrection of Christ, for example—that so far transcend the effects of all created power as to leave no proper occasion for doubt.

Importance of Miracles. The Scriptures would guard us at this point against two extremes. We are not to attach to miracles an exaggerated value or importance. They are not the highest evidence of truth. That is found rather in the truth itself. Miracles are not demonstrations of truth, certainly not in the sense of compelling those who behold them to accept the truth in connection with which they stand. Many who witnessed the divine works of the Lord refused to believe in Him. And He declared faith that was founded upon His words to be of higher value than that which was based upon His miracles (John 4:48; 14:11; 20:29). On the other hand, we are not at liberty to underrate their importance. Christ did not work miracles needlessly. He appealed to them as among the evidences of His authority (Matt. 11:4–5, 20–24; 12:28, 39–40; John 5:36; 20:25, 27–28; 14:11; 15:24); and many were led to faith by the aid of these means (e.g., 11:45). Miracles are acts of condescension and special grace to unbelieving men. And though their ultimate effect depends upon the inner bent of those who behold them, still they are in this respect like the truth itself with which they stand connected. They are not only tests of character, but also divine means for awakening attention and reverent reflection, and then leading those who are receptive to recognition and acceptance of the truth (3:19, 21; 18:37; etc.).

The question often raised—whether, on the whole, miracles are helps or hindrances to faith—here finds its answer. Much depends upon the person whose faith it is proposed to establish and much also upon the kind of faith it is sought to establish. With the true faith of the gospel, miracles are bound up as an indispensable element and are in thorough harmony with those supernatural measures and operations in man’s spiritual life upon which the gospel concentrates chief attention.

Theological Considerations. Under this head space permits only a few suggestions and references.

Possibility. The possibility of miracles is not a matter of question for one who believes in a personal God. The denial of such possibility is at bottom pantheistic or atheistic (e.g., Spinoza, Renan).

Credibility. The credibility of miracles has been subjected to frequent assaults from various standpoints. For a compact history and refutation of them we refer to Trench, Notes on the Miracles.

To appreciate rightly the truth in this matter, we must not view miracles as isolated facts but view them in their actual relationships. The scriptural concept of God and of man, and of the purpose and work of God in saving man, furnish the explanation that outweighs all theoretical objections. And, practically, whoever realizes the proper effect of the gospel, the renewing power of the Holy Spirit, has an inner witness to the power of God and the reality of divine revelation that leave no room for doubt concerning the external acts of God with which the history of revelation is interwoven. (Cf. Num. 16:30; 2 Cor. 5:17; Col. 3:10.)

Continuance. The question of the continuance of miracles beyond the apostolic age must be one of history. As conservative a theologian as Charles Hodge declares that “there is nothing in the New Testament inconsistent with the occurrence of miracles in the postapostolic age of the Church.” At the same time, however, he discredits the miracles claimed by the Roman Catholic church to have been wrought by her saints, as well as the distinctive claim of that church to power in that direction. Trench regards it as a strong presumption against the continuance of this power in the Christian church that in the earlier history of God’s dealings with His people miracles were only at great and critical periods.

The necessity for miracles no longer exists. And further, the professed miracles of later times will not bear the tests of genuineness. (For valuable discussion of this point and comparison of biblical with extrabiblical miracles we refer to Trench.) The passage in Mark 16:17–18, which has been interpreted by some (e.g., Grotius, Lavater, Hess) in a wide sense and extending to all times, has been taken in a restricted sense by others (e.g., Augustine and Protestant theologians generally).

The promise of miraculous power, it is held, was completely fulfilled in the early period of the church, when such power was needed for the establishment of Christianity.

It is proper to say that the portion of Mark’s gospel in which this passage occurs (16:9–20) is regarded by some eminent Christian scholars (notably Meyer) as a later addition from some unknown source. The NASB contains in the margin the note: “Some of the oldest mss. do not contain vv. 9–20.”

It is important to remember that the craving for miracles manifest in some directions at the present day may spring not from faith but from the lack of it and from failure to recognize the great spiritual works that God is constantly accomplishing.

MIRAGE (Heb. shārāb, “parched ground”). An optical illusion common in the East; directly referred to by Isaiah in Isa. 35:7 (“scorched land,” marg. “mirage,” NASB; “parched ground,” KJV; “burning sand,” NIV); 49:10 (“scorching heat,” NASB; “heat,” KJV; “desert heat,” NIV).

MIR’IAM (mir’i-am; “obstinacy, rebellion”).

1. The daughter of Amram and Jochebed and sister of Moses and Aaron. She is probably (Josephus Ant. 2.9.4) the sister who was stationed near the river Nile to watch over her infant brother (Ex. 2:1–8).

The first mention of Miriam by name is when, after the passage of the Red Sea, she led the chorus of women who replied to the male chorus with timbrels and dancing. She is here called “Aaron’s sister,” probably to point out the position she was to occupy in the congregation as ranking not with Moses but with Aaron and, like him, subordinate to Moses. She is the first person of that household to whom prophetic gifts are ascribed. “Miriam the prophetess” is her acknowledged title (Ex. 15:20–21), c. 1440 B.C.

The exalted position of Moses aroused a feeling of envy in the minds of his brother and sister, and they at length disputed the preeminence of his special calling. Miriam instigated the open rebellion and was followed by Aaron. An occasion was found for their manifestation of discontent in the Cushite wife whom Moses had taken. “Has the Lord indeed spoken only through Moses? Has He not spoken through us as well?” Summoned to the Tabernacle by Jehovah, they were administered a stern rebuke, and Miriam, the instigator of the rebellion, was struck with leprosy. When Aaron saw his sister, he said to Moses, “Oh, my lord, I beg you, do not account this sin to us.” And Moses prayed unto Jehovah, “O God, heal her, I pray!” God heard his prayer, though not without inflicting deep humiliation upon Miriam. She was shut outside of the camp, excluded from the congregation for seven days, after which restoration and purification from her leprosy were promised. During her seclusion the people did not journey any farther (Num. 12:1–15), c. 1439 B.C. This stroke, and its removal, which took place at Hazeroth, form the last public event of Miriam’s life. She died toward the close of the wanderings, at Kadesh, and was buried there (20:1), c. 1401 B.C. Her tomb was shown near Petra in the days of Jerome. According to Josephus she was married to the famous Hur and, through him, was grandmother of the architect Bezaleel. In the Koran (chap. iii) she is confounded with the virgin Mary; hence the holy family is there called the family of Amram, or Imram.

2. Probably the first named of the sons of Mered, of the family of Caleb, by Bithia, the daughter of Pharaoh (1 Chron. 4:17). See Mered.

MIR´MAH (mir´ma; “deceit”). The last of the seven sons of Shaharaim by Hodesh; born in the land of Moab (1 Chron. 8:10), after 1440 B.C.

MIRROR. Two Heb. words, marʾâ (Ex. 38:8) and rîl (Job 37:18). The Hebrew women on coming out of Egypt probably brought with them mirrors like those that were used by the Egyptians. These were made of a mixed metal, chiefly copper, wrought with such admirable skill that they were capable of a luster that has even been partially revived in some of those discovered at Thebes, though they had been buried in the earth for many centuries. The mirror itself was nearly round, inserted into a handle of wood, stone, or metal, whose form varied according to the taste of the owner. Some presented the figure of a female, a flower, a column, or a rod ornamented with the head of Hathor, a bird, or a fancy device. Sometimes the face of a Typhonian monster was used to support the mirror, serving as a contrast to the features whose beauty was displayed within it. The metal of which the mirrors were composed, being liable to rust and tarnish, required care to be kept constantly bright (Wisd. 7:26; Eccclus. 12:11). This was done by means of pounded pumice-stone, rubbed on with a sponge, which was generally suspended from the mirror. The obscure image produced by a tarnished or imperfect mirror appears to be alluded to in 1 Cor. 13:12 (Smith, Bib. Dict.). See Glass.

MIS´GAB (mišgāb, “high place,” “refuge”). The Heb. expression is transliterated in the KJV of Jer. 48:1; it is frequently translated “stronghold” in the NASB and NIV.

MISH' AEL (mish'a-el; "who is like God?")

1. The first named son of Uzziel (son of Kohath), the uncle of Aaron (Ex. 6:22). When Nadab and Abihu died, Mishael and his brother Elzaphan, at the command of Moses, removed their bodies from the sanctuary (Lev. 10:4–5), about 1439 B.C.

2. One of those who supported Ezra on the left when he read the law to the people after the captivity (Neh. 8:4), about 445 B.C.

3. One of the three Jewish youths trained with Daniel at the Babylonian court and who "entered the king's personal service" (Dan. 1:6, 11, 19). His court name was Meshach (v. 7). With the other two he assisted Daniel in solving the dream of Nebuchadnezzar (2:17–18) and was "appointed over the administration of the province of Babylon" (3:12). The three were afterward cast into the fiery furnace for not worshiping the image set up by the king, but, being miraculously preserved, they were promoted by royal decree (3:13–30), perhaps after 586 B.C.

MI'SHAL (mī'shal). A city of Asher (Josh. 19:26; "Misheal," KJV), assigned to the sons of Gershon of the Levites (21:30); also called Mashal (1 Chron. 6:74). Location uncertain.

MI'SHAM (mī'sham; "fleet, swift." Arab. sa'ama, "to trot swiftly," as a camel). A son of Elpaal, a Benjamite, and one of the builders of Ono, Lod, and their suburbs (1 Chron. 8:12), after 1170 B.C.

MI'SHEAL. See Mishal.

MISH'MA (mish'ma; "hearing").

1. The fifth son of Ishmael, and head of an Arabian tribe (Gen. 25:14; 1 Chron. 1:30), about 1800 B.C.

2. The son of Mibsam, of the tribe of Simeon, and father of Hammuel (1 Chron. 4:25–26), perhaps about 1300 B.C.

MISHMAN'NAH (mish-man'a; "fatness"). One of the twelve Gadite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:10), before 1000 B.C.

MISH'RAITES (mish'ra-its, only in 1 Chron. 2:53). The fourth of the four families of Kiriath-jearim. It is usual to assume that Kiriath-jearim, whose father was Shobal (v. 52), was the city of that name and that the four families were its colonies. This is quite probable, but not certain. Sometimes the name of a person is the same as that of a place. Thus Ephrath in Gen. 35:16, 19 is the name of a place, whereas in 1 Chron. 2:19 it is the name of Caleb's second wife. In 2:42–43 the familiar name Hebron is used as the name of a person, as is Haran in v. 46.

"There is a Jewish tradition, embodied in the Targum of Rabbi Joseph, that the families of Kirjath-jearim were the sons of Moses whom Zipporah bare him, and that from them were descended the disciples of the prophets of Zorah and Eshtaol" (Smith, s.v. "Puhites"). But it is probable that the Mishraites, etc., were either colonies or leading families of Kiriath-jearim and that Shobal was called its "father," as having founded or greatly improved it. The latter is more probable, since the statement is made of Shobal, as an entirely independent fact, that he "had sons" (2:52), and the name of Kiriath-jearim is not among them. W.H.

MISPAR. See Mispereth.

MIS'PERETH (mis'pe-reth). One of those who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 7:7), about 445 B.C. He is called Mispar in Ezra 2:2.

MIS'REPHOTH-MA'IM (mis're-fōth-ma'im; "hot springs," lit., "burning of waters"). Understood by the Greek translators "as a proper name, though the rabbins and some Christian commentators render it in different ways, such as salt pits, smelting huts, or glass huts" (K. & D., Com.). It is mentioned (Josh. 11:8) as a place between Sidon and the valley of Mizpeh where Joshua pursued the allied Canaanites after the defeat of Jabin (cf. 13:6). It is now frequently identified with Khirbet el-Musheirifeh, eleven miles N of Acre at the base of Ras en-Naurah.

MIST (Heb. ṣēd). A rising vapor, or cloud, which again distills upon the ground (Gen. 2:6; Job 36:37). The reference in Genesis probably refers to a perennial stream (so NIV) or an underground canal.

MITE. A mite (KJV) or small copper coin (NASB) was a unit of money. See Metrology.

MITH'CAH. See Mithkah.

MITH'KAH (mith'ka; "sweetness"). The twenty-ninth station of the Israelites in the desert, mentioned between Terah and Hashmonah (Num. 33:28–29), perhaps Wadi Abu Taqiyeh.

MITH'NITE (mith'nīt). The designation of Joshaphat, one of David's guard in the catalog of 1 Chron. 11:43.

MITH'REDATH (mith're-dath; "gift of Mithra"). A Persian god of the light between heaven and hell.

1. The treasurer of Cyrus, king of Persia, to whom the king gave the vessels of the Temple to be transferred by him to the hands of Sheshbazzar, the prince of Judah (Ezra 1:8), 536 B.C.

2. A Persian officer, stationed in Samaria, who joined in writing a letter to Artaxerxes in opposition to the Jews (Ezra 4:7), 522 B.C.

MITRE. A KJV term for the headdress worn by the high priest. See Dress: Garment; and also the article Turban.

MITYLE'NE (mit-i-lē'ni). The chief city on the island of Lesbos, in the Aegean Sea between Chios and Assos, famous for riches and literary character and for having the privileges of a free city. It was a favorite resort area for Roman aristocrats. Sappho, Alcaeus, Pittacas, and Theophrastus were natives of Mitylene. Paul touched there overnight (Acts 20:14–15). The name was given to the entire island. See Paul.

MIXED MARRIAGES. Marriages between Jews and Gentiles were strictly prohibited by the Mosaic law. See Marriage: Laws of Intermarriage.

MIXED MULTITUDE (Heb. ḥēreb, "mixture"). With the Israelites who journeyed from Rameses to Succoth, the first stage of the Exodus from Egypt, there went up (Ex. 12:38) "a mixed multitude" ("many other people," NIV), who have not hitherto been identified. During their residence in Egypt, marriages were naturally contracted between the Israelites and the natives. This hybrid race is evidently alluded to by Rashi and Aben Ezra and is most probably that to which reference is made in Exodus. That the "mixed multitude" is a general term, including all those who were not of pure Israelite blood, is evident; more than this cannot be positively asserted. In Exodus and Numbers it probably denotes the miscellaneous hangers-on of the Hebrew camp, whether they were the issue of spurious marriages with Egyptians or were themselves Egyptians or belonging to other nations. The same happened on the return from Babylon, and in Neh. 13:3 (cf. 10:28) a slight clue is given by which the meaning of the "mixed multitude" may be more definitely ascertained. According to Deut. 29:11 they seem to have occupied a very low position among the Israelites and to have furnished them with hewers of wood and drawers of water. See Mingled People.

MI'ZAR (mī'zar). A mountain that cannot be identified unless, as seems likely, it is an alternative name for Mt. Hermon (Ps. 42:6).

MIZ'PAH (miz'pa; "watchtower"), or Miz'eh (miz'pe). The name of several places.

1. The heap of stones raised by Jacob as a witness of the covenant made by him and Laban (Gen. 31:49). Laban called it, in the language of Aram, Jegar-sahadutha, and Jacob called it Galeed, in the language of Canaan. Both names have the same meaning, "the heap of witness." Jacob and Laban made a covenant not to pass beyond Mizpah to the harm of the other. The place was in Gilead, E of the Jordan, and in later times was known from afar by its mizpah, or "watchtower," whose garrison kept watch upon the Aramaean tribes of the Hauran.

2. Another place E of the Jordan, called Mizpah of Gilead, where Jephthah (which see) lived (Judg. 11:34) and where the Israelites assembled under him against the Ammonites (10:17; 11:11). It is probably the same as the Ramath-mizpeh of Gad (Josh. 13:26).

3. "The land of Mizpeh" (Josh. 11:3) was a district in Gilead inhabited by Hivites, the country below Hasbeya, between Nahr Hashbany on the E and Merj Ayûn on the W, with the village of Mutelleh or Mtelleh, at present inhabited by Druses, which stands upon a hill more than 200 feet high and from which there is a splendid view over the Huleh basin. It is from this that it has derived its name (see Robinson, Biblical Researches, p. 272).

4. A city of Benjamin, named in the list of the allotment between Beeroth and Chephirah and in apparent proximity to Ramah and Gibeon (Josh. 18:26, "Mizpeh"). Its connection with the two last named towns is also implied in the later history (1 Kings 15:22; 2 Chron. 16:6; Neh. 3:7). It was one of the places fortified by Asa against the incursions of the kings of Northern Israel (1 Kings 15:22; 2 Chron. 16:6; Jer. 41:10). After the destruction of Jerusalem, it became the residence of the superintendent appointed by the king of Babylon (40:7; etc.) and was inhabited after the captivity (Neh. 3:7, 15, 19). Robinson (Biblical Researches, 2:139) supposes it to be the present Neby Samwîl (i.e., prophet Samuel), 4½ miles NW of Jerusalem, but it is more likely Tell en-Naşbeh about 8 miles distant.

W. F. Badé, on behalf of the Pacific School of Religion in Berkeley, California, excavated there in 1926, 1927, 1929, and 1935. He found that Mizpeh was inhabited as early as the third millennium B.C., but the place was insignificant before the Hebrew period (c. 1100–400 B.C.). The wall of the early Hebrew period was weak, but about 900 B.C. it was replaced by a formidable system of fortifications. The new wall, probably built by Asa, was more than a mile in circumference, thirteen feet thick, and had ten projecting towers. There was only one city gate, on the NE, inside of which was an open space interpreted as a marketplace. H.F.V.

5. A city of Judah (Josh. 15:38, "Mizpeh") in the district of the Shephelah, or maritime lowland. Van de Velde suggests its identity with the present Tell es-Sâfiyeh—the Blanchegarde of the Crusaders.

6. A town of Moab to which David moved his parents when threatened by Saul (1 Sam. 22:3). It was probably a mountain fastness on the high land that bounded the Arboth-Moab, E of the Dead Sea, and that could be easily reached from Bethlehem by crossing the Jordan near its entrance into the Dead Sea.

MIZ'RAIM (miz'ra-im; Heb. miṣrayim). In Gen. 10:6, 13–14 and 1 Chron. 1:8, 11–12, Mizraim is the second son of Ham and the father of “the people of Lud, Anam, Lehab, Naphtuh, Pathrus, Casluh, from which the Philistines came, and Caphtor.” But elsewhere miṣrayim is the standing name of Egypt, in which sense it occurs nearly eighty-seven times, the only exception being that in 1 Sam. 30:13 “a young man of Egypt” is, in Heb., “a young man an Egyptian.”

It is very generally believed that Mizraim is a dual form, properly and originally signifying the two Egypts, Upper and Lower. (See Egypt.) In Isa. 11:11 the origin is left out of view, the name no doubt being mostly used for that part of Egypt that was nearest and most familiar, and Mizraim is Lower Egypt in distinction from Pathros, which is Upper Egypt. The same may be the case in Jer. 44:1, 15; Ezek. 29:14; 30:14. But in Jeremiah Egypt may possibly be the whole of which Pathros is a part, and in Ezekiel the use of the two names may be a poetic variation. So Robinson and Gesenius. Some, with Gesenius's twelfth German edition, think the ending of Mizraim local instead of dual. The singular māṣôr is found only in 2 Kings 19:24; Isa. 19:6; 37:25; Mic. 7:12.

The names of Mizraim and the descendants of Mizraim in Gen. 10:13–14 and 1 Chron. 1:11–12 all appear to be names of nations rather than of individuals, and they include far more than Egypt. “Mizraim, therefore, like Cush, and perhaps Ham, geographically represents a center whence colonies went forth in the remotest period of postdiluvian history.” “We regard the distribution of the Mizraites as showing that their colonies were but a part of the great migration that gave the Cushites the command of the Indian Ocean, and which explains the affinity the Egyptian monuments show us between the pre-Hellenic Cretans and the Carians (the latter no doubt the Seleges of the Greek writers) and the Philistines” (Smith, s.v. “Mizraim”).

MIZ'ZAH (miz'a). The fourth and last of the sons of Reuel the son of Esau, by Basemath (Gen. 36:13; 1 Chron. 1:37), and a petty Edomite chief (Gen. 36:17).

MNA'SON (nā'son; perhaps “reminding”). A Christian with whom Paul lodged the last time he was in Jerusalem (Acts 21:16), A.D. 60. He was a native of Cyprus and may have been acquainted with Barnabas, who was a Cyprian (4:36).

MO'AB (mō'ab; perhaps “from father”). The name of the son whom Lot's eldest daughter bore to him after the destruction of Sodom, and founder of the Moabites (Gen. 19:30–37), about 2055 B.C.

MO'ABITE, MO'ABITES (mō'a-bīt). Descendants of the elder of Lot's two surviving daughters, as the Ammonites are of the younger. The starting point of both was in the vicinity of Zoar. Thence the roving Ammonites went to the NE (see Ammonites), whereas the more peaceful Moabites remained near their ancestral home, displacing the Emim (Deut. 2:10–11; cf. Gen. 14:5).

Territory. According to Smith (s.v. “Moab”), the territory of Moab at its greatest extent included three parts: (1) The “land of Moab” (Ruth 1:1–2), a tract enclosed by natural fortifications; on the N by the chasm of the Arnon, on the W by the cliffs that rise almost perpendicularly from the shore of the Dead Sea, on the S and E by a semicircle of hills that opens only for the Arnon and another Dead Sea torrent. (2) The “land of Moab,” the more open country from the Arnon north to the hills of Gilead. (3) The so-called “plains of Moab” (Num. 22:1), “the sunk” district in the tropical depths of the Jordan Valley. Before the arrival of Israel, Sihon, king of the Amorites, had taken from “the former king of Moab,” very possibly Zippor the father of Balak (22:2), all the land “from the Arnon to the Jabbok”

Coming up from Egypt the Israelites approached Moab through the desert facing Moab, outside the bordering circle of hills on the SE. They were forbidden to molest the Moabites in the enjoyment of the land that they had taken from the Emim (Deut. 2:9–11). They therefore applied for permission to pass through the territory of Moab and, being refused, went around its borders.

Moab and Israel.

Refuses Passage. From Deut. 2:29 it would appear at first sight that both Moab and Edom granted the request of Israel to be allowed to pass through their territory, whereas Num. 20:18–21 and Deut. 23:3–4 seem to show that both Moab and Edom utterly refused. But more careful reading removes the difficulty and gives us a clear idea of the whole transaction. Israel’s request in Num. 20:17 is to be allowed to cross the territory of Edom by the royal highway. This the martial Edomites refused, with a display of force, standing on their national dignity and declining to show any hospitality for relationship’s sake. From Jephthah’s statement in Judg. 11:17 it appears that the more timorous Moabites took the same course. But it nowhere appears that they showed any further signs of hostility. Indeed Jephthah (11:25–26) makes the special point that Moab did not fight against Israel while they were neighbors for 300 years. In Deut. 23:4, 7 there is no complaint of hostility on the part of either Edom or Moab, but only of want of hospitality on the part of Moab and Ammon and the hiring of Balaam to curse Israel. There is not the slightest hint that either nation made any attempt to hinder the Israelites from passing along the edge of its territory, trading with the people as they are said to have done in 2:28–29. For in “You shall not pass through us” in Num. 20:18, “through” must be taken in the sense of “by way of” (“via”). The Heb. is lō ta-ābōr bî. So far from being hostile, the Moabites were only too friendly, sending their daughters to cultivate friendly relations with the Israelites and then to entice them to their idolatrous services. For in Num. 25:2 “they invited” is feminine, referring to the daughters. Thus the conduct of Moab and Edom stood in strong contrast with the aggressive attitude assumed by Sihon, king of the Amorites. Moses could, therefore, truthfully make use of the peaceful conduct of those nations in his message to Sihon (Deut. 2:26–29), and so could Jephthah in his dealings with the sons of Ammon (Judg. 11:15–27).

The peaceful character and rich possessions of Moab may account for the terror of Balak at the approach of the Israelites and for the special means that he took to guard against them. Instead of flying to arms, like Sihon, he first consulted with the elders of Midian. Moab and Midian were kin by virtue of their common descent from Terah (Gen. 11:27; 19:36–37; 25:2; see also table 25, “Kinship of Moab and Midian”).

So the tradition in Targum (Pseudo-Jonathan on Num. 22:4) that up to this time Moab and Midian had been one nation, with kings alternately taken from Midian and Moab, and that Balak was a Midianite may have at its foundation a fact.

The result of the conference was that the two nations united in sending for Balaam. If we are right in understanding Mic. 6:5–7 as a quotation from Balaam, it would seem that Balak in his desperation contemplated a sacrifice like that made by a later king of Moab (2 Kings 3:26) and that he was restrained by Balaam in words of remarkable depth and truth that have been compared with those of our Lord (Matt. 9:13; 12:7; cf. Hos. 6:6).

“It is remarkable that Moses should have taken his view of the promised land from a Moabite sanctuary, and been buried in the land of Moab. It is singular, too, that his resting place is marked in the Hebrew records only by its proximity to the sanctuary of that deity to whom in his lifetime he had been such an enemy” (Smith). “He buried him in the valley in the land of Moab, opposite Beth-peor,” i.e., the abode of Baal-peor (Deut. 34:6; cf. Ps. 106:28).

Exclusion of Moab. The exclusion of Moabites (and Ammonites) from the congregation of the Lord to the tenth generation was not on account of any active hostility but, as is expressly said (Deut. 23:3–4), on account of their want of hospitality and of the hiring of Balaam. We may well believe that the ingenuity that made the daughters of Moab the means of enticing the Israelites into drawing the curse upon themselves made the exclusion of Moab more rigorous. The principal share in the transaction seems, however, to have belonged to Midian (which see). Indeed, Moab is named in connection with the affair only in Num. 25:1. See Marriage: Laws of Intermarriage.

The defeat of Midian in the field of Moab by the Edomite Hadad (Gen. 36:35) is sometimes understood to refer to a war between Moab and Midian, but it looks rather like a defeat of the allied Midianites and Moabites by Edom. This accords well with what is otherwise known of the martial character of Edom and the unwarlike disposition of Moab and Midian (see above, and also Midian, especially no. 5).

Time of Judges. After the conquest Moab oppressed Israel once for eighteen years, but, as if recognizing the general unmilitary character of Moab, the text significantly says, “The Lord strengthened Eglon the king of Moab against Israel.... And he gathered to himself the sons of Ammon and Amalek; and he went and defeated Israel,” etc. (Judg. 3:12–13).

Time of the Kingdom. Of Saul we read simply that he fought against Moab (1 Sam. 14:47). But the early relations of Moab and Israel seem on the whole to have been friendly, as shown by the book of Ruth. Ruth brought a Moabite element into the line of David and, hence, on the human side, into the ancestry of our Savior. Thus David, when pressed by Saul, entrusted his father and mother to the keeping of the king of Moab (22:3–4). But twenty years or more afterward, from some cause unknown to us, he treated the Moabites with great rigor (2 Sam. 8:2), and their spoil, with that of other nations, went to swell the treasure amassed for the Temple. The Moabites became tributary, and when we again hear of them they are acting for Solomon the same part that they had acted for the Israelites in Balaam’s time—sending their daughters to lead him astray.

In the days of Ahab they still paid tribute, which shows both the severity of Israel’s yoke and the resources of the country (2 Kings 3:4–5).

On the death of Ahab they revolted. According to the chronology of our English Bible (2 Chron. 20:1–25), their first step was to collect an army of Moabites, Ammonites, and others, including Edomites (vv. 1, 10, 23), and attack Judah, then ruled by Jehoshaphat. Judah met them with prayer and praise. By divine interposition, dissension broke out in the camp of the invaders, the Moabites and Ammonites first slaughtering the Edomites and then each other, so that nothing was left for Israel but to gather the spoil.

The consequence was a counter-invasion of Moab by Israel (eager to humble and perhaps regain a revolted province), Judah (ready to strike down a dangerous enemy), and Edom (mindful of the trap into which he had been led). This sequence of events shows how Edom came to act with Israel and Judah for once, and it explains the otherwise unaccountable and inexcusable severity with which Moab was treated when the victory was won. The story is told in 2 Kings 3:4–27.

Moab for a time must have been greatly reduced in power, so that nearly sixty years later we find predatory bands of Moabites as of Arabs (13:20). But later, in the days of Isaiah, about the time of the death of Ahaz, “Moab has regained all and more than all of his former prosperity, and has besides extended himself over the district which he originally occupied in the youth of the nation, and which was left vacant by the removal of Reuben to Assyria” by Tiglath-pileser (18:11; 1 Chron. 5:26).

Prophecies. Isaiah, in his “oracle concerning Moab” (Isa. 15–16; cf. 25:10), predicts, in poetic lamentation, the fall of Moab from his high estate and his reduction to a small and feeble remnant (16:14). Jeremiah (Jer. 48) 140 years later (600 B.C.) echoes the lament of the older prophet, whose prophecy he had no doubt read, and gives Moab a gleam of hope at the last (48:47). These prophecies refer naturally to injuries to be inflicted by Assyria and Babylon. But they are especially interesting from their allusions, which show clearly the condition of Moab. The nation appears in them as high-spirited, wealthy, populous, and even to a certain extent civilized, enjoying a wide reputation and popularity. Outside the towns lie the fields and vineyards, the gardens of “summer fruits”; the harvest an “abundance which they have acquired and stored up.” These characteristics contrast favorably with any traits recorded of Ammon, Edom, Midian, Amalek, the Philistines, or the Canaanite tribes. Since the descriptions of Isaiah and Jeremiah agree, they seem to represent the nation as permanently flourishing.

In Josiah’s time Zephaniah threatens Moab and Ammon with vengeance for their reviling words against Israel but mentions no act of hostility. In 2 Kings 24:2 we find marauding bands of Moabites and Ammonites, along with Aramaeans and Chaldeans, harassing Judah in the time of Jehoiakim.

Jeremiah (Jer. 27:3) warned Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Sidon, as he warned Judah, not to resist Nebuchadnezzar, into whose hand God had delivered those countries for the time, but to serve him and remain in their lands. It is to be presumed that they profited by his advice, since it appears from 40:11 that these countries had been a refuge to many of the Jews when the storm finally broke.

After the Captivity. Sanballat, who in Nehemiah's time was associated with Tobiah the Ammonite and Geshem the Arab against the Jews (Neh. 2:10, 19; etc.), was a Horonite. If this name is derived from Horonaim, Sanballat was a Moabite, as he is quite often regarded. If from Beth-horon, he was probably a Samaritan. See Horonite.

In Judith, shortly after the captivity (4:3) Moab and Ammon occupy their ancient seats. The Maccabees do not mention Moab or any towns south of the Arnon. In the time of Josephus (Ant. 1.11.5), the Moabites were "even still a great nation." The name remained to the time of Eusebius (A.D. about 380), and at the time of the Council of Jerusalem, A.D. 536, it formed the see of a bishop under the name Charak-Moba (Smith).

Language and Worship. The language of Moab was merely a dialect of Hebrew, differing from biblical Hebrew only in some comparatively trifling details.

The national deity of the Moabites was Chemosh (which see), mentioned only in Num. 21:29; Judg. 11:24; 1 Kings 11:7, 33; 2 Kings 23:13; Jer. 48:7, 13, 46.

MO'ABITE STONE. One of the important memorials of alphabetic writing is the famous Moabite Stone, erected by Mesha king of Moab as a record of his successful revolt from Israel and in honor of his god Chemosh (which see), to whom his successes are ascribed. It was set up c. 850 B.C. The stone was discovered in 1868 by a German missionary, the Rev. F. Klein. He was on a visit to Moab and was informed by an Arab sheikh that at Dhiban, the ancient Dibon, was lying a stone inscribed with old characters. On examining it he found that it was a stela of black basalt, rounded at the top and measuring nearly four feet in length and two in width. It was covered with thirty-four lines of an inscription in the letters of the Phoenician alphabet. Mr. Klein had little idea of the importance of the discovery he had made and contented himself with noting down a few words and compiling an alphabet out of the rest. On his return to Jerusalem he informed the Prussian consulate of the discovery, and measures were taken at once to secure the stone.

In the spring of the following year M. Clermont-Ganneau, the dragoman of the French consulate, heard that the stone was still lying at Dhiban with its inscribed face exposed to the weather, and he determined to get possession of it for France. Natives were accordingly sent to take squeezes of the inscription and to offer a large sum of money for the monument. The natives quarreled in the presence of the Arabs, and it was with some difficulty that a half-dried squeeze was carried off safely by Selim el-Oari, M. Clermont-Ganneau's agent, and delivered to the French consulate. It is upon this squeeze, now preserved in the Louvre, that we are largely dependent for our knowledge of the contents of the text. The largeness of the sums offered and the rival bidding of the two European consulates naturally aroused in the minds of both Moabite and Turkish officials an exaggerated idea of the stone's value. The governor of Nablus accordingly demanded the splendid prize for himself, and the Arabs, rather than lose it for nothing, lighted a fire under it, poured cold water over it, and so shattered it into fragments. The pieces were distributed among different families and placed in their granaries, in order to act as charms in protecting the corn from blight. A considerable number of fragments have since been recovered, but without the squeeze that was taken while the stone was intact, it would have been impossible to fit many of them together, and for the missing portions of the text it is our only authority.

The work of restoration and interpretation was ably performed by Clermont-Ganneau, by way of amends for the overhasty zeal that brought about the destruction of the monument. The latest and best edition of the text, however, is that which was published in 1886 by the two German professors, Smend and Socin, after weeks of study of the squeeze preserved in the Louvre.

The inscription on this stone in a remarkable degree supplements and corroborates the history of King Mesha recorded in 2 Kings 3:4–27. It affords evidence of the knowledge of alphabetic writing in the lands of the Jordan. “The art of writing and reading can have been no new thing. As soon as Mesha has shaken off the yoke of the foreigner, he erects an inscribed monument in commemoration of his victories.... It is the first and most natural thing for him to do, and it is taken for granted that the record will have numerous readers.... Moreover, the forms of the letters as they appear on the Moabite Stone show that alphabetic writing must have been long practiced in the kingdom of Mesha. They are forms which presuppose a long acquaintance with the art of engraving inscriptions upon stones, and are far removed from the forms out of which they must have developed. Then, again, the language of the inscription is noteworthy. Between it and Hebrew the differences are few and slight. It is a proof that the Moabites were akin to the Israelites in language as well as in race, and that like their kinsfolk they had adopted the ancient ‘language of Canaan.’ The likeness between the languages of Moab and Israel extends beyond the mere idioms of grammar and syntax. It is a likeness which exists also in thought” (Sayce, Higher Crit. and the Mon., p. 364).

MOCK (Heb. qālas, to “disparage,” Hab. 1:10; “scoff,” KJV and NIV; and other Heb. and Gk. words). To ridicule, make light of, as of a fortification or an enemy.

MOCKERS (Gk. empaiktes). One who trifles, and so derides (2 Pet. 3:3); “scoffers,” KJV and NIV.

MODERATION. Better, “forbearing spirit” (Phil. 4:5, NASB), “gentleness” (Phil. 4:5), or “patience.” In 1 Tim. 3:3; Titus 3:2; 1 Pet. 2:18, the Gk. is rendered by the word “gentle.”

MODIUS. A foreign measure of capacity. See Metrology.

MOL’ADAH (Heb. môlādâ, “origin, birth”). A town in the southern part of Judah, probably about twenty miles S of Hebron, named in connection with Kedesh and Beersheba (Josh. 15:26). It was afterward assigned to Simeon (19:2; 1 Chron. 4:28) and was occupied after the Exile (Neh. 11:26). Later it was called Malada, an Idumaeen fortress (Josephus Ant 18.6.2), which Eusebius and Jerome located about twenty Roman miles S of Hebron.

MOMENT (Heb. regāc, “wink,” Ps. 30:5; etc.; Gk. atomas, “indivisible,” 1 Cor. 15:52; stigmē, a “point,” Luke 4:5). An instant (as in Num. 16:21, 45; “at once,” NIV), the smallest interval of time. See Time.

MONEY. See Metrology: Measures of Value, or Money.

MONEY CHANGER (Gk. kollubistēs, “a coin dealer”; kermatistēs, “money broker,” from kerma, a “small coin”).

1. Bankers who sat in the Court of the Gentiles (or in its porch) and for a fixed discount changed all foreign coins into those of the sanctuary. Every Israelite, rich or poor, who had reached the age of twenty was obliged to pay into the sacred treasury, whenever the nation was numbered, a half shekel as an offering to Jehovah (Ex. 30:13–15). This tribute was in every case to be paid in the exact Hebrew half shekel. The money changers assessed a fixed charge for their services. This charge must have brought in a large revenue, since not only many native Palestinians might come without the statutory coin, but a vast number of foreign Jews presented themselves on such occasions in the Temple. In addition to the tribute, those who came to worship at the Temple needed money for other purposes. Most sacrifices for the feasts were bought within the Temple area. It was easier to get the right money from the authorized changers than to have disputes with the dealers. Thus the immense offerings of foreign Jews and proselytes to the Temple passed through the hands of the money changers. Indeed, they probably transacted all business matters connected with the sanctuary.

2. The Gk. trapezitēs (Matt. 25:27, marg.), “bankers,” is a general term for a money changer, broker, banker; one who exchanges money for a fee and pays interest on deposits. The fact that this occupation had become characterized by avarice may account for the strong language and vigorous action of Jesus in Matt. 21:12 and Mark 11:15.

MONEY, LOVE OF (Gk. philarguria, 1 Tim. 6:10). Avarice or covetousness.

MONEY, PIECE OF (Gen. 33:19; Job 42:11; etc.). See Metrology.

MONEY PURSES. See articles Dress; Purse.

MONITOR. See Animal Kingdom: Chameleon.

MONSTERS (Heb. tannîm). The context of Lam. 4:3 requires jackal (so NASB and NIV), but the Heb. term is given other translations in the various passages where it appears. See Animal Kingdom: Dragon; Jackal; Whale; Wolf.

MONTH. See Time.

MOON. The terms that were used to designate the moon contain no reference to its office or essential character; they simply describe it by the accidental quality of color—yārēah signifying “pale” or “yellow,” l̄bānâ, “white.” The moon held an important place in the kingdom of nature as known to the Hebrews. In the history of the creation (Gen. 1:14–16) it appears simultaneously with the sun and is described in terms that imply its independence of that body so far as its light is concerned. Conjointly with the sun it was appointed “for signs, and for seasons, and for days and years”; though in this respect it exercised a more important influence, if by the “seasons” we understand the great religious festivals of the Jews, as is particularly stated in Ps. 104:19 and Eccles. 43:6–7. Besides this it had its special office in the distribution of light; it was appointed “to govern the night,” as the sun was to govern the day, and thus the appearance of the two founts of light served “to separate the day from the night.” The inferiority of its light is occasionally noticed, as in Gen. 1:16; Song of Sol. 6:10; Isa. 30:26. The worship of the moon was extensively practiced by the nations of the East. Ur in lower Mesopotamia, Abraham’s birthplace, was an important center of the worship of Sin, the moon god, as was Haran in Upper Mesopotamia, where Abram and Terah emigrated. In Egypt the moon was honored under the name Isis and was one of the only two deities that commanded the reverence of all the Egyptians. In Syria the moon was represented by one of the Ashtaroth surnamed “Karnaim,” from the horns of the crescent moon by which she was distinguished. There are indications of the early introduction into the countries adjacent to Palestine of a species of worship distinct from any that we have described, namely, the direct homage of the heavenly bodies—sun, moon, and stars—characteristic of Sabianism. The first notice we have of this is in Job 31:26–27, and it is observable that the warning of Moses (Deut. 4:19) is directed against this nature worship rather than against the form of moon worship that the Israelites must have witnessed in Egypt. At a later period, however, the worship of the moon in its grosser form of idol worship was introduced from Syria, probably through Aramaic influence. In 2 Kings 23:5 we read that Josiah did away with those “who burned incense to Baal, to the sun and to the moon,” etc. Manasseh appears to have been the great patron of this form of idolatry, for he “worshiped all the host of heaven” (21:3, 5). From his reign down to the captivity, moon worship continued to prevail among the Jews, with the exception of a brief period under Josiah. Jeremiah has several references to it (Jer. 7:18; 8:2; 44:17). In the first of those references the prophet gives us a little insight into the manner of worship accorded to the moon: “The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead dough to make cakes for the queen of heaven.” These cakes were probably intended as gifts, in acknowledgment of a supposed influence exercised by the moon on the affairs of the world or, more specially, on the products of the soil.

Figurative. In the figurative language of Scripture the moon is frequently seen presaging events of the greatest importance, such as the second coming of Christ, through the temporary or permanent withdrawal of its light (Isa. 13:10; Joel 2:31; Matt. 24:29; Mark 13:24). The moon’s becoming “like blood” (Rev. 6:12) points to approaching judgments. M.F.U.

MO’RASTHITE. The KJV expression in Jer. 26:18; Mic. 1:1). It is replaced in the NASB and NIV with “Micah of Moresheth” to distinguish him from the elder prophet Micaiah son of Imlah. See Moresheth-gath.

MOR’DECAI (mor’de-kī; possibly from Akkad. Marduk, patron god of Babylon). The name of two biblical characters.

1. Esther’s cousin, the son of Jair, a descendant of Kish the Benjamite. He resided at Susa, the metropolis of Persia, at the time when Ahasuerus (Xerxes) desired a successor to Queen Vashti. Mordecai had under his care his adopted daughter, Hadassah (Esther) (Esther 2:5–7). Among the fairest women of the land who were gathered at the palace was Esther, upon whom the king’s choice fell.

Mordecai sat in the king’s gate in those days (that is, probably, held some office in or about the palace), and became aware of the plot of two of the king’s officials against the king’s life, which, through Esther, was made known to the monarch. Although the conspirators were punished, no reward seems to have been bestowed upon Mordecai (2:21–23), about 478 B.C.

Some years later, the king promoted Haman, and Mordecai alone refused to manifest the customary signs of homage to the royal favorite. Some think his refusal to bow before Haman arose from religious scruples, as if such salutation as was practiced in Persia were akin to idolatry; others, as seems far more probable, that he refused, from a stern unwillingness as a Jew, to bow before an Amalekite. Haman's indignation was aroused, and he determined upon revenge. Remembering the avowed enmity of the Israelites against his people, he resolved upon their extermination and obtained from the king a decree for the slaughter of all the Jews in the empire. When Mordecai learned what had been done he "tore his clothes, put on sackcloth and ashes, and went out into the midst of the city and wailed loudly and bitterly." Esther, having been informed of this through her servants, sent Hathach, one of the king's eunuchs, to learn the cause of Mordecai's grief. He sent word to the queen of the decree of extermination against the Jews, and an exhortation for her to interfere in behalf of herself and their people. Esther was equal to the occasion and, seizing a favorable opportunity, presented herself unbidden before Ahasuerus and secured his consent to come with Haman to a banquet on the following day (3:1-5:8).

That night the monarch could not sleep and commanded that the records be read to him. Providentially part of them that was read referred to the conspiracy frustrated by Mordecai. In answer to his question, "What honor or dignity has been bestowed on Mordecai for this?" the king's attendants replied, "Nothing." He then asked, "Who is in the court?" and they said, "Behold, Haman is standing in the court." The king said, "Let him come in," and then asked him, "What is to be done for the man whom the king desires to honor?" Haman, supposing that he was the person alluded to, named the highest and most public honor he could conceive of, and received the astounding answer, "Do so for Mordecai the Jew, who is sitting at the king's gate." The next day Esther appealed to the king on behalf of her people, and Haman was hanged on the gallows that he had prepared for Mordecai (chaps. 6-7). Mordecai was summoned into the royal presence and was promoted to the position so recently held by Haman (8:1-2, 15), "and his fame spread throughout all the provinces" (9:4). The first use he made of his power was to counteract as far as possible the decree obtained by Haman, which could not be recalled, as the kings of Persia had no power to rescind a decree once issued. The Jews were permitted to defend themselves and so were preserved from destruction. The feast of Purim (see Festivals) was instituted in memory of this deliverance, and is observed to this day (9:20-32). Mordecai is supposed to be the author of the book of Esther, which contains the narrative.

2. A leading man among the Israelites who returned from Babylon to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7), 536 B.C. Perhaps the same as no. 1.

MO'REH (mō're; "teacher, teaching").

1. The "oak of Moreh" (Gen. 12:6), to which Abraham came when he entered Canaan, where the Lord appeared to him, and where he built an altar. The "oaks of Moreh" (Deut. 11:30) are mentioned by Moses when addressing the Israelites before entering Canaan. They are situated about 1½ miles from Shechem. It is thought by some that Moreh was an early Canaanite and that the oaks were named after him.

2. The "hill of Moreh," in the valley of Jezreel on the N side of the spring of Harod, near which the Midianites were encamped when attacked by Gideon (Judg. 7:1); probably the same as Little Hermon (Jebel Dahy) some eight miles NW of Mt. Gilboa.

MO'RESHETH-GATH (mo'resh-eth-gath; "possession of Gath," i.e., "nearby Gath").

Apparently the birthplace or residence of the prophet Micah (Mic. 1:14). Jerome (Onomast) places it a short distance E of Eleutheropolis, from which Robinson (Researches, 2:423) concludes that it must have been near Mareshah. Possibly to be identified with Tell ej-Judeideh, about five miles W of Gath.

MORI'AH (mo-rī'a). "The land of Moriah" is named (Gen. 22:2) as the place where Abraham (which see) went to offer up Isaac. It is thought to be the same as "Mount Moriah," one of the hills of Jerusalem on which Solomon built the Temple, on the spot once occupied by the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite (2 Chron. 3:1). The Jews themselves believe that the altar of burnt offerings in the Temple stood upon the very site of the altar on which Abraham intended to offer up his son.

MORNING (Heb. bōqer, Gen. 1:5; etc.; Gk. prōia, Matt. 21:18). The early part of the day after sunrise. See Dawn; Time.

Figurative. Morning is illustrative of a nearby time, as "the upright shall rule over them in the morning," i.e., speedily (Ps. 49:14). Christ is called the "morning star" (Rev. 22:16), as He introduced the light of gospel day; the reward of saints (2:28), stars being an emblem of lofty position; the morning cloud, as speedily disappearing before the sun, is figurative of the short-lived profession of hypocrites (Hos. 6:4).

MORSEL. The translation of several Heb. and Gk. terms.

1. Heb. pat, "bit." A term answering to our bit, and usually referring to food (Prov. 17:1), sometimes rendered "piece," i.e., of bread (see the NASB of Judg. 19:5; Ruth 2:14; 1 Sam. 28:22; 1 Kings 17:11).

2. Heb. mitlahāmîn, "bits greedily swallowed." The Heb. expression appears only in Prov. 18:8; 26:22. It is given as "morsels" in the NASB and NIV. The KJV rendering, "wounds," is less apt.

3. Gk. psōmion, "fragment." A piece of bread "dipped" into the sauce (John 13:26–30; "sop," KJV). In the East meat is so thoroughly cooked as to be easily separated by the fingers. When, however, the food is in a semifluid state, or so soft that the fingers cannot conveniently hold it, it is conveyed to the mouth by means of a thin piece of bread. It is customary for the host to honor a guest by thus passing to him any dainty morsel. Jesus' dipping the morsel of bread and handing it to Judas would indicate that his place at the table must have been near to the Lord.

4. Gk. brōsis, "eating," "food." The Gk. term appears in Heb. 12:16 as part of a reference to the price for which Esau sold his birthright: "a morsel of meat," KJV; "a single meal," NASB and NIV.

MORTAL, MORTALITY. A term used for a human being, as frequently with us. The Gk. thnētos ("liable to die") is applied to man's natural body in contrast with the body that shall be (Rom. 6:12; 1 Cor. 15:53, 54; 2 Cor. 4:11; 5:4).

MORTAR.

1. Heb. m□dōkâ, Num. 11:8; maktēsh, "hollow," Prov. 27:22, a hollow vessel of wood, stone, or metal, used to pulverize grain or other substances. The most ancient mention of its use is in the account of the manner in which the Israelites prepared the manna in the desert:

“The people would go about and gather it and grind it between two millstones or beat it in the mortar” (Num. 11:8).

Figurative. “Though you pound a fool in a mortar with a pestle along with crushed grain, yet his folly will not depart from him” (Prov. 27:22). Grain may be separated from its husk and all its good properties preserved by such an operation. But the fool’s folly is so essentially a part of himself that no such process can remove it from him.

2. The word descriptive of any cement used in building, and the rendering of the Heb. word hōmer, “mire” or “clay.” Thus the builders of the tower of Babel “used brick for stone, and they used tar [‘slime,’ KJV] for mortar” (Gen. 11:3). Mortar in Ex. 1:14 is thought by some to mean the clay from which the bricks were made; as also in Isa. 41:25, “He will come upon rulers as upon mortar”; and Nah. 3:14. See Mineral Kingdom: Clay; Tar.

Another Heb. word translated “plaster” is āpār (powdered, usually rendered dust), used in the account of the treatment of a leprous house (Lev. 14:41–45). Here the mortar scraped from the walls is called “plaster” (“dust,” KJV), while the fresh material placed upon the walls is called “plaster” also (“mortar,” KJV). See Mineral Kingdom: Lime; Mortar; Plaster.

In Ezekiel (13:10–16) the figure is introduced of the people building a wall which the false prophets plastered (Heb. tāpēl; NIV “white-wash”). The meaning of the figure is intelligible enough. The people build up false hopes, and the prophets not only paint these hopes for them in splendid colors, but even predict their fulfillment, instead of denouncing their folly. The plastering is therefore a figurative description of deceitful flattery or hypocrisy (see Matt. 23:27; Acts 23:3). The same word occurs in the sense of that which is unsavory (Job 6:6) or foolish (Lam. 2:14).

MORTGAGE (Heb. ārāb, to “give security,” Neh. 5:3). A lien upon real estate for debt (Gesenius reads the passage, “We must pawn our houses”). In Prov. 17:18 it is rendered “pledge.”

MORTIFICATION (Gk. thanatōō, to “kill,” Rom. 8:13; nekroō, to “deaden,” Col. 3:5). The term mortify appears in the KJV of Rom. 8:13; Col. 3:5, with the sense of “put to death,” or “consider as dead,” the NASB readings of those passages. The NIV renders “put to death” in both passages.

MOSE´RA, MOSE´RAH (mo-se´ra; a “bond”). The thirty-ninth station of the Israelites in the desert, between Beeroth Bene-Jaakan and Gudgodah (Deut. 10:6); evidently near Mt. Hor, since Aaron is said to have died there (cf. Num. 33:37–38). The exact location is uncertain.

MOSE´ROTH (mo-se´rōth; “correction”). A station of the Israelites named between Hashmonah and Bene-jaaken (Num. 33:30–31); probably the same as Moserah.

MO´SES (mō´zez). The deliverer, leader, lawgiver, and prophet of Israel. The name in Heb. is mōsheh (“drawn out”), but the original is Egyptian ms, a “child,” a “son,” reflecting that Pharaoh’s daughter simply named him “child” (cf. Thutmose, Ahmose, etc., in which the same element appears frequently in Egyptian names). Thutmose=“Son of Thot,” etc. Moses belonged to the tribe of Levi, and was the son of Amram by his wife Jochebed. The other members of the family were Aaron and Miriam, his elder brother and sister. His immediate pedigree is given in table 26, “The Family Register of Moses.”

Table 26

* m. = married.

The life of Moses is divided into three equal portions of forty years each (Acts 7:23, 30, 36): his life in Egypt, exile in Arabia, and government of Israel.

Life in Egypt. Here took place his birth, adoption, and the avenging of his countrymen.

Birth. Moses was born about 1520 B.C. and, according to Manetho (Josephus Against Apion 1.26; 2.2), at Heliopolis; his birth, according to Josephus (Ant. 2.9.2–4), having been foretold to Pharaoh by the Egyptian magicians, and to his father by a dream. At the time of Moses' birth the decree commanding the slaying of all male children was in force (Ex. 1:10, 16), but his mother was by some means able to conceal him and hid him away for three months. When concealment was no longer possible she placed him in a small boat or basket of papyrus—perhaps from an Egyptian belief that the plant is a protection from crocodiles. She placed him among the reeds of the Nile and left his sister to watch the result. The daughter of Pharaoh, who may well have been the famous Queen Hatshepsut, and who herself a little later assumed the throne of Egypt, came to the river to bathe, saw the basket, and had it brought to her. It was opened, and the cry of the child moved the princess to compassion. She determined to rear it as her own. The sister was then at hand to recommend as a Hebrew nurse the baby's mother, who was hired by the princess (2:1–9).

Adoption. The child was adopted by the king's daughter, and from this time for many years Moses must be considered as an Egyptian (2:10). In the Pentateuch this period is a blank, but in the NT he is represented as "educated in all the learning of the Egyptians" and as "a man of power in words and deeds" (Acts 7:22). The discovery of the tablets of el-Amarna shows how extensive were the knowledge and use of writing throughout the East in the time of Moses and that the young prince could write—doubtless in Egyptian hieroglyphics, Akkad. cuneiform, and in alphabetic cuneiform such as Ugaritic, which was almost identical with the Heb. of the day. See Babylonia; Egypt.

Avenges His Countrymen. When he was forty years old (Acts 7:23) Moses resolved to cast in his lot with his brethren (Heb. 11:24–26), and seeing an Israelite being beaten by an Egyptian, and thinking that they were alone, he killed the Egyptian and buried the corpse in the sand. The next day he endeavored to act as peacemaker between two Hebrews, but his offices were refused and he became aware that his act of the preceding day was known. It became evident to him that safety was to be found only in flight (Ex. 2:11–15).

Exile in Arabia. Here took place the middle years of Moses' life, culminating in his return to Egypt as a prophet of God.

Marriage. Moses fled, about 1480 B.C., at the beginning of the reign of the famous Thutmose III (if we follow the Masoretic chronology), into Midian, in or near the peninsula of Sinai, and rested himself by a well, where he helped some young women to water their sheep. Because of this they returned to their home earlier than usual, and when they told their father, Jethro, the reason, he had Moses called in, and Moses consented to live with him, later taking his daughter Zipporah as his wife and assuming charge of his father-in-law's flock (Ex. 2:16–21; 3:1).

Call. In the seclusion of this shepherd life Moses received his call as a prophet. The traditional scene of this event is in the valley of Shoeib, on the N side of Jebel Musa, but we are unable to fix the spot with any certainty. It was “to the west side of the wilderness” at Horeb (3:1); to which the Heb. adds, while the LXX omits, “the mountain of God.” Upon the mountain was the well-known acacia, the thorn tree of the desert, spreading out its tangled branches, thickset with white thorns, over the rocky ground. The angel of the Lord appeared to Moses in a flame of fire in the midst of the bush, the dry branches of which would naturally have burned in a moment, but that remained unconsumed. The twofold revelation was made to Moses of the eternal self-existence of the one God and of his mission to deliver his own people. Two signs attested to him his divine mission—the staff that turned into a serpent, and the hand of Moses made leprous and afterward cleansed. Should these be disbelieved by the people a third was promised, that the waters of the Nile thrown by Moses upon the land would be turned into blood. The objection of Moses, “I am slow of speech and slow of tongue,” was answered by the promise of Jehovah's assistance. Moses' difficulties were now all exhausted and removed by the assurances of God; but since he was still unwilling to undertake the mission, Aaron was allowed to be his spokesman, and Moses consented (3:2–4:17).

Return to Egypt. He then returned to the home of his father-in-law and received permission to visit his brethren. God appeared to him and assured him of the death of all those in Egypt who sought his life, c. 1440 B.C. Moses then set out upon his journey with his wife and sons. On the way Moses, threatened with death by Jehovah, was spared upon the circumcision of his son. It would seem to have been in consequence of this event, whatever it was, that the wife and her children were sent back to Jethro and remained with him until they joined Moses at Rephidim (18:2–6). He once more received a token of divine favor in the arrival of Aaron, who met him at the “mountain of God,” went with him to Egypt, and communicated to the people of Israel the words of Jehovah (chap. 4)

Government of Israel. The history of Moses henceforth is the history of Israel for forty years, c. 1440–1400 B.C. He and Aaron appeared before Pharaoh to demand permission for the children of Israel to go to the wilderness and sacrifice to Jehovah. Then followed the contest between these two men and the king, and the plagues sent by Jehovah (chaps. 5–12).

Exodus. On the night of the deliverance Moses took the decisive lead, and after that he is usually mentioned alone. Under divine direction he did not lead the people by the nearest way to the Promised Land, i.e., through the country of the Philistines, lest, being opposed by this warlike people, the Israelites should turn back into Egypt. “Hence God led the people around by the way of the wilderness to the Red Sea” (13:17–18), through which the Israelites passed in safety while the hosts of Pharaoh perished in its waves.

Journey to Sinai. From the Red Sea Moses led Israel through Marah, where the bitter waters were sweetened (15:23); Elim, where there were twelve springs of water and seventy palm trees (15:27); the wilderness of Sin, where the people murmured for want of bread and were supplied with quail and manna (chap. 16); Rephidim, where the smitten rock of Horeb gave forth water (17:1–7), where the hands of Moses, upheld by Aaron and Hur, inspired the Israelites with courage, so that they defeated the Amalekites (17:8–16), and where Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, brought to him his wife and two sons (chap. 18).

At Sinai. Arriving at Sinai, Moses responded to the call of Jehovah and, going up into the mountain of God, received the message to the people to prepare for divine communications (19:1–13). He led the people to the foot of the mountain on the third day, where he received the Ten Commandments (19:14–20:17); conducted the ceremony of ratifying the covenant (24:1–8), reading all the “words of the Lord” (24:3) and all the “ordinances” (chaps. 21–23); stayed forty days and nights on the mountain (24:18), receiving the details of the plan of the sanctuary and worship of God (chaps. 25–31), and the two tablets of stone (31:18). In chap. 32 we have a vivid description of the righteous indignation of Moses at the sin of Israel in the worship of the golden calf, which led him to destroy the tablets of stone and call for volunteers to kill the idolaters (vv. 1–29); and we see his no less earnest zeal in the capacity of mediator (32:30–33:16). The glory of Jehovah was revealed to him (33:17–23), and the tablets of the law were renewed (34:1–4). A covenant was made with Israel (vv. 10–27), and after a second stay of forty days upon the mountain Moses returned to the people, his shining face covered with a veil (vv. 28–35). Moses then superintended the erection of the Tabernacle and its preparation for worship (chaps. 35–40), received the statutes of Israel for the congregation of Jehovah (Lev. 1–7), and consecrated Aaron and his sons for the priesthood (chaps. 8–9). Judgment was executed upon Nadab and Abihu (chap. 10), and further regulations were given (chaps. 11–27). After this Moses numbered the people (Num. 1); arranged the order of the tribes in the camp and on the march (chap. 2); numbered the Levites and arranged for their special calling (chaps. 3–4); gave directions respecting unclean persons, trespasses, Nazirites, etc. (chaps. 5–6); received the dedicatory gifts from the princes of the tribes (chap. 7); consecrated the Levites (chap. 8); and prepared for the onward journey (9:1–10:10).

Journey. On the twentieth day of the second month of the second year the cloud lifted from the Tabernacle, announcing that the time to leave Sinai had come. Moses accordingly gave the order to march, and the people moved forward (Num. 10:11–33). Mention is made of Moses’ securing, by prayer, the quenching of the fire at Taberah (11:1–3); the story records his complaint of the burden of his duties and the subsequent appointment of seventy elders to assist him (11:10–30); the sedition of Miriam and Aaron (chap. 12); the sending out of the spies (chaps. 13–14); the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (chap. 16); the deaths of Miriam and Aaron, and the striking of the rock at Meribah (chap. 20); the plague of serpents (chap. 21); the appointment of Joshua by Moses as his successor (chap. 27); the assignment of their inheritance to the Reubenites and Gadites (chap. 32); the appointment of commissioners to divide the Promised Land (chap. 34); and Moses’ farewell address (Deut. 1–33).

Death. For forty years the care and burden of the Israelites had been upon the mind and heart of Moses. The people were camped in Moab, awaiting the command to pass over the Jordan into the land of promise. Moses had sinned at Meribah in not sanctifying Jehovah in the eyes of the people (Num. 20:12) and had thereby forfeited the privilege of entering Canaan. At the command of God he blessed the people and then ascended Mt. Nebo, a peak of Pisgah, which gave a view of the land promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. After this favor had been granted him Moses died and was buried by Jehovah “in the valley in the land of Moab, opposite Beth-peor,” in an unknown sepulcher (Deut. 34:1–6), c. 1400 B.C.

Character. “Moses was in a sense peculiar to himself the founder and representative of his people. And in accordance with this complete identification of himself with his nation is the only strong personal trait which we are able to gather from his history (Num. 12:3). The word meek is hardly an adequate reading of the Hebrew ānāw, which should rather be much enduring. It represents what we should now designate by the word disinterested. All that is told of him indicates a withdrawal of himself, a preference of the cause of his nation to his own interests, which makes him the most complete example of Jewish patriotism” (Smith, Dict., s.v.). He joins his countrymen in their degrading servitude (Ex. 2:11; 5:4) and forgets himself to avenge their wrongs (2:14). He desires that his brother should be leader instead of himself (4:13); and when Jehovah offers to destroy the people and make of him a great nation (32:10), he prays for their forgiveness—"If not, please blot me out from Thy book which Thou hast written!" (v. 32).

Moses and Archaeology. The story of Moses being found in a papyrus ark among the reeds by the riverside has many parallels in ancient lore. To the classical examples of Romulus and Remus, Bacchus, and Perseus, must now be added account of the great Sargon I of Akkad (c. 2400 B.C.). The cuneiform legend of the ninth century B.C. thus speaks of Sargon: "My humble mother conceived me; she bore me in secret, placed me in an ark of bulrushes, made fast my door with pitch and gave me to the river which did not overwhelm me. The river lifted me up and carried me to Akki, the irrigator ... Akki, the irrigator, hauled me out ... took me to be his son and brought me up" (Hugo Gressmann, Altorientalische Texte und Bilder zum Alten Testament [1909], 1:79). There is certainly no necessity to postulate a common origin for such simple, natural romances, but "if one must do so, the episode of Moses (sixteenth century B.C.) may have been the inspiration of them all (S. Caiger, Bible and Spade [1936], p. 68). Archaeology sheds light on Moses' name, which is apparently nothing more than Egyptian mase, pronounced mose after the twelfth century B.C., and meaning "the child." This Egyptian word is preserved in such composites as Ahmose ("son of Ah," the god of light) and Thutmose ("son of Thot") (cf. Alan H. Gardiner, Journal of Egyptian Archaeology 5 [1918]: 193). Pharaoh's daughter evidently did not endow this unknown infant, a child of an alien race, with a special name. She simply contented herself to call him "the child." The sacred penman, however, as a result of an unusual coincidence of sound and circumstance, connects the name with the Heb. root māshâ, "to draw out," because Pharaoh's daughter "drew him out of the water" (Ex. 2:10). The presence of a Nubian element in Moses' family is another fact attested to by his own name and those of his kinsmen. "Then Miriam and Aaron spoke against Moses because of the Cushite [Ethiopian or Nubian] woman he had married (for he had married a Cushite woman)" (Num. 12:1). The name of Moses' brother Aaron's grandson, Phinehas, means "Nubian" in Egyptian and "is interesting as providing an independent but an absolutely reliable confirmation" of the circumstance (W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity, p. 193).

Writings. Although much controversy has been carried on respecting the extent of the authorship of Moses, it is probable that there should be attributed to him the Pentateuch (as far as Deut. 31:23), the song of Moses (32:1-43), the blessing of Moses on the tribes (33:1-29), and Ps. 90. The evidence of Moses' being the author of the Pentateuch is thus summed up by Keil (Introduction to the Old Testament, pp. 160ff.): (1) In Ex. 17:14 (see marg.), after the victory over the Amalekites, Moses receives the divine command to write in the book (bāsēpēr), as a memorial, the will of God that Amalek should be utterly blotted out.

According to 24:3-4, Moses wrote the words of the covenant and the "ordinances" of Israel (20:2-17; chaps. 21-23) in "the book of the covenant." According to Num. 33:2 he wrote down the camping stations of the Israelites in the wilderness by divine command. (2) According to Deut. 31:9-11, Moses wrote the law and gave it to the priests, with the command to read it before all Israel at the Feast of Booths (vv. 24-26): "And it came about, when Moses finished writing the words of this law in a book until they were complete, that Moses commanded the Levites, ... 'Take this book of the law and place it beside the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, that it may remain there as a witness against you.'" To this double testimony we must add 17:18, that the future king who should be chosen was to write "a copy of this law" for himself, and was to read it every day; cf. 27:1-8, where Moses commands the people to set up on Mt. Ebal great stones coated with lime, and to write upon these all the words of this law, which was actually done (Josh. 8:30–35); Deut. 28:58, 61; 29:19–20, 27, where Moses threatens if they do not obey the law written in this book; and 30:10, where he promises blessings if they “keep His commandments and His statutes which are written in this book of the law” (italics added). See also Gleason L. Archer, A Survey of Old Testament Introduction, rev. ed., pp. 109–18.

As a Lawgiver. “It occurs at once as a striking thing that the uniform tradition is, that Moses gave laws and ordinances to Israel.... The body of laws that formed the constitution of Israel as a people is invariably referred to Moses. The persistence with which it is represented that law, moral and ceremonial, came from Moses, and the acceptance of the laws by the whole people as of Mosaic origin, proves at least that it was a deeply-seated belief in the nation that the great leader had given some formal legal constitution to his people” (Robertson, Early Religion of Israel, p. 335).

Later Scripture Reference. In the OT the name of Moses does not occur as frequently, after the close of the Pentateuch, as might be expected. In Judges (18:30) the name is given as “Manasseh” in the Heb. copies in order to avoid the admission that the great lawgiver’s grandson was the first idolatrous priest among them. In the Psalms and the Prophets, however, Moses is frequently named as the chief of the prophets. Smith observes: “In the New Testament he is referred to partly as the representative of the law, especially in the vision of the transfiguration, where he appears side by side with Elijah. As the author of the law he is contrasted with Christ, the Author of the Gospel: ‘The law was given by Moses’ (John 1:17). The ambiguity and transitory nature of his glory is set against the permanence and clearness of Christianity (2 Cor. 3:13–18), and his mediatorial character against the unbroken communication of God in Christ (Gal. 3:19). His ‘service’ of God is contrasted with Christ’s sonship (Heb. 3:5–6). 1. Moses is, as it would seem, the only character of the Old Testament to whom Christ expressly likens himself—‘Moses wrote of me’ (John 5:46). It suggests three main points of likeness: (a) Christ was, like Moses, the great prophet of the people—the last, as Moses was the first. (b) Christ, like Moses, is a lawgiver: ‘Him shall ye hear.’ (c) Christ, like Moses, was a prophet out of the midst of the nation—‘from their brethren.’ As Moses was the entire representative of his people, feeling for them more than for himself, absorbed in their interests, hopes, and fears, so, with reverence be it said, was Christ. 2. In Heb. 3:1–19; 12:24–29; Acts 7:37, Christ is described, though more obscurely, as the Moses of the new dispensation—as the Apostle, or Messenger, or Mediator of God to the people—as the Controller and Leader of the flock or household of God. 3. The details of their lives are sometimes, though not often, compared (Acts 7:24–28, 35). In Jude 9 is an allusion to an altercation between Michael and Satan over the body of Moses. It probably refers to a lost apocryphal book, mentioned by Origen, called the ‘Ascension, or Assumption, of Moses’” (Bib. Dict., s.v.).

MOST HIGH (Heb. elyôn, “elevated”; Gk. hupsistos). A title ascribed to God (Pss. 18:13; 87:5; Luke 1:32, 35, 76; 6:35), indicative of His rank as Supreme Being. In Matt. 21:9; Mark 11:10; Luke 2:14; 19:38, hupsistos is rendered “in the highest,” referring to heaven as the highest place He could be. See also Highest.

MOTE. See Speck.

MOTH.

Figurative. The moth is a figure employed to represent destructive power. Apparently an insignificant figure, it is in reality a terrible one, inasmuch as it points to a power of destruction working imperceptibly and slowly, yet effecting the destruction of the object selected with all the greater certainty (see Job 4:19; 27:18, marg.; Isa. 50:9; 51:8; Hos. 5:12; Matt. 6:19; etc.). See Animal Kingdom.

MOTHER (Heb. ēm; Gk. mētēr).

General Use. The mother among the Israelites occupied a higher position in the family than was accorded to her by many other nations (see Family). When the father had more than one wife, the son appears to have confined the title “mother” to his real mother, by which he distinguished her from his father’s other wives (Gen. 43:29). When precision was not required the stepmother was sometimes called mother (37:10, where Jacob speaks of Leah as Joseph’s mother). The stepmother was often distinguished from one’s own mother by the name of “father’s wife.” “Mother,” like brother, father, etc., was employed in a somewhat wider sense than is usual among us, such as grandmother (1 Kings 15:10); of any female ancestor (Gen. 3:20); of a benefactress (Judg. 5:7); of any intimate relationship (Job 17:14).

Mosaic Code. The Mosaic code had several regulations respecting treatment of parents, even animals. Thus the young animal was to be with its mother (“dam,” KJV) seven days after birth before it could be sacrificed (Ex. 22:30; Lev. 22:27); a lamb was not to be seethed in its mother’s milk (Ex. 23:19); a mother bird was not to be taken with her young (Deut. 22:6–7).

Figurative. As in English so in Heb., a nation was considered as a mother, and individuals as her children (Isa. 50:1; Jer. 50:12; Ezek. 19:2; Hos. 4:5). Large and important cities are called mothers (2 Sam. 20:19), such as “Babylon the great, the mother of harlots” (Rev. 17:5). A place where two ways part has the designation of “mother of the way” (Ezek. 21:21, marg.), because out of it two ways arise as daughters. In Job (1:21) the earth is represented as the common mother, to whose bosom all must return. The sentiment, at once so mild and tender, which is felt by a true mother for her child, is used to illustrate the love of God for His people (Isa. 44:1–8; 66:6–14; 1 Cor. 3:1–2; 1 Thess. 2:7).

MOTIONS OF SIN. The word motions in this KJV expression is from Gk. pathēma and refers to the passions through which the sins are brought about, of which the sins are the actual consequence. When the Gk. term refers to an external state, it signifies suffering, misfortune, and calamity and is generally translated “suffering” or “sufferings” in the KJV, NIV, and NASB.

MOULDY (Heb. niqqūd, “crumbled,” Josh. 9:5, 12). The Heb. term refers to crumbs of bread and not to moldiness, a meaning which the NASB reading, “had become crumbled,” reflects.

MOUNT. Though normally used with the sense of mountain, hill country, or to ascend, in the KJV this word sometimes has the meaning of siegeworks or siege (see Isa. 29:3; Jer. 6:6).

MOUNT OF BEATITUDES. This was the name given to the mountain mentioned in Matt. 5:1, probably the place known as the “Horns of Hattin,” Kurun Hattîn, near Capernaum, and on the W of the Lake of Galilee. Hattin is the name of the village above which are the two elevations now called “the horns.” Its situation is central both to the peasants of the Galilean hills and the fishermen of the Galilean lake, between which it stands, and would therefore be a natural resort both to Jesus and His disciples when they retired from the shores of the sea for solitude, and also to the crowds who assembled from Galilee, from Decapolis, from Jerusalem, from Judea, and from beyond Jordan. None of the other mountains in the neighborhood could answer as well to this description, inasmuch as they are merged into the uniform barrier of hills around the lake; whereas this stands separate, “the mountain” that alone could lay claim to a distinct name, with the exception of Tabor, which is too distant to answer the requirements. The hospice and church of the Italian Franciscan sisters now crown the traditional site adjacent to the Sea of Galilee.

MOUNT OF THE AM'ALEKITES. See Hill Country of the Amalekites.

MOUNT OF THE CONGREGATION. See Assembly, Mount of.

MOUNT OF THE VALLEY. Better “hill of the valley” (so NASB and NIV, Josh. 13:19).

MOUNTAIN.

Figurative. Mountain is used as symbolical of strength, stability. Thus when David says, “O Lord, by Thy favor Thou hast made my mountain to stand strong” (Ps. 30:7), he means to express the stability of his kingdom. In like manner the kingdom of the Messiah is depicted as a mountain (Isa. 2:2; Dan. 2:35), as is also the Chaldean monarchy (Jer. 51:25; Zech. 4:7). Mountains are frequently used to signify places or sources of strength (Jer. 3:23); the righteousness of God (Ps. 36:6); persons in authority (Ps. 72:3); difficulties (Isa. 40:4; Zech. 4:7; Matt. 17:20); proud and haughty persons (Isa. 2:14); a burning mountain, of destroying enemies (Jer. 51:25). A threshed mountain is used for heavy judgments (Isa. 41:15); a mountain laid waste is figurative of desolation (Isa. 42:15; Mal. 1:3); singing mountains, of great joy (Isa. 44:23; 55:12), of dropping new wine, of abundance (Amos 9:13).

MOUNTAIN SHEEP. See Animal Kingdom.

MOURN. The rendering of quite a number of Heb. and Gk. words.

Occasions. Mourning is frequently referred to in Scripture as an expression of grief for the dead. Thus Abraham mourns for Sarah (Gen. 23:2); Jacob for Joseph, thinking him dead (37:34–35); the Egyptians for Jacob (50:3, 10); the Israelites for Aaron (Num. 20:29), for Moses (Deut. 34:8), and for Samuel (1 Sam. 25:1); David for Abner (2 Sam. 3:31–32, 35); Mary and Martha for Lazarus (John 11:31). There is mourning on account of calamities, either endured or impending, e.g., Job under his many afflictions (Job 1:20–21; 2:11), Israel under the threatening of divine displeasure (Ex. 33:4), the Ninevites in view of threatened destruction (Jonah 3:5). There is as well mourning in repentance of sin (3:6–9), and the mourning of the Israelites on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 23:27; cf. Zech. 12:10–11).

Modes. The modes of expressing grief were numerous and varied.

Weeping. Weeping, as the general name for the expression of mourning, was one of the chief of these. The tree under which Deborah, Rebekah’s nurse, was buried was called Allon-bacuth, the “oak of weeping” (Gen. 35:8, marg.), on account of the lamentation made for her. The children of Israel wept “each man at the doorway of his tent” for flesh to eat (Num. 11:10). Tears are repeatedly referred to (Pss. 42:3; 56:8; etc.). In fact the orientals seem to have had tears at their command and could weep at pleasure.

Lamentation. Loud lamentation was another method of expressing sorrow (Ruth 1:9; 2 Sam. 3:31–34; 13:36), often with wailing and howls of grief, even amid the solemnities of worship (Joel 1:13; Mic. 1:8). The Egyptians were vociferous in their grief: “there was a great cry in Egypt” at the death of the firstborn (Ex. 12:30). Not only did the relatives of the deceased give utterance to loud cries, but hired mourners were often engaged to swell the lamentation with screams and noisy utterances (2 Chron. 35:25; Eccles. 12:5). See Dead, Burial of.

Personal Disfigurement. Such action was doubtless resorted to that the public might be convinced of the greatness of the mourner’s grief. Among the particular forms were rending the clothes (Gen. 37:29, 34; 44:13; 2 Chron. 34:27; Isa. 36:22; Jer. 36:24; Matt. 26:65; Mark 14:63; etc.); dressing in sackcloth (Gen. 37:34; 2 Sam. 3:31; 21:10; Ps. 35:13; Isa. 37:1; Joel 1:8, 13; Amos 8:10; Job 16:15; etc.); wearing black or other somber-colored garments (2 Sam. 14:2); covering the face or head (2 Sam. 15:30; Jer. 14:4; Ezek. 24:17); sitting in or sprinkling ashes or dust upon the person (2 Sam. 13:19; 15:32; Josh. 7:6; Esther 4:1, 3; Job 2:12; 42:6; Isa. 61:3; Jer. 6:26; Rev. 18:19); the removal of ornaments or the neglect of one’s person (Ex. 33:4; Deut. 21:12–13; 2 Sam. 14:2; 19:24; Ezek. 26:16; Dan. 10:3; Matt. 6:16–17); laying bare some part of the body (Isa. 20:2, 4; 47:2; 50:6; Jer. 13:22, 26; Nah. 3:5; Mic. 1:8, 11); shaving the head, cutting the hair short, or plucking out the hair of the head or beard (2 Sam. 19:24; Ezra 9:3; Job 1:20; Jer. 7:29; 16:6); fasting (2 Sam. 1:12; 3:35; 12:16, 22; Ezra 10:6; Ezek. 24:17); diminution in offerings to God, and the prohibition against partaking of sacrificial food (Deut. 26:14; Hos. 9:4; Joel 1:9, 13, 16); sitting or lying in silence (Gen. 23:3; Judg. 20:26; 2 Sam. 12:16; Job 1:20; Ezra 9:3; Lam. 2:10); lifting up the hands (Ezra 9:5; Lam. 1:17).

Forbidden Modes. Some of the expressions of mourning that were usual among the heathen were forbidden to the Israelites: cutting the flesh (Lev. 19:28; Deut. 14:1), shaving the forehead (14:1, i.e., the eyebrows and eyelids and the forepart of the head—an idolatrous custom). Priests were not to defile themselves for the dead by any outward expression of mourning, except for near relatives (Lev. 21:1–2); and the high priest not even for these (21:10–11), under which restriction the Nazirites also came (Num. 6:7).

MOUTH (Heb. properly peh; Gk. stoma). In addition to its ordinary applications the Hebrews used the following idiomatic phrases: a mouth “smoother than butter” (Ps. 55:21), i.e., a flattering mouth; a “deceitful mouth” (109:2).

Notice the following remarkable phrases: To speak “mouth to mouth,” i.e., in person, without an interpreter or third party (Num. 12:8; cf. 1 Kings 8:15; Jer. 32:4, marg.); with “one mouth,” i.e., with universal consent (Josh. 9:2, marg.; cf. 1 Kings 22:13; 2 Chron. 18:12); “to put words in his mouth,” i.e., to suggest what someone else shall say (Ex. 4:15; Num. 22:38; 23:5, 12; 2 Sam. 14:19). To “be in your mouth” is to be frequently spoken of (Ex. 13:9; Ps. 34:1). To “put your hand over your mouth” is to be silent (Judg. 18:19; Job 21:5; 40:4), for silence is enjoined by placing the finger upon the lip. To write “from the mouth of” anyone is to do so from his dictation (Jer. 36:4, marg., cf. vv. 27, 32; 45:1, marg.). To inquire at “the mouth of the Lord” (Josh. 9:14, marg.) is to consult with Him; while to set one’s mouth “against the heavens” (Ps. 73:9) is to speak arrogantly, blasphemously against God. God’s word is called “the rod of His mouth” (Isa. 11:4). The mouth is sometimes used for that which one speaks, as well as for the speaker himself (Ex. 4:16; Num. 3:16, marg.; Jer. 15:19, marg.).

MOWING (Heb. gēz, lit., “fleece,” something cut; rendered “mown grass” in Ps. 72:6).

Mowing can scarcely be said to exist in Palestine, unless we understand by it cutting with a sickle. The climate is too hot and dry to allow grain to grow sufficiently tall to need a scythe to cut it. The Heb. term refers to “grass ready for mowing.”

The “king’s mowing” (Amos 7:1) may refer to some royal right of early pasturage, or tyrannical exaction from the people (NIV, “king’s share”).

MO’ZA (mō’za; “going forth”).

1. The second son of Caleb by his concubine Ephah (1 Chron. 2:46), about 1380 B.C.
2. Son of Zimri, and descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:36–37; 9:42–43), perhaps about 850 B.C.

MO’ZAH (mō’za). A town of Benjamin connected with Mizpeh and Chephireh (Josh. 18:26). Its location is unknown, but it may be identified with Koloniyeh almost five miles NW of Jerusalem on the Jaffa Road.

MUFFLER (Heb. ṣāḥāḥ, “veil”). Long fluttering veils, more expensive than ordinary ones (Isa. 3:19, “veil,” NASB).

MULBERRY TREE. See Vegetable Kingdom.

MULE. See Animal Kingdom.

MUP’PIM (mup’im). A Benjamite, and one of the fourteen descendants of Rachel who belonged to the original colony of the sons of Jacob in Egypt (Gen. 46:21). In Num. 26:39 the name is written Shephupham; in 1 Chron. 7:12, 15 it is Shuppim; in 8:5 it is Shephuphan.

MURDER (Heb. rāṣaḥ, to “kill”). From the very beginning of human history murder has been considered one of the greatest of crimes. The principle on which the act of taking the life of a human being was regarded by the Almighty as a capital offense is stated on its highest ground as an outrage on the likeness of God in man, to be punished even when caused by an animal (Gen. 9:5–6; see also John 8:44; 1 John 3:12, 15). Its secondary or social ground appears to be implied in the direction God gave Noah to replenish the earth, which immediately follows His statement about the shedding of man’s blood (Gen. 9:7). The postdiluvian command was limited by the law of Moses, which, while it protected accidental homicide, defined with additional strictness the crime of murder. It prohibited compensation or reprieve of the murderer, or his protection if he took refuge in the refuge city, or even at the altar of Jehovah (Ex. 21:12, 14; Lev. 24:17, 21; 1 Kings 2:5, 6, 31–34). Bloodshed, even in warfare, was held to involve pollution (Num. 35:33–34; Deut. 21:1–9; 1 Chron. 28:3). It is not certain whether a master who killed his slave was punished with death (Ex. 21:20). No punishment is mentioned for attempted suicide, nor does any special restriction appear to have attached to the property of the suicide (2 Sam. 20:23). Striking a pregnant woman so as to cause her death was punishable with death (Ex. 21:22–23). If an animal known to be vicious caused the death of anyone, not only was the animal destroyed, but the owner also, if he had taken no steps to restrain it, was held guilty of murder (21:29, 31). The duty of executing punishment on the murderer is in the law expressly laid on the “avenger of blood”; but the question of guilt was to be previously decided by the Levitical tribunal. In regal times the duty of execution of justice on a murderer seems to have been assumed to some extent by the sovereign, as well as the privilege of pardon (14:7–11; 1 Kings 2:31–34). It was lawful to kill a burglar taken at night in the act, but unlawful to do so after sunrise (Ex. 22:2–3).

MUSE (Heb. śāḥ, to “ponder,” Ps. 143:5). To meditate, reflect; pertaining to delighting, as an old man, in memories. In Luke 3:15 the KJV reading “muse” (from dialogizomai) is replaced in the NASB and NIV by “wondering” (NASB marg., “reasoning” or “debating”).

MU’SHI (mū’shi). A son of Merari, son of Kohath (Ex. 6:19; Num. 3:20; 1 Chron. 6:19, 47; 23:21, 23; 24:26, 30). His offspring were called Mushites (Num. 3:33; 26:58).

MUSIC. Music was a prominent art in ancient biblical times and played a vital role both in Israel and adjacent lands.

Vocal. Hebrew music was primarily vocal. The lyre was an instrument commonly used to accompany the human voice. When singing first appears in the Bible, it is as a familiar part of merrymaking in connection with sending away guests and loved ones (Gen. 31:27). As a religious ceremony, vocal music first appears in Ex. 15:1, 20 in the antiphonal song led by Miriam in celebration of the passage through the Red Sea. Two other responsive songs are probably found in Ps. 136 and 1 Sam. 18:7. The digging of the well (“Beer”) was celebrated by a song (Num. 21:17–18). Moses taught Israel some of his last warnings in a song (Deut. 32:1–4). Deborah and Barak celebrated their triumph in song (Judg. 5:1–31). David was received with song by Israel’s women after his victory over Goliath (1 Sam. 18:6–7). Barzillai mentioned “singing men and women” among social pleasures (2 Sam. 19:35). Solomon was a song writer, composing 1,005 songs (1 Kings 4:32). Singing was common in ancient Israel. David’s trained choir numbered 288. It continued under Solomon (2 Chron. 5:12–13; 9:11), Jehoshaphat (20:21–22), Joash (23:13, 18), Hezekiah (29:27–30), Josiah and after him (35:15, 25), Ezra (Ezra 2:41; 3:11; 7:24) and Nehemiah (Neh. 7:44; 10:28; etc.). The “songs of Zion” were famous (cf. Ps. 137:3).

Instrumental. Instrumental music as well as vocal was common in ancient Israel. Saul was influenced by it (1 Sam. 10:5), and David’s skill in playing upon the lyre had a profound effect upon Saul when he was demonized (16:23). David was not only a great warrior but a skilled musician and singer. Instrumental music certainly figured largely in Solomon’s Temple (1 Chron. 25). “Male and female musicians” are specifically mentioned in the prism of Sennacherib (691 B.C.) as being part of the tribute the Judean Hezekiah had to render to Sennacherib. These musicians were certainly not mediocre to be mentioned in connection with the Assyrian court. In Elisha’s day a minstrel was easily procurable (2 Kings 3:15). At the time of the Exile, the Israelites are said to have hung their harps on the trees and refused to sing the songs of Zion (Ps. 137). Instrumental music and singing were common in the postexilic period (Ezra 3:10–11; Neh. 12:27–47).

Tambourine, Timbrel, Tabret. The Heb. tōp is most often translated “tambourine,” sometimes “timbrel.” The KJV often uses the term “tabret.” Some scholars think it was a drum, like a tom-tom, made “of a wooden hoop and very probably two skins, without any jingling contrivance or sticks” (see Kurt Sachs, A History of Musical Instruments [1940]; Sol B. Finesinger, “Musical Instruments in the O.T.,” Hebrew Union College Annual 3 [1926]: 21–75). It was associated with merrymaking or praise (cf. Ex. 15:20; Judg. 11:34; 1 Sam. 18:6; Ps. 68:25). This instrument played an important part from patriarchal times through the period of the restoration.

Lyre, Harp, Lute, Psaltery, Trigon, Stringed Instrument, Sackbut(?). The main Heb. word for this kind of instrument is kinnôr, which is translated “lyre” and “harp” (1 Chron. 13:8; Neh. 12:27; Isa. 23:16). By its translation in the LXX and the Vulgate, kinnôr may be definitely identified as a species of lyre and was called kithara by the Greeks and Romans.

Several archaeological illustrations give a good idea of what the Israelite lyre was. On a Beni Hasan monument to be dated around 1900 B.C., one of the Semites entering Egypt is depicted performing on a lyre. Inasmuch as lyres were unknown in ancient Egypt in Old-Kingdom monuments, they were introduced by Asiatics coming from Palestine. According to rabbinic sources, to make the lyre strings the small intestines of sheep were stretched across a sounding board over a blank space and attached to a crossbar. The performer apparently drew a plectrum across the strings with his right hand and deadened the strings with his left. Pictures on Assyrian monuments portray the lyre in similar fashion, as on the Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III and the musicians appearing before Sennacherib at Lachish, although the players in this case seem to be drawing the index fingers over the strings instead of using a plectrum. David played with his hand before Saul (1 Sam. 16:23).

Another Heb. term often translated “harp” is nēbel (Pss. 33:2; 144:9; Amos 6:5). The KJV also renders this word “psaltery” and “viol”; the NIV, “lyre” or simply “musical instrument.” The word normally means “a skin bottle,” but in twenty-seven cases it refers to a musical instrument. The LXX and Vulg. both often translate this term “psaltery.” Since the psaltery is plainly a harp, which has more and longer strings than the lyre, and since this instrument was common both in Egypt and Mesopotamia from very ancient times, the Hebrew instrument seems to be therefore correctly defined as a harp. The rabbinic tradition asserts that the harp was called nēbel because it was shaped like a skin bottle, the body being rounded out and covered with skin.

Qitrōs, a Heb. word of Gk. origin, is translated “lyre” (Dan. 3:5, 7, 10, 15; “harp,” KJV). ʿAsōr, a Heb. form that literally means “ten,” is used together with nēbel (Pss. 33:2; 144:9), translated “harp of ten strings.” When used alone (Ps. 92:3) it is translated “ten-stringed lute” (NASB) or “instrument of ten strings” (KJV, NIV). Sachs considers this instrument to be a zither of ten strings. Phoenicians played this instrument, but apparently it was not used in Egypt or Mesopotamia.

Psantrîn is a transliteration from the Gk. found only in Dan. 3:5, 7, 10, 15 and translated “psaltery,” a kind of harp or lyre (so NIV). In this same Daniel passage, the Aram. word šabb□kā is translated “trigon,” probably referring to a small triangular harp of four or more strings and a high pitch. Some claim it may have been a large, many-stringed harp. In either case, it was not a “sackbut” (KJV), which was probably a wind instrument.

Minnûm is translated “stringed instruments” in its few occurrences (Pss. 45:8; 150:4) and probably refers to another form of harp, if not simply a generic term.

Trumpet, Horn, Cornet. Trumpets consisted of the horn (qeren) of the ram or goat. This term is used scores of times in the OT for either animal anatomy or musical instruments made from animal parts (Dan. 3:5, 7, 10, 15; “cornet,” KJV) as the context dictates. Most often, “trumpet(s)” is the translation of shôpār, the Heb. word referring to a ram’s horn wind instrument. It was used for giving of signals for war, as in the case of Joshua, Ehud, Gideon, and Joab. It announced the year of Jubilee and also approaching danger (Jer. 4:5; Ezek. 33:3; Joel 2:1). It heralded the appearance of the new moon and full moon (Ps. 81:3).

Another type of trumpet was of metal. Moses was instructed to prepare two trumpets of silver (Num. 10:2). These were called hăšōš□râ (Neh. 12:35; Ps. 98:6) and were in pairs, as Moses’ two trumpets and the two trumpets on the Arch of Titus, as well as on Jewish coins. Doubtless two priests blew on the trumpets simultaneously.

The Heb. word yôbēl is sometimes translated “horn” (Ex. 19:13) or “trumpet,” but most often “jubilee,” signifying the festival introduced by this trumpet’s prolonged blast. Tāqôa is “trumpet” (Ezek. 7:14).

Flute, Pipe, Organ. The flute referred to in Nebuchadnezzar’s band (Dan. 3:5, 7, 10, 15) is from the Heb. mashrôqî, which was often used as a whistle. It could also refer to any of the instruments of wood that were blown. The term ʿûgāb was probably a kind of flute that was later used to describe woodwind instruments in general. It is translated “flute” (Job 21:12) and “pipe” (Gen. 4:21; “flute,” NIV); “organ” in both places by the KJV. The word hālîl ("pipe," KJV) is commonly considered to be a flute and is so translated by the NASB and the NIV (Isa. 30:29; Jer. 48:36). Sachs, however, considers it to be an oboe since at the time the instrument appears (the era of Saul) the double oboe was in common vogue. It too may have been used at times for woodwind instruments in general.

Flutes occur in prehistoric, Old Kingdom, and Middle Kingdom Egyptian drawings. It is inconceivable to think the flute was not known among the Israelites, being simply a reed indented with holes and blown. Flutes are still common in the Middle East.

Cymbals. The Heb. words for cymbals are onomatopoeic (names that imitate the instruments' sounds). The more common is m□siltayim (1 Chron. 15:16, 19; Ezra 3:10; etc.). The other is šelšlîm (2 Sam. 6:5; Ps. 150:5). Cymbals are seen on Assyrian reliefs where two types appear: one is beaten horizontally; one, vertically. This instrument occurs for the first time in the list of instruments upon which David played on the occasion of bringing up the Ark of God to Jerusalem from the house of Abinadab.

Castanets, Cornet. The Heb. term m□naāna is translated "castanets" in its only occurrence (2 Sam. 6:5; "cornets," KJV; "sistrums," NIV). The word is derived from a root verb meaning to shake. Sachs and Finesinger are both of the opinion that this instrument was the sistrum, an instrument common in Egypt and early Babylonia. It was a rattle-type noisemaker composed of a handle with a metal loop at one end. The metal circle was perforated by holes through which wires were positioned and loosely secured by bent ends. These wires jingled when the instrument was shaken. Excavations at Bethel in 1934 yielded a sistrum containing a carving of the Egyptian goddess Hathor.

Bagpipe, Dulcimer. The Aram. word, sûm- pōnyâ, found in the Bible only in Dan. 3:5, 7, 10, 15, is best translated "bagpipe," a wind instrument, rather than "dulcimer" (KJV), a stringed instrument.

Generic "Instruments." Shālîshîm (1 Sam. 18:6) and klî (2 Chron. 23:13) are both general terms simply translated "instruments of music."

It should be noted that the verses from Dan. 3, so often referred to in earlier paragraphs, list six instruments found in Babylon. In this list qeren (horn) and mashrôqî (flute) are Semitic. The other four are of Gk. derivation: qîtrōs (lyre); šabb□kā (trigon); psantrîn (psaltery). The Greek influence in Babylonian linguistics is accountable by early commercial connections between Greece and Assyria long before Daniel's time.

What sort of music scale the Hebrews used or how their music sounded is not known for certain. Authorities such as Sachs speculate that the scale was pentatonic.

MUSTARD. See Vegetable Kingdom.

MUTTER (Heb. hāgâ, Isa. 8:19). Ancient wizards ("spiritists," NASB and NIV; see Magic) imitated the chirping of bats, which was supposed to proceed from the shades of Hades, and uttered their magical formulas in a whispering tone.

MUZZLE (Heb. hāsam; Gk. phimoō, to "stop the mouth"). In the East grain was threshed by oxen trampling upon it; and the command was not to muzzle the ox when threshing (Deut. 25:4). This was not intended to apply merely to the ox employed in threshing, but to be understood in the general sense in which the apostle Paul used it (1 Cor. 9:9; 1 Tim. 5:18), that a laborer was not to be deprived of his wages.

MY'RA (mī'ra). One of the chief cities of Lycia in Asia Minor. It was situated about two miles from the sea, upon rising ground, at the foot of which flowed a navigable river with an excellent harbor. It was at Myra that Paul, on his voyage to Rome, was transferred from the ship that had brought him from Cilicia to the ship from Alexandria (Acts 27:5). To be seen at Myra today are fascinating rock-cut Lycian tombs, a Roman theater, a Roman bath, a Hellenistic fortress, and at the harbor area the ruins of a temple, a sixth-century church, and a granary of Hadrian. In the nearby town of Demre is the famous Church of St. Nicholas, who was martyred in 655. He is the St. Nicholas connected with Christian legend. H.F.V.

MYRRH. See Vegetable Kingdom.

MYRTLE. See Vegetable Kingdom.

MYS'IA (mish'i-a). A province in the NW of Asia Minor, and separated from Europe only by the Propontis and Hellespont. Paul passed through this province and embarked at its chief port, Troas, on his first voyage to Europe (Acts 16:7–8).

MYSTERY (Gk. mustērion). The NT use of the term “mystery” has reference to some operation or plan of God hitherto unrevealed. It does not carry the idea of a secret to be withheld, but of one to be published (1 Cor. 4:1; “secret things,” NIV). Paul uses the word twenty-one times. The term mystery, moreover, comprehends not only a previously hidden truth, presently divulged, but one that contains a supernatural element that still remains in spite of the revelation. The more important biblical mysteries are the following:

1. The mysteries of the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 13:3–50).
2. The mystery of the translation of the living saints at the end of the church age (1 Cor. 15:51–52; 1 Thess. 4:14, 17).
3. The mystery of the church as the Body of Christ, composed of saved Jews and Gentiles of this age (Eph. 3:1–11; 6:19; Col. 4:3).
4. The mystery of the church as the bride of Christ (Eph. 5:28–32).
5. The mystery of “Christ in you, the hope of glory” (Gal. 2:20; Col. 1:26–27).
6. “God’s mystery, that is, Christ Himself” (Col. 2:2, 9; 1 Cor. 2:7). This involves Christ as the fullness of the Godhead in bodily form.
7. The mystery of lawlessness (2 Thess. 2:7; Matt. 13:33).
8. The mystery of the operation by which man is restored to godliness (1 Tim. 3:16).
9. The mystery of Israel’s blindness during the gospel age (Rom. 11:25).
10. The mystery of the seven stars (Rev. 1:20).
11. The mystery of Babylon, the harlot (Rev. 17:5, 7).

N

NA'AM (nā'am; "sweetness, pleasantness"). One of the sons of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (1 Chron. 4:15), about 1375 B.C.

NA'AMAH (nā'a-ma; "sweetness, pleasantness").

1. One of the four women whose names are preserved in the records of the world before the Flood, all except Eve being Cainites. She was the daughter of Lamech and Zillah and sister of Tubal-cain (Gen. 4:22).

2. Wife of Solomon and mother of King Rehoboam (1 Kings 14:21, 31; 2 Chron. 12:13). On each occasion she is distinguished by the title "the [not "an," as in the KJV] Ammonitess." She was, therefore, one of the foreign women whom Solomon took into his establishment (1 Kings 11:1), after 960 B.C.

3. A city in the plain of Judah, mentioned between Beth-dagon and Makkedah (Josh. 15:41), not definitely located.

NA'AMAN (nā'a-man; "pleasantness").

1. One of the family of Benjamin who came down to Egypt with Jacob (as read in Gen. 46:21) or, more correctly, born in Egypt. According to the LXX version of that passage, he was the son of Bela, which is the parentage assigned to him in Num. 26:40. In the enumeration of the sons of Benjamin, he is said to be the son of Bela and head of the family of the Naamites. He is also reckoned among the sons of Bela (1 Chron. 8:3–4), after 1876 B.C.

2. "The Syrian" was commander of the armies of Ben-hadad II (Josephus Ant. 8.15.5), king of Damascene Syria. He is described in 2 Kings 5:1 as "a great man with his master, and highly respected, ... a valiant warrior." He was, however, a leper; and when a captive Hebrew girl spoke of a prophet in Samaria who could cure her master of leprosy, Ben-hadad furnished him with a letter to King Joram. But when the king read the letter to the effect that Naaman had been sent to him to be cured, he tore his clothes, suspecting that the object was a quarrel. Elisha the prophet, hearing of this, sent for Naaman, who came to his house, not being permitted as a leper to enter. Elisha sent a messenger to him saying, "Go and wash in the Jordan seven times, and your flesh shall be restored to you and you shall be clean." Naaman was indignant at the apparent incivility and would doubtless have returned to Syria without a cure but for the entreaties of his servants. He bathed in the Jordan and was cleansed of his leprosy. Returning to Elisha, he acknowledged that Jehovah was above all gods, and he declared his intention of worshiping Him alone. He asked permission to take home two mules' loads of earth, probably to set up in Damascus an altar to Jehovah. He desired to bestow valuable gifts upon Elisha, but the prophet refused to accept anything. His servant, Gehazi, coveting some of the riches proffered his master, hastened after Naaman and asked, in his master's name, for a portion. Naaman granted him more than he had asked (5:2–23), about 848 B.C.

“Naaman’s appearance throughout the occurrence is most characteristic and consistent. He is every inch a soldier, ready at once to resent what he considers a slight cast either on himself or the natural glories of his country, and blazing out in a moment into sudden ‘rage,’ but calmed as speedily by a few good-humored and sensible words from his dependents, and after the cure has been effected evincing a thankful and simple heart, whose gratitude knows no bounds, and will listen to no refusal” (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopaedia, s.v.).

The expression “because by him the Lord had given victory to Aram” (v. 1) seems to point to services such as were incidentally to serve the divine purposes toward Israel and may on this account have been ascribed to Jehovah.

Naaman’s request to be allowed to take away two mules’ loads of earth is not easy to understand. The natural explanation is that, with a feeling akin to that which prompted the Pisan invaders to take away the earth of Aceldama for the Campo Santo at Pisa, the grateful convert to Jehovah wished to take away some of the earth of His country to form an altar. But in the narrative there is no mention of an altar.

NA’AMATHITE (nā’a-ma-thit). An epithet of Zophar, one of Job’s friends, found only in Job 2:11; 11:1; 20:1; 42:9 and always in the phrase “Zophar the Naamathite.” There are several towns from which it might have been derived, such as “Noam, a castle in the Yemen, and a place on the Euphrates; Niameh, a place belonging to the Arabs; and Noamee, a valley in Tihameh,” not to mention the common Naaman. The LXX calls Zophar the Minaean and the king of the Minaeans. But of the real meaning of the term nothing is known. W.H.

NA’AMITE (nā’a-mīt). One of the family descended from Naaman (Num. 26:40), a Benjamite. The name is a contraction seldom occurring in Heb. and is rendered “the Naamanites” by the Samaritan codex.

NA’ARAH, NA’ARATH (na’a-ra; “a girl”).

1. The second named of the two wives of Ashhur of the tribe of Judah, and the mother by him of four sons (1 Chron. 4:5–6), about 1440 B.C.

2. A town named (Josh. 16:7; “Naarath,” KJV) as one of the southern landmarks of Ephraim. It was in the Jordan Valley and N of Jericho. Probably the same as Naaran (1 Chron. 7:28).

NA’ARAI (na’a-rī). The son of Ezbai, and one of David’s heroes (1 Chron. 11:37), about 1000 B.C. In 2 Sam. 23:35 he is called “Paarai,” probably through a scribal error.

NA’ARAN (na’a-ran). A town in Ephraim, between Bethel and Jericho (1 Chron. 7:28), and possibly the same as Naarah (Josh. 16:7). It is evidently Noorath mentioned by Eusebius, five Roman miles N of Jericho, to be identified with Tel el-Jisr.

NA’ARATH. See Naarah.

NA’ASHON. See Nahshon.

NA’ASSON. See Nahshon.

NA’BAL (nā’bal; “foolish”). A descendant of Caleb, who lived in Maon (Tell Ma’in about 1½ miles S of Carmel of Judah and 8½ miles S of Hebron) when David, with his followers, was on the southern borders of Palestine (1 Sam. 25:2), about 1004 B.C. He was a man of great wealth, having 3,000 sheep and 1,000 goats, which he pastured in Carmel (not the promontory of that name but the present Kurmul, on the mountains of Judah). When David heard in the desert (v. 1) that Nabal was shearing his sheep, which was generally accompanied with festivities, he sent ten young men to Nabal and instructed them to wish him peace and prosperity, to remind him of David's friendly services, and to solicit a present for himself and his people. The services alluded to were doubtless protection afforded by David and his men to Nabal's shepherds and flocks against the Bedouin Arabs. Nabal refused the petitioners in a churlish manner: "Who is David? And who is the son of Jesse? There are many servants today who are each breaking away from his master. Shall I then take my bread and my water and my meat that I have slaughtered for my shearers, and give it to men whose origin I do not know?" (vv. 10–11). Thus, in order to justify his covetousness, he set down David as a worthless vagrant. David was enraged at this reply and started with four hundred men to take vengeance upon Nabal. In the meantime one of Nabal's servants told Abigail, his intelligent and godly wife, what had taken place. As quickly as possible she took a bountiful present of provisions (v. 18) and, sending it to David, followed herself to appease his wrath. They met, and Abigail, throwing herself at David's feet, sought his forgiveness. David's anger was appeased, and in his reply he praised Jehovah for having sent Abigail to meet him and congratulated her upon her understanding and acts, which had kept him from bloodshed (vv. 32–33). He received her gifts and dismissed her with the assurance that he had granted her request (v. 35). All this had occurred without the knowledge of Nabal. When Abigail returned and found him in a drunken stupor she told him nothing until the next morning. Conscious of the danger that had threatened him, and either angry at the loss he had sustained or vexed because his wife had humbled herself in such a manner, Nabal collapsed: "his heart died within him so that he became as a stone" (v. 37). It was as if a stroke of paralysis fell upon him. He seems not to have changed in his nature by his affliction, for ten days later "the Lord struck Nabal, and he died" (v. 38). David not long after took Abigail for his wife (vv. 40–42).

Between the sixth and fourth centuries B.C. they pushed northward and seized the fortresses of Edom and Moab. Gaining control of the great caravan routes of the Middle East, they developed a remarkable civilization. They came into their greatest glory between 200 B.C. and A.D. 100. In the year A.D. 106 they were annexed to Rome as a province of Arabia. The great fortress of Petra, sixty miles S of the Dead Sea, became their capital. This remarkable rose-colored city was unknown to the West until 1812. Petra, known in the OT as Sela (Isa. 16:1), contained notable "high places," or outdoor religious sanctuaries. Petra's great high place was discovered by G. L. Robinson in 1900. The Conway High Place, found by Agnes Conway Horsefield, flourished in the first century B.C. The Nabataeans honored both sun and moon. Their chief deities were Dusares, that is, Dionysus, and the female goddess Alat. Numerous other deities are found in their pantheon. In the first century A.D., Nabataea was located S of Idumaea, reaching to the Mediterranean Sea S of Gaza. It also extended through the Arabah almost to Syrian Damascus. The Nabataean king Aretas IV (9 B.C.-A.D. 40) appointed an ethnarch of Damascus, who plotted to arrest Paul when the apostle escaped from the city by a basket let over the wall. The Nabataeans were ingenious. They built dams, reservoirs, and aqueducts at the rock city of Sela, NW of Buseirah, known in the Bible as Bozrah (Isa. 63:1). M.F.U.

NABONI'DUS (nab-o-ni'dus). The last ruler of the Neo-Babylonian Empire (556–539 B.C.), he is called Nabunaid in the cuneiform records. His son Belshazzar, who figures prominently in Dan. 5, was associated with him legally from his third regnal year to the capture of Babylon by Cyrus the Great, founder of the Persian Empire (539 B.C.). He was the last Babylonian ruler to repair the ziggurat of the moon god Sin at Ur. One of his daughters was a devotee of the moon god temple at Ur. No Babylonian document actually affirms that Nabunaid's son Belshazzar was present at the fall of Babylon, yet there is no positive evidence against his participation in these events. Indeed, "of all known Babylonian records dealing with the situation at the close of the Neo-Babylonian Empire, the fifth chapter of Daniel ranks next to cuneiform literature in accuracy so far as outstanding events are concerned" (R. P. Dougherty, Nabonidus and Belshazzar [1929], p. 200). Joseph Free (Archaeology and Bible History [1950], p. 235) says: "The matter concerning Belshazzar, far from being an error in the Scriptures, is one of the many striking confirmations of the Word of God which have been demonstrated by archaeology." NABOPOLAS'SAR (na-bō-po-las'ar). A Chaldean who laid the foundations of the new Babylonian Empire by revolting against Assyria in 625 B.C. He was able to start reconstruction of the city of Babylon. In 612 B.C., in alliance with Cyaxares the Mede and the Scythians he took Nineveh, the Assyrian capital (cf. Nah. 3:1–3). Nabopolassar was Nebuchadnezzar II's father, and the son succeeded to the royal power after the battle of Carchemish, when Egypt was defeated (605 B.C.). M.F.U.

NA'BOTH (nā'both; cf. Arab. nabata, to "sprout, grow," hence probably "a sprout"). An Israelite of Jezreel and the owner of a small portion of ground (2 Kings 9:25–26) that lay on the eastern slope of the hill of Jezreel. He also had a vineyard (1 Kings 21:1), the location of which is not certain. The royal palace of Ahab was close to the city wall at Jezreel. According to both texts, it immediately adjoined the vineyard, and it thus became an object of desire to the king, who offered either an equivalent in money or another vineyard in exchange. Naboth, in the independent spirit of a Jewish landholder, refused. "The Lord forbid me that I should give you the inheritance of my fathers." Ahab was cowed by this reply; but the proud spirit of Jezebel was roused. She took the matter into her own hands. She wrote letters in Ahab's name to the elders and nobles of Jezreel, directing them to proclaim a fast and place Naboth at the head of the services. Two men of worthless character accused him of having "cursed God and the king," and he and his children (cf. 2 Kings 9:26) were stoned to death. Jezebel then informed Ahab of the death of Naboth, whereupon he took possession of the land. The perpetration of this crime brought upon Ahab and Jezebel the severest punishment (1 Kings 21), about 853 B.C.

NA'CHON. See Na'con.

NA'CHOR. See Nahor.

NA'CON (nā'kon; "prepared"). A name for the threshing floor near which Uzzah was slain (2 Sam. 6:6; "Nachon," KJV). It is uncertain whether this is the name of the owner or merely an epithet applied to it, i.e., the prepared floor. In 1 Chron. 13:9 it is called the "threshing floor of Chidon,” which is supposed by some to be another name of the owner. Eventually it was known by the name of Perez-uzzah (2 Sam. 6:8).

NA'DAB (nā'dab; “spontaneous, liberal”).

1. The eldest son of Aaron and Elisheba (Ex. 6:23; Num. 3:2). He, his father and brother, and seventy old men of Israel were led out from the midst of the assembled people (Ex. 24:1) and were commanded to stay and worship God “at a distance,” below the lofty summit of Sinai, where Moses alone was to come near to the Lord, c. 1439 B.C. Nadab and his brothers Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar were anointed, with their father, to be priests of Jehovah (28:1). He and Abihu, in offering incense, kindled it with “strange” fire, that is, fire not taken from that which burned perpetually on the altar (cf. Lev. 6:13) and for this offense were struck dead before the sanctuary by fire from the Lord (10:1–2; Num. 3:4; 26:61). On this occasion, as if to mark more decidedly the divine displeasure, Aaron and his surviving sons were forbidden to observe the usual mourning ceremonies for the dead. It seems likely from the injunction (Lev. 10:9–10) that the brothers were in a state of intoxication when they committed the offense.

2. King Jeroboam's son, who succeeded to the throne of Israel, about 909 B.C., and reigned two years (1 Kings 15:25–31). He followed the idolatrous policy of his father (cf. 15:3 and 12:30). At the siege of Gibbethon a conspiracy broke out in the midst of the army, and the king was slain by Baasha, a man of Issachar.

3. A son of Shammai (1 Chron. 2:28), of the tribe of Judah, and father of two sons (v. 30).

4. A son of Jeiel, the “father” (founder) of Gibeon (1 Chron. 8:29–30; 9:35–36), of the tribe of Benjamin.

NAG'GAI (nag'ī). An ancestor of Jesus in the maternal line, the son of Maath and father of Hesli (Luke 3:25; “Nag'ge,” KJV).

NAG'GE. See Naggai.

NA'HALAL (na'ha-lal; “pasture”). A city in Zebulun on the border of Issachar (Josh. 19:15; “Nahallal,” KJV), but inhabited by Canaanites tributary to Israel (Judg. 1:30; “Nahalol,” KJV). It was given, with its pasture lands, to the Merari family of Levites (Josh. 21:35). It is evidently modern Tel en-Nahl, S of Acre.

NAHA'LIEL (na-hā'li-el; “wadi” or “torrent, valley of God”). One of the encampments of Israel when in the wilderness (Num. 21:19), between Mattanah and Bamoth. It was near Pisgah, north of Arnon. Its exact location is conjectural.

NAHALLAL. See Na'halal.

NA'HALOL (nā'ha-lol). Another form (Judg. 1:30) of Nahalal (which see).

NA'HAM (nā'ham; “solace, consolation”). A brother of the wife of Hodiah; Hodiah's sons were Keila the Garmite and Eshtemoa the Maacathite (1 Chron. 4:19, NASB). Both the KJV and NASB readings at this point are difficult; but the NASB and NIV, which indicate that Hodiah is a man, are probably the more accurate.

NAHAMA'NI (na-ha-ma'ni; “compassionate”). A leading man among those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:7), about 445 B.C.

NA'HARAI (nā'ha-rī; “snorting”). The Beerothite, one of David's mighty men and the armor bearer of Joab (1 Chron. 11:39; 2 Sam. 23:37), about 975 B.C.

NA'HASH (nā'hash; "serpent").

1. "Nahash the Ammonite," king of Ammon at the foundation of the monarchy in Israel, c. 1020 B.C. He was directing an assault against Jabesh-gilead, and when the inhabitants asked him to make a treaty with them he dictated the cruel alternative of the loss of their right eyes or slavery, arousing the swift wrath of Saul and causing the destruction of the Ammonite force (1 Sam. 11:1–11). He is probably the same as Nahash the father of Hanun, who had rendered David some special and valuable service, which David was anxious for an opportunity of requiting (2 Sam. 10:2).

2. A person mentioned only once (2 Sam. 17:25), in stating the parentage of Amasa, the commander in chief of Absalom's army. Amasa is there said to have been the son of a certain Ithra by Abigail "the daughter of Nahash, sister to Zeruiah." By the genealogy of 1 Chron. 2:16 it appears that Zeruiah and Abigail were sisters of David and the other children of Jesse. The question then arises, How could Abigail have been at the same time daughter of Nahash and sister to the children of Jesse? To this three answers may be given: (a) The universal tradition of the rabbis, that Nahash and Jesse were identical. (b) The explanation first put forth by Stanley, that Nahash was the king of the Ammonites and that the same woman had first been his wife or concubine—in which capacity she had given birth to Abigail and Zeruiah—and afterward wife to Jesse and the mother of his children. (c) A third possible explanation is that Nahash was the name not of Jesse, nor of a former husband of his wife, but of his wife herself (Smith, Bib. Dict., s.v.).

NA'HATH (nā'hath; "rest, quiet").

1. One of the chiefs in the land of Edom, eldest son of Reuel, the son of Esau (Gen. 36:13, 17; 1 Chron. 1:37).

2. A Kohathite Levite, son of Zophai (1 Chron. 6:26). He is the same as Toah (v. 34) and Tohu (1 Sam. 1:1) and was an ancestor of Samuel.

3. A Levite in the reign of Hezekiah and an overseer of the sacred offerings in the Temple (2 Chron. 31:13).

NAH'BI (nā'bi; "concealed, hidden"). The son of Vophsi, a Naphtalite; he was one of the twelve spies (Num. 13:14), c. 1441 B.C.

NA'HOR (nā'hor; "snorting, snoring"; sometimes ìNa'chor," KJV).

1. The son of Serug, father of Terah, and Abraham's grandfather (Gen. 11:22–24; Luke 3:34–35). He lived 148 years, before 2200 B.C.

2. Grandson of the preceding, a son of Terah and brother of Abraham (Gen. 11:26; Josh. 24:2), about 2200 B.C. He married Milcah, his brother Haran's daughter, by whom he had eight children (Gen. 11:29; 22:20–23), and had as concubine Reumah, who bore him four children (v. 24). When Abraham and Lot migrated to Canaan Nahor remained in Haran, where his descendants were certainly living two generations later (24:10; 29:5). It was to the family descended from Nahor and Milcah that Abraham and Rebekah in turn had recourse for wives for their sons. The city of Nahor (24:10) is frequently mentioned in the Mari Letters of the eighteenth century B.C., when it was ruled by an Amorite prince. It also is named in the Middle Assyrian documents. It was situated below Haran in the Balikh Valley of Upper Mesopotamia.

NAH'SHON (nā'shon). The son of Amminadab and leader of Judah when first numbered in the desert (Ex. 6:23, "Naashon," KJV; Num. 1:7; 1 Chron. 2:10–11), 1439 B.C. His sister Elisheba was wife to Aaron (Ex. 6:23), and his son Salmon married Rahab after the taking of Jericho (Matt. 1:4–5, "Naashon," KJV). In the encampment (Num. 2:3), in the offering of the princes (7:12, 17), and in the order of the march (10–14), the first place is assigned to him as captain of Judah's host. We have no further particulars of his life, but we know that he died in the wilderness (26:64–65). His name occurs in Matt. 1:4; Luke 3:32 (in both references, “Naasson,” KJV), in the genealogy of Christ, where his lineage is evidently copied from Ruth 4:18–20; 1 Chron. 2:10–12.

NA’HUM (nā’hum; “compassionate”).

1. The seventh of the minor prophets. Of himself little is known. The book is titled simply “The book of the vision of Nahum the Elkoshite” (1:1). The site of the village is disputed. According to Jerome, it was in Galilee, and only insignificant ruins remained in his day. Toward the end of the sixteenth century the idea arose that Nahum was born at Alkosh, a town near Mosul, where a modern tomb is also pointed out as the place of his burial.

2. The son of Hesli and father of Amos, in the maternal ancestry of Christ (Luke 3:25; “Naum,” KJV). He is probably the same as Johanan, the son of Elioenai (1 Chron. 3:24).

NAHUM, BOOK OF. One of the books of the minor prophets. Nahum was an accomplished poet who devoted his great talent to a moving description of the destruction of Nineveh, the mighty capital of the Assyrian Empire. He foresees in this a manifestation of God’s punitive justice. The book stands seventh in the order of the minor prophets. Nahum’s prophetic ministry occurred between the conquest of No-Amon (Thebes) in Egypt (3:8), regarded as a past event, one that occurred in 661 B.C. under Ashurbanipal, and the destruction of Nineveh in 612 B.C. The prophet confines himself to one theme, the destruction of Nineveh, “the bloody city” (3:1).

Outline.

- I. An ode to God’s majesty (1:1–2:2)
 - A. Superscription (1:1)
 - B. God’s vengeance (1:2–11)
 - C. Judah’s restoration (1:12–2:2)
- II. An ode on Nineveh’s destruction (2:3–3:19)
 - A. The prophecy of Nineveh’s fall (2:3–13)
 - B. The cause of Nineveh’s fall (3:1–19)

Subject. Nahum’s preview of Nineveh’s destruction (chaps. 2–3) foresees the crash of the Assyrian Empire. In 612 B.C. Cyaxares the Mede in league with Nabopolassar of Babylon commenced the siege. The terrifying aspect of Nineveh’s fall is depicted as a just recompense of the powerful and cruel city. Nahum was a seventh-century prophet who lived at the same time as Zephaniah, Habakkuk, and Jeremiah. In the destruction of Nineveh, Nahum sees the punishment of the horrible cruelty of the Assyrian world power.

Authorship. Since the latter part of the nineteenth century critics have customarily denied 1:2–2:2 in substance to Nahum. Nahum 1:2–10 is regarded as the remnant of a postexilic acrostic poem that was later prefixed to Nahum’s prophetic oracle concerning Nineveh. Robert Pfeiffer considers chaps. 2:3–3:19 to be Nahum’s triumphal ode and the intervening material (1:11–2:12) has in part a redactional and in part an original section of the poem. The redactional portion was allegedly inserted about 300 B.C. In characteristic negative fashion, Pfeiffer denies the prophetic character of the book and avers that Nahum’s poem on the fall of Nineveh was erroneously viewed as a prophecy and preserved as a result of this misapprehension. An example of critical subjectivity, Pfeiffer’s view is to be rejected. If the introductory song was considered written by a redactor, why could it not have been originally written by Nahum? The acrostic idea is based on violent emendations and upon the assumption that the redactor wrote it from a faulty memory. If the acrostic arrangement could be proved, the question still remains, Why refuse to attribute it to Nahum?

NAIL. The translation of a number of words in the original languages; the English term is used in several ways.

1. An ordinary peg, or a tent peg (Heb. yātēd). Nail appears in this sense only in the KJV; it is replaced in the NASB and NIV by peg (which see).

2. Ordinary and ornamental nails (Heb. masmēr). Those mentioned in 1 Chron. 22:3 and 2 Chron. 3:9 were partly for pivots upon which the folding doors turned, partly in the construction of the doors. Those used for fastening the gold plates upon the planks were also probably of gold.

Figurative. In the proverb “The words of wise men are like goads, and masters of these collections are like goads, and masters of these collections are like well-driven nails” (Eccles. 12:11), we are taught that truth sinks deeply into the mind as a nail well pointed does when driven into the wall. In a collection of 206 Oriental proverbs, made by Lydia Einsler and published in the Journal of the German Palestine Society 19, no. 2, is the following, “‘She now has a house and nail in the wall,’ referring to a woman who was of a low station socially but had attained a higher. It was often used of a poor girl who had made a good marriage. The nail in the wall is typical of something firm and strong, able to support heavy burdens.”

Nails are mentioned in the accounts of the crucifixion (John 20:25; Col. 2:14).

3. Nail of the finger (Heb. šipporēn; Deut. 21:12). Like cutting the hair, the paring of the nails—both signs of purification—was a symbol of a slave woman passing out of slavery and being received into fellowship with the covenant nation.

In Jeremiah 17:1, “stylus” (“tool,” NIV) is the rendering of the same Heb. term and means the “point” of a stylus or metal pin.

4. Claws of a bird or beast. In Dan. 4:33 Nebuchadnezzar’s nails (Aram. ṭpar) are said to have grown like the claws of a bird; the nails (KJV), or claws (NASB), of the fourth beast are mentioned in 7:19. This use of claws is distinct from Heb. parsâ, “hoof,” NASB; but variously “claws” or “hoof,” KJV (e.g., Deut. 14:6, where parsâ is both “claws” and “hoof”). See Claws; Hoof.

NA'IN (nā'in; “pleasantness, beauty”). The city at the gate of which Jesus raised the widow’s son to life (Luke 7:11–15). Robinson found a hamlet named Neïn, six miles SW of Nazareth, standing on a bleak, rocky slope of the northern descending slope of Jebel ed-Duh (the “hill of Moreh” of Scripture) in the Valley of Jezreel. In this locality Eusebius and Jerome place the city of Nain.

NA'IOTH (nā'oth; “dwellings”). Or, more fully, “Naioth in Ramah,” the place in which Samuel and David took refuge after the latter’s escape from Saul (1 Sam. 19:18). Saul followed them there after having sent three companies of men to take David. When he came to Secu, near Ramah, the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, so that he went along prophesying until he came to Naioth; there he took off his clothes and prophesied before Samuel, lying upon the ground all day and night (vv. 20–24). Keil and Delitzsch (Com.) believe Naioth to be a proper name applied to the common dwelling of the pupils of the prophets, who had assembled around Samuel in the neighborhood of Ramah.

NAKED (Heb. erwâ, “nudity”; Gk. gumnos). Absolute nakedness (Job 1:21; Eccles. 5:15; Amos 2:16; Mic. 1:8), but elsewhere in the sense of ragged, poorly clad (Isa. 58:7; Matt.

25:36). In John 21:7 the meaning is “clad in the undergarment only” (the outer garment being cast aside).

Figurative. “Naked” is used figuratively to signify stripped of resources, disarmed; thus “I have stripped Esau bare” (Jer. 49:10) signifies the destruction of Edom. The “nakedness of a land” (Gen. 42:9, KJV) signifies the weak and ruined parts of it where the country lies most open and exposed to danger. “Naked” is also used for discovered, made manifest (Job 26:6; cf. Heb. 4:13). In Ezek. 16:36–39 nakedness symbolizes the stripping from one of his righteousness through idolatry.

NAMES (Heb. shēm; Gk. onoma). Names are designed to distinguish objects and originally expressed the distinct impressions that objects made upon one or the special relations in which they stood to the person. Thus God brought the beasts to Adam, and from the impression they made upon him he assigned names to them (Gen. 2:19). Some names were given prophetically, such as the name of Jesus, the Savior (Matt. 1:21). Often the name of a natural object was given to a child, such as Jonah (dove), Tamar (palm tree), and Tabitha (gazelle). Sometimes a name preserved the memory of a national event, such as Ichabod (1 Sam. 4:21). From a comparison of the roots of many names with the same roots in the cognate dialects it is evident Heb. was in early days much more closely allied to Arab. than when it became a literary tongue. Much use might be made of the study of Heb. proper names for the better understanding of the history of that people.

Play On. The Israelites were fond of playing on names. The name to them was a sign of something quite outward. Hence names rarely became hereditary in Heb.; they still retained their significance, being proper personal names, seldom passing into the unmeaning surname. They generally expressed some personal characteristic, some incident connected with the birth, some hope or wish or prayer of the parent; and henceforth the child embodied it, and for the parents’ sake felt it like a personal vow and made his life an effort to realize it. This tendency to play on names and find analogies or contrasts in them is seen throughout the Bible (see Ruth 1:20; 1 Sam. 25:3, 25). So we have “Dan [judge] shall judge his people” (Gen. 49:16) and many other instances.

Personal Names. These may be divided into two classes: those given at birth and those imposed in later life.

Those given at birth. At such times the slightest event was considered to be of importance—a chance word, a sly intimation by the gossip at the bedside, a pious or hopeful ejaculation by the mother; and, where names were sought for, any well-omened word was hastily seized and attached to the newcomer. Sometimes the name would express the time of birth, e.g., Shaharaim (the “dawn”), Hodesh (the “new moon”); sometimes the place, as Zerubbabel (“born in Babylon”). The condition of the mother is often indicated; thus Rachel dying in childbirth named her son Ben-oni (“son of my pain”), whereas Leah (“exhausted”) and Mahli (“sick”) are names that hint of much weakness, if not death. Sometimes the name indicates a peculiarity of the child, such as Esau (“hairy”), Edom (“red”), Korah (“bald”). Or the feeling of the parent found expression—Eve called her firstborn Cain (“acquisition”), but she came to know that a mother’s feelings are made up more of sadness than of joy, and she called her second son Abel (“vanity”). The strong affection of Hebrew women for their children is sometimes shown in the names they gave them, e.g., Adah (“ornament”), Peninnah (“pearl”), Rachel (“dove”), Susanna (“lilies”), etc. Religious names were frequently given, the most simple being expressive of thanks to God for the gift of a child, such as Mahalalel (“praise to God”), and of wonder at God’s liberality, such as Zabdiel (“bountifully given”) and Zechariah (“God has remembered”). A name may express some great longing of the parent. Rachel named her first son Joseph (“adding,” i.e., may God add to me another child). A name may also express resignation and trust, such as Elieonai (“toward Jehovah are my eyes”). The name was generally given by the parents, but sometimes a number of their kinsmen and friends would agree in bestowing one (Ruth 4:17; Luke 1:59).

Change of name. Often the name given at birth was changed for a new one, or a new one was added to the original name and gradually took its place. Thus Abram’s name was changed to Abraham (which see) when he renewed his covenant with Jehovah (Gen. 17:5); Jacob (the “supplanter”) became Israel (“prince”) after his successful struggle with the angel (32:28). Princes often changed their names on their accession to the throne (2 Kings 23:34; 24:17). This was also done in the case of private persons on entering upon public duties of importance (Num. 13:16; cf. John 1:42; Acts 4:36). So the prophet Nathan, on assuming the charge of Solomon’s education, gave him the name Jedidiah (2 Sam. 12:25). Children frequently received names expressive of relationship such as Abimelech (“father of the king”), or one of the several divine names is coupled in the same manner with another element, such as Nathanael, with the divine name El, or Jonathan, with the divine name Jehovah (contracted Jo) and the verb gave. The word El enters early in the composition of names, whereas those compounded with the name Jehovah do not appear until the Mosaic era; and not until the time of Samuel are names compounded with this name of God common.

Figurative. The name in Heb. is sometimes used to signify the collected attributes or characteristics of the object named. This is particularly the case with the divine name (Ex. 34:5–6). Our Lord says, “I manifested Thy name,” etc. (John 17:6), where name embraces the whole divine nature revealed by the Son. The expression “name of God” indicates the entire administration of God by which He reveals Himself and His attributes to men; the glory and power of God displayed in nature (Ps. 8:1); God’s revelation of Himself to His people (Zech. 10:12); and when God announces His mighty presence it is said, “Thy name is near” (Ps. 75:1). In the NT the name of Christ refers to all that Jesus is to men (Luke 24:47; Acts 9:15); to “believe in His name” (John 1:12), “there is no other name under heaven ... by which we must be saved” (Acts 4:12), “life in His name” (John 20:31) all refer to the saving and life-giving power in Christ, which is communicated to the believer. The expression “let everyone who names the name of the Lord” (2 Tim. 2:19) means everyone who acknowledges Him to be what His name means, the Lord.

NAO MI (nā-ō’mi; “my pleasantness, delight”). A woman of Bethlehem, in the days of the judges, whose history is interwoven with that of her daughter-in-law Ruth (Ruth 1–4), about 1322–1312 B.C. Her husband’s name was Elimelech, and her two sons were Mahlon and Chilion. With them, because of a famine in her own country, she went to Moab, where they died. Returning to her native land, she was accompanied by Ruth, who became the wife of Boaz. Upon her return she replied to those asking her, “Is this Naomi?” “Do not call me Naomi; call me Mara, for the Almighty has dealt very bitterly with me” (1:19–20).

NA PHISH (nā’fish). The eleventh son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chron. 1:31). The tribe descended from Nodab was subdued by the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh, when “they made war against the Hagrites, Jetur, Naphish, and Nodab” (1 Chron. 5:19). The tribe is not found again in the sacred records, nor is it mentioned by later writers. It has not been identified.

NA'PHOTH (na'fōth). A town assigned to the tribe of Manasseh but located in the territory of Asher (Josh. 17:11). Called elsewhere Napthoth Dor (Josh. 11:2; 12:23; 1 Kings 4:11) because of its association with the coastal city or plain of Dor (which see).

NAPH'TALI (naf'ta-lī; “my wrestling”).

The sixth son of Jacob. Naphtali was the second son of Bilhah, Rachel's maid, and brother to Dan. Of the personal history of Naphtali we know nothing, as up to the time of Jacob's blessing the twelve patriarchs his name is mentioned only in the two public lists (Gen. 35:25; 46:24).

Numbers. When Israel went down into Egypt Naphtali had four sons (Gen. 46:24; 1 Chron. 7:13). While in Egypt Naphtali increased with wonderful rapidity, numbering at the first census 53,400 (Num. 1:43), ranking sixth. The number decreased during the wilderness journey, for at the second census the adult males amounted to only 45,400, ranking eighth (26:50).

Position. During the march through the wilderness Naphtali occupied a position on the N of the sacred tent with Dan and Asher (2:25–31).

Territory. In the apportionment of the land the lot of Naphtali was not drawn till the last one. Their portion lay at the northern angle of Palestine and was inclosed on three sides by that of other tribes—Zebulun (S), Asher (W), trans-Jordanic Manasseh (E).

Subsequent history. Naphtali had its share in the incursions and molestations by the surrounding pagans. One of these, apparently the severest struggle of all, fell with special violence on the N of the country, and the leader by whom the invasion was repelled—Barak, of Kedesh-naphtali—was the one great hero whom Naphtali is recorded to have produced (Judg. 4:6). Naphtali was also the first tribe captured by the Assyrians under Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings 15:29). But though the history of the tribe ends here, yet under the title of Galilee the district that they formerly occupied became in every way far more important than it had ever been before.

NAPHTALI, HILL COUNTRY OF. The mountainous district that formed the main part of the territory of Naphtali (Josh. 20:7), similar to that of Ephraim and Judah.

NAPH'TUHIM (naf'tū-him). A Mizraite nation or tribe, mentioned only as descendants of Noah (Gen. 10:13; 1 Chron. 1:11), and who probably settled at first, or when Gen. 5 was written, either in Egypt or immediately W of it.

NAPH'TUHITES. See Naphtuhim.

NAPKIN. See Handkerchief.

NARCIS'SUS (nar-sis'us; a well-known flower). A person at Rome to some of whose household (or friends) Paul sent salutation (Rom. 16:11). He cannot be the celebrated favorite of the Emperor Claudius, as that person was put to death before the epistle was written.

NA'THAN (nā'than; “He, i.e., God, has given”).

1. A son of David; one of the four who were born to him by Bath-Shua (Bathsheba; 1 Chron. 3:5; cf. 14:4 and 2 Sam. 5:14), about 987 B.C. Nathan appears to have taken no part in the events of his father's or his brother's reigns. To him are to be referred, probably, the words of Zech. 12:12. He appears as one of the forefathers of Mary in the genealogy of Luke (Luke 3:31).

2. The Hebrew prophet who lived in the reigns of David and Solomon. The first mention of him is in a consultation with David, in which he advises him to build the Temple (2 Sam.

7:2–3); but after a vision he informed David that he was not to carry out his intention (vv. 4–17), about 984 B.C.

About a year after David's sin with Bathsheba and the death of Uriah, Nathan comes forth to reprove him. The reason for this delay seems to be set forth by David in Ps. 32, where he describes the state of his heart during this period and the sufferings he endured while trying to conceal his crime. To insure success Nathan resorted to a parable of a rich man taking from a poor man his "one little ewe lamb." The parable was selected so that David could not suspect that it had reference to him and his sin. With all the greater shock, therefore, did the prophet's words "You are the man" come to the king (2 Sam. 12:1–15), about 977 B.C. At the birth of Solomon, Nathan came to David, according to Jehovah's instructions, and named the child Jedidiah, because "the Lord loved him" (vv. 24–25).

In the last years of David, Nathan, with Bathsheba, secured the succession of Solomon (1 Kings 1:11–30), and at the king's request assisted at his inauguration (vv. 32–38, 45), about 960 B.C. He assisted David by his advice when he reorganized the public worship (2 Chron. 29:25). His son Zabud succeeded him as the "king's friend," and another son, Azariah, was "over the deputies" in Solomon's time (1 Kings 4:5). He left two works behind him—the Acts of David (1 Chron. 29:29) and the Acts of Solomon (2 Chron. 9:29). The last of these may have been incomplete, as we cannot be sure that he outlived Solomon. His grave is shown at Halhul, near Hebron.

3. An inhabitant of Zobah in Syria, and the father of Igal, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:36), about 984 B.C. In 1 Chron. 11:38 it is given as Joel, the brother of Nathan.

4. A descendant of Judah, being the son of Attai and father of Zabad (1 Chron. 2:36).

5. One of the leading Jews who were sent by Ezra from his encampment at the river Ahava to the Jews' colony at Casiphia, to obtain "ministers ... for the house of our God" (Ezra 8:15–17), about 457 B.C. He is perhaps the same as the Nathan who put away his Gentile wife (10:39).

NATHAN' AEL (na-than'ā-el; Gk. from Heb. "God has given"). A disciple of our Lord, of whose life we have no particulars save the references in John's gospel. It appears that after Jesus was proclaimed by John the Baptist to be the Lamb of God, He went to Galilee. Having called Philip to follow him, the latter hastened to Nathanael to inform him that the Messiah had appeared. Nathanael expressed his distrust that any good could come from so small and insignificant a place as Nazareth. He accompanied Philip, however, and upon his approach was saluted by Jesus as "an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile." This elicited the inquiry from Nathanael as to how he had become known to Jesus. The answer, "Before Philip called you, when you were under the fig tree, I saw you," satisfied him that Jesus was more than man, and "Nathanael answered Him, 'Rabbi, You are the Son of God; You are the King of Israel'" (John 1:43–51), A.D. 25. We meet with the name of Nathanael only once more, and then simply as one of a small company of disciples at the Sea of Tiberias to whom Jesus showed Himself after His resurrection (21:2). From this reference we learn that Nathanael was a native of Cana of Galilee. "It is very commonly believed that Nathanael and Bartholomew are the same person. The evidence for that belief is as follows: John, who twice mentions Nathanael, never introduces the name of Bartholomew at all. Matthew (10:3), Mark (3:18), and Luke (6:14) all speak of Bartholomew, but never of Nathanael. It may be, however, that Nathanael was the proper name and Bartholomew (son of Tholmai) the surname of the same disciple, just as Simon was called Bar-jona, and Joses, Barnabas. It was Philip who first brought Nathanael to Jesus, just as Andrew had brought his brother Simon; and Bartholomew is named by each of the first three evangelists immediately after Philip, while by Luke he is coupled with Philip precisely in the same way as Simon with his brother Andrew, and James with his brother John” (Smith, Bib. Dict., s.v.).

NA’THAN-MEL’ECH (nā’tan-mel’ek; “given of the king”). An official (i.e., eunuch) from before whose chamber at the Temple entrance King Josiah removed the horses dedicated to the sun by the king of Judah (2 Kings 23:11), 624 B.C.

NATIVITY OF CHRIST. See Christmas; Jesus.

NATURAL. The rendering of two Gk. words:

1. Phusikos (“produced by nature”), thus “the natural function” (Rom. 1:26–27) means that which is agreeable to nature. “Natural branches” (11:21, 24) are those growing naturally as opposed to ingrafted branches.

2. Psuchikos (“having the nature and characteristics of the principle of animal life”) that which men have in common with animals; thus the “natural body” (1 Cor. 15:44, 46), and equivalent to “flesh and blood” (v. 50). In the expression the “natural man does not accept the things of the Spirit” (2:14), the meaning refers to the unregenerate man governed by his sensuous nature with its subjection to appetite and passion.

NATURAL HISTORY. In dealing with the natural history of the Bible we should be governed by principles similar to those that we use in determining the allusions to nature in other ancient and most modern books. Nothing like a scientific classification of animals and plants can be detected in the Bible any more than in Homer or Horace or Shakespeare or Wordsworth. Natural objects are grouped with reference to their more obvious characteristics. Thus plants are divided into trees and herbs. Yet even in speaking of the knowledge of the vegetable kingdom that Solomon possessed, it is said that “he spoke of trees, from the cedar that is in Lebanon even to the hyssop that grows on the wall” (1 Kings 4:33). All plants are here characterized as trees. Solomon seems to have divided the animal kingdom into four classes, corresponding to the modern classes of the vertebrates—“he spoke also of animals and birds and creeping things and fish” (4:33). The last class doubtless includes most or all of the aquatic creatures not included in the modern class of fish, while “creeping things” includes reptiles and amphibians. It is plain that in this classification of Solomon no notice is taken of insects, coelenterata, etc. Worms were probably included among “creeping things.” Moses seems to have recognized a somewhat similar division. In the ceremonial law a classification into clean and unclean was based on the correlation of certain organs and functions, such as cleft hoofs and rumination, and in the case of aquatic creatures the presence or absence of fins and scales. According to this, water mollusks, coelenterata, and scaleless fish were in one class and other fish in a second. G.E.P.

NATURE.

1. (Gk. genesis; elsewhere, as Rom. 11:24; 1 Cor. 11:14, phusis, “genus”). The following are the uses of these terms: (a) the law of the natural or moral world (Rom. 11:24); (b) birth, origin, natural descent, e.g., “Jews by nature” or (NIV) “birth” (Gal. 2:15), “which by nature are no gods” (4:8); (c) genus, “kind”: “for every species (marg. “nature”) of beasts,” etc. (James 3:7).

G.E.P. George E. Post

marg. margin, marginal reading

2. (Gk. homoioopathēs), used in the expressions “men of the same nature as you” (Acts 14:15; “human like you,” NIV) and “a man with a nature like ours” (James 5:17; “a man just like us,” NIV) and meaning “suffering like” another, “of like feelings or affections.”

NAUGHTINESS. A KJV term appearing in 1 Sam. 17:28 (Heb. rôac, “badness”), Prov. 11:6 (Heb. hawwâ, “calamity,” “wickedness,” “evil desire”), and James 1:21 (Gk. kakia, “malice,” “ill will,” “vicious disposition”). The NASB and NIV translations are “wickedness” or “wicked” or “evil” (1 Sam. 17:28; James 1:21) and “greed” or “evil desires” (Prov. 11:6).
NA'UM. See Nahum.

NAVE (Heb. gab, “hollow” or “curved”). Sometimes defined as the hub of a wheel, the central part into which the spokes are inserted. The NASB and NIV, however, render the word as the rim of a wheel (1 Kings 7:33). Cf. Hub; Spoke; Rims.

NAVEL (Heb. shôr, “twisted,” as a string). The umbilical connection of the fetus with the mother (Ezek. 16:4), hence the abdomen where it is attached (Song of Sol. 7:2).

NAVY. See Fleet.

NAZ'ARENE (naz'a-rēn). An inhabitant or native of Nazareth, as Matt. 21:11; etc., and rendered “from Nazareth.” The term Nazarene (Gk. Nazōraios) occurs in Matt. 2:23; Mark 14:67; 16:6; Luke 24:19; Acts 2:22; 24:5; etc., and should have been rendered Nazoraean in English. At first it was applied to Jesus naturally and properly, as defining His residence. In the process of time its population became mixed with other peoples, its dialect rough, provincial, and strange, and its people seditious, so that they were held in little consideration. “The name of Nazarene was but another word for despised one. Hence, although no prophet has ever said anything of the word Nazarene, yet all those prophecies describing the Messiah as a despised one are fulfilled in His being a Nazarene. But we are convinced that something more than this is intended. The Heb. word for Nazareth was Netzer, a branch, or rather germ.... Nazareth is called a germ from its insignificance, yet it shall through Him, fill the earth with its importance” (Whedon, Com., ad loc.). The Christians were called “Nazarenes” (Acts 24:5), a contemptuous appellation, as the followers of Jesus, whose presumed descent from Nazareth stamped Him as a false Messiah.

NAZ'ARETH (naz'a-reth). The home of Joseph and Mary.

Location. Nazareth is situated on the most southern of the ranges of lower Galilee, about ten miles from the plain of Esdraelon. “You cannot see from Nazareth the surrounding country, for Nazareth lies in a basin; but the moment you climb to the edge of this basin ... what a view you have. Esdraelon lies before you, with its twenty battlefields—the scenes of Barak’s and of Gideon’s victories, of Saul’s and Josiah’s defeats, of the struggles for freedom in the glorious days of the Maccabees. There is Naboth’s vineyard and the place of Jehu’s revenge upon Jezebel; there Shunem and the house of Elisha; there Carmel and the place of Elijah’s sacrifice. To the E the valley of Jordan, with the long range of Gilead; to the W the radiance of the Great Sea.... You can see thirty miles in three directions” (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 432). Across the plain of Esdraelon emerged from the Samaritan hill the road from Jerusalem and Egypt. The name of the present city is en-Nâzira, the same as of old.

Scripture Mention. Nazareth is not mentioned in the OT or by Josephus. It was the home of Joseph and Mary (Luke 2:39); there the angel announced to Mary the birth of the Messiah (1:26–28), and there Joseph brought Mary and Jesus after the sojourn in Egypt (Matt. 2:19–23); there Jesus grew up to manhood (Luke 4:16) and taught in the synagogue (Matt. 13:54; Luke 4:16). His long and intimate association with this village made Him known as “Jesus of Nazareth” (18:37; John 1:45; etc.). The disrepute in which Nazareth stood (John 1:46) has generally been attributed to the Galileans’ lack of culture and rude dialect; but Nathanael, who asked, “Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?” was himself a Galilean. It would seem probable that “good” must be taken in an ethical sense and that the people of Nazareth had a bad name among their neighbors for irreligion or some laxity of morals.

Present Condition. Modern Nazareth is a bustling city with a population of some forty to fifty thousand, composed largely of Muslims and Christians. A Jewish community has settled on the heights above the city. Tourism is an especially important basis of the economy. The chief attraction of Nazareth is the new Church of the Annunciation (1966) built on the traditional site of Mary’s house, which is shown under the church. This church replaced an earlier one built in 1730, which in turn was constructed on the site of a twelfth-century Crusader church. Nearby is the Church of St. Joseph (consecrated in 1914), which stands on the traditional site of Joseph’s carpenter shop (shown below the church). Between the two churches is a Franciscan monastery. Not far away is Mary’s well, which has certainly provided water for the village from the first century to the present.

NAZIRITE. One of either sex who was bound by a vow of a peculiar kind to be set apart from others for the service of God. The obligation was either for life or for a defined time.

Name (Heb. nāzîr, and nzîr ʾēlōhîm, “Nazirite of God”). The term comes from the verb nāzar, to “separate,” and denotes in general one who is separated from certain things and unto others, and so distinguished from other persons and consecrated unto God (cf. Gen. 49:26; Deut. 33:16). According to others, the word nēzer, a “diadem,” contains the original idea of nāzar, which will then radically signify “to crown,” and the hair is regarded as a crown to the person. In accordance with this view the Nazirite is a “crowned one,” because “his separation to God is on his head” (Num. 6:7), evidently in allusion to the mass of uncut hair, which was considered an ornament (6:5; cf. 2 Sam. 14:25–26).

Origin. The origin of the custom is obscure. The prescriptions in Num. 6 presuppose it to have been an institution already in existence and merely regulate it so as to bring it into harmony with the whole Mosaic legislation. There are no conclusive analogies tending to show that the custom was derived from a heathen source, especially from Egypt.

The Nazirite Vow. This vow consisted in the person’s consecrating his life to God for a fixed period. The Mosaic law speaks of such consecration as being limited to a particular time that was probably fixed by the one making the vow; yet instances occur of children being dedicated by their parents before their birth to be Nazirites all their lives, e.g., Samson (Judg. 13:5, 12–14), Samuel (1 Sam. 1:11), and John the Baptist (Luke 1:15). According to the Mishna the usual time was thirty days, but double vows for sixty days and triple vows for a hundred days were sometimes made. The vow of the apostle Paul seems also to have been a kind of Nazirite vow, in fulfillment of which he shaved his head at Cenchrea (Acts 18:18), although according to the law (Num. 6:9, 18) and the Talmud the shaving of the head was required to be done at the door of the Temple.

The Law of the Nazirite (Num. 6:1–21). The Nazirite, during the term of his consecration, was bound to abstain from wine, grapes, every product of the vine, and from every kind of intoxicating drink. He was forbidden to cut his hair or to approach any dead body, even that of his nearest relative. If a Nazirite incurred defilement by accidentally touching a dead body, he had to undergo certain rites of purification and to recommence the full period of his consecration. There is nothing whatever said in the OT of the duration of the period of the vow of the Nazirite of days. When the period of the vow was fulfilled he was released from it and was required to offer a ewe lamb for a burnt offering, a ewe lamb for a sin offering, and a ram for a peace offering, with the usual accompaniments of peace offerings (Num. 6:13–20) and of the offering made at the consecration of priests (Ex. 29:2; Num. 6:15), “unleavened bread and unleavened cakes mixed with oil, and unleavened wafers spread with oil.” He also brought a meat offering and a drink offering, which appear to have been presented by themselves as a distinct act of service (v. 17). He was to cut off his “dedicated head of hair” (i.e., the hair that had grown during the period of his consecration) at the door of the Tabernacle and to put it into the fire under the sacrifice on the altar. The priest then placed upon his hands the boiled left shoulder of the ram, with one of the unleavened cakes and one of the wafers, and then took them again and waved them for a wave offering. These, as well as the breast and the heave, or right, shoulder (to which he was entitled in the case of ordinary peace offerings, Lev. 7:32–34) were given to the priest. The Nazirite also gave him a present proportioned to his circumstances (Num. 6:21). From this the custom afterward grew up that, when poor persons took the Nazirite’s vow upon them, those who were better off defrayed the expenses of the sacrifices (cf. Acts 21:23–24). When all the service was concluded the late Nazirite was again at liberty to drink wine (Num. 6:20).

Meaning of the Vow. As the name means, it was an act of consecrating oneself to Jehovah (Num. 6:2), negatively “by renouncing the world with its pleasures—that are so unfavorable to sanctification—and all its defiling influences”; and positively, by giving a certain complexion to the life as being specifically devoted to the Lord. Consequently, the Nazirite was “holy to the Lord” (v. 8). Abstinence from the fruit of the vine was meant not merely to secure the sobriety that is necessary to qualify one for the service of the Lord but to serve as a symbol of the renunciation of those weaknesses of the flesh that tend to endanger a man’s sanctification.

The long, uncut hair of the Nazirite was the symbol of strength and abundant vitality (see 2 Sam. 14:25–26) and was worn in honor of the Lord as a sign that he belonged to the Lord and dedicated himself to His service with all his vital powers. Then, too, a luxurious growth of long hair was looked upon as imparting a somewhat handsome appearance, an ornament, and, in the case of the Nazirite, was the diadem of the head consecrated to God.

The time that the Nazirite vow lasted was not a lazy life, involving a withdrawal from the duties of citizenship, but it was perfectly reconcilable with the performance of all domestic and social duties, the burial of the dead alone excepted. “The position of the Nazirite, as Philo, Maimonides, and others clearly saw, was a condition of life consecrated to the Lord, resembling the sanctified relation in which the priests stood to Jehovah, and differing from the priesthood solely in the fact that it involved no official service at the sanctuary and was not based upon a divine calling and institution, but was undertaken spontaneously for a certain time and through a special vow. The object was simply the realization of the idea of a priestly life, with its purity and freedom from all contamination from everything connected with death and corruption, a self-surrender to God stretching beyond the deepest earthly ties. In this respect the Nazirite’s sanctification of life was a step toward the realization of the priestly character which had been set before the whole nation as its goal at the time of its first calling (Ex. 19:5); and although it was simply the performance of a vow, and therefore a work of perfect spontaneity, it was also a work of the Spirit of God which dwelt in the congregation of Israel, so that Amos could describe the raising up of Nazirites along with prophets as a special manifestation of divine grace” (K. & D., Com., ad loc.).

NE'AH (nē'a). A town of Zebulun, on the southern border of Rimmon (Josh. 19:13). As it is stated to have been not far from Rimmon, it lay perhaps at the modern site Nimrin, a little W of Kurn Hattin.

NEAP'OLIS (Gk. ne-apo-lis, “new city”). A place in northern Greece and a seaport town of Philippi, ten miles away. The modern city of more than fifty thousand inhabitants covers the site of the NT city; so there is little to see dating to the biblical period. Remains of a Roman aqueduct still stand. It was the place where Paul first landed in Europe (Acts 16:11) and the terminus of the great Egnatian Road. Its modern name is Kavalla.

NEARI'AH (nî-a-rî'a; “servant of Jehovah”).

1. One of the six sons of Shemaiah in the line of the royal family of Judah after the captivity (1 Chron. 3:22–23). Some identify him with Naggai (which see).

2. A son of Ishi and one of the captains of the five hundred Simeonites who, in the days of Hezekiah, drove out the Amalekites from Mt. Seir (1 Chron. 4:42), about 715 B.C.

NE'BAI (ne'bî). A family of the heads of the people who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:19), 445 B.C.

NEBA'JOTH (ne-bî'oth; iNeba'joth,” KJV). The eldest son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:13; 1 Chron. 1:29) and father of a pastoral tribe named after him (Isa. 60:7; cf. Gen. 17:20). This Arabian clan was a neighbor to the people of Kedar, and its name occurs in the records of Ashurbanipal (669–626 B.C.). They seem to be the forerunners of the later Nabataeans (which see).

NEBA'JOTH. See Neba'ioth.

NEBAL'LAT (ne-bal'at). A place occupied by the Benjamites after the captivity (Neh. 11:34). Identified with Beit Nabāla, four miles NE of Lydda.

NE'BAT (nî-bat; “He [i.e., God] has regarded”). The father of Jeroboam, whose name is only preserved in connection with that of his distinguished son (1 Kings 11:26; 12:2, 15; etc.), before 934 B.C. He is described as an Ephraimite of Zereda.

NE'BO (nê'bo). As a geographical name may signify an elevated place, answering to Arabic naba'a (“to be high”), or refer to a center of the worship of Nebo, a Babylonian deity.

1. A town E of Jordan, situated in the fertile country asked for by Reuben and Gad (Num. 32:3), taken possession of and rebuilt by Reuben (v. 38), although it does not occur in the catalogue of the towns of Reuben in the book of Joshua (Josh. 13:15–22), which may be because the Israelites gave it another name. Although rebuilt by the Reubenites (Num. 32:37–38; 33:47; 1 Chron. 5:8), it reverted to Moab (Moabite Stone, 14, see Moabite Stone). Its modern site is on or near Mt. Nebo.

2. The mountain from which Moses saw the Promised Land (Deut. 32:49; 34:1), and in a ravine of which he was buried (32:50; 34:6). It was the head or summit of Mt. Pisgah (which see), a portion of the general range of the “mountains of Abarim.” Josephus says of Abarim (Ant. 4.8.48) that it “is a very high mountain, situated over against Jericho, and one that affords a view of much of the excellent land of Canaan.” This is corroborated by Eusebius and Jerome. The mountains of Abarim are a mountain range forming the Moabite tableland, which slope off into the steppes of Moab.

3. A man whose fifty-two descendants are mentioned among those of Judah and Benjamin who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:29; Neh. 7:33). Seven of them put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:43).

4. A Babylonian god (Isa. 46:1). See Gods, False.

NE'BO-SAR'SEKIM. See Samgar-nebu.

NEBUCHADNEZ'ZAR (neb-ū-kad-nez'er; Akkad. Nabu-kudduriuṣur, "Nebo, defend the boundary"). The form of the name as commonly given is due to dissimilation, and in Heb. the name is more correctly represented in the form Nebuchadrezzar, than in the form Nebuchadnezzar. Nebuchadnezzar was the son of Nabopolassar and was in all probability of Chaldean race and not of pure Babylonian (see Babylonia). When the Assyrian power was tottering to its fall, the Chaldeans, who lived in the S near the Persian Gulf, saw an opportunity of again seizing power in the much coveted city of Babylon. The signs of decay were evident in the reign of Ashurbanipal (see Assyria), and Nabopolassar seized the throne in 625 as soon as Ashurbanipal had ceased to reign in Assyria. But Nabopolassar was not accounted king at once by the Assyrians and numerous conflicts must have occurred during his reign between the successors of Ashurbanipal and the new Chaldean king in Babylon. Nabopolassar followed the ancient Babylonian custom of building temples and attending to the internal affairs of his kingdom.

In the Field. Nabopolassar's son Nebuchadnezzar was destined to be his successor and was his representative in the field. He probably began his military service against the later Assyrian kings and soon achieved distinction. Toward the end of the reign of Nabopolassar, the fall of Nineveh became imminent, and the Babylonian king determined to gain not only his own complete independence of Assyria but also as much as possible of the former Assyrian possessions. He allied his own family to that of the Medes, who were threatening to overthrow Assyria, by marrying his son Nebuchadnezzar to the daughter of Cyaxares. This alliance, as well as the vigilance and ability of Nebuchadnezzar as a warrior, was completely successful. When the Medes delivered the final blow that forever ended the Assyrian commonwealth, they secured Nineveh and the northern and northwestern provinces of the Assyrian Empire, while Nabopolassar secured all of southern Assyria and as much of the vast western provinces as were still in Assyrian control. All this territory, however, was but loosely held together during the latter part of the Assyrian control, and much of it was already lost to Egypt.

Opposes Egypt. It was quite natural that Egypt should early seek to profit by the weakening of Assyrian power. Palestine and Syria had belonged to Egypt by right of conquest during the reign of Thutmose III, and as late as the days of Amenophis III and Amenophis IV the governors of Syrian cities were accustomed to address the Egyptian kings as their lords and even as their gods. When Neco II succeeded his father, Psammetichus I, as king of upper and lower Egypt, he promptly began the reconquest of Syria and Palestine. In 608 B.C. he left Egypt and marched up the seacoast, penetrating inland to the plain of Esdraelon at Megiddo. There Josiah, king of Judah, vainly opposed him and was killed (2 Kings 23:29). Neco was soon able to count himself master of the whole country. It was now his purpose to move eastward to the Euphrates and cross the great valley to seize what might fall to his share when the Assyrian Empire met its end. He reached Carchemish, on the Euphrates, in 605, and there was confronted by Nebuchadnezzar at the head of his father's armies. The battle that ensued was one of the greatest in all history, judged simply by its immediate historic results. Neco was utterly and disastrously defeated and fled homeward closely pursued by the victor. That one blow made Nebuchadnezzar the presumptive holder of all the valuable territory of Syria and Palestine. He pursued Neco to the borders of Egypt.

Becomes King. At that critical moment, 605 B.C., Nebuchadnezzar's father died at Babylon, and he had to return immediately to take over the government. Otherwise he would probably have invaded Egypt. Had he dared to do so his success would have been almost certain, and he and his father would have made in twenty years an empire as vast as that achieved by the Assyrians after centuries of relentless conflict. The first years of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar were devoted to the establishing and ordering of his rule in Babylonia. The warlike enterprises that follow he has unfortunately not described for us. Following the example of the earlier Babylonian kings, Nebuchadnezzar has left to us records almost exclusively of his building operations and proofs of his zeal in the worship of the gods and of care in conserving their sanctuaries. From the OT and from the classical historians we secure the necessary information for following his campaigns with reasonable fullness. The Egyptians had been defeated in their plan of securing by the sword possession of Syria and Palestine, but they had not given up the hope of attaining their desires in some other way. Apries, who is called Hophra (Egyptian Mah-ab-Rē) in the OT, was now king of Egypt, and he set himself to arrange rebellions in Palestine that should culminate in the loss of this territory to Nebuchadnezzar.

Western Campaign. Evidently in the first year of his reign Nebuchadnezzar led a force into Palestine and subdued the Jews, carrying off numerous captives (including Daniel, 2 Kings 24:1–9; Dan. 1:1–7). Then Zedekiah of Judah, in the first year of his reign (597), rebelled again, and Nebuchadnezzar invaded once more, taking additional captives (including Ezekiel, 2 Kings 24:10–20; Ezek. 1:1–3). Finally Nebuchadnezzar faced another rebellion and this time besieged Jerusalem (588–586) and destroyed it along with the Temple, bringing to an end the kingdom of Judah (2 Kings 25:1–21). In these acts of rebellion Edom, Moab, Tyre, Sidon, and Ammon had also joined, and these all were punished by Nebuchadnezzar. The punishment of Tyre was more difficult and less successful than that of the other partners. Nebuchadnezzar besieged it from 585 to 572 B.C. and finally destroyed the mainland city of Tyre. But the island city survived because the Babylonians had no navy with which to reduce it. Tyre continued to enjoy prosperity until finally wiped out by Alexander the Great in 332 B.C. The punishment of Egypt for inciting the Palestinian states was undertaken and successfully carried through in 568. Nebuchadnezzar himself has left us no account of this important campaign, but an Egyptian inscription proves that he marched the whole length of Egypt proper to Syene (the modern Aswân). As the direct result of this single campaign, Egypt became subject to Babylonia during the reign of Amasis II, who had dethroned Hophra and succeeded him on the throne. To hold the advantage thus gained Nebuchadnezzar had to invade Egypt again, and one of his own inscriptions mentions the sending of an expedition there in the thirty-seventh year of his reign. Nebuchadnezzar also carried on a war (Jer. 49:28–33) against the Arabs of Kedar, but we have no other account of it than that preserved by the OT. With this ends our knowledge of the warlike undertakings of Nebuchadnezzar. There is every reason to believe that he fought many a campaign of which we know nothing. He would not have been able to hold this great empire together without frequent recourse to the sword. By force he had achieved power and only by force would it have been successfully maintained. It is curious and interesting to notice that on at least one occasion Nebuchadnezzar played the part of peacemaker. When the Medes, who had overthrown Assyria, pushed westward, they came into conflict with the Lydians. On May 25, 585 B.C., during a fierce battle on the Halys, an eclipse of the sun separated the combatants. Nebuchadnezzar interposed and made peace among them. A selfish desire to prevent too great success of his former allies doubtless contributed to this undertaking, but the deed may be nevertheless accounted good.

Works of Peace. If we were to accept Nebuchadnezzar's own estimate of his life and work, we would conclude that he had little interest in his campaigns and that his real concern was the glory of Babylon and its gods. The chief concern of Nebuchadnezzar was for the great temple of Bel-Marduk at Babylon, known under the name E-sagila. This he rebuilt and greatly adorned and beautified. To the Nebo temple of E-zida at Borsippa he also gave unstinted means and time. Besides these two temples he carried on works of repair and construction in bewildering number and variety at Ur, Larsa, Sippar, Erech, and Kutha. The city of Babylon (see Babylon) he also greatly beautified and strengthened. In it he built new streets and greatly strengthened its walls, so that the city was deemed impregnable. The worldwide glory of Babylon owed more to Nebuchadnezzar than to any other man. After a prosperous and eventful reign of forty-three years (604–562 B.C.), Nebuchadnezzar died and was succeeded by his son, Evil-merodach (Amel-Marduk; cf. 2 Kings 25:27). Taking Nebuchadnezzar's reign as a whole, it may safely be regarded as one of the strongest as it was clearly one of the most glorious in all the long history of Babylon as a world center. A man of great force and decision of character, not severe in his dealings beyond the custom of his age, a man who could plan and execute great and daring movements, he may surely be regarded as one of antiquity's greatest men. Many insights into Nebuchadnezzar's character and culture are portrayed in Daniel 2–4, including his sinful pride and his humiliation and restoration by God.

Nebuchadnezzar and Archaeology. Nebuchadnezzar's Babylon was extensively excavated from 1899 to 1914 by Robert Koldewey and the Deutsche Orientgesellschaft (see Koldewey's, Das wieder erstehende Babylon, 4th ed., 1925). Among the tremendous complex of ruins was the great Ishtar Gate, beautifully decorated with a series of bulls and dragons in enameled, colored brick. (For further results see Babylon.) Archaeology has shown the complete suitability, albeit egocentricity, of Nebuchadnezzar's words recorded in Dan. 4:30: "Is this not Babylon the great, which I myself have built as a royal residence by the might of my power and for the glory of my majesty?" In fact, an extensive inscription, now in the British Museum, details the various construction projects of Nebuchadnezzar at Babylon.

NEBUCHADREZ'ZAR (neb-û-kad-rez'er). Another form of Nebuchadnezzar (which see).

NEBUSHAZ'BAN (neb-û-shaz'ban). A rab-saris (which see) or officer of the Babylonian occupation force who delivered Jeremiah from confinement and allowed him to return home (Jer. 39:13). The NIV calls him "a chief officer."

NEBUZARA DAN (neb-û-zar-a'dan; Akkad. Nābū-zēr-id-dina, "Nebo has given offspring"). The "captain of the bodyguard" (Jer. 39:10; etc.), a high officer in the court of Nebuchadnezzar, apparently the person next to the monarch. He appears not to have been present during the siege of Jerusalem, but as soon as the city was actually in the hands of the Babylonians he arrived, and from that moment everything was completely directed by him, 586 B.C. Only one act is referred directly to Nebuchadnezzar—the appointment of the governor or superintendent of the conquered district. All this Nebuzaradan seems to have carried out with wisdom and moderation. He appears to have left Judea for this time when he took down the chief people of Jerusalem to his master at Riblah (2 Kings 25:8–20). In four years he again appeared (Jer. 52:12). Nebuchadnezzar in his twenty-third year made a descent on the regions E of Jordan, including the Ammonites and the Moabites, who had escaped when Jerusalem was destroyed. From there he proceeded to Egypt, and, either on the way there or on the return, Nebuzaradan again passed through the country and carried off 745 more captives (52:30).

NECHO. See Neco.

NECK. This part of the human frame is used by the sacred writers with considerable variety and freedom in figurative expressions. Thus, "Your neck is like the tower of David built with rows of stones" (Song of Sol. 4:4), and "like a tower of ivory" (7:4), with reference to the graceful ornament that the neck is, especially to the female figure. "Who for my life risked their own necks" (Rom. 16:4) is a strong expression for hazarding one's life. "Neck" is also used to represent that part of the building at which the roof or gable rests upon the wall (Hab. 3:13). To "put your feet on the necks" (Josh. 10:24) is a usual expression in the East for triumphing over a fallen foe. A common reference was to a beast of burden, which bore upon his neck the yoke and thus became an emblem of man in relation to a true or false service (cf. Matt. 11:29). A stiff or hardened neck is a familiar expression for a rebellious spirit (Ps. 75:5, marg.; Prov. 29:1; Isa. 48:4, “your neck is an iron sinew,” i.e., inflexible; Acts 7:51). See Yoke.

NECKLACE (Heb. rābîd, “binding”). The word necklace is not found in the NASB, but in early times, as now, necklaces were common in the East. They were sometimes made of silver or gold (Ex. 35:22), sometimes of jewels or pearls strung on a ribbon (Song of Sol. 1:10), hanging to the breast or even to the girdle. To these were attached crescent ornaments (Judg. 8:21; Isa. 3:18). See Dress; Jewelry.

NE’CO (nî’ko; 2 Chron. 35:20, 22; 36:4; “Necho,” KJV). A name applied to one of the pharaohs (which see).

NECROMANCER (from Gk. nekros, “the dead,” and manteia, “divination”; Heb. dōrēsh el-hammētîm, “one who inquires of the dead”). In many ancient nations there were those who pretended to be able by incantations to call up the dead and consult with them on the mysteries of the present and future. The Mosaic law forbade consultation with the necromancer (Deut. 18:11). Another method of consulting the dead was by examining the viscera of one newly dead or slain, in order to draw out omens.

The most famous instance of necromancy in Scripture is Saul and the medium of Endor, recounted in 1 Sam. 28:1–25. It is an unequivocal divine condemnation of all traffic in occultism and a glaring exposé of the fraudulency of spiritism. This practice of consulting the dead, common among the heathen nations, was strictly forbidden to any Israelite. The reason is simple. It was a recourse to a medium who was under the control of a divining demon; in fact, the woman of Endor was identical with the modern spiritistic medium. She is called “a woman that hath a familiar spirit,” literally, “a woman controlled or mastered by a divining demon” (vv. 7–8, KJV). In the episode, the spirit of Samuel was actually brought back from the spirit world, as the circumstances of the account indisputably prove. However, the seer’s spirit was not brought back by the medium’s power but by divine power, to pronounce doom upon Saul and to expose the fraud of spiritism, its traffic in evil power, and its complete inconsistency with the worship of Israel’s God. Neither ancient nor modern spiritism can recall or have communion with the spirits of the departed dead, as the medium’s fear in the narrative shows (vv. 12–13). What spiritistic mediums can do, however, is to impersonate the spirits of the departed dead and give superhuman knowledge by reason of their superior powers as evil spirit beings. Necromancy is also discussed in the articles Magic; Familiar Spirit. See Merrill F. Unger, Biblical Demonology, 2d ed. (1953), pp. 143–64. M.F.U.

NEDABI’AH (ne-da-bî’yah). A son of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, about whom nothing else is known (1 Chron. 3:18).

NEEDLE (Gk. hraphis). This term occurs in Scripture only in proverb. “It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle,” etc. (Matt. 19:24; Mark 10:25; Luke 18:25). See Camel.

NEEDLEWORK. See Handicrafts: Embroiderer; Needlework; Weaving.

NEGEV (neg’ev). “The south,” the little-watered region situated S of Judea and, in the present-day, a part of the Israeli state. In the biblical era grazing was its principal industry (Gen. 20:14). The Negev is about 3,600 square miles in area and contains important biblical sites such as Kadesh-barnea and Beersheba. The modern boundaries of Israel are larger and taper down to the site of Ezion-geber on the Gulf of Aqabah. In 1959 Nelson Glueck completed his monumental archaeological survey of Transjordan, the Jordan Valley, and the Negev (Southern Palestine). The results of his detailed surface surveys in the Negev, begun in 1951, appear in Rivers in the Desert: A History of the Negev (1959). Compare also Glueck, "The Negev," in The Biblical Archaeologist 22 no. 4 (1959): 82–97.

NEGINOTH. (neg'î-nōth). A term appearing in the KJV of the titles of Pss. 4,6,54,67,76 and meaning "stringed instruments" (so NASB and NIV).

NEHEL'AMITE (ne-hel'a-mīt; "dreamed," only in Jer. 29:24, 31–32). A patronymic or patrial of unknown origin and significance, applied to the false prophet Shemaiah. No such name of person or place as Nehelam is known. The Targum gives the name as Helam. A place named Helam, between the Jordan and Euphrates, is mentioned in 2 Sam. 10:16–17. This may be identical with Ptolemy's Alamatha, W of the Euphrates and not far from Nicephorium and Thapsacus. Possibly the mention of "Nehelamite" contains a punning allusion to the dreams (hālōmîm) of the false prophets (see Jer. 23:25–28, 32, and other passages).

NEHEMI'AH (nē'he-mi'a; "Jehovah consoles").

1. The second named of "the people of the province ... whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away," and who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7), 536 B.C.

2. The son of Azbuk, official of Beth-zur, in the mountains of Judah, and one who was prominent in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:16), 445 B.C.

3. Governor of the Jews. The genealogy of Nehemiah is unknown, except that he was the son of Hacaliah (Neh. 1:1) and brother of Hanani (7:2; cf. 1:2). All that we know for certain of Nehemiah is found in the book bearing his name.

He first appears at Susa as cupbearer to King Artaxerxes Longimanus (Neh. 1:11–2:1), about 446 B.C. In that year he was informed of the deplorable condition of his countrymen in Judea, and determined to go to Jerusalem to endeavor to better their condition.

Three or four months later he presented his request to the king to be allowed to go and rebuild Jerusalem. His royal master granted his request and appointed him Tirshathá, "governor." Accompanied by a troop of cavalry and letters from the king to the different governors through whose provinces he was to pass, as well as to Asaph, the keeper of the king's forests (to supply him with timber), he started upon his journey, being under promise to return to Persia within a given time (2:1–10).

Nehemiah, without a moment's unnecessary delay, began the restoration of the city walls, which was accomplished in the wonderfully short time of fifty-two days (6:15), 444 B.C. In this he was opposed by Sanballat and Tobiah, who not only poured out a torrent of abuse and contempt upon all engaged in the work but actually made a conspiracy to fall upon the builders with an armed force and put a stop to the undertaking. The project was defeated by the vigilance and prudence of Nehemiah. This armed attitude was continued from that day forward (chap. 4). He also reformed abuses, redressed grievances (chap. 5), introduced law and order (chap. 7), and revived the worship of God (chap. 8). Various stratagems were then resorted to in order to get Nehemiah away from Jerusalem and, if possible, take his life. But that which most nearly succeeded was the attempt to bring him into suspicion with the king of Persia, as if Nehemiah intended to set himself up as an independent king as soon as the walls were completed. The artful letter of Sanballat so far wrought upon Artaxerxes that he issued a decree stopping the work until further orders (Ezra 4:21).

In these reforms Nehemiah enjoyed the cooperation of Ezra, who had preceded him to Jerusalem, and who is named as taking a prominent part in public affairs (Neh. 8:1, 9, 13; 12:36). Nehemiah refused to receive his lawful allowance as governor during the whole term of his office because of the people's poverty but entertained for twelve years, at his own cost, 150 Jews and welcomed any who returned from captivity (13:14–18).

Nehemiah, after twelve years' service, returned to Babylon (5:14; 13:6), 434 B.C. It is not known how long he remained there, but "after some time" he obtained permission to again visit Jerusalem, where his services were needed because of new abuses that had crept in. When he arrived, Nehemiah enforced the separation of the mixed multitude from Israel (13:1–3), expelled Tobiah the Ammonite from the Temple chamber (vv. 4–9), and made better arrangements for the support of the Temple service (vv. 10–14) and for the observance of the Sabbath (vv. 15–22). His last recorded act was an effort to put an end to mixed marriages, which led him to drive away a son of Joiada, the high priest, because he was son-in-law to Sanballat the Horonite (vv. 23–28). It is supposed that Nehemiah remained in Jerusalem until about 405 B.C., toward the close of the reign of Darius Nothus, mentioned in 12:22. The time and place of his death is unknown. To Nehemiah is credited the authorship of the book that bears his name.

Nehemiah's character seems almost without a blemish. He was a man of pure and disinterested patriotism, willing to leave a position of wealth, power, and influence in the first court of the world and share the sorrows of his countrymen. He was not only noble, high-minded, and of strict integrity, but he was also possessed of great humility, kindness, and princely hospitality. In nothing was he more remarkable than in his piety, walking before his God with singleness of eye, seeking divine blessing and cooperation in prayer, and returning thanks to him for all his successes.

NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF. A postexilic book taking its name from its main character and traditional author, said to be "the words of Nehemiah the son of Hacaliah" (Neh. 1:1). The book occurs in the third section of the Heb. canon and constitutes one of the historical books of that group.

Purpose. It is closely linked with Ezra and together with that book shows God's faithfulness in the restoration of His exiled people to their own land. God's purpose is seen to work through great monarchs of the Persian Empire such as Cyrus, Darius I the Great, and Artaxerxes. God is also seen to operate through the agency of His own anointed servants, such as Ezra, Nehemiah, Zerubbabel, Joshua, Haggai, and Zechariah. The book narrates the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem and the establishment of civil authority under Nehemiah as governor. The book of Nehemiah is more civil and secular than Ezra, but it also contains a priestly slant.

Date and Authority. Nehemiah is commonly regarded as the work of the so-called chronicler. This priest-historian is supposed to have written 1 and 2 Chronicles and the book of Ezra-Nehemiah long after the time of these leaders. The date is customarily put at the beginning of the Greek period, around 330 B.C. These arguments, however, are unsound. It is better to regard the book as belonging to the latter half of the fifth century B.C. Whether Ezra precedes Nehemiah or Nehemiah, Ezra is disputed by critics. Since Jewish tradition and the title of the book assign the authorship to Nehemiah, section 1:1–7:5 is to be looked upon as an excerpt from the author's memoirs, as the first person indicates. This material is inserted apparently without change. Other passages evidently taken from Nehemiah's memoirs are 11:1–2; 12:27–43; 13:4–31. The work also consists of earlier documents that were incorporated into the author's work, such as 7:6–73a. The remainder of the book is based upon historical sources.

Outline.

- I. Restoration of the walls (1:1–7:73)
 - A. The initial circumstances (1:1–2:20)
 - B. The actual construction (3:1–6:19)
 - C. The later census (7:1–73)
- II. Reformation of the faith (8:1–13:31)
 - A. The Covenant renewed (8:1–10:39)
 - B. The nation revived (11:1–13:13)
 - C. The violations remedied (13:14–31)

NE'HILOTH (ne'hi-lōth). The title of Ps. 5 (KJV); it means wind instruments. The NASB reads: “for flute accompaniment,” with a marg. note: “Or, according to a lower octave.” The NIV translates “for flutes.”

NE'HUM (ne'hum; “consoled,” i.e., by God). One of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:7), about 445 B.C.

NEHUSH'TA (ne-hush'ta; “bronze”). The daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem, wife of Jehoiakim, and mother of Jehoiachin, kings of Judah (2 Kings 24:8), about 616 B.C.

NEHUSH'TAN (ne-hush'tan; a piece of “brass,” bronze). The name given by King Hezekiah to the bronze serpent (which see) when he broke it into pieces because the people had made it an object of worship (2 Kings 18:4, see marg.).

NEI'EL (ne-i'el). A place mentioned as a landmark of Asher (Josh. 19:27), possibly Neah (v. 13). It has been associated with Khirbet Ya'hîn, about two miles N of Kabûl on the edge of the plain of Acre; at the S of the valley of Jiphtah-el.

NEIGH (Heb. šāhal, to “sound” clear, Jer. 8:16; 13:27; 50:11). The neighing of a horse, a sign of excessive wantonness; used figuratively of men: “each one neighing after his neighbor’s wife” (Jer. 5:8).

NEIGHBOR (Heb. rēac, “associate”; Gk. plēsion, “near”). Generally a person near, one connected by bonds of humanity, and whom natural regard would lead to treat with kindness and equity (Ex. 20:16–17; Deut. 5:20). The construction placed upon “neighbor” (Lev. 19:18) was that of friend as opposed to enemy; therefore, it was held that to hate one’s enemy was not forbidden by the law (Matt. 5:43). But Jesus, in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:29–37), taught that all the world were neighbors. Moreover, the Pharisees used the term neighbor in an exclusive sense, namely, one who observed the law in the strictest manner. They called themselves neighbors; therefore the question, “Who is my neighbor?”

NE'KEB. See Adami-nekeb.

NEKO'DA (ne-kō'da; “distinguished, speckled”).

One of the Temple servants whose descendants returned to Jerusalem after the captivity (Ezra 2:48; Neh. 7:50), 536 B.C. The sons of Nekoda were among those who went up after the captivity from Tel-melah, Tel-harsha, and other places, but they were unable to prove their descent from Israel (Ezra 2:60; Neh. 7:62).

NEM'UEL (nem'ū-el; or perhaps for Jemuel, “day of God”).

1. The first named son of Eliab, a Reubenite, and brother of Dathan and Abiram (Num. 26:9), about 1438 B.C.

2. The eldest son of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:24), from whom were descended the family of the Nemuelites (Num. 26:12). In Gen. 46:10 he is called Jemuel (which see).

NEM'UELITES (nem'ū-el-its; Num. 26:12). Descendants of Nemuel, no. 2 (which see), of the tribe of Simeon.

NE'PHEG (ne'feg).

1. One of the sons of Izhar, the son of Kohath (Ex. 6:21).

2. One of David's sons, born to him in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chron. 3:7; 14:6), after 1000 B.C.

NEPHEW, NEPHEWS. In the KJV the rendering of the second instance of the Heb. term bēn (normally “son”) in Judg. 12:14; of the Heb. term neked in Job 18:19; Isa. 14:22; and of the Gk. term ekgonon in 1 Tim. 5:4.

In the NASB and NIV nephew appears only in Gen. 12:5; 14:12 as the replacement for KJV brother's son. Elsewhere nephew (or nephews) is replaced by posterity or descendants (Job 18:19; Isa. 14:22), grandsons (Judg. 12:14), or grandchildren (1 Tim. 5:4), terms that fully reflect the Heb. and Gk. expressions.

NEPH'ILIM (nef'i-lim; Gen. 6:4; Num. 13:33). See also Giant. The Nephilim are considered by many to be giant demigods, the unnatural offspring of the “daughters of men” (mortal women) in cohabitation with the “sons of God” (angels; cf. Gen. 6:1–4). This utterly unnatural union, violating God's created order of being, was such a shocking abnormality as to necessitate the worldwide judgment of the Flood. Another view of the Nephilim is that they were particularly violent (the name is from a root, “to fall,” i.e., on other people), strong (“mighty”), and infamous (“men of renown”) people who predated the marriages of v. 2. This viewpoint often explains the unions as intermarriage of the godly line of Seth (described in 4:25–5:32) with the ungodly line of Cain (4:1–24).

NE'PHISH (ne'fish; 1 Chron. 5:19, KJV). See Naphish.

NEPHISH'ESIM (ne-fish'e-sim; Neh. 7:52, KJV). See Nephisim.

NEPHI'SIM (ne-fi'sim). The head of a family of Temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra 2:50), about 536 B.C. The parallel text (Neh. 7:52) has Nephushesim. The NIV reads Nephussim in both places.

NEPH'THALIM (nef'tha-lim; Matt. 4:13, 15; Rev. 7:6, KJV). See Naphtali.

NEPHTO'AH, THE WATERS OF (nef-tō'a; “an opening”). The spring or source of the water, or (inaccurately) waters of Nephtoah, was one of the landmarks in the boundary line that separated Judah from Benjamin (Josh. 15:9; 18:15). It lay two miles NW of Jerusalem, in which direction it seems to have been satisfactorily identified in 'Ain Lifta, a spring situated a little distance above the village of the same name. Nephtoah was formerly identified with various springs—the spring of St. Philip ('Ain Haniyeh) in the Wadi el Werd; the 'Ain Yalo in the same valley, but nearer Jerusalem; the 'Ain Karim, or Fountain of the Virgin of medieval times, and even the so-called Well of Job at the western end of the Wadi 'Aly.

NEPHUSH'ESIM (ne-fush'e-sim, Neh. 7:52). See Nephisim.

NEPHUSSIM. See Nephisim.

NER (nēr; light, “lamp”). A Benjamite, father of Kish and Abner and grandfather of King Saul (1 Sam. 14:50; 26:5; 2 Sam. 2:8; 1 Chron. 8:33), about 1100 B.C. The statement in 1 Chron. 9:36, that Kish and Ner were both sons of Jeiel, is explained by the supposition of an elder Kish, uncle of Saul’s father or, rather, Ner’s grandfather.

NE’REUS (ne’re-us; Lat. from Gk., the name of a sea god). A Christian at Rome saluted, with his sister, by the apostle Paul (Rom. 16:15), A.D. 60 (55). A legendary account of him is given in Acta Sanctorum, from which may be gathered the tradition that he was beheaded at Terracina, probably in the reign of Nerva. His ashes are said to be deposited in the ancient church of SS. Nereo et Archileo at Rome.

NER’GAL (ner’gal). One of the chief Assyrian deities. See Gods, False.

NER’GAL-SHARE’ZER (ner’gal-sha-rē’zer; Akkad; Nergal-shar-ušur, “Nergal, protect the king”). The name of two princes, the one Assyrian, the other Babylonian.

1. In the biblical description of the end of the reign of Sennacherib he is said to have been killed by his two sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer (2 Kings 19:37; Isa. 37:38). There is little doubt that the name Sharezer is simply the latter part of the name Nergal-sharezer. The name is given by Abydemus as Nergilos, so that the OT has preserved the latter half of his name and the Greek historian the first half. Abbreviations of names in this manner are common among Assyrians and Babylonians. The Assyrian story of the death of Sennacherib is much more brief in its details and does not mention the names of his murderers. It is as follows: “On the twentieth day of Tebet Sennacherib, king of Assyria, was killed by his son during an insurrection.... From the twentieth day of Tebet to the second day of Adar the insurrection continued, and on the eighteenth day of Sivan (of the following year) Esarhaddon ascended the throne.” It will be observed that in this account the death of Sennacherib is ascribed to the act of one son, and not to two, as in the OT. It is a probable conjecture that the death of the Assyrian king was due to the jealousy felt by his son Esarhaddon, who succeeded him.

2. The name of one of the Babylonian princes belonging to the attendants of Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 39:3, 13, given as “Nergal-sar-ezer”). He held the office of Rab-mag and is the Nergalsharusur, Gk. Neriglissar, who married one of Nebuchadnezzar’s daughters, murdered Evil-merodach (which see), his brother-in-law, and ascended the throne, reigning from 560 to 556.

NE’RI (ne’ri). The son of Melchi and father of Shealtiel, in the genealogy of Christ (Luke 3:27).

NERI’AH (ne-rī’a; “lamp of Jehovah”). The son of Mahseiah and father of Baruch, Jeremiah’s scribe (Jer. 32:12, 16; 36:4, 8, 14, 32; 43:3, 6; 45:1; 51:59). He is probably the same as Neri.

NE’RO (nē’rō; 2 Tim., subscription, KJV). A Roman emperor, born at Antium, probably December 15, A.D. 37, the son of Cneius Domitius Ahenobarbus by Agrippina, the sister of Caligula, his original name being Lucius Domitius Abenobarbus. When he was twelve years old his mother married her uncle, the emperor Claudius, who four years afterward gave his daughter Octavia to Nero in marriage, having formally adopted him under the name of Nero Claudius Caesar Drusus Germanicus. He succeeded Claudius, A.D. 54, and for five years showed clemency and justice, though his private life was extremely licentious. During his early years he was especially under the influence of the great Seneca. When he disposed of Seneca, he seemed to rule without restraint. Later he caused the death of Britannicus, the son and heir of Claudius. In A.D. 59 he procured from the Senate an order for the death of his mother to please his mistress, Poppaea, the wife of Otho. This was soon followed by the divorce of Octavia and Nero's marriage to Poppaea. In A.D. 64 a dreadful conflagration raged in Rome, said to have been started by Nero, who is reported to have watched the progress of the flames from the top of a high tower, chanting to his own lyre verses on the destruction of Troy. The truth of this story is doubtful, but it was believed at the time, and Nero sought to assign the blame for the disastrous fire on the Christians, many of whom were put to death. Having killed Poppaea by a kick when she was with child, Nero proposed to marry Antonia, his adopted sister, and on her refusal ordered her to be put to death. He then married Statilia Messalina, whose husband Vestinus he had assassinated for marrying Messalina after the emperor had cohabited with her.

The jurist Longinus was exiled, and the most virtuous citizens were put to death. In the midst of these sad events Nero's ambition seemed to be to excel in circus games. He went to Greece to show his ability as musician and charioteer in the Olympian games, returning to Rome in great pomp as victor. The formidable insurrection that broke out in Gaul alarmed Nero, and, deserted by the praetorian guard and condemned to death by the Senate, he committed suicide.

It was during Nero's reign that the war commenced between the Jews and Romans, which terminated in the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. Nero was the emperor before whom Paul was brought on his first imprisonment at Rome; and in the persecution of the Christians by Nero Paul and Peter are supposed to have suffered martyrdom. The early Christians believed Nero would return as the Antichrist; and many modern writers find his name in the mystic number of the Apocalypse (Rev. 13:18).

NEST (Heb. qēn, from qānan, to "build;" Gk. kataskēnōsis, "encampment, a perch"). The law (Deut. 22:6–7) directs that if anyone found a bird's nest by the road upon a tree or upon the ground, with young ones or eggs, and the mother sitting upon them, he was to let the mother go. The eagle's preference for localities removed from man and commanding a wide view is referred to in Job 39:27–28. "Is it at your command that the eagle mounts up, and makes his nest on high?" The loftiness of the eagle's nest was proverbial; it was "among the stars" (Obad. 4). The rock dove in Palestine often builds a nest on cliffs over deep ravines or gorges (Jer. 48:28).

See also Animal Kingdom: Bird.

Figurative. "I shall die in my nest" (Job 29:18) seems to mean in the bosom of one's family, with children to succeed him. To "make your nest as high as an eagle's" was a phrase by which the prophets reprov'd the pride and ambition of men (Jer. 49:16; Hab. 2:9). The figure of the partridge "that hatches eggs which it has not laid" (Jer. 17:11) is applied to one who gathers riches unlawfully; the robbing of a nest in the absence of the parent birds is symbolic of an easy victory (Isa. 10:14); the dominion exercised over the surrounding nations by Assyria is symbolized under the figure of a cedar of Lebanon, in whose boughs all the birds of heaven made their nests (Ezek. 31:3–6; cf. Dan. 4:21).

NET. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words. The frequency of images derived from them show that nets were much used by the Hebrews for fishing, fowling, and hunting.

Fishing Nets. Of fishing nets among the Hebrews we have no direct information, but it is likely that they were similar to those of the Egyptians. These used two kinds. The drag net had floats on the upper edge and leads on the lower edge to keep it close to the bottom (Isa. 19:8). It was sometimes let down from a boat, while those who pulled it usually stood on the shore. In lake fishing the net is cast from and drawn into the boat, except in case of a large draught, when the fishermen dragged the net after their boats to the shore (John 21:6, 8). A smaller net was sometimes used for fishing in shallow water. It was furnished with a pole on either side; and the fisherman, holding a pole in each hand, thrust it below the surface of the water, awaiting the moment when the fish passed over it. This, or a smaller landing net, was used to land fish wounded with a spear or caught by a hook.

Fowling Nets. The Egyptians used the trap and the clap-net. “The trap was generally made of network, strained over a frame. It consisted of two semicircular sides or flaps of equal size, one or both moving on the common bar, or axis, upon which they rested. When the traps were set the two flaps were kept open by means of strings, probably of catgut, which, the moment the bait that stood in the center of the bar was touched, slipped aside, and allowed the two flaps to collapse, thus securing the bird. Another kind, which was square, appears to have closed in the same manner; but its construction was different, the framework running across the center, and not, as in the others, round the edges of the trap. The clap-net was of different forms, though on the same general principle as the traps. It consisted of two sides, or frames, over which the network was strained; at one end was a short rope, which was fastened to a bush or a cluster of reeds, and at the other was one of considerable length, which, as soon as the bird was seen feeding in the area of the net, was pulled by the fowlers, causing the two sides to collapse” (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, 2:180, 182).

Hunting Nets. These were of universal use among the Hebrews and were probably like those of the Egyptians, of two kinds—one, a long net, furnished with several ropes, and supported on forked poles, varying in length to correspond with the inequalities of the ground over which it was extended. The other was smaller and used for stopping gaps and is probably alluded to in Job 19:6; Ps. 140:5; Isa. 51:20.

Figurative. The spreading of the net is an appropriate image of the subtle devices of enemies (Pss. 9:15; 10:9; 25:15; etc.) “Fish caught in a treacherous net” (Eccles. 9:12) is figurative of men suddenly overtaken by evil, the unexpected suddenness of the capture being the point of comparison. “An antelope in a net” (Isa. 51:20) is the figure of one exhausted with ineffectual attempts to release himself. Being caught in a net represents the unavoidable vengeance of God (Lam. 1:13; Ezek. 12:13; Hos. 7:12). In Hab. 1:14–16 “hooks” and “nets” are great and powerful armies by which the Chaldeans gained dominion over lands and peoples and brought home the spoil. To “sacrifice to their net” (v. 16) is to attribute to the means that he has employed the honor due to God.

NETA’IM (ne-ta’im). A town inhabited by potters who were descendants of Shelah son of Judah (1 Chron. 4:23). Its location is unknown but it was evidently near Gederah (which see).

NETHAN’EL (ne-than’el; “God gives”).

1. The son of Zuar and head of the tribe of Issachar at the Exodus (Num. 1:8; 2:5; 7:18, 23; 10:15), 1440 B.C.
2. The fourth son of Jesse, David’s father (1 Chron. 2:14), about 1026 B.C.
3. One of the priests who “blew the trumpets before the ark” when it was brought from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chron. 15:24), about 989 B.C.
4. A Levite, “the scribe and father of” Shemaiah (1 Chron. 24:6).
5. The fifth son of Obed-edom and one of the gatekeepers of the Temple appointed by David (1 Chron. 26:4), before 960 B.C.
6. One of the officials commissioned by King Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:7), about 870 B.C.
7. One of the chief Levites who made offerings when the observance of the Passover was renewed by King Josiah (2 Chron. 35:9), about 621 B.C.
8. A priest of the family of Pashhur, in the time of Ezra, who had married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:22), 456 B.C.
9. The representative of the priestly family of Jedaiah in the time of Joiakim, the son of Jeshua (Neh. 12:21), before 445 B.C.

10. A Levite, of the sons of Asaph, who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:36).

NETHANI'AH (neth-a-nī'a; "Jehovah bestows").

1. The son of Elishama and father of Ishmael, who murdered Gedaliah (2 Kings 25:23, 25; Jer. 40:8, 14–15; 41:1–2, etc.). He was of the royal family of Judah, before 586 B.C.

2. One of the four sons of Asaph the singer (1 Chron. 25:2). He was head of the fifth division of the Temple musicians (v. 12), about 961 B.C.

3. One of the Levites appointed by Jehoshaphat to accompany the officials who were to teach the law in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8), 869 B.C.

4. The father of Jehudi, which latter was sent by the officials to request Baruch to read the scroll to them (Jer. 36:14), about 606 B.C.

NETH'INIM (neth'i-nim; Ezra 7:24). The Heb. and KJV rendering of Temple servants (which see).

NETO'PHAH (ne-to'fa; "dripping, distillation"). A place in Judah, near Bethlehem, fifty-six of whose people returned with Zerubbabel from captivity (Ezra 2:22; Neh. 7:26). Maharai and Heleb (or Heldai), two of David's guard, were from Netophah (2 Sam. 23:28–29; 1 Chron. 27:13, 15), as well as one of the captains who remained under arms near Jerusalem after its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar (9:16).

NETO'PHATHITES (ne-to'fa-thīts; "the Netophathite," Neh. 12:28; "Netophathi," KJV).

Inhabitants of Netophah, which was near Bethlehem or connected with it (Neh. 7:26; cf. 1 Chron. 2:54), and seems to have belonged to Judah, since Maharai the Netophathite was a Zerahite (2 Sam. 23:28; 1 Chron. 27:13; cf. Josh. 7:17) and Heldai the Netophathite was "of Othniel" (2 Sam. 23:29; 1 Chron. 27:15; cf. Judg. 1:8–13). Netophah itself is mentioned only in Ezra 2:22; Neh. 7:26; but as two of David's men, Maharai and Heldai, mentioned above, were Netophathites, the town must have existed long before. The Jewish authors have a tradition "that the Netophathites slew the guards which had been placed by Jeroboam on the road leading to Jerusalem, to stop the passage of the first fruits from the country villages to the temple.... Jeroboam's obstruction, which is said to have remained in force till the reign of Hoshea.... was commemorated by a fast on the 23d Sivan," which is said to be still retained in the Jewish calendar. The Mishna mentions "oil of Netophah" and the valley of "Beth Netophah." The site is now identified with Khirbet Bedd Faluh, about 3½ miles S of Bethlehem.

NETTLES. See Vegetable Kingdom.

NETWORK.

1. Heb. reshet. The grate of the altar of burnt offering (Ex. 27:4; 38:4).

2. Heb. šēbākā ("twined"), applied to latticework, especially around the capitals of columns such as the two court pillars of the Temple (1 Kings 7:18, 20, 41–42; 2 Kings 25:17; 2 Chron. 4:12–13), which, according to Keil (Com., ad loc.), was formed of seven cords plaited together in the form of festoons (cf. Jer. 52:22–23). The word is used once to refer to the "lattice" before a window or balcony (2 Kings 1:2).

NEW BIRTH. The technical expression frequently used for regeneration (which see).

NEW MOON. See Festivals.

NEWNESS (Gk. kainotēs). A new state of spirit or life in which the Spirit places the believer (Rom. 6:4; 7:6).

NEW TESTAMENT. The NT or "New Covenant" is a term describing a portion of the Bible revealed in fulfillment of the OT and dealing with the nativity, ministry, life, death, resurrection, and ascension of the predicted Messiah and the inauguration of the new dispensation of the Christian church on the Day of Pentecost.

The ministry of Christ is set forth in the four gospels. These gospels record selections from the events of Christ's life; taken together they set forth a Personality, not a biography. The twenty-nine formative years of the Messiah are passed over silently. This silence is broken only once or twice. The gospels do not present everything the Son of God did, but they introduce in a wonderful way "the Doer."

The gospels are elucidated by the OT. The foreview of Christ, presenting and including His Person, work, and kingdom, are indispensable requisites to opening up the gospels. To understand the gospels one must not confuse the kingdom, which was offered to Israel, and the church of Jesus Christ. The throne of David (Luke 1:32) must not be made identical with "My Father on His throne" (Rev. 3:21), nor must the house of Jacob (Luke 1:33) be construed as the church of Jesus Christ. It must also be remembered that the mission of the Messiah was primarily to the Jewish nation (Matt. 10:5–6; John 1:11). He was "a servant to the circumcision" (Rom. 15:8). He fulfilled the law, died under the law, and set us free from the law (cf. Gal. 4:4–5).

Therefore, to understand the gospels one must expect to be on legal ground up to the time of the cross (Matt. 10:5–6; 15:22–28; Mark 1:44). The Sermon on the Mount must be seen to be law, not grace. It demands a perfect character that grace alone through divine power can produce. In understanding the NT it also must be borne in mind that the full-orbed revelation concerning grace is to be found in the epistles, not in the gospels, and that Christ by His life, death, and resurrection made possible the operation of divine grace. The gospels do not present the doctrine of the church. Not until the Messiah was rejected as King and Savior by the Jews did He begin to announce a "mystery," until that moment "hidden in God" (Eph. 3:3–10). His great new announcement was "I will build My church" (Matt. 16:16–18).

This church was still future, for it was to be based upon a wholly new operation of the Spirit—His baptizing work (Matt. 3:11; Mark 1:8; Luke 3:16–17; cf. Acts 1:5; 11:16). A study of those Scriptures reveals that the baptism of the Spirit occurred between Acts 1:5 and 11:16; that is, in the pivotal new beginning inaugurated on the Day of Pentecost. On this day the Holy Spirit came to perform His baptizing work for the first time and consequently to give birth to the Christian church.

Following the gospels and Acts, numerous epistles deal with the great Pauline revelation governing this new Body, and the rest of the NT books give practical teaching for this period.

The book of Revelation outlines the future and destiny of the church (chaps. 2–3), as well as the destiny of Israel after her tribulation and establishment of the kingdom (chaps. 4–20). The final two chapters present the eternal state. Since the dispensation of grace was not begun until the cross, when "the veil of the temple was torn in two from top to bottom" (Matt. 27:51), the term New Testament is a popular accommodation to describe the latter portion (less than one-third) of divine revelation rather than a strictly accurate usage. See Covenant. NEZI'AH (ne-zī'a; "illustrious"). One of the Temple servants whose descendants accompanied Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra 2:54; Neh. 7:56), about 536 B.C.

NE'ZIB (ne'zib; a "statue," or "idol"). A town on the lowland of Judah, mentioned between Ashnah and Keilah (Josh. 15:43). It is to be located at Khirbet Beit Nešib, about 2¼ miles S of Khirbet Kila NIB'HAZ (nib'haz). An Avvite deity (2 Kings 17:31). See Gods, False.

NIB'SHAN (nib'shan). A town in the wilderness of Judah, on the shore of the Dead Sea, near Engedi (Josh. 15:62), but its location is not definite.

NICA'NOR (ni-kā'nor; Gk. "victorious"). A deacon of the church at Jerusalem (Acts 6:5).

NICODE'MUS (nik-ō-dē'mus; Gk. "victor over the people"). His family is unknown, though some recognize him as Nicodemus Ben Gorion, the brother of Josephus the historian. This Nicodemus was a member of the Sanhedrin and was counted one of the three richest men of Jerusalem. But it was said that he afterward became poor, and his daughter was seen gathering barleycorn for food from under the horses' feet. Some have conjectured that this was the result of the persecutions he received for having embraced Christianity (Whedon, Com., John 3:1).

Interview with Jesus. Nicodemus was a Pharisee and a member of the Sanhedrin. Being convinced by His miracles that Jesus was a teacher "come from God," he sought an interview with Him; but fear of the Jews and a regard for his reputation, no doubt, influenced him to make the visit by night. He opened the conversation by an announcement of his belief in Christ's divine mission and was answered by a declaration of the wonderful doctrine of the new birth (John 3:1–10). Jesus also maintained that this doctrine of regeneration should be accepted upon His own divine authority (vv. 10–13), and He insisted upon the doctrine of responsibility for unbelief (vv. 18–21).

Defends Jesus. When, upon a later occasion, the officers sent to apprehend Christ returned without Him and were reproached by the rest of the Sanhedrin, Nicodemus said to them, "Our Law does not judge a man, unless it first hears from him and knows what he is doing, does it?" His words were answered by the taunt, "You are not also from Galilee, are you? Search, and see that no prophet arises out of Galilee" (7:45–52).

At Christ's Burial. Perhaps encouraged by the example of Joseph of Arimathea, Nicodemus assisted at the burial of Jesus. He brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pounds' weight, to anoint the body, and he assisted in its embalming and burial (19:39–42). Nothing further is known of Nicodemus from Scripture. Tradition adds that after he had thus publicly declared himself a follower of Jesus, and had been baptized by Peter, he was displaced from his office and expelled from Jerusalem.

Character. "A constitutional timidity is observable in all that the Gospel tells us about Nicodemus; a timidity which could not be wholly overcome even by his honest desire to befriend and acknowledge one whom he knew to be a prophet, even if he did not at once recognize in him the promised Messiah” (F. W. Farrar, Life of Christ, p. 92).

NICOLAΪTANS (nik-o-lā'i-tanz). A sect or party that arose in the apostolic period of the church, mentioned twice by name in the book of Revelation (2:6, 15). In the former passage it is said, to the credit of the church in Ephesus, that she shared in the feelings of the Lord concerning the Nicolaitans, viewing them with the hatred they deserved. The charge is made that some in Pergamos (v. 15) held to teachings of the Nicolaitans, who are compared to those who “hold the teaching of Balaam,” etc. “The general voice of antiquity accuses them of holding the lawfulness of eating things offered to idols, and of mixing in and encouraging idolatrous worship; and as they are charged with denying God to be the creator of the world, and attributing its existence to other powers, they could unquestionably, on such grounds, permit themselves so to act, and thus far it is probable that the accusation is not ill-founded. The community of women was another doctrine which they are said to have adopted, and their conduct seems to have been in the highest degree licentious” (Imperial Bible Dictionary, s.v.). The origin of the sect will perhaps never be ascertained with certainty. See Nicolas.

NICOLAS (nik-ō-las; Gk. “victor over the people”). A native of Antioch who had become a proselyte to the Jewish faith. He was afterward converted to Christianity and was elected one of the first seven deacons (Acts 6:5). By some it has been believed that the sect of the Nicolaitans was founded by this Nicolas, but of this there is no positive evidence.

NICOPOLIS (ni-kop'o-lis; “city of victory”). A city to which Paul refers (Titus 3:12) as the place where he intended to pass the following winter. Titus was at this time in Crete (1:5). There were several cities of this name, which leaves some doubt as to the one about which Paul wrote. Of the three, one was in Thrace, another in Cilicia, and a third in Epirus; the latter seems the most likely to have been meant. This was built by Augustus Caesar in 30 B.C. in honor of a victory at Actium, which was only four miles distant.

NI'GER (nī'jer; “black”). Of Antioch (Acts 13:1). See Simeon, no. 5.

NIGHT. See Time.

Figurative. The expression “Morning comes but also night” (Isa. 21:12) is interpreted by Delitzsch (Com., ad loc.): “Even if the morning dawns, it will be swallowed up again directly by night. And the history was quite in accordance with such an answer. The Assyrian period of judgment was followed by the Chaldean, and the Chaldean by the Persian, the Persian by the Grecian, and the Grecian by the Roman.” The phrase “songs in the night” (Job 35:10; Ps. 77:6) uses night to represent trials and suffering. Thus night stands for a period of distress or trouble and, by a natural extension, also for death or the grave (John 9:4). Sons “of night” (1 Thess. 5:5) are those who practice the deeds of depravity. Night is also used for a time of ignorance and helplessness (Mic. 3:6).

NIGHT HAWK. See Animal Kingdom: Hawk; Night Hawk; Owl.

NIGHT MARCHES. From Num. 9:21, “If it remained in the daytime and at night, whenever the cloud was lifted, they would set out,” it is evident that the Israelites made night marches. Such marches might have been made either to escape heat or to avoid their enemies—the Amalekites, Edomites, or Ammonites.

NIGHT MONSTER (Heb. lîlîṭ, Isa. 34:14). In Assyr., Lilith was “a night demon,” and the biblical reference is apparently to a demonic creature, something seen in the night by special divine revelation. Respecting Dan. 2:19, “Then the mystery was revealed to Daniel in a night vision,” Keil (Com., ad loc.) says: “A vision of the night is not necessarily to be identified with a dream. It is possible, indeed, that dreams may be, as the means of a divine revelation, dream visions, and as such may be called visions of the night, but in itself a vision of the night is a vision simply which anyone receives during the night while he is awake.”

NIGHT WATCH. See Watch.

NILE. The one great river of Egypt, navigable for most of its four-thousand-mile course. It is the longest river in the world. The name Nile, from the Gk. Neilos, Lat. Nilus, probably means “dark blue” (cf. Arab., En-nil). The river is known to modern Egyptians as El Bahr, “the sea” (cf. Nah. 3:8). The Heb. term is yāōr, which in the plural refers to the Nile River system (cf. Isa. 7:18, marg.). The ancient Egyptians deified it as Hapi. Hecataeus of Miletus (fifth century B.C.), accurately described Egypt as “the gift of the river.” The geographer Ptolemy in the second century A.D. believed that the Nile River had its source in the heart of Africa at the base of “the Mountains of the Moon.” Henry Stanley’s discovery in 1888 proved the ancient geographer substantially correct. Stanley first caught sight of a cloud-wrapped mountain at the equator, which he called “the Rain Maker.” The Duke of Abruzzi in the early part of the twentieth century explored the 16,791-foot summit of the mountain and demonstrated that the Nile does rise in the Mountains of the Moon. Rains and melting snows from this mountain pour into the waters of Victoria, Albert, and Edward lakes, from which the Nile springs. The main part of the upper river is known as the White Nile. The White Nile is joined by the Blue Nile at Khartoum. The only other tributary is the Atbara, flowing in from the SE. The Nile is furnished a never-failing supply of water by almost daily equatorial rains.

The marvel of the Nile is its annual inundation. Occurring regularly, it overflowed its banks extensively before the dams were completed at Aswan (1902, 1971). At the beginning of June it commences its annual rise. Between July 15 and 20 it rises rapidly. Toward the last part of September the water stops rising and remains constant for twenty to thirty days. In October it rises again, attaining its greatest height, then receding. The fields dry off in January, February, and March, and the soil, softened and fertilized, bears splendid crops. Occasionally inundation failed to take place. Under the famous Dynasty XII, a certain Egyptian official in the reign of Sesostris I speaks of unfruitful years when he did not collect unpaid debts of the field due after short payment. In Joseph’s time there was a serious seven-year famine (Gen. 41:54) because of the failure of the inundation. There was likewise a recorded failure for seven years in the reign of the Caliph el-Mustansir. The famine at that time reached serious proportions in A.D. 1070. In pharaonic times the agricultural year consisted of three seasons: the inundation period—June to October; spring (or planting)—October to February; summer (or harvest)—end of February to June. Today the great dam at Aswan gives Egypt a greater cultivatable area than in ancient times.

Between Khartoum at the confluence of the Blue and White Nile and Aswan (ancient Elephantine) there are six cataracts. From the first cataract at Aswan to Memphis, near modern Cairo, is a distance of 600 miles and was known as Upper Egypt. In the course of its last 125 miles from Memphis to the Mediterranean, the Nile branches out into the Delta, so-called because it is shaped like the Gk. letter, and is called Lower Egypt. The Delta forms a great triangle of fertile land cut through by the numerous mouths of the Nile, the most important of which are the Rosetta and Damietta. At the former the famous Rosetta Stone was uncovered, proving to be the key to the reading of ancient Egyptian hieroglyphics and inaugurating the modern science of Egyptology. In Upper Egypt the Nile Valley is mostly a narrow ribbon, usually not more than a dozen miles across, a thread of green wedged in between crags, shelves, and the relentless sands of the desert. The peculiar isolation and the advantages of the almost never-failing river gave Egypt an ideal locale for an early and advanced stage of culture. Egypt in a definite sense was the Nile.

In the OT the Nile is famous as the river in which Moses' mother laid him in a papyrus boat by the river's brink (Ex. 2:3). The waters of the river were turned into blood at the time of the Exodus (7:20–21, 24–25). The river of Egypt was famous for papyrus production (Isa. 19:7). Goshen was the NE area of the Delta, nearest Palestine. In patriarchal times, evidently under the famous Twelfth Dynasty, Abraham migrated there to escape famine in the land of Canaan (Gen. 12:10–13:1). Joseph was sold into Egypt by his brothers, and Jacob and his family settled there in a similar time of famine (46:3–50:26). Hebrews during their captivity built such store cities as Pithom and Rameses (cf. Ex. 1:11). It was to Egypt that Joseph and Mary fled with the Christ child, when endangered by the unscrupulous Herod (Matt. 2:13–21). Egypt was a site of ancient cities whose monumental remains constitute great archaeological discoveries, such as Memphis, Amarna, Thebes, and Heliopolis. M.F.U. BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. NIM'RAH (nim'ra; "limpid"). A place mentioned by this name in Num. 32:3 only, among those that formed the districts of the "land of Jazer and the land of Gilead." It is the same as Beth-nimrah (v. 36), which belonged to the tribe of Gad. It is located near the Wadi Sha'ib.

NIM'RIM (nim'rim; "limpid waters" or [waters of] "the leopards"). A fertile tract in Moab, SE of the Dead Sea, probably in Wadi Nemeirah. Springs existed near Beth-nimrah. These waters were cursed (Isa. 15:6; Jer. 48:34).

NIMROD (Heb. "rebel"). The son of Cush and founder of the kingdom of Babylon (Gen. 10:8–9). In Micah 5:6 Babylon is designated as "the land of Nimrod." In the Bible Nimrod appears as a great personality in whom earthly imperial power first appears in human history. That this character is evil appears from several observations.

1. Earthly kingship initially comes into existence among the Hamitic peoples, upon one branch of which a prophetic curse was pronounced and in the entire family of which there is an absence of divine blessing (Gen. 9:25–27).

2. Nimrod is represented as the establisher of Babylon (Gen. 10:8–12), which is invariably outlined in Scripture both in type and prophecy as a religiously and morally evil system (Isa. 21:9; Jer. 50:24; 51:64; Rev. 16:19; 17:5; 18:2–3).

3. Nimrod's name "no doubt suggested to the Israelites the idea of 'rebel' ... against God" (A. Dillmann, Genesis [1897], 1:350). The name Nimrod in the divine account is definitely meant to suggest the concept of rebellion as descriptive of the character of this first world empire-builder, despite the fact that the original name in Hamitic speech did not have this meaning.

Nimrod has been explained plausibly as Sumerian (early non-Semitic Babylonian) Nin-maradda, "lord of Marad," a town SW of Kish (W. F. Albright, in O. T. Commentary [1948], p. 138). If, however, Babylonian Cush is to be connected with the exceedingly ancient city kingdom of Kish (founded c. 3200 B.C.), from whence the Babylonian emperors of the third millennium B.C. took their title "kings of the world," archaeological light is thrown on the primeval imperial period preserved in the name of Nimrod. The dynasty of Kish, consisting of twenty-three kings, is significantly enumerated first in the Mesopotamian dynasties that were established just after the Flood (cf. Jack Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past [1946], p. 31; Thorkild Jacobsen, The Sumerian King List, Assyriological Studies, no. 11 [1939]). Then, too, Nimrod is said to have been "a mighty hunter before the Lord" (Gen. 10:9). The simple meaning of this statement is that Nimrod was the exact opposite of the divine ideal of a king—that of a shepherd (cf. 2 Sam. 5:2; 7:7; 1 Pet. 5:4). Whereas a hunter gratifies himself at the expense of his victim, the shepherd expends himself for the good of the subjects of his care. Nimrod has been connected with the legendary name of Gilgamesh, the demi-god king of Uruk (biblical Erech, Gen. 10:10), modern Warka, in SW Sumer. Although the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom is said to be "Babel and Erech and Accad and Calneh, in the land of Shinar," there is nothing to prove that Gilgamesh is a reflection of Nimrod. Others imagine that Nimrod is the Babylonian Merodach (Marduk) in human form. The existence in Mesopotamia of many cities preserving the name Nimrod is evidence of his widespread popularity in antiquity (cf. Birs Nimrud; Tell Nimrud, near Baghdad; and Nimrud [ancient Calah], about twenty miles S of Nineveh). Nimrod's designation as a "hunter" clearly connects him with the founding of the military state based on absolute force. However, Babylonian and Assyrian art picturing wild animals in hunting scenes may point to Nimrod also as a literal hunter, which in the Heb. account is given a religious connotation. M.F.U. NIMRUD. See Calah; Nimrod.

NIM'SHI (nim'shi). The grandfather of Jehu (2 Kings 9:2, 14), but he is also called his father (9:20; 2 Chron. 22:7).

NIN'EVE (nin'e-ve). The Gk. form (Luke 11:32, KJV) of Nineveh (which see).

NIN'EVEH (nin'e-ve). A famous and ancient city situated on the eastern bank of the Tigris River opposite the modern city of Mosul. The Bible names Nimrod as the founder of Nineveh (Gen. 10:8–11). In 612 B.C. the ancient splendid city and capital of the Assyrian Empire was so completely obliterated, according to its prophesied decimation by Hebrew prophets, that it became like a myth until its discovery by Sir Austen Layard and others in the nineteenth century. The site has now been extensively excavated. Its occupational levels reach back as far as prehistoric times. Excavated pottery indicates Sumerian origin. The actual walled city has been outlined to indicate an area three miles in length and less than a mile-and-a-half in breadth; the wall itself was eight miles in length. The Hebrews, however, perhaps like other foreigners, were in the habit of including other cities under the name Nineveh (Assyr. Nuna or Ninua). A modern comparison would be the complex of cities that constitute New York City. Such cities are Calah (which see), eighteen miles S; Resen, between Calah and Nineveh proper; and Rehoboth-Ir. The latter "must be Rebit-ninua, W of the capital, since the names are not only etymologically related but have the same meaning" (W. F. Albright in O. T. Commentary, [1948], p. 138). The above-mentioned four places are catalogued in Gen. 10:11–12 and Jonah 1:2; 3:27; 4:11 as constituting "the great city." Other suburbs such as Tarbisu and Dursharrukin (or Sargonsburg) added to the aggregate size of "Nineveh" in the heyday of the Assyrian Empire.

Nineveh occurs early in cuneiform records under the reigns of Gudea (twenty-first century B.C.) and Hammurabi (c. 1700 B.C.). After the twelfth century B.C. Nineveh became one of the royal residences of Assyria. Sargon II (722–702 B.C.) elevated it as the capital of the Assyrian Empire. Sennacherib (704–681 B.C.) greatly beautified and adorned the capital city. Splendid temples, palaces, and fortifications made it the chief city of the empire (2 Kings 19:36). Sennacherib built a massive wall forty to fifty feet high that extended for two-and-a-half miles along the Tigris and eight miles around the inner city. The defenses of the capital can still be traced. Sennacherib also built a water system containing the oldest aqueduct in history at Jerwan, across the Gomer River. Austen Layard did the first successful digging in 1847, uncovering the splendid royal residence of Sennacherib in 1849–51. He unearthed the seventy-one-room palace with walls lined with sculptured slabs. The remains of Nineveh are a silent witness to the glory of Assyria under Sennacherib and his successors Esarhaddon (681–669 B.C.) and Ashurbanipal (669–626 B.C.). The Kuyunjik Mound yielded not only the vast palace of Sennacherib but also the royal residence and famous library of Ashurbanipal in which were housed 22,000 inscribed clay tablets. These are important for their accounts of the creation and Flood and because they furnish scholars with invaluable background material for OT studies.

An alliance of Medes, Babylonians, and Scythians destroyed Nineveh in August 612 B.C., after a two-month siege. This great victory was due in part to the releasing of the city's water supply and the inundation of the Koser River, dissolving the sun-dried brick of which much of the city was built. Nahum prophesied the fall of the "bloody city" (Nah. 2:1–3:19; cf. Zeph. 2:13–15). Nineveh is a site so huge that perhaps it never will be completely excavated. A modern village covers one of the larger palaces. Cemeteries that cannot be disturbed cover other areas. Excavators have to bore through thirty to forty feet of debris before Assyrian strata are reached. (For Nineveh's repentance see Jonah, Book of). The nearby mound of Nebi Yunus, that is, "Mound of the Prophet Jonah," contains the palace of Esarhaddon. The popular tradition is that Jonah is buried beneath the mosque at Nebi Yunas. M.F.U.

NOADI'AH (nō-a-dî'a; "Jehovah convenes").

1. One of the Levites who, with Meremoth, Eleazar, and others weighed the silver, gold, and utensils of the Temple brought back from Babylon (Ezra 8:33), about 457 B.C.

2. A professed prophetess, who seems to have joined Tobiah and Sanballat in opposition to Nehemiah (Neh. 6:14), about 445 B.C.

3. One of the five daughters of Zelophehad of the tribe of Manasseh (Num. 26:33), c. 1435 B.C. As their father had died leaving no son, the daughters applied for an inheritance in the Promised Land in their father's right. Moses, under divine direction, granted their request (27:1–7), and this promise was redeemed by Joshua (Josh. 17:3–4).

4. Also the name of the well-known pre-Flood patriarch (which see below).

NO'AH (nō'a; "rest, quiet"). The son of Lamech and tenth in descent from Adam (Gen. 5:28–29). Beyond the record of his birth the Scriptures tell us nothing of Noah until he was 500 years old, when it mentions his three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth (5:32; 6:10).

As Preacher. The wickedness of the human race had for a long time provoked the wrath of God. A cause of their unrighteousness was the intermarriage of the "sons of God" and the "daughters of men." Jehovah resolved to destroy the human race, but He allowed a respite of 120 years, during which time Noah sought to bring the people to repentance (Gen. 6:1–9; 1 Pet. 3:20; 2 Pet. 2:5). Thus Noah was "a preacher of righteousness," exercising faith in the testimony of God and condemning the world by the contrasted excellence of his conduct.

In the Ark. At length the cup of man's shocking iniquity, manifested in the breaking down of the divinely established orders of created beings (see Giants; Nephilim), was full, and the time of their destruction was near at hand. Noah, because of his righteousness, was exempted from extermination and was saved by means of the ark, constructed according to divine direction (Gen. 6:14–22). He entered the ark when he was 600 years old, and the Flood (see The Flood), which commenced on the seventeenth day of the second month (7:6, 11), kept rising for 40 days (vv. 12, 17) and only began to abate after 150 days (8:3). On the seventeenth day of the seventh month the ark rested on Ararat; after 40 days Noah sent forth a raven and, at intervals of seven days (or a week), a dove. Finally, on the first day of the first month of his 601st year, Noah removed the covering of the ark; and on the twenty-seventh day of the following month he returned again to dry land (8:4–19).

Noah's Sacrifice. The first thing that Noah did after leaving the ark was to build an altar and to offer sacrifice. He took his offerings from every clean beast and every clean fowl, such animals as were destined for man's food. God accepted the sacrifice and promised no more to waste the earth with a plague of waters but to continue without interruption the regular alternations of day and night and of the seasons of the year (8:20–22). Jehovah blessed Noah and his sons and pronounced his superiority over the inferior creation. All living creatures were given to man for food, with the prohibition against eating blood. Provision was made for the security of human life against animals as well as men. To give Noah and his sons a firm assurance of the prosperous continuance of the human race, God established a covenant with them and gave them as a sign the "bow in the cloud" (9:1–17).

Intoxication. After this Noah entered upon agricultural pursuits and began to cultivate the vine. Whether in ignorance of its properties or not we do not know, but Noah drank wine until intoxicated and shamefully exposed himself in his tent. Ham, seeing the nakedness of his father, displayed a lascivious bent of character and told his brothers, who reverently covered their father with a garment, walking backward that they might not see his nakedness. For this they received their father's blessing, whereas Ham reaped for his son Canaan a prophetic curse (9:20–27).

Conclusion. After this we hear no more of the patriarch but the sum of his years: "Noah lived three hundred and fifty years after the flood. So all the days of Noah were nine hundred and fifty years, and he died" (9:28–29).

Character. The character of Noah is given in a few words descriptive of him in Gen. 6:9: "Noah was a righteous man, blameless in his time; Noah walked with God." That is, he was righteous in his moral relations to God and blameless in his character and conduct. His righteousness and integrity were manifested in his walking with God.

Noah and Archaeology. In the Sumerian account of the Flood the flood hero appears under the name Ziusudra and in the Babylonian version as Utnapishtim. The Babylonian account is contained in the eleventh chapter of the famous Gilgamesh Epic. Of all ancient traditions that bear upon the OT, the Babylonian flood story, revolving around Utnapishtim, manifests the most striking and detailed similarity to the Bible. Both Noah and his Babylonian counterpart are divinely warned of the Flood and are instructed to build a boat, pitch it with pitch, and preserve human and animal life in it. Both accounts tell of the landing place of the boat and describe the sending out of birds. In both, sacrifices are offered with the idea of the gods or the one true God smelling the sacrifice. Both speak of rewards after the Flood. M.F.U.

NO-AMON. See Thebes.

NOB (nob). A priestly city in Benjamin, situated on an eminence near Jerusalem. It would seem from Isa. 10:28–32 that it was on one of the roads leading from the N and within sight of the city. Here David applied to Ahimelech for bread after he fled from Saul (1 Sam. 21:1–6), from which it appears that the Ark was then located there before being moved to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:1–2). A company of the Benjamites settled here after the return from the exile (Neh. 11:32). But the event for which Nob was most noted in the Scripture annals was a frightful massacre that occurred there in the reign of Saul (1 Sam. 22:17–19). All trace of the name has long ago disappeared from the country. Jerome states that nothing remained in his time to indicate where it had been. Geographers are not agreed as to the precise spot with which we are to identify the ancient locality. Père Abel locates it on Scopus at Räs Umm et-Tala.

NO'BAH (nō'ba; a “barking”).

1. An Israelite whose family is not named but who probably belonged, like Jair, to one of the families of Machirites of the tribe of Manasseh (cf. Num. 32:39–41). He took the town of Kenath and its villages (Heb. “daughters”) and gave it his own name, Nobah (v. 42).

2. The name given by the above to the town of Kenath, after being taken by him (Num. 32:42).

NOBLES. See Princes.

NOD (nod; “wandering, exile”). A place, the location of which is dependent upon that of Eden. The inhabitants of Bussorah and of Bushire claim that the land of Nod lay between these two cities on the NE of the Persian Gulf. It was the retreat of Cain after the murder of Abel (Gen. 4:16). See Eden.

NO'DAB (nō'dab; “nobility”). The name of a Bedouin tribe mentioned (1 Chron. 5:19 only) in the account of the war of the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh against the Hagrites. Nothing more is definitely known respecting them.

NO'E (nō'e). The Gk. form (Matt. 24:37–38; Luke 3:36; 17:26–27; all KJV) of Noah (which see).

NO'GAH (nō'ga; “brilliance, luster”). One of the sons of David who was born to him in Jerusalem by a wife other than Bathsheba (1 Chron. 3:7, 9; 14:3, 6), after 1000 B.C.

NO'HAH (nō'ha; “rest”). The fourth named of the sons of Benjamin and the head of a family (1 Chron. 8:2).

NON (non). Once (1 Chron. 7:27) for Nun (which see; Heb. nun, “fish”), the father of Joshua.

NOON. See Time.

NOPH (nof). The Heb. name of the Egyptian city Memphis (which see), the capital of Lower Egypt and of all Egypt during the Old Kingdom. Its ruins have been carried away over the millennia and its stones used in buildings elsewhere. Not much is to be seen there today. In Hos. 9:6 the Heb. name is Moph, and it is translated Memphis, which is its Gk. and Lat. form.

NO'PHAH (no'fa). One of the Moabite cities occupied by Amorites (Num. 21:30), probably the same as Nobah (Judg. 8:11), according to which passage it was near Jogbeha, not far from the eastern desert, and still existing in the ruined place called Nowakis, NW of Amman.

NORTH.

1. (Heb. mzārîm, “scatterer,” Job 37:9). The north wind, so called as dispersing clouds and bringing clear, cold weather. Among the Hebrews the cardinal points of the heavens were considered with reference to the E. Thus to a man facing the E, the N would be at his left hand (Gen. 14:15, see marg.; Job 23:9). Land lying to the N was considered as higher and to the S as lower; hence to travel northward was to “go up” (Gen. 45:25; Hos. 8:9; Acts 18:22; 19:1), whereas to travel southward was to “go down” (Gen. 12:10; 26:2; 1 Sam. 25:1; 26:2; 30:15–16).

2. (Heb. šāpôn, “hidden”), the northern quarter of the heavens, called the “hidden,” because the ancients regarded the N as the seat of gloom and darkness, in contrast to the bright and sunny S. Thus the phrase “out of the north comes golden splendor” (Job 37:22), i.e., “fair weather.” Delitzsch (Com., ad loc.) believes that a contrast is made between the “gold” mined in the N and “the terrible majesty of Jehovah.” The reason that Babylonia, Chaldea, Assyria, and Media were said to be N of Palestine (Jer. 1:14; 46:6; etc.; Ezek. 26:7; Zeph. 2:13) is that the kings of most of these countries, in order to avoid the deserts, invaded Palestine chiefly from the N side by way of Damascus and Syria; that is, by way of the so-called fertile crescent. By “the chiefs of the north” (Ezek. 32:30) some understand the Tyrians and their allies (26:15) joined with the Zidonians. “The families of the north” (Jer. 25:9) may indicate kings who were dependent on Babylon; whereas “the king of the North” is the king of Syria, opposed to the king of the S, namely, Egypt (Dan. 11:6–15, 40). The Heb. word is applied to the N wind (Prov. 27:16; Song of Sol. 4:16).

NOSE, NOSTRILS (Heb. ḥap; dual ḥappayim, properly “breathing place,” Num. 11:20). The same Heb. word sometimes means anger (Prov. 22:24), as shown in the breathing.

Figurative. “I will put My hook in your nose” (2 Kings 19:28; Job 41:2; Isa. 37:29) is a figurative expression taken from the custom of restraining wild animals, and means to control, humiliate. “For behold, they are putting the twig to their nose” (Ezek. 8:17) appears to be a proverbial expression variously interpreted. Some understand it as the barsom, which the Pharisees while praying held in front of the mouth as a magical mode of driving demons away. Two other explanations may be given—that it is a proverbial expression, “to apply the twig to anger,” in the sense of adding fuel to the fire. The second, that of Hitzig, “They apply the sickle to their nose,” i.e., by seeking to injure me they injure themselves (Keil, Com., ad loc.).

The phrase “they will remove your nose and your ears” (Ezek. 23:25) is not to be interpreted, as the earlier expositors suppose, from the custom prevalent among the Egyptians and other nations of cutting off the nose of an adulteress, but rather it depicts the mutilation of prisoners.

NOSE RING. A ring worn in or on the nose as an adornment (Gen. 24:47; Isa. 3:21; Ezek. 16:12). The KJV renders the word “earring” and “nose jewel.” See Jewelry.

NOVICE (Gk. neophutos, “newly planted”). One lately converted, not yet matured in Christian experience (1 Tim. 3:6, KJV only). Later the term came to be applied to converts to Christianity preparing for baptism.

NU'BIANS. The NIV rendering of KJV and NASB “Ethiopians” in Dan. 11:43. See Ethiopia.

NUMBER. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words.

Mode of Expressing Numbers. Like most oriental nations, it is probable that the Hebrews in their written calculations made use of the letters of the alphabet. That they did so in post-Babylonian times we have conclusive evidence in the Maccabaeen coins; and it is highly probable that this was the case also in earlier times. But, though on the one hand it is certain that in all existing manuscripts of the Heb. text of the OT the numerical expressions are written at length, yet on the other hand the variations in the several versions among themselves and from the Heb. text, added to the evident inconsistencies in numerical statement among certain passages of that text itself, seem to prove that some shorter mode of writing was originally in vogue, liable to be misunderstood, and in fact misunderstood by copyists and translators. These variations appear to have proceeded from the alphabetic method of writing numbers.

Arithmetic. Although we know little of the arithmetic of the Hebrews, they must have made considerable progress in the science. Thus we find reference made to addition (Num. 1:26), subtraction (Lev. 27:18), surplus (25:27; Num. 3:46, 48), multiplication (Lev. 27:16), division (25:50), and fractions (Gen. 47:24; Lev. 5:16; 6:5; Num. 15:4; Ezek. 4:11; 45:13). The proportions of the measurements of the Temple in Ezekiel presuppose a considerable proficiency in mathematics.

Scripture Numerics. Many interpreters of Scripture are persuaded that numbers in the Bible have a symbolic meaning. See F. W. Grant, The Numerical Bible, The Pentateuch, pp. 11–20, for an interpretation of the spiritual meaning of Bible numbers.

NUMBERS, BOOK OF. The fourth book of the Pentateuch, continuing the redemptive history of Israel where Exodus leaves off. As Genesis is the book of origins, Exodus the book of redemption, and Leviticus the book of worship and fellowship, Numbers is the book of the service and walk of God's redeemed people.

Name. The LXX title Arithmoi (numbers) was rendered Liber Numeri in the Vulg., which appears in English as the book of Numbers or simply Numbers. The book is so designated because it makes a double reference to taking a census of the Jewish people (chaps. 1–3 and chap. 26). As was usual, the Jews named the book from its opening word wayyāḏabbēr (“and He [Jehovah] said”), or more often from the fifth word bāmidbar (“in the wilderness”).

Aim. Numbers continues the journey commenced in the book of Exodus, beginning with the events of the second month of the second year (Num. 10:11) and ending with the eleventh month of the fortieth year (Deut. 1:3). The thirty-eight years of wandering deal with the failure of the redeemed people in the face of every divine provision for their welfare and success. The book is typically significant in warning against the dangers of unbelief. The people disobeyed at Kadesh-barnea (Num. 14) and suffered repeated defeat and eventual death in the desert (20:1–33:49).

Critical Theory. Critics who deny Mosaic authorship divide Numbers into P (Priestly Code) and JE (Jehovistic-Elohistic narrative). Chapters 1:1–10:28 are supposedly a long extract from P, while JE is interwoven in the book. This criticism of Numbers, of a piece with Pentateuchal higher criticism in general, is based upon the same erroneous philosophic, literary, and religious presuppositions. It is a product of rationalistic scepticism that attempted to reconcile prevailing modes of thinking of the nineteenth century with the testimony of the Mosaic books.

NUN (nun; a “fish,” as prolific).

1. An Ephraimite who was the father of Joshua (Ex. 33:11; Num. 11:28; 13:8, 16; 14:6, 30, 38; 26:65; 27:18; 32:12, 28; etc.). There is no account given of his life.
2. The fourteenth letter (ⲛ or ⲣ) of the Hebrew alphabet (Ps. 119:105–112).

NURSE, NURSING (Heb. yānaq, to “give milk,” once āman, to “support, foster,” Ruth 4:16). It is clear, both from Scripture and from Greek and Roman writers, that in ancient times the position of the nurse was one of honor and importance (see Gen. 24:59; 35:8; 2 Sam. 4:4; 2 Kings 11:2). The same term is applied to a foster father or mother, e.g., Num. 11:12; Ruth 4:16; Isa. 49:23. In great families male servants, probably eunuchs in later times, were entrusted with the charge of the boys (2 Kings 10:1, 5).

NURTURE (Gk. paideia, Eph. 6:4, KJV). The whole training and education of children that relates to the cultivation of mind and morals. For this purpose commands and admonitions are sometimes used and at other times, reproofs and punishments. It includes also the care and training of the body. It also is a term describing God’s dealing with His children under grace.

NUTS. See Vegetable Kingdom.

NUZI. See Jacob.

NYM’PHA (nim’na; “nymph-given”). A prominent Christian in Laodicea, whose house was used as a place of worship (Col. 4:15).

O

OAK, WORSHIP OF. Oak groves in early times were used as places of religious concourse; altars were set up in them (Josh. 24:26); Jacob buried idolatrous images under an oak (Gen. 35:4), probably because, since the oak was a consecrated tree, no one would disturb them there. Idolatry was practiced under oaks (Isa. 1:29; 57:5; Ezek. 6:13), and idols were made of oak (Isa. 44:14). See Vegetable Kingdom.

Figurative. The oak is a symbol of Israel (Isa. 6:13) and of strong and powerful men (Amos 2:9). Fading oaks are a symbol of the wicked under judgment (Isa. 1:30).

OAR. See Ship.

OATH. Two terms are employed in the OT to express what we understand by an oath, to take an oath, or to swear. (1) Heb. ʾālâ, “imprecation,” according to Gesenius, from El, the name of God, and so “to call upon God.” Hence the word quite naturally passed over to the sense of imprecation, cursing, as it is frequently rendered (Num. 5:23; Isa. 24:6; Zech. 5:3; etc.). It also means a sworn covenant (Gen. 26:28; 2 Sam. 21:7) and an oath, as an appeal to God in attestation of the truth of a statement (Ex. 22:11; Neh. 10:29). (2) shġbûâ, from the Heb. sheba, “seven,” the sacred number. To “seven one’s self,” or to do by sevens, was to act after the manner of God—to give what was done a peculiarly sacred character—hence to make an oath or swear. Solemn agreements, or oaths, were often accompanied by a sevenfold action of some sort, e.g., the giving of seven ewe lambs by Abraham to Abimelech (Gen. 21:30).

Nature of Oath. Every oath contains two elements, namely, an affirmation, or promise, and an appeal to God as omniscient and the punisher of falsehoods. (1) The principle on which an oath is held to be binding is incidentally laid down in Heb. 6:16: “For men swear by one greater than themselves, and with them an oath given as confirmation is an end of every dispute.” The Almighty is represented as promising or denouncing with an oath, i.e., doing so in the most positive and solemn manner. (2) On the same principle that oath has always been held most binding that appealed to the highest authority both as regards individuals and communities. (a) Thus believers in Jehovah appealed to Him both judicially and extrajudicially. (b) Appeals of this kind to authorities recognized respectively by adjuring parties were regarded as bonds of international security and their infraction as being not only grounds for international complaint but also offenses against divine justice. (3) As a consequence of this principle, (a) appeals to God’s name on the one hand, and to heathen deities on the other, are treated in Scripture as tests of allegiance (Ex. 23:13; Deut. 29:12; etc.). (b) So also the sovereign’s name is sometimes used as a form of obligation (Gen. 42:15; 2 Sam. 11:11; 14:19). (4) Other forms of oath, serious or frivolous, are mentioned, some of which are condemned by our Lord (Matt. 5:33; 23:16–22; cf. James 5:12), yet He did not refuse the solemn adjuration of the high priest (Matt. 26:63–64).

Occasions. The Hebrews used oaths under the following circumstances: (1) Agreement or stipulation for performances of certain acts (Gen. 14:22; 24:2–3, 8–9; etc.). (2) Allegiance to a sovereign or obedience from an inferior to a superior (Eccles. 8:2; 2 Chron. 36:13; 1 Kings 18:10). (3) Promissory oath of a ruler (Josh. 6:26; 1 Sam. 14:24, 28; etc.). Priests took no oath of office (Heb. 7:21). (4) Vows made in the form of an oath (Lev. 5:4). (5) Judicial oaths. Public or judicial oaths were required on the following occasions: (a) A man receiving a pledge from a neighbor was required, in case of injury happening to the pledge, to clear himself by oath of the blame of damage (Ex. 22:10–11; 1 Kings 8:31; 2 Chron. 6:22). (b) A person suspected of having found or otherwise come into possession of lost property was to vindicate himself by an oath (Lev. 6:3). It appears that witnesses were examined on oath; a false witness, or one guilty of suppression of the truth, was to be severely punished (Lev. 5:1; Deut. 19:16–19; cf. Prov. 29:24). (c) A wife suspected of infidelity was required to clear herself by oath (Num. 5:19–22). But this ordeal does not come under the civil administration of justice.

Forms of Oaths. As to the forms of oaths, the Jews appealed to God with or without an imprecation in such phrases as “God do this to me and more also,” etc. (1 Sam. 14:44); “as the Lord lives” (14:39; 19:6; 2 Sam. 15:21; 1 Kings 18:10); “as the Lord lives and as your soul lives” (1 Sam. 20:3); “the Lord is between you and me forever” (20:23); “the God of Abraham judge between us” (Gen. 31:53). The Jews also swore “by heaven,” “by the earth,” “by Jerusalem,” “by the temple” (Matt. 5:34–35; 23:16), “by the angels” (Josephus Wars 2.16.4), and by the lives of distinguished persons (Gen. 42:15–16; 1 Sam. 1:26; 17:55; 2 Sam. 11:11; 14:19). The external manner of an oath was as follows: (1) Originally the oath of a covenant was taken by solemnly sacrificing seven animals, or it was attested by seven witnesses or pledges, consisting either of so many animals presented to the contracting party or of memorials erected to testify to the act (Gen. 21:28–31). (2) Lifting up the hand. Witnesses laid their hands on the head of the accused (Gen. 14:22; Lev. 24:14; Isa. 3:7). (3) Putting the hand under the thigh of the person to whom the promise was made. It has been explained (a) as having reference to the covenant of circumcision; (b) as containing a principle similar to that of phallic symbolism, i.e., the genital organ the symbol of the Creator; (c) as referring to the promised Messiah. (4) Oaths were sometimes taken before the altar or, as some understand the passage, if the persons were not in Jerusalem, in a position looking toward the Temple (1 Kings 8:31; 2 Chron. 6:22). (5) Dividing a sacrifice and passing between or distribution of the pieces (Gen. 15:10, 17; Jer. 34:18). In every case the oath taken before a judgment seat seems to have consisted of an adjuration by the judge, responded to by the persons sworn with an amen (Heb. āmēn, “truly,” 1 Kings 22:16; Gk. su eipas, “you have said,” Matt. 26:63–64).

Sanctity. As the sanctity of oaths was carefully inculcated by the law, so the crime of perjury was strongly condemned; and to a false witness the same punishment was assigned that was due for the crime to which he testified (Ex. 20:7; Lev. 19:12; Deut. 19:16–19; Ps. 15:4; Jer. 5:2; 7:9; Ezek. 16:59; Hos. 10:4; Zech. 8:17).

Christian. The Christian practice in the matter of oaths was founded in great measure on the Jewish. Thus oath-taking on the gospels was an imitation of the Jewish practice of placing the hands on the book of the law. The meaning of our Lord’s interdiction of swearing (Matt. 5:33–37) was that “Christianity should know no oath at all. To the consciousness of the Christian, God should always be so vividly present that, to him and others in the Christian community, his yea and nay are, in point of reliability, equivalent to an oath. His yea and nay are oath enough” (Meyer, Com., ad loc.). The prohibition of swearing does not refer to official oaths but to private conduct, for none of the oaths referred to by our Lord are judicial oaths. The orientals were great swearers, and the secondary oaths forbidden by our Lord are just the ordinary profanities of their conversation. In these they avoided the use of God’s name, and they supposed that the breaking of these oaths did not constitute perjury.

OBADI'AH (ō-ba-dī'a; “servant of Jehovah”).

1. An officer of high rank in the court of Ahab, who is described as “over the household,” i.e., apparently, lord high chamberlain or mayor of the palace (1 Kings 18:3), about 870–850 B.C. Notwithstanding his position, he “feared the Lord greatly,” and during the persecution of the prophets by Jezebel he concealed 100 of them in a cave, supplying them with food. In the third year of the terrible famine that visited Samaria, Ahab and Obadiah divided the land between them to search for pasture. While on his journey he unexpectedly met Elijah, who commanded him to tell the king of the prophet’s appearance. Obadiah hesitated, fearing death at Ahab’s hands, but when Elijah insisted he had no choice but to obey (vv. 5–16).

2. A man referred to in 1 Chron. 3:21 in an obscure manner. Keil (Com., ad loc.) and Smith (Dict., s.v.) believe the passage clearly corrupt. Strong (McC. and S., Cycl., s.v.) considers that Obadiah was a son of Arnan, as the LXX and Vulg. have, reading “his son” instead of “sons of,” and identifies him with Joda (Luke 3:26) and Abiud (Matt. 1:13) of Christ’s genealogy.

3. According to the received text, one of the five sons of Izrahiah, a descendant of Issachar, and a leader of his tribe (1 Chron. 7:3).

4. One of the six sons of Azel, a descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:38; 9:44).

5. A Levite, son of Shemaiah, who dwelt in one of the villages of the Netophathites, near Jerusalem (1 Chron. 9:16). He is named as one of the Temple gatekeepers (Neh. 12:25), about 445 B.C.

6. The second named of the eleven Gadite warriors of renown who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:9), before 1000 B.C.

7. The father of Ishmaiah, who was chief officer of the tribe of Zebulun in David’s reign (1 Chron. 27:19).

8. One of the officials whom Jehoshaphat employed to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:7), about 870 B.C.

9. A Levite of the family of Merari, who was one of the overseers of Temple repairs ordered by King Josiah (2 Chron. 34:12), 622 B.C.

10. The son of Jehiel, of the sons of Joab, who came up with a company of 218 male kinsmen in the second caravan with Ezra (Ezra 8:9), about 457 B.C.

11. One of the priests who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:5), 445 B.C.

12. The prophet. As to the person and circumstances of Obadiah nothing certain is known; and the traditional accounts of him in the rabbis and Fathers, some of whom identify him with Ahab’s pious commander, others with the third captain sent by Ahaziah against Elisha (2 Kings 1:13), are evidently false.

OBADIAH, BOOK OF. One of the minor prophets, constituting the smallest book of the OT. The name Obadiah, the prophet and traditional author of the oracle, means “the servant or worshiper of Jehovah.”

Subject. The prophetic oracle is taken up wholly with the denunciation of Edom for its unbrotherly conduct toward Judah, presenting a foreview of its complete decimation and Judah’s deliverance in the Day of the Lord.

Contents.

I. Edom’s destruction prophesied (vv. 1–9)

- A. Her fortifications conquered (vv. 1–4)
- B. Her possessions consumed (vv. 5–9)
- II. Edom’s destruction explained (vv. 10–14)
- III. Edom’s destruction completed (vv. 15–21)
- A. Her sin judged (vv. 15–16)
- B. Her victim saved (vv. 17–20)
- C. Her kingdom replaced (v. 21)

The Date. The prophecy is variously dated by critics. Oesterley and Robinson view the book as a group of oracles from “almost anytime between the end of the sixth and middle of the second centuries B.C.” (Introduction, p. 370). Critics generally ascribe the prophecy to the Chaldean period after the destruction of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. and deny the unity of the book. Robert Pfeiffer was of the opinion that the original oracle against Edom is preserved in two editions, Obadiah 1–9 and Jeremiah 49:7–22. He dated Obadiah 1–15 about 460 B.C. and 16–21, which he regarded as “apocalyptic fancy,” even later. There is no genuine reason to deny the unity of the prophecy or to refuse it a place in the reign of Jehoram (c. 848–841 B.C.). During Jehoram’s reign the Philistines and Arabians overran Judah and plundered Jerusalem (2 Chron. 21:16–17; cf. Joel 3:3–6; Amos 1:6). At that time the Edomites were particularly hostile to Judah (2 Kings 8:20–22; 2 Chron. 21:8–20). All the requirements of the prophecy are satisfied in this historical context. In support of this view it may be said that the prophet Amos (c. 760) had an acquaintance with Obadiah (cf. Obad. 4 with Amos 9:2; Obad. 9–10, 18 with Amos 1:11–12; Obad. 14 with Amos 1:6, 9; Obad. 19 with Amos 9:12; and Obad. 20 with Amos 9:14). Jeremiah, too, doubtless used the prophecies (cf. Obad. 1–6 with Jer. 49:7–22). Moreover, the position of Obadiah in the minor prophets after Amos suggests a preexilic origin. (For critical literature see T. H. Robinson, “The Structure of the Book of Obadiah,” Jour. of Theol. Studies 17 [1916]: 402–8; G. W. Wade, Obadiah in the Westminster Commentaries [1925].)

O’BAL (ō’bal). A son of Joktan, and founder of an Arabian tribe (Gen. 10:28). The locality (called Ebal in 1 Chron. 1:22; see NIV marg.) where they settled is unknown.

O’BED (ō’bed; “serving”).

1. The son of Boaz and Ruth and father of Jesse the father of David (Ruth 4:17; 1 Chron. 2:12), about 1070 B.C. The name Obed occurs only in Ruth 4:17 and in the four genealogies (Ruth 4:21–22; 1 Chron. 2:12; Matt. 1:5; Luke 3:32).

2. A descendant of Jarha, the Egyptian slave of Sheshan, in the line of Jerahmeel. He was grandson of Zabad, one of David’s mighty men (1 Chron. 2:37–38), after 1015 B.C.

3. One of David’s mighty men (1 Chron. 11:47), about 1000 B.C.

4. One of the gatekeepers of the Temple, son of Shemaiah, the firstborn of Obed-edom (1 Chron. 26:7), before 960 B.C.

5. Father of Azariah, one of the captains of hundreds who joined Jehoiada in the revolution by which Athaliah fell (2 Chron. 23:1), c. 842 B.C.

O’BED-E’DOM (ō’bed-ē’dom; “servant of Edom”).

1. A Levite of the family of Korhites and belonging to the class of gatekeepers (1 Chron. 15:18, 24). He is called a Gittite, or Gathite, from his birthplace, the Levitical city of Gath-rimmon in the tribe of Dan. After the death of Uzzah, the Ark, which was being conducted from the house of Abinadab in Gibeah to the city of David, was carried aside into the house of Obed-edom, where it remained three months, during which time Obed-edom was greatly prospered (13:14). It was brought from that place by David (1 Chron. 15:25), about 986 B.C. It was Obed-edom the Gittite who was appointed to play "with lyres tuned to the sheminith" (1 Chron. 15:21; 16:5, 38). He is probably the same person mentioned in 26:4–8.

2. The son of Jeduthun and one of the Temple gatekeepers (1 Chron. 16:38), before 960 B.C.

3. A person who had charge of the utensils of the sanctuary in the time of Amaziah, king of Judah (2 Chron. 25:24), about 783 B.C.

OBEDIENCE. As a branch of Christian ethics, obedience is to be viewed not only with respect to the relations existing between God and man and between man and society but also with respect to the example of Christ and man's relation to Him.

1. Perfect obedience to the commandments of God must be the object of our constant endeavor. The imperfect results of even our most strenuous efforts, however, reveal the necessity of God's grace in Christ. Nothing less than entire self-surrender to God and reverent trust can make this grace available (see 1 John 1:6–10; 2:1–6; Rom. 3:20; 5:1; 6:1–2; etc.). See Law; Atonement; Faith.

2. Christian obedience also includes that of children to their parents (see Luke 2:51; Eph. 6:1–2); of servants to their masters (see Titus 2:9–10; Col. 3:23; Eph. 6:6); proper respect to civil authority (see Matt. 22:21; Rom. 13:1–7); also proper recognition of the authority of the church, or the obligations of Christian fellowship (Matt. 18:17; 2 Cor. 6:14–18). But see, further, Judgment, Right of Private.

OBEDIENCE OF CHRIST. This embraces not only the holy life of our Lord, His complete conformity to the divine law to which He was subject as a man, but also His voluntary acceptance of His sacrificial suffering and death as the Savior of mankind (see John 8:46; 17:4–6; Matt. 3:15; Rom. 5:18; Gal. 4:4–5; Phil. 2:7–8). The distinction between the active and passive obedience of Christ, however, has been too sharply drawn by many theologians and made the basis of artificial theorizing. Thus, while to the death of Christ is ascribed the blessing of pardon, to what is called His active obedience is referred the imputation of Christ's perfect righteousness to believers, in the stead of imperfect righteousness (see Imputation). But, as Van Oosterzee observes, "The very doing of the Lord was to a certain extent a suffering; his suffering on the other hand, in some respects his highest form of action." The holy life of Christ is essentially connected with human salvation because: (1) Although His atonement centers in His death, His whole life was sacrificial, and the offering of Himself even in death could not have been acceptable without the spotless life that preceded (see 1 Pet. 1:18–19). (2) Christ thus became in Himself the perfect manifestation of truth and righteousness and thus, in His self-denial and love, the perfect ideal of righteousness for mankind (see John 14:6–9; 13:14–15; 1 Pet. 2:21; 1 Cor. 11:1; Phil. 2:4–12). (3) He is also thus fitted to be the "second Adam," the source of spiritual life and strength to His people (see John 10:10; 15:4; Acts 3:15; 1 Cor. 15:45). (4) Thus also Christ achieved His exaltation to the throne of His mediatorial kingdom (see Phil. 2:9–11; Heb. 2:16–18).

O'BIL (ō'bil). An Ishmaelite who was in charge of the herds of camels in the reign of David (1 Chron. 27:30).

OBLATION. See Offering.

O'BOTH (ō'both). The forty-sixth station of the Israelites in their journey from Egypt to Canaan, near Moab (Num. 21:10–11; 33:43–44), probably the oasis el-Weiba.

OBSCURITY. See Gloom.

OBSERVED (Gk. paratērēsis, that which may be seen; “without outward show”). In the expression “the kingdom of God is not coming with signs to be observed” (Luke 17:20), the meaning is, “The coming of Messiah’s kingdom is not so conditioned that this coming could be observed as a visible development; or that it could be said, in consequence of such observation, that here or there is the kingdom” (Meyer, Com., ad loc.).

OBSERVER OF TIMES. See Magic.

OCH'LAN, OC'LAN (ok'ran). Ochran (Ocran, KJV and NIV) was the father of Pagiel, the latter being the leader of the tribe of Asher, who assisted Moses in the numbering of the people (Num. 1:13; 2:27; 7:72, 77; 10:26), 1438 B.C.

O'DED (ō'ded; “reiteration”).

1. The father of Azariah the prophet who met Asa on his return from defeating the Ethiopians (2 Chron. 15:1), before 905 B.C. The address is in v. 8 (see marg.) ascribed to Oded, probably through a mistake of the copyists.

2. A prophet of the Lord in Samaria in the time of Pekah’s invasion of Judah (about 735 B.C.). He met the victorious army returning with their booty and prisoners (200,000) and pointed out to them their cruelty and guilt, exhorting them to turn away the anger of God by sending back their prisoners (2 Chron. 28:9). His speech made a deep impression, and, according to the advice of some of the leaders of Ephraim, the captives were fed, clothed, anointed, and returned to Jericho.

ODOR. See Aroma.

OFFENSE. The English rendering of several Gk. and Heb. words. In the OT, “offense” or “offenses” appears in the NASB in Gen. 41:9; Eccles. 10:4 for Heb. ḥēṭ, with the meaning of “crime or its penalty”; in Lev. 19:7 for Heb. piggûl, “an offense” (“abomination,” KJV; “impure,” NIV); and in Ezra 10:19 for Heb. āshēm, with the meaning of “guilt.” In the KJV, ḥēṭ (Eccles. 10:4), mikshôl (1 Sam. 8:14), and āshām (Hos. 5:15) are behind the English terms. The NIV translates āwôn as “responsibility for offenses” (Num. 18:1) and it renders ḥattāt “offense” (Deut. 19:15) as well as its cognate ḥēṭ (Deut. 21:22).

In the NT, Gk. skandalon, “the movable stick of a trap,” i.e., an impediment, “a rock of offense” (Rom. 9:33) is frequently translated “offense,” although the NASB and NIV are more likely to use stumbling block (Matt. 16:23; 18:7; Luke 17:1; Gal. 5:11), hindrances, or obstacles, (Rom. 16:17). The “offence of the cross” (Gal. 5:11, KJV and NIV) was the offense that the Jews took at Christianity, because faith in a crucified Savior—faith without legal observances—was alone offered as the means of salvation. “Offense” is the KJV and NASB translation of proskomma and proskopē in Rom. 14:20; 2 Cor. 6:3. The NIV renders “causes to stumble” and “stumbling block” respectively.

In Rom. 4:25; 5:15–20, another Gk. term, paraptōma, to “fall beside” or “near,” a “lapse” or “deviation from the truth” is given as “offense” in the KJV and “transgression” in the NASB. The NIV translates “sins” in 4:25 and “trespass” in 5:15–20. The reverse is the case with parabasis in Rom. 5:14. Offended, or offend, appears as the KJV translation of hamartanō in Acts 25:8, of skandalizō in Matt. 13:57; 17:27; Mark 6:3, and of ptaiō in James 2:10; 3:2, although the NASB uses the terms offense and stumble. The NIV translates “do wrong” in Acts 25:8; “take offense” in Matt. 13:57 and Mark 6:3; “offend” in Matt. 17:27; and “stumbles” or “stumble” in James 2:10 and 3:2. See Abomination; Stumbling Block; Transgression.

OFFERING.

1. An offering presented (Heb. qorbān, brought near), usually of the meat offerings (Lev. 2:4; 7:14, 29).

2. A heave-offering (Heb. t□rûmâ, heave), a portion lifted or taken by a person from his property as an offering to God; consequently, everything that was offered by the Israelites, either voluntarily or in consequence of a command from the Lord, for the erection and maintenance of the sanctuary and its officials (Isa. 40:20; Ezek. 44:30; 45:1; etc.).

3. A present (Heb. minhâ, a donation), especially of a bloodless offering (Isa. 19:21; 66:3; Dan. 9:21, 27).

4. A libation (Heb. massākâ, pouring), in worship a libation, but it is to be taken in Dan. 2:46 in the general sense of sacrifice. See First Fruits; Sacrifice; Sacrificial Offerings.

OFFICE. The rendering of numerous Heb. and Gk. words, with some variety of meaning: position (Gen. 41:13; 1 Chron. 23:28); the priestly fraternity (Luke 1:9; Heb. 7:5); pastoral oversight (1 Tim. 3:1). In the KJV this translation also means responsibility (Num. 4:16; 2 Chron. 24:11; Ps. 109:8); priestly service (Luke 1:8); function, as of a member of the body, or of the church (Rom. 12:4).

OFFICER. It is obvious that most, if not all, of the Heb. words rendered “officer” are either of an indefinite character or are synonymous terms for those who serve in functions known under other and more specific names such as “scribe,” “eunuch,” etc.

1. Eunuch (Heb. sārîs, to “castrate,” Gen. 37:36; 39:1; cf. 40:2), usually (but not in the NIV) rendered eunuch (which see).

2. Prefect (Heb. shōtēr, properly a “writer”), from the use of writing in judicial administration, a magistrate; the “taskmasters” (“slave drivers,” NIV) set over the Israelites in Egypt (Ex. 5:6–19); those appointed with the elders to administer public affairs among the Israelites (Num. 11:16; Deut. 20:5, 8–9; 29:10; Josh. 1:10; etc.); magistrates in the cities and towns of Palestine (Deut. 16:18; 1 Chron. 23:4; 26:29; etc.), and apparently a military chief (2 Chron. 26:11).

3. One appointed (Heb. nissāb, “fixed,” 1 Kings 9:23, see marg.), elsewhere “deputy,” general receivers of taxes, or chief tax collectors, who levied the king’s duties or taxes, consisting in the East, for the most part, of the produce of the land, and were delivered at the royal kitchen.

4. A superintendent (KJV only), either civil, military, or ecclesiastical (Heb. paqēd, Gen. 41:34; Judg. 9:28; Esther 2:3; etc.).

5. The two words so rendered in the NT each bear in ordinary Gk. a special sense. In the case of hupēretēs (Matt. 5:25; John 7:32, 45–46; 18:3, 12, 18, 22; Acts 5:22, 26), this is of no definite kind, but the word is used to denote an inferior officer of a court of justice, a messenger or bailiff, like the Roman lictor. Praktores (Luke 12:58, KJV), at Athens, were officers whose duty it was to register and collect fines imposed by courts of justice; to “deliver to the officer” means, to give in the name of the debtor to the officer of the court.

OFFICES OF CHRIST. The three offices of Christ as Prophet, Priest, and King.

Biblical View. This division of the saving work of Christ is derived from the Scriptures inferentially. The OT term Messiah is generally, though not universally, held to have this threefold significance (see Messiah). Also the work ascribed by prophecy to Christ had this threefold character (see particularly Deut. 18:15; Isa. 49:7; chap. 53). Moreover, the divinely appointed economy of Judaism, with the three great offices of prophet, priest, and theocratic king, was typical of Christ. In the NT we find that Christ spoke of Himself most distinctly as king. He referred to Himself but indirectly as prophet (e.g., Matt. 13:57) and never called Himself priest. His reserve may be explained by His words in John 16:12–13. We find, however, from the gospels that His work in a large measure was actually that of a prophet; and as the time drew near for His great sacrifice He spoke of it in a way that clearly indicated His priestly character (see Matt. 26:26–28; John 10:11, 17–18). This fullness of Christ’s work, as might be expected, is more clearly set forth in Acts and in the epistles (see Acts 2:22, 33, 38; 4:12; 5:31; 7:37, 52; Heb. 1:2–3; 2:9–11; 7:22–28; etc.).

Christ is Prophet because more than all others He has declared to men the truth and will of God. He is Himself the revelation of God (see John 14:9; 17:25–26; Heb. 1:1–2; etc.). He is Priest not only because of His holy character and mediatorial position, but also, and emphatically, because of His sacrificial work (see, besides Scriptures already cited, 1 John 2:1–2; Rev. 5:9). See Atonement.

He is King not only by virtue of His divine nature but also because as the God-man He is the divinely appointed head of the mediatorial kingdom, who in His second advent as “King of kings” (Rev. 19:16) will restore the kingdom to Israel (Acts 1:6) and fulfill the Davidic covenant and the OT promises made to Israel (2 Chron. 7; Isa. 60; Zech. 8; etc.).

It is important in the highest degree that each one of these forms of the work of Christ should be duly recognized. Otherwise we fail to obtain the right conception of Christ and of His relations to mankind.

Historical. The division of Christ’s mediatorial work in three offices, based upon Scripture, was formally stated in the early church, as indicated in the writings of Eusebius, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Augustine.

In the Middle Ages it was elaborated by Thomas Aquinas. It was introduced into the theology of the Lutheran and Calvinistic churches. Through the influence of T. A. Ernesti, in 1773, and others, this form of statement fell to a large extent into disuse. It was revived by Schleiermacher and others, who in this respect followed in his footsteps. It is now currently employed in the theology of the evangelical churches of Europe and America.

OFFSCOURING (Heb. shī, “refuse,” as “swept” off). A figurative term for something vile (Lam. 3:45). The apostles were looked upon by some in their day in this way (Gk. peripsēma, 1 Cor. 4:13, KJV; “scum,” NIV).

OG (og). An Amorite, king of Bashan (Num. 21:33; 32:33; Deut. 4:47; 31:4), who ruled over sixty cities (Josh. 13:30), the chief of which were Ashtaroth and Edrei (v. 12) at the time of the occupation of Canaan, c. 1400 B.C. He was defeated by the Israelites at Edrei and, with his children and people, was exterminated (Num. 21:33–35; Deut. 1:4; 3:1–13; 29:7; Josh. 2:10). His many walled cities were taken (Deut. 3:4–10), and his kingdom was assigned to the trans-Jordanic tribes, especially the half tribe of Manasseh (3:13; Josh. 9:10; 13:12, 30). He was a man of giant stature, and Moses speaks of his iron bedstead (or sarcophagus, some scholars believe), nine cubits long by four broad, which was preserved as a memorial in Rabbath (Deut. 3:11). He was one of the last representatives of the giant race of Rephaim.

O'HAD (ō'had; "unity"). The third named of the sons of Simeon (Gen. 46:10) and head of a family in Israel (Ex. 6:15).

OHO'LAH (ōhō'la; "her own tent"). The name of a probably imaginary harlot, used by Ezekiel (23:4–5, 36, 44; "Aholah," KJV) as a symbol of the idolatry of Samaria, the apostate branch of Judah being designated by Oholibah ("Aholibah," KJV). The terms indicate respectively that, whereas the worship of Samaria had been self-invented and never sanctioned by Jehovah, at Jerusalem it was divinely instituted but was now degraded and abandoned for foreign alliances. They are both graphically described as lewd women, adulteresses prostituting themselves to the Egyptians and Assyrians, in imitating their abominations and idolatries; as such the allegory is an epitome of the history of the Jewish people.

OHO'LIAB (ōhō'li-ab; "tent of his father"; "Aholiab," KJV). The son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan, an expert workman in precious metals and other materials and, together with Bezalel, appointed to superintend the preparation of such articles for the Tabernacle (Ex. 31:6; 35:34; 36:1–2; 38:23), c. 1440 B.C.

OHOL'IBAH (ōhō'li-ba; "my tent is in her"; "Aholibah," KJV). A symbolical name given to Jerusalem (Ezek. 23:4, 11, 22, 36, 44), under the figure of an adulterous harlot, as having once contained the true worship of Jehovah and having prostituted herself to foreign idolatries. See Oholah.

OHOLIBA'MAH (ōhōl-i-ba'ma; "tent of the height"; "Aholibamah," KJV).

1. The granddaughter of Zibeon the Hivite and one of the wives of Esau (Gen. 36:2). In a previous narrative (26:34) Oholibamah is called Judith the daughter of Beeri the Hittite. The probable explanation is that her proper name was Judith and that Oholibamah was the name that she received as the wife of Esau and founder of the three tribes of his descendants.

2. One of the chiefs who sprang from Esau (Gen. 36:41; 1 Chron. 1:52). The list of names in which this is included is probably of places, not of persons. This would seem to be evident from the expression in the heading, "according to their families and their localities, by their names" (Gen. 36:40,) as compared with v. 43, "according to their habitations in the land of their possession" (Keil, ad loc.; Smith, Dict., s.v.).

OIL. The following original words are rendered "oil": (1) Most generally oil is the rendering of the Heb. shemen, "grease." Sometimes rendered "ointment" in the KJV. (2) Heb. yīshār, "shining, clear olive oil" (Num. 18:12; Deut. 7:13; 11:14; 12:17; etc.). (3) Aram. m□shah, an "unguent" (only in Ezra 6:9; 7:22). (4) Gk. elaion, neuter of word meaning "olive."

Of the numerous substances, animal and vegetable, that were known to the ancients as yielding oil, the olive berry is the one the Scriptures mention most frequently. The best oil is made from fruit gathered about November or December, when it has begun to change color but before it has become black. The berry in the more advanced state yields more oil, but it is of an inferior quality.

Harvesting. In order not to injure either the crop or the tree, great care is necessary in gathering, either by hand or shaking the fruit off carefully with a light stick. It is then carefully cleaned and carried to press, which is considered best; or, if necessary, laid on tables with hollow trays made sloping, so as to allow the first juice to flow into other receptacles beneath, care being taken not to heap the fruit too much and so prevent the free escape of the juice, which is injurious to the oil though itself useful in other ways.

Manufacture. In order to make oil, the fruit was either bruised in a mortar, crushed in a press loaded with wood or stones, ground in a mill, or trodden with the feet. The “beaten” oil of Ex. 27:20; 29:40; Lev. 24:2; Num. 28:5 was probably made by bruising in a mortar. The berries are bruised in a crude mill consisting of a round stone resembling a millstone but much larger, usually six to eight feet in diameter. This stone is laid flat on the ground. Its upper surface is depressed about three inches, except at its edge. The center of this stone is bored through, and an upright pole is fastened in it, projecting about three feet above it. Another stone disk, five or six feet in diameter and a foot or eighteen inches thick, is set on edge in the depression on the top of the other. Through the center of this stone passes a long pole, one end of which has a ring attached to it, which fits over the end of the upright in the other disk, while the other end is attached to a whiffletree, by which a horse or mule draws it round and round the mill. The berries are placed in the cavity on the face of the horizontal stone, and the upright stone moves around the edge of the cavity, crushing the berries as it goes. A part of the oil thus expressed is drawn off by a hole in the elevated rim of the stone. The refuse is then transferred to baskets, which are piled on top of one another in the space between two grooved upright posts. A lever, weighted at its distal end with heavy stones, compresses these baskets and expresses the crude oil. This is run into large stone reservoirs, in which it becomes clarified and is kept for use or sale. From these the oil was drawn out for use in horns or other small vessels, which were stored in cellars or storehouses, of which special mention is made in the inventories of royal property and revenue (1 Sam. 10:1; 16:1, 13; 1 Kings 1:39; 17:16; 2 Kings 4:2, 6; 9:1, 3; 1 Chron. 27:28; 2 Chron. 11:11; 32:28; Prov. 21:20). A supply of oil was always kept in the Temple (Josephus Wars 5.13.6), and an oil treasure was among the stores of the Jewish kings (2 Kings 20:13; 2 Chron. 32:27–28). Oil of Tekoa was reckoned the best. Trade in oil was carried on with the Tyrians, by whom it was probably often re-exported to Egypt, whose olives do not for the most part produce good oil (2 Chron. 2:10). Direct trade in oil was also carried on between Egypt and Palestine (Ezra 3:7; Isa. 57:9; Ezek. 27:17; Hos. 12:1).

Uses.

As Food. Oil is now, as formerly, in general use as food throughout western Asia, taking the place of butter and animal fat in various preparations (cf. Ezek. 16:13). Indeed, it would appear that the Hebrews considered oil one of the prime necessities of life (Sirach 39:31; cf. Jer. 31:12; 41:8; Luke 16:6). It is frequently mentioned with honey (Ezek. 16:13, 19; 27:17), and its abundance was a mark of prosperity (cf. Joel 2:19).

Cosmetic. As is the case generally in hot climates, oil was used by the Jews for anointing the body, e.g., after the bath, and giving to the skin and hair a smooth and comely appearance, e.g., before an entertainment. At Egyptian entertainments it was usual for a servant to anoint the head of each guest as he took his seat (Deut. 28:40; 2 Sam. 12:20; 14:2; Ruth 3:3).

Funereal. The bodies of the dead were anointed with oil by the Greeks and Romans, probably as a partial antiseptic, and a similar custom appears to have prevailed among the Jews.

Medicinal. As oil is in use in many cases in modern medicine, it is not surprising that it should have been much used among the Jews and other nations of antiquity for medicinal purposes. Celsus repeatedly speaks of the use of oil, especially old oil, applied externally with friction in fevers, and in many other cases. Josephus mentions that among the remedies employed in the case of Herod, he was put into a sort of oil bath. The prophet Isaiah (Isa. 1:6) alludes to the use of oil as ointment in medical treatment; and it thus furnished a fitting symbol, perhaps also an efficient remedy, when used by our Lord's disciples in the miraculous cures that they were enabled to perform (Mark 6:13). With similar intention, no doubt, its use was enjoined by James (5:14).

Light. Oil was in general use for lamps, being still used in Egypt with cotton wicks twisted around straw, the receptacle being a glass vessel into which water is first poured (Matt. 25:1–9; cf. Luke 12:35).

Ritual. Oil as poured on or mixed with the flour used in offering (see Sacrificial Offerings), excepting the sin offering (Lev. 5:11) and the offering of jealousy (Num. 5:15). The use of oil in sacrifices was indicative of joy or gladness; the absence of oil denoted sorrow or humiliation (Isa. 61:3; Joel 2:19; Rev. 6:6). Kings, priests, and prophets were anointed with oil or ointment. Tithes of oil were also prescribed (Deut. 12:17; 2 Chron. 31:5; Neh. 10:37, 39; 13:12; Ezek. 45:14).

Figurative. Oil was a fitting symbol of the Spirit or spiritual principle of life, by virtue of its power to sustain and fortify the vital energy; and the anointing oil, which was prepared according to divine instructions, was therefore a symbol of the Spirit of God, as the principle of spiritual life that proceeds from God and fills the natural being of the creature with the powers of divine life. Anointing with oil, therefore, was a symbol of endowment with the Spirit of God for the duties of the office to which a person was consecrated (Lev. 8:12; 1 Sam. 10:1, 6; 16:13–14; Isa. 61:1). Oil was symbolic of abundance (Deut. 8:8; Ezek. 16:13); lack of oil was a figure for want, poverty (Deut. 28:40; Joel 1:10); to “suck honey from the rock, and oil from the flinty rock” (Deut. 32:13) is a figure derived from the fact that Canaan abounds in wild bees, which make their hives in clefts of the rock and in olive trees that grow in a rocky soil. The expression suggests the most valuable productions out of the most unproductive places, since God so blessed the land that even the rocks and stones were productive. “The oil of gladness” is a figure for the consolations of the gospel (Isa. 61:3; Heb. 1:9); “oil upon the head” (Ps. 141:5) is a figure for kind reproof. “His words were softer than oil” (55:21) is used to express the hypocritical pretense of a false friend (cf. Prov. 5:3). See Vegetable Kingdom: Olive.

OIL, HOLY, ANOINTING. The mode of preparing this oil is prescribed (Ex. 30:22–25). It was a compound consisting of one hin (about one gallon) of olive oil, 500 shekels of pure myrrh, 250 shekels of cane, 250 shekels of fragrant cinnamon, and 500 shekels of cassia (the aromatic bark of a shrub that grows in Arabia). The proportions in which these ingredients were mixed compels us to assume that the cinnamon, calamus, and cassia were not mixed with the oil in their dry form but as prepared spices, say in the shape of cinnamon cane and cassia ointment; or it may have been, as the rabbinical writers assure us, that the dry substances were steeped or boiled in water to extract the strength or virtue out of them; then to the liquid thus obtained the oil was added, and both were put upon the fire to boil till the whole of the watery element should evaporate. The preparing of the anointing oil was superintended by Bezalel, the perfumer (37:29).

OILS AND OINTMENTS.

Name. Although the term ointment is frequent in the KJV, it is rare in the NASB and NIV, usually being replaced there by oil (sometimes alone, at other times not, e.g., “holy anointing oil,” Ex. 30:25; “precious oil,” 2 Kings 20:13; Is. 39:2; “perfumer’s oil,” Eccles.

10:1), or perfume (Matt. 26:7, 9; Mark 14:3–4; Luke 7:37, 38, 46; 23:56; John 12:3, 5). The Heb. terms include shemen, rōqēah, mishhâ, and mirqahat; muron is the Gk. original.

Nature and Preparation. The ointments and oils used by the Israelites were generally composed of various ingredients. Olive oil was combined with sundry aromatics, chiefly foreign (1 Kings 10:10; Ezek. 27:22), particularly spices, myrrh, and nard. Being costly, these ointments were a much-prized luxury (Amos 6:6). The ingredients, and often the prepared oils and resins ready for use, were imported from Phoenicia in small alabaster boxes, in which the delicious aroma was best preserved. The preparation of these required peculiar skill and formed a particular trade, sometimes carried on by women (1 Sam. 8:13; see Handicrafts: Perfumers). The better kinds of ointments were so strong, and the different substances so perfectly amalgamated, that they have been known to retain their scent for centuries. One of the alabaster vases at Alnwick Castle contains some ancient Egyptian ointment that has retained its fragrance between 2,000 and 3,000 years.

Uses. The practice of producing agreeable odors by burning incense, anointing the person with aromatic oils and ointments, and sprinkling the dress with fragrant waters originated in, and is mostly confined to, warm climates. In such climates the perspiration is profuse, and much care is needed to prevent offensive results. It is in this necessity that we find a reason for the use of perfumes, particularly at feasts, weddings, and on visits of persons of rank. The following are the uses of ointments in Scripture:

Cosmetic. The Greek and Roman practice of anointing the head and clothes on festive occasions prevailed also among the Egyptians and appears to have had place among the Jews (Ruth 3:3; Prov. 27:9, 16; Eccles. 7:1; 9:8; etc.). Oil of myrrh, for like purposes, is mentioned (Esther 2:12). Egyptian paintings represent servants anointing guests on their arrival at their entertainer's house, and alabaster vases exist that retain the traces of the ointment that they were used to contain.

Funereal. Perfumes as well as oil were used to anoint dead bodies and the clothes in which they were wrapped (Matt. 26:12; Mark 14:3, 8; Luke 23:56; John 12:3–7; 19:40).

Medicinal. Ointment formed an important feature in ancient medical treatment (Isa. 1:6). The mention of balm of Gilead and of eye salve (collyrium) points to the same method (Isa. 1:6; John 9:6; Jer. 8:22; Rev. 3:18; etc.).

Ritual. Besides the oil used in many ceremonial observances, a special ointment was used in consecration (Ex. 29:7; 30:23–25; 37:29; 40:9, 15). Strict prohibition was issued against using this ointment for any secular purpose, or on the person of a foreigner, and against imitating it in any way whatsoever (30:32–33). The weight of the oil in the mixture would be twelve pounds eight ounces in English measure. A question arises: In what form were the other ingredients, and what degree of solidity did the whole attain? According to Maimonides, Moses, having reduced the solid ingredients to powder, steeped them in water till all the aromatic qualities were drawn forth. He then poured in the oil and boiled the whole till the water evaporated. The residue thus obtained was preserved in a vessel for use. Another theory supposes all the ingredients to have been in the form of oil or ointment. The measurement by weight of all except the oil seems to imply that they were in some solid form, but whether in an oily state or in that of powder cannot be ascertained. A process of making ointment consisting, in part at least, in boiling, is alluded to (Job 41:31).

OLD GATE. The name (Neh. 3:6; 12:39) of a gate in Jerusalem (which see), probably the gate on the NE corner. The NIV renders “Jeshanah [i.e., “old”] Gate.” See also Gate.

OLD TESTAMENT. The part of the Bible extending from Genesis to Malachi.

Designation. This portion of revealed truth consists of thirty-nine books, which make up about 8/13 of the content of the whole Bible. The thirty-nine books of the Protestant canon are identical with the ancient Hebrew canon. Roman Catholics have a larger canon, consisting of eleven of the fourteen apocryphal, called deuterocanonical books. These books, however, have no legitimate place in the canon. The OT bears a vital and inseparable relation to the NT. It is fundamental and preparatory. The NT is enfolded in the OT, and the OT is unfolded by the NT. It is a mistake to separate the two testaments. In rejecting Christianity and the NT revelation, Judaism makes this blunder. The terms Old Testament and New Testament were popularized by the Latin Fathers and did not come into vogue until the Christian Scriptures were complete. The term Old Testament was used as a device to distinguish the Christian Scriptures from the “Jewish Scriptures.” In one sense of the word, the terms Old Testament and New Testament are inaccurate, since the Old or Mosaic Covenant overlaps and was in force until the crucifixion of Christ and the veil of the Temple was torn in two from top to bottom. The New Covenant is based upon the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, and the Jew who would now enjoy salvation must come by “a new and living way” (Heb. 10:20), that is, Christ (John 14:6).

Origin and Preservation. The NT expressly declares the inspiration of the OT books (2 Tim. 3:16; 2 Pet. 1:20–21). Likewise, everywhere in the OT the Hebrew Scriptures are presented as the divinely revealed Word of God. God is everywhere set forth implicitly and explicitly as its principal Author. The sacred writers are represented as receiving or recording the divine message in its fullness and with divine accuracy. Internal evidence of its inspiration abounds everywhere. The sacred authors repeatedly prefix their messages with such commanding expressions as “Thus says the Lord” (Ex. 4:22) and “Hear the word of the Lord” (Isa. 1:10). Prophets such as Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Daniel have had their predictions verified by time.

Almost as unique as the inspiration of the OT is its preservation. Many other books besides Scripture existed (Eccles. 12:12). Echoes of ancient literary pieces survive in the Scripture references to the book of Jasher (Josh. 10:13; 2 Sam. 1:18) and “the Book of the Wars of the Lord” (Num. 21:14). Human writings apparently contested with inspired documents. Divine intervention assured the giving, reception, and recording of Holy Scripture as well as its miraculously meticulous and accurate preservation through the centuries—an almost incredible phenomenon at a time when each manuscript had to be executed by hand.

Position and Purpose in the Canon. The OT comes before the NT because it is introductory both historically, typically, and redemptively to all that is enfolded there. The central unifying theme is the Person and work of Christ. From the proto-evangelium (Gen. 3:15) to Malachi’s “Sun of righteousness,” Christ is the interwoven and inseparable subject of all the OT. The OT does not present the church of the NT (except typically), which was a mystery hidden in God (Eph. 3:1–9) and was first revealed to the apostle Paul. The OT, however, fully presents the first advent of Christ, leaving the gap between the two comings to be filled in by the NT church. The OT in amazing detail presents the coming of the Redeemer to work out man’s salvation (cf. Isa. 53:1–12) and also with great elaboration sets forth the second coming of Christ and the establishment of the millennial kingdom, involving the restoration of Israel. The disciples’ question in Acts 1:6, “Lord, is it at this time You are restoring the kingdom to Israel?” finds the fullest elucidation in the OT, not in connection with the church, but in connection with the Great Tribulation and the cataclysmic second coming of Christ, as set forth in the book of the Revelation (chaps. 4–19).

Value of the OT. Although the OT Scriptures were given to one small nation, its message is for all time. In no sense is it confined to Palestine or to the Jews, but because of its world outreach becomes vital to all peoples of every land and age. The target of relentless critical attack stigmatized by unbelief, it continues with the NT to meet man's deepest needs and to lead the human race to the fountain of salvation and dynamic inspiration for right living. OLIVE. See Vegetable Kingdom: Oil.

OLIVES, MOUNT OF. The ridge of hills east of Jerusalem, separated from it by the Jehoshaphat Valley.

Name. Its descriptive appellation is “the Mount of Olives” (Heb. har hazzêtîm, only in Zech. 14:4; Gk. to oros tou elaiov, the mount on which the olive grew; Matt. 21:1; 24:3; 26:30; Mark 11:1; Luke 19:37; John 8:1). It is referred to (2 Sam. 15:30) as “the ascent of the Mount of Olives”; “the mountain which is east of Jerusalem” (1 Kings 11:7); “the mount of destruction” (2 Kings 23:13), from the heathen altars erected there by Solomon (cf. 1 Kings 11:7); “the hills” (Neh. 8:15), and “the mount called Olivet” (Acts 1:12). The hill has now two names, Jebel et-Tûr, i.e., “the Mount,” and Jebel et-Zeitûn, “Mount of Olives.”

Physical Features. The Mount of Olives is a limestone ridge, rather more than a mile in length, running in general direction N and S and covering the whole eastern side of the city of Jerusalem. At the N the ridge bends to the W, enclosing the city on that side also. At the N about a mile intervenes between the city walls, while on the E the mount is separated only by the valley of Kidron. It is to the latter part that attention is called. At a distance its outline is almost horizontal, gradually sloping away at its southern end; but when seen from below the eastern wall of Jerusalem, it divides itself into three or perhaps four independent summits or natural elevations. Beginning at the N they are: Galilee or Viri Galilaei, from the address of the angel to the disciples (Acts 1:11); Mount of Ascension, now distinguished by the minaret and domes of the Church of the Ascension, in every way the most important; Mount of the Prophets, subordinate to the former; and Mount of Offense. Three paths lead from the valley to the summit. The first passes under the N wall of the enclosure of Gethsemane and follows the line of the depression between the center and the northern hill. The second parts from the first about fifty yards beyond Gethsemane and, striking off to the right up the very breast of the hill, surmounts the projection on which is the traditional spot of the lamentation over Jerusalem and thence proceeds directly upward to the village of Bethany. The third leaves the other two at the NE corner of Gethsemane and, making a considerable detour to the S, visits the so-called “Tombs of the Prophets” and, following a slight depression that occurs at that part of the mount, arrives in its turn at Bethany. Every consideration is in favor of the first path being that which David took when fleeing from Absalom, as well as that usually taken by our Lord and His disciples in their morning and evening walks between Jerusalem and Bethany, and that also by which the apostles returned to Jerusalem after the ascension. Tradition assigns many sacred sites to the Mount of Ascension, Gethsemane, and the place of lamentation. The third of the traditional spots mentioned—that of the lamentation over Jerusalem (Luke 9:41–44)—has been shown to have been badly chosen and that the road of our Lord’s “triumphal entry” was not by the short and steep path over the summit but the longer and easier route around the southern shoulder of the southern of the three divisions of the mount.

Scripture Notices. The Mount of Olives is mentioned in connection with the flight of David from Absalom (2 Sam. 15:30); with the building there of high places by Solomon (2 Kings 23:13); and with the vision of the Lord’s departure from Jerusalem (Ezek. 10:4, 19; 11:23), in which last passage the prophet said, “And the glory of the Lord went up from the midst of the city, and stood over the mountain which is east of the city.” The command to “go out to the hills, and bring olive branches,” etc. (Neh. 8:15), indicates that the mount, and probably the valley at its base, abounded in various kinds of trees. In the time of Jesus the trees were still numerous (Mark 11:8). The only other OT mention of the Mount of Olives is in Zechariah’s prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem and the preservation of God’s people (Zech. 14:4). The NT narrative makes Olivet the scene of four remarkable events in the history of Jesus: the triumphal entry—its scene being the road that winds around the southern shoulder of the hill from Bethany to Jerusalem (Matt. 21:1, 8–10; Mark 11:1, 8–10; Luke 19:29, 36–37, 41); the prediction of Jerusalem’s overthrow (Mark 13:1–2); Gethsemane—after the institution of the Lord’s Supper, Jesus led His disciples “over the ravine of the Kidron” and “out to the Mount of Olives,” to a garden called Gethsemane (John 18:1; Matt. 26:30, 36); and the ascension (which see).

OLIVET See Olives, Mount of.

OLIVET DISCOURSE. This great prophetic pronouncement of our Lord extends from Matt. 24:1 to 25:46, cf. Luke 21:5–38. In this far-reaching eschatological pronouncement Jesus in a sense gives a farewell message to Israel through His disciples in the role of representative Israelites and outlines the future of the nation previous to the millennial kingdom. In this prophetic statement concerning Israel, no mention is made of the church, her beginning, her course, her destiny, or her sojourn in the world. Likewise, no reference is made to the Person or work of the Holy Spirit as each occurs in this age. If the course and character of this present age are reflected, it is only in a general sense apart from the distinctive character and destiny of the church (cf. 24:6–7).

The disciples’ threefold question recorded in Matt. 24:3 is answered as follows: “When will these things be?” that is, the destruction of the city and Temple in A.D. 70. Luke 21:20–24 answers that. The second and third questions: “And what will be the sign of Your coming and of the end of the age?” are answered in Matt. 24:4–33. Christ spoke of Israel’s cataclysmic time of trouble at the end of the age and warned concerning it (vv. 9–28). The glorious appearing of the Messiah to Israel is described in 24:29–25:30, exhortations to watch in 24:36–25:13, and judgments upon Israel in 24:45–25:30. The prophecy concludes with the judgment of the nations in regard to their treatment of Israel (25:31–46). Thus the Olivet discourse in Matthew and Luke gives us the eschatological future of the nation Israel and, except for the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, deals with the fate of Israel in Daniel’s Seventieth Week after the glorification of the church. See the articles Seventy Weeks; Daniel, Book of. M.F.U.

OLYM'PAS (ō-lim'pas). The name of an individual, apparently in Rome, to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom. 16:15).

O'MAR (ō'mar). A descendant of Esau through his son Eliphaz (Gen. 36:11, 15; 1 Chron. 1:36).

OME'GA (Ω) (ō-me'ga). The last letter of the Gk. alphabet, as alpha is the first.

Figurative. Omega is used metaphorically to denote the end of anything. "I am the Alpha and the Omega, the first and the last, the beginning and the end" (Rev. 1:8, 17; 21:6; 22:13; cf. Isa. 41:4; 44:6).

OMER. A Hebrew dry measure. See Metrology.

OMNIPOTENCE. Exclusively an attribute of God and essential to the perfection of His being. It is declared in such Scriptures as Gen. 17:1; Ex. 15:11–12; Deut. 3:24; Pss. 62:11; 65:6; 147:5; Jer. 32:17; Matt. 6:13; 19:26; Eph. 3:20; Rev. 19:6. By ascribing to God absolute power, it is not meant that God is free from all the restraints of reason and morality, as some have taught, but that He is able to do everything that is in harmony with His wise and holy and perfect nature (see Matt. 23:19; Heb. 6:18). The infinite power of God is set before us in the Scriptures in connection with His work of creation (Gen. 1:1; Rom. 1:20), His work of upholding the world (Heb. 1:3), the redemption of mankind (Luke 1:35, 37; Eph. 1:19), the working of miracles (Luke 9:43), the conversion of sinners (1 Cor. 2:5; 2 Cor. 4:7), and the complete accomplishment of the great purpose of His kingdom (Matt. 6:13; 13:31–32; 1 Pet. 1:5; 1 Cor. 15; Rev. 19:6). For fuller exposition see works of systematic theology, elsewhere referred to, particularly Hodge, Dorner, Van Oosterzee. E.MCC.

OMNIPRESENCE. An attribute of God alone, by which is meant that God is free from the laws or limitations of space (see Ps. 139:7–10; Jer. 23:23–24; Heb. 1:3; Acts 17:27–28; etc.). It is essential to the right conception of God in this respect that we avoid all materialistic notions of His presence that confuse God with everything and thus lead to pantheism (which see). God is Spirit, and His infinite presence is to be regarded in the dynamical sense rather than in the sense of a substance infinitely extended. He is distinct from all His works while His power and intelligence and goodness embrace and penetrate them all. The omnipresence of God is also to be regarded as compatible with various manifestations of His presence according to the spheres of life in which He exists and operates. Thus in the most exalted sense He is "Our Father ... in heaven" (see Matt. 6:9; etc.).

OMNISCIENCE. The divine attribute of perfect knowledge. This is declared in Pss. 33:13–15; 139:11–12; 147:5; Prov. 15:3; Isa. 40:14; 46:10; Acts 15:18; 1 John 3:20; Heb. 4:13, and in many other places. The perfect knowledge of God is exclusively His attribute. It relates to Himself and to all beyond Himself. It includes all things that are actual and all things that are possible. Its possession is incomprehensible to us, and yet it is necessary to our faith in the perfection of God's sovereignty. The revelation of this divine property like that of others is well calculated to fill us with profound reverence. It should alarm sinners and beget confidence in the hearts of God's children and deepen their consolation (see Job 23:10; Pss. 34:15–16; 90:8; Jer. 17:10; Hos. 7:2; 1 Pet. 3:12–14). The Scriptures unequivocally declare the divine prescience and at the same time make their appeal to man as a free and consequently responsible being.

OM'RI (om'ri).

1. The seventh king of Israel, originally commander of the armies of Elah king of Israel, and engaged in the siege of Gibbethon when informed of the king's death and the usurpation of Zimri.

Proclaimed king by his army, Omri left Gibbethon and besieged Zimri in Tirzah. In despair Zimri burned himself in his palace (1 Kings 16:16–18), 885 B.C. Another competitor appeared in the person of Tibni, the son of Ginath. After a civil war of four years Omri was left undisputed master of the throne (vv. 21–22), c. 880 B.C. Having resided six years in Tirzah, he moved to the hill Samaria, which he bought from Shemer for two talents of silver. He seems to have been a vigorous and unscrupulous ruler, anxious to strengthen his dynasty by connections and alliances with foreign states. He made a treaty with Ben-hadad I of Damascus, surrendering to him some foreign cities (20:34), among them, probably, Ramoth-gilead (22:3), and admitted into Samaria a resident Syrian embassy, which is described by the expression “you shall make streets for yourself in Damascus, as my father made in Samaria” for Ben-hadad. He united his son in marriage to the daughter of a principal Phoenician prince, which led to the introduction of Baal worship into Israel. Of Omri it is said: “Omri did evil in the sight of the Lord, and acted more wickedly than all who were before him. For he walked in all the way of Jeroboam the son of Nebat and in his sins which he made Israel sin, provoking the Lord God of Israel with their idols” (16:25–26). This worldly and irreligious policy is denounced by Micah (Mic. 6:16) under the name of “the statutes of Omri.” He died c. 874 B.C. and was succeeded by his son Ahab. His daughter Athaliah was the mother of Ahaziah, king of Judah (2 Kings 8:26).

The Moabite Stone attests the military prowess of Omri, mentioning his military successes over Moab, lines 4–9. “Now Omri had taken possession of all the land of Medeba.” Years later Mesha, a wealthy sheep-owning king of Moab, was paying wool tribute to Israel (2 Kings 3:4). Assyrian records also attest the political and military importance of Omri; a century after Omri's reign the Assyrians were still referring to Israel as “the land of the House of Omri.” Jehu, a later Israelite usurper, is styled “Mar Humri” (“son,” i.e., royal successor, of Omri). The Samaritan Ostraca unearthed at the “ostraca house” in Samaria bear the names of both Yahweh and Baal, corroborating Omri's apostasy (1 Kings 16:25–26).

2. One of the sons of Becher the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8).

3. A descendant of Perez the son of Judah (1 Chron. 9:4).

4. Son of Michael and head of the tribe of Issachar in the reign of David (1 Chron. 27:18).

ON (on; “strength”).

1. The son of Peleth and one of the leaders of the tribe of Reuben who took part with Korah, Dathan, and Abiram in their revolt against Moses (Num. 16:1). His name does not appear in the narrative of the conspiracy; neither is he alluded to when reference is made to the final catastrophe. There is a rabbinical tradition to the effect that he was prevailed upon by his wife to withdraw from his accomplices.

2. A city of Egypt, the residence of Potiphera, whose daughter Asenath became the wife of Joseph (Gen. 41:45, 50; 46:20). The city was devoted to the worship of the sun god Ra, and thus was known also as Heliopolis, Gk. for “sun city” (see Jer. 43:13, NASB; in the KJV the place name is given as Beth-shemesh, from Heb. bêt shemesh, “sun temple,” or “house of the sun god”; the NIV reads “temple of the sun”). On was situated ten miles NE of Cairo and was the chief city of Egyptian science. Herodotus speaks of it as one of the four great cities, noted for religious festivals in honor of the sun. Its magnificent ruins have become the richest adornments of other cities, like Rome and Constantinople. Two magnificent red Syene granite obelisks set up by the great Thutmose III (c. 1490–1450 B.C.) in front of the temple of Ra in Heliopolis now adorn the Thames Embankment in London and Central Park in New York. A single obelisk remains in Heliopolis, that set up by Senwosret I (c. 2000 B.C.) in honor of Re-Horus of the Horizon. This is a remnant of the glory of ancient biblical On. The ancient city was famous for the worship of the sun, and many sun cults operated there. It was the religious capital of early Egypt around 2900 B.C. See also City of Destruction for discussion of a place given in some ancient manuscripts as City of the Sun. M.F.U.

O’NAM (ō’nam).

1. A descendant of Seir (which see) the Horite through his son Shobal (which see). Gen. 36:23; 1 Chron. 1:40.

2. A son of Jerahmeel’s second wife Atarah and thus a descendant of Judah through Hezron (1 Chron. 2:26, 28). See Jerahmeel, no. 1.

O’NAN (ō’nan; “strong”). The second son of Judah by the daughter of Shua the Canaanite (Gen. 38:4; 46:12; Num. 26:19; 1 Chron. 2:3), about 1925 B.C. When his brother Er, Judah’s firstborn, was put to death by Jehovah on account of his wickedness, Onan refused, in defiance of the ancient custom, to produce offspring by his widow, Tamar. For this he was punished by death (Gen. 38:8–10).

ONESIMUS (o-nes’i-mus; Gk. “useful, profitable”). The servant (or slave) in whose behalf Paul wrote the epistle to Philemon. He was a native, or certainly an inhabitant, of Colossae, since Paul, in writing to the church there, speaks of him (Col. 4:9) as “one of your number.” Fleeing from his master Philemon to Rome, he was there led to embrace the gospel through the instrumentality of the apostle (Philem. 10). After his conversion the most happy and friendly relationship sprang up between the teacher and the disciple; and so useful had he made himself to Paul that he desired to have Onesimus remain with him. This, however, he forbore in view of the relations of Onesimus and his master’s right to his services. Onesimus, accompanied by Tychicus, left Rome with not only this epistle but with that to the Colossians (Col. 4:9), A.D. 60.

ONESIPHORUS (on-e-sif’o-rus; “benefit-bringing, profit-bearing”). A Christian of Ephesus who not only ministered to the apostle there (2 Tim. 1:18) but who, being in Rome during Paul’s second imprisonment, “was not ashamed” of his “chains,” sought out Paul, and “often refreshed” him (1:16–17), A.D. 60. In his epistle the apostle expressed his appreciation for the services rendered by Onesiphorus and sent salutations to his household (4:19).

ONION. See Vegetable Kingdom.

ONLY BEGOTTEN (Gk. monogenēs, “single of its kind”). This term is used of Christ (John 1:14, 18; etc.) to denote that in the sense in which He is the Son of God He has no brothers or sisters. See Sonship of Christ.

O’NO (ō’no; “strong”). A city of Benjamin built (or restored), apparently, by Shemed (1 Chron. 8:12). Some of the inhabitants of Ono returned after the captivity (Ezra 2:33; Neh.

7:37). The valley in which it was located was known as “the plain of Ono” (6:2), probably the same as “the valley of craftsmen” (11:35), and in any case a part of the extension of the Vale of Sharon (which see). It is commonly identified with Kefr ‘Ana, SE of Joppa.

ON’YCHA (on’i-ka). An ingredient of the holy incense (Ex. 30:34) used in the Tabernacle ritual. It was likely obtained from a mollusk. See also Animal Kingdom.

ONYX. See Mineral Kingdom.

O’PHEL (ō’fel; “mound” or “tower”).

1. The ridge of Jerusalem extending S of the Temple mount between the Kidron Valley on the E and the Tyropoeon Valley on the W. This was the location of the original city of Jerusalem, which was occupied by the Jebusites when David captured it and made it the capital of the Hebrew kingdom (2 Chron. 27:3; 33:14). David fortified and enhanced the city in various ways. Later, after the Babylonian destruction, Nehemiah rebuilt the wall around Ophel. Kathleen Kenyon excavated the ancient fortification of Ophel in the 1960s, and Yigal Shiloh worked there in the 1970s and 1980s. See Jerusalem.

2. The place in central Palestine in which was the house where Gehazi deposited the presents that he took from Naaman (2 Kings 5:24, rendered “hill” in the NIV, see marg. of the NASB; “tower,” KJV). It was probably near the city of Samaria.

1. One of the sons of Joktan, the son of Eber, a great-grandson of Shem (Gen. 10:29; 1 Chron. 1:23).

2. The famous gold-producing region prominent in the OT. It is believed to have been located in SW Arabia in what is now known as Yemen. It may have included a part of the adjacent African seaboard. Yemen was famous for its gold mines, which are known to have still existed in the ninth century B.C. Ophir was visited by the trading fleet of Solomon and the Phoenicians. Solomon’s navy was fitted out at Ezion-Geber, then traveled to Ophir, taking “four hundred and twenty talents of gold from there” (1 Kings 9:26–28; 22:48; 2 Chron. 8:17–18; 9:10). At the northern end of the Gulf of Aqabah, Ezion-Geber (modern Tell el Keleifeh) was excavated by Nelson Glueck. Solomon used the copper of the Arabah, smelted at Ezion-Geber, as a stock-in-trade. His tarshish or “refinery” fleet sailed down the Red Sea and spent part of three years to make the trip, explainable by long hauls in excessively hot weather. In exchange for copper, Solomon’s refinery fleet brought back not only the fine gold of Ophir but silver, apes, ivory, and peacocks (1 Kings 10:22). Gold of Ophir garnished Solomon’s armor, throne, Temple, and house of the forest of Lebanon (10:14–19). M.F.U.

OPH’NI (of’ni). A town NE of Benjamin (Josh. 18:24), perhaps the Gophna of Josephus and the Bethgufnin of the Talmud, which still survives in the modern Jifna, or Jufna, 2½ miles NW of Bethel. A palace of the Roman period was discovered on this site.

OPH’RAH (of’ra; “fawn, hind”).

1. A city of Benjamin (Josh. 18:23; cf. 1 Sam. 13:17), probably the same as Ephron (2 Chron. 13:19), Ephraim (John 11:54), and Apherema (1 Macc. 11:34).

2. A town of Manasseh, W of the Jordan and six miles SW of Shechem (Judg. 6:11, more fully Ophrah of the Abiezrites, 8:27, 32). It was the native place of Gideon (6:11), his residence after his ascension to power (9:5), and the place of his burial (8:32). Robinson was doubtless correct in locating it at et-Taiyibeh, four miles NE of Bethel. Because of the ephod’s having been deposited there it was a place of pilgrimage.

3. A Judaite, a son of Meonothai (1 Chron. 4:14), although it is more than likely that “became the father of” here means to found, and that Ophrah is the name of a village.

ORACLE (Heb. dbîr, from dābar, to “speak”; Gk. logion, “utterance” of God). The divine communications given to the Hebrews. The manner of such utterances was various: God speaking sometimes face to face, as with Abraham and Moses; sometimes by dreams and visions, as with Joseph and Pharaoh; sometimes by signs and tokens, as with Gideon and Barak; sometimes by word of prophecy; and sometimes by a regularly organized system of communication, as with Urim and Thummim (which see). These last were distinctly Hebrew and were always accessible, as in the case of David’s inquiring whether it would be safe for him to take refuge with the men of Keilah (1 Sam. 23:9–12; cf. 30:7–8). The earliest oracle on record, probably, is that given to Rebekah (Gen. 25:22–23), whereas the most complete is that of the child Samuel (1 Sam. 3).

Heathen oracles are mentioned in Scripture, a celebrated case being that of Baal-zebub at Ekron, where inquiry was made respecting the recovery of King Ahaziah (2 Kings 1:2). Other oracular means in Palestine were the teraphim, such as that of Micah (Judg. 17:5, see marg.); the ephod of Gideon (8:27; etc.); the false gods of Samaria, with their false prophets, and consequently their oracles. Israel is reproached by Hosea for consulting wooden idols (Hos. 4:12), and also by Habakkuk (Hab. 2:19).

ORATION. See Orator.

ORATOR. The rendering in the KJV of Heb. lāḥash in Isa. 3:3 and Gk. rhētor in Acts 24:1. The Heb. term means “a whispering, charming” and is translated “skillful enchanter” in the NASB and NIV of the passage. The Gk. term has the meaning of “professional advocate” and is applied to Tertullus, who acted as the attorney (so NASB) or lawyer (so NIV) for the Jewish persecutors of Paul. He was a forensic speaker, a class common in Rome.

The oration (Gk. dēmēgoria) or “address” (NASB and NIV) delivered by Herod (Acts 12:21) was a rhetorical effort addressed to the populace for the sake of popularity.

ORCHARD (Heb. pardēs, “park”). A garden planted with trees (Song of Sol. 4:13, cf. Eccles. 2:5; rendered “forest” in Neh. 2:8).

ORDINANCES, CHRISTIAN. These are “outward rites prescribed by Christ to be performed by His Church” (Charles Ryrie). For most evangelical Protestants, ordinances are symbolic in nature and neither contain in themselves nor convey to others the grace of God. Many, however, call ordinances sacraments, a term that usually includes the idea of imparting grace. In either case, the faith within the soul of the participant can be encouraged and motivated by prayerful meditation on the divine meaning of the form.

Nearly all Christians practice baptism (Matt. 28:19) and the Lord’s Supper (1 Cor. 11:23–29). Baptism means identification with the Holy Trinity in general and with the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ in particular (Rom. 6:3–4). Christians are divided over two main issues: the mode of baptism (sprinkling, Heb. 9:10; pouring, Heb. 6:2; immersion, Acts 8:38–39) and the time of baptism (in infancy, Col. 2:11–12; after belief, Acts 2:41).

The Lord’s Supper means the remembrance of the sacrifice of the body and blood of the Lord Jesus for man’s sin. It apparently was the focal point for worship in the early church (Acts 2:42). Christians are divided here too over two main issues: the nature of the Lord’s Supper (transubstantiation, Roman Catholics; consubstantiation, Lutherans; spiritual presence, Calvin; memorial only, most evangelicals), and the frequency of the Lord’s Supper (daily, Acts 2:46; weekly, 20:7; monthly; annually).

Besides the two common ordinances, some Christians include the following: footwashing (John 13:1–14), love feast (1 Cor. 11:17–22), laying on of hands (Acts 8:15–18), holy kiss (1 Thess. 5:26), and anointing of the sick with oil (James 5:14–15). Roman Catholics believe in seven sacraments including confirmation, penance, matrimony, extreme unction, and holy orders. Some dispensationalists teach that physical ordinances are transitional from Israel to the church, and that either baptism or both baptism and the Lord's Supper are not for this age of grace.

ORDINATION. In the limited and technical sense ordination is the ceremony by which a person is set apart to an order or office; but in a broader, and in fact its only important sense, ordination signifies the appointment or designation of a person to a ministerial office, with or without attendant ceremonies.

Bible Usage. Uses in the OT and NT appear.

Old Testament Ordination. Ordination was practiced early in Bible times. The Hebrew priests, Levites, prophets, and kings were solemnly ordained for their several offices (see under their several articles). Moses thus, i.e., by laying on of hands, appointed Joshua (which see) as his successor (Num. 27:18–20, 22–23; Deut. 34:9).

Example of Christ. In the introduction of the Christian dispensation no exterior act of ordination was practiced by Christ. The calling, appointing, and commissioning of the twelve apostles was His personal act, unattended, so far as the record shows, with any symbolic act or ceremony. In the account (Mark 3:14) of His appointing “twelve, that they might be with Him, and that He might send them out to preach,” the Gk. word is epoiēse, “he made,” i.e., he “appointed” them for the purposes named. The word rendered “appointed” (John 15:16; Gk. ethēka) means “I have set, or placed.” In no ordination of His disciples to their ministerial or apostolic office is it recorded that He laid His hands upon them. But just before His ascension, our Lord, in blessing His disciples and breathing upon them the Holy Spirit, “lifted up His hands” (Luke 24:50). In so doing He illustrated the nature of the spiritual influence that was to come upon them in its full manifestation at Pentecost. In this connection He uttered the words so often grossly perverted, “If you forgive the sins of any, their sins have been forgiven them; if you retain the sins of any, they have been retained” (cf. John 20:22–23). A literal and materializing construction of this passage, with those relating to the keys and the power of binding and loosing (Matt. 16:19; 18:18), became early in the history of the church a great fountain of error in reference to the office and power of the clergy (see Peter).

In the Apostolic Church. In the appointment of Matthias to the vacant apostleship, the principal interest appears to have centered on ascertaining whom the Lord had chosen (Acts 1:21–26); in this case there is no evidence of the imposition of hands.

Deacons. The first ordination in the Christian church was that of the seven deacons, in which case the apostles set them apart by prayer and the laying on of hands (6:5–6).

Barnabas and Paul. Paul, although he had been called and set apart by Christ, submitted to the laying on of hands (13:1–3). “The simplest interpretation is that the Church as a whole held a special service for this solemn purpose. Codex Bezae makes all clear by inserting the nominative ‘all.’ ... Further, there is no sign in 13:2, 3 that this ‘consecration’ by the Church was more efficacious than the original divine call; the ceremony merely blessed Barnabas and Saul for a special work, which was definitely completed in the next three years” (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, pp. 66–67).

Elders. It is recorded (Acts 14:23) that Paul and Barnabas “appointed elders for them in every church.” In this narrative the Gk. word cheirotoneō is used for the first time.

Unfortunately its meaning is by no means certain. Originally it meant to elect by popular vote, yet it came to be used in the sense to appoint or designate. Apparently, the votes and voice of each congregation were considered. The term is obviously used in that way by Paul (2 Cor. 8:19). As to the ceremonies used in these ordinations, the components of prayer, fasting, and commending the persons ordained to the Lord are mentioned.

Principles. In reviewing the scriptural instances of ordination we note the following: (1) Christ ordained in the sense of appointing His disciples to ministerial service by His own authority and without employing any ceremony. (2) In the election of Matthias to fill the place of Judas, it was deemed sufficient to learn by prayer and the lot whom the Lord had chosen, then without any ceremony to number him with the eleven. (3) The laying on of hands as a ceremony of ministerial ordination was first practiced by the apostles in the case of the seven deacons. (4) It was also practiced in the case of Paul and Barnabas and elders of the NT church. (5) We have no account of anyone's having been ordained to the office of bishop in distinction from that of elder; still less is there any intimation that bishops were or were to become the only officers competent to ordain ministerial candidates; whereas elders were frequently, if not always, associated even with apostles in the act of ordination.

Meaning of Ordination. Ordination in the early church seems to have been regarded as a formal induction into the ministerial office and as having more significance than a mere bestowment of the authority of the church. The clergy were at first elected by the people; and Clement of Rome speaks of them as having been appointed by other distinguished men, with the approbation of the whole church. But the fact that the special ordination of the presbyters or the bishop was considered necessary seems to imply that a special efficacy was associated with the rite. Augustine, however, distinctly exclaims, "What else is the imposition of hands than a prayer over a man?" With the growing importance of the episcopal office, and the sanctity associated with it and the clergy in general, the rite of ordination assumed the character of a sacramental act in which special grace was conferred, and that could only be performed by the bishop. The ordination of clergymen was as early as the fourth or fifth century admitted into the number of the sacraments. It is so held now by the Roman Catholic and Greek churches. In the Church of England and the Episcopal church of the United States ordination has not the significance of a sacrament; and the view of the English Reformers was not that the laying on of hands, as such, conferred any grace. Only bishops can ordain, and any other than episcopal ordination is invalid. The Lutheran and Reformed churches have always acknowledged and practiced ordination; but their confessions and theologians have justly laid stress upon the necessity of the divine call to the ministry. The Moravians confine to their bishops the right to ordain but recognize the validity of the ordination by other Protestants. The Disciples of Christ, Quakers, and Plymouth Brethren do not recognize any human rite of ordination. The Discipline of the Methodist church (§ 163) provides for the ordination of deacons by the bishop, whereas an "elder is constituted by the election of the Annual Conference, and by the laying on of hands of a bishop and some of the elders who are present" (Dis., § 166). The following note in the Discipline (§ 449) sets forth the Methodist view as to bishops: "This service is not to be understood as an ordination to a higher order in the Christian ministry, beyond and above that of elders or presbyters, but as a solemn and fitting consecration for the special and most sacred duties of superintendency in the Church."

O'REB (ō'reb; "a raven"). One of the leaders of the Midianite host that invaded Israel and was defeated and driven back by Gideon. He was killed, not by Gideon himself or the people under his immediate conduct, but by the men of Ephraim, who rose at his entreaty and intercepted the flying horde at the fords of the Jordan (Judg. 7:24–25), about 1200 B.C. The terms in which Isaiah refers to it (Isa. 10:26) are such as to imply that it was a truly awful slaughter. He places it in the same rank with the two most tremendous disasters recorded in the history of Israel—the destruction of the Egyptians in the Red Sea and of the army of Sennacherib (cf. Ps. 83:11).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. M. Lang and T. Kirk, Studies in the Book of Judges, 2 vols. in 1 (1983), 1:154–67.

O'REB, ROCK OF (ō'reb; the “raven’s crag”). The place at which Gideon slew Oreb (Judg. 7:25; Isa. 10:26), believed by some to be E of Jordan. Keil and Delitzsch say (Com., ad loc.) that it was “west of Jordan, where the Ephraimites had taken possession of the waters of the Jordan in front of the Midianites.”

O'REN (ō'ren). The third named of the sons of Jerahmeel, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:25), about 1190 B.C.

ORGAN. See Music.

ORI'ON (o-ri'on). The celestial constellation composed of myriads of stars, most of which are invisible without a telescope. It was early imagined to resemble the form of a hunter who, according to ancient legend, was put to death by Artemis after his pursuit of the Pleiades. Job attributed the creation of Orion, Arcturus, and Pleiades to God (Job 9:9; 38:31). This constellation is located S of Taurus and Gemini. It includes the giants Betelgeuse and Rigel. M.F.U.

ORNAMENT (Heb. generally ḥdāḥ, “trapping”). The number, variety, and weight of the ornaments ordinarily worn upon the person form one of the characteristic features of oriental costume, both in ancient and modern times. The monuments of ancient Egypt exhibit wealthy ladies loaded with rings, earrings of great size, anklets, armlets, bracelets of the most varied character, richly ornamented necklaces, and chains of various kinds. There is sufficient evidence in the Bible that the inhabitants of Palestine were equally devoted to finery. The Midianites appear to have been as prodigal as the Egyptians in the use of ornaments (Num. 31:50–52; Judg. 8:24–26).

Male. From the most ancient times two ornaments pertained to men: a staff in the hand (Gen. 38:18) and a seal worn by a ribbon on the breast or in a ring on the right hand (41:42; Jer. 22:24; Esther 3:10; 8:2). Earrings, which were worn by the Midianites (Judg. 8:24–26) and other orientals, seem also to have been worn by men among the Israelites (Ex. 32:2–3). Gold necklaces do not appear as a male ornament among the Israelites, as they do among the Persians and Medes; neither does the custom of the Egyptians and Medo-Persians, whose kings adorned their highest ministers with gold chains as insignia of office or tokens of their favor (Gen. 41:42; Dan. 5:7).

Female. Much more varied were the ornaments and jewelry of Israelite women. In the OT Isaiah (Isa. 3:18–23) supplies us with a detailed description of the articles with which the luxurious women of his day were decorated, and the picture is filled up by incidental notices in other places. The notices that occur in the early books of the Bible imply the weight and abundance of the ornaments worn at that period. Earrings were worn by Jacob’s wives, apparently as charms, for they are mentioned in connection with idols: “So they gave to Jacob all the foreign gods which they had, and the rings which were in their ears” (Gen. 35:4). Nose rings were worn in the right or left nostril, perhaps also in the division of the nose (24:47; Isa. 3:21; Ezek. 16:12). Necklaces were made of metal, of jewels, or of pearls, strung on a ribbon (Song of Sol. 1:10), hanging down to the breast or girdle. To these were attached golden crescents (Judg. 8:21; Isa. 3:18), perhaps also amulets and perfume boxes (3:20). Armlets or bracelets (Gen. 24:22; Num. 31:50; Isa. 3:19) were worn by women and also by men of rank (2 Sam. 1:10). There also were anklets (Isa. 3:18), fastened with chains (3:20), which women used to make a tinkling as they tripped along (3:16). These trinkets were made of gold in the case of women of rank; as, in addition, were hand mirrors of metal (Ex. 38:8; Isa. 3:23), probably carried in the hand as ornaments. The poetical portions of the OT contain numerous references to the ornaments worn by the Israelites in the time of their highest prosperity. The appearance of the bride is thus described in the Song of Solomon (1:10–11; 4:4, 9).

OR'NAN (or'nan). The form given (1 Chron. 21:15, 18, 20–25, 28; 2 Chron. 3:1) to Araunah (which see).

ORON'TES (o-ron'tez). A historically famous river of Syria taking its source in the elevated Beq'a Valley. It runs N through Syria and then W into the Mediterranean Sea at the port of ancient Antioch-on-the-Orontes, named Seleucia Pieria. Antioch was a famous NT center of early Christianity (Acts 11:20–26; 13:1–3). Riblah appears prominently in 2 Kings and Jeremiah in connection with Zedekiah of Judah and Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings 25:20–21; Jer. 39:5–6; 52:9–10). Other important centers on the Orontes were Hamath, a Hittite stronghold, Kadesh, where Rameses II clashed with the Hittites, and Homs (Emessa), a center of early Christianity. M.F.U.

OR'PAH (or'pa; "neck"). A Moabitess and wife of Chilion, the son of Naomi. At first she was disposed to accompany her mother-in-law to Canaan but afterward she decided to remain among her own people. She gave Naomi the kiss of farewell and returned "to her people and her gods" (Ruth 1:4, 14–15).

ORPHAN (Heb. yātôm, "lonely," Jer. 5:28; Lam. 5:3). One deprived of one or both parents. But the Heb. word, as well as the Gk. (orphanos, John 14:18), is used figuratively for one bereft of a teacher, guide, guardian. In this sense the Gk. word aporphanizō (1 Thess. 2:17) is used, referring to one bereft of connections with society.

O'SEE (ō'zē). A less correct way (Rom. 9:25) of Anglicizing the name of the prophet Hosea (which see).

OSHE'A (o-shē'a; "deliverer"). Another form (Num. 13:8, 16, sometimes "Hoshea") of the name Joshua (which see).

OSNAPPAR (os'nap-er), or Osnapper. The name of a king mentioned only in Ezra 4:10 and called there the "great and honorable Osnappar" ("Asnapper," KJV; "Ashurbanipal," NIV), an Aram. form of the Assyrian Ashurbanipal (Gk., Sardanapallos; Lat., Sardanapalus). He followed his father, Esarhaddon, on the throne of Assyria and ruled 668–633. He completed the Assyrian conquest of Egypt, ravaged Elam when it proved to be a threat to him, and savagely put down a rebellion in Babylon. He was a terribly ruthless and vindictive king, who has been described as "barren in political insight." He is important to the Bible student, however, because he collected a great library of texts from all over Mesopotamia. Containing tens of thousands of texts written on clay tablets, it was discovered in the main by Hormuzd Rassam for the British Museum in 1853. This library has been said to "form the foundations of the science of Assyriology." Among other things, it contained copies of the Babylonian accounts of the creation and the Flood. H.F.V.

OSPRAY, OSPREY. See Animal Kingdom: Buzzard; Vulture.

OSSIFRAGE. See Animal Kingdom: Vulture.

OS'TIA (os'ti-a). A famous seaport of Rome at the mouth of the Tiber. The port connected with the city proper by the Ostian Way. Paul's ship landed at Puteoli (Acts 28:13), another port accommodating heavily laden grain ships, because harbor facilities at Ostia were not yet completed. Claudius (A.D. 41–54) and Trajan in 104 completed harbor facilities at Ostia so it was no longer necessary to unload goods at Puteoli 138 miles away and haul them overland. In the second century A.D. Ostia reached its peak and may have had a population in excess of 100,000. Systematic excavations began at Ostia in 1909 and have continued more or less uninterruptedly to the present. About half of the 160 acres of the ancient city have now been excavated, revealing tremendous granaries and warehouses, a theater, numerous sanctuaries of the Mithra cult and other temples, a Jewish synagogue, and blocks of apartment houses and shops. The Ostian excavations have revealed a great deal about the wealth, commerce, and religious sects in Rome at the time of Paul. M.F.U.

OSTRICH. See Animal Kingdom.

Figurative. In Lam. 4:3 the ostrich is used as a symbol of the unnatural cruelty of the Jews in their calamity; in companionship the ostrich (Job 30:29) is a figure of extreme desolation, taken from the isolated life of that bird in the desert.

OTH'NI (oth'ni; apocopated from Othniel). One of the sons of Shemaiah, and a gatekeeper of the Tabernacle (1 Chron. 26:7).

OTH'NIEL (oth'ni-el; “God is might”).

1. “The son of Kenaz, Caleb’s younger brother” (Judg. 3:9). The probability is that Kenaz was the head of the tribe (Judah) and that Othniel, as the son of Jephunneh, was one of the descendants of Kenaz.

The first mention of Othniel is on the occasion of the taking of Kiriath-sepher, or Debir (which see), as it was afterward called. Caleb, to whom the city was assigned, offered as a reward to its captor, his daughter Achsah. Othniel won the prize (Josh. 15:16–17; Judg. 1:12–13), about c. 1380 B.C.

Israel “forgot the Lord their God, and served the Baals and the Asheroth.” As a punishment for their idolatry the Lord delivered them into the hands of Cushan-rishathaim (which see), king of Mesopotamia, whom they were obliged to serve for eight years. In this oppression the Israelites cried unto the Lord, and He raised them up a deliverer in the person of Othniel the Kenizzite. “The Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and he judged Israel. When he went out to war ... he prevailed over Cushan-rishathaim. Then the land had rest forty years. And Othniel the son of Kenaz died” (Judg. 3:7–11), about 1360 B.C.

2. An Othniel is mentioned (1 Chron. 27:15) as an ancestor of Heldai, the head of a family of Netophathites and probably the same person as above.

OUCH (ouch; pl. “ouches,” Heb. mishbāṣōt, “woven together” in filigree fashion). An archaic term referring to the gold work, which not only served to fasten the stones upon the woven fabric of the ephod but formed at the same time clasps or brooches, by which the two parts of the ephod were fastened together. The NASB and NIV read “filigree” (Ex. 28:11–25; 39:6–18). See High Priest, Dress of.

OUTER TUNIC. See Dress.

OUTLANDISH (Heb. nēkār, Neh. 13:26). “Foreign,” as the women of other nations that caused Solomon to sin.

OUTRAGEOUS (Heb. shetep, to “gush out,” Prov. 27:4). Whence the metaphor, anger is an outpouring, or flood (so NASB).

OVEN (Heb. tannûr, “fire pot”; Gk. klibanos, “earthen pot”). There are four kinds of ovens or places for baking, in the East:

1. Mere sand, heated by a fire, which was afterward removed. The raw dough was placed upon it, and in a little while turned; and then, to complete the process, covered with warm ashes and coals. Unless turned they were not thoroughly baked (Hos. 7:8).

2. An excavation in the earth lined with pottery. This is heated, the dough spread on the sides, and so baked.

3. A large stone jar, about three feet high, open at the top and widening toward the bottom, with a hole for the extraction of the ashes. Each household possessed such an article (Ex. 8:3); and it was only in times of extreme need that the same oven sufficed for several families (Lev. 26:26). It was heated with dry twigs and grass (Matt. 6:30), and the loaves were placed both inside and outside of it.

4. A plate of iron, placed upon three stones; the fire was kindled beneath it, and the raw cakes placed upon the upper surface. No doubt bakers had a special oven in ancient times (Hos. 7:4, 6), such as are now public in oriental cities.

Figurative. “Ten women will bake your bread in one oven” (Lev. 26:26) is a figurative expression for scarcity; for in ordinary times each woman would have enough baking for an oven of her own. “You will make them as a fiery oven” (Ps. 21:9; “furnace,” NIV) is a figure taken from the intense heat of an oven being prepared for baking; hence speedy destruction (cf. Hos. 7:4, 6–7). “Our skin has become as hot as an oven” (Lam. 5:10), i.e., as an oven is scorched and blackened with fire, so hunger dries up the pores till the skin becomes as if scorched by the sun.

OVERLIVE (Josh. 24:31). Another form for outlive.

OVERPASS (Heb. ābar, to “cross over,” Jer. 5:28, KJV; “excel,” NASB; “no limit,” NIV). To excel, to go beyond; here in badness.

OVERSEER (Heb. usually pāqîd, a “visitor”; Gk. episkopos, a “bishop,” Acts 20:28). An officer having the superintendence of a household, such as Joseph (Gen. 39:4–5; cf. 41:34); a superintendent, either civil, military, or ecclesiastical (Judg. 9:28; 2 Chron. 31:13; Esther 2:3). See Elder.

OVERSHADOW (Gk. episkiazō, to “envelop in a shadow”). From a vaporous cloud that casts a shadow the word is transferred to a shining cloud surrounding and enveloping persons with brightness (Matt. 17:5; Luke 9:34).

Figurative. It is used of the Holy Spirit’s extending creative energy upon the womb of the virgin Mary and impregnating it; a use of the word that seems to have been drawn from the familiar OT idea of a cloud as symbolizing the immediate presence and power of God.

OWL. See Animal Kingdom.

OX. A castrated male of the Bos taurus family, valued in the OT period as a patient, heavy draft animal. See Animal Kingdom.

Figurative. “As the ox licks up the grass” (Num. 22:4) is a figure of easy victory. For an ox to “low over his fodder” (Job 6:5) is to complain without cause. “As an ox goes to the slaughter” is used in connection with a rash youth (Prov. 7:22). To “let out freely the ox and the donkey” (Isa. 32:20; lit., let the ox and the donkey roam in freedom) is a figure of copious abundance, inasmuch as the cattle would not have to be watched lest they should stray into the grainfields. “A fattened ox” (Prov. 15:17) represents sumptuous living. Oxen not muzzled in treading corn (1 Cor. 9:9–10) is figurative of the minister’s right to support.

OXGOAD. See Goad.

OX, WILD. See Animal Kingdom: Wild Ox.

O’ZEM (ō’zem; probably “strength”).

1. The sixth son of Jesse and next eldest above David (1 Chron. 2:15), about 1060 B.C.
2. One of the sons of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. 2:25), about 1190 B.C.

OZI´AS (ō-zī´as). Another form of the name of Uzziah king of Judah (Matt. 1:8–9).

OZ´NI (oz´ni; “cared, i.e., attentive”). The fourth son of Gad and the founder of the family of Oznites (Num. 26:16).

OZ´NITES (oz´nīts; “having” quick “ears”). The descendants of Ozni (which see) or Ezbon (Gen. 46:16). One of the families of the tribe of Gad (Num. 26:16).

P

PA´ARAI (pa´a-ri). “The Arbite,” one of David’s valiant men (2 Sam. 23:35), called Naarai (which see) in 1 Chron. 11:37.

PACE (Heb. ṣa:ad, a “step,” as elsewhere rendered). This was not a formal measure but was taken in the general sense (2 Sam. 6:13). See Metrology: Linear Measures.

PAD´DAN (pa´dan; Heb. paddān, “plain, field”). Mentioned in Gen. 48:7. See Paddan-aram.

PAD´DAN-A´RAM (pad´an-a´ram; “plain or field of Aram,” i.e., Syria). The name given to the country of Rebekah (Gen. 25:20) and the home of Laban (28:2–7); called “the land of Aram” by Hosea (Hos. 12:12). It was a district of Mesopotamia (which see), the large plain surrounded by mountains, in which the town of Haran was situated. Paddan-aram was intimately associated with the history of the Hebrews. Abraham’s family had settled there, and there he sent his servant to secure a wife for Isaac (Gen. 24:10, see marg.; 25:20); and later Jacob went there and married (28:2; 41:18).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: D. J. Wiseman, ed., Peoples of Old Testament Times (1973), pp. 134–35. See also Haran.

PADDLE (Heb. yātēd). Literally a tent peg (so NASB and NIV, Judg. 4:21), or a stake or pin, but in Deut. 23:13 (KJV), a small shovel.

PA´DON (pa´don; “redemption, ransom, deliverance”). The name of one of the Temple servants whose descendants returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:44; Neh. 7:47), about 536 B.C.

PA´GIEL (pa´gi-el; “meeting or rendezvous” with God). The son of Ochrán and leader of the tribe of Asher at the time of the Exodus (Num. 1:13; 2:27; 7:72; 10:26), c. 1440 B.C.

PA´HATH-MO´AB (pa´hath-mō´ab; “governor of Moab”). The head of a leading family of Judah, whose 2,812 descendants returned to Jerusalem after the captivity (Ezra 2:6; Neh. 7:11 says 2,818), and another company, of 200 males, under Ezra (Ezra 8:4). Hasshub the Pahath-moabite is named among the builders of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:11). In Ezra 10:30, eight of the “sons” of Pahath-moab are named as putting away their foreign wives. That this family was of high rank in the tribe of Judah we learn from their appearing fourth in order in the two lists (Ezra 2:6; Neh. 7:11) and from their leader having signed second among the lay princes (Neh. 10:14).

PA´I (pa´i; 1 Chron. 1:50). See Pau.

PAINTING. A form of art that played an important role in antiquity.

Palestine. Ancient painting as early as the fourth millennium B.C. showed remarkable vitality. The most popular type of work of this kind was done on cave walls or plastered surfaces. Early paintings have been found at such sites as Megiddo and Jericho. Egyptian and Mesopotamian art of this type also flourished. The wealth and ease afforded by these irrigation cultures fostered leisure and supplied the means for the cultivation of the arts. Famous in Palestine are the paintings on cave walls in the Hellenistic city of Marisa (Beit Jibrin) dating from the third century B.C.

Egypt. Egyptian belief in life after death manifested itself in bright colors and cheerful paintings that adorn the walls of rock-cut tombs as at Thebes and Saqqarah. The Egyptians were skillful in designing objects of everyday life, the lotus with bud and leaf, the animals and birds of the Nile Valley, and lifelike people and events. In fine colors they portrayed on sarcophagi and mummy cases festal meals and social pastimes, scenes from city life and farm life. The Egyptians ground their paints on stones worn smooth by constant use. These relics of an ancient art may be seen in many museums.

Crete. Knossos in Crete shows famous painted frescoes executed between 1900 and 1750 B.C. Minoan Crete, explored by Sir Arthur Evans, has given us much information of paintings in the House of the Frescoes and on sarcophagi. Such frescoes as the "Saffron Gatherer" and the "Toreador and His Horse" are notable for their artistic execution.

Rome. Fresco painting was widely popular in the time of Jesus and in the apostolic age. Excavations at Pompeii in the Villa of the Mysteries have yielded elaborate cultic rites executed in fresco paintings. Such paintings come from all parts of the Roman world. M.F.U.

PALACE. The dwelling of a king or important official. All over the biblical world palaces figure prominently.

In Israel. Saul's austere palace-fortress has been excavated at Gibeah by W. F. Albright and displays stout masonry, cyclopean walls, and rustic construction. David's first palace was at Hebron and must have been a crude edifice compared with his more lavish dwelling at Jebusite Jerusalem, which he captured. Hiram of Tyre sent him cedar trees and carpenters and artisans to build him a house (2 Sam. 5:11). David's palace must have been simple but nevertheless evidently showed evidence of Phoenician artistry. Solomon's palace was much grander. This was indeed a lavish building, as we may gather from 1 Kings, but unfortunately nothing survives of it. The vast wealth of Solomon, along with the skilled Phoenician workers, doubtless produced a fabulous structure. Herod the Great's palace at Jerusalem in the first century B.C. was also magnificent. At the city of Samaria Omri and his son Ahab, in the first quarter of the ninth century B.C., built lavish palaces, as did also Jeroboam II in the following century. Much later Herod also built at Sebastieh (the name of Samaria in the Roman period). Herod built other palaces at Masada, Jericho, and in Herodion (near Bethlehem).

In Egypt. All of the pharaohs of Egypt's thirty dynasties had ornate and expensive palaces. Knowledge of these has come down through tomb reliefs and other forms of art. Especially well known is the palace of Merenptah, the son of Rameses II, about 1230 B.C. This palace was destroyed by fire, which left traces of painted frescoes; walls were brick, the roof of wood. The throne room opened at the end of a colonnaded court. The room was supported by six huge columns of white limestone, twenty-five feet high. The king's cartouche appears on the bronze door fastenings. The palace of Amenhotep III at Thebes has also been excavated by the Metropolitan Museum of Art. (See its bulletins for 1916–18.) The palace of Amenhotep IV (c. 1385–1366 B.C.) is also well known. It was built at Akhetaten, or Amarna, where the famous Amarna Letters were discovered. The king's palace was designated the "castle" of Aton. The palace was surrounded by an extensive complex of buildings. A double wall (with fortified passages) ran around the palace. The queen, the famous Nofretete, had her own palace. The royal residence also had priestly quarters situated near the Chapel of Aton, as well as large servants' quarters and a place for craftsmen.

In Mesopotamia. Both the Assyrians and Babylonians had splendid palaces. The palaces of Sargon II (722–705 B.C.) and of his son Sennacherib are well known for their size and lavish decorations. Nebuchadnezzar's palace at Babylon in the sixth century B.C. is also famous. The throne room of Nebuchadnezzar II was adorned with enamel bricks done in artistic geometrical lines. Bulls and dragons in enameled, colored bricks were favorite decorative motifs in the Babylon of this era, which was world-famous for its many buildings, including temples, ziggurats, wide processional streets, hanging gardens, and other architectural wonders. Nebuchadnezzar's palace fitted in with the splendor of its surroundings. A notable royal palace was uncovered at Mari on the Middle Euphrates. Dating from around 1700 B.C., this tremendous structure covers more than 7½ acres, including not only royal apartments but administrative offices and even a school for scribes. It was adorned with great mural paintings, portions of which are still in a fair state of preservation, containing depictions of sacrifice and a scene in which the king of Mari receives from Ishtar, the goddess of propagation, the emblematic staff and ring symbolic of his royal power (cf. A. Parrot in Syria 18 [1937], pp. 325–54. Also copies of Syria [1935–39]). The palaces of the great Persian monarchs at Persepolis are also noteworthy for their vastness and extravagance. The palaces of ancient Susa, which have been excavated by Jacques de Morgan, illustrate the story of Nehemiah, who refers to the time when he was "in Susa the capital" acting as cupbearer to Artaxerxes, the king. It also reminds us of Dan. 8:2.

Elsewhere in the Biblical World. The palaces excavated at Knossos, Phaestos, Mallia, and elsewhere on Crete display the glory of the Minoan culture, especially during the period from about 1600 to 1400 B.C. Palace fortresses uncovered at Mycenae, Pylos, Tiryns, and elsewhere on the Greek mainland demonstrate the power and wealth of the Mycenaean between about 1400 and 1200 B.C. The palaces of the Hittite kings found at Boghazköy and other centers in Asia Minor and Syria likewise show the power of those biblical people. Studies of palaces of Cyprus, Syria, and of the Caesars at Rome help to round out our knowledge of the Bible world. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

PALESTINA (Ex. 15:14; Isa. 14:29, 31, all KJV). Palestine.

PALESTINE. Palestine, as the scene of ancient biblical events, is the region of SW Asia extending S and SW of the Lebanon ranges, NE of Egypt and N of the Sinai Peninsula. The "river" or "brook of Egypt" (Gen. 15:18; 2 Chron. 7:8), the modern Wadi el-Arish, is its SW boundary. On the W its boundary is the Mediterranean plain and on the E the Arabian Desert. It formed a tiny bridge between the ancient empires on the Tigris-Euphrates rivers in Mesopotamia, on the Halys River in Asia Minor, and the mighty civilization of Egypt on the Nile. It constitutes the westernmost extremity of Breasted's "Fertile Crescent."

The Name. The name Palestine as a geographical designation was most probably derived from an Egyptian group, the prst (or plst) which migrated from the Delta region to southern Canaan at the beginning of the Proto-dynastic period (2900–2700 B.C.). Evidence of migrations from Egypt at this period have been furnished by excavations at Arad, En-gedi, and elsewhere. The prst (spelled this way because there was no letter l in Egyptian) evidently gave their name to the area where they settled, which was known as the "land of the Philistines" in Abraham's day (Gen. 21:32–34). It was these same people with whom Isaac also had dealings (Gen. 26:1). About 1200 B.C. a group of the Aegean Sea People, who conquered the Hittites and Phoenicians, settled ultimately in the coastal areas of southern Canaan and became known in the OT by the name of the land in which they were living. Philistia was subsequently rendered hē Palaistinē in Greek, a form which Herodotus (fifth century B.C.) was apparently the first to use. The Romans called it Palestina. Palestine as an official designation did not come into usage, however, until the second century A.D., first describing the SW plain of Phoenicia and subsequently applied to all Palestine W of the Jordan. Canaan (which see) is the older name of Palestine, the former seemingly derived from Hurrian, meaning "belonging to the land of red purple." By the fourteenth century B.C. this geographical designation came to be employed of the region in which the "Canaanites," or Phoenician traders, exchanged red-purple dye from murex shells on the Mediterranean coast for other commodities. In the Amarna Letters "the land of Canaan" is applied to the Phoenician coast, and the Egyptians called all western Syria by this name. The "holy land" is referred to only in Zech. 2:12. This name differentiates the country as Jehovah's and the people who possessed it in covenant relation with Him. After the OT period in the Hellenistic-Roman era (333 B.C.–A.D. 300) the country was called Judea, a term that at first described only the region around Jerusalem after the Babylonian Exile.

Size. It averages about 70 miles in width and its greatest width is some 90 miles. "Dan to Beersheba," an expression denoting the extremity of the ancient N-S boundaries at their fullest extent, is a distance of only about 150 miles. OT Palestine was never much more than 10,000 sq. miles with barely 6,000 miles W of the Jordan and less than 4,000 E of it. In the Davidic-Solomonic era the boundaries roughly extended to the Euphrates and to the borders of Egypt, but this included tributary peoples, a population of about 2 million or possibly more than 3 million counting tributary peoples. In NT times Palestine consisted of Roman Judea, composed of Galilee, our Lord's home province in the N; Samaria, occupying the central highlands; and Judea extending on the S to the borders of Edom.

Geography. From the Mediterranean to the Arabian Desert two mountain ranges separate the land into four bands running N and S. These consist of the level coastal Maritime Plain, the Central Range or southerly spur from Mt. Lebanon, the Ghor or deep valley of the Jordan, and Eastern Palestine, consisting of a long plateau extending from Mt. Hermon to Mt. Hor in Edom.

Maritime Plain. This runs from the river Leontes on the N, five miles N of Tyre, to the desert beyond Gaza on the S. Mt. Carmel interrupts the valley, N of Carmel is the Plain of Acre. From Carmel S to Joppa the area is known as the Plain of Sharon, and S of Joppa is the Philistine Plain.

Central Range. The Central Range as a continuation of the Lebanon Mts. consists of Galilee, Samaria, and Judea. In Upper Galilee rise a number of hills, some 2,000 to 3,000 feet in height and a few to almost 4,000 feet. Lower Galilee is triangular, bounded by the Sea of Galilee and the Jordan to Beth-shan on its eastern border and the Plain of Esdraelon on the SW side. It consists of ranges running E and W with elevations much less than upper Galilee.

Hills of lower Galilee usually have an altitude of 400–600 feet, although Mt. Tabor reaches 1,843 feet, and Mt. Gilboa has one peak 1,698 feet and another 1,648 feet. The Plain of Esdraelon intercepts the central region; S of Esdraelon the range is interrupted by many wadis. Mt. Ebal rises 3,077 feet and Gerizim 2,849 feet. Samaria was located in this region. From Bethel to Hebron, in Judea, the range has an average height of 2,200 feet. Bethel reaches 2,930 feet, Jerusalem 2,598, Bethlehem 2,550, and Hebron 3,300.

Jordan Valley. The Jordan Valley consists of a deep gorge. At the foot of Mt. Hermon it is 1,700 feet above sea level. From there it descends rapidly to the Dead Sea, where it is 1,290 feet below sea level. The bottom of the Dead Sea reaches 1,300 feet still lower than its surface, recognized as the lowest point on the earth's surface and being a part of an amazing geological fault running S to the Red Sea and into East Africa.

Eastern Palestine. A large, fertile plateau, much of eastern Palestine more than 3,000 feet above sea level. It included ancient Bashan, Gilead, and Moab. This general territory is divided naturally into four parts by four rivers. There is the Yarmuk with Bashan to the N and the Jabbok with Gilead to the N and S; the Arnon, S of which was Moab; and the river Zered, with Edom located southward. The Yarmuk and Jabbok are tributaries of the Jordan. The Arnon and the Zered flow into the Dead Sea; S of the Dead Sea lies the deep copper-rich Arabah stretching to Ezion-geber at the head of the Red Sea.

Climate. Because of the diversity in elevation from Hermon's snowy 9,101 feet to the Dead Sea's tropical 1,290 feet below sea level, a great variety of plant and animal life is found. In the hill country prevailing W winds create adequate rains from October to April; E winds from the desert bring intense heat and discomfort (Job 1:19; Jer. 18:17; Ezek. 17:10). Two seasons characterize Palestine: winter—moist, rainy, and mild, lasting from November to April; summer—hot and rainless, lasting from May to October.

Biblical Archaeology. Archaeologists claim important finds in Palestine long before the biblical period (e.g., Carmel Man). In the Chalcolithic Age (c. 4500–3000 B.C.) early Palestinian cultures appear at Teleilat Ghassul just N of the Dead Sea, not far from Jericho. At this early period mud-brick houses were adorned with amazing mural paintings. Artistic frescoes survive. The Bronze Age (c. 3000–2000 B.C.) is marked by the discovery of the earliest Canaanite sanctuaries at Megiddo, Jericho, and Ai. The Middle Bronze Age (c. 2000–1500 B.C.) is marked at the beginning by Abraham's entrance into Palestine, which in this period was thinly settled in the heavily forested highland regions. Archaeology has fully corroborated the general background of the patriarchal period. The Middle Bronze Age cities were stoutly fortified with high walls, towers, moats, and Cyclopean masonry. In the Late Bronze Age (1500–1200 B.C.) came the Israelites. Their conquest of Palestine took place around 1400 B.C. (Masoretic chronology). At this period City D of Jericho was built upon three earlier predecessors. It was this city that eventually fell to Joshua and the Israelites. During the period of Israelite conquest Ai and Bethel figure prominently, as well as Lachish. These cities have all been excavated. The situation at Ai particularly offers difficulty because et-Tell, identified as Ai, was unoccupied in 2000–1050 B.C. But there is serious question as to whether this identification is correct.

Numerous Iron Age or Hebrew monarchy sites have been excavated too. Among some of the more significant are Megiddo, Beth-Shan, Gezer, Hazor, Lachish, Samaria, and Jebusite Jerusalem. Excavations relating to NT study have not been so numerous as those connected with the OT. Especially significant for NT study has been the work at Caesarea, Capernaum, Samaria, Herodian Jericho, and excavations in the Temple area in Jerusalem. A detailed treatment of archaeological finds in Palestine would be impossible in a one-volume work of this type. See the individual Palestinian biblical sites for discussion of archaeological discoveries at each.

The story of the rediscovery of Palestine could begin in almost any of the early modern centuries. But a complete revolution in the surface exploration of Palestine came with the work of Edward Robinson of Union Theological Seminary of New York in 1838. His Biblical Researches (1841) marked an important milestone in Palestinian studies. Another significant development during the foundational period of Palestinian archaeology was the establishment of the Palestine Exploration Fund in 1865. An important project of the fund was the plotting of an inch to a mile survey of Western Palestine under the leadership of C. R. Conder and H. H. Kitchener.

The advent of scientific archaeology in Palestine may be said to have occurred in 1890, when the British scholar W. M. Flinders Petrie developed his pottery chronology method of dating at the mound of Tell el Hesi. There his work was confirmed and refined by American excavator F. J. Bliss. Between 1890 and 1914 the Palestine Exploration Fund sponsored work at several sites in the Shephelah. Of special importance was R. A. S. Macalister's work at Gezer (1902–9). German scholars also began to work in Palestine. The German Palestine Society was organized in 1877 and the German Oriental Society in 1898. The latter worked on the Capernaum synagogue, at Jericho, and at Shechem. The American Schools of Oriental Research was founded in 1900 and conducted five minor excavations before World War I. The great American expedition before World War I was at Samaria (1908–10) under the leadership of G. A. Reisner. His work marked the beginning of scientific excavation in Palestine.

During the years between the wars a new beginning of sorts came to Palestinian archaeology in 1920 when the British set up in Palestine a modern Department of Antiquities headed by an experienced archaeologist. The first major excavation in this period was the University of Pennsylvania Museum dig at Beth-Shan (1921–33). But the greatest single undertaking was the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago excavation at Megiddo (1925–39), originally designed to take down the entire tell, stratum by stratum, and to serve as a model of stratigraphic technique. The American Schools of Oriental Research initiated or participated in several excavations between the wars. These included Gibeah of Saul, Tell Beit Mirsim, Tell en-Nasbeh, Beth-Zur, Jerash, Bethel, and Tell el-Kheleifeh, identified as Solomon's seaport of Ezion-geber. W. F. Albright and Nelson Glueck especially led in ASOR projects. Also Elihu Grant excavated at Beth-Shemesh (1928–33), and the Harvard dig at Samaria continued (1931–33, 1935). The British Palestine Exploration Fund worked at Lachish (1933–38); John Garstang dug at Jericho (1930–36); and Judith Marquet-Krause excavated at Et-Tell (1933–35). In 1925 and 1928 British excavators also made discoveries connected with Palestinian prehistory in Galilee and Carmel caves.

Agitation connected with the division of Palestine and the establishment of the State of Israel effectively stopped archaeological work between 1938 and 1949. After 1949 resumption of excavation was under quite different conditions from the earlier period. On the Israeli side there was a strong nationalistic spirit and historical consciousness that gave rise to a desire to unearth the past. The Israelis built several large universities with departments of archaeology where they could train personnel to conduct the various digs. The Hebrew University, founded in 1925, had already produced qualified archaeologists by 1948. On the Jordanian side there was no such strong national scholarship, and foreign scholars and teams were welcome. The greatest excitement in the archaeological world at the time of the United Nations division of Palestine focused on the Dead Sea Scrolls. Numerous excavations were conducted in caves and at Qumran.

In Jordan and on the West Bank in the 1950s important digs were conducted at Dhiban (Dibon), NT Jericho, OT Jericho, Dothan, Bethel, Gibeon, Shechem, Beth-Zur, and Petra. Momentum built up in the 1960s with work on Jebusite Jerusalem, Gibeah, Taanach, Et-Tell, on Mt. Gerizim, at the Herodium, and elsewhere. Israeli archaeologists first attacked the site of Tell Qasile in 1949 and went on to work at Dor, Ramat Rahel, Hazor, Joppa, Acre, Caesarea, and elsewhere during the 1950s. During the following decade they continued at Caesarea and worked at Megiddo, En-Gedi, Tiberias, Arad, Chorazin, Masada, Timna, Dan, and elsewhere.

The Six-Day War in 1967 brought a new era to Palestinian studies. Now, with Israeli control of the West Bank, the part of Palestine most developed archaeologically was in Israeli hands. Dead Sea Scrolls scholars on both sides of the “Middle East Curtain” now had access to each other, and Israelis had access to the Old City with opportunity to excavate there. The Israelis tried to assure Western archaeologists that they were welcome to return to the West Bank; a few did. Joseph Callaway went back to Et-Tell. The Drew-McCormick, Harvard Expedition returned to Shechem, and the Danes excavated again at Shiloh. Israeli archaeologists have continued work in Israeli territory, at places like Beersheba, Hazor, Lachish, Chorazin, Dan, and Tell Qasile. And they have dug in occupied territory at such places as the Herodium and Megiddo. Consortiums of schools have also excavated at Tell el Hesi, Aphek, and Caesarea. The Franciscans have done a lot of work at Capernaum. But some of the most exciting archaeological investigation since the war has gone on in the Old City. Benjamin Mazar has directed the excellent work in the Temple area. Excavations in the Jewish Quarter, in the Armenian Garden, the Citadel, and on the City of David also have been rewarding.

Over in Jordan archaeological work has been undertaken at Heshbon, the Amman citadel, at Petra, and elsewhere. Surveys of sites have been conducted in the E Jordan Valley and S of the Dead Sea. Changed conditions have forced a change in the administration of the American Schools of Oriental Research in Jerusalem. The school now has an Amman Center of Oriental Research and an Albright Institute in Jerusalem, both autonomous.

With all that has been done and is now in progress in Palestine, it can confidently be stated that work there has scarcely begun. Of the approximately five thousand ruin heaps in Palestine, only a few hundred have been excavated at all, and only some thirty have been the scene of major digs.

History. The first glimpse of the history of Palestine is found in Genesis (10:15–20). Canaan, the son of Ham, is the father of Sidon, i.e., the Phoenician stock; Heth, i.e., the Hittites; the Jebusites, a local tribe in and about Jerusalem; the Amorites, men of the hills; the Gurgashites, an unknown stock; the Hivites, peasantry or fellahîn; the Arkites, citizens of Arka, in northern Phoenicia; the Sinites, people from some locality near Arka; the Arvadites, inhabitants of the island of Arvad off Tartos; the Zemarites, inhabitants of Sumra, and the Hamathites, the inhabitants of Hamath. “And afterward the families of the Canaanite were spread abroad. And the territory of the Canaanite extended from Sidon as you go toward Gerar, as far as Gaza; as you go toward Sodom and Gomorrah and Admah and Zeboiim, as far as Lasha” (vv. 18–19). These boundaries are substantially those of Canaan and later those of Palestine. Some of the primitive inhabitants of Canaan are called Rephaim—giants (Deut. 2:11, 20; 3:11; cf. Num. 13:33). The Amorites appear to belong to this race, as also the Emim, the Zamzummim or Zuzim, Ammon or Ham, and the Anakim, who are described as redoubtable giants. They inhabited the hill country, both E and W of the Jordan. The term Amorite is equivalent to “highlander.” Although Canaan is represented as the father of all Palestine, the Canaanites (“lowlanders”) are one family or group of the seed of Canaan. They inhabited the Philistine plain and the Jordan Valley. The Horites were the aborigines of Edom. The Amalekites were a Bedouin stock, inhabiting the ’Arabah, the Tîh, and Sinai, where their descendants still live a more or less predatory life. The Hittites proceeded from the Taurus, extending their conquests southward to Hamath and Carchemish and finally to southern Canaan. Some of them were in Hebron in Abraham’s day. Ezekiel said (Ezek. 16:3) that the father of Jerusalem was an Amorite and the mother was a Hittite. During the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Dynasties of Egypt the Egyptians vainly attempted to break the Hittite power. Rameses II finally made a treaty with them. Eventually, in the time of Sargon II of Assyria (709 B.C.), the last of the Hittite city-states in Syria were brought under Assyrian control.

The earliest mention of Palestine in Babylonian records is its conquest by Naram-sin, son of Sargon of Akkad, about 2350 B.C. It was called then "the land of the Amorites." His conquests extended also to Cyprus. Other Babylonian records show that an extensive commerce existed between Babylonia and Palestine. The inference is almost inevitable that it depended upon the maintenance of the ancient overlordship of Babylon. Babylonian science and writing existed in Palestine during the early second millennium B.C., and relics of them have been found there and in el-Amarna. Not until the reign of Thothmes III was Palestine finally conquered by Egypt, 1481 B.C., in a great battle near Megiddo. The el-Amarna tablets give many details of the Egyptian occupation of Palestine.

About 1400 B.C. the Hittites began to conquer large portions of Syria and Palestine, and the Amorites and Canaanites began to regain their independence from Egypt. Edom had never submitted to the Egyptian yoke. Under Rameses II Palestine and Syria were temporarily reconquered.

During the sojourn of the patriarchs in Palestine they doubtless found both the Hebrew and Babylonian languages a medium of polite intercourse, and the political affinities of the land a sure protection. When Jacob's sons went into Egypt the Hyksos, an Asiatic people with Babylonian culture, were infiltrating the land; in subsequent decades they gradually rose to power there. Under the circumstances it was not strange for Joseph to be made prime minister. Then from about 1720 to 1580 the Hyksos ruled Egypt. A native Egyptian dynasty overthrew the Hyksos and destroyed foreign control in about 1580 B.C. So when the Israelites were oppressed it was by a king of African descent "who did not know Joseph" and hated all that belonged to the Asiatics. When the Israelites came to Canaan, both Egyptian and Babylonian overlordship were at an end, and the Hebrews did not have to contend with mighty empires but only with numerous discordant tribes of the natives, a circumstance that greatly facilitated their conquest. Canaan was an agricultural and commercial country, not a center of conquering power. Its religion was of Babylonian origin.

The history of the Israelites from the Exodus, c. 1440 B.C. (Masoretic chronology), to the captivity is given with so much detail in the Bible that it is unnecessary to present more than the leading outlines. After forty years in the wilderness the Israelites entered Canaan. In a few years they conquered most of eastern and western Palestine. They failed, however, to subdue part of the Philistine plain, all of Phoenicia, Lebanon, and Anti-Lebanon, even part of the highlands of Judea, including Jerusalem, the future capital, and all of Edom and Moab. In the time of Saul and David the kingdom was consolidated from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates and from Phoenicia to the Red Sea. In the days of Rehoboam the kingdom was divided, and Judah and Benjamin and sometimes Edom formed the kingdom of Judah, and northern and eastern Palestine that of Israel, with ten tribes. Jeroboam tried to draw away the hearts of Israel from Jerusalem as a religious center by establishing a focus of idolatry at Bethel, a few miles to the N. At first this effort was only partially successful. And even late into the history of the divided commonwealth the pious Israelites turned to the Temple and worship at Jerusalem with an irrepressible yearning. At last, however, the whole people seems to have been corrupted, and in 721 B.C. Samaria was taken and the ten tribes deported to Assyria. For a while longer some of the kings of Judah resisted the idolatry that had ruined Israel, but in 586 B.C. Jerusalem was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, and the best of the people were carried away captive to Babylon.

For seventy years Palestine remained a ruined country; the poor who remained were subjected to the worst type of oriental despotism. In 536 B.C. the first installment of the Jews returned to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel. Later, under Ezra and Nehemiah, others of the more enterprising of the exiles followed. The immense majority of the Hebrew people, however, remained in Assyria, Arabia, and other parts of the East. Wherever they retained their national identity they were thoroughly cured of idolatry. To this day Judaism, although formal and pharisaical, is in no part of the world idolatrous.

From the time of the restoration until the conquest of Alexander, 332 B.C., Palestine continued to be a province of Persia. Subsequently it was ruled by the Ptolemies of Egypt (301–198 B.C.). During the period of the Seleucids (198–167) it was under the Greek yoke. In 167 B.C. Mattathias led a revolt that resulted in the independence of Judea under the Hasmonaean dynasty (143 B.C.), which lasted until 63 B.C., when Pompey took Jerusalem and made Judea a vassal kingdom under Herod. Roman covetousness ultimately brought about a rebellion, which was finally ended by Vespasian and Titus, who destroyed Jerusalem and reduced Judea to a simple Roman province, A.D. 70. Hadrian rebuilt Jerusalem about A.D. 130, calling it Aelia Capitolina. Soon afterward the rebellion of Bar Kochba broke out but was put down with immense slaughter, A.D. 135. It was at this time that the Romans changed the name of Judea, which became hateful to them, to Syria Palestina. Jerusalem was made a heathen city, and Jews were forbidden to set foot in it on pain of death. Thenceforward Palestine remained a part of the Byzantine or continuing Roman Empire in the East until, in the early part of the seventh century, it fell into Muslim hands. During the eleventh and twelfth centuries it was the scene of the Crusades until, in A.D. 1187, it was conquered by Saladin. In A.D. 1517 it succumbed to the Turks, who held it until 1917, when it was liberated and passed under British protectorate. The State of Israel was established May 14, 1948, but controlled only part of Palestine. Israel occupied the West Bank and Gaza after the Six-Day War in 1967, but the East Bank remains under Jordanian control. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

PAL'LU (pal'ū; “distinguished”). The second named of the sons of Reuben (Gen. 46:9; Ex. 6:14; Num. 26:5, 8; 1 Chron. 5:3) and founder of the Palluites (Num. 26:5), about 1900 B.C.

PAL'LUITE (pal'ū-īt). A descendant of Pallu (which see), of the tribe of Reuben (Num. 26:5).

PALM TREE. See Vegetable Kingdom.

Figurative. The straightness and beauty of the palm would naturally suggest giving its name to women; and we have the comparison “Your stature is like a palm tree” (Song of Sol. 7:7). The palm is a figure of the righteous enjoying their deserved prosperity (Ps. 92:12), doubtless with reference to the greenness of its foliage, its symmetry, its fruit, etc. Palm branches are a symbol of victory (Rev. 7:9).

The early church used the palm to express the triumph of the Christian over death through the resurrection; and on the tombs the palm is generally accompanied by the monogram of Christ, signifying that every victory of the Christian is because of this divine name and sign. The palm is especially the sign of martyrdom, as this was considered in the light of victory. See also Vegetable Kingdom.

PAL'TI (pal'ti; “delivered”).

1. The son of Raphu, of the tribe of Benjamin, and appointed to represent that tribe among the twelve spies (Num. 13:9), c. 1440 B.C.

2. The son of Laish of Gallim, to whom Saul gave Michal in marriage after he had driven away David (1 Sam. 25:44; “Phalti,” KJV; “Paltiel,” NIV), before 1004 B.C. The only other reference to him is when Michal was restored to David and “her husband went with her, weeping as he went, and followed her as far as Bahurim. Then Abner said to him, ‘Go, return.’ So he returned” (2 Sam. 3:15–16, where he is called Paltiel), about 977 B.C.

PAL'TIEL (pal'ti-el; “God delivers”).

1. The son of Azzan and leader of the tribe of Issachar (Num. 34:26). He was one of the twelve appointed to divide the land of Canaan among the tribes, c. 1440 B.C.

2. The son-in-law of Saul (1 Sam. 25:44; 2 Sam. 3:15); elsewhere in the NASB he is called Palti (“Phalti,” KJV; see article above).

PAL'TITE (pal'tit; i.e., sprung from Beth-pelet, in the S of Judah, Josh. 15:27). The same as Palti (which see) and the Gentile name of Helez, chief of the seventh division of David's army (2 Sam. 23:26), called the Pelonite in 1 Chron. 11:27; 27:10.

PAMPHYLIA (pam-fil'i-a; “of every race”). “One of the coast regions in the S of Asia Minor, having Cilicia on the E and Lycia on the W. In the Persian war, while Cilicia contributed one hundred ships and Lycia fifty, Pamphylia sent only thirty. The name probably then embraced little more than the crescent of comparatively level ground between Taurus and the sea. The Roman organization of the country, however, gave a wider range to the term Pamphylia. In St. Paul's time it was not only a regular province, but the Emperor Claudius had united Lycia with it, and probably also a good part of Pisidia. It was in Pamphylia that St. Paul first entered Asia Minor, after preaching the Gospel in Cyprus. He and Barnabas sailed up the river Cestrus to Perga (Acts 13:13). We may conclude, from Acts 2:10, that there were many Jews in the province; and possibly Perga had a synagogue. The two missionaries finally left Pamphylia by its chief seaport, Attalia. Many years afterward St. Paul sailed near the coast (27:5)” (Smith, Bib. Dict., s.v.).

PAN. A number of Heb. words are given as “pan” or “pans” in the KJV, NIV, and NASB.

One of them, marḥeshet, “frying pan” in the KJV and NIV (Lev. 2:7; 7:9), is more likely a deep, lidded, cooking pan (see marg., NASB). Another term, Heb. maḥābat, “pan” in the KJV, is usually translated “griddle” in the NASB and NIV (cf. Lev. 2:5; 1 Chron. 23:29). Still another, Heb. kap, appears frequently in discussions of the Tabernacle and the Temple, referring there to containers for incense, described as “spoons” in the KJV, “spoons” or “pans” in the NASB, and “ladles” in the NIV.

PAN'NAG (pan'ag). In the account of the commerce of Tyre, it is stated (Ezek. 27:17), “Judah and the land of Israel, they were your traders; with the wheat of Minnith, cakes, honey, oil,” etc. The Heb. for “cakes” is pannag (cf. marg.), the meaning of which cannot be definitely ascertained. Some understand confectionery, sweetmeats made from honey (thus the NIV “confections”). Some kind of sweetmeat is evidently intended. Cf. Akkad. pannigu, a variety of cake. See also Vegetable Kingdom.

PAPER. See Writing; Papyrus; Gebal.

PA'PHOS (pa'fos; “heated”). A city of Cyprus and its capital. It was famous for the worship of Venus, whose great temple was at “Old Paphos.” Here Paul's convert Sergius Paulus was secured (Acts 13:6–13; see Conybeare and Howson's Life of St. Paul). Old Paphos was settled by Greek or Phoenician colonists late in the second millennium B.C. New Paphos, about ten miles NW of Old Paphos, was the port of the old city, and it gradually became the more important of the two. New Paphos was the capital of Cyprus in Paul's day. Excavations in the 1960s uncovered some of the public buildings of Roman New Paphos: an odeon with an agora in front of it, next to the odeon a temple (possibly dedicated to Asklepios), a theater, and two rather luxurious villas (one of which was believed to have been the palace of the Roman governor). H.F.V.

PAPYRUS. A plant growing along the Nile in Egypt during the biblical period. It no longer is found in the Nile marshes of Lower Egypt, but it grows in the Sudan. It is also found in the region around Lake Huleh in Galilee. In the ancient world papyrus, Lat. cyperus papyrus, from which we get our word paper, was a common writing material. To prepare the writing product the outer covering of the stem of the plant was removed and the inner fibers were cut into thin strips. Some of these were placed vertically. Superimposed upon them were soaked fibers laid horizontally. These two layers were stuck together with an adhesive substance, pressure applied, and the strips dried. The result was a yellowish piece of papyrus paper. Often the exterior was rubbed smooth to accommodate a finer type of writing with ink. Papyrus rolls were used in ancient Egypt during the Old Kingdom (c. 2800–2250 B.C.) and perhaps even earlier. Egyptian papyrus rolls are still in existence from the end of the third millennium B.C. According to the Story of Wenamon (11:41), about the twelfth century B.C. papyrus rolls were exported from Egypt to Gebal in Phoenicia. For this reason the Greeks later called this city “Byblus,” meaning “papyrus,” later “book.” The largest ordinary papyrus roll in common use was about 30 feet long and some 10 inches high, adequate for the nonvocalized Heb. text of Isaiah. Egyptians upon occasion employed such huge rolls as the Papyrus Harris, 133 feet in length, and the Book of the Dead, 123 feet in length. Among the Jews the common use of the standard size papyrus rolls necessitated the division of some books such as the Torah of Moses into five books. The books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles, and perhaps others, were partitioned into two books when translated into Gk. because Gk. included the vowels, requiring more space than the consonantal Heb. text. Evidently Baruch wrote on papyrus as Jeremiah dictated to him, using pen and ink. The reed or calamus made from the hollow stalk of coarse grass or rush was cut diagonally with a knife and split in the end like a modern pen, hence the term “scribe’s knife” (Jer. 36:23). Ink was commonly made of soot or lamp black and gum mixed in water. Ancient Egyptians also employed papyrus for constructing boats (Isa. 18:2, cf. Moses’ “wicker basket,” Ex. 2:3, see marg.). The papyrus was the symbol of Lower Egypt, and the Egyptians made a notable discovery when they made use of this vegetable membrane as an excellent writing material.

Because the climate of Egypt is so dry, even fragile papyrus has been preserved in quantity. Though some papyri came to light earlier, they were found in quantity during the latter part of the nineteenth century and the early twentieth. Some of them were discovered accidentally by workers, but many were excavated during archaeological campaigns. Space limitations permit only a summary of the results of those finds. Though the papyri were written in several languages, the majority were produced in Gk. during the period just before, during, and after the time when the NT was written, and they are extremely valuable for NT study.

1. They show (as a result of studies in historical grammar) that the NT was written during the first Christian century instead of later, as critics often have asserted.
2. They demonstrate that the NT was written in the language of the people instead of in a Gk. coined by biblical writers.
3. They show further that the grammar of the NT is good grammar, judged on the basis of contemporary usage instead of on the basis of classical usage.
4. They help to give clarity to meanings of NT words not previously well understood.
5. The biblical papyri, dating from the second century and following, underscore the fact that the Gk. text we have had all along has been remarkably preserved in transmission. There is incredibly little difference between these early texts and those from later centuries, and not one doctrine is affected in the variations that do occur. H.F.V.

PARABLE. A word derived from the Gk. verb paraballo, to “lay by the side of,” to “compare”; and so a “likeness, similitude.”

Original Terms and Their Meaning. “Parable” is the rendering of the following Heb. and Gk. terms:

1. Heb. māshāl, a “similitude.” Most commonly rendered “discourse” or “oracle,” in Ps. 78:2 “parable” is the rendering, and an obscure or mysterious saying appears to be meant; whereas in other instances it signifies a fictitious narrative, invented for the purpose of conveying truth in a less offensive or more engaging form than that of direct assertion, such as that by which Nathan reproved David (2 Sam. 12:1–4), that in which Jotham exposed the folly of the Shechemites (Judg. 9:7–15), and that addressed by Jehoash to Amaziah (2 Kings 14:9–10), although these latter two are more properly classified as “fables.”

2. Gk. parabolē, a “placing one thing beside another,” an example by which a doctrine or precept is illustrated (Luke 14:7); a pithy and instructive saying involving some likeness or comparison, and having preceptive or admonitory force; an aphorism, a maxim (Matt. 15:15; Luke 5:36; 6:39; a proverb, and so rendered in 4:23).

3. Gk. paroimia, a saying out of the usual course; any dark saying that shadows forth some didactic truth, a symbolic or figurative saying (John 16:29, rendered “figure of speech”; “proverb,” see marg.); an allegory, i.e., extended and elaborate metaphor (10:6).

Definition and Distinctions. In the NT the term parable is not confined to those lengthened narratives to which alone we now usually apply it. Thus, “And He said to them, ‘No doubt you will quote this proverb to Me, “Physician, heal yourself!” ’” (Luke 4:23). The word is frequently used, either by the evangelists or by the disciples of Jesus, with reference to instructions of Christ, which we would simply call figurative, metaphorical, or proverbial. In Luke 6:39 we read, “And He also spoke a parable to them: ‘A blind man cannot guide a blind man, can he? Will they not both fall into a pit?’” (cf. Matt. 15:14–15). In all these sayings of our Lord, however, it is obvious that the germ of a parable is contained. We have only to work upon the hint given us, and we have the perfect story.

Trench (Notes on the Parables, p. 9) says: “In the process of distinguishing it [the parable] from those forms of composition with which it is most nearly allied, and therefore most likely to be confounded, and justifying the distinction, its essential properties will come before us much more clearly than I could hope to bring them in any other way.” In defining the difference between the parable and the fable, he writes, “The parable is constructed to set forth a truth spiritual and heavenly; this the fable, with all its value, is not; it is essentially of the earth, and never lifts itself above the earth. It never has a higher aim than to inculcate maxims of prudential morality, industry, caution, foresight; and these it will sometimes recommend even at the expense of the higher self-forgetting virtues.... Yet again there is another point of difference between the parable and the fable. While it can never be said that the fabulist is regardless of truth, since it is neither his intention to deceive, when he attributes language and discourse by reason to trees, and birds, and beasts, nor is anyone deceived by him; yet the severer reverence for truth, which is habitual to the higher moral teacher, will not allow him to indulge even in this sporting with the truth, this temporary suspension of its laws, though upon agreement, or, at least, with tacit understanding.... The great Teacher, by parables, therefore, allowed himself in no transgression of the established laws of nature, in nothing marvelous or anomalous; he presents to us no speaking trees or reasoning beasts, and we should be at once conscious of an unfitness in his so doing.”

He says that “the parable is different from the myth, inasmuch as in the myth the truth, and that which is only the vehicle of the truth, are wholly blended together.... The mythic narrative presents itself not merely as the vehicle of the truth, but as itself being the truth; while in the parable there is a perfect consciousness in all minds of the distinctness between form and essence, shell and kernel, the precious vessel and yet more precious wine which it contains.”

Again he says, “The parable is also clearly distinguishable from the proverb, though it is true that in a certain degree the words are used interchangeably in the NT, and as equivalent the one to the other. Thus, ‘Physician, heal thyself’ (Luke 4:23) is termed a parable, being more strictly a proverb. It is not difficult to explain how this interchange of the two words should have come to pass. Partly from the fact of there being but one word in the Hebrew to signify both parable and proverb; which circumstance must have had considerable influence upon writers accustomed to think in that language, and itself arose from the parable and proverb being alike enigmatical and somewhat obscure forms of speech, ‘dark sayings,’ speaking a part of their meaning, and leaving the rest to be inferred.”

The parable differs from the allegory “in form rather than in essence: there being in the allegory an interpenetration of the thing signifying and the thing signified, the qualities and properties of the first being attributed to the last, and the two thus blended together, instead of being kept quite distinct and placed side by side, as is the case in the parable. The allegory needs not, as the parable, an interpretation to be brought to it from without, since it contains its interpretation within itself, and, as the allegory proceeds, the interpretation proceeds hand in hand with it, or at least never falls far behind it.” “I am the true vine,” etc. (John 15:1–8) is an allegory, whereas 10:1–16 contains two allegories.

The Parable as a Means of Teaching. Two characteristics of the parable render it eminently useful in teaching. It is illustrative, assisting to make truth intelligible, or, if intelligible before, to present it more vividly to the mind. The parable “does not indeed contain direct proof of the doctrine which it unfolds, but it associates with it all the force of that proof which is given by the exhibition of the universal prevalence of any principle. Growth, for example, we know to be a law of nature. Let us set out, therefore, with the conviction that the kingdom of grace corresponds with the kingdom of nature—the conviction, it is to be borne in mind, which constitutes the foundation of the parable; and, in a story calling our attention to that growth, we have not only an illustration, but a proof, that the same growth which appears in the natural must also appear in the spiritual world. The analogy convinces us that it must be so, and is therefore so far a proof” (Wm. Milligan, Imperial Bible Dictionary, s.v.).

Again, “the mind takes a natural delight in this manner of teaching, appealing as it does not to the understanding only, but to the feelings, to the imagination, in short to the whole man, calling as it does the whole man, with all its powers and faculties, into pleasurable activity; and all things thus learned with delight are those longest remembered.” The Scriptures are full also of acted parable, for every type is a real parable. The whole Levitical constitution, with its sacred precincts, its priesthood, its sacrifices, and all its ordinances, is a parable, and is so declared (Heb. 9:9). The wandering of Israel in the desert has ever been regarded as a parable of spiritual life.

Whedon (Com., on Matt. 13:1ff.) thus happily sums up the advantages of the parable as a means of teaching: “The sacred parable was a wonderful vehicle of truth to serve three distinct purposes, viz.: to reveal, to conceal, and to perpetuate. It revealed the sacred truth by the power of analogy and illustration. It concealed the truth from him who had not, by proper sympathy or previous instruction, the true key to its hidden meaning. To such a one it was a riddle or a tale. And so our Lord could give to his disciples in this method the deepest secrets of his kingdom for ages, while the caviler, who would have abused the truth, heard without understanding (v. 11). But the truth thus embodied in narrative was, as it were, materialized and made fit for perpetuation. It had a form and body to it by which it could be preserved in tangible shape for future ages.”

Interpretation of Parables. It has been urged by some writers, by none with greater force or clearness than by Chrysostom, that there is a scope or purpose for each parable and that our aim must be to discern this, not to find a special significance in each circumstance or incident. It may be questioned, however, whether this canon of interpretation is likely to lead us to the full meaning of this portion of our Lord’s teaching. It must be remembered that in the great patterns of interpretation that He Himself has given us there is more than this. Not only the sower and the seed and the several soils have their counterparts in the spiritual life, but the birds of the air, the thorns, and the scorching heat have each of them a significance. It may be inferred from these two instances that we are, at least, justified in looking for meaning even in the seeming accessories of a parable. The very form of the teaching makes it probable that there may be, in any case, more than one legitimate explanation. A parable may be at once ethical and in the highest sense of the term prophetic. There is thus a wide field open to the discernment of the interpreter. There are also restraints upon the fertility of his imagination: (1) The analogies must be real, not arbitrary. (2) The parables are to be considered as parts of a whole, and the interpretation of one is not to override or encroach upon the lessons taught by others. (3) The direct teaching of Christ presents the standard to which all our interpretations are to be referred, and by which they are to be measured. (4) And, finally, the parable may not be made the first source of doctrine. Doctrines otherwise and already grounded may be illustrated, or indeed further confirmed by them, but it is not allowable to constitute doctrine first by their aid.

Classification. Tables 27 and 28 classify the parables in the Scriptures. In addition to the parables, we call attention to the allegories of (1) the vine and its branches (John 15:1–8) and (2) the sheep and shepherd (10:1–16). We have also several sayings of our Lord that obviously contain the germ of a parable, such as: the houses on the rock and on the sand (Matt. 7:24–27; Luke 6:46–49); children in the marketplace (Matt. 11:16–17; Luke 7:32); the unclean spirit (Matt. 12:34–45; Luke 11:24–26); the city (Matt. 5:14); the lamp (Matt. 5:15; Mark 4:21; Luke 8:16); the householder (Matt. 13:52); the attendants of the bridegroom (Matt. 9:15; Mark 2:19–20; Luke 5:34–35); the patched garment (Matt. 9:16; Mark 2:21; Luke 5:36); old and new wineskins (Matt. 9:17; Mark 2:22; Luke 5:37); the harvest and lack of workmen (Matt. 9:37–38; Luke 10:2); the opponent (Matt. 5:25; Luke 12:58); the narrow gate, etc. (Matt. 7:13–14; Luke 13:24); building a tower (14:28–30); the king going to war (14:31–32); the fig tree (Matt. 24:32–35; Mark 13:28–31; Luke 21:29–33); the watching servants (Mark 13:34–37); the faithful and the unfaithful servants (Matt. 24:45–51); and the watching householder (Matt. 24:43; Luke 12:39).

PARACLETE. See Advocate; Helper; Holy Spirit.

PARADISE (Gk. paradeisos, “park”). This term has been applied to Eden (which see). In the later books of the OT it appears in the sense of a park or pleasure ground (Heb. pardēs, rendered “forest,” Neh. 2:8; “parks,” Eccles. 2:5; “orchard,” Song of Sol. 4:13). It first appears in Gk. as coming straight from Persia. Greek lexicographers classify it as a Persian word. Modern linguists accept the same conclusion with hardly a disagreement. In Xenophon the word occurs frequently, and we receive vivid pictures of the scene that it implied. A wide open park, enclosed against injury, yet with its natural beauty unspoiled, with stately trees, many of them bearing fruit, watered by clear streams on whose banks roamed large herds of antelope or sheep—this was the scenery that connected itself in the mind of the Greek traveler with the word paradeisos and for which his own language supplied no precise equivalent. Through the writings of Xenophon and through the general mixture of orientalism in the later Gk. after the conquests of Alexander, the word gained a recognized place, and the LXX writers chose it for a new use that gave it higher worth and secured for it a more enduring life. They used the same word whenever there was any allusion, however remote, to the fair region that had been the first blissful home of man. It was natural, however, that this higher meaning should become the exclusive one and be associated with new thoughts. Paradise, with no other word to qualify it, was the bright region that man had lost, which was guarded by the flaming sword. Paradise, or the Garden of Eden, became to the later Jews a common designation for the state of bliss that awaits the righteous after death—by which they meant that delights like those of Eden are enjoyed by the departed—they are in a paradise-like state. With reference to this use of the term, but with a deeper insight into the spiritual relation of things and the connection between the past and future, it is employed in the NT to indicate the destiny and experience of the redeemed (Luke 23:43; cf. Rev. 2:7; 22:2, 14). It is quite difficult to locate paradise as mentioned by Paul (2 Cor. 12:4). Whedon (Com., ad loc.) believes it nearer to earth than the third heaven (v. 2). Meyer (Com., ad loc.) says, “The paradise is here not the lower, i.e., the place of Sheol, in which the spirits of the departed righteous are until the resurrection, but the upper, the paradise of God (Rev. 2:7) in heaven, where God’s dwelling is.”

PA’RAH (pa’ra; “young cow, heifer”). One of the towns of Benjamin (Josh. 18:23), identified as Farah, 5½ miles NE of Jerusalem.

PARALYTIC. See Diseases: Paralysis.

PARAMOUR (Heb. pîlegesh, Ezek. 23:20). Applied to the male lover in this passage but elsewhere rendered concubine (which see).

PA’RAN (pa’ran). A wilderness located in the E central region of the Sinai Peninsula. This region bordered the Arabah and the Gulf of Aqaba on the E and apparently comprised the wilderness of Zin, Kadesh-barnea, and Elath in its borders on the W.

Paran is first noticed in connection with the expedition of the eastern kings against Sodom (Gen. 14:6; “El Paran,” NIV). We then learn that Ishmael dwelt in the wilderness of Paran (21:21); that after Israel left Sinai they camped in Paran (Num. 10:12; 12:16); that the spies were sent from Paran into Canaan (13:3) and returned to “the wilderness of Paran, at Kadesh” (v. 26). Its mountainous nature and its rugged passes seem to have impressed the Israelites, accustomed to the level country of Egypt (Deut. 1:19), and they feared to enter these passes until they were found to be open (v. 22). To Paran David went at the death of Samuel (1 Sam. 25:1), probably because he could not find support for himself in the desert of Judah. Hadad the Edomite, when he revolted from Solomon, went to Egypt by way of Paran (1 Kings 11:18).

PAR’BAR (par’bar; “suburb”). A part of the city of Jerusalem connected with the Temple (2 Kings 23:11, “precincts,” NASB, but “suburbs,” KJV; 1 Chron. 26:18; NIV, “court”). As to the meaning of the name, the rabbis generally agree in translating it “the outside place,” whereas modern authorities accept it as equivalent to the parwārīm in 2 Kings 23:11 (KJV, “precincts”; NIV, “court”). In accepting this interpretation, there is no difficulty in identifying the Parbar with the suburb mentioned by Josephus in describing Herod’s Temple, as lying in the deep valley that separated the W wall of the Temple from the city opposite it, in other words the southern end of the Tyropoeon. Parbar is possibly an ancient Jebusite name. Keil (Com., 1 Chron. 26:18) believes it to have been the name of a separate building on the W side, the back of the outer court of the Temple by the door Shallecheth, which contained cells for storage of goods and furniture (see marg.).

PARENT (Gk. goneus). The fifth commandment (Ex. 20:12; cf. Lev. 19:3; Deut. 5:16) enjoined devotion to parents as a religious duty; and as the law was declared more fully the relation of children to parents was more accurately defined and more firmly established in society. A child who cursed (Ex. 21:17; Lev. 20:9; cf. Deut. 27:16; Prov. 20:20) or struck his parents was punishable with death. Obstinate disobedience on the part of sons was, upon judicial investigation, punished with stoning (Deut. 21:18–21). But such crimes seem to have been almost unknown. According to the rabbinical ordinances a son was considered independent when he could make his own living; and, although a daughter remained in the power of her father till marriage, she could not after she was of age be given away without her own express and full consent. A father might chastise his child but only while young, and even then not to such an extent as to destroy self-respect. But to beat a grown-up son was forbidden on pain of excommunication; and the apostolic injunction “Fathers, do not provoke your children to anger” (Eph. 6:4) finds an almost literal counterpart in the Talmud (Edersheim, Sketches of Jewish Social Life in the Days of Christ, p. 99). According to the law a father married his sons (Gen. 24; Ex. 21:9; Judg. 14:2–3) and daughters (Gen. 29:16–29; 34:12) at his pleasure; and he might sell the latter as concubines (Ex. 21:7). Much value was attached to the blessing of a parent, whereas the curse of a parent was accounted a great misfortune (Gen. 27:4, 12; 49:1–28).

PARLOUR. Archaic rendering of several Heb. terms. In 1 Chron. 28:11 Heb. ḥeder refers to the inner rooms (so NASB and NIV) of the Temple porch and holy place. Hebrew alḥyyâ in Judg. 3:20–28 refers to a “cool roof chamber” (NASB) or “upper room” (NIV) upon the flat roof of a house. It was open to currents of air and as such offered relief from the heat.

The “parlour” in 1 Sam. 9:22, Heb. lishkâ, was the chamber or hall (so NASB and NIV) in which Samuel ate the sacrificial meal with Saul.

PARMASH'TA (par-mash'ta; Old Persian, “the very first”). The seventh named of the sons of Haman (which see), slain by the Jews (Esther 9:9).

PAR'MENAS (par'me-nas). One of the seven deacons, “men of good reputation, full of the Spirit and of wisdom” (Acts 6:3, 5). There is a tradition that he suffered martyrdom at Philippi in the reign of Trajan, A.D. 98–117. Hippolytus said that he was at one time bishop of Soli. He is commemorated in the calendar of the Byzantine church on July 28.

PAR'NACH (par'nak). Father of Elizaphan, leader of the tribe of Zebulun at the close of the Exodus (Num. 34:25), c. 1440 B.C.

PA'ROSH (pa'rōsh; “a flea”). The 2,172 descendants of Parosh who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:3; Neh. 7:8). Another detachment of 150 males, with Zechariah at their head, accompanied Ezra (Ezra 8:3). Seven of the family had married foreign wives (10:25). They assisted in the building of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:25) and signed the covenant with Nehemiah (10:14), before 536 B.C.

PARSHANDA'THA (par-shan-da'tha; Old Persian, “inquisitive, inquiring”). The eldest of Haman's ten sons, who were slain by the Jews at Susa (Esther 9:7).

PAR'SIN. See Mene.

PAR'THIANS (par'thi-anz). They are mentioned as being present in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:9). They were a people of NW Persia (Iran) who lived in the general region SE of the Caspian Sea. The ancient Parthians are called a "Scythic" race and probably belonged to the great Turanian family. Nothing is known of them till about the time of Darius Hystaspes, when they are found in the district that so long retained their name. They appear as faithful subjects of the Persian monarchs. Herodotus speaks of them as contained in the sixteenth satrapy of Darius. In the final struggle between the Greeks and Persians they remained faithful to the latter, serving at Arbela; but they offered only a weak resistance to Alexander when, on his way to Bactria, he entered their country. In the division of Alexander's dominions they fell to the share of Eumenes, and Parthia for some time was counted among the territories of the Seleucidae. About 256 B.C., however, they revolted and, under Arsaces, succeeded in establishing their independence.

Parthia, in the mind of the writer of the Acts, would designate the great empire the Parthians built up, which extended from India to the Tigris and from the Chorasmian desert to the shores of the southern ocean. Hence the prominent position of the name Parthians in the list of those present at Pentecost. Parthia was a power almost rivaling Rome—the only existing power that had tried its strength against Rome and not been defeated in the encounter. The Parthian dominion lasted for nearly five centuries, commencing in the third century before Christ. The Parthians seized Jerusalem in 40 B.C., and Rome made Herod king of Judea at that time to check the formidable westward push of the Parthian Empire.

PARTIAL, PARTIALITY. The translation of several terms in the original. Heb. nākar means "to scrutinize" and therefore to care for, or respect; it is used with pānîm, "face," to convey the idea of showing partiality toward someone (Deut. 1:17; 16:19; Prov. 24:23; 28:21). Heb. nāšā, to "lift," is similarly used in combination with pānîm to mean "be partial" (Lev. 19:15). The Gk. verb prosōpolēmp̄teō (James 2:9) is derived from two others meaning to "accept the face"; and both have the idea of partiality. This is contrary to the Bible, for God commanded that the judges should pronounce judgment without partiality ("respect of persons," KJV; see Lev. 19:15; Deut. 1:17; 16:19). God is declared to be impartial or without favoritism (prosōpolēptes, Acts 10:34; prosōpolēmpsia, Rom. 2:11; Eph. 6:9; Col. 3:25); and Christians are warned against partiality (prosōpolēmpsia, James 2:1; epiblepō, 2:3; prosōpolēmp̄teō, 2:9; cf. Prov. 24:23; 28:21).

Undue inclination toward one or another party (Gk. prosklisis) is cautioned against in 1 Tim. 5:21.

PARTITION, MIDDLE WALL OF. See Dividing Wall, Barrier of.

PARTRIDGE. See Animal Kingdom.

PARU'AH (pa-rū'a; "blossoming" or "increase"). The father of the Jehoshaphat who was Solomon's deputy in Issachar (1 Kings 4:17), 960 B.C.

PARVA'IM (par-va'im). The name of a place rich in gold, from which it was brought to adorn Solomon's Temple (2 Chron. 3:6). The name does not occur elsewhere and has never been satisfactorily explained. Gesenius and other authorities regard it as a general term signifying the East and corresponding to our "Levant."

PARZITE. See Perez.

PA'SACH (pa'sak; to "divide"). The first named of the sons of Japhlet, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:33), about 1390 B.C.

PASDAM'MIM (pas-dam'im). A place mentioned (2 Sam. 23:9 [NIV; see marg.]; 1 Chron. 11:13; Ephes-dammim, 1 Sam. 17:1) as the scene of a fierce conflict with the Philistines. It was between Socoh and Azekah. See Ephes-dammim.

PASE'AH (pa-se'a; "lame").

1. One of the sons of Eshton, among the descendants of Judah, described as "the men of Recah" (1 Chron. 4:12).

2. The head of a family of Temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:49; Neh. 7:51). His "son" (or descendant) Joiada assisted in restoring one of the gates of the city (3:6), probably before 536 B.C.

PASH'HUR (pash'her).

1. The son of Immer the priest. He was chief officer of the Temple (Jer. 20:1), and when he heard the prophecies of Jeremiah he had Jeremiah beaten and put in the stocks. The next day he released Jeremiah, who informed him that his name had been changed to Magor-missabib (i.e., "terror on every side") and that he and all his house would be carried to Babylon and would die there (20:2–6), about 605 B.C. Nothing more is known of him.

2. Another priest, the son of Malchijah, who in the reign of Zedekiah was one of the chief officers of the court (Jer. 38:1). He was sent, with others, by Zedekiah to Jeremiah at the time when Nebuchadnezzar was preparing his attack upon Jerusalem (chap. 21), about 589 B.C. Again, somewhat later, Pashhur joined with others in petitioning the king to have Jeremiah put to death because of his denunciations. In the time of Nehemiah this family appears to have become a chief house and its head the head of a division (1 Chron. 9:12; Ezra 2:38; Neh. 7:41; 10:3; 11:12).

3. The father of Gedaliah, which latter took part with Jucal and the Pashhur in no. 2 in the accusation and imprisonment of Jeremiah (Jer. 38:1), 589 B.C.

PASSENGER (Prov. 9:15; Ezek. 39:11, 14, 15, KJV). Those who pass by, or who pass through the land (see NASB).

PASSION OF CHRIST (Gk. to pathein, "suffering"). A term employed in Acts 1:3, KJV (NASB and NIV, "suffering"), with reference to the crucifixion of the Lord. For the chief points of the history of the event, see Jesus Christ.

PASSIONS, LIKE (Gk. homoioopathēs). Used in the KJV in the expressions "men of like passions with you" (Acts 14:15) and "a man subject to like passions as we are" (James 5:17). It means "men of the same nature," "man with a nature like ours" (so NASB) or "men, human like you" (NIV).

PASSOVER, FEAST OF. See Festivals.

PASTOR (Heb. rō'eh, "shepherd," and usually so rendered; Gk. poimēn, "shepherd"). The rendering "pastor" in the KJV of the OT is confined to several passages in Jeremiah (2:8; 3:15; 10:21; 12:10; 17:16; 22:22; 23:1–2) and reflects the translation of those passages in the Geneva Bible. The NASB and NIV renderings, "shepherd," "shepherds," or, in 2:8 only, "ruler," or "leaders," lit., "shepherd," are to be preferred. The Gk. term poimēn (Eph. 4:11) is elsewhere rendered "shepherd."

PASTOR, CHRISTIAN (lit., "shepherd"). Paul's pastoral epistles contain the sum and substance of NT teaching on this subject. He laid down three functions: (1) The ministration in divine service includes the ordering of worship, administering the sacraments, and preaching the Word. Here the pastor is appropriately termed minister. (2) The responsibility of the pastoral care springs out of no. 1. The feeding of the flock is the instruction of its members, but it is also the vigilant distributive attention to all its interests in the whole economy of life. The shepherds must imitate the chief shepherd, who “calls his own sheep by name.” (3) This pastoral relation passes naturally into what we have scriptural authority for calling the spiritual government of the church. Its ministers are called rulers (Gk.

hēgoumenoi) or presidents (Gk. proestōtes), and all its members are bidden to obey them that have the rule. The design of the Lord’s gift of pastors and teachers, as supplementary to that of apostles and evangelists, is “the equipping of the saints for the work of service, to the building up of the body of Christ” (Eph. 4:12). Pastors are to be watchful (Heb. 13:17; 2 Tim. 4:5), gentle and affectionate (1 Thess. 2:7–8), and should exhort, warn, and comfort (2:11; 1 Cor. 4:14–15).

PASTURE. See Shepherd.

PASTURELANDS (Heb. migrāsh; “suburbs,” KJV). A place where cattle are driven to graze; especially the open country set apart for pasture around the Levitical cities (which see; Num. 35:2; Josh. 21:11; 1 Chron. 6:55). It also meant an open area around a city or building (Ezek. 27:28; cf. 45:2; 48:17).

PAT´ARA (pat´a-ra). A seaport where Paul changed ships during his third missionary journey (Acts 21:1–2). Located on the coast of Lycia, it was a city of magnificence and large population in Paul’s time. Its ruins are impressive, though unfortunately nearly everything to be seen there today dates after the time of Paul (e.g., the handsome gate of c. A.D. 100; the baths of Vespasian, A.D. 69–79; the granary of Hadrian, second century; the theater with its second-century stage building). Christianity had a footing in the city, and it was the residence of a bishop. H.F.V.

PATH.

Figurative. The dispensations of God are called His paths (Pss. 25:10; 65:11), as are also His precepts (17:5); the phenomena of nature are also paths of God (77:19; Isa. 43:16).

PATH´ROS (path´ros; Egyptian, “Southland”). The name of upper Egypt as distinguished from Matsor, or lower Egypt (Isa. 11:11; Jer. 44:1, 15; Ezek. 30:14). It was the country that was called Thebais by the classic geographers and Paturissu in the cuneiform texts. Colonies of Jews were settled there.

PATH´RUS (path´rus; 1 Chron. 1:12). See Pathros.

PATHRU´SIM (path-rū´sim). The fifth in order of the sons (i.e., descended tribes) of Mizraim (Gen. 10:14; 1 Chron. 1:11–12, where they are called the people of Pathrus), believed to have been inhabitants of Pathros, Egypt, and from it to have taken their name. See Pathros.

PATHRU´SITES. See Pathrusim.

PATIENCE.

1. Gk. makrothumia. Endurance, constancy, forbearance, long-suffering.

2. Gk. hupomonē. “A remaining under,” steadfastness, constancy, a patient waiting for.

The difference between these two terms is given by Trench (NT Syn., 2:14):

“Makrothumia will be found to express patience in respect of persons, hupomonē in respect of things.... We should speak, therefore, of the makrothumia of David (2 Sam. 16:10–13), the hupomonē of Job (James 5:11).” Patience is that calm and unruffled temper with which the good man bears the evils of life, whether they proceed from persons or things. It also manifests itself in a sweet submission to the providential appointments of God and fortitude in the presence of the duties and conflicts of life. This grace saves one from discouragement in the face of evil (Luke 21:19), aids in the cultivation of godliness (2 Pet. 1:6), aids the development of the entire Christian character (James 1:4), and, continued till the end, will terminate in reward in the life to come (Rom. 2:7; James 5:7–8).

Patience of God. Respecting the patience of God, Trench says (vol. 2, p. 15), “While both graces [the two forms mentioned above, namely, with persons and with things] are possessed by men only the former is an attribute of God. Men may tempt and provoke him, and he does display patience in regard to them (Ex. 34:6; Rom. 2:4; 1 Pet. 3:20); there may be a resistance to God in men, because he respects the wills with which he created them, even when those wills are fighting against him. But there can be no resistance to God, nor burden upon him, the Almighty, from things; therefore patience of things is never ascribed to him.” The “God who gives perseverance” (hupomonē) means that God is the Author of patience in His servants (Rom. 15:5).

PATMOS (pat'mos). A small, rocky island belonging to the group called “Sporades,” in that part of the Aegean known as the Icarian Sea. On account of its rocky, barren, and desolate nature the Roman government used the island as a place of banishment for criminals. The prisoners were compelled to work the mines of the island. The emperor Domitian banished the apostle John to this island (Rev. 1:9), A.D. 95. Patmos was the locale for the far-reaching apocalyptic visions of the book of the Revelation. The fifty-mile-square Aegean island has magnificent scenery and the white crags of the shoreline and the beauty of the open ocean furnish an example of a geographical background that aids the biblical interpreter to expound the events and experiences of the revelator who was banished to its shores. PATRIARCH (Gk. patriarchēs, patēr, “father,” archēs, “head”). The founder of a tribe, a progenitor. It is applied in the NT to Abraham (Heb. 7:4), to the sons of Jacob (Acts 7:8–9), and to David (2:29). In common usage the title patriarch is assigned especially to those whose lives are recorded in Scripture previous to the time of Moses.

PATRIARCHAL AGE, THE. The period of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. If one follows the Masoretic chronology and the general chronological scheme underlying the Heb. Bible, Abraham was born c. 2161 B.C. and entered Canaan 2086 B.C. The patriarchal period would extend in this case from 2086 to 1871 B.C. and the Egyptian sojourn from 1871 to 1441 B.C. (cf. 1 Kings 6:1 with Ex. 12:40–41). Scholars for the most part reject the numbers underlying the biblical chronology and place Abraham's migration from Ur anywhere from 1900 to 1750 B.C. and the patriarchal period itself anywhere from 1750 to 1500 B.C. However, following the simple biblical chronology, Abraham is placed, insofar as his early Mesopotamian connections are involved, just prior to the new Sumero-Akkadian empire of Ur-Nammu, the founder of the famous Third Dynasty of Ur (c. 2080–1960 B.C.), who assumed the new title “king of Sumer and Akkad.” The mightiest work of this monarch was the erection of the great ziggurat at Ur, which is well preserved today. The patriarch thus left Ur just before it entered the heyday of its power. On the other hand, the patriarchal age in Palestine would be coterminous with numerous smaller Elamite and Amorite states of Mesopotamia with strong city-states existing at Isin, Larsa, and Eshnunna, whose princes took over the heritage of the Third Dynasty of Ur after its collapse. As far as Egypt is concerned the patriarchal age marked the strong Middle Kingdom under the Twelfth Dynasty (c. 2000–1780 B.C.). Abraham went down to Egypt evidently in the early years of this dynasty. Joseph became prime minister of and Jacob stood before one of the powerful pharaohs of this dynasty, Amenemes I-IV or Senwosret I-III.

The Ur of Abraham's age has been excavated, showing a remarkably rich commercial emporium, the center of the important cult worshipping the moon god Sin. Archaeology has given support to the position that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were historical figures and not mere legendary creations, mythological heroes, or personification of clans or tribes. (See R. P. DeVaux, Revue Biblique 53 [1949]: 321–28.) The old critical view of the unhistoricity of the patriarchal narratives has been almost completely discredited by recent archaeological discoveries at Nuzi between 1925 and 1941. The Nuzi Tablets furnish many illustrations of patriarchal customs such as adoption, marriage laws, rights of primogeniture, and the teraphim. Since 1933 the Mari Letters from Tell Hariri have added their weight of confirmation. Such names as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob occur extrabiblically in the cuneiform tablets. Moreover, Abraham’s sojourns at Haran (Gen. 11:31; 12:5), a town that is still in existence on the Balikh River sixty miles W of Tell Halaf, have been made more believable. Cuneiform sources of the nineteenth and eighteenth centuries B.C. mention Haran frequently. The name appears in Assyrian documents as Harranu (meaning “road”), likely describing the trade flowing through this city from Damascus, Carchemish, and Nineveh. Haran, like Ur, was the center of the worship of the moon god Sin. The city of Nahor, Rebekah’s home (24:10), occurs frequently in the Mari Tablets discovered in 1935 and belonging to the eighteenth century B.C. Another support for Abraham’s residence in Aram-Naharaim is the names of Abraham’s forefathers in Assyrian times: Serug (Assyr. Sarugi), Nahor, and Terah (Til Turakhi, “mount of Terah”). Moreover, the general situation in Canaan at the time of Abraham’s arrival in the Middle Bronze Age (2000–1500 B.C.) is thoroughly in agreement with the representations in Genesis. Archaeology has exploded the critical idea that the stories of the patriarchs are mostly regressions from the time of the dual monarchy (ninth and eighth centuries B.C.). Places that are named in the patriarchal narratives, moreover, are not the towns and holy sites of later periods, such as Mizpeh and Gibeah, but are nearly all known from archaeological explorations to have existed in the patriarchal period. Examples are Dothan, Gerar, Jerusalem, Bethel, Shechem, and Beersheba. Also, the general historical background of the remarkable chapter 14 of Genesis has been essentially corroborated by modern archaeology. Although certain conclusions may need to be modified somewhat (cf. J. Van Seters, Abraham in History and Tradition [1975]), there can be no doubt that archaeology has in recent decades performed a splendid service in vindicating the essential historicity of the patriarchal period of Genesis, besides marvelously illustrating its background. PATRIMONY. The produce of the property that a Levite (which see) possessed according to his family descent (Deut. 18:8, “fathers’ estate”). Thus a Levite who went to the sanctuary might either rent his property in the Levitical town and draw the yearly income, or sell the house that belonged to him there.

PAT’ROBAS (pat’ro-bas; “life of his father”). One of the Christians at Rome to whom Paul sent salutations (Rom. 16:14).

PA’U (pa’u; “bleating”). A place in Edom (Gen. 36:39), the capital of Hadar, king of Edom. Its position is unknown. It is called Pai in 1 Chron. 1:50 (Pau in the NIV).

PAUL. The great apostle (Gk. Paulos, “little”; Saulos, perhaps from Heb. shā’ûl, “asked”).

Name. The name Paul, which was used for the first time by the historian in Acts 13:9, “Saul, who was also known as Paul,” has given rise to much discussion. The usual theory is that the apostle had a Jewish name, Saul, and a Roman name, Paul. Ramsay says (St. Paul the Traveller, etc., p. 81), “It was the fashion for every Syrian, Cilician, or Cappadocian who prided himself on his Greek education and his knowledge of the Greek language to bear a Greek name; but at the same time he had his other name in the native language by which he was known among his countrymen in general.” But it is best to understand that Saul’s name was changed as a matter of course when he became a Christian, that the word Paul means “little,” and that Paul wanted to be known as the “Little One” in Christ’s service; such changes in the cases of Abram, Gideon, Naomi, etc., are to be noted.

Personal History. Paul was a native of Tarsus, a city of Cilicia (Acts 21:39; 22:3), and was of pure Jewish descent, of the tribe of Benjamin (Phil. 3:5). There is no mention of his mother, and the information respecting his father is meager, namely, that he was a Pharisee (Acts 23:6) and that from him Saul inherited the rights of Roman citizenship (22:28). “The character of a Roman citizen superseded all others before the law and in the general opinion of society, and placed him amid the aristocracy of any provisional town” (Ramsay, p. 31). It will help to better understand the apostle’s life and teaching to remember that he was (1) a Roman citizen; (2) a Tarsian, a citizen of no humble city (see Tarsus); (3) a Hebrew; and (4) a Pharisee. The date of his birth is unknown, although an ancient tradition places it as the second year after Christ.

Previous to Conversion. Because it was the custom among the Jews that all boys learn a trade, Paul learned “tent-making,” “the material of which was haircloth supplied by the goats of his native province and sold in the markets of the Levant by the well-known name of cilicium” (Coneybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul). At the proper age (probably about thirteen) he went to Jerusalem to pursue his studies in the learning of the Jews. Here he became a student of Gamaliel, a distinguished teacher of the law (Acts 22:3). He grew more and more familiar with the outward observances of the law, gaining that experience of the “spirit of slavery,” which would enable him to understand himself and to teach others the blessing of the “spirit of adoption.” Paul is first introduced to us in connection with the martyrdom of Stephen and the persecution that followed, A.D. 36. “Stephen, full of grace and power, was performing great wonders and signs among the people” (6:8). The learned members of the foreign synagogues endeavored to refute his teachings by argument or by clamor. As the Cilician synagogue is mentioned among them, we can readily believe that Saul was one of the disputants. In this transaction he was, if not an assistant, something more than a mere spectator, for “the witnesses laid aside their robes at the feet of a young man named Saul” (7:58). He is described as a young man (neanias) but was probably at least thirty. After Stephen’s burial Saul continued his persecution of the church, as we are told again and again in Luke’s narrative and in Paul’s own speeches and epistles. He “began ravaging the church,” invading the sanctuaries of domestic life, “entering house after house” (8:3). Those whom he thus tore from their homes he committed to prison. And not only did men thus suffer at his hands, but women also, a fact three times repeated as a great aggravation of his cruelty (8:3). These persecuted people were even “punished ... often in all the synagogues” (26:11). Stephen was not the only one to suffer death, as we may infer from the apostle’s own confession, “I persecuted this Way to the death, binding and putting both men and women into prisons ... also when they were being put to death I cast my vote against them” (22:4; 26:10). He even endeavored to cause them “to blaspheme” (26:11). His fame as an inquisitor was notorious far and wide. Even at Damascus Ananias had heard “howmuch harm” he had done to Christ’s “saints at Jerusalem” (9:13). It was not without reason that in his later years he remembered how he had persecuted “the church of God beyond measure” (Gal. 1:13).

Saul’s Conversion. Owing to the persecution of the church the believers were scattered abroad and went everywhere preaching the word. “And Saul, still breathing threats and murder against the disciples of the Lord,” determined to follow them. “Being furiously enraged at them,” he persecuted them “even to foreign cities” (Acts 26:11; cf. 8:3; Gal. 1:13; 1 Tim. 1:13). He went to the high priest “and asked for letters from him to the synagogues at Damascus,” where he had reason to believe that Christians were to be found. While on his journey to that city his wonderful conversion took place, changing the proud and persecuting Saul into the loving, helpful Paul. We hesitate to enlarge upon the words of Scripture, referring to the narrative of Luke (Acts 9:3–9). The conflict of Saul’s feelings was so great and his remorse so piercing and deep, that during this time he neither ate nor drank. He could have had no contact with the Christians, for they had been terrified by the news of his approach; and the unconverted Jews could have no true sympathy with his present state of mind. But he called upon God, and in his blindness a vision was granted him—a vision soon to be realized—of his being restored to sight by Ananias. After his restoration he was baptized, communed with the disciples, and “immediately he began to proclaim Jesus in the synagogues, saying, ‘He is the Son of God’” (9:20), A.D. 37. Conscious of his divine mission, he never believed that it was necessary to consult those who were apostles before him, but he went into Arabia (Gal. 1:17). Of the time thus spent we learn further from himself (v. 18) that it was three years, which may mean either three full years or one year with parts of two others. We are not told to what district he retired, or for what purpose—perhaps for seclusion, meditation, and prayer. After he returned to Damascus (v. 17) the Jews took counsel to slay him, but the disciples took him by night and let him down by the wall in a basket (Acts 9:25). According to Paul (2 Cor. 11:32) it was the ethnarch under Aretas the king who watched for him, desiring to apprehend him.

First Visit to Jerusalem. Preserved from destruction at Damascus, Paul turned his steps toward Jerusalem. His motive for the journey, as he himself tells us, was “to become acquainted with Cephas [Peter]” (Gal. 1:18). He tried to join the disciples; but “they were all afraid of him, not believing that he was a disciple” (Acts 9:26). Barnabas became his sponsor to the apostles and the church, assuring them of the facts of Paul’s conversion and subsequent behavior at Damascus. Barnabas’s introduction quieted the fears of the apostles, and Paul “was with them moving about freely in Jerusalem” (v. 28). It is not strange that the former persecutor was singled out from the other believers as the object of murderous hostility. He was therefore again urged to flee, and, by way of Caesarea, he went to his native city, Tarsus. The length of his stay in Jerusalem was fifteen days (1:18), A.D. 39.

At Antioch. While Paul was at Tarsus a movement was going on at Antioch that raised that city to an importance second only to that of Jerusalem in the early history of the church. A large number believed there through the preaching of the disciples driven from Jerusalem, and when this was reported at Jerusalem, Barnabas was sent on a special mission to Antioch. Needing assistance, he went to Tarsus to seek Saul, A.D. 44. Ramsay believes (p. 46) that Paul’s stay in Tarsus was ten years. After Paul returned with Barnabas to Antioch, they labored together for “an entire year.” As new converts in vast numbers came in from the ranks of the Gentiles the church began to lose its ancient appearance of a Jewish sect and to stand as a self-existent community. They were, therefore, first at Antioch distinguished as “Christians”—they that are connected with Christos. While Barnabas and Saul were evangelizing the Syrian capital, certain prophets came down from Jerusalem to Antioch. One of them, named Agabus, announced that a time of famine was at hand (probably A.D. 46). No time was lost in preparing for the calamity. All the Antioch Christians, according to their ability, “determined to send a contribution for the relief of the brethren living in Judea. And this they did, sending it in charge of Barnabas and Saul to the elders” (Acts 11:22–30). This was the occasion of Paul’s second visit to Jerusalem. Having fulfilled their mission they returned to Antioch, bringing with them another helper, John, whose surname was Mark (12:25). “And while they were ministering to the Lord and fasting, the Holy Spirit said, ‘Set apart for Me Barnabas and Saul for the work to which I have called them.’ Then, when they had fasted and prayed and laid their hands on them, they sent them away” (13:1–3).

First Missionary Journey. The date of their departure is variously fixed between A.D. 45 and 50, probably 47–48, lasting perhaps two years.

Cyprus. Their first point of destination was the island of Cyprus, the native place of Barnabas. Reaching Salamis, they preached the word of God in the synagogues of the Jews; and John also ministered with them. From Salamis they traveled to Paphos, at the other extremity of the island, the residence of the Roman governor, Sergius Paulus, who, hearing of the arrival of Barnabas and Saul, sent for them, desiring to hear the word of God. Attached to the governor was a Jew named Bar-Jesus, or Elymas, a false prophet and magician, who, fearful of the influence of the apostles, withstood them, “seeking to turn the proconsul away from the faith.” Paul rebuked Bar-Jesus, denounced him in remarkable terms, declaring against him God’s sentence of temporary blindness. “Immediately a mist and a darkness fell upon him, and he went about seeking those who would lead him by the hand.” The proconsul, moved by the scene and persuaded by the teaching of the apostle, became a believer (13:4–12). From this point of the apostolic history Paul appears as the great figure of every event. He now entered on his work as the preacher to the Gentiles, and simultaneously his name was suddenly changed. Nothing is said to explain the change of name, although we find many conjectures among writers (see above).

Perga and Antioch. From Paphos Paul and his company set sail for Perga in Pamphylia, where they remained a short time. An event occurred there that was attended with painful feelings at the time and involved the most serious consequences: “John left them and returned to Jerusalem” (Acts 13:13). This abandonment of the expedition by John was doubtless because of a change of plan and made a deep and lasting impression upon Paul (cf. 15:38). From Perga they traveled to Antioch in Pisidia. Here, on the Sabbath, “they went into the synagogue and sat down.” Being invited to speak after the reading of “the Law and the Prophets,” Paul stood and addressed the people (13:16–41). The discourse made a deep and thrilling impression upon the audience, and the apostles were requested to repeat their message on the next Sabbath. During the week so much interest was stirred up that on the Sabbath “nearly the whole city assembled to hear the word of God.” Filled with envy because of the desire of the Gentiles to hear, the Jews “began contradicting the things spoken by Paul, and were blaspheming.” The apostles turned to the Gentiles and boldly proclaimed salvation to them. Opposition increased, and the apostles left Antioch (13:42–51) and came to Iconium.

Iconium. This city belonged at different times to Phrygia and Lycaonia. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 109) believes it was at this time in the former. Here they went first to the synagogue, and the effect of their discourses was such that great numbers, both of Jews and Greeks, believed the gospel. Persecution was raised by the unbelieving Jews, but the apostles persevered and lingered in the city for a considerable time, encouraged by the miracles that God worked through them. Learning the intention of the hostile Gentiles and their Jewish instigators to raise a riot and stone them, Paul and his company fled (13:51–14:6).

Lystra and Derbe. These cities of Lycaonia were now reached. Here their mission was attested by a miracle—the cure of a cripple. The people of the city ascribed the work to a deity and exclaimed, “The gods have become like men and have come down to us.” They identified Paul with Hermes and Barnabas with Zeus and were about to pay them divine honors. From this the apostles with difficulty dissuaded them. The people in general were disappointed at the repulse of the honors they had offered. The easy step from blind worship to rapid persecution was soon taken, at the instigation of certain Jews who came from Antioch and Iconium. Paul was stoned and dragged out of the city for dead; but as the new disciples stood around him he revived and returned into the city. He and Barnabas departed the next day for Derbe, where they gained many disciples (14:7–21).

Return. Paul revisited Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch, “strengthening the souls of the disciples, encouraging them to continue in the faith.” The apostles also ordained elders in every church for their teaching and guidance. They then passed through Pisidia and Perga (in Pamphylia) to Attalia. They embarked for Antioch in Syria, where they related the successes that had been granted to them, especially the opening of the “door of faith to the Gentiles.” And so ended the first missionary journey (14:21–27).

The Council at Jerusalem. (Acts 15; Gal. 2.) While Paul and Barnabas were abiding at Antioch, certain men came down from Judea and taught the brethren that it was necessary for the Gentile converts to be circumcised. The older converts in Antioch had all entered through the synagogue and had necessarily accepted certain prohibitions as a rule of life. But in Galatia there were many who became Christians without any connection with the synagogue. Paul does not seem to have imposed upon them any preliminary compliance; and even Peter had no scruple in associating freely with Antioch Christians in general. It appears that Peter, having come to Antioch, fellowshipped with the Gentile converts until the arrival of some Jewish brethren, when he withdrew and separated himself from them. Paul, seeing this, rebuked Peter “in the presence of all” and “opposed him to his face” (Gal. 2:11–14). Because this doctrine was vigorously opposed by the two apostles, it was determined to refer the question to the apostles and elders at Jerusalem. Paul and Barnabas themselves and certain others were selected for the mission. In Gal. 2:2 Paul says that he went up “because of a revelation.” On their way to Jerusalem they announced to the brethren in Phoenicia and Samaria the conversion of the Gentiles. Arriving at Jerusalem, Paul had private interviews with the more influential members of the Christian community (2:2). The apostles and the church in general, it appears, would have raised no difficulties; but certain believers, who had been Pharisees, thought fit to maintain the same doctrine that had caused the disturbance at Antioch. A formal decision became necessary. After considerable discussion Peter addressed the council, followed by Paul and Barnabas with a statement of facts. Then James gave his decision, which was adopted by the apostles, elders, and brethren. They wrote to the Gentiles in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia, disavowing the men who “have disturbed you with their words, unsettling your souls,” and bearing emphatic testimony to Paul and Barnabas as the “beloved” who “have risked their lives for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ.” Having been dismissed, the apostles returned to Antioch and read the epistle to the gathered multitude, who “rejoiced because of its encouragement.” The apostles continued at Antioch, preaching the word. Soon after, Paul expressed a desire to revisit the cities where he had preached and founded churches. Barnabas determined to take John Mark with them, and “there arose such a sharp disagreement that they separated from one another” (Acts 15:24–39).

Second Missionary Journey. Paul chose Silas for his companion, and the two went together through Syria and Cilicia, visiting the churches, and so came to Derbe and Lystra. At the latter place they found Timothy (which see), whom Paul desired to take with him and therefore circumcised him because of the Jews. Paul then passed through the regions of Phrygia and Galatia. Avoiding, by direction of the Spirit, Asia and Bithynia, he came with his companions by way of Mysia to Troas, on the borders of the Hellespont (Acts 15:40; 16:8).

Macedonia. Paul saw in a vision a man of Macedonia who besought him, saying, “Come over to Macedonia and help us.” The vision was understood to mean that “God had called us to preach the gospel to them.” They traveled N with the intention of entering Bithynia, but “the Spirit of Jesus did not permit them.” So they passed by Mysia without preaching there (16:6–8). It is at this point that the historian, speaking of Paul’s company (v. 10), substitutes “we” for “they.” He says nothing of himself. We can only infer that Luke, to whatever country he belonged, became a companion of Paul at Troas. The party immediately set sail from Troas, touched at Samothrace, passed on to Neapolis, and from thence journeyed to Philippi (16:9–12).

Philippi. The first convert in Macedonia was Lydia, a woman of Thyatira, who already worshiped God. She made a profession of her faith in Jesus and was baptized. So earnest was she in her invitation that Paul and his company made her house their home while at Philippi. A female slave, who brought gain to her masters by her powers of prediction when she was in the possessed state, harassed Paul and his company. Some believe that the young woman was a ventriloquist; Plutarch so understands the word and states that in his time such persons were called puthōnes (the Gk. word used in v. 16). Paul, in the name of Jesus, cast the spirit out of the girl, whereupon her masters, seeing their hope of gain was gone, dragged Paul and Silas before the magistrates. They yielded to the clamor of the multitude and ordered the apostles to be beaten and cast into prison. This cruel wrong was the occasion of the signal appearance of the God of righteousness and deliverance. The narrative tells of the earthquake, the jailer's terror, his conversion and baptism, and also of the anxiety of the rulers when they learned that those whom they had beaten and imprisoned without trial were Roman citizens (16:13–40).

Thessalonica. Leaving Philippi, Paul and Silas traveled through Amphipolis and Apollonia and stopped at Thessalonica, where there was a Jewish synagogue. For three Sabbaths Paul proclaimed Christ in the synagogue, and as a result some of the Jews, with many devout Greeks “and a number of the leading women,” joined with Paul and Silas. But the envy of the unbelieving Jews was excited, and, gathering a mob, they assaulted the house of Jason, with whom Paul and Silas were staying as guests. “And the brethren immediately sent Paul and Silas away by night” (17:1–10). How long they stayed in Thessalonica is uncertain, but the success of their work and the language of 1 Thess. 1–2 would indicate quite a length of time.

Berea. The next point reached was Berea, where the apostles found Jews more noble than those of Thessalonica had been. Accordingly they gained many converts, both Jews and Greeks. When the Thessalonian Jews heard of this they came and stirred up the people. A riot was avoided only by Paul's departure for the coast, whence he set sail for Athens, leaving Silas and Timothy behind (17:10–15). Some of “the brethren” went with Paul as far as Athens, where they left him, carrying back “a command for Silas and Timothy to come to him as soon as possible.”

Athens. Paul was left in Athens alone (1 Thess. 3:1), August A.D. 51. As he looked about him he “saw the city full of idols,” and “his spirit was being provoked within him.” According to his custom, he sought out his brethren of the scattered race of Israel, declaring to them that the Messiah had come. He also began to discourse daily in the Agora (marketplace) with them that met with him, among whom were philosophers of the Epicurean and Stoic schools. His teachings were received partly in pity, partly in contempt, and yet anyone with a novelty was welcome, for “all the Athenians and the strangers visiting there used to spend their time in nothing other than telling or hearing something new.” They therefore brought him to the Areopagus, that he might make to them a formal exposition of his doctrine. Here the apostle delivered that wonderful discourse reported in Acts 17:22–31. Beginning by complimenting them on their carefulness in religion, he, with exquisite tact and ability, exposed the folly of their superstitions and unfolded the character and claims of the living and true God. But when Paul spoke of the resurrection the patience of his audience failed; some mocked him, and others, believing they had heard enough of his subject for the time, promised him another audience. So Paul departed from among them. But some believed, among whom was Dionysius the Areopagite and a woman named Damaris (17:34). We are not informed how long Paul remained in Athens or for what cause he left.

Corinth. From Athens Paul proceeded to Corinth, where, as at Thessalonica, he chose to earn his own subsistence by working at his trade of tent-making. This brought him into an acquaintance with Aquila and Priscilla, with whom he made his home. “And he was reasoning in the synagogue every Sabbath and trying to persuade Jews and Greeks” (18:4). While he was thus engaged Silas and Timothy came from Macedonia and joined him. The first epistle to the Thessalonians was probably written at this time, drawn out from Paul by the report given him of the church in Thessalonica (1 Thess. 3:1–2). Their coming greatly encouraged him, for he acknowledged himself to have been “in weakness and in fear and in much trembling” (1 Cor. 2:3). This was doubtless that period of pressing want from which he was relieved by the arrival of “the brethren” (Silas and Timothy) from Macedonia with contributions (2 Cor. 11:9). Rejected by the Jews, he turned to the Gentiles and worshiped in the house of a proselyte named Titius Justus. Encouraged by the conversion of Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, and by a vision of the Lord, he remained in Corinth, teaching the word, a year and six months. During this period he probably wrote the second epistle to the Thessalonians. The Jews then made an unsuccessful attempt against Paul but were defeated by the calmness of Gallio, the deputy.

Return. After this long stay at Corinth he departed into Syria, taking with him Priscilla and Aquila (Acts 18:1–18). The apostle’s destination was Jerusalem, since he desired to be there on the Day of Pentecost (20:16). He journeyed by the way of Ephesus, leaving his friends Aquila and Priscilla there. This visit seems to have been a brief one, the only record of it being “And when he had landed at Caesarea, he went up and greeted the church [at Jerusalem], and went down to Antioch” (18:22). He thus completed his second missionary journey in the early summer of A.D. 54 (Conybeare and Howson) or September A.D. 53 (Lewin). Ramsay makes it early in the spring of 53, as Passover in that year fell on March 22.

Third Missionary Journey. After a considerable stay at Antioch, Paul departed and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia, “strengthening all the disciples” (Acts 18:23) and giving directions for the collection in behalf of the poor saints in Jerusalem (1 Cor. 16:1–2).

Ephesus. He then came to Ephesus (probably October A.D. 53), where he found about twelve disciples who had received the instructions of Apollos. Upon inquiry Paul found that they had received only John’s baptism and were ignorant of the advent of the Spirit and all the ministries committed to Him in this age. He thereupon explained the mission of John as a teacher of repentance to prepare men’s minds for Christ, who is the true object of faith. They believed and were baptized, having been introduced into the spiritual blessings of the new age. Entering upon his public ministry, for three months he spoke boldly in the synagogue. Being opposed he withdrew to the school of one Tyrannus, where he discoursed daily for two years. “And God was performing extraordinary miracles by the hands of Paul,” so that many from among the exorcists became converts and burned their books of magic to the value of about ten thousand dollars. At about this time (according to Conybeare and Howson) he paid a visit to Corinth and, returning to Ephesus, wrote the first epistle to the Corinthians. The religious change was becoming so great that the craftsmen who gained their living by making models of the statue of Artemis (Diana) became alarmed and raised an insurrection (see Demetrius; Gods, False: Artemis). The danger increased, and the apostle and his companion left the city (Acts 18:1–20:1), January A.D. 56.

Troas and Macedonia. On leaving Ephesus Paul went first to Troas, where he preached with great success, though much dejected by the nonarrival of Titus, who had been sent to Corinth (2 Cor. 2:12–13). The necessity of meeting Titus urging him forward, he sailed to Macedonia and, landing at Neapolis, proceeded immediately to Philippi. Here he was “comforted ... by the coming of Titus” (7:6) and was probably rejoined by Timothy (1:1). Titus was sent to Corinth with the second epistle to the Corinthians and to finish the collection he had begun there (8:6, 16–18). Hearing that Judaizing teachers had been corrupting the church of Galatia, Paul wrote the epistle to the Galatians, powerfully refuting the errors in question. Paul traveled through Macedonia, perhaps to the borders of Illyricum (Rom. 15:19), and then he carried out the intention of which he had spoken so often and arrived at Corinth, where he probably remained three months (Acts 20:2–3). Here he wrote the epistle to the Romans, about January A.D. 57. Leaving Europe, Paul now directed his course toward Jerusalem, accompanied by Luke. At Troas he restored Eutychus (which see) to life. Paul journeyed by land to Assos, where he took ship for Miletus. By invitation the elders of the church at Ephesus met him here and were bidden an affectionate farewell (20:3–38). The voyage was then resumed by the way of Cos, Rhodes, and Patara, to Tyre. Here Paul and his company remained seven days and then sailed to Ptolemais, stopping one day, and reached Caesarea. In opposition to the entreaties of Philip (the evangelist) and others, as well as the prophetic intimations of danger from Agabus, Paul determined to go on to Jerusalem, which he probably did on horseback (21:1–17), May 20, A.D. 57.

Arrest at Jerusalem. This fifth visit of Paul to Jerusalem since his conversion is the last of which we have any certain record. He was gladly received by the brethren and the following day had an interview with James and the elders, relating “one by one the things which God had done among the Gentiles through his ministry.” The charge had been brought against him that he taught “all the Jews who are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, telling them not to circumcise their children nor to walk according to the customs.” In order to dispel this impression he was asked to do publicly an act of homage to the law. They had four men who were under the Nazirite law, and Paul was requested to put himself under the vow with these and to supply the cost of their offerings. When the seven days were almost ended some Jews from Asia stirred up the people against him on the charge of bringing Greeks into the Temple to pollute it. The whole city was moved, the apostle was dragged out of the Temple, and they were about to kill him. The appearance of soldiers and centurions sent by the commander of the Roman troops stopped their blows. The commander ordered Paul to be chained and, not able to learn who he was or what he had done, sent him to “the barracks.” He obtained leave to address the people (Acts 21:40; 22:1–21) and delivered what he himself called his “defense.” At the mention of his mission to the Gentiles they shouted, “Away with such a fellow from the earth, for he should not be allowed to live!” Seeing that a tumult was imminent, the commander sent him within the barracks, ordering him to be scourged. From this outrage the apostle protected himself by mentioning his Roman citizenship. The next day he was taken before the Sanhedrin; no conclusion was arrived at. A dissension between the Sadducees and Pharisees arose. The life of the apostle was in danger, and he was removed again to the barracks. That night he was cheered by a vision, in which he was told to “take courage” for he must “witness at Rome also.” The conspiracy of forty Jews to kill him was frustrated by news brought by Paul’s sister’s son, and it was determined to send him to Caesarea to Felix, the governor of Judea (22:21–23:24).

Before Felix. In charge of a strong guard of soldiers, he was taken by night as far as Antipatris; the cavalry alone went with him to Caesarea. Felix simply asked Paul of what province he was, promising him a hearing when his accusers should come (23:23–35). Five days later the high priest Ananias and certain members of the Sanhedrin appeared, with Tertullus as their attorney. The charges made against Paul were denied by him, and Felix delayed proceedings until Lysias, the commander, should arrive, commanding that Paul should be treated with indulgence and his friends allowed to see him. After several days Felix sent for Paul, influenced probably by the desire of Drusilla, his wife, to hear him, she being a Jewess. Felix trembled under his preaching but was unrepentant, shutting his ears to conviction and neglecting his official duty, hoping that he might receive a bribe from Paul for his liberation. Not receiving this he retained Paul as a prisoner without a hearing two years, until the arrival of Festus (chap. 24), A.D. 59.

Before Festus. As soon as the new governor, Festus, came to Jerusalem, the Jews requested him to send for Paul. He replied that Paul should be kept at Caesarea, to which place he ordered his accusers to accompany him. After ten days he returned, and on the next day Paul was brought before the tribunal. When asked if he was willing to be tried at Jerusalem, the apostle, aware of his danger, replied that he stood at Caesar’s judgment seat. He then uttered the words “Caesarem appello” (“I appeal unto Caesar”), which a Roman magistrate dared not resist. Festus conferred with his council and replied, “You have appealed to Caesar, to Caesar you shall go” (25:1–12).

Before Agrippa. While waiting for an opportunity to send Paul to Rome, Festus desired to prepare an account of the trial to be sent to the emperor. This was a matter of some difficulty, as the information elicited at the trial was so vague that he hardly knew what statement to insert; and it seemed “absurd” to send a prisoner and not to signify the crime laid against him. About this time King Agrippa II, with his sister Bernice, came on a complimentary visit to the new governor. To him Festus recounted the case, confessing his own ignorance of Jewish theology, whereupon Agrippa expressed a desire to hear the prisoner. The next day Agrippa and Bernice came “amid great pomp,” with a retinue of military officers and chief men of Caesarea. Paul was brought, and, permission having been given him to speak, he pronounced one of his greatest apologies for the Christian truth. When he spoke of the resurrection Festus exclaimed, “Paul, you are out of your mind! Your great learning is driving you mad.” This Paul courteously denied, and, turning to the Jewish voluptuary, he made the appeal to him, “King Agrippa, do you believe the Prophets? I know that you do,” to which the king ironically responded, “In a short time you will persuade me to become a Christian.” The reply of Paul concluded the interview, and it was decided that he had done nothing worthy of death, and he might have been set free except for his appeal to Caesar. There was no retreat, and nothing remained but to wait for a favorable opportunity of sending the prisoner to Rome (25:13–26:32).

Voyage to Rome. At length (August A.D. 59, Ramsay; A.D. 60, Conybeare and Howson) Paul, under the care of Julius, a centurion of the Augustan cohort who had charge of a convoy of prisoners, set sail in a coasting vessel belonging to Adramyttium. The next day they touched at Sidon, “and Julius treated Paul with consideration and allowed him to go to his friends and receive care.” The next port reached was Myra, a city of Lycia, where they found a ship of Alexandria bound for Italy; and to this vessel Julius transferred his prisoners. Leaving behind the harbor of Cnidus and doubling Salmone, the headland of Crete, they beat up with difficulty under the shelter of the island as far as Fair Havens, near Lasea, which still bears its ancient name. “The ship reached Fair Havens in the latter part of September, and was detained there by a continuance of unfavorable winds until after October 5” (Ramsay, p. 322). Contrary to the warning of the apostle that it would be perilous to continue the voyage at that season of the year, it was decided not to remain. The hope was to reach Phoenix and winter there. Overtaken by the “Euraquilo,” a violent wind, they were unable to bear up and, letting the ship drive, were carried under the protecting shelter of a small island named Clauda. The storm raged with unabated fury, and the ship was drifting in the Adriatic Sea, when, on the fourteenth night after their departure from Clauda, they found themselves near land. In the morning they ran aground, and they all escaped safely to the land, which they found to be Malta (Melita, KJV; Acts 27), about November. The people of the island treated them kindly and were deeply impressed with Paul’s shaking off a viper from his hand, believing him to be a god. The company remained three months on the island, and Paul performed miracles of healing. They then departed from Malta in February on an Alexandrian ship, “which had the Twin Brothers for its figurehead,” and came, by the way of Syracuse and Rhegium, to Puteoli, in Italy. Here they found Christian brethren, with whom they remained seven days, and so went toward Rome, being met by brethren from that city at “the Market of Appius and Three Inns” (28:11–15), spring A.D. 60.

At Rome. Upon his arrival in Rome the apostle was allowed to dwell in his own rented house (under the care of a soldier) and to receive visitors (Acts 28:16, 30). After three days he invited the chief men among the Jews to come to him and explained his position. He had committed no offense against the holy nation; he came to Rome not to accuse his countrymen but was compelled to appeal to Caesar by their conduct. “For I am wearing this chain for the sake of the hope of Israel,” he concluded. They replied that they had received no letters concerning him and that none of the brethren coming from Jerusalem had spoken evil of him. They expressed also a desire to hear further concerning his religious sentiments. The day for the hearing was set. They came in large numbers, and he expounded and testified to them the kingdom of God, endeavoring to persuade them by arguments from their own Scriptures, “from morning until evening.” Some believed, and others did not, and separating, they had “a great dispute among themselves” (vv. 17–29). Paul remained in his own house under military custody. He was permitted to preach “the kingdom of God” and teach those things “concerning the Lord Jesus Christ” (v. 31). This imprisonment lasted two years (v. 30), from spring A.D. 60 to spring A.D. 62. Here closes the account as given in the book of Acts, but we gather from his epistles that during this time he wrote the letters of Philemon, Colossians, Ephesians, and Philippians.

Release and Subsequent Labors. It is the general opinion that at the end of the two years Paul was granted a trial before Nero, which resulted in his acquittal and liberation. He then probably fulfilled his intention, lately expressed (Philem. 22; Phil. 2:24), of traveling eastward through Macedonia, on to Ephesus, and from there to Colossae and Laodicea. From Asia Minor he went to Spain (disputed by many), where he remained two years. Returning to Asia Minor and Macedonia, he wrote the first epistle to Timothy; to Crete, epistle to Titus; wintered at Nicopolis; was arrested there and sent to Rome for trial. This is the scheme as given by Conybeare and Howson. Lewin (Life of St. Paul) gives the following scheme: Paul sailed for Jerusalem and went thence by Antioch and Asia Minor. He visited Colossae, Ephesus, Crete, Macedonia, and Corinth. He wintered at Nicopolis, made his traditional journey to Spain, and was probably arrested at Ephesus and taken to Rome. Ramsay says (p. 360) that “the hints contained in the Pastoral Epistles hardly furnish an outline of his travels, which must have lasted three or four years, A.D. 62–65.”

Second Imprisonment and Death. This imprisonment was evidently more severe than the first one. Now he was not only chained but treated “as a criminal” (2 Tim. 2:9). Most of his friends left him, many, perhaps, like Demas, “having loved this present world” (4:10), others from necessity; and we hear the lonely cry, “Only Luke is with me” (4:11). So perilous was it to show any public sympathy for him that no Christian ventured to stand by him in the court of justice. As the final stage of his trial approached he looked forward to death as his final sentence (4:6–8). Probably no long time elapsed after Paul’s arrival before his case came up for hearing. He seems to have successfully defended himself from the first (4:17) of the charges brought against him and to have been delivered from immediate peril and from a painful death. He was sent back to prison to wait for the second stage of the trial. He probably believed that this would not come up, or at least the final decision would not be given, until the following winter (4:21), whereas it actually took place about midsummer. We are not left to conjecture the feelings with which he awaited this consummation, for he himself expressed them in that sublime strain of triumphant hope that is familiar to the memory of every Christian and that has nerved the heart of a thousand martyrs: “I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith; in the future there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will award to me on that day” (4:7–8). The presence of Luke still consoled him, and Onesiphorus sought him out and visited him in prison, undeterred by the fear of danger or of shame (1:16). He longed, however, for the presence of Timothy, to whom he wrote the second epistle, urging him “to come before winter” (4:21). We do not know if Timothy was able to fulfill these last requests; it is doubtful whether he reached Rome in time to receive Paul’s parting commands and cheer his latest sufferings. The only intimation that seems to throw any light upon the question is the statement in the epistle to the Hebrews (13:23) that Timothy had been liberated from imprisonment in Italy. We have no record of the final stage of the apostle’s trial and know only that it ended in martyrdom, summer A.D. 68 (or 67). He died by decapitation, according to universal tradition, “weeping friends took up his corpse and carried it for burial to those subterranean labyrinths (Clement Rom. 1.5) where, through many ages of oppression, the persecuted Church found refuge for the living, and sepulchers for the dead.”

Character. Although we learn much concerning the character of Paul from his life and labors—his burning zeal, untiring industry, singleness of aim, patient suffering, and sublime courage—it is in his letters that we must study his true life, for in them we learn “what is told of Paul by Paul himself” (Gregory Nazianzen). “It is not only that we there find models of the sublimest eloquence, when he is kindled by the visions of the glories to come, the perfect triumph of good over evil, the manifestation of the sons of God, and the transformation into God’s likeness; but in his letters, besides all this which is divine, we trace every shade, even to the faintest, of his human character also. Here we see that fearless independence with which he ‘withstood Peter to the face, because he was to be blamed’ (Gal. 2:11); that impetuosity which breaks out in his apostrophe to the ‘foolish Galatians’ (3:1); that earnest indignation which bids his converts ‘beware of dogs, beware of the concision’ (Phil. 3:2), and pours itself forth in the emphatic ‘God forbid’ (Rom. 6:2; 1 Cor. 6:15), which meets every Antinomian suggestion; that fervid patriotism which makes him ‘wish that he were himself accursed from Christ for his brethren, . . . who are Israelites’ (Rom. 9:3); that generosity which looked for no other reward than ‘to preach the glad tidings of Christ without charge’ (1 Cor. 9:18, 25) and made him feel that he would rather ‘die than that any man should make this glorifying void’; that dread of officious interference which led him to shrink from ‘building on another man’s foundation’ (Rom. 15:20); that delicacy which shows itself in his appeal to Philemon, whom he might have commanded, ‘yet for love’s sake rather beseeching him’ (Philem. 9); that scrupulous fear of evil appearance which ‘would not eat any man’s bread for naught, but wrought with labor and travail night and day, that he might not be chargeable to any of them’ (1 Thess. 2:9); that refined courtesy which cannot bring itself to blame till it has first praised (cf. 1 Cor. 1:5–7; 2 Cor. 1:6–7, with the latter part of these epistles), and which makes him deem it needful almost to apologize for the freedom of giving advice to those who are not personally known to him (Rom. 15:14–15); that self-denying love which ‘will eat no flesh while the world standeth,’ lest he make his ‘brother to offend’ (1 Cor. 8:13); that impatience of exclusive formalism with which he overwhelms the Judaizers of Galatia, joined with a forbearance so gentle for the innocent weakness of scrupulous consciences (1 Cor. 8:12; Rom. 14:21); that grief for the sins of others which moved him to tears when he spoke of the enemies of the cross of Christ, ‘of whom I tell you even weeping’ (Phil. 3:18); that noble freedom from jealousy with which he speaks of those who, out of rivalry to himself, preach Christ even of envy and strife, supposing to add afflictions to his bonds, ‘What then? notwithstanding every way, whether in pretense or in truth, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice’ (1:18); that tender friendship which watches over the health of Timothy, even with a mother’s care (1 Tim. 5:23); that intense sympathy in the joys and sorrows of his converts which could say, even to the rebellious Corinthians, ‘Ye are in our hearts, to die and live with you’ (2 Cor. 7:3); that longing desire for the intercourse of affection, and that sense of loneliness when it was withheld, which perhaps is the most touching feature of all, because it approaches most nearly to a weakness” (Conybeare and Howson).

Paul’s Citizenship. It is a mistake to suppose that Paul’s citizenship, which belonged to the members of the family, came from their being natives of Tarsus. Although it was a “free city” (urbs libera), enjoying the privileges of being governed by its own magistrates, and was exempted from the occupation of a Roman garrison, its citizens did not necessarily possess the civitas of Rome. The Roman commander (Acts 21:37–39; 22:25–27) knew that Paul was a Tarsian, without being aware that he was a citizen. This privilege had been granted, or descended, to his father as an individual right perhaps for some services rendered to Caesar during the civil wars (Conybeare and Howson; Bloomfield, New Testament).

Member of the Sanhedrin. “There are strong grounds for believing that if Paul was not a member of the Sanhedrin at Stephen’s death he was elected into that powerful senate soon after; possibly as a reward for the zeal he had shown against the heretic. He himself says that in Jerusalem he not only exercised the power of imprisonment by commission from the high priest, but also, when the Christians were put to death, gave his vote against them (Acts 26:10). From this expression it is natural to infer that he was a member of that supreme court of judicature. If this inference is well founded, and the qualification for members of the Sanhedrin was that they should be the fathers of children, Saul must have been a married man, and the father of a family. If so it is probable that his wife and children did not long survive; for otherwise some notice of them would have occurred in the subsequent narrative, or some allusion to them in the epistles” (Conybeare and Howson).

Conversion. Some regard the circumstances of the case as by no means miraculous but as produced solely by certain terrific natural phenomena, which they suppose had such an effect on the high-wrought imagination, and so struck the alarmed conscience of Saul, as to make him regard as reality what was merely produced by fancy. “Paul, however ardent might be his temperament and vivid his imagination, could not so far deceive himself as to suppose that the conversation really took place if there had been no more than these commentators tell us. Besides he is so minute in his description as to say it was in the Hebrew language” (Bloomfield, New Testament). The seeming discrepancies found in the several accounts (Acts 9, 22, 26) have been differently explained. “The Greek ‘akouo,’ like our word ‘hear,’ has two distinct meanings—to perceive sound and to understand. The men who were with Saul heard the sound, but did not understand what was said to him. As to the fact that one passage represents them as ‘standing,’ the other as having ‘fallen to the earth,’ the word rendered ‘stood’ also means to be fixed, rooted to the spot. Hence the sense may be, not that they stood erect, but that they were rendered motionless, or fixed to the spot, by overpowering fear. Or, perhaps, when the light with such exceeding brilliancy burst upon them, they all ‘fell to the earth,’ but afterward rose and ‘stood’ upon their feet” (Haley, Alleged Discrepancies of the Bible).

“Saul, Who Was Also Known as Paul” (Acts 13:9). “The invariable use in the Acts of Saul at this point, and Paul afterward, and the distinct mention by St. Luke himself of the transition, is accounted for by the desire to mark the turning-point between Saul’s activity among his own countrymen and his new labors as the apostle of the Gentiles” (Smith). “We are inclined to adopt the opinion that the Cilician apostle had this Roman name, as well as his other Hebrew name, in his earlier days, and even before he was a Christian ... yet we cannot believe it accidental that the words which have led to this discussion occur at this point of the inspired narrative. The heathen name rises to the surface at the moment when St. Paul visibly enters on his office as the apostle to the heathen” (Conybeare and Howson Life and Epistles of Paul, 1:152–53).

Journeys to Jerusalem. In the book of Acts we are informed of five distinct journeys made by the apostle to Jerusalem after the time of his conversion. In the epistle to the Galatians Paul speaks of two journeys to Jerusalem—the first being “three years” after his conversion, the second “fourteen years” later (Gal. 1:18; 2:1). The question arises whether the second journey of the epistle must be identified with the second, third, or fourth of the Acts, or whether it is a separate journey, distinct from any of them. It is agreed by all that the fifth cannot possibly be intended. Paley and Schrader have resorted to the hypothesis that the Galatian visit is some supposed journey not recorded in the Acts at all. Conybeare and Howson (Life and Epistles of Paul) identify it with the third journey of Acts 15.

Vow at Cenchrea (Acts 18:18). The impression on the reader's mind is that Paul himself shaved his head at Cenchrea. Eminent commentators hold the view that the ceremony was performed by Aquila; also that the vow was not one of Nazirite but a votum civile, such as was taken during or after recovery from sickness, deliverance from any peril, or on obtaining any unexpected good. In case of a Nazirite vow the cutting of the hair, which denoted that the legal time had expired, could take place only in the Temple in Jerusalem, or at least in Judea (Conybeare and Howson; Bloomfield, New Testament).

Reply to Ananias (Acts 23:3–5). "God is going to strike you," etc. Some consider these words as an outburst of natural indignation and excuse it on the ground of the provocation, as a righteous denouncing of an unjust ruler. Others believe them a prophetic denunciation, terribly fulfilled when Ananias was murdered in the Jewish wars (Josephus Wars 2.17.9). "I was not aware, brethren, that he was high priest." These words are variously explained. "Some think that St. Paul meant to confess that he had been guilty of a want of due reflection; others that he spoke ironically, as refusing to recognize a man like Ananias as high priest; others have even thought that there was in the words an inspired reference to the abolition of the sacerdotal system of the Jews and the sole priesthood of Christ. Another class of interpreters regards St. Paul as ignorant of the fact that Ananias was high priest, or argues that Ananias was not really installed in office. And we know from Josephus that there was the greatest irregularity in the appointments about this time. Lastly, it has been suggested that the imperfection of St. Paul's vision was the cause of his mistake" (Conybeare and Howson).

Charge Against Paul Before Felix (Acts 24:5–6). Paul was accused of a threefold crime: first, with causing factious disturbances among all the Jews throughout the empire (which was an offense against the Roman government and amounted to lese majeste, or treason against the emperor); second, with being a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes (which involved heresy against the law of Moses); and third, with an attempt to profane the Temple at Jerusalem (an offense not only against Jewish but also Roman law, which protected the Jews in the exercise of their worship; Conybeare and Howson, 2:282).

Thorn in the Flesh (2 Cor. 12:7). "The best commentators are, with reason, agreed that the word skolops (thorn) must be taken in the natural sense, as denoting some very painful order or mortifying infirmity; grievous afflictions being, in all languages, expressed by metaphors taken from the piercing of the flesh by thorns or splinters. Various acute disorders have been supposed to be meant, as the headache" (Jerome, Tertullian), earache, impediment of speech (10:10), or a malady affecting the eyesight. "But it should rather seem that some chronic distemper or infirmity is meant, and probably such as was exceedingly mortifying as well as painful; otherwise the apostle would scarcely have felt such anxiety to have it removed. A most probable conjecture is that it was a paralytic and hypochondriac affection, which occasioned a distortion of countenance, and many other distressing effects, which would much tend to impair his usefulness" (Bloomfield, New Testament). Dr. Ramsay suggests (p. 94) that the malady was a species of chronic malarial fever, with its regularly recurring weakness, producing sickness and trembling.

Message. The preaching of the apostle Paul as reflected in his epistles was distinctive. The OT, as well as the gospel accounts up to the crucifixion, looked forward to the cross and primarily envisioned Israel and the blessing to the earth by means of the kingdom through Israel. The death, burial, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, together with the gift of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost in Acts 2, initiated the church period wherein the work accomplished by Christ became experientially effective in the early Christians. This experience of Christ's finished work is narrated principally in the book of Acts.

However, with the Pauline epistles we are given the theological exposition of what the finished work of Christ and the consequent giving of the Holy Spirit purchased for men. “Hidden in God” (Eph. 3:9) was the revelation given to the apostle, consisting first of the fact that the interval of time between the crucifixion and the resurrection of Christ and His return in glory was unrevealed; second, that during this era the out-calling of the ecclesia, the church, which is Christ’s Body, was to occur. The Lord prophetically announces the church in Matt. 16, but leaves unrevealed its formation, its call, its position, its relationships, its privileges, and its duties. In the Upper Room discourse in John 14–17, the Lord gives preliminary teaching concerning this future entity, principally with regard to the work of the Holy Spirit, who would come at Pentecost. With the coming of the Holy Spirit the church was formed and began its existence. However, all through the book of Acts the precise doctrine that would govern the church was unrevealed. Neither Peter nor any of the other disciples was given the revelation distinctively concerning the church.

Two periods in the life of the apostle after his conversion are passed over in silence. One is his sojourn in Arabia, from which he came forth in full possession of the gospel revelation as set forth in Galatians and Romans. In the two silent years in prison at Caesarea between his arrest in the Temple at Jerusalem and his deportation to Rome he likely received other revelation. At any rate, the doctrine, position, walk, and destiny of the church appear in his writings alone. This was given to him by divine revelation. In his epistles to seven Gentile churches (Thessalonica, Corinth, Galatia, Ephesus, Philippi, Colossae, and Rome) the “mystery which for ages has been hidden in God” (Eph. 3:9) is fully set forth. These letters give full instructions concerning the unique place of the church in this age and in the counsels and purposes of God.

The central message of the apostle is the church as one body (1 Cor. 12:13) formed by the baptizing work of the Holy Spirit. This ministry of the Holy Spirit of baptizing, which was prophetic in the gospels with John the Baptist (Matt. 3:11; Mark 1:8; Luke 3:16; Acts 1:5), became historic in Acts 2 and in the experience of the church in the book of Acts, and was given its doctrinal exposition through the revelation of Paul in the epistles.

The baptism of the Spirit, according to Paul, places one “in Christ.” This vital organic oneness of the people of this age with Christ and with one another in Him (Rom. 6:3–4; Gal. 3:27; Col. 2:8–10) forms the central core of the Pauline revelation. This “in Christ” position wrought by the giving of the Holy Spirit subsequent to the ascension of Christ makes real in the believer all that Christ purchased for him on the cross. Thus Paul becomes the expositor theologically of the finished work of Christ on the cross.

Although all centers in the new entity, the church, the mystery hid in God, and the connection of this new entity with the present age, to Paul was also committed the unfolding of the doctrines of grace that were latent in the teachings of Jesus Christ. To Paul was given the revelation concerning the precise relationship and purpose of the law to the new entity, the church. He unfolds the believer’s justification, sanctification, and glory. He is distinctively the witness to a glorified Christ, head over all things to the church, which is Christ’s Body. He thus places in his theological approach the believer in closest union with Christ, identified with Him by the Spirit’s baptizing work in death, burial, resurrection, ascension, and coming glory.

The mystery “hidden in God” according to the Pauline revelation was a divine purpose to make of Jew and Gentile a wholly new thing, the church, which is Christ’s Body, formed by the baptism of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 12:12–13) in which the earthly distinction of Jew and Gentile disappears (Eph. 2:14–16). The revelation of this mystery, which was foretold by our Lord (Matt. 16:18), was revealed to Paul. Failure to see the apostle’s distinctive revelation and to enter into his differentiation between law and grace, the church and Israel, the present age as distinguished from other ages, and the present purpose of God in distinction to His OT purpose for His yet-future kingdom purpose have caused untold confusion in the Christian world.

Paulinism and Contemporary Thought. Modern scholarship has signally failed to catch the unique revelatory emphasis of the apostle's theology. Albert Schweitzer, for example, found in apocalyptic literature (as the result of increased knowledge of first-century Judaism) the explanation of Paulinism, particularly in the idea of a close union of the saved with the Messiah (The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle [Eng. trans., 1931]). Schweitzer stressed the social implications of the phrase "in Christ." In contrast to Schweitzer, Deissmann correctly emphasizes the central importance of the term "in Christ," which he said indicated "the most intimate possible fellowship of the Christian with the living Christ" (Paul: A Study in Social and Religious History [Eng. trans., 1926]). C. A. A. Scott interpreted the thought of salvation as the explanation of Paul's theology (Christianity According to Saint Paul [1927]). R. Bultmann stressed Pauline terminology as the explanation of his theological concepts. This study is of course important, but it is hardly the answer to the explanation of Paul's theological thought. Kittel (Theologisches Wörterbuch zum N. T. [1933]) has given impetus to this stress on terms employed.

Numbers of scholars in Germany have, in this century, contended that the ancient mystery religions had a peculiar influence on the apostle. Cf. Loisy (La Naissance du Christianisme [1933]), Bousset (Kyrios Christos [1913, 1921]), Reitzenstein (Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, 3d ed. [1927]). The idea of mystery-religion influence upon the apostle Paul has not been popular outside of Germany, however. Critics like Kennedy and Schweitzer disfavored such influence (cf. Kennedy's St. Paul and the Mystery Religions [1913] and Schweitzer's Paul and His Interpreters [Eng. trans., 1912]). Critics such as W. D. Davies emphasized Paul's Judaistic background and saw a large influence of his rabbinic training in his preaching and teaching (Paul and Rabbinic Judaism [1948]).

Modern treatment of the apostle has stimulated realization of the vast theological importance of Paulinism, which extends far beyond the elementary concept of justification by faith (Karl Barth, The Epistle to the Romans [Eng. trans., 1933]). Arthur Darby Nock has written a satisfying biography of Paul (St. Paul [1938]). With regard to the Pauline epistles there is a tendency in present-day criticism to approve in many cases traditional datings and authorship.

PAULUS (paw'lus). See Sergius Paulus.

PE (פ) (pā). The seventeenth letter of the Heb. alphabet, heading the seventeenth section of Ps. 119, in which each verse of the original begins with this letter.

PEACE (Heb. shālôm, "peace, health"; Gk. eirēnē, "unity, concord"). A term used in different senses in the Scriptures. (1) Frequently with reference to outward conditions of tranquility and thus of individuals, of communities, of churches, and of nations (e.g., Num.

6:26; 1 Sam. 7:14; 1 Kings 4:24; Acts 9:31). (2) Christian unity (e.g., Eph. 4:3; 1 Thess. 5:13). (3) In its deepest application, spiritual peace through restored relations of harmony with God (e.g., Isa. 9:6–7; 26:3; Luke 2:14; John 14:27; Acts 10:36; Rom. 1:7; 5:1; Gal. 5:22; etc.). See Atonement; Faith; Pardon; Adoption; Holy Spirit.

PEACE OFFERING. See Sacrifices; Sacrificial Offerings.

PEACOCK. See Animal Kingdom.

PEARL. See Mineral Kingdom.

PECULIAR (Heb. šgūllâ; Gk. periousios). The Heb. term signifies personal property, something treasured. The NASB and NIV readings declare Israel to be the Lord's own, or treasured, possession (Ex. 19:5; Deut. 14:2; 26:18; Ps. 135:4). David speaks of giving his treasure of gold and silver "to the house of ... God" (1 Chron. 29:3). The Gk. term has the meaning of "that which is peculiarly one's own"; thus KJV "peculiar people" in Titus 2:14; 1 Pet. 2:9 is replaced in the NASB by a reference to a people for the Lord's "own possession," and in the NIV by "people that are his very own."

PED'AHHEL (ped'a-hel). A leader of the tribe of Naphtali who was charged with the task of helping to apportion the land of Canaan after the conquest (Num. 34:28).

PED'AHZUR (ped'a-zur). The father of Gamaliel, a leader of Manasseh who was responsible for numbering his tribe in preparation for the march from Sinai (Num. 1:10; 2:20; 7:54, 59; 10:23).

PEDAI'AH (ped-ī'yah).

1. The grandfather of Jehoiakim king of Judah (2 Kings 23:36).
2. The third son of Jehoiachin king of Judah and father of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:18–19).
3. The father of Joel, an officer placed by David over the half tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. 27:20).
4. A leader under Nehemiah who helped build a portion of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:25).
5. A leader of Judah who stood to the left of Ezra as the latter read the law of Moses to the people (Neh. 8:4). Perhaps the same as no. 4.
6. A Benjamite whose descendant Sallu was selected by lot to live in the city of Jerusalem under Nehemiah's governorship (Neh. 11:7).
7. A Levite whom Nehemiah appointed to be in charge of the Temple storerooms (Neh. 13:13).

PEEP (Heb. šāpap; Isa. 8:19). Better, "whisper." See Magic.

PEG (Heb. yatēd).

1. Similar to a nail and usually made of wood (Isa. 22:25; Ezek. 15:3; both "pins" in the KJV).
2. The bronze pegs driven into the ground to hold the cords of the Tabernacle court (Ex. 27:19; 35:18; 38:20, 31; all are "pins" in the KJV) or for any other purpose or material (Judg.

NASB New American Standard Bible

NIV New International Version

KJV King James Version

4:21–22; 5:26; 16:14, “pin,” KJV, NASB, NIV, although Heb. is yātēd; Ezra 9:8, “nail,” KJV, “firm place,” NIV; Ezek. 15:3, “pin,” KJV, “pegs,” NIV).

Figurative. A tent peg was used as a general designation for national rulers (Zech. 10:4, “nail,” KJV), who stand in relation to the commonwealth as a tent peg to the tent, which it holds firmly and keeps upright (Isa. 22:23, “nail,” KJV). The figure in this passage is changed, so that Eliakim, instead of being honored, is likened to a peg driven into the wall and upon which his family hung. When the nail fell, all that hung upon it (his family) shared the same fate (v. 25). A similar use of peg is found in Ezra 9:8 (“nail,” KJV), where the returned captives are spoken of as having “a peg in His holy place.”

PE'KAH (pē'ka; God “has opened” the eyes). The eighteenth king of Israel. He is introduced into Scripture history as the son of Remaliah and captain of King Pekahiah, whom he murdered and succeeded to the throne (2 Kings 15:25), c. 740 B.C. Because fifty Gileadites were with him in the conspiracy it has been conjectured that he was a native of Gilead. Under his predecessors Israel had been much weakened through the payment of enormous tribute to the Assyrians (see especially 15:20) and by internal wars and conspiracies. Pekah steadily applied himself to the restoration of its power. For this purpose he sought for the support of a foreign alliance and fixed his mind on the plunder of the sister kingdom of Judah. He must have made the treaty by which he proposed to share its spoils with Rezin, king of Damascus, when Jotham was still on the throne of Jerusalem (15:37), but its execution was long delayed, probably in consequence of that prince's righteous and vigorous administration (2 Chron. 27). When, however, his weak son Ahaz succeeded to the crown of David, the allies no longer hesitated and besieged Jerusalem. The history of the war is found in 2 Kings 16 and 2 Chron. 28. It is famous as the occasion of the great prophecies in Isa. 7–9. Pekah was despoiled of at least half of his kingdom and fell into the position of an Assyrian vassal (2 Kings 15:29), c. 733 B.C. About a year later Hoshea conspired against him and put him to death (v. 30). Of his character and reign it is recorded, “He did evil in the sight of the Lord.”

PEKAHI'AH (pēk-a-hī'a; “Jehovah has opened [the eyes],” “Jehovah has observed”). The seventeenth king of Israel, being the son and successor of Menahem. After a brief reign of scarcely two years, 742–740 B.C., a conspiracy was organized against him by Pekah, who, at the head of fifty Gileadites, attacked him in his palace, murdered him and his friends Argob and Arieh, and seized the throne (2 Kings 15:23–26). His reign was an idolatrous one, as he followed in the sinful practices of Jeroboam.

PE'KOD (pē'kod). A strong Aramaean tribe (the Puqudu) dwelling in the plain E of the Tigris near its mouth. In Ezekiel's day these people were a part of the Chaldean Empire (Jer. 50:21; Ezek. 23:23).

PELAI'AH (pel-ī'yah).

1. A son of Elioenai and descendant of King Jehoiachin through Zerubbabel, Hananiah, and Shecaniah. He lived after the Exile (1 Chron. 3:24).

2. A Levite who assisted Ezra in interpreting the law to the throngs gathered to hear it read (Neh. 8:7). He also is likely the Levite who signed the covenant presented by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:10).

PELALI'AH (pel-a-li'yah). The grandfather of Adaiah, one of the priests assigned by lot to live in Jerusalem under Nehemiah's governorship (Neh. 11:12).

PELATI'AH (pel-a-tī'yah).

1. A descendant of King Jehoiachin through Zerubbabel and Hananiah (1 Chron. 3:21).
2. A Simeonite leader who helped in the defeat of the Amalekites in the days of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:42).
3. One of the leaders of the Judean people who signed the covenant offered by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:22).
4. Son of Benaiah and one of the leaders of Judah whom Ezekiel saw in vision as responsible for Judah's apostasy just before Jerusalem's fall to the Babylonians (Ezek. 11:1, 13).

PE'LEG (pe'leg; "division"). The son of Eber and fourth in descent from Shem. His brother's name was Joktan and his son's Reu (Gen. 10:25; 11:16–19; 1 Chron. 1:25). His name is said to have been given him because "in his days the earth was divided" (Gen. 10:25; 1 Chron. 1:19). The "division" referred to is enigmatic and may point to the scattering of Noah's descendants (Gen. 11:8).

PEL'ET.

1. A descendant of Caleb son of Hezron (1 Chron. 2:47). See Caleb, no. 2.
2. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:3).

PEL'ETHITE (pel'i-thit; 2 Sam. 8:18; 15:18). The term is equivalent to courier, as one portion of the officials had to convey the king's orders to distant places (2 Chron. 30:6). Some believe the Pelethites and Cherethites (which see) to have been foreigners (Philistines, Ewald, History of Israel, 1:246; 3:143); but the evidence is meager.

PELICAN. See Animal Kingdom.

PEL'ONITE. Any citizen of Pelon, a place so far not identified (1 Chron. 11:27, 36; 27:10).

PELU'SIUM (pe-lū'si-um). A fortified city in the NE delta of Egypt and the name of the easternmost mouth of the Nile River (Ezek. 30:15–16, NIV; marg., NASB, for Sin).

PEN. See Writing.

PENCE. Replaced in the NASB by denarii. See "Denarius" in Metrology: Measures of Value, or Money.

PENI'EL (pe-ni'el; Gen. 32:30). See Penuel.

PENIN'NAH (pe-nin'na). The wife of Elkanah who, unlike Hannah, was able to bear children (1 Sam. 1:2, 4).

PENNY. See "Denarius," in Metrology: Measures of Value, or Money.

PENTATEUCH. From Gk. penta, "five," teuchos, "a tool" or "implement"; a later Gk. term applied to the five books of Moses, which in their ancient scroll form were kept in sheaths or cases for protection. The Gk. term first appears in the second century A.D. and was later employed by Origen (J. E. Steinmueller, Companion to Scripture Studies [1942], 2:7).

Contents. The Pentateuch is the first of the three divisions of the ancient Hebrew canon, called earlier the law or Torah. It catalogs the giving of those religious and civil institutions that form the basis of ancient Israel's theocratic national life. This section of the Heb. Bible, introductory to the other two sections of the Prophets and the Writings, is composed of five books: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. Moses is the traditional author. It is by no means impossible that the original five-volume arrangement was executed by Moses himself. These books, especially Genesis, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy, are natural units in themselves. We may, therefore, conclude with Edward J. Young "that the five-volume division was the work of the original author of the Law, namely, Moses"

(Introduction to the O. T. [1949], p. 48). If, however, such a five-volume division was not in effect from the beginning and the five books were originally one book, such a five-volume division was necessitated in later times for liturgical reasons to facilitate the reading of the law in the synagogue services. The explanation of this is that ancient books were in the cumbersome form of rolls or scrolls. A scroll 30 feet long would ordinarily accommodate the Heb. text of Genesis or Deuteronomy. If the length was longer than this, they became difficult to handle. The Hebrews were accustomed to employing the standard 30-foot size. It is true that the Egyptians sometimes used extremely long rolls like the Papyrus Harris, 133 feet long, and the Book of the Dead, 123 feet long. But these were definitely exceptions and antiquarian relics and not intended for everyday use. It can plainly be seen why the division of the Pentateuch would be necessitated. The five-volume division of the Pentateuch is attested by both Philo and Josephus in the first century A.D., and its existence goes back to LXX times (third century B.C.), and probably to the time of Ezra-Nehemiah.

Names. In the OT the Pentateuch is variously designated by names descriptive of its contents. It is called the “law” or “Torah” (Josh. 1:7), more fully “the book of the law of Moses” (8:31); “the book of the law” (8:34); “the book of the law of God” (24:26); “the law of Moses” (1 Kings 2:3); and “the book of the law of the Lord” (2 Chron. 17:9). The NT calls it “the book of the law” (Gal. 3:10); “the law of Moses” (Luke 2:22); “the Law of the Lord” (2:23); or simply “the Law” (Matt. 5:17; Luke 10:26).

Importance. The Pentateuch is of religious, historical, and cosmic importance.

Religious Importance. The Pentateuch is the foundation of all subsequent divine revelation. Both Christianity and Judaism rest on the inspired revelation of the Pentateuchal books. The Pentateuch describes the beginning of the cosmic universe, of man, of human sin, of human civilization, of the nations, and of God’s redemptive program in type (Gen. 3:21) and prophecy (3:15). The three primary names of Deity—Jehovah, Elohim, and Adonai—and five of the most important compound names occur in the opening book of the Pentateuch. This volume initiates the program of progressive self-revelation of God culminating in Christ. Christ is the central theme of the Pentateuch. This portion is honeycombed with the miraculous and with typical, symbolic, and prophetic elements dealing with the Person and work of the coming divine Redeemer (cf. 1 Cor. 10:11).

Historical Importance. The Pentateuch is most intimately bound up with history and archaeology. The Pentateuch is not history in the strict sense of the term, however, but a highly specialized history of redemption, or almost a philosophy of the history of redemption. It has an all-pervading purpose to include only such historical background as is essential for introducing and preparing the stage for the Redeemer. In other words, the Pentateuch is history but more than history; it is history wedded to prophecy, a Messiah-centered history combining with a Messiah-centered prophecy. To consummate the redemptive plan it initiates, it has been called the philosophy of Israel’s history (cf. Herbert C. Alleman, O. T. Commentary [1948], p. 171). In such a character, the Pentateuch catalogs the events concerning the origin of the Israelite people and their constitution as a theocratic nation. It interprets the old in the light of the nation’s relationship to Jehovah and His redemptive purpose for the world. Archaeology has shed abundant light on the Pentateuch. Babylonian cuneiform tablets illustrate the creation and particularly the Flood, yielding amazing parallels of detail. The longevity of the patriarchs is illustrated by the Sumerian king list. The Table of the Nations (Gen. 10) is shown by archaeological discoveries to be an amazing document. The patriarchal age is set in the framework of authentic history and the Egyptian sojourn, the Exodus, and the conquest are now much better understood as the result of the triumphs of scientific archaeology since 1800.

Cosmic Importance. The Pentateuchal account of the creation of the world and man stands unique in all ancient literature. All nonbiblical creation legends by their polytheistic crudity stand in striking contrast to Gen. 1:1–2:3. The unifying principle of the universe in one omnipresent and omniscient God is revealed through inspiration in the majestic Genesis account. Ancient Mesopotamian writers blindly groped after this principle. The Pentateuch is all the more striking against the background of a world grossly ignorant of the first principles of causation. The discovery of secondary causes and the explanation of the how of creation in its ongoing operation is the achievement of science. Revelation alone can sense the why of creation. The Bible alone discloses that the universe exists because God made it and has a definite redemptive purpose in it. Regarding its account of creation as outlined in Gen. 1, the “sequence of created phases” that it stipulates is “so rational that modern science cannot improve on it, given the same language and the same range of ideas in which to state its conclusions.” In fact, “modern scientific cosmogonies show such a disconcerting tendency to be short-lived that it may be seriously doubted if science has yet caught up with the Biblical story” (W. F. Albright, O. T. Commentary [1948], p. 135). In its account of the Flood, the Pentateuch is also incomparably superior to the crudities and inconsistencies of the polytheistic account preserved in the eleventh book of the Assyro-Babylonian classic The Epic of Gilgamesh. For a summary of the higher criticism of the Pentateuch and its authorship, see Gleason Archer, Survey of O. T. Introduction, rev. ed. (1974), pp. 81–119. M.F.U.

PENTECOST (pen'te-kost). See Festivals. As to the leading events of the Pentecost, namely, that which followed the death of our Lord, see Tongues, Gift of.

PENU'EL (pe-nu'el; “face of God”).

1. The name of the place at which Jacob wrestled with God (Gen. 32:24–32; “Peniel,” v. 30). The exact site is not known. It is placed not far from Succoth, E of the Jordan and N of the Jabbok. The people of Penuel seem to have treated Gideon scornfully when he pursued the Midianites across the Jordan, for which he threatened to destroy their tower (probably castle, Judg. 8:8–9, 17), which was rebuilt by Jeroboam (1 Kings 12:25).

2. A son of Hur, grandson of Judah, and father (i.e., founder) of Gedor (1 Chron. 4:4).

3. The last named of the eleven sons of Shashak, a leading man residing in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:25).

PE'OR (pē'or; “opening, cleft”).

1. A mountain in Moab, to the top of which Balak led the prophet Balaam (which see), that he might see and curse the host of Israel (Num. 23:28, where it is written, “Peor which overlooks the wasteland,” i.e., the wilderness on either side of the Dead Sea). Mt. Peor was one peak of the northern part of the mountains of Abarim by the town of Beth-peor and opposite to where Israel encamped in the steppes of Moab (Deut. 3:29; 4:46).

2. In four places (Num. 25:18, twice; 31:16; Josh. 22:17) Peor occurs as a contraction for Baal-peor (cf. Num. 25:3, 5, marg.).

3. The "Peor" referred to in Num. 25:18; 31:16 is the god Baal-peor. See Gods, False.

PERATH (pe-rath'). The Heb. word for the Euphrates (which see) and the term used in the NIV of Jer. 13:4–7 ("Parah," marg., NASB, 13:4).

PERA'ZIM (per-ā'zim). Another name (Isa. 28:21) for Baal-perazim (which see).

PERDITION, SON OF (Gk. huios tēs apoleias). The Gk. apoleia, a "perishing, destruction," is rendered "perdition" in the NASB only in John 17:12, where Jesus calls Judas Iscariot "the son of perdition" and refers to his end as the fulfillment of Scripture. The Jews frequently expressed a man's destiny by calling him "the son" of the same. Elsewhere, KJV "perdition" is rendered in the NASB and NIV by "destruction" (cf. 2 Thess. 2:3; 1 Tim. 6:9; Heb. 10:39; 2 Pet. 3:7; Rev. 17:8, 11). The best commentary on this statement is made by Peter (Acts 1:20).

PE'RES (pe'res; Aram. p̄ras, to "split up"). One of the three words of the writing on the wall interpreted by Daniel (Dan. 5:28), being the singular of the word rendered "Upharsin" (v. 25). The meaning of the verb is to "divide into pieces," to "dissolve" the kingdom.

PE'RESH. A son of Machir (Makir, NIV) and his wife Maacah of the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:16). See Machir, Makir, no. 1.

PE'REZ (pe'rez, "breach"; sometimes "Phares," or "Pharez," KJV). A twin son (with Zarah) of Judah by Tamar (his daughter-in-law; Gen. 38:29; 1 Chron. 2:4). Little is known of his personal history, although his family is often mentioned. He and his brothers were numbered among the sons of Judah (Gen. 46:12), and after the death of Er and Onan he is named as the second son (Num. 26:20). His family was numerous, as is shown in Ruth 4:12: "May your house be like the house of Perez whom Tamar bore to Judah." His descendants were notable in the time of David (1 Chron. 27:2–3) and after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:4; Neh. 11:4–6).

PE'REZ-UZ'ZAH, PE'REZ-UZZA (pe'rez-uz'a; "the breach of Uzzah," 2 Sam. 6:8; 2 Chron. 13:11). A place also called Nacon (2 Sam. 6:6) and Chidon (1 Chron. 13:9), the place where Uzzah (which see) died as a result of touching the Ark of God (2 Sam. 6:6–8). About a mile and a half or two miles from the site of Kiriath-jearim on the road to Jerusalem is a small village still called Khirbet el-Uz, or "the ruins of Uzzah." This seems to be Perez-uzzah.

PERFECTER (Gk. teleiōtēs, "completer"). Spoken of Jesus (Heb. 12:2, NASB and NIV) as one who in His own person raised faith to its perfection and so set before us the highest example of faith. The KJV renders "finisher."

PERFECTION, PERFECT. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words. The fundamental idea is that of completeness. Absolute perfection is an attribute of God alone. In the highest sense He alone is complete, or wanting nothing. His perfection is eternal and without defect. It is the ground and standard of all other perfection (see Job 36:4; 37:16; Matt. 5:48). A relative perfection is also ascribed to God's works. It is also either ascribed to men or required of them. By this is meant complete conformity to those requirements as to character and conduct that God has appointed. But this, it is constantly to be borne in mind, has reference to the gracious government of God that takes account of man's present debilitated condition (see Gen. 6:9; 17:1; Job 1:1, 8; 2:3; Matt. 5:48; Phil. 3:15; James 3:2; 1 Pet. 5:10; etc.). The term perfection as applied to man's present moral life has been a subject of much contention. The propriety of using the word as in any sense of actual description has even been denied. But fidelity to the Scriptures requires us to believe that, in some important sense, Christians may be perfect even in this life, although they still must wait for perfection in a larger sense in the life that is to come. This important sense in which the Bible presents man's present perfection relates to the believer's position in union with Christ by the Spirit's baptizing work (Rom. 6:3–4; Gal. 3:27; Col. 2:10–12; 1 Cor. 12:13). Being placed "in Christ," the Christian acquires a perfect position, because the Father sees him in the Son's perfection. As far as his actual experience is concerned, however, the Christian realizes his perfect position only in proportion as he believes in what he is "in Christ." He is what he is "in Christ" ("perfect," i.e., "complete," Col. 2:9–10), whether he reckons on it or not. The difference is that his position of perfection becomes experiential as he believes himself to be what he is "in Christ" (Rom. 6:11). For fuller discussion of this we refer to articles in this work. See Sanctification; Sin.

PERFUME. Such passages as the following: "Oil and perfume make the heart glad" (Prov. 27:9); "All Thy garments are fragrant with myrrh" (Ps. 45:8); "What is this coming up from the wilderness like columns of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense?" (Song of Sol. 3:6); "And you have journeyed to the king with oil and increased your perfumes" (Isa. 57:9), and others, give abundant and striking evidence of the use and love of perfume in the East. In hot climates the use of perfumes is a sanitary necessity. They not only mask bad smells but correct them and are wonderfully reviving to the spirits from the depression that they fall into in crowded places. There can be but little doubt, from what may be observed in the East, that the use of sweet odors in religious rites generally has originated in sanitary precautions. Being but little acquainted with soap, their chief substitutes for it were ointments and other preparations of gums, woods, etc. The Hebrews manufactured their perfumes chiefly from spices imported from Arabia, among which the following are mentioned in Scripture: Algum (2 Chron. 2:8; 9:10–11) or almug (1 Kings 10:11–12); balm (Gen. 37:25; 43:11; Jer. 8:22; 46:11; etc.); bdellium (Gen. 2:12; Num. 11:7); frankincense (Ex. 30:34; Lev. 2:1–2; 24:7; etc.); galbanum (Ex. 30:34); myrrh (30:23; Ps. 45:8; Prov. 7:17; Song of Sol. 1:13; Matt. 2:11; John 19:39; etc.); onycha (Ex. 30:34); saffron (Song of Sol. 4:14); nard (Mark 14:3; John 12:3); and stacte (Ex. 30:34). These perfumes were generally in the form of ointments (which see), incense (which see), or extracted by some process of boiling and then mixed with oil. Perfumes entered largely into the Temple service, in the two forms of incense and ointment (30:22–38). Nor were they less used in private life; not only were they applied to the person but to garments (Ps. 45:8; Song of Sol. 4:11) and to articles of furniture, such as beds (Prov. 7:17). On the arrival of a guest the same compliments were probably paid in ancient as in modern times (Dan. 2:46). When a royal personage went abroad in his litter (covered and curtained couch carried by shafts), attendants threw up "columns of smoke" about his path (Song of Sol. 3:6). The use of perfumes was omitted in times of mourning, whence the allusion in Isa. 3:24.

PER´GA (per´ga). The capital of Pamphylia, located on the river Cestrus, about seven miles from its mouth, was visited by Paul when on his first missionary journey (Acts 13:13–14). It was celebrated for the worship of Artemis (Diana), whose temple stood on a hill outside the town. (See Artemis; Gods, False.) Arif Mansel of Istanbul University conducted excavations at Perga in 1946, 1953–1957, and from 1967 to his death in 1975 on behalf of the Turkish Historical Society. Jale Inan of Istanbul University has been excavating there since 1975. The city consists of an acropolis on its N side and the major part of the city that lay at its feet on the S. The city was divided into four quarters by two colonnaded streets. Most of the city wall dates to the Hellenistic period, but a later addition on the S dates to the fourth century A.D. Outside the wall on the S stand the theater and stadium and inside the walls numerous structures, including baths, a palestra, an agora, two churches, and a fountain. H.F.V.

PER´GAMUM (per´ga-mum). A city of Mysia in Asia Minor, about three miles N of the river Bakyrtschai (the ancient Caicus) and about twenty miles from the sea. It had a vast library of 200,000 volumes, which was moved by Antony to Egypt and presented to Cleopatra. In this town was first discovered the art of making parchment, which was called pergamena. The city was greatly addicted to idolatry, and its grove, which was one of the wonders of the place, was filled with statues and altars. Antipas met martyrdom here (Rev. 2:13), and here was one of the seven churches of Asia (v. 12). The wealth of the Attalic princes had raised Pergamum to the rank of the first city in Asia as regards splendor. It was a sort of union of a pagan cathedral city, a university town, and a royal residence, embellished during a succession of years by kings who all had a passion for expenditure and ample means of gratifying it.

The acropolis of the city seems to have been well fortified as early as the fourth century B.C. Attalos I (241–197 B.C.) began to construct the magnificent buildings that were to earn the city a pristine place among ancient Greek centers. Eumenes II (197–159) erected the most magnificent structures of the acropolis. Systematic study of Pergamum began in 1878 after the German engineer Carl Human (now buried on the Pergamum acropolis) discovered the great altar of Zeus (believed by some to be Satan’s seat, Rev. 2:13), now in East Berlin. Major archaeological campaigns have been conducted there: 1878–86, 1900–1913, 1927–36, 1957–72, and 1975 to the present. Most of the structures on the acropolis have now been laid bare, as has the famous asclepion, or hospital complex, in the lower city of the Roman period. I. U. Rombock of the German Archaeological Institute has been directing restoration of the temple of Hadrian on the acropolis since 1976. H.F.V.

PERI´DA (pe-rī´da; Neh. 7:57). See Peruda.

PERISHABLE (Gk. phthartos; phthora; also apollumi, lit., “perishes”). Paul uses this word (1 Cor. 15:42, 50, 53–54, NASB and NIV) in connection with the body and in contrast with the word imperishable (Gk. aphtharsia; aphthartos) when describing the resurrection of the dead; i.e., what is perishable belongs to this life and to the unresurrected, whereas the imperishable is equated with a new life and immortality. The same thought is expressed in 9:25, where Paul speaks of receiving the imperishable rather than the perishable wreath (“crown,” KJV). Except for 1 Pet. 1:7 (Gk. apollumi), where the KJV uses perisheth, the NASB and NIV term perishable replaces KJV corruptible, or corruption.

PERIZZITES (per’i-zits; Heb. always hap-prîzzî). “The Perizzite,” one of the nations whose land was given to Israel. They are not named in Gen. 10, and their origin is not known. They first appear (13:7) as dwelling in the land together with the Canaanites in Abram’s day (34:30). In Judg. 1:4–5 they dwell in the land given to Judah, in southern Palestine, Bezek being apparently the stronghold of the Canaanites and Perizzites, though it may have been merely a rallying point. In Josh. 17:15–18 the Perizzites and Rephaim (which see) dwell in the “hill country” near Mt. Ephraim, in the land of Ephraim and West Manasseh. They appear as late as the time of Solomon, who made them, with other Canaanite tribes, tributary to Israel (1 Kings 9:20; 2 Chron. 8:7). A late echo is in 2 Esd. 1:21, where “the Canaanites, the Perezites, and the Philistines” are named as the original inhabitants of the land. The “unwalled towns” (ārê happrâzî, Deut. 3:5) and the “country villages” (kōphēr happrâzî, 1 Sam. 6:18) are translated by the LXX as referring to the Perizzites, whence it has been suggested that Perizzite may mean “a dweller in an unwalled village,” as does pārūz in the Mishna. We may compare the Arab. word meaning low ground between hills (where the unwalled villages would grow up). The LXX probably read happrâzî. W.H.; M.F.U.

PERJURY. See Oath: Sanctity.

PERSEVERANCE. A term used both in ethics and theology. In ethics it denotes the duty and privilege of a Christian to continue steadfastly in obedience and fidelity to Christ, not in order to inherit eternal life but to demonstrate love and gratitude to Christ for His great salvation (1 Cor. 15:58; Rev. 3:2). Arminian views stipulate this faithfulness to inherit eternal life, but Calvinists hold that the NT teachings testify to the safety and security of the believer as a result of his faith in Christ and his resulting position in Christ (Rom. 8:28–39; Eph. 1:1–14; 2:8–10; etc.). The Christian’s fidelity and obedience will be rewarded at the judgment seat of Christ. His salvation is not affected by lack of human faithfulness, but his rewards are. Calvinists teach that final perseverance is a result of the doctrine of unconditional election. Thus the Westminster Confession says, “This perseverance of the saints depends not upon their own free will but upon the immutability of the decree of election flowing from the free and unchangeable love of God the Father....” In other words, those who are real Christians cannot fall away or be eternally lost. Their position in Christ by the baptizing work of the Holy Spirit assures their eternal salvation. When men begin to interject human faithfulness and human works into the question of their eternal salvation, they take it off the rock of Christ’s finished work and place it upon a flimsy basis. If getting to heaven depended upon human merit or faithfulness in any degree, no human being would ever get there or claim merit for entrance. Christ will abundantly reward faithfulness in His redeemed children, but He can never accept their faithfulness as merit for salvation. Failure to distinguish between salvation and rewards has confused this subject in theological thinking and this is, accordingly, a much disputed doctrine. M.F.U.

PERSIA. A world empire that flourished from 539 to 331 B.C.

The Early History. The original native name Parsa, or Persia, was descriptive of the homeland of the Persians in the western and larger part of the Iranian plateau that extended from the Indus on the E to the Tigris on the W. Iran was another native designation of the land. This name was officially restored in 1935 by the Persian government and means “the [land] of the Aryans.” It is descriptive of the people of Aryan language who came into the highland (c. 1500 B.C.). The Amadai, or Medes, and the inhabitants of the land of Parsua W of Lake Urmia, or Persians, were the two Aryan tribes that were to come into the greatest prominence. The Medes occupied the NW portion of the territory. Their capital city was Hagmatana, later Ecbatana, modern Hamadan. Cyaxares, the Mede, was confederate with Nabopolassar in the fall of Nineveh in 612 B.C. Gradually the Persians migrated southward and settled in Anshan in a portion of country that they called Parsamash, in recollection of their old homeland of Parsua. Around 700 B.C. their leader was named Achaemenes. This name prevailed in the later Persian kings. About the middle of the seventh century B.C. the king of Parsamash was called Tiespes. He was a notable conqueror and increased the territories of the Persians E of Anshan and N of the Persian Gulf. This extended country became known as Parsa or Persian Land.

Cyrus II, The Great. The founder of the mighty Persian Empire ascended the throne of Anshan c. 559 B.C. Astyages, the Mede, was conquered by Cyrus who took Ecbatana. Henceforth Cyrus grew greater and greater with Parsa taking the lead, Media coming second, and Elam third. The supremacy of the Persians was hereafter established, although the Medes continued to be held in high esteem. Reference is made in Scripture to “Persia and Media” (Esther 1:19), as well as “the Medes and Persians” (Dan. 5:28). With lightning-like rapidity Cyrus extended his conquests, defeating Croesus of Lydia (c. 546 B.C.) and Babylon (539 B.C.), thus establishing the mighty Persian Empire. Cyrus was a remarkably humane leader (cf. Isa. 45:1–4). It was he who issued the decree restoring the Jews to their homeland (2 Chron. 36:22–23; Ezra 1:2–4). Archaeology has demonstrated that Cyrus’s concession to the exiles was not an isolated account of generosity but a general policy of a remarkably beneficent leader of winning the favor of his new subjects by showing consideration for their religious beliefs. Cyrus’s capital was Pasargadae in the land of Parsa. On his ruined palace can still be read the repeated words, “I, Cyrus the king, the Achaemenid.” Cyrus was killed in battle in 530 B.C. His body was returned to Pasargadae and buried in a tomb that is still extant. Plutarch (c. A.D. 46–120) says the inscription on the tomb ran thus: “O man, whosoever thou art and whensoever thou comest, for I know that thou wilt come, I am Cyrus and I won for the Persians their empire. Do not, therefore, begrudge me this little earth which covers my body.”

Cambyses II (530–522 B.C.) was Cyrus’s son, who conquered Egypt. Shortly after his Egyptian triumphs civil war broke out, evidently led by his brother Bardiya or Smerdis. Cambyses is believed to have suffered a self-inflicted wound as he leaped on his horse in a hurry and in an excited state to ride off to deal with the insurrection. Reportedly the chape of Cambyses’ dagger sheath came off, and he accidentally stabbed himself in the thigh and died about three weeks later somewhere in Syria. The Persian Empire almost collapsed in the confusion that followed; but Darius seems to have assassinated Bardiya, won the throne for himself, and subdued the revolts that broke out in the various provinces.

Darius I, The Great (522–486 B.C.). This powerful ruler put down the rebellion, saved the empire, and recorded his victory over his enemies on the famous Rock of Behistun, visible from the old caravan road from Ecbatana to Babylon. This pivotal monument, with its trilingual inscriptions describing Darius’s quelling of the insurrection, furnished the key to the decipherment of Akkad. cuneiform, just as the Rosetta Stone opened up the ancient language of the Nile River. Darius ruled a vast empire. The closing years of his reign saw the outbreak of the Graeco-Persian wars and the defeat of Persia at Marathon (490 B.C.), a precursor to the later defeat at Salamis (480 B.C.). The mighty empire over which Darius and his successors ruled extended from the Grecian Archipelago on the W, the Caucasus Mountains and the Caspian Sea on the N, to the Arabian and Nubian deserts on the S (cf. Esther 1:1; 10:1) and the Indus River on the E. This vast territory was nearly 3,000 miles long and 500 to 1,500 miles wide, constituting an area of some 2 million square miles. In this huge kingdom Judah was a tiny dependency practically lost in the vast stretch of empire.

Xerxes (485–465 B.C.). Xerxes followed his father Darius on the Persian throne. This king, as well as his father, was devoted to Ahura-Mazda. Xerxes is evidently the Ahasuerus of the book of Esther. Esther did not become queen until the seventh year of Xerxes' reign (478 B.C.), after his return from his defeat in Greece (480 B.C.) when Herodotus states that he paid attention to his harem (9.108). Although the queen at this time is said to have been Amestris, certainly Xerxes, from what we know of him, may well have had other wives.

Artaxerxes I Longimanus (464–423 B.C.). Artaxerxes I succeeded Xerxes. In his reign Nehemiah was cupbearer and visited Jerusalem (Neh. 2:1). The Elephantine Papyri, discovered in 1903 on the island of Elephantine at the First Cataract of Egypt, shed important light on the Artaxerxes-Nehemiah era. Ezra 7:1–8 specifies that Ezra journeyed to Jerusalem in Artaxerxes' seventh year. This was 458 B.C., if Artaxerxes I is meant. In such a case Ezra precedes Nehemiah. However, some construe Artaxerxes to be Artaxerxes II, the seventh year of whose reign would be 398 B.C. (cf. Ezra 10:6).

Later Kings. Following Artaxerxes I the splendid Persian throne was occupied by Darius II (423–404 B.C.), Artaxerxes II Mnemon (404–359 B.C.), Artaxerxes III Ochus (359–338 B.C.), Arses (338–335 B.C.), and Darius III (335–331 B.C.), when the far-flung Persian Empire fell to the conquests of Alexander the Great.

Persia and Archaeology. Persian archaeology may be said to have had its beginning in 1835, when Henry C. Rawlinson, with the British army in Iran, began to copy the famous Behistun inscription, the great trilingual inscription (Persian, Akkad., and Elamite) cut by Darius on a cliff about five hundred feet above a plain W of Ecbatana. Rawlinson himself was to decipher the Persian and Akkad. parts of this inscription.

Actual excavation began at Susa (biblical Shushan) in 1854 when the British archaeologist W. K. Loftus sank the first trial trenches there and identified it as Susa. Marcel and Jeanne Dieulafoy conducted excavations at the site (150 miles N of the head of the Persian Gulf) from 1884 to 1886. Then in 1897 the French Delegation in Persia started work at Susa under the leadership of Jacques de Morgan and continued until World War I. R. de Mequenem assumed directorship after the war, to be followed by Roman Ghirshman and since 1967 by M. Jean Perrot. One of de Morgan's greatest finds was the Code of Hammurabi, which turned up in three pieces in December 1901 and January 1902. Susa is a large site. Four gigantic mounds, covering an area of 300 acres, stand on the E bank of the Shaur River, and a smaller mound rises W of the river. For details of discovery see article Susa. Between World Wars I and II Persian archaeology was put on a more firm footing. In 1927 the Iranian Archaeological Service was established, and national activity began in the field of archaeology. André Godard, a distinguished French archaeologist, directed the service from 1931 to 1960.

Though many sites have been attacked by domestic and foreign teams, the two sites most important for the present study are Pasargadae and Persepolis. Cyrus the Great established his main capital at Pasargadae, about forty-five miles NE of the later complex at Persepolis. Pasargadae is said to have been founded on the site of Cyrus's victory over Astyages the Mede, which gave him control over the empire. The first archaeological soundings were made at Pasargadae in the first decade of the twentieth century by Ernst Herzfeld. Ali Sami, the director of the Archaeological Institute at Persepolis, began a five-year dig in 1949. David Stronach, director of the British Institute of Persian Studies in Tehran, excavated there from 1961 to 1963. At the SW edge of Pasargadae stands the tomb of Cyrus. Its stepped stone base measures about forty-five by thirty-eight feet and the tomb chamber itself about seventeen by seventeen feet and nineteen feet high. Its gabled roof stands to a height of about thirty-five feet from the ground. About a half mile to the NE of the tomb is a complex of palaces: an audience hall, a garden pavilion, a gatehouse, and a residential palace. These structures were built of black and white limestone. The residential palace consisted of a central hall with thirty stone columns on black and white square subbases. Another half mile to the NE lay the citadel area of Pasargadae.

Persepolis (thirty miles NE of Shiraz in central western Iran) was built between about 520 and 450 B.C., not so much as a political capital as a ceremonial shrine for the celebration of the Persian new year festival. Although some archaeological work was done there as early as 1878, the first definitive and major excavation at the site was carried on by the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago under the leadership of Ernst Herzfeld and Erich Schmidt (1931–39). The Iranian Archaeological Service continued work there during and after World War II. Persepolis is a great complex built at an elevation of 5,800 feet on a massive stone platform 40 feet high and covering 33 acres. Darius I constructed the platform and worked out the master plan for the structures in advance. He also built a stairway up to the platform, his private palace, and the treasury, and began the Apadana or audience hall. Xerxes completed the Apadana, a monumental gateway, his own palace, and the so-called harem. Artaxerxes I completed the Throne Hall and may have constructed a private palace. The great Apadana was 197 feet square and its roof was supported by 36 65-foot columns, 13 of which remain standing. About 6 miles N of Persepolis is Naksh-e Rostam, a rock cliff with royal tombs cut into it. These are commonly believed to be of Darius II, Artaxerxes I, Darius I, and Xerxes I. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

PER'SIS (per'sis; Gk. Persian). A Christian woman at Rome to whom Paul sent salutations (Rom. 16:12).

PERSONALITY. In theology as in metaphysics, personality is that which constitutes a person. Says Locke: “A person is a thinking, intelligent being that has reason and reflection, and can consider itself as itself, the same thinking thing in different times and places.” In other words, the distinguishing marks of personality are self-consciousness and freedom.

1. According to the Scriptures, God is a person. He is not merely an eternal substance but the one eternal free and self-conscious Being. He says “I” and teaches men to say “thou.” The Bible doctrine of God is therefore not opposed only to atheism, which denies His existence, but also to pantheism, which merges His existence in that of the universe. It is objected, as by Mansel, e.g., that personality implies limitation and therefore implies a contradiction in our thought of God, thus illustrating the limits of religious thought. This objection is ably answered by Hodge (Systematic Theology, vol. 1, chaps. 4–5), where he shows that it is founded upon an arbitrary definition of the absolute and infinite. Also Mansel himself, a Christian theist, says upon this subject: “It is our duty to think of God as personal, and it is our duty to believe that he is infinite.” Further, Hodge suggests, with respect to the objection that “without a thou there can be no I,” that according to the Scriptures and the faith of the church, there are in the unity of the Godhead three distinct Persons—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, “so that from eternity the Father can say I and the Son thou.” The personality of God as a fact apprehended by our faith is essential to religion. “We do not worship a law, however simple and fruitful it may be; we do not worship a force if it is blind, however powerful, however universal it may be; nor an ideal, however pure, if it be an abstraction. We worship only a Being who is living perfection, perfection under the highest form—Thought, Love.” See Trinity; Freedom.

2. Man is also a person. In this respect he is distinct from things and from animals. This is one of the features of his likeness to his Creator. Here is the basis of his moral obligation. See Image of God; Freedom. A.E.MCC.; M.F.U.

PERU'DA (pe-rū'da; "divided, separated"). The name of one of "Solomon's servants," whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra 2:55), before 536 B.C. In Neh. 7:57 he is called Perida.

PERVERSE, PERVERSITY. Habitually disobedient (Deut. 32:20, KJV, "froward"); deceit, falsehood (Prov. 2:12; 6:14; etc.).

PESTILENCE (Heb. deber; Gk. loimos). The Heb. term seems to have originally meant "destruction" but is regularly applied to that common oriental epidemic the plague (which see). The prophets usually connect sword, pestilence, and famine (2 Sam. 24:15). See also Disease.

PESTLE (Heb. ēlî, "lifted"). The instrument used for grinding in a mortar (Prov. 27:22) in order to separate the grain from the husk.

PE'TER (pē'ter; Gk. petros, "a rock"). Formerly Simon. Peter was the son of Jonas (John 1:42; 21:15–16) and probably a native of Bethsaida in Galilee (1:44).

Occupation. Peter and his brother Andrew were fishermen on the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 4:18; Mark 1:16) and partners of James and John (Luke 5:10). Although his occupation was a humble one, it was not incompatible with some degree of mental culture and seems to have been quite profitable.

Meets Jesus. With his brother Andrew, Peter was a disciple of John the Baptist; and when their teacher pointed out Jesus to Andrew as the Lamb of God, Andrew went to Peter and told him, "We have found the Messiah." He brought him to Jesus, who looked upon him and said, "You are Simon the son of John; you shall be called Cephas" (John 1:36–42). This interview resulted in no immediate change in Peter's external position. He returned to Capernaum and continued his usual vocation, waiting for further instruction.

Call. This was received on the Sea of Galilee, where the four partners were engaged in fishing. The people were pressing upon Jesus to hear the word, and He entered Peter's boat. At Christ's request the boat was thrust out a little from the land so He could discourse with the multitude. After this He wrought the miracle of the great haul of fish, foreshadowing the success of the apostles as fishers of men (Luke 5:1–7). Peter and Andrew immediately accepted the call and, leaving all, were soon after joined by James and John, who also received a call to follow the Master (Matt. 4:18–22; Mark 1:16–20; Luke 5:8–11), A.D. 27. Immediately after this Jesus wrought the miracle of healing on Peter's wife's mother (Matt. 8:14–15; Mark 1:29–31; Luke 4:38–40), and Peter for some time attended upon our Lord's ministry in Galilee, Decapolis, Perea, and Judea, returning at intervals to his own city. During this period he was selected as one of the witnesses of the raising of Jairus's daughter (Mark 5:22, 37; Luke 8:41, 51).

Apostle. The special designation of Peter and his eleven fellow disciples took place some time afterward, when they were set apart as the Lord's immediate attendants (Matt. 10:2–4; Mark 3:13–19; Luke 6:13–16). They appear then first to have received formally the name of apostles, and from that time Simon bore publicly, it would seem almost exclusively, the name Peter, which had up to this time been used rather as a characteristic term than as a proper name.

Walks on the Sea. On one occasion a boat, in which were a number of the disciples, was in the midst of the sea, tossed with waves. Jesus appeared walking on the sea, much to the alarm of the disciples, who said, “It is a ghost!” Hearing His words of encouragement, Peter put the Master to the test by saying, “Lord, if it is You, command me to come to You on the water.” Jesus replied, “Come!” and Peter, obeying, walked for a while on the surface of the sea. But losing his confidence because of the tempest, he began to sink, and he uttered the cry “Lord, save me!” The Master took him by the hand and accompanied him to the ship. When safe in the boat Peter fell down at His feet and declared, “You are certainly God’s Son!” (Matt. 14:25–33).

We find him asking the meaning of our Lord’s parable of the blind leading the blind (15:15).

Confession. In a conversation with His disciples as to men’s declarations concerning Himself, Jesus asked, “But who do you say that I am?” Peter promptly replied, “Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.” In His reply the Master made the declaration, so often commented upon, “You are Peter, and upon this rock I will build My church,” etc. (Matt. 16:13–19; Mark 8:27–29; Luke 9:18–20).

Rebukes Jesus. Our Lord on one occasion began to inform His disciples of His coming sufferings and death. “Peter took Him aside and began to rebuke Him, saying, ‘God forbid it, Lord!’” But Jesus turned and said to Peter, “Get behind Me, Satan!” etc. (Matt. 16:21–23; Mark 8:31–33). The Lord seems to have been calling Peter Satan. Not quite so. But He recognized Satan speaking in the words that Peter uttered.

Mount of Transfiguration. Peter, with James and John, was a witness of the Lord’s transfiguration and in the ecstasy of the hour exclaimed, “Lord, it is good for us to be here; if You wish, I will make three tabernacles here, one for You, and one for Moses, and one for Elijah” (Matt. 17:1–4; Mark 9:2–5; Luke 9:28–33).

Mention is made of Peter’s inquiry as to forgiveness (Matt. 18:21); declaration of having left all for Jesus’ sake (19:27; Mark 10:28; Luke 18:28); asking the meaning of the parable of the overturning of the Temple (Mark 13:3) and of the servant watching for his master (Luke 12:41); and calling the Master’s attention to the withered fig tree (Mark 11:21).

The Last Supper. When Jesus would keep the Passover He commissioned Peter and John to make proper preparation (Luke 22:8). All being ready for the supper, Jesus began to wash the disciples’ feet; but when He came to Peter he, in his presumptuous humility, declared, “Never shall You wash my feet!” But upon the Master’s replying, “If I do not wash you, you have no part with Me,” Peter consented, with the request that the washing might include also hands and head (John 13:3–9). When our Lord declared that one of them would betray Him, Peter beckoned to John that he should ask of whom He spoke (13:24). Still later he stoutly asserted that under no circumstances would he ever leave his Master, to which Jesus replied by saying, “Simon, Simon, behold, Satan has demanded permission to sift you like wheat,” and told him of his speedy denial (Luke 22:31–34; Matt. 26:33–35; Mark 14:29–31; John 13:36–38).

At Gethsemane. Peter and the two sons of Zebedee accompanied Jesus to Gethsemane (Matt. 26:36–37; Mark 14:32–33), and when Judas came with his company to apprehend the Lord, Peter drew his sword and cut off the right ear of Malchus, a slave of the high priest, for which he was promptly rebuked (Matt. 26:51–52; John 18:10–11).

Denial. When Jesus was apprehended, Peter, along with John, followed Him at a distance to the palace of Caiaphas and entered into his court. While he was there a slave girl said to him, “You are not also one of this man’s disciples, are you?” Peter answered, “I am not” (John 18:15–17; Matt. 26:58, 69–70; Mark 14:66–68; Luke 22:55–57). Peter’s second denial occurred on the porch, to which he had withdrawn. Another servant girl declared to those who were standing about, “This man was with Jesus of Nazareth.” Peter, with an oath, denied even an acquaintance with Jesus (Matt. 26:71–72; Mark 14:69–70; Luke 22:58, where the accuser was a man; John 18:25). His third denial was uttered after a while (Luke says an hour) and was in reply to some who charged him with being one of the disciples of Jesus, saying, “The way you talk gives you away.” Peter probably made some remark in his Galilean dialect. He cursed and swore, then declared, “I do not know the man!” The crowing of the cock and the look of our Lord awakened Peter to a sense of his guilt, “and he went out and wept bitterly” (Matt. 26:73–75; Mark 14:70–72; Luke 22:59–62; John 18:26–27).

At the Sepulcher. On the morning of the resurrection, the women, finding the stone removed from the door of the sepulcher, hastened to tell the disciples. Mary Magdalene outran the rest and told Peter and John, who immediately ran toward the spot. John arrived before Peter but did not enter the sepulcher. Peter went in and saw the linen cloths and the face cloth laid carefully away, showing that there had been no violence or pillage. John now entered and believed that his Lord had risen, but Peter departed “marveling at that which had happened” (Luke 24:10–12; John 20:1–8).

Restoration. “We are told by Luke (24:34) and by Paul that Christ appeared to him first among the apostles. It is observable, however, that on that occasion he is called by his original name, Simon, not Peter; the higher designation was not restored until he had been publicly reinstated, so to speak, by his Master. That reinstatement took place at the Sea of Galilee (John 21), an event of the very highest import. Slower than John to recognize their Lord, Peter was the first to reach him: he brought the net to land. The thrice repeated question of Christ, referring doubtless to the three protestations and denials, was thrice met by answers full of love and faith. He then received the formal commission to feed Christ’s sheep, rather as one who had forfeited his place, and could not resume it without such an authorization. Then followed the prediction of his martyrdom, in which he was to find the fulfillment of his request to be permitted to follow the Lord. With this event closes the first part of Peter’s history” (Smith, [which see]).

After the Ascension. After this Peter stands forth as the recognized leader of the apostles, although it is clear that he does not exercise or claim any authority apart from them, much less over them. It is he who points out to the disciples the necessity of filling the place of Judas and the qualifications of an apostle (Acts 1:15–22).

Pentecost. On the Day of Pentecost Peter, as the spokesman of the apostles, preached a remarkable sermon that resulted in the conversion of about three thousand people (2:14–41).

First Miracle. Peter and John went up to the Temple to pray, and as they were about to enter, a lame man, who was lying at the entrance of the gate called Beautiful, accosted them, asking alms. Peter said to him, “Look at us! ... I do not possess silver and gold, but what I do have I give to you: In the name of Jesus Christ the Nazarene—walk!” When the people ran together to Solomon’s porch, Peter preached Jesus to them. For this the apostles were imprisoned, and the next day they were brought before the Sanhedrin to answer the question, “By what power, or in what name, have you done this?” Peter replied with boldness, and they were dismissed (Acts 3:1–4:23).

Ananias and Sapphira. In this miracle of judgment Peter acted simply as an instrument, not pronouncing the sentence, but denouncing the sin, and that in the name of his fellow apostle and of the Holy Spirit (5:1–11).

In Prison. Many miracles of healing were performed by the apostles, and they were thrust into prison; “but an angel of the Lord during the night opened the gates of the prison” and commanded them to go to the Temple and preach the words of “Life.” They were brought before the high priest and rebuked for their preaching, but Peter declared it to be their purpose to “obey God rather than men,” and he charged the rulers of the people with being guilty of the murder of Jesus. Angered at his words, they sought to slay the apostles but were restrained by the wise counsel of Gamaliel (5:14–40).

In Samaria. After Philip had preached a while in Samaria, Peter and John were sent down to confirm the converts; and while there Peter rebuked Simon the sorcerer, showing him that, though professedly a believer, he was still “in the gall of bitterness and in the bondage of iniquity” (8:14–24).

Meets Paul, etc. Acts 9:26 and Gal. 1:17–18 record the first meeting of Peter and Paul about three years later. This interview was followed by other events marking Peter’s position—a general apostolic tour of visitation to the established churches (Acts 9:32), in the course of which two great miracles were wrought on Aeneas and Tabitha, and in connection with which the most signal transaction after the Day of Pentecost is recorded, the baptism of Cornelius (9:32–10:48). Peter’s conduct gave great offense to his countrymen (11:2), and it needed all his authority, corroborated by a special manifestation of the Holy Spirit, to induce his fellow apostles to recognize the propriety of this great act.

Miraculous Deliverance. A few years later (A.D. 44), Herod, having found that the murder of James pleased the Jews, arrested Peter and put him in prison. He was kept under the care of “four squads of soldiers,” who relieved one another on the watch. Two were stationed at the gate, while the other two were attached to Peter by chains. Notwithstanding these precautions, an angel delivered the apostle, who reported himself at the house of Mary, the mother of John Mark, where many of the church were gathered praying for his safety (12:2–17). His miraculous deliverance marks the close of this second great period of his ministry. The special work assigned to him was completed. From that time we have no continuous history of him. It is quite clear that he retained his rank as the chief apostle; equally so, that he neither exercised or claimed any right to control the proceedings of the others. He left Jerusalem, but it is not said where he went. Certainly not to Rome, where there are no traces of his presence before the latter part of his life. Some years later (A.D. 51) we find him in Jerusalem at the convention of apostles and elders, assembled to consider the question whether converts should be circumcised. Peter took the lead in the discussion, contending that salvation comes through grace, which is received through faith; and that all distinction between believers is thereby removed (15:7–11). His argument was enforced by James, and the question was at once and finally settled. A painful collision occurred between Peter and Paul at Antioch. Peter had eaten there with Gentiles; but when certain Jews sent by James came from Jerusalem, he, fearful of offending them (representing as they did the circumcision), withdrew from all social connection with the Gentiles. Paul, apprehensive of disastrous consequences and believing that Peter was infringing upon a great principle, said that he “opposed him to his face, because he stood condemned” (Gal. 2:11–14). This controversy did not destroy their brotherly communion, which continued to the end of Peter’s life (2 Pet. 3:15–16).

Peter was probably employed for the most part in building up and completing the organization of Christian communities in Palestine and the adjoining districts. There is, however, strong reason to believe that he visited Corinth at an early period. The name of Peter as founder or joint founder is not associated with any local churches save those of Corinth, Antioch, or Rome, by early ecclesiastical tradition. From 1 Pet. 5:13–14, it is probable that Peter either visited or resided for some time at Babylon, and that Mark was with him there when he wrote that epistle. It may be considered as a settled point that he did not visit Rome before the last year of his life. The evidence for his martyrdom there is complete, while there is a total absence of any contrary statement in the writings of the early Fathers. Clement of Rome, writing before the end of the first century, speaks of it but does not mention the place, that being, of course, well known to his readers. Ignatius, in the undoubtedly genuine epistle to the Romans (chap. 4), speaks of Peter in terms that imply a special connection with their church. In the second century Dionysius of Corinth, in the epistle to Soter, bishop of Rome (following Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 2.25), states, as a fact universally known and accounting for the intimate relations between Corinth and Rome, that Peter and Paul both taught in Italy and suffered martyrdom about the same time. In short, the churches most nearly connected with Rome and those least affected by its influence, which was as yet inconsiderable in the East, concur in the statement that Peter was a joint founder of that church and suffered death in that city. The time and manner of the apostle's martyrdom are less certain. The early writers imply, or distinctly state, that he suffered at or about the same time as Paul, and in the Neronian persecution. All agree that he was crucified. Origen says that at his own request he was crucified with his head downward.

Character. Among the leading characteristics of Peter were: "Devotion to his Master's person (John 13:37), even leading him into extravagance (13:9), and an energetic disposition, which showed itself sometimes as boldness (Matt. 14:29) and temper (John 18:10). His temperament was choleric, and he easily passed from one extreme to another (13:8-9)" (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopaedia, s.v.). "The contrast between Peter of the gospels—impulsive, unsteadfast, slow of heart to understand the mysteries of the kingdom—and the same apostle as he meets us in the Acts, firm and courageous, ready to go to prison and to death, the preacher of the faith, the interpreter of Scripture, is one of the most convincing proofs of the power of Christ's resurrection and the mighty working of the pentecostal gift" (E. H. Plumptre, Bible Educator, 4:129).

Prominence as an Apostle. By consulting Matt. 17:1; Mark 9:2; 14:33, we learn that Peter was among the most beloved of Christ's disciples. Sometimes he speaks in the name of the twelve (Matt. 19:27; Luke 12:41); sometimes he answers when questions are addressed to them all (Matt. 16:16; Mark 8:29); sometimes Jesus addresses him in place of them all (Matt. 26:40). His eminence among the apostles depended partly on the fact that he was chosen among the first, and partly on his own peculiar traits. This position became more decided after the ascension of Jesus and perhaps in consequence of the saying in John 21:15-19. The early church regarded him as the representative of the apostolic body—a very distinct theory from that which makes him their head or governor in Christ's stead. Peter held no distinct office (Primus inter pares) and certainly never claimed any powers that did not belong equally to all of his fellow apostles (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopaedia, s.v.).

The Rock. "You are Peter, and upon this rock I will build My church," etc. "The expression this rock upon which I will build my church, has received very different interpretations ... in various ages. The first is the construction given by the Church of Rome.... It affirms that the rock is Peter individually, that the commission constituted him supreme apostle, with authority, inherited from him by the bishops of Rome. Other constructions are more convincing. First, as may be shown, not Peter alone, but each apostle, was a rock and a recipient of the keys, and all were coequal in powers. Second, were the authority conveyed to Peter alone and personally, it must still be shown that this personal prerogative was among the successional attributes conferred upon him. Third, that Peter was ever bishop of Rome is without historical foundation; and the pretense of a succession from him by the Roman bishop is a fable. It is to be clearly noted that Peter was not given the keys of the church but of 'the kingdom of heaven' as a sphere of Christian profession (cf. Matt. 13). Since a key signifies power and authority (Isa. 22:22; Rev. 3:7), the book of Acts gives the infallible commentary on Peter's use of this special prerogative. It was Peter who opened the door of Christian opportunity to Israel at Pentecost (Acts 2:38-40), to the Samaritans (Acts 8:14-17), and to the Gentiles in Cornelius's abode (Acts 10:34-46). After gospel opportunity was introduced to this age to Jew (Acts 2), Samaritan (Acts 8), and Gentile (Acts 10), there was no assumption whatever by Peter of any other authority (Acts 15:7–11). The power of binding and loosing (Matt. 18:18; John 20:23) was shared with the other disciples. It is preposterous to make this refer to human destiny, as Rev. 1:18 explains.” M.F.U.

PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF. One of the general, or catholic, epistles written by the apostle Peter.

Purpose and Message. This is a letter of hope in the midst of suffering and testing. Peter was writing to “those who reside as aliens, scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia” (1:1). The keynote of the book is suffering and glory. About seven words of suffering occur in it. The sufferings of Christ are used as an example (1:11; 2:21; 4:1–2; 5:1). Suffering is to be looked for (4:12); it represents the will of God (4:19); it is to be borne patiently (2:23; 3:9); rejoicingly (4:13); others were suffering (5:9); suffering has value (1:6–7; 2:19–20; 4:14). The practical note dominates the epistle rather than the doctrinal.

Occasion and Date. The epistle is probably to be dated around A.D. 65, and the Neronian persecutions apparently furnish its background. The provinces of Asia also mistreated their Christian citizens and residents. The apostle shows acquaintance with early epistles such as James, 1 Thessalonians, Romans, Colossians, Ephesians, and Philippians. Accordingly it was most probably written after the prison epistles. Many commentators consider the “Babylon” of 5:13 to have reference to the literal Babylon of the Euphrates (see Calvin, Alford, Mayor, Moorehead). The majority of writers, however, make it a symbolic reference to Rome, but Alford thinks “we are not to find an allegoric meaning in a proper name thus simply used in the midst of simple matter-of-fact sayings” (Greek Testament, 4:129).

Authorship. The early church presented almost unanimous agreement on the Petrine authorship. No other book has stronger attestation of authenticity than 1 Peter. Second Peter 3:1 is the earliest acknowledgment of the first epistle. The book seems to be alluded to in the epistle of Barnabas and in Clement's epistle to the Corinthians. Polycarp quotes it in his epistle to the Philippians. Irenaeus is the first to quote it by name. Internal evidence likewise agrees with the external. The writer calls himself Peter (1:1). He was a witness of the sufferings of Christ (5:1). The vocabulary reminds us of the Peter of the gospels and the Acts. There is a similarity between Peter's speeches in the Acts and his words in the epistle (cf. Acts 10:34 with 1 Pet. 1:17; Acts 2:32–36, 10:40–41 with 1 Pet. 1:21; Acts 4:10–11 with 1 Pet. 2:7–8).

Outline.

- I. Salutation (1:1–2)
- II. Suffering and the certainty of future inheritance (1:3–12)
- III. Suffering and personal life (1:13–2:10)
- IV. Suffering and social and domestic life (2:11–3:12)
- V. Faith and right conduct and suffering (3:13–4:6)
- VI. Right conduct in the light of the end (4:7–19)
- VII. Suffering and right relationship between elders and the congregation (5:1–11)
- VIII. Conclusion (5:12–14)

PETER, SECOND EPISTLE OF. A second general, or catholic, epistle, written by the apostle Peter.

Subject Matter. Peter's second epistle may be viewed as a complement to his first. It deals with the second coming of Christ and the evils preceding this great event. The first epistle also speaks of the second coming but does not deal with the conditions prior to that prophetic event. Stern warning is given of coming apostasy, when monetary considerations would sway church leaders. As a result loose morality and general iniquity would abound. In chap. 1 Peter expounds certain precious promises of God's Word; in chap. 2 he inveighs against false teachers; in chap. 3 he deals with the certainty of the coming of the Lord and the prevailing skepticism of the end time.

Authorship. The writer of the epistle strongly affirms himself to be Simon Peter (1:1). The book thus represents itself to be the genuine production of the apostle Peter, who claims to have been present at the transfiguration of Christ (1:16–18) and to have been warned by our Lord of his impending death (1:14). Despite these clear claims, numerous modern critics consider the work written by a pseudonymous author in the postapostolic period. The writer is supposed to have assumed Peter's name a century or so after Peter's death. Supposed differences in style between First and Second Peter are alleged to indicate that the books were by different authors. Although there are confessedly some differences in vocabulary, it has been shown by Zahn (Introduction to the O. T., 2:289ff.) that there are some striking likenesses. One may also ask whether a forger would run the risk of detection by failing to pay more attention to the style and language of First Peter. Second Peter, however, lacks any proved evidence of forgery. The autobiographical allusions are true to fact. No new material is added. There is nothing romantic or indisputably anachronistic about the second epistle. This is in striking contrast to the apocalyptic "Gospel of Peter" and the "Apocalypse of Peter." A claim is also made that the epistle was penned at a period when the Pauline letters were made use of by heretics to promulgate their teachings (3:15–16). This reference to Paul's letters, however, does not imply that they had been already collected or even that they had already all been written. The reference may merely refer to such as Peter had come to know. It cannot be shown that Peter deals with a more advanced stage of apostasy than Paul dealt with. Against the charge of spuriousness is the apostolic tone, the Christian earnestness, the genuineness of the autobiographical allusions, and the absence of the fantastic. It ought, therefore, to be accepted as a genuine work of the apostle Peter.

Attestation. Although it is true that Peter's second epistle has less historical support of its genuineness than any other NT book, it bears points of resemblance to a number of writings during the period of A.D. 90–130. It is not mentioned in the Muratorian Fragment, nor does it occur in the Old Syriac and Old Latin versions. All this is doubtless explainable on the basis of the brevity of the epistle, its containing no striking new material, and its not being addressed to any specific person or church. According to Zahn, the epistle of Jude gives an early attestation of it, and therefore we need no other.

Occasion and Date. Antinomian Gnosticism had begun to manifest itself. The false teachings spread with its immoral tendencies. The apostle wrote to correct this evil and to forewarn of conditions at the end of the age. There is no decisive evidence that Second Peter was not written shortly after First Peter. It was penned probably in A.D. 66–67, which date would meet all requirements.

Purpose and Plan. The epistle is the second in which the apostle proposes to stir up the “sincere” minds of his readers “by way of reminder” (3:1). To this end he urges upon them growth in Christian grace (1:5–15), warns against false teachers (chap. 2), and urges believers to patient expectation of the Lord’s return (3:1–14).

Outline.

- I. Introduction (1:1–4)
- II. Exhortation to Christian growth (1:5–11)
- III. Apostolic authority (1:12–21)
- IV. The peril of apostate teachers (2:1–22)
- V. Conduct in the light of the Lord’s return (3:1–18) M.F.U.

PETHAHI’AH (peth-a-hi’a; “Jehovah opens,” i.e., the womb.)

1. A priest, head of the nineteenth division in the reign of David (1 Chron. 24:16), about 970 B.C.

2. A Levite in the time of Ezra who had married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:23). He is probably the same person mentioned in Neh. 9:5, about 445 B.C.

3. The son of Meshezabel and descendant of Zerah, who was counselor of King Artaxerxes in matters relating to the Jews (Neh. 11:24), 445 B.C.

PE’THOR (pe’thor). A town in Mesopotamia where Balaam resided (Num. 22:5; Deut. 23:4). It was probably a noted seat of Babylonian magi, because those wise men were accustomed to congregate in particular localities. Shalmaneser II of Assyria captured this place from the Hittites, who called it Pitru. Still earlier, it appears in the lists of the great Egyptian conqueror Thutmose III (fifteenth century B.C.). The town was located on the W bank of the Euphrates a few miles S of Carchemish.

PETHU’EL (pe-thū’el). The father of the prophet Joel (Joel 1:1), eighth century B.C.

PETITION. See Prayer.

PE’TRA (pe’tra). The capital of Edom and subsequently of Nabataea (which see) about fifty miles S of the Dead Sea. The name is from the Gk. word petra, “rock,” Heb. sela. The rock-cut city of Petra was a noted pagan center. It was also a notable fortress and stronghold. Many identify Petra with OT Sela. Sela is referred to in 2 Kings 14:7–10; 2 Chron. 25:11–12; Isa. 16:1; Jer. 49:16–17; Obad. 3–4. Whether or not the OT refers to Petra, the NT indirectly refers to it. Aretas IV, king of Petra (9 B.C.–A.D. 40) ruled Damascus during the days of Paul’s conversion and earliest witness and sought to apprehend the apostle there (2 Cor. 11:32–33). The site is about a mile long and a half mile wide. Its dominant natural feature is the 950-foot acropolis known as Umm el-Biyara. Its high place is an excellent example of the high places referred to and condemned in the OT. Petra is striking even in ruins. Some of its structures are rose red and others a dark red ochre shade of sandstone with bands of yellow, gray, and white. These buildings and tombs are almost all cut into the rock cliffs of the area. Among the most exciting remains are the Khazneh (often called “the Treasury,” with a facade 92 feet wide and 130 feet high); a Roman theater capable of seating 4,000, and Ed Deir (a temple with a facade 165 feet wide, 148 feet high, and a door 23 feet high). H.F.V.

PHA'RAOH (fār'o). The title of Egyptian kings. It is the Heb. form of the Egyptian title “the great house.” During the early dynasties the expression was an honorific title for the chief Egyptian ruler, but from the powerful Eighteenth Dynasty when Egypt ruled the East (c. 1550–1320 B.C.), it was in common use as the official title of the kings of Egypt. (See Jack Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past [1946], p. 88.) Of the many pharaohs (thirty dynasties in all), the following are among those alluded to in the Bible:

The Pharaoh of the Patriarchs. If one subscribes to the chronology embedded in the MT, Abraham was born in 2161 B.C. and entered Canaan in 2086 B.C. This would make the patriarchal period in Palestine coeval with the strong Middle Kingdom in Egypt under the Twelfth Dynasty (2000–1780 B.C.). Abraham visited one of the earlier kings of this dynasty, and Joseph became prime minister of one of these powerful rulers, either Amenemes (I-IV) or Senwosret (I-III). Many scholars, however, make the pharaoh of Joseph one of the Hyksos kings (Dynasties XV-XVII) resident at Avaris-Tanis (c. 1720–1550 B.C.). This, however, is contrary to the Masoretic chronology.

The Pharaoh of the Oppression. If the early date of the Exodus (c. 1441 B.C.) is subscribed to, Thutmose III (c. 1482–1450 B.C.) furnishes an ideal figure for the pharaoh of the oppression. According to the Bible, Moses waited for the death of the great oppressor before returning to Egypt from his refuge in Midian (Ex. 2:23). However, late-date theorists commonly identify Seti I (c. 1319–1301 B.C.) as the pharaoh of the oppression, disregarding the Masoretic chronology.

The Pharaoh of the Exodus. Amenhotep II (c. 1450–1425 B.C.), son of the famous empire-builder Thutmose III, likely was the pharaoh of the Exodus. There are no references, of course, in the contemporary records of this pharaoh to such national disasters as the ten plagues or the destruction of the Egyptian army in the Red (Reed) Sea, much less to the escape of the Hebrews. This is not amazing, however, as Egyptians were loathe to catalog their disasters. If Amenhotep II was the pharaoh of the Exodus, his eldest son was slain in the tenth plague (Ex. 12:29). It seems clear that Thutmose IV (c. 1425–1412 B.C.) was not Amenhotep II's eldest son. He could, therefore, have fitted into the historical situation. Many scholars make Rameses II (c. 1301–1234 B.C.) the pharaoh of the Exodus. This, however, is not proved.

KJV King James Version

MT Masoretic Text

The Father-in-Law of King Solomon (c. 960–922 B.C.). Solomon married this Egyptian ruler's daughter. He was a firm ally of the Hebrew monarch (1 Kings 3:1; 7:8).

Pharaoh Shishak, a member of the Twenty-second or Libyan Dynasty, who appears on the Egyptian monuments as Sheshonk I and overran Judah and Jerusalem during the reign of Solomon's successor, Rehoboam (1 Kings 14:25) of Judah (c. 926 B.C.). Late in the reign of Solomon, Jeroboam, who was subsequently to become king of Israel, took refuge in the court of Shishak (11:40; 2 Chron. 10:2).

Zerah the Ethiopian, evidently Osorkon I, Shishak's successor. This pharaoh was defeated in southern Palestine in Asa's reign (c. 910–869 B.C.; cf. 2 Chron. 14:9–15; 16:8).

So (c. 732–724 B.C.), whom Hoshea, king of Israel, tried to align against Assyria. He was possibly a powerful general or tartan of Egypt rather than a pharaoh (2 Kings 17:4).

Tirhakah of the Twenty-fifth Dynasty. He conducted a military campaign against Sennacherib of Assyria (2 Kings 19:9). His name on the Egyptian monuments is rendered Taharka.

Neco of the Twenty-sixth Dynasty, who killed Josiah of Judah at Megiddo (2 Kings 23:29–30). Neco was conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, who built the Chaldean Empire on defeated Egypt.

Hophra. Called also Apries (c. 588–569 B.C.), he ruled during the ministry of Jeremiah, who, with others, fled to Egypt. The prophet foretold that this pharaoh would be defeated by his enemies (Jer. 44:30). The Bible refers to other unnamed pharaohs (1 Kings 11:14–22; 2 Kings 18:21). See Egypt. M.F.U.

PHAR´ISEES (far´i-sēz; Gk. from Aram. prīshā, “separated”).

Name. The name Separatists is thought by some to have been derived from that separation that took place in the time of Zerubbabel and then again in the time of Ezra, when Israel separated from the pagans dwelling in the land and from their uncleanness (Ezra 6:21; 9:1; 10:11; Neh. 9:2; 10:29). But this is correctly objected to on the ground that their name must have come to the Pharisees in consequence of their stricter view of the notion of uncleanness, not only from the uncleanness of the heathen but from that with which they believed the great portion of Israel to have been affected. This seems to have been the sense in which they were called the separated or the separating, and they might have been so called from either praise or blame. It is not probable that they took the name themselves, but that their adversaries called them “the separatists.” They called themselves Hāberîm (Aram. hābar, “associate”), this term being in the language of the Mishna and of ancient rabbinical literature in general exactly identical with Perushim; a Haber in them meaning one who associates himself with the law in order to observe it strictly in opposition to the encroachments of Hellenism.

Origin. The priests and scribes determined the inner development of Israel after the captivity. Virtually identical in Ezra's time, they became more and more separated, until, in the Maccabean period, two parties sharply contrasted with each other were developed from them. The Sadducean party came from the ranks of the priests, the party of the Pharisees from the scribes. The characteristic feature of the Pharisees arises from their legal tendency, that of the Sadducees from their social position. When once the accurate observance of the ceremonial law was regarded as the true essence of religious conduct, Pharisaism already existed, but not as a distinct sect or party. It appears that during the Greek period, the chief priests and rulers of the people took up an increasingly low attitude toward the law; the Pharisees united themselves more closely into an association that made a duty of the law's punctilious observance. They appear in the time of John Hyrcanus under the name of "Pharisees," no longer indeed on the side of the Maccabees but in hostile opposition to them. The reason for this was that the Maccabaeans' chief object was no longer the carrying out of the law but the maintenance and extension of their political power. The stress laid upon religious interests by the Pharisees had won the bulk of the nation to their side, and Queen Alexandra, for the sake of peace with her people, abandoned the power to the Pharisees. Their victory was now complete; the whole conduct of internal affairs was in their hands. All the decrees of the Pharisees done away with by Hyrcanus were reintroduced, and they completely ruled the public life of the nation. This continued in all essentials even during subsequent ages. Amid all the changes of government under Romans and Herodians the Pharisees maintained their spiritual authority. Consistency with principle was on their side, and this consistency procured them the spiritual supremacy. Although the Sadducean high priests were at the head of the Sanhedrin, the decisive influence upon public affairs was in the hands of the Pharisees. "They had the bulk of the nation as their ally, and women especially were in their hands. They had the greatest influence upon the congregations, so that all acts of public worship, prayers, and sacrifices were performed according to their injunctions. Their sway over the masses was so absolute that they could obtain a hearing even when they said anything against the king or the high priest, consequently they were the most capable of counteracting the design of the kings. Hence, too, the Sadducees, in their official acts, adhered to the demands of the Pharisees, because otherwise the multitude would not have tolerated them" (Schürer, History of the Jewish People in the Time of Christ, div. 2, 2:28).

Teachings. Pharisaism thus represented the effect of Hellenism on normative Judaism; many of the differences between it and Sadduceeism were the result of their respective reactions toward Greek culture (cf. W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity [1941], pp. 272–73).

Immortality. The Pharisees taught "that every soul is imperishable, but that only those of the righteous pass into another body, while those of the wicked are, on the contrary, punished with eternal torment" (Josephus Wars 2.8.14); or "they hold the belief that an immortal strength belongs to souls, and that there are beneath the earth punishments and rewards for those who in life devoted themselves to virtue or vileness, and that eternal imprisonment is appointed for the latter, but the possibility of returning to life for the former" (Josephus Ant. 18.1.3). The above is merely the Jewish doctrine of retribution and resurrection (Dan. 12:2), testified to by all subsequent Jewish literature, and also by the NT, as the common possession of genuine Judaism.

Angels. The Pharisees also taught the existence of angels and spirits, whereas the Sadducees denied them (Acts 23:8); in this respect they also represented the general standpoint of later Judaism.

Providence, Human Freedom. The Pharisees "make everything depend on fate and on God, and teach that the doing of good is indeed chiefly the affair of man, but that fate also cooperates in every transaction" (Josephus Wars 2.8.14). "They assert that everything is accomplished by faith. They do not, however, deprive the human will of spontaneity, it having pleased God that there should be a mixture, and that to the will of fate should be added the human will with its virtue or baseness" (Josephus Ant. 18.1.3). "If we strip off its Greek form, from what Josephus says, it is nothing more than this, that according to the Pharisees everything that happens takes place through God's providence, and that consequently in human actions also, whether good or bad, a cooperation of God is to be admitted. And this is a genuine OT view" (Schürer, div. 2, 2:15).

Political. “In politics the standpoint of the Pharisees was the genuinely Jewish one of looking at political questions not from a political, but from a religious point of view. The Pharisees were by no means a ‘political’ party, at least not directly. Their aim, viz., the strict carrying out of the law, was not political, but religious. So far as no obstruction was cast in the way of this, they could be content with any government. It was only when the secular power prevented the practice of the law in that strict manner which the Pharisees demanded, that they gathered together to oppose it, and then really became in a certain sense a political party, opposing even external resistance to external force. To politics as such they were always comparatively indifferent.” We must consider the Pharisee as acting under two different religious views: (1) The idea of the Divine Providence might be made the starting point. From this concept resulted the thought that the sway of the heathen over Israel was the will of God. Hence, this chastisement of God must be willingly submitted to; a heathen and, moreover, a harsh government must be willingly borne, if only the observance of the law was not thereby prevented. (2) Israel’s election might be placed in the foreground. Then the rule of the heathen over the people of God would appear as an abnormality whose abolition was by all means to be striven for. Israel must acknowledge no other king than God alone and the ruler of the house of David, whom He anointed. The supremacy of the heathen was illegal and presumptuous. From this standpoint it was questionable, not merely whether obedience and payment of tribute to a heathen power was a duty, but whether it was lawful (Matt. 22:17–21; Mark 12:14–17; Luke 20:22–25).

Practices. As an Israelite avoided as far as possible all contact with a pagan, lest he should thereby be defiled, so did the Pharisee avoid as far as possible contact with the non-Pharisee, because the latter was to him included in the notion of the unclean Amhaarez (i.e., Israelites other than Pharisees). When, then, the gospels relate that the Pharisees found fault with the free interaction of Jesus with “tax-gatherers and sinners,” and with His entering into their houses (Mark 2:14–17; Matt. 9:9–13; Luke 5:27–32), that criticism agrees exactly with the standpoint here described. The Pharisees, according to the Talmud, were of seven kinds: (1) the Shechemite Pharisee, who simply kept the law for what he could profit thereby, as Shechem submitted to circumcision to obtain Dinah (Gen. 34:19); (2) the Humbling Pharisee, who to appear humble always hung down his head; (3) the Bleeding Pharisee, who in order not to see a woman walked with his eyes closed, and thus often met with wounds; (4) the Mortar Pharisee, who wore a mortar-shaped cap to cover his eyes that he might not see any impurities or indecencies; (5) the What-am-I-yet-to-do Pharisee, who, not knowing much about the law, as soon as he had done one thing, asked, “What is my duty now? and I will do it” (cf. Mark 10:17–22); (6) the Pharisee from Fear, who kept the law because he was afraid of future judgment; (7) the Pharisee from Love, who obeyed the Lord because he loved Him with all his heart (Delitzsch, Jesus und Hillel).

Pharisaism and Christianity Compared. (1) In relation to the OT dispensation it was the Savior’s great effort to unfold the principles that had lain at the bottom of that dispensation and carry them out to their legitimate conclusions, to fulfill the law (Matt. 5:17), to “fulfill,” not to confirm, as too many suppose it to mean. The Pharisee taught such a servile adherence to the letter of the law that its remarkable character, as a pointing forward to something higher than its letter, was completely overlooked, and its moral precepts, intended to elevate men, were made rather the instruments of contracting and debasing their ideas of morality. Thus, strictly adhering to the letter, “You shall not commit murder,” they regarded anger and all hasty passion as legitimate (5:21–22). (2) Whereas it was the aim of Jesus to call men to the law of God itself as the supreme guide of life, the Pharisees multiplied minute precepts and distinctions to such an extent, upon the pretense of maintaining it intact, that the whole life of Israel was hemmed in and burdened on every side by instructions so numerous and trifling that the law was almost, if not wholly, lost sight of (see Matt. 12:1–13; 23:23–30; Mark 3:1–6; 7:1–13; Luke 13:10–17; 18:9–14). (3) It was a leading aim of the Redeemer to teach men that true piety consisted not in forms, but in substance; not in outward observances, but in an inward spirit; not in small details, but in great rules of life. The whole system of Pharisaic piety led to exactly opposite conclusions. Under its influence “the weightier provisions of the law: justice and mercy and faithfulness” (Matt. 23:23; Luke 11:42) were undervalued and neglected; the idea of religion as that which should have its seat in the heart disappeared (11:38–42); the most sacred obligations were evaded (Mark 7:11–13); vain and trifling questions took the place of serious inquiry into the great principles of duty (Matt. 19:3; etc.); and even the most solemn truths were handled as mere matters of curious speculation or means to entrap an adversary (22:35–36; Luke 17:20). (4) The lowliness of piety was, according to the teaching of Jesus, an inseparable concomitant of its reality, but the Pharisees sought mainly to attract attention and excite the admiration of men (Matt. 6:2–4, 16–18; 23:5–7; Luke 14:7–11; 18:11–14). (5) Christ inculcated compassion for the degraded, helpfulness to the friendless; liberality to the poor, holiness of heart, universal love, and a mind open to the truth. The Pharisees regarded the degraded classes of society as classes to be shunned, not to be won over to the right (Luke 7:39; 15:2; 18:11), and pushed from them such as the Savior would have gathered within His fold (John 7:47–48). They made a prey of the friendless (Matt. 23:14); with all their pretense to piety they were in reality avaricious, sensual, and dissolute (Matt. 23:25–28; John 8:7), and devoted their energies to making converts to their own narrow views (Matt. 23:15). The exclusiveness of Pharisaism certainly justifies its being called a sect (Gk. hairesis, Acts 15:5; 26:5). Their number, which was comparatively small, was about six thousand.

PHA´ROSH (fa´rosh; Ezra 8:3, KJV). See Parosh.

PHAR´PAR (far´par; “swift,” cf. Arab. farbar, “haste”). One of the two rivers of Damascus mentioned by Naaman: “Are not Abanah and Pharpar, the rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?” (2 Kings 5:12), the same as the “Awaj,” a little S of Damascus. Its total length is forty miles, and it is but one-fourth the volume of the Barada, or Abana. It flows through the Wadi el-Ajam, “the valley of the Persians.”

PHAR´ZITE (far´zīt). See Perez.

PHASE´AH (fa-se´a). See Paseah.

PHE´BE (fē´bē). See Phoebe.

PHE´NICE (fe´nis). See Phoenicia (Acts 11:19; 15:3) and Phoenix (Acts 27:12).

PHENIC´IA (fe-nish´i-a). See Phoenicia.

PHI-BE´SETH (fi-be´seth). See Pi-beseth.

PHI´COL (fi´kol). Commander of the army of Abimelech, the Philistine king of Gerar (Gen. 21:22, 32; 26:26), about 1980 B.C.

PHILADEL´PHIA (fil-a-del´fi-a; “brotherly love”). A city in Lydia of Asia Minor, containing one of “the seven churches that are in Asia” (Rev. 1:4, 11; 3:7). It was built by Attalus II Philadelphus, whose name it bore. It was situated on the lower slopes of the Tmolus, about twenty-eight miles SW of Sardis and 100 miles W of Smyrna (Izmir). Its elevation is 952 feet above the sea. A Roman town until A.D. 1379, it fell, after persistent resistance, into the hands of the Turks. It has been several times almost destroyed by earthquakes. Its name now is Alasehir, "City of God." Today all that one can see there dating to the Christian history of the city are a section of Byzantine wall and a couple of brick pillars of the Church of St. John dating to the eleventh century. The town is an unimportant place of fifteen to twenty thousand people. H.F.V.

PHILEMON (fī-lē'mon; "affectionate"). A member of the church of Colossae, who owed his conversion to the apostle Paul, for such is the interpretation generally assigned to the words "You owe to me even your own self as well" (Philem. 19). To him Paul addressed his epistle in behalf of Onesimus. His character, as given in that letter, was one of great nobility. The apostle commends his faith and love, his benevolence and hospitality, and his docile, sympathizing, and forgiving spirit. His house at Colossae was shown in the time of Theodoret. Tradition represents him as bishop of that city and as having suffered martyrdom.

PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO. A brief epistle of Paul to Philemon, a Christian slave owner, whose slave Onesimus had run away from him.

Object. Onesimus had fled to Rome, and he seems to have defrauded his master (v. 18). At Rome he was converted under the ministry of Paul and was induced by the great apostle to return to his master. The exquisite epistle to Philemon recommends the converted runaway slave to Philemon's favorable reception. Paul urges that the new convert be no longer considered a mere servant but also a brother in Christ. Paul also requests Philemon to prepare him a lodging, as he expects to visit Colossae shortly. Philemon is also addressed to a certain "Apphia," perhaps Philemon's wife, and to "Archippus," a minister in the Colossian church (cf. Col. 4:17).

Place of Writing. Philemon is closely connected with Colossians. Onesimus carried both epistles. However, Tychicus is joined with Onesimus in the epistle to the Colossians (4:9). Paul and Timothy stand in the greetings of Paul. Paul is named as a prisoner in both (Philem. 9; Col. 4:18); and in both Archippus is addressed (Philem. 2; Col. 4:17). It seems evident, therefore, that both epistles were written in about the same time and place—at Rome during Paul's first imprisonment, A.D. 61 or 62.

Authenticity. Origen cites the epistle as a Pauline letter addressed to Philemon concerning Onesimus. Tertullian refers to the brevity of this epistle as the "sole cause of its escaping the falsifying hands of Marcion" (Against Marcion 5.21). Eusebius refers to it as one of the "universally acknowledged Epistles of the canon" (Ecclesiastical History 3.25). Jerome and Ignatius also allude to it. It is quoted infrequently by the Fathers, evidently because of its brevity. Its coincidences with the Colossian epistle attest to its authenticity.

Its Style. This short epistle is a masterpiece of Christian tactfulness and politeness. In fact, it has been called "the polite epistle." Its politeness, however, has no trace of insincerity, often found in the urbanity of the world. As Luther noted, the epistle exhibits "a right noble, lovely example of Christian love." Verses 17 and 18 of the epistle present a forceful illustration of imputation: "Accept him as you would me," that is, reckon to him my merit; "if he has wronged you in any way, or owes you anything, charge that to my account," that is, reckon to me his demerit.

PHILETUS (fī-lē'tus; "beloved"). An apostate Christian named in connection with Hymenaeus (2 Tim. 2:17) as holding false views regarding the resurrection. The apostle does not state their opinions, concerning which there have been many dissertations. Dean Ellicott (Com., ad loc.) says: "The false asceticism which is so often tacitly alluded to and condemned in these epistles led very probably to an undue contempt for the body, to false views of the nature of death, and thence to equally false views of the resurrection. Death and resurrection were terms which had with these false teachers only a spiritual meaning and application; they allegorized the doctrine, and turned all into figure and metaphor." The names of Philetus and Hymenaeus occur separately among those of Caesar's household whose relics have been found in the Columbaria at Rome.

PHILIP (fil'ip; Gk. Philippos, "lover of horses"). The name of two Herodian rulers, Herod Philip I (or Philip I; Matt. 14:3) and Herod Philip II ("the tetrarch"; Luke 3:1; see discussion at Herod: Herod Philip II) and of an apostle and an evangelist.

1. Philip the Apostle. This Philip was of the city of Bethsaida, in Galilee (John 1:44; 12:21), but of his family we have no information. Little is recorded of Philip in the Scriptures.

He had probably gone with Andrew and Peter to hear the preaching of John the Baptist. They had, without doubt, spoken to him of Jesus as the long-expected Savior, for on the next day after Andrew brought his brother Simon to Jesus, Philip unhesitatingly complied with the Master's request to follow Him (1:41–43). He was thus the fourth of the apostles who attached themselves to Jesus.

The first act of Philip was to invite Nathanael to "come and see" Jesus, saying, "We have found Him of whom Moses in the Law and also the Prophets wrote, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph" (1:45–47). His ready acceptance of Jesus, and what he said to Nathanael, seem to imply much acquaintance with the Word.

When the twelve were specially set apart for their office, Philip was numbered among them (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14).

When Jesus was about to feed the 5,000 He asked Philip, "Where are we to buy bread, that these may eat?" And it is added, "And this He was saying to test him" (John 6:5–7). Bengel and others suppose that this was because the duty of providing food had been committed to Philip, whereas Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia rather suppose it was because this apostle was weak in faith. The answer of Philip agrees well enough with either supposition. Certain Greeks, desiring to see Jesus, made application to Philip for an introduction. Philip, uncertain at first whether to comply with their request or not, consulted with Andrew, who went with him and mentioned the circumstance to Jesus (12:21–22). Scripture adds only the remark of Philip, "Lord, show us the Father, and it is enough for us" (14:8), and refers to his presence at Jerusalem with the church after the ascension (Acts 1:13). The later traditions concerning this apostle are vague and uncertain; but there is nothing improbable in the statement that he preached the gospel in Phrygia and that he met his death at Hieropolis in Syria.

2. Philip the Evangelist. Of his family nothing is known. We first hear of this Philip in his appointment as one of the seven deacons, his name following Stephen in the list (Acts 6:5). They were appointed to superintend the daily ministrations of food and alms and so to remove all suspicion of partiality. The persecution that followed the death of Stephen stopped the daily ministrations of the church. The teachers who had been most prominent were compelled to take flight, and Philip was among them.

Philip found his way to the city of Samaria, where Simon Magus practiced sorcery. The latter was held in great reverence because of the wonders he wrought. Philip performed many substantial miracles and thus drew away from the sorcerer the attention of the people, who listened gladly to the gospel. Simon himself seems to have regarded Philip as in league with some superhuman being and looked upon baptism as the initiatory rite through which he might obtain the same powers; he solicited and obtained baptism from the evangelist (8:5–13).

After Peter and John had come to Samaria to complete the work begun by Philip, he was directed by the angel of the Lord to proceed to Gaza. On the way he met a court official of Candace, queen of Ethiopia, who had come to Jerusalem to worship. The eunuch was reading Isa. 53 when Philip drew near to his chariot and asked him if he understood that which he read. Upon invitation Philip took a seat and expounded the Scripture, preaching Jesus, the result of which was the conversion and baptism of the eunuch. Upon the return from the water in which the baptism occurred “the Spirit of the Lord snatched Philip away; and the eunuch saw him no more” (Acts 8:39). Philip continued his work as a preacher at Azotus (Ashdod) and among the other cities that had formerly belonged to the Philistines and, following the coastline, came to Caesarea (8:26–40).

For a number of years (estimated from fifteen to nineteen) we lose sight of the evangelist. The last glimpse we have of him in the NT is in the account of the apostle Paul’s journey to Jerusalem. At his house the great apostle and his companions stayed for many days. The four virgin daughters of Philip, “who were prophetesses,” and Agabus, who prophesied of Paul’s danger from the Jews, are mentioned in the narrative (21:8–14). The traditions concerning Philip are conflicting and uncertain. The Greek martyrologies make him to have been bishop of Tralles, in Lydia; but the Latins make him end his days in Caesarea.

PHILIPPI (fi-lip’i; “lover of horses, warlike”). A town of Macedonia, anciently known as Krenides (Strabo 7.331). It was situated about nine miles from the Aegean Sea, NW of the island of Thasos. King Philip II took it from the Thracians and gave it his own name. The area of Philippi was then important for its gold mines, but the economy was bolstered by the fertility of the soil as well. The Philippi that the apostle Paul visited was a Roman colony founded by Augustus. The position of the city on the main road from Rome to Asia, the Via Egnatia, made it strategically important.

The fertile plain of Philippi was the battlefield between Mark Antony and Octavian and Brutus and Cassius, in which the former conquered and the Roman Republic was overthrown in 42 B.C. In celebration of the victory the city was made a Roman colony with the special privileges this involved. Paul and Silas were imprisoned here on the second missionary journey (Acts 16:9–40). The Philippian church was especially generous and beloved by Paul (2 Cor. 8:1–6; 11:9; Phil. 1:1–8), and his epistle to this congregation has always been a favorite of Christians. The second epistle to the Corinthians may have been written in this city. The first church in Europe was planted here.

Excavations at Philippi were conducted by the French School of Athens 1914–38, and since World War II to the present they have been carried on by the Greek Archaeological Service. Dominating the site is the forum, a rectangle 330 by 165 feet, which in its present form dates to about A.D. 175. Apparently, however, the form of it is about the same as in Paul’s day. On the N side of the forum is a bema where Paul probably stood before the magistrates (Acts 16:19–21). A stretch of the Via Egnatia (Egnatian Way) may be seen adjacent to the N side of the forum. South of the forum are remains of a sixth-century Christian basilica (Basilica B). North of the forum across the modern road are excavated remains of a fifth-century basilica (Basilica A). Next to that the modern visitor is shown what is identified as the prison into which Paul and Silas were cast. Actually a Roman cistern, it seems to have dubious support for having been the place where Paul was held. On the slope of the acropolis just to the NE of Basilica A is a well-preserved theater, which in its original form probably dated from the time of Philip II in the fourth century B.C. H.F.V.

PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO. A letter of the apostle Paul addressed to the church at Philippi. It was the first city of the district called Macedonia Prima, correctly rendered “a leading city of the district of Macedonia, a Roman colony” (Acts 16:12). It was made a Roman colony by Augustus in honor of his celebrated victory over Brutus and Cassius. As a colony it was “a little Rome” itself, transplanted to the provinces. Its inhabitants were Roman citizens who had the privilege of voting and were governed by their own senate and legislature.

Purpose. The epistle is general, correcting no disorders, false doctrines, or disturbances, but exhorting the Philippians to consistency of Christian living. The immediate occasion was the expression of thanks for a contribution sent by Epaphroditus, who was now returning to take back the apostle’s letter. The only disturbance behind it was a lack of lowliness of mind among some with resulting disputing and friction between two women, Euodia and Syntyche.

Background and Date. The Philippian church had been established by the apostle Paul on his second missionary journey (Acts 16:9–40). The vision at Troas induced him to cross over into Europe and to visit the city of Philippi. There was apparently no synagogue in the city, and the church began by the riverside. Lydia, a seller of purple from Thyatira, was converted. As a result of Paul’s experience with a demon-possessed slave girl, he was cast into prison, miraculously delivered, and saw other converts in the Philippian jailor and his house. After this experience, he had to leave the city, but Luke remained at Philippi. This is obvious because from that point onward Luke uses the third person in speaking of the party. The small church established here was a nucleus of a work of God. The church was loyal to Paul and twice sent a contribution while he was at Thessalonica (Phil. 4:15–16). The church also sent him a gift at Corinth (2 Cor. 11:8–9; cf. Acts 18:5). To thank the Philippians and to send them instruction and comfort, Paul wrote the letter, since Epaphroditus was about to return to Philippi (Phil. 2:28). The epistle was manifestly penned from Rome (cf. 1:13; 4:22) and very likely near the end of Paul's two years there (Acts 28:30–31). The general background would suggest that Philippians is the last of the four so-called prison epistles. The first three of those epistles were written about A.D. 60; therefore, Philippians must be dated at the close of the year A.D. 61. M.F.U.

PHILISTIA (fil-is'ti-a). The land of the Philistines (which see), as it is usually called in poetry (Ex. 15:14; Isa. 14:29–31; Pss. 60:8; 87:4; 108:9).

PHILISTINES. A powerful sea people who settled in the coastal strip in SW Palestine, extending along the Mediterranean from Joppa to S of Gaza. Taking advantage of the fruitful, well-watered Maritime Plain about fifty miles long and fifteen miles wide, they developed into a strong rival of Israel.

Origin. The second millennium B.C. Philistines are said to have come from Caphtor (Amos 9:7; Jer. 47:4; cf. Deut. 2:23) usually believed to be Crete. The monuments show that the Peleste, or Philistines, invaded Palestine with other "sea peoples" at the time of Rameses III (1195–1164 B.C.) of Egypt. This Egyptian monarch repulsed them in several battles, but some of the invaders survived in Syria and eventually reached SE Palestine. There they settled and became known by the name of the country, Philistia, derived from an Egyptian word prst (or plst). This was evidently the name of a Delta group which had migrated from Egypt to southern Canaan at the time when Menes of Thinis was ruling over a unified Egypt (c. 2900 B.C.), and whose descendants were known to Abraham as Philistines. Genesis 10:13–14 records that their ancestor Casluhim was born in Egypt, but his offspring apparently left during the Proto-dynastic period (2900–2700 B.C.). Other contemporary Egyptian groups settled in the Aegean in Crete and elsewhere, establishing the Minoan civilization. The migrants to Canaan, who gave their Egyptian name to the land, lived in the interior around Gerar and Beersheba. They were agriculturalists, and not belligerent maritime people as were the Aegean invaders of Palestine in the second millennium B.C. The reference in Gen. 10:14 to Philistine origins is thus correct for the third millennium B.C. Philistines. By contrast, the references in Amos 9:7 and Jer. 47:4 are to the second millennium B.C. group which formed part of the Sea People. To be consistent historically, the prophets should have used the name Caphtorim to describe them, as in the much earlier source (Deut. 2:23). But this was archaic, since the Caphtorim had long been known as Philistines. In the days of the judges and the Hebrew monarchy, the Philistines, like later Mycenaean rulers of Crete, were quite warlike.

Race. The Philistines were a non-Semitic people. The fact that they were uncircumcised figures prominently in the OT. They were apparently Aryans, viewed by some scholars as Indo-Europeans. Rameses III's temple at Medinet Habu contains reliefs depicting the Philistines. They appear as a tall, Hellenic-looking people.

Government. Their power and threat to Israel was due to a large extent to their political organization. It consisted of a league of five great cities. The famous Philistine pentapolis was composed of (1) Gaza, strategically located a few miles from the Mediterranean and controlling the Maritime Plain and caravan routes to Egypt and Arabia; (2) Ekron, a wealthy market in the valley of Sorek, close to Danite territory; (3) Ashdod, on the main road to Joppa and lying east of Lydda; (4) Ashkelon, a strong fort on the coast, controlling principal caravan routes; (5) Gath, NE of Gaza and bordering on the Shephelah. The effective political organization was headed by five Philistine lords, who are called in Heb., seranim. In numerous instances they are simply called sarim, the normal Heb. word for “princes.” Some scholars have connected seranim with a dialectal variation of sar, Heb. “prince.” It has also been connected with Gk. tyrant. At the time of Joshua these five lords seem to have been joined in a confederacy.

Military Might. Besides their warlike nature, effective political organization, and economic power, the Philistines posed a continual threat to Israel because of their early control of the iron monopoly. Iron came into use in Palestine around 1200 B.C. The Philistines knew the secret of smelting it, which they evidently got from the Hittites. They were able to import, smelt, and forge iron and make use of various iron military weapons. By enforcing a rigid monopoly over Israel, the Philistines were able to make great strides in military encroachments upon Israelite territory. This Philistine iron monopoly is described in 1 Sam. 13:19–22. Sir Flinders Petrie at Tell Jemmeh, apparently ancient Gerar, found abundant evidence of iron manufacture. An iron smeltery and sword factory with furnaces and numerous iron weapons were discovered. Also iron-rimmed chariots were depicted on pottery.

Religion. The Philistines were intensely religious. They celebrated their victories in the “house of their idols” (1 Sam. 31:9). They often carried their idol gods into battle (2 Sam. 5:21). Dagon (Heb. dāgôn), a diminutive of dāg, “fish,” was a grain deity who was represented with the hands and face of a man and the tail of a fish (1 Sam. 5:4). To his temple the captive Ark was carried (5:2), and to him they offered thanksgiving when they had taken Samson (Judg. 16:23–24). They also worshiped Ashtaroath (1 Sam. 31:10). This is the ancient Assyrian goddess of propagation, Ishtar. At Ekron there was a sanctuary to Baal-zebub, “lord of habitation,” who was sufficiently well known as the “god of Ekron” to attract the patronage of Ahaziah (2 Kings 1:2–3). His name in Greek became Beelzebub, “the ruler of the demons” (Matt. 12:24).

Philistine-Israelite Struggle. In Judg. 3:3 the Philistines are left to prove Israel. Shamgar (Judg. 3:31) is said to have slain 600 Philistines with an oxgoad. The tribe of Dan had to move to the NE because of the Philistine advance (18:2). In 13:1, just previous to the time of Samson, Israel was overrun by the Philistines for forty years. Samson, the Israelite hero, produced great victories over the Philistines but eventually met death in the Philistine temple of Dagon (chaps. 13–16). About 1050 B.C., at the battle of Ebenezer, the Philistines again overran the whole country, destroying Shiloh and carrying away the Ark (1 Sam. 4:4). The sacred relic of Israel, however, caused untold suffering to the Philistines, who returned it after seven months (5:6–12). About two decades later Israel recovered her territory under Samuel (7:1–14).

Hebrew Domination. Jonathan defeated the Philistines at Michmash (1 Sam. 13–14), and David won signal victories over them (chaps. 17–18). During the Davidic era the Philistines were completely subjugated and were among the tributary peoples under Solomon.

Under the Judahite Kings. The divided monarchy caused some resurgence of Philistine power. Nadab, around 909 B.C., and other Judahite monarchs invaded Philistia (1 Kings 15:27; 16:15). The Philistines paid tribute to Jehoshaphat (c. 873–848 B.C.; 2 Chron. 17:11), but their power increased during the reigns of Jehoram (c. 853–841 B.C.) and Ahaz (c. 735 B.C.; 2 Chron. 21:16; 28:18). Uzziah and Hezekiah attacked them (26:6–7). They suffered under Egyptian and Assyrian attacks in the eighth and seventh centuries B.C. because of their exposed position on the great highways between Egypt and the Euphrates. Philistine studies are still in their infancy. To date only one Philistine temple has been excavated in Palestine, at Tell Qasile at the northern city limits of Tel Aviv, in 1972.

PHILOLOGUS (fi-lol'o-gus; “fond of talk”). A Christian at Rome to whom Paul sends his salutation (Rom. 16:15). Pseudo-Hippolytus makes him one of the seventy disciples and bishop of Sinope. His name is found in the Columbarium “of freedmen of Livia Augusta” at Rome, which shows that there was a Philologus connected with the imperial household at the time when it included many Julias.

PHILOSOPHY (Gk. philosophia, “love of wisdom”). This term is used in Gk. writings of either zeal for, or skill in, any art or science or other branch of knowledge. It occurs only once in the NT to describe the theology of certain Jewish Christian ascetics who busied themselves with refined and speculative inquiries into the nature and classes of angels and to the ritualism of the Mosaic legislature and the traditional Jewish regulations respecting practical living (see Col. 2:8). M.F.U.

PHINEHAS (fin'i-as; Egyptian, “the Nubian”). The name of several biblical personages.

1. The grandson of Aaron and son of Eleazar by his wife, “one of the daughters of Putiel” (Ex. 6:25). He first appears in biblical history at the time of the licentious idolatry, where his zeal and action secured the end of the plague that was destroying the nation (Num. 25:7–8), c. 1435 B.C. For this he was rewarded by the special praise of Jehovah and by a promise that the priesthood should remain in his family forever (vv. 10–13). He was appointed to accompany as priest the expedition by which the Midianites were destroyed (31:6). Seven years later he also headed the party dispatched from Shiloh to protest the altar that the trans-Jordanic tribes were reported to have built near the Jordan (Josh. 22:13–32). In the partition of the country he received an allotment of his own—a hill on Mt. Ephraim. Here his father was buried (24:33). Phinehas appears to have been the ruler of the Korahites, or Korhites (1 Chron. 9:20). After the death of Eleazar he became high priest (the third of the series), in which capacity he is introduced as giving the oracle to the nation during the whole struggle with the Benjamites on the matter of Gibeah (Judg. 20:28). The verse that closes the book of Joshua is ascribed to Phinehas, as the description of the death of Moses at the end of Deuteronomy is to Joshua. The tomb of Phinehas, a place of great resort to both Jews and Samaritans, is shown at Awertah, four miles SE of Nablus.

The narrative of the Pentateuch presents Phinehas as an ardent and devoted priest, whereas in one of the psalms (106:30–31) he is commemorated in the identical phrase that is consecrated forever by its use in reference to the great act of faith of Abraham—“and it was reckoned to him as righteousness” (Rom. 4:3; cf. Gen. 15:6).

2. The second son of Eli (1 Sam. 1:3; 2:34; 4:4, 11, 17, 19; 14:3). This Phinehas was killed with his brother by the Philistines when the Ark was captured, about 1050 B.C.

3. A Levite of Ezra’s time (Ezra 8:33), unless the meaning be that Eleazar was of the family of the great Phinehas.

PHLEGON (fle'gon; “burning”). A Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent salutations (Rom. 16:14). Pseudo-Hippolytus states that he was one of the seventy disciples and bishop of Marathon.

PHOE'BE (fē'bē; "radiant"). A "servant" (deaconess, see marg.) of the church at Cenchrea, commended by Paul to the church of Rome, who had been a recipient of her kindness (Rom. 16:1–2). She seems to have been on her way to Rome on some important business, the nature of which is not known.

PHOENIC'IA (fe-nish'i-a). The narrow coastland stretching along the NE Mediterranean. It is bordered on the E by the Lebanon Mountains and on the SE by the hills of Galilee. It is famous in history for such great commercial emporia as Tyre and Sidon (both which see), Byblos (see Gebal), and Arvad (which see). It was a part of OT Canaan. At present it consists of the Republic of Lebanon and South Latakia. The boundary generally extended from Arvad southward over 120 miles to the Ladder of Tyre. At some periods the territory was included from Mt. Carmel to the Orontes River. In NT times Phoenicia extended as far S as Dor, sixteen miles S of Tyre. It was thus a narrow ribbon of coastland at its greatest extent some two hundred miles long. For references to Phoenicia see Acts 11:19; 15:3; 21:2.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G. Rawlinson, History of Phoenicia (1889).

PHOENICIANS. The inhabitants of Phoenicia. The name Phoenician is evidently derived from Gk. phoinos, meaning "blood red." Three possible explanations are available. (1)

Phoinos refers to the reddish sunburned skin of Phoenician seamen or, more likely, (2) to the reddish purple dye from the mollusks-murex, widely exported by Phoenicians and widely used as a coloring material in antiquity. (3) However, it may be safest to derive the name Phoenician from phoinix, "the date palm." It would then signify the land of palms, like Palmyra.

Race. The Phoenicians were Semitic and were known as Canaanites as long as the Phoenician cities were important for their commercial activity. In the table of nations (Gen. 10:8–12), Canaan denotes the descendants of Ham, who settled in the land later known as Palestine and from whom the country took its original name. Thus originally Hamitic according to the table of nations, the Canaanites settled in a small country that was like a bridge between Egypt and the great Semitic empires that flourished on the Fertile Crescent. At an early date they must have succumbed to the pressure of racial and linguistic intermixture with Semites with the loss of their own ethnic predominance. This is doubtless the explanation as to why anthropologically and ethnologically the evidence is that the Canaanites were predominantly Semitic rather than Hamitic. Such explanations as that the terms used in Gen. 10 "[express] not race but empire or civilization" (J. A. Montgomery, Record and Revelation [1938], p. 2), or that Canaan is called a son of Ham "on account of the long domination of the land of Canaan by Egypt" (H. S. Gehman, Westminster Dictionary of the Bible [1944], p. 89), are scarcely satisfactory, especially in view of the stress laid upon the Hamitic origin of Canaan (9:22–27).

Factors in Phoenician Commercialism. Three outstanding reasons account for the world-famous commercial activities of the Phoenicians. (1) Their conquest by the Israelites around 1380 B.C. deprived them of most of Palestine and crowded them on the narrow ribbon of coastland extending from Accho N of Mt. Carmel to Ras Shamra-Ugarit more than 200 miles N. Shortly thereafter the Aramaeans took the hinterland of Syria E of Mt. Lebanon. Thus hemmed in to the coast of northern Palestine and southern Syria, they took to the sea and became one of the most distinguished seafaring peoples of history, founding commercial colonies on the shores and islands of the Mediterranean as far W as Spain. In the ninth century they established Carthage. They also founded centers at Tartessus and at Gades in Spain. They seem to have gone past the Pillars of Hercules to secure tin from Cornwall, Britain. (2) The mountains that approach close to the narrow coastal strip further confined the Phoenicians and were a factor in their seafaring exploits. (3) Another circumstance was the plentiful yield of pine, cypress, and cedar trees for shipbuilding. The men of Byblos (OT Gebal) were noted shipbuilders (Ezek. 27:9), and the Sidonians were expert in timber felling (1 Kings 5:6). The two greatest ports were Tyre and Sidon, although Byblos, Arvad, Arka, Zarepath, and Ugarit were famous.

Religion. Canaanite religion is now well known as the result of the recovery of the religious epic literature from ancient Ugarit. These priceless documents reveal the chief gods and goddesses of the numerous Canaanite cities in various periods. The important deities were El, the supreme Canaanite deity, and his son, Baal, the reigning king of the gods who dominates the Canaanite pantheon. In Ugaritic literature, Baal is given the epithet of Aliyan, “the one who prevails.” Both of these gods are utterly immoral in their actions, as are the three goddesses, Anath, Astarte, and Ashera. These three are patronesses of sex and war and reveal the barbarity and licentiousness of Canaanite cults (see John Gray, The Canaanites [1964]). These Canaanite deities periodically exerted an extremely debilitating influence on Israel. Such degeneracy is illustrated in the Ahab-Jezebel apostasy (1 Kings 18–19). The gross idolatrous lapse of Solomon (11:5) is another example. Solomon suffered from the degenerating influence of the licentious cultic ritual of the Phoenician religion. The prophetic curse upon Canaan (Gen. 9:25–27) was principally religious and refers to the religious depravity and moral degeneracy of Canaanite cults. This was a prime reason for their extermination by the conquering Israelites under divine orders.

Art. From an early period Canaanites played a conspicuous role in the cultural history of civilization. By the end of the fourth millennium important cities such as Jericho, Gezer, Megiddo, Beth-shan, Byblos, Hamath, Jerusalem, and Ai were already in existence. Literature, music, religion, art, and science developed on the busy bridge between great civilizations. The Canaanites were in a position to absorb from other peoples, and it is hard to distinguish what they copied or assimilated from what they invented. The invention of the alphabet, which is attributed to the Canaanites, was adopted by the Greeks. In fact, the Greeks learned so much about writing and writing materials from the Canaanites that their word for book, biblion (“Bible”), was connected with the Phoenician city Byblos.

Phoenicians early knew the art of glassmaking, if they did not actually make the discovery themselves; the Sumerians probably were the ones who first discovered that art. The Phoenicians had great artistic ability in working fine metals for jewelry. The Canaanites also possessed literary skill, as the Ugaritic epic literature attests. Even though their religion degenerated morally, it nevertheless had many artistic and aesthetic elements. In architecture the Phoenicians also excelled, as the account of Solomon’s building activities, particularly of the Temple in Jerusalem, attest (cf. 1 Kings 5–10).

History. During the Egyptian Old Kingdom period (c. 2700–2200 B.C.), Phoenicia fell under Egyptian influence. Phoenician Gebal was the port through which trade with Egypt especially flowed. Again during the Egyptian Middle Kingdom (c. 2000–1776) Egypt effectively dominated Phoenicia, at least by means of economic imperialism and perhaps with the stationing of troops there. Then when Egypt built her empire (c. 1580–1100) she controlled the Lebanese coast as part of that empire. Thutmose III, the great “Napoleon of ancient Egypt,” mentioned conquests in Phoenicia and claimed this part of Canaan as a vassal dependency. As the Egyptian and Hittite empires passed off the scene, Phoenicia was free to develop on her own. During her period of independence (c. 1100–900 B.C.) Tyre established dominance over the rest of Phoenicia; and her king Hiram enjoyed favorable commercial relations with David and Solomon, helping the former build a palace and the latter to build a palace, a seaport and merchant marine, and the Temple. Later, King Ethbaal of Tyre married his daughter Jezebel to Ahab of Israel, and as a result Baal worship entered the Northern Kingdom. After about 900 B.C. Phoenicia fell under the sway of Assyria, but at first at least this was not severely restrictive for the Phoenicians because the Assyrians were willing to give them considerable freedom as long as they paid their tribute. In fact, being part of the great Assyrian Empire was commercially advantageous to the Phoenicians. During this period the Phoenicians established colonies in the western Mediterranean, transmitted the alphabet to western lands, and traded their high quality timber and dye and fabrics and other commodities with far places. After the fall of the Assyrian Empire, Nebuchadnezzar incorporated Phoenicia into his empire. Tyre, like Jerusalem, incurred the displeasure of Nebuchadnezzar. After Nebuchadnezzar destroyed Jerusalem in 586, he launched a twelve-year siege of Tyre (585–572), at the end of which time he destroyed mainland Tyre, leaving the island city relatively secure and prosperous. Later Alexander the Great determined to conquer Tyre and during a siege of seven months (332 B.C.) built a road to the island and took the great commercial emporium, destroying it utterly. Subsequently Tyre was rebuilt and repopulated with Greeks. Phoenicia was again prosperous during the Hellenistic and Roman empires. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

PHOE'NIX (fē'nix). A harbor of Crete “facing southwest and northwest” (Acts 27:12, marg., “possibly, northeast and southeast”). Paul and his fellow passengers on the ship going to Adramyttium hoped to winter there. The harbor is in the southern part of the island. M.F.U.

PHRYG'IA (frij'i-a). An inland province of Asia Minor. Once it seemed to include the greater part of the peninsula of Asia Minor, then it was divided into Phrygia Major and Minor, and the Romans again divided it into three parts, Phrygia Salutaris on the E, Phrygia Pacatiana on the W, and Phrygia Katakekaumene (“the burned”) in the middle, for this part was volcanic. The country was fertile, and its rich pastures made it famous for its breeds of cattle. Paul crossed this province twice in the course of his missionary journeys. It is the Greater Phrygia that is referred to in the NT. The towns of Antioch in Pisidia (Acts 13:14), Colosse, Hierapolis, Iconium, and Laodicea were situated in it. In the passages (16:6; 18:23) Phrygia is mentioned in a manner not intended to be precise, the former referring to Paul’s second missionary journey and the latter to the third. Neither is 2:10 inconsistent with this view. By Phrygia we must understand an extensive district, which contributed portions to several Roman provinces, and varying portions at different times.

PHYGE'LUS (fi-je'lus; “a fugitive”; 2 Tim. 1:15; “Phygellus,” KJV). A Christian connected with those in Asia of whom Paul speaks of as having turned away from himself. It is open to question whether their repudiation of the apostle was joined with a falling away from the faith, and whether the open display of the feeling of Asia took place—at least so far as Phygellus and Hermogenes were concerned—at Rome. Phygellus may have forsaken the apostle at some critical time when his support was expected (see 4:16), or he may have been a leader of some party of nominal Christians at Rome, such as the apostle describes at an earlier period (Phil. 1:15–16) as opposing him there.

PHYLACTERY.

Name. (Gk. “safeguard, amulet,” so-named because it was thought to ward off evil spirits and ill fortune.) Neither the LXX nor the other Gk. versions have this term in their translations of the passages that enjoin this token. Even Josephus does not use the word phylactery, though he mentions the custom. The Jews in Christ’s time and to this day call phylacteries tpīlîn (Heb. for “prayer bands”).

Form and Use. A phylactery, or frontal (which see), was a strip of parchment with four passages of Scripture written upon it in the following order: Deut. 11:13–22; 6:4–9; Ex. 13:11–16; 13:1–10. Each strip was rolled up, tied with the white hairs of a calf’s or a cow’s tail, and placed in one of the compartments of a small box. During prayer these phylacteries were worn by the male Israelites firmly attached with leather straps to the forehead between the eyebrows, and on the left arm, so as to be near the heart. This practice—regarding the origin of which only this much is certain, that it was in existence in our Lord’s time (Matt. 23:5; Josephus Ant. 4.8.13)—is founded upon a literal interpretation of Ex. 13, where, with reference to the enactments as to the observance of the Passover and the sanctifying of the firstborn, we read: “And it shall serve as a sign to you on your hand, and as a reminder on your forehead” (v. 9), and “as phylacteries on your forehead” (v. 16); and Deut. 6:8; 11:18, where the injunction, so far as the latter part of it is concerned, is repeated, and that with reference to the whole of the commandments. Of course the injunction was intended to be taken figuratively.

The boxes for the head phylactery and for the arm were ordinarily 1½ inches square; the former having on the outside to the right the three-pronged letter shin, which is designed as an abbreviation of the divine name Shaddai, “the Almighty,” whereas on the left side it had a four-pronged shin, the two constituting the sacred number seven.

How Worn. A long leather strap is passed through a flap in the box. Before commencing his morning prayers the Israelite first puts on the phylactery for the arm. The strap, passed through the loop, makes a noose for the arm. Having put his bare arm through this in such a way that when it is bent it may touch the flesh and be near the heart to fulfill the precept, “You shall therefore impress these words of mine on your heart” (Deut. 11:18), he twists the strap three times close to the box in the form of the letter shin and pronounces the following benediction: “Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us with the commandments and enjoined us to put on phylacteries.” He then twists the strap seven times around the arm, forming two shins, one with three prongs and the other with four.

He next puts on the head phylactery, placing it exactly in the center between the eyes so as to touch the spot where the hair begins to grow (Deut. 11:18) and pronounces the following benediction before he secures it: “Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and enjoined upon us the command about phylacteries.”

To “broaden their phylacteries” (Matt. 23:5) was to make the strips wider, requiring a larger box, thus making them more conspicuous. Some believe that this means having wider straps.

The real meaning of phylacteries is equivalent to amulets or charms. The rabbinites regarded and treated them as such, even though they otherwise disclaimed all connection with heathen views and fear of demons.

PHYSICIAN. The exclamation “Physician, heal yourself!” (Luke 4:23) was delivered by Jesus as part of a rebuke of the worshipers at the synagogue in Nazareth and represented what those worshipers wanted to say to Him. In earlier quoting Isa. 61:1 and applying it to Himself, Jesus had implied both that His listeners needed a physician and that they would find one in Him. They resented the implication, leading to the rejoinder from Jesus that in effect said, “You are going to turn into ridicule even what you have just heard and are going to say to Me, ‘You who pretend to save humanity from its misery, begin by delivering Yourself from Your own misery,’” namely, from the lack of esteem or consideration that was attached to Him.

The saying “It is not those who are well who need a physician” (5:31) was quoted to the scribes and Pharisees who objected to Jesus’ eating with Levi. So far as the statement conceded to the Pharisees that they were perfectly well (and thus had no need of Him as a physician), it was irony. On the other hand it was calculated to raise serious doubts in their minds as to whether their point of view was correct (Godet, Com., ad loc.). See Diseases, Treatment of.

PI-BE’SETH (pī-be’seth; Egyptian, “house of the goddess Bast”). The Gk. rendering is Boubastos; the Egyptian Pi-Pasht, i.e., the place of Pasht, was so-called from the cat-headed Bubastis or Bast, the Egyptian Artemis, which was worshiped there in a splendid temple. It was situated on the royal canal leading to Suez, not far from its junction with the Pelusiac arm of the Nile. It was the chief seat of the Nomas Bubastiles, was destroyed by the Persians, who demolished its walls (Diodorus Siculus Bibliotheca historica 16.51), and has entirely disappeared, with the exception of some ruins that still bear the name of Tell Basta. The prophet Ezekiel (Ezek. 30:17) declared that the young military men of Pi-beseth would fall by the sword and the population of the city go into exile. The NIV renders the name “Bubastis.”

PICTURES. Images were strictly forbidden (Heb. maskîṭ, “figure”), as were idolatrous representations, either independent images, or more usually stones sculptured in low relief, or engraved and colored (Num. 33:52; cf. Ezek. 23:14, “portrayed”). Pictures, movable as with us, were probably unknown to the Jews; but colored sculpture and drawings on walls or wood, such as mummy cases, must have been familiar to them in Egypt.

The “pictures of silver” referred to in the KJV of Prov. 25:11 were probably cornices with carvings (the NASB and NIV read “settings of silver”), and the “apples of gold” representations of fruits or flowers, such as Solomon’s flowers and pomegranates (1 Kings 6–7).

PIECE of Gold, Money, Silver. See Metrology: Measures of Value, or Money.

PIETY. The term occurs only in the exhortation “Let them first learn to practice piety in regard to their own family” (1 Tim. 5:4; Gk. eusebeia), better toward their own “household.” The NIV renders, “put their religion into practice.” It translates Heb. yir-āh as “piety” in Job 4:6; 15:4; 22:4. Toward God the Gk. word means reverence, toward man, due and proper respect.

PI-HAHI'ROTH (pi-ha-hī'roth). The place before or at which the Israelites encamped at the close of their third march from Rameses. It was "between Migdol and the sea.... in front of Baal-zephon" (Ex. 14:2, 9; Num. 33:7; v. 8, "Hahiroth") and is not identified beyond dispute. But Père Abel placed it in the swamps of Jeneffeh at the extremity of the pass between the mountain and the Bitter Lake.

PI'LATE (pī'lat). The Roman procurator of Judea, A.D. 26–36.

Name. Pilate's family name, Pontius (pon'shus), indicates that he was connected, by descent or adoption, with the clan of Pontii. His surname, Pilatus, may have been derived from pilatus, armed with pilum (or javelin), or pileatus, the pileus (or cap) being the badge of freed slaves.

Personal History. Information regarding Pilate is available in the Scriptures and in Josephus and the early church Fathers; less reliable material is provided in traditions and legends.

Early History. The early history of Pilate is unknown, save some unreliable traditions. A German legend relates that he was an illegitimate son of Tyrus, king of Mayence, who sent him to Rome as a hostage. There he committed a murder and was sent to Pontus, where he subdued the barbarous tribes, receiving in consequence the name of Pontius, and was sent to Judea.

Procurator. Pilate was appointed governor of Judea by Tiberius (A.D. 26) and immediately offended the Jews by moving the headquarters of his army from Caesarea to Jerusalem. The soldiers, of course, took their standards—which bore the image of the emperor—with them into the holy city. The sight of the standards planted within sight of the Temple greatly enraged the people, who declared themselves ready to submit to death rather than to this idolatrous innovation. Pilate yielded to their demands and ordered the standards to be returned to Caesarea (Josephus Ant. 18.3.1–2; Wars 2.9.2–4). On two other occasions Pilate nearly drove the Jews to insurrection; the first, when he hung in his palace on Mt. Zion golden shields inscribed with the names of deities. The shields were removed only by an order from the emperor. The second was when he appropriated the revenue of the Temple, arising from the redemption of vows, for the building of an aqueduct. To these acts must be added the slaughter of certain Galileans (Luke 13:1), who seem to have been slain while they were offering sacrifices in the Temple.

His Connection with Jesus. It was the custom for the procurators to reside at Jerusalem during the great feasts in order to preserve order, and, accordingly, at the time of our Lord's last Passover Pilate was occupying his official residence in Herod's palace. It was to the gates of this palace that Jesus, condemned on the charge of blasphemy, was brought early in the morning by the chief priests and officers of the Sanhedrin, who were unable to enter the residence of a Gentile, lest they should be defiled and unfit to eat the Passover (John 18:28). Pilate, therefore, came out to learn their purpose and demanded the nature of the charge. At first they seem to have expected that he would have carried out their wishes without further inquiry and therefore merely described our Lord as a disturber of the public peace; but as the Roman procurator had too much respect for justice, or at least understood his business too well, to consent to such a condemnation, they were obliged to devise a new charge and therefore interpreted the Lord's claims in a political sense, accusing Him of assuming the royal title, perverting the nation, and forbidding the payment of tribute to Rome (Luke 23:3, an account plainly presupposed in John 18:33). It is evident that from this moment Pilate was distracted between two conflicting feelings—a fear of offending the Jews and a conscious conviction that Jesus was innocent. Moreover, this last feeling was strengthened by his own hatred of the Jews, whose religious scruples had caused him frequent trouble, and by a growing respect for the calm dignity and meekness of the sufferer. First he examined the Lord privately and asked Him whether He was a king. At the close of the interview he came out to the Jews and declared the prisoner innocent. To this they replied that His teaching had stirred up all the people from Galilee to Jerusalem. The mention of Galilee suggested to Pilate a new way of escaping from his dilemma by sending on the case to Herod Antipas; but Herod, though pacified by this act of courtesy, declined to enter into the matter. So Pilate was compelled to come to a decision, and, first having assembled the chief priests and also the people, he announced to them that the accused had done nothing worthy of death; but, at the same time, in hopes of pacifying the Sanhedrin, he proposed to scourge Him before he released Him. But as the accusers were resolved to have His blood, they rejected this concession, and therefore Pilate had recourse to a fresh expedient. It was the custom for the Roman governor to grant every year, in honor of the Passover, pardon to one condemned criminal. Pilate therefore offered the people their choice between two—the murderer Barabbas and the prophet whom a few days before they had hailed as the Messiah. To receive their decision he ascended the Bema, a portable tribunal placed on the Gabbatha, a mosaic pavement in front of the palace. As soon as he was seated he received a message from his wife, who had “suffered greatly in a dream because of Him” (Matt. 27:19), urging him not to condemn the Just One. But he had no alternative, as the mob, urged by the priests, chose Barabbas for pardon and clamored for the death of Jesus. Insurrection seemed imminent, and Pilate yielded. Before issuing the fatal order he washed his hands before the multitude, as a sign that he was innocent of the crime, in imitation, probably, of the ceremony enjoined in Deut. 21. As it produced no effect, Pilate ordered his soldiers to inflict the scourging preparatory to execution; but the sight of unjust suffering so patiently borne seems again to have troubled his conscience and prompted a new effort in favor of the victim. But the priests only renewed their clamors for His death, and, fearing that the political charge of treason might be considered insufficient, returned to their first accusation of blasphemy. They quoted the law of Moses (Lev. 24:16), which punished blasphemy with stoning, declared that He must die, “because He made Himself out to be the Son of God” (John 19:7). But this title augmented Pilate’s superstitious fears, already aroused by his wife’s dream; he feared that Jesus might be one of the heroes or demigods of his own mythology. He took Him again into the palace and inquired anxiously into His descent (“Where are You from?”) and His claims (John 19:9). The result of this interview was one last effort to save Jesus by a fresh appeal to the multitude; but now arose the formidable cry, “If you release this Man, you are no friend of Caesar” (19:12); and Pilate, to whom political success was as the breath of life, again ascended the tribunal and finally pronounced the desired condemnation. So ended Pilate’s share in the greatest crime that has been committed since the world began.

Later History. Scripture gives us no further information concerning Pilate, but we learn from Josephus that his anxiety to avoid giving offense to Caesar did not save him from political disaster. The Samaritans were noisy and rebellious. Pilate led his troops against them and defeated them easily enough. The Samaritans complained to Vitellius, now president of Syria, and he sent Pilate to Rome to answer their accusations before the emperor. When he reached it he found Tiberius dead and Caius (Caligula) on the throne, A.D. 36. Eusebius adds that soon afterward, “wearied with misfortunes,” he killed himself. As to the scene of his death, there are various traditions. One is that he was banished to Vienna Allobrogum (Vienne on the Rhone), where a singular monument—a pyramid on a quadrangular base, fifty-two feet high—is called Pontius Pilate’s tomb. Another is that he sought to hide his sorrows on the mountain by the Lake of Lucerne, now called Mt. Pilatus; and there, after spending years in its recesses in remorse and despair rather than penitence, he plunged into the dismal lake that occupies its summit. We learn from Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Eusebius, and others that Pilate made an official report to Tiberius of our Lord’s trial and condemnation; and in a homily ascribed to Chrysostom, though marked as spurious by his Benedictine editors (Homilies 8, in Pasch., 8:968, D), certain hupomnēmata (Acta, or Commentarii Pilati) are spoken of as well-known documents in common circulation. The Acta Pilati, now extant in Gk., and two Lat. epistles from him to the emperor, are certainly false. Confirmation of the existence of Pilate and of his chronological placement came with the work of A. Frova, who conducted an Italian Archaeological Mission dig in the theater of Caesarea (1959–63). There he found an inscription mentioning Pontius Pilate and the Emperor Tiberius.

PIL'DASH (pil'dash; derivation uncertain). One of the eight sons of Nahor, Abraham's brother, by his wife and niece, Milcah (Gen. 22:22), about 2080 B.C.

PIL'FERING (Gk. nosphizō, "to set apart, divide"). Secretly appropriating and setting apart for one's self the property of another, as of a servant thus misusing the property of his master (Titus 2:10; "purloining," KJV; "to steal," NIV). The same Gk. term is used of the act of Ananias in apparently giving all his property to the church and then appropriating part of the purchase money for his own use (Acts 5:2–3).

PIL'HA (pil'ha). One of the leaders of the people who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:24), 445 B.C.

PILLAR. The rendering of nine Heb. words and one Gk. word.

1. The essential notion of a pillar is of a shaft or isolated pile either supporting or not supporting a roof. Pillars form an important feature in oriental architecture, partly, perhaps, as a reminiscence of the tent with its supporting poles, and partly also from the use of flat roofs, in consequence of which the chambers were either narrower or divided into portions by columns. The general practice in oriental buildings of supporting flat roofs by pillars, or of covering open spaces by awnings stretched from pillars, led to an extensive use of them in construction. At Nineveh the pillars were probably of wood, and it is likely that the same construction prevailed in the "house of the forest of Lebanon," with its hall and porch of pillars (1 Kings 7:2, 6). The "capitals" (vv. 16–20; "chapiters," KJV) of the two pillars, Jachin and Boaz, resembled the tall capitals of the columns at Persepolis.

2. Perhaps the earliest application of the pillar was the votive or monumental. This in early times consisted of nothing but a single stone or pile of stones (Gen. 28:18; cf. 31:46; etc.). The stone Ezel (1 Sam. 20:19) was probably a terminal stone or a roadside marker. The monument set up by Saul (15:12) is explained by Jerome to be a trophy. The word used is the same as that for Absalom's pillar. So also Jacob set up a pillar over Rachel's grave (Gen. 35:20). The monolithic tombs and obelisks of Petra are instances of similar usage. Absalom set up a pillar "to preserve" his name (2 Sam. 18:18).

Figurative. The figurative use of the word pillar, in reference to the cloud and fire accompanying the Israelites on their march, or as in Rev. 10:1, is plainly derived from the notion of an isolated column not supporting a roof. In poetry we read of pillars on which earth and heaven rest (Job 9:6; 26:11; Ps. 75:3); and the comparison is made of a man, or his limbs, with pillars, for strength and firmness (Song of Sol. 5:15; Jer. 1:18; Gal. 2:9; Rev. 3:12; 10:1). In 1 Tim. 3:15, we have the metaphorical expression "the pillar and support of the truth."

PILLAR OF CLOUD AND FIRE. In Ex. 13:18 it is stated that "God led the people around by the way of the wilderness"; in v. 21 (cf. 14:24; Num. 14:14; Neh. 9:12–19) it is said that "the Lord was going before them in a pillar of cloud by day to lead them on the way, and in a pillar of fire by night to give them light, that they might travel by day and by night,” etc., that they might march at all hours. To this sign of the divine presence and guidance there was a natural similarity in the caravan fire, which consisted of small iron vessels or grates with wood fires burning in them, fastened at the end of long poles and carried as a guide in front of caravans, by which the direction of the road was indicated in the daytime by the smoke and at night by the light of the fire. A still closer analogy is found in the custom of the ancient Persians of carrying fire, which they called “sacred and eternal,” in silver altars in front of the army. The pillar of cloud and fire must not, however, be confounded with any such caravan or army fire, or set down as nothing more than a mythical conception or a dressing up of this natural custom. The cloud was not the result of a caravan fire, nor was it a mere symbol of the divine presence; it had a miraculous origin and supernatural character.

1. There was but one pillar of both cloud and fire (Ex. 14:24), for even when shining in the dark it is still called the pillar of cloud (14:19) or the cloud (Num. 9:21), so that it was a cloud covering the fire. By day it appeared as a cloud in contrast with the light of the sun, but by night as a fiery splendor (9:15–16).

2. When this cloud went before the army of Israel it assumed the form of a column; but when it stood still above the Tabernacle or came down upon it, it most probably took the form of a round globe of cloud. When it separated the Israelites from the Egyptians at the Red Sea, we imagine it spreading out like a cloud bank, forming, as it were, a dividing wall.

3. In this cloud Jehovah, i.e., the visible representation of the invisible God under the OT, was present with Israel and spoke to them. In this, too, appeared “the glory of the Lord” (Ex. 16:10; 40:34). The fire in the pillar was the same as that in which the Lord revealed Himself in the burning bush and afterward descended upon Sinai amid thunder and lightning in a thick cloud (19:16–18). It was a symbol of the zeal of the Lord and therefore was enveloped in a cloud that protected Israel by day from heat, sunstroke, and pestilence (Isa. 4:4–5; 49:10; Pss. 91:5–6; 121:6). At night it lighted up Israel’s path by its splendor and defended it from terror and calamity (Pss. 27:1–3; 91:5–6). It also threatened destruction to those who murmured against God (Num. 17:10), sending out fire against the rebels and consuming them (Lev. 10:2; Num. 16:35).

PILLOW. The KJV term pillow does not appear in the NASB and NIV, being replaced there by several different words. Heb. kābîr, “something netted,” appears in the NASB of 1 Sam.

19:13–16 as a “quilt” of goats’ hair, and in the NIV as a “garment.” Heb. m[□]ra’āshôt is behind the expression at its head in those verses; and a similar expression, under his head, is used for the Heb. word in Gen. 28:11, 18 (see also Bolster). The “pillows” of KJV Ezek.

13:18, 20, from Heb. keset, are replaced in the NASB reading by “magic bands,” and in the NIV by “magic charms.”

The “pillow” on which the Lord rested His head (Mark 4:38, KJV), from Gk. proskephalaion, was a rower’s bench or its cushion (so NASB and NIV).

PILOT (Heb. ḥōbēl, a “steersman”). Also rendered “captain” in Jonah 1:6, but in Ezek. 27:8 “pilots” seems to be used in a figurative sense for the chief men of Tyre. Keil (Com., on Ezek.) believes the meaning to be that the chief men in command of the ships (captains and pilots) were as a rule citizens of Tyre. The NIV translates Gk. kubernētēs as “pilot” in Acts 27:11 and euthunontos similarly in James 3:4.

PIL’TAI (pil’ti; “my deliverances”). The representative of the priestly house of Moadiah or Maadiah, in the time of Joiakim, the son of Jeshua, and apparently one of the priests who returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (Neh. 12:17), 536 B.C.

PIN. For the nominal use of this word, see Peg.

PINE TREE. See Vegetable Kingdom: Box Tree.

PINNACLE (Gk. pterugion, a “wing, any pointed extremity,” Matt. 4:5; Luke 4:9). The NIV translates, “highest point.” It is impossible to decide definitely what portion of the Temple is referred to as the pinnacle. The use of the definite article makes plain that it was not a pinnacle but the pinnacle. Much difference of opinion exists respecting it, but it may be that it was the battlement ordered by law to be added to every roof.

PI'NON (pī'non). One of the “chief” men (i.e., head or founder of a tribe) of Edom (Gen. 36:41; 1 Chron. 1:52), about 1440 B.C.

PINT. A unit of measure in John 12:3 usually rendered “pound.” See Metrology: Measures of Weight: Pound.

PIPE. See Music.

PI'RAM (pī'ram; perhaps wild ass). The Amorite king of Jarmuth who, with four confederate kings, made war against Gibeon and was defeated by Joshua. The kings fled to the cave at Makkedah, from which they were brought at the close of the battle and pursuit and hanged. Their bodies were taken down and cast “into the cave where they had hidden themselves” (Josh. 10:3–27), c. 1375 B.C.

PIR'ATHON (pir'a-thon; “height, summit,” cf. Arab. farḥ, “top”). The dwelling place of Abdon, who died after holding the office of judge for eight years and was buried there (Judg. 12:13–15). It is also mentioned (2 Sam. 23:30; 1 Chron. 11:31) as the home of Benaiah, the hero. It was in the land of Ephraim, on the mountains of the Amalekites. Fer'ata, on a height some 7½ miles W by S of Shechem, is the plausible identification by Robinson.

PIR'ATHONITE (pir'a-thon-it). The native of, or dweller in, Pirathon (which see). Two such are named in the Bible, Abdon the son of Hillel (Judg. 12:13, 15), and “Benaiah the Pirathonite of the sons of Ephraim” (1 Chron. 27:14).

PIS'GAH (pis'ga; Rash es-Siyâghah.) The headland of the rugged Abarim range in Jordan (ancient Moab), breaking through the ridge and skirting the NE end of the Dead Sea by Jericho (Deut. 34:1). Although Pisgah is often considered as identical to or a part of a neighboring peak, Mt. Nebo, it is actually slightly NW of Nebo.

From the top or head of Pisgah Moses took his survey of the Promised Land. The particular peak upon which he stood was near Nebo (Num. 21:20; 23:14; Deut. 3:27; 34:1).

Upon Pisgah Balaam offered sacrifices (Num. 23:14), so that it was probably one of the ancient “high places” of Moab (33:52). The exact identification of Pisgah was long a problem, until the Duc de Luyne (1864) and Professor Paine, of the American Palestine Exploration Society (1873), independently identified it with Jebel Siyâghah, the extreme headland of the range of Abarim, of which the highest summit is Nebo. Respecting the view from this point Smith writes (Hist. Geog., p. 563): “The whole of the Jordan valley is now open to you, from Engedi, beyond which the mists become impenetrable, to where, on the N, the hills of Gilead seem to meet those of Ephraim. The Jordan flows below. Jericho is visible beyond. Over Gilead, it is said, Hermon can be seen in clear weather, but the heat hid it from us. The view is almost that described as the last on which the eyes of Moses rested, the higher hills of West Palestine shutting out all possibility of a sight of the [Mediterranean] sea.”

PI'SHON (pī'shon). One of the four rivers said to “flow out of Eden to water the garden” (Gen. 2:10–14). The Pishon and the Gihon were presumably canals (called “rivers” in Babylonia), which connected the Tigris and Euphrates as ancient riverbeds. Some scholars identify it with the Pallakottos Canal near the ancient Sumerian town of Eridu, not far from Abraham's city of Ur. M.F.U.

PISID'IA (pi-sid'i-a). A mountainous district in Asia Minor, N of Pamphylia, twice visited by the apostle Paul, and in which he was probably in “dangers from robbers” (2 Cor. 11:26; cf. Acts 13:14; 14:21–24). It was overrun with desperate bands of men who resisted the power of Rome. Antioch was in Pisidia, as distinguished from the more renowned Antioch in Syria.

PISON. See Pishon.

PIS'PA (pis'pa). The second named of the sons of Jether, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:38).

PISTA'CHIO. See Vegetable Kingdom: Nuts.

PIT. The rendering of several Heb. and two Gk. words, and used in the sense of a deep hole dug, in the first instance, for a well or cistern. When these were without water they were used as (1) a place of burial (Pss. 28:1; 30:3, 9; Isa. 38:18) and (2) a place of destruction (Zech. 9:11).

Figurative. To “go down to the pit” (Pss. 28:1; 30:3, 9; etc.), a phrase of frequent occurrence, is sometimes employed to denote dying without hope, but more commonly it refers simply to going to the place of the dead. To dig a pit (7:15; 57:6; Prov. 26:27) is to plot mischief. The pit, as a place of great discomfort and probable starvation, naturally suggested a place of punishment (Rev. 9:1–2).

PITCH. See Mineral Kingdom.

PITCHER. The translation of a variety of Heb. and Gk. terms. Rebekah used a kad, a small jug, for carrying water (Gen. 24:14–18, 20, 43–46; “jar,” NASB and NIV); and the widow of Zarephath stored flour in such a container (1 Kings 17:12–16, marg., NASB, for “bowl”; “barrel,” KJV; “jar,” NIV). The same Heb. term is employed in 1 Kings 18:33 of the barrels (so KJV) of water used by Elijah on Mt. Carmel (“pitchers,” NASB; “jars,” NIV) in Judg. 7:16–20 (“jars,” NIV) of the pitchers used by Gideon’s 300 men; and in Eccles. 12:6 of the pitchers (so NIV) shattered by the well.

The “pitchers” (KJV), “pot” (NIV), or “earthen jars” (NASB) in Lam. 4:2 was a nēbel, a container about twice the size of the kad and having a capacity of about five gallons; it could be closed with a stopper.

The qaśwâ (1 Chron. 28:17; “cups,” KJV; “pitchers,” NIV) was a kind of jug; the gābîa (Jer. 35:5; “pots,” KJV), a “bowl” (so NIV).

The keramion (Mark 14:13; Luke 22:10) was a portable water jar; the xestēs (Mark 7:4, “pitchers,” NASB and NIV; “pots,” KJV) was a sextarius, which held about a pint.

See also Jar.

Figurative. The “pitcher” shattered “by the well” (Eccles. 12:6) is used figuratively for the end of life. “Earthen pitchers” (“jars,” NASB; “pots,” NIV), as contrasted with “fine gold” (Lam. 4:2), represent the enemy’s estimate of the worth of Israel’s sons.

PI'THOM (pi'thom). A storage city of Egypt mentioned in Ex. 1:11 in connection with the bondage of the children of Israel, who were said to have built it and Raamses. It is located in the NE part of Egypt in the land referred to as Goshen. It was SW of Succoth and identified with Tell el-Retabah. The name seems to be derived from Egyptian Pi-Tum, signifying the “house or dwelling of Tum,” the solar deity. Excavations at this site reveal constructions made of bricks without straw (cf. 5:10–15). Extensive brickwork in the site constituted large storage spaces. Together with Rameses (Qantir), Pithom was alleged to have been built by Rameses II (c. 1290–1224 B.C.), but in the light of Rameses II’s notorious practice of taking credit for achievements wrought by his predecessors, those cities were evidently merely rebuilt or enlarged by him. Inasmuch as Tanis was called the house of Rameses only for a couple of centuries (c. 1300–1100 B.C.), the reference of 1:11 must be to the older city, Zoan, where the oppressed Israelites labored centuries earlier. It is probable, therefore, that the name Raameses in 1:11 (same as Rameses) is to be construed as a modernization of an archaic occupational area, Avaris, once a flourishing city before the expulsion of the Hyksos (c. 1570 B.C.). If that is true, both Pithom and Rameses (Avaris/Qantir) were built by the enslaved Israelites long before the time of Rameses II. However, many scholars refer 1:11 to the reign of Seti I or Rameses II.

PI'THON (pi'thon). The eldest son of Micah, the grandson of Jonathan, the son of Saul (1 Chron. 8:35; 9:41), after 1000 B.C.

PLAGUE. A judgment or calamity that God sends upon men (Gen. 12:17; Ex. 11:1; Ps. 106:29–30). The Heb. word nega means “stroke,” “plague,” or “disease.” Another common Heb. word denoting calamities afflicted by God is makkâ, also meaning “blow,” “sound,” or “slaughter,” but sometimes translated “plague,” or “plagues” (Lev. 26:21; Num. 11:33; Deut. 28:59; 1 Sam. 4:8; etc.). Another original term denoting divine judgment, mostly of a final decision, is negep, also from a root to “strike,” and is translated “plague,” or “plagues” in many places (Ex. 12:13; 30:12; Num. 8:19; etc.). A variation of this is the term maggēpâ, also referring to fatal disease, as a divine judgment (Ex. 9:14; 1 Sam. 6:4; etc.). The Gk. term plēgē denotes “a blow” and is a word used for public calamity and heavy affliction sent by God as a punishment (“plagues,” Rev. 9:18, 20; 11:6; 15:1; 16:9; etc.).

PLAGUES OF E'GYPT. The term usually employed in speaking of the divine visitations of wrath with which Jehovah punished the Egyptians because they would not allow the Israelites to leave.

History. Moses, with Aaron as spokesman, appeared before Pharaoh to convey to him the divine command to allow the departure of the Israelites. In attestation of their authority Aaron cast down his staff before the king, and it became a serpent. This miracle, having been performed, or simulated, by his magicians, “Pharaoh’s heart was hardened” (Ex. 7:13) against Jehovah; he refused the desired permission, and thus produced the occasion for the ten plagues. Although it is distinctly stated that the plagues prevailed throughout Egypt, their descriptions seem principally to apply to that part of Egypt that lay nearest to Goshen, and more especially to “the field of Zoan,” or the tract about that city, since it seems almost certain that Pharaoh dwelt in the Delta, and that territory is especially indicated in Ps. 78:43. The descriptions of the first and second plagues seem especially to refer to a land abounding in streams and lakes, which is more characteristic of the Delta than Upper Egypt. Still we must not forget that the plagues evidently prevailed throughout the land. There is nothing in the biblical account of the plagues to fix the length of time occupied in their infliction. Although some scholars contend that the plagues took place over the space of a year, the basis of their reasoning seems to be that so long a period of time enables them to compare the plagues with certain natural phenomena occurring at fixed seasons of the year in Egypt. The biblical historian asserts that each plague lasted only a short time; and unless we suppose an interval of several weeks between each, a few months, or even weeks, would afford sufficient time for the happening of the whole.

The Plagues.

Blood (Ex. 7:19–25). Pharaoh having hardened his heart against the first sign, Moses and Aaron were empowered to enforce the release of Israel by a series of punishing miracles. In the morning they met Pharaoh near the Nile and made another demand for the people’s release. Upon his refusal Aaron lifted up the staff over “the waters of Egypt,” and “all the water that was in the Nile was turned to blood” (vv. 19–20). Keil and Delitzsch observe: “The changing of the water into blood is to be interpreted in the same sense as in Joel 2:31, where the moon is said to be turned into blood; that is to say, not as a chemical change into real blood, but as a change in the color, which caused it to assume the appearance of blood (cf. 2 Kings 3:22). The reddening of the water is attributed by many to the red earth which the river brings down from Sennaar, but Ehrenberg came to the conclusion, after microscopical examinations, that it was caused by cryptogamic plants and infusoria [secretions of decaying organic matter]. This natural phenomenon was here intensified into a miracle, not only by the fact that the change took place immediately in all branches of the river at Moses’s word and through the smiting of the Nile, but even more by a chemical change in the water, which caused the [fish] to die, the stream to stink, and what seems to indicate putrefaction, the water to become undrinkable” (Com., ad loc.). The plague appears to have extended throughout Egypt, embracing “their rivers,” or different arms of the Nile; “their streams,” or Nile canals; “their pools,” or standing lakes formed by the Nile; and all “their reservoirs of water,” or the standing lakes left by the overflowings of the Nile. The “vessels of wood” and the “vessels of stone” were those in which was kept the water for daily use, those of stone being the reservoirs in which fresh water was kept for the poor. “The Egyptians dug around the Nile for water to drink” (v. 24), as it probably purified itself by filtering through the banks. The miracle was imitated by the magicians, but where they got water is not stated. On the supposition that the changing of the Nile water took place at the time when the river began to rise, and when the reddening generally occurs, many expositors fix upon the month of June or July for the time of this plague, in which case all the plagues would be confined to the space of about nine months. Perhaps a more likely date was September or October, that is to say, after the yearly overflow of the Nile. This plague was humiliating, inasmuch as the Egyptians were so dependent upon the Nile for water that they worshiped it as a god, as well as some of its fish.

Frogs (Ex. 8:1–15). The second plague also proceeded from the Nile and consisted of unparalleled numbers of frogs. These were the small Nile frog, called by the Egyptians dofda. As foretold to Pharaoh, the frogs not only penetrated into the houses and inner rooms and crept into the domestic utensils, the beds, the ovens, and the kneading troughs, but they even got upon the men themselves. This miracle was also imitated by the Egyptian magicians, who made “frogs come up on the land of Egypt” (v. 7). Whether the Egyptian augurs really produced frogs by means of some evil occult power or only simulated the miracle is not stated. One thing is certain: they could not remove the evil, for Pharaoh was obliged to send for Moses and Aaron to intercede with Jehovah to take them away. This request of Pharaoh, coupled with the promise to let the people go, was a sign that he regarded Jehovah as the author of the plague. Upon the morrow God removed the plague and the frogs died, the odor of their putrefaction filling the land. This plague must have been aggravating to the Egyptians, for the frog was included among their sacred animals, in the second class of local objects of worship. It was sacred to the goddess Hekt, who is represented with the head of this animal. Then, too, the fertilizing water of Egypt had twice become a plague.

Gnats (Ex. 8:16–19). Gnats creep into the eyes and nose, and they have a sting that causes a painful irritation. After the harvest they rise in great swarms from the inundated rice fields. The plague was caused by Aaron’s smiting the dust of the ground with his staff; all the dust throughout the land of Egypt thereupon turned into gnats, which were upon man and beast. We are not able, nor is it necessary for us, to assert whether this miracle consisted in calling creatures into existence or in a sudden creative generation and supernatural multiplication, for in either case we have a miracle. The failure of the magicians in this instance is believed to have been because of God's restraint of the demoniac powers, which the magicians had before made subservient to their purpose. Their declaration, "This is the finger of God" (v. 19), was not to glorify God but simply to protect their own honor, that Moses and Aaron might not be considered as superior to themselves in virtue or knowledge. It was merely equivalent to saying, "It is not by Moses and Aaron that we are restrained, but by a divine power, possibly some god of Egypt."

Insects (Ex. 8:20–32). The fourth plague was foretold to Pharaoh in the morning as he came out to the water, doubtless for worship. It consisted of swarms of insects, probably dog flies. They are more numerous and annoying than gnats, and when enraged they fasten themselves upon the human body, especially the edges of the eyelids, and become a dreadful plague. As the Egyptian magicians only saw in the plague the work of some deity they could not imitate, a distinction between the Israelites and the Egyptians was made in the plagues that followed. Jehovah placed a "division" (v. 23), i.e., a redemption, or deliverance, between the two peoples. Thus Pharaoh was to be taught that Israel's God was the author of the plagues; that He had authority over Egypt; indeed, that He possessed supreme authority. Pharaoh called Moses and told him to sacrifice to God in the land. This Moses declined to do, on the ground that by so doing the Israelites would be an abomination in the eyes of the Egyptians. The abomination would not have consisted in their sacrificing animals that the Egyptians considered holy, for the cow was the only animal offered in sacrifice that the Egyptians so regarded. The abomination would rather be that the Israelites would not observe the sacrificial rites of the Egyptians. The probability is that the Egyptians would have looked upon such sacrifice as an insult to their gods and, enraged, would stone the Israelites. Pharaoh, therefore, promised to let the Israelites go if he were released from the plague, but he hardened his heart as soon as the plague was taken away.

Pestilence (Ex. 9:1–7). This plague consisted of a severe disease that killed the cattle of the Egyptians that were in the field, those of the Israelites being spared. A definite time was fixed for the plague, in order that, whereas diseases occasionally occur in Egypt, Pharaoh might see in this one the judgment of Jehovah. That the loss of cattle seems to have been confined to those in the field must be understood from v. 3 and from the fact that there were beasts to be killed by the hail (v. 25). Again this plague was an insult to the gods of Egypt, for the cow, the calf, and the bull were all worshipped there. The heart of Pharaoh still remained hardened.

Boils. The sixth plague was of boils breaking forth in sores (Ex. 9:8–12). Moses and Aaron took soot or ashes from a smelting furnace or lime kiln and threw it toward heaven. This flew like dust throughout the land and became boils (which see, Diseases). The magicians appear to have tried to protect the king by their secret arts but were attacked themselves. The king's heart remained hardened, and he refused to let the people go.

Hail (Ex. 9:17–35). In response to the continued hardness of Pharaoh, Jehovah determined to send such hail as had not been known since Egypt became a nation (vv. 18, 24). A warning was sent out for all God-fearing Egyptians to house their servants and cattle, thus showing the mercy of Jehovah. The hail was accompanied by thunder and lightning, the latter coming down like burning torches, and multitudes of men and beasts were slain, trees and plants destroyed. Terrified by the fierceness of the storm, Pharaoh called for Moses and Aaron and said, "I have sinned this time; the Lord is the righteous one, and I and my people are the wicked ones" (v. 27). Moses promised to pray to Jehovah on behalf of the Egyptians that the storm cease; but as soon as the storm ceased Pharaoh again hardened his heart and refused permission to Israel. "The account of the loss caused by the hail is introduced (vv. 31–32) to show how much had been lost, and how much there was still to lose through continued refusal. According to Pliny the barley is reaped in the sixth month after the sowing time, the wheat in the seventh. The barley is ripe about the end of February or beginning of March, the wheat at the end of March or beginning of April. The flax is in flower at the end of January. Consequently the plague of hail occurred at the end of January, or at the latest in the first half of February; so that there were at least eight weeks between the seventh and tenth plague” (K & D., Com., ad loc.). The havoc caused by this plague was greater than any of the earlier ones; it destroyed men, which others seem not to have done.

Locusts (Ex. 10:1–20). Pharaoh still persisted in resisting the command of Jehovah. Moses was directed to announce another plague. He appeared before the king and put the question, “How long will you refuse to humble yourself before Me?” and added the command “Let My people go, that they may serve Me” (v. 3). A compromise was suggested, by which the men should be allowed to go and worship, but that the women should remain, Pharaoh knowing full well that in such a case the men would return. This compromise was rejected, and Moses and Aaron were driven from the king’s presence. Moses lifted up his staff, and the Lord brought an E wind, which the next day brought locusts (which see, Animal Kingdom). They came in such dreadful swarms as Egypt had never known before, nor has experienced since; “they covered the surface of the whole land, so that the land was darkened.... Thus nothing green was left on tree or plant of the field through all the land of Egypt” (v. 15). The fact that the wind blew a day and a night before bringing up the locusts showed that they came from a great distance, and therefore proved to the Egyptians that the omnipotence of God reached far beyond the borders of Egypt and ruled over every land. Another miraculous feature of the plague was its unparalleled extent, that it was over all Egypt, whereas ordinary swarms are confined to particular districts. In this respect the judgment had no equal either before or afterward (v. 14). In response to Pharaoh’s entreaty the Lord “shifted the wind to a very strong west wind” (v. 19), which took away the locusts and cast them into the Red Sea. Pharaoh’s promise to allow the Israelites to depart was no more sincere than those he had made before.

Darkness (Ex. 10:21–29). As the king still continued to be defiant, a continuous darkness came over all Egypt, with the exception of Goshen (v. 23). It is described as a “thick darkness” (v. 22). The combination of two words or synonyms gives the greatest intensity to the thought. The darkness was so great that they could not see one another, and no man rose from his place. The Israelites alone “had light in their dwellings” (v. 23). This does not refer to their houses but means that their part of the land was not visited by the plague. The cause of this plague is not given in the text, but most commentators agree that it was the chamsin, a wind that generally blows in Egypt before and after the vernal equinox, and lasts two or three days. It rises suddenly, and fills the air with fine dust and coarse sand; the sun is obscured, and the darkness following is greater than the thickest fog. Men and animals hide themselves from this storm, and the inhabitants shut themselves up in the innermost rooms of their houses till it is over, for the dust penetrates even through well-closed windows. “The darkness which covered the Egyptians, and the light which shone upon the Israelites were types of the wrath and grace of God” (Hengstenberg). Again the theology of Egypt was attacked; the sun-god was blotted out by the thick darkness. Pharaoh proposed another compromise, that the Israelites, men, women, and children, should go, but that the flocks and herds should remain. But Moses insisted upon the cattle’s being taken for the purpose of sacrifices and burnt offerings, saying, “Not a hoof will be left behind” (v. 26). This firmness Moses defended by saying, “We ourselves do not know with what we shall serve the Lord.” At this Pharaoh was so enraged that he not only dismissed Moses but threatened him with death if he should come into his presence again. Moses answered, “You are right; I shall never see your face again!” (v. 29). God had already told Moses that the last blow would be followed by the immediate release of the people, and there was no further necessity for him to appear before Pharaoh. This announcement to Moses is recorded in 11:1.

Death of the Firstborn (Ex. 11:1–12:30). The brief answer of Moses (10:29) was followed by an address (11:4–8) in which he announced the coming of the last plague and declared that there should be “a great cry in all the land of Egypt, such as there has not been before and such as shall never be again” (v. 6), and that the servants of Pharaoh would come to Moses and entreat him to go with all the Israelites. “And he went out from Pharaoh in hot anger” (v. 8). Then Moses commanded the Israelites to ask from the Egyptians articles of silver and gold, and the Egyptians readily “let them have their request” (v. 36). The Passover (see Festivals) was instituted, and the houses of the Israelites sprinkled with the blood of the victims. The firstborn of the Egyptians were struck at midnight, as Moses had forewarned Pharaoh. The clearly miraculous nature of this plague, coming as it did without intervention on the part of Moses, taking only the firstborn, and sparing those of the Israelites, must have convinced Pharaoh that he had to deal with the One who inflicted this punishment by His own omnipotence. That very night Pharaoh sent for Moses and Aaron and gave them permission to depart with their people, their children, and their cattle, even urging haste. See Exodus.

General Considerations. The nature of the plagues, their ultimate objective, and Egyptian imitation of the plagues all deserve particular attention.

Miraculous Nature of the Plagues. Whether the plagues were exaggerations of natural evils or not, they were evidently of a miraculous character. They formed the chief part of the miraculous side of the great deliverance of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage. The historian obviously intends us to regard them as miraculous, and they are elsewhere spoken of as the “wondrous acts among them, and miracles in the land of Ham” (Ps. 105:27), i.e., in Egypt (106:7), “signs and wonders” that He sent into the midst of Egypt (135:9). Even if we admit them to have been of the same kind as phenomena natural to the country, their miraculous character would be shown by the unparalleled degree to which the affliction reached; in their coming and going at the command of Moses as the agent of Jehovah; and in the exemption of the Israelites from the general calamity.

Design. As we have already said, the plagues had for their ultimate object the liberation from Egypt; but there were probably other ends contemplated: (1) On Moses, tending to educate and discipline him for the great work on which he was about to enter; to give him confidence in Jehovah, and courage in obeying Him. (2) Upon the Israelites, impressing them with God’s care for them and His great power exercised in their behalf. (3) Upon the Egyptians, convincing them of the advantage of casting in their lot with Israel. (4) In demonstrating to Egypt, Israel, and other nations the vanity of Egypt’s gods (Ex. 12:12).

The Egyptian Imitations. The question arises as to whether these imitations were miracles performed through the agency of evil spirits or tricks by sleight of hand. It is certainly more conformable to scriptural modes of expression—and therefore more likely to be true—to consider these miracles real; and that the magicians were the instruments of supernatural powers of evil, which at any crisis in the history of redemption always condense their energies. On the other hand, it may be said that the magicians did nothing more than the jugglers of India easily do today. It must be noted that they failed to perform a miracle on the instant, as in the case of the plague of the lice, when no time was allowed them. They were also unable to remove the infliction, or even exempt themselves from it. See Moses; Pharaoh. BIBLIOGRAPHY: T. S. PLAIN. A level stretch of land. The Heb. biq’â denotes a wide expanse of level land, usually between mountain ranges, such as the “plain in the land of Shinar” (Gen. 11:2); the plain of Megiddo (2 Chron. 35:22; Zech. 12:11); and the plain of Ono (Neh. 6:2). The uniform word for plain (or “plateau” in the NIV) is mîshôr (Josh. 13:9, 16–17, 21; Zech. 4:7; etc.), which in Deut. 3:10 is rendered “tableland” (NIV, “plateau”). A similar word, Heb. kikkâr, “circle,” denotes an entire region, as in Gen. 13:10–12, where Lot sees “all the valley of the Jordan” (see marg.).

PLAITING (1 Pet. 3:3, KJV). Braiding the hair.

PLANE (Heb. maqšûcâ, a “scraper”). A carpenter’s tool, perhaps a chisel (so NIV) or carving tool (Isa. 44:13). See Handicrafts.

PLANE TREE. See Vegetable Kingdom.

PLANKS. In the KJV planks occurs for Heb. sêlâc in 1 Kings 6:15; Heb. cês in Ezek. 41:25; and Heb. câb in 41:26; the NASB renders the terms respectively as boards, wood, and threshold, with a marginal note giving canopy or canopies as a possible substitute for threshold or thresholds. The NIV translates them “planks,” “wooden overhang,” and “overhangs,” respectively.

PLANT. See articles Agriculture; Garden; Vegetable Kingdom.

PLASTER. Several uses of plaster are mentioned in Scripture.

1. When a house was infected with “leprosy” the priest was to take away the part of the wall infected and, putting in other stones, replaster the house with fresh plaster (Lev. 14:42, 48).

2. The words of the law were ordered to be engraved on Mt. Ebal on stones that had previously been coated with lime (Deut. 27:2, 4; Josh. 8:32). The process was probably similar to that adopted in Egypt for receiving bas reliefs. The wall was first made smooth and its interstices, if necessary, filled up with plaster. When the figures had been drawn and the stone adjacent cut away so as to leave them in relief, a coat of lime whitewash was laid on, followed by one of varnish after the painting of the figures was complete.

3. It was probably a similar coating of cement on which the fatal letters were traced by the mystic hand “on the plaster of the wall” of Belshazzar’s palace at Babylon (Dan. 5:5). See Lime, Mortar, Plaster in article Mineral Kingdom.

PLASTERER. See House; Mineral Kingdom; Plaster.

PLATTER.

Figurative. To “clean the outside of the cup and of the platter” while it remained unclean within (Luke 11:39) is a symbol of hypocrisy. See Dish.

PLAY. See Games; Music.

PLEDGE. See Hostages; Loan.

PLEIADES (plê’ya-dêz; kîmâ, “heap, cluster,” Job 9:9; 38:31; Amos 5:8). A constellation of seven large and other smaller stars in the eastern sky, found in Taurus (the Bull), more particularly in the shoulder of the animal.

PLOW. Egypt, probably legitimately, claims the honor of inventing the plow. It was entirely of wood, of simple form, as it is still in that country. It consisted of a share, two handles, and a pole or beam, the last being inserted into the lower end of the stilt, or the base of the handles, and was strengthened by a rope connecting it with the heel. It had no coulter but was probably shod with metal. It was drawn by two oxen, guided and driven by the plowman with a long goad.

The plow now used in Palestine differs in some respects from that described above. It is lightly built, with the least possible skill or expense, consisting of two poles, which cross each other near the ground. The pole nearer the oxen is fastened to the yoke, whereas the other serves, the one end as the handle, the other as the plowshare. With these frail plows and tiny oxen, the farmer must wait until the ground is saturated and softened (cf. Jer. 14:4), however late the season may be. Then they cannot sow and plow in more than half an acre per day, and few average so much (Thomson, Land and Book, 1:208). Thomson believes that the twelve pairs of oxen (1 Kings 19:19) were each yoked to a plow.

Figurative. Plowing was a symbol of repentance (Jer. 4:3), peace and prosperity (Isa. 2:4; Mic. 4:3), desolation (Jer. 26:18), and the labor of ministers (1 Cor. 9:10). “The plowers plowed upon my back” (Ps. 129:3) is a figure of scourging; keeping the hand upon the plow, a sign of constancy (Luke 9:62).

PLOWMAN. In the KJV, the Heb. terms ḥarash and ṣikkār are behind the English term; in the NASB, those two Heb. terms as well as Heb. yāgab and Gk. arotriaō are the source of the English expression. Heb. ṣikkār is not only a plowman, but a farmer in general. In some instances NASB plowman replaces KJV husbandman. See Farmer, Farmers, Farming.

PLOWSHARE. The iron tip of the plow where it enters the earth. To beat a plowshare into a sword is symbolic of war; the reverse of peace.

In the KJV, NIV, and NASB plowshare appears in Isa. 2:4; Joel 3:10; Mic. 4:3 as the translation of Heb. ṣēt. In the NASB and NIV the term appears in 1 Sam. 13:20–21 as the translation of Heb. maḥāreshet.

PLUMB LINE (Heb. ṣānāk), or Plummet (Heb. mishqelet). A line, to one end of which is attached a weight. Its use by masons was early known to the Egyptians and is ascribed to their king Menes about 2900 B.C.

Figurative. A wall built with a plumb line is a perpendicular wall, a wall built with mechanical correctness and solidity. The wall built with a plumb line is a figurative representation of the kingdom of God in Israel, as a firm and well-constructed building. To hold a plumb line to a building may represent the act of construction; or it may be applied to a building in judgment as to the propriety of destroying it (2 Kings 21:13; Amos 7:7–8). The expression “And I will make justice the measuring line, and righteousness the level” (Isa. 28:17) refers to the process of using a plumb line, this being a figure by which what Jehovah is about to do is depicted as a building that He is erecting, and which He will carry out, so far as His despisers are concerned, with a plan of strict retribution. To carry a plumb line in the hand (Zech. 4:10) is a sign of being engaged in the work of building or of superintending the erection of a building.

POCH'ERETH-HAZZEBBA'IM (pok'e-reth-ha-ze-ba'im; “binder of the gazelles”), Pok'ereh-Hazzeba'im (NIV). A man whose sons were among “Solomon’s servants” who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:55, 57; Neh. 7:57, 59), before 536 B.C. The KJV reads “Pochereth of Zebaim.”

POET (Gk. poiētēs, a “performer”). This term occurs in Acts 17:28, in which Paul quotes from Aratus of Cilicia, in the third century, and Cleanthes of Mysia, “For we also are His offspring.” From this he argues the absurdity of worshiping idols. The NIV translates Heb. mōshlîm as “poets” in Num. 21:27.

POETRY, OLD TESTAMENT. Modern scholarship has shown that large sections of the Heb. Bible are poetic besides the three poetical books—Psalms, Proverbs, and Job—recognized by the Masoretes. Many scholars have studied Heb. versification in the past 200 years. These studies have been aided by extensive archaeological findings in Assyrian, Egyptian, Babylonian, and Canaanite (Ugaritic) poetic literature. This considerable nonbiblical literature has furnished an illuminating background for the study of Bible poetry and demonstrates that the poetry of the Hebrews shares many of the same forms and features of the poetry of neighboring peoples.

Nature of Hebrew Poetry. Hebrew verse is characterized by parallelism. This is a type of sense rhythm constituting thought arrangement rather than word arrangement. This basic phenomenon of Heb. versification was first clearly set forth by Robert Lowth in 1753. (See Lowth’s De sacra poesi Hebraeorum praelectiones academicae [English trans., 1847]). Lowth distinguished three chief types of parallelism: synonymous, antithetic, and synthetic.

Synonymous Parallelism is a repetition of the same thought with equivalent expressions, the first line or stich reinforcing the second, giving a distich or couplet:

He who sits in the heavens laughs,
The Lord scoffs at them. (Ps. 2:4)

Antithetic Parallelism consists of the repetition of a contrasting thought in the second line to accentuate the thought of the first:

The young lions do lack and suffer hunger;
But they who seek the Lord shall not be in want of any good thing. (Ps. 34:10)

Synthetic Parallelism is a building up of thought, with each succeeding line adding to the first:

And he will be like a tree firmly planted by streams of water,
Which yields its fruit in its season,
And its leaf does not wither;
And in whatever he does, he prospers. (Ps. 1:3)

This basic pattern of Heb. poetry conveys thoughts pleasing to the mind and produces a musical cadence pleasing to the ear. There are numbers of variations in parallelism discovered since Lowth’s day, such as inverted parallelism (Pss. 137:5–6; 30:8–10). This occurs in a quatrain when the first line is parallel to the fourth instead of the second and the intervening lines are parallel. G. B. Gray in his Forms of Hebrew Poetry (1915) made important advances in the study of parallelism. He distinguished many complete and incomplete parallelisms.

Hebrew Poetry Is Highly Figurative. The Heb. language itself is resonant, rhythmic, and musical, even in prose. Its vocabulary is vivid. It abounds in figures of speech such as alliteration, personification, hyperbole, metaphor, simile, metonymy, and assonance. The difference between Heb. prose and poetry is not always easy to define. In poetry the rhythms are confined within certain limits, whereas in prose they are absolutely free.

Hebrew Poetry Is Rhythmic. Scholarly researchers have shown that Heb. versification is not qualitative; that is, it does not count syllables but depends upon a number of accents. Scholars have differentiated lyric meter to be two plus two as in the Song of Solomon; epic or didactic, three plus three, as in Job or Proverbs; dirge or qinah, three plus two, as in Lamentations. However, too often scholars have assumed that the ancient Hebrews had definite poetic laws and have superimposed such an artificial prosody on Heb. poetry. This mistake has resulted in wholesale corrections. It must be concluded that Heb. poetry is rhythmical but not strictly metrical. Hebrew poets did not bind themselves by rigid rules.

There is evidence also of stanzas or strophes, but scholars need to beware of superimposing their own artificial divisions upon ancient Heb. poetry. Research in this field promises to yield more light on Heb. verse.

POISON, VENOM. The burning venom of poisonous serpents is the Heb. rendering of hēmâ, sometimes translated as “poison,” sometimes as “venom” (KJV, NASB, NIV; see Deut. 32:24, 33; Pss. 58:4; 140:4). Heb. rōsh and m□rôrâ are other terms often translated “poison” or “venom.” The Gk. word ios is used to refer to the serpent’s poisonous venom (Rom. 3:13; James 3:8). POLE. See Standard.

POLICEMAN (Gk. hrabdoukos). A rod holder, i.e., a Roman lictor, a public servant who bore a bundle of rods before the magistrates of cities and colonies as insignia of their office, and who executed the sentences that they pronounced (Acts 16:35).

POLL (Heb. gūlgōlet, a “skull,” and so rendered in Judg. 9:53; 2 Kings 9:35). The head (Num 3:47, NASB); sometimes a census (Num. 1:2; 1 Chron. 23:3, 24). Cutting the hair or shaving the head is rendered (in the NASB) by the verbs trim (Heb. kāsam, Ezek. 44:20), cut off (Heb. gāzaz, Mic. 1:16), and cut (gālah, 2 Sam. 14:26). The NIV translates the respective verbs by “trim,” “shave,” and “cut.”

POLL TAX (Gk. kensos). A register and valuation of property in accordance with which taxes were paid, the tax or tribute levied on individuals, and to be paid yearly (Matt. 17:25; 22:17; Mark 12:14). The KJV renders this term “tribute,” and the NIV, “taxes.”

POLYGAMY. See Marriage.

POMEGRANATE. Representations of pomegranates, in blue, purple, and scarlet, ornamented the hem of the robe of the ephod (Ex. 28:33–34; see High Priest, Dress of), and carved figures of the pomegranate adorned the tops of the pillars in Solomon’s Temple (which see). The “spiced wine . . . from the juice of my pomegranates” (Song of Sol. 8:2) is made at the present day in the East as it was in the days of Solomon. See Vegetable Kingdom.

Figurative. The liquid ruby color of the pulp of this fruit is alluded to in the figurative description of the beautiful complexion of the bride (Song of Sol. 4:3).

POMMEL (Heb. gūllâ, “round”). The ball or round ornament on the capital of a column (2 Chron. 4:12, KJV; “bowl,” NASB; “bowl-shaped,” NIV; see also 1 Kings 7:41–42, KJV, NASB, NIV).

PON´TIUS PI´LATE (pon´shus pī´lat). See Pilate.

PON´TUS (pon´tus; the “sea”). A large district in the N of Asia Minor, extending along the coast of the Pontus Euxinus, from which circumstance the name was derived. It is three times mentioned in the NT (Acts 2:9–10; 18:2; 1 Pet. 1:1). All these passages agree in showing that there were many Jewish residents in the district. As to the annals of Pontus, the one brilliant passage of its history is the life of the great Mithridates, a dynasty of kings that ruled from c.

337 to 63 B.C. Under Nero the whole region was made a Roman province, bearing the name Pontus.

POOL. The translation of several terms in the original.

1. A collection or gathering of water (Ex. 7:19, from Heb. miqweh; in this verse, “pools,” KJV, “reservoirs,” NASB and NIV).

2. Heb. ṣāgam, a marsh or pond (Ex. 7:19; Isa. 35:7, cf. 14:23, NASB, “swamps of water”).

3. Heb. bāṣrēkâ, “a pool,” or “pond” (Eccles. 2:6; Isa. 36:2; Nah. 2:8). “Pools” in the KJV of Ps. 84:6, from a slightly different Heb. word, is more appropriately “blessings” (so NASB).

4. Heb. mayim, “waters” (see Gen. 1:10), given as “pool” in the NASB and NIV of Jer. 41:12. See Water; Well, no. 3.

5. Gk. kolumbēthra, a “diving place,” given as “pool” in John 5:2, 4, 7; 9:7; cf. 9:11, KJV.

The following are the principal pools (reservoirs mentioned in Scripture:

Pool of Hezekiah (2 Kings 20:20). The pool of Hezekiah was a basin opened by King Hezekiah in the city and fed by a water course. In 2 Chron. 32:30 it is stated that “it was Hezekiah who stopped the upper outlet of the waters of Gihon and directed them to the west side of the city of David,” i.e., by a subterranean channel into the city of David. This pool, called by the Arabs Birket el-Hammâm, is pointed out by tradition in the NW part of the modern city, not far E of the Jaffa gate.

The Upper and Lower Pool. The “upper” pool (Isa. 7:3; 36:2; 2 Kings 18:17) is one lying near the fuller’s field and on the road to it, outside the city. The lower pool is named in Isa. 22:9. They are generally known as the upper and lower pools of Gihon. Support for the identification of the pools of Gihon with “the upper and lower pools” arises from there being no other similar or corresponding reservoirs in the neighborhood; and the western position of the upper pool suits well the circumstances mentioned in Scripture (36:2). It may be added that a trustworthy tradition places the fuller’s field W of the city.

The Old Pool (Isa. 22:11). The “old pool” was not far from the two walls. The two walls were near the king’s garden (2 Kings 25:4; Jer. 39:4), which must be sought in the SE of the city, near the fountain (“pool”) of Siloam (Neh. 3:15).

The King’s Pool (Neh. 2:14). The king’s pool is thought to be the Fountain of the Virgin Mary, E of Ophel (Robinson, 2:102, 149) and is perhaps the same as the pool of Solomon. See Gibeon; Samaria; Solomon; Bethesda; and Siloam for the pools under those names.

POOR. In the Heb. and Gk., as in the English language, there were a number of words used to express the condition of being in need. The Scriptures frequently mention the poor, and they teach that no inconsiderable part of the duty required of believers under both Testaments has respect to the treatment accorded to the poor. No merit, however, is given to the assumption of poverty; and the Mosaic law takes every precaution to prevent poverty. Its extreme form of want and beggary was ever represented as the just recompense of profligacy and thriftlessness (Ps. 37:25; Prov. 20:4; 24:34).

Mosaic Enactments. It was stated from the first that there would be those among the covenant people who would be in circumstances calling for sympathy and aid (Deut. 15:11). Negatively, the poor man was to have no advantage over others on the ground of his poverty (Ex. 23:3); but neither, on the other hand, was his judgment on that account to be wrested from him (v. 6). Among the special enactments in his favor the following must be mentioned: (1) The right of gleaning (Lev. 19:9–10; Deut. 24:19–21). (2) The custom of giving the poor and the stranger their portion of the produce of the land in sabbatical years (Ex. 23:11; Lev.

25:6). (3) The reversion of land to the owner in the Jubilee year, with the year-long right of redemption as to town homes (Lev. 25:25–30). (4) The prohibition of usury and the limitation on what could be retained as a pledge (Lev. 25:35–37; cf. Ex. 22:25–27; etc.). (5) The forbidding of permanent bondage and the enjoinder to free Hebrew bondmen or bondwomen in the sabbatical and Jubilee years (Deut. 15:12–15; cf. Lev. 25:39–42, 47–54). (6) The requirement that portions from the tithes be shared by the Levites and then the poor (Deut. 14:28; 26:12–13). (7) The right of the poor to partake in entertainments at the feasts of Weeks and Booths (Deut. 16:11–14; see Neh. 8:10). (8) The requirement that wages be paid daily (Lev. 19:13). Principles similar to those laid down by Moses are inculcated in the NT, as in Luke 3:11; 14:13; Acts 6:1; Gal. 2:10; James 2:15–16. In later times the practice of begging, which does not appear to have been considered by Moses, became frequent.

POR'ATHA (por'a-tha; Old Pers., “liberal, bounteous”). One of the ten sons of Haman slain by the Jews in the palace at Susa (Esther 9:8), about 509 B.C.

PORCH. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. terms.

1. Heb. ûlām (1 Chron. 28:11). The entrance hall of a building (Ezek. 40:7, 48), a pillar hall (1 Kings 7:6), a throne hall (v. 7), and the veranda or “gallery” surrounding a court (Ezek. 41:15). It is especially applied to the vestibule of the Temple (1 Kings 6–7; Joel 2:17). “The porch of the Lord” (2 Chron. 15:8; 29:17) seems to stand for the Temple itself.

2. Heb. misdāron. A “vestibule” (so NASB, Judg. 3:23), probably a sort of chamber in the works of Solomon, open in front and at the sides but capable of being enclosed with awnings or curtains. It was perhaps a corridor or colonnade connecting the principal rooms of the house. The NIV renders “porch” here.

3. Gk. pulōn. A “gateway” (so NASB and NIV, Matt. 26:71).

4. Gk. stoa. A “portico” (so NASB, John 5:2; 10:23; Acts 3:11; 5:12). The NIV translates “colonnade” in the passages.

PORTION.

1. An allowance, as of food, clothing, etc. (1 Sam. 1:5; Ps. 17:14; Prov. 31:15; Isa. 53:12); also called a share (Gen. 14:24) and an allotment (47:22). The command “Go, eat of the fat, drink of the sweet, and send portions to him who has nothing prepared; for this day is holy to our Lord” (Neh. 8:10) has reference to a custom, still existing in the East, of sending a portion of a feast to those who cannot attend it, especially to relatives, or to those in mourning or in a particular time of joy (Esther 9:19).

2. One's lot, destiny, etc. (Job 20:29; 27:13; Ps. 11:6; Isa. 17:14).

3. Part of an estate, one's inheritance (which see). It may be that the expression “The Lord is the portion of my inheritance and my cup” (Ps. 16:5; 119:57; Lam. 3:24) includes all the other meanings.

POSTS. See Courier.

POT (Heb. pārûr, sîr, dûd, maşrep, kāli; Gk. chalkion; all NASB; cf. Gk. hudria, xestēs). The Heb. and Gk. terms translated “pot” in the KJV are not always the same as in the NASB and NIV). A term of wide application, including many sorts of vessels, the most common designation being Heb. sîr, a vessel of various sizes and shapes (2 Kings 4:38) and made of different materials, both earthenware and metal. An earthenware vessel for stewing or seething (Heb. heresû) is mentioned (Ps. 22:15, “potsherd”; Prov. 26:23, “potsherd,” KJV; “earthen vessel,” NASB; “earthenware,” NIV) as well as a culinary vessel (Heb. dûd, Job 41:20; Ps. 81:6). Heb. maşrep refers to a crucible (“refining pot,” Prov. 17:3), and Heb. pārûr to a cooking pot (Num. 11:8; Judg. 6:19). In the NT a vessel of stone or hard earthenware for holding water is referred to in John 2:6–7 (Gk. hudria, “waterpot”).

POTENTATE (Gk. dunastēs). A term applied to God (1 Tim. 6:15, KJV; cf. Rom. 16:27), expressive of His transcendent power and authority. “Sovereign,” NASB; “Ruler,” NIV.

POTIPHAR (pot’i-fer; Egyptian, “whom Re,” i.e., the sun-god, “has given,” contraction of Potiphara, which see). An Egyptian and an officer (“captain of the bodyguard”) of Pharaoh. When Joseph was taken to Egypt Potiphar purchased him from the Midianite merchants. Potiphar was so favorably impressed by the ability and fidelity of Joseph that he made him overseer of his house and committed all his possessions to his care. Upon the accusation of his wife, Potiphar cast Joseph into prison (Gen. 39:1–20), c. 1890 B.C. After this we hear no more of Potiphar, unless, which is not likely, he was the chief of the executioners afterward mentioned.

POTIPH’ERA, POTIPHERAH (po-tif’er-a). An Egyptian and priest of On (Heliopolis) whose daughter Asenath was married to Joseph (Gen. 41:45, 50; 46:20), about c. 1870 B.C.

POTSHERD (Heb. heresû). A fragment of an earthen vessel. Scraping the boil (see Job 2:8) with a potsherd will not only relieve the intolerable itching but also remove the matter.

Figurative. The potsherd is used as a figure for that which is dry (Ps. 22:15).

POTSHERD GATE. A gate of Jerusalem (Jer. 19:2; “east gate,” KJV), not mentioned elsewhere by this name. It is probably identical with the Valley Gate leading to the valley of Hinnom (which see), if not with the Refuse Gate (Neh. 2:13; 3:13–14; 12:31), through which one went southward from the city. Potter’s works seem to have been located in its vicinity; it is “the ‘gate of potsherds,’ so called from the many potsherds thrown down before it” (Orelli, Com., ad loc.).

POTS OF MEAT. The pots referred to by this expression in the NASB and NIV are more familiarly known by the KJV term flesh pots (Ex. 16:3). They were probably three-legged bronze vessels used for culinary purposes by the Egyptians, such as are represented in the paintings of the tombs.

POTTAGE (nāzîd, something “boiled”). A stew (so NASB and NIV, Gen. 25:29, 34). See also Vegetable Kingdom: Lentils.

POTTER. See Handicrafts.

POTTER’S FIELD. A piece of ground that was purchased by the priests with the thirty pieces of silver rejected by Judas. It was converted into a burial place for Jews not belonging to the city (Matt. 27:7). Matthew referred to this disposal of the field as being a fulfillment of an ancient prediction (v. 9). According to Acts 1:18, the purchase is said to have been made by Judas himself, an idiom of Scripture by which an action is sometimes said to be done by a person who was the occasion of its being done. What that prediction was, and who made it, is not, however, at all clear. Matthew names Jeremiah; but there is no passage in the book of Jeremiah, as we possess it, resembling that which he gives; and that in Zechariah (11:12), which is usually supposed to be alluded to, has only an imperfect likeness to it. Four explanations suggest themselves: (1) That the evangelist unintentionally substituted the name Jeremiah for that of Zechariah, at the same time altering the passage to suit his immediate object. (2) That this portion of the book of Zechariah was in the time of Matthew attributed to Jeremiah. (3) That the reference is to some passage of Jeremiah that has been lost from its place in his book and exists only in the evangelist. Some support is afforded to this view by the fact that potters and the localities occupied by them are twice alluded to by Jeremiah. Its partial correspondence with Zech. 11:12–13 is no argument against its having at one time formed a part of the prophecy of Jeremiah; for it is well known to every student of the Bible that similar correspondences are continually found in the Prophets. See, for instance, Jer. 48:45; cf. with Num. 21:27, 28; 24:17; Jer. 49:27; cf. with Amos 1:4 (Smith, Dict., s.v.). (4) “That it is to be regarded as a very old copyist’s error, of a more ancient date than any of the critical helps that have come down to us” (Luther, Com., on Zech., p. 1528).

Meyer (Com., on Matt. 27:9) says, “According to the historical sense of Zechariah, the prophet, acting in Jehovah’s name, resigns his office of shepherd over Ephraim to Ephraim’s own ruin; and having requested his wages, consisting of thirty pieces of silver, to be paid him, he casts the money, as being God’s property, into the treasury of the temple.”

Accordingly, Meyer believes “into the treasury” ought to be read ʔel and not ʔel hăyōšēr “to the potter.”

POTTER’S GATE. See Potsherd Gate.

POUL’TICE (pōl’tis). A soft medicinal application spread on a cloth and applied to sores or wounds. The only reference in the Bible is to the healing of Hezekiah’s boil (2 Kings 20:7; Isa. 38:21) where the Heb. word for “poultice” in the NIV is usually translated “cake,” here a cake of figs.

POUND. A weight and a unit of money. See Metrology.

POVERTY. See Poor.

POWDERS (Heb. ʔăbāqâ, “dust”). Powdered spices, used for perfume and incense (Song of Sol. 3:6).

POWER. The ability of performing belongs essentially to God, who is all-powerful and omnipotent. In the KJV the term power has the sense of ability, strength (Gen. 31:6; Ps. 22:20; Isa. 37:27); right, privilege, or dignity (John 1:12; Acts 5:4; 1 Cor. 7:37; 9:4, Gk. dunamis); absolute authority (Matt. 28:18, same Gk. as above); the exertion or act of power, as of the Holy Spirit (Eph. 1:19, Gk. kratos), some of which meanings are more directly represented in the NASB and NIV readings.

PRAETORIUM (pre-tō’ri-um; Gk. praitorion, Matt. 27:27; Mark 15:16; sometimes “judgment hall,” KJV).

1. The headquarters in a Roman camp, the tent of the commander in chief.

2. The palace in which the governor or procurator of a province resided (John 18:28, 33; 19:9; Acts 23:35). At Jerusalem the Praetorium was the magnificent palace that Herod the Great built for himself, and that which the Roman procurators seem to have occupied whenever they came from Caesarea to Jerusalem on public business.

3. In Rome the Praetorium was probably the quarters built by Tiberius for the imperial bodyguard, the “praetorian guard” (Phil. 1:13). Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 357) says, “The pretorium is the whole body of persons connected with sitting in judgment, the supreme imperial court, doubtless in this case the prefect or both prefects of the Pretorian Guard, representing the emperor in his capacity as the fountain of justice, together with the assessors and high officers of the court.”

PRAISE. The rendering of a number of Heb. and Gk. words. Praise is an expression of approval or admiration, of gratitude and devotion for blessings received. When directed toward men, it should never descend to flattery; neither should the love of it become so great as to hush the voice of conscience and of duty. Although without it there will be no sense of reproach, when it has gone beyond its proper place it corrupts instead of improving.

Praise of God is the acknowledging of His perfections, works, and benefits. Praise and thanksgiving are generally considered as synonymous, yet some distinguish them thus: praise properly terminates in God, on account of His natural excellencies and perfections, and is that act of devotion by which we confess and admire His several attributes; but thanksgiving is a more contracted duty and imports only a grateful sense and acknowledgment of past mercies. We praise God for all His glorious acts of every kind, that regard either us or other men; but we thank Him, properly speaking, for the instances of His goodness alone, and for such only of these as we ourselves are in some way concerned.

PRAYER.

Scriptural Terms. The following Heb. terms are rendered prayer: (1) T[□]pillâ, in general, supplication to God (Pss. 65:2; 80:4; Isa. 1:15; Job 16:17; etc.); also intercession, supplication for another (2 Kings 19:4; Isa. 37:4; Jer. 7:16; 11:14). (2) Pālāl, to “judge,” and then “to interpose as umpire, mediator” (Gen. 20:7; Deut. 9:20; 1 Sam. 7:5; Job 42:8), with the general sense of prayer (Ps. 5:2; 1 Sam. 1:26; 2 Sam. 7:27; etc.). (3) Ātār, “to burn incense,” therefore to pray to God (Job 33:26), the prayers of the righteous being likened to incense (Rev. 5:8). (4) Lāhash, to “whisper a prayer” uttered in a low voice (Isa. 26:16).

Lāhash is a quiet whispering prayer (like the whispering forms of incantation in 3:3); sorrow renders speechless in the long run; and a consciousness of sin crushes so completely that a man does not dare to address God aloud (cf. 29:4).

The following Gk. terms are rendered prayer: (1) Deēsis, prayer for particular benefits. (2) Proseuchē, prayer in general, not restricted as respects its contents. (3) Enteuxis (1 Tim. 4:5), confiding access to God. In combination, deēsis gives prominence to the expression of personal need; proseuchē to the element of devotion; and enteuxis to that of childlike confidence, by representing prayer as the heart’s converse with God. (4) Euchē, which occurs only once in the NT in the sense of a prayer (James 5:15), but in this noun and its verb, the notion of the vow—of the dedicated thing—is more commonly found than that of prayer. The two other occasions of the word (Acts 18:18; 21:23) bear out this remark (Trench, Synonyms of the N.T., 2:1).

Scriptural History. Prayer, constituting as it does the most direct expression of religious feeling and consciousness, has been, from the beginning, the principal means by which men, created in the image of God, have given expression of their attitude toward Him; and from the earliest times, ever since in the days of Enoch when “men began to call upon the name of the Lord” (Gen. 4:26), it has formed an integral part of the public worship of God. The patriarchs and pious Israelites in all ages have expressed the feelings and dispositions of their hearts by praise, thanksgiving, prayer, and intercession before God (18:22–33; 20:17; 24:12– 14; 25:21–22; 32:9–12; Ex. 32:11–13; 1 Sam. 1:10; 2:1–10; 8:6; 12:23; 1 Kings 8:22–53; 17:20–21; 2 Kings 4:33; 19:15–19; Jonah 2:2–9; 4:2–3; Dan. 6:10; 9:3–19; etc.). We find also that wherever the patriarchs erected an altar for worship, they did so with the view of calling upon the name of the Lord (Gen. 12:8; 13:4; 21:33).

The law did not prescribe any prayer for public worship except the confession of sin on the great Day of Atonement (see Festivals; also Lev. 16:21), and the thanksgiving on the occasion of the offering of the firstlings and tithes (Deut. 26:3–11), yet it is certain that in Israel no act of worship was unaccompanied by prayer. It was not expressly mentioned in the law because it not only happened that prayer was a regular accompaniment of laying the hand on the victim in sacrifice but also because it was usual for the congregation, or the Levites as representing it (1 Chron. 23:30), to offer up prayer morning and evening while the incense was being burned (Luke 1:10). As early as David's time we hear of private prayer being offered three times a day (Ps. 55:17), which subsequently became an established practice (Dan. 6:10), the hours being at the time of the morning sacrifice, about the third hour (Acts 2:15); at midday, about the sixth hour (10:9); and at the time of the evening sacrifice, about the ninth hour (Dan. 9:21; Acts 3:1).

Grace. Grace before and after meals was an ancient practice, although we find no explicit testimony regarding it earlier than in the NT (Matt. 15:36; John 6:11; Acts 27:35). How earnest and fervent the prayers of pious Israelites were may be seen from the psalms and many other parts of the OT. Prayer degenerated into mere "lip service" at so early a period as to provoke the censure of the older prophets (Isa. 1:15; 29:13). Later, prayer seems to have degenerated into a mere performance, especially among the Pharisees (Matt. 6:5, 7). As a rule the Israelites prayed in a solitary room, especially the upper chamber (Dan. 6:11; Judith 8:5; Tobit 3:12; Acts 1:13), or in elevated places and mountains with the view of being alone (1 Kings 18:42; Matt. 14:23; Mark 6:46; Luke 6:12). If near the sanctuary, they offered their prayers in the court (1 Sam. 2:1; Luke 18:10; Acts 3:1), with faces turned toward the Holy of Holies (1 Kings 8:38), in which direction it was the practice to turn the face during prayer, even when at a distance from the Temple (2 Chron. 6:34; Dan. 6:11).

The Posture. Prayer was generally made standing (1 Sam. 1:26; Dan. 9:20; Matt. 6:5; etc.), but sometimes, as expressive of deeper devotion, the worshiper knelt (1 Kings 8:54; 2 Chron. 6:13; Ezra 9:5; Dan. 6:10; Luke 22:41; etc.), or bowed the head to the ground (Neh. 8:6). In both cases the hands were uplifted and spread toward heaven or in the direction of the Holy of Holies (1 Kings 8:22; Neh. 8:7; Lam. 2:19; 3:41; Ps. 28:2; etc.). In cases of deep, penitential prayer it was usual to strike the breast with the hand (Luke 18:13) and to bend the head toward the bosom (Ps. 35:13; cf. 1 Kings 18:42).

After the sacrificial worship was discontinued prayer came entirely to occupy the place of sacrifice. Minute regulations regarding the order and the different sorts of prayer, as well as the outward posture, are given in the Talmud. The ancient rabbis and their followers regarded the wearing of phylacteries (which see) as essential to prayer.

Christian Doctrine. Prayer is the expression of man's dependence upon God for all things. What habitual reverence is to praise, the habitual sense of dependence is to prayer. "Prayer, or communion with God, is not reckoned among the means of grace technically so called. It is regarded rather as the concomitant of the others. But, while it is undeniably true that prayer is a condition of the efficacy of other means, it is itself and alone a means of grace" (Pope, Systematic Theology, 3:298). It is a means of grace that has large value, for it affords the privilege of close communion with God, especially when one is alone with Him in its supplications. Although on the one hand there arises a deep sense of need, helplessness, and unworthiness, there also comes an assurance of the divine fullness and love, which enlarges our petitions and brings confidence of answers to our prayers.

Requisites. Prayer requires sincerity, repentance or contrition, purpose of amendment and a good life, the spirit of consecration, faith, and submission to the will of God.

Elements of Power. There are certain elements of power in prayer that have a clear and scriptural ground, such as fervency of mind (James 5:16). In such a prayer the mind is intensely active. The object for which we pray is grasped in all the vigor of thought and feeling. Another element of power lies in the help of the Holy Spirit. There are in Scripture clear promises of His help and statements that mean the same thing (Zech. 12:10; Eph. 6:18). Then we have these explicit words: "And in the same way the Spirit also helps our weakness" (Rom. 8:26). There are many ways in which He may thus help us. He may give us a deeper sense of our spiritual needs and clearer views of the fullness and freeness of the divine grace, and may kindle the fervor of our supplication. We reach a deeper meaning in the words "But the Spirit Himself intercedes for us." He joins us in our prayers, pours His supplications into our own. Nothing less can be the meaning of these deep words. Here is the source of the glowing fervor and the effectual power of prayer. There are instances that cannot be explained otherwise: such as the prayer of Jacob (Gen. 32:24–30), of Moses (Ex. 32:9–14), and of Elijah (James 5:17–18). Another element of this power lies in the intercession of Christ. In His high-priestly office He presents our prayers with the incense of His own blood and the intercession of His own prayers (Rev. 8:3–4).

Objections. The question, "And what would we gain if we entreat Him?" (Job 21:15) is one that continues to be asked. Those who deny the personality of God declare that it is vain to pray, for there is no God to hear our prayers. Such objectors set themselves against the common consciousness of all mankind and may be dismissed with the question, "He who planted the ear, does He not hear?" (Ps. 94:9). Others admit the ability of God to hear but see no use in prayer, since God is so high and His counsels far too firmly established to be ever moved by their poor petitions. We answer, God is "not far from each one of us" (Acts 17:27); and in giving man a strong instinct to pray God has virtually pledged Himself to hear prayer and to answer it (1 John 5:14–15).

Again it is urged that God is immutable. "The idea of a supernatural providence, with answers to prayer, is the idea of a temporal agency of God above the order of nature. The objection is that such an agency is contradictory to the divine immutability. There is no issue respecting the truth of immutability. Is such an agency contradictory to this truth? An affirmative answer must reduce our Christian theism to the baldest deism. Only a false sense of immutability can require the same divine action toward nations and individuals, whatever the changes of moral conduct in them; the same toward Christian believers, whatever the changes of estate with them. A true sense of immutability requires changes of divine action in adjustment to such changes in men. It seems strange that any one who accepts the Scriptures can for a moment give place to this objection.

"Another objection is based on the divine omniscience. This objection is made specially against the efficacy of prayer. God foreknows all things, knows from eternity the state and need of every soul. Hence prayer is not necessary, nor can it have any influence upon the divine mind. These inferences are not warranted. If it were the office of prayer to give information of our wants, it is surely needless and must be useless. Prayer has no such office. It is required as the proper religious movement of a soul in its dependence and need, and thus becomes the means of God's blessings" (Systematic Theology, 1:341ff.).

Objection to the need of prayer on the ground of the wisdom and goodness of God—that being wise and good He will give what is good without asking—"admits but of one answer, viz., that it may be agreeable to perfect wisdom to grant that to our prayers which it would not have been agreeable to that same wisdom to have given us without praying for. A favor granted to prayer may be more apt, on that very account, to produce good effects upon the person obliged. It may be consistent with the wisdom of the Deity to withhold his favors till they are asked for, as an expedient to encourage devotion in his rational creation, in order thereby to keep up and circulate a knowledge and sense of their dependency upon him. Prayer has a natural tendency to amend the petitioner himself, and thus to bring him within the rules which the wisdom of the Deity has prescribed to the dispensation of his favors” (Paley, Moral Philosophy, book 5, chap. 2).

PRAYER, LORD’S. See Lord’s Prayer.

PREACHER, PREACHING. By preaching is generally understood the delivering of a religious discourse based upon a text of Scripture.

Scripture Terms. The study of the Scripture terms for preaching is interesting, for they show the various characteristics and purposes of preaching:

To Cheer with Good Tidings (Heb. bāsār, to “be cheerful, joyful”), as “I have proclaimed glad tidings of righteousness in the great congregation” (Ps. 40:9); “To bring good news to the afflicted,” etc. (Isa. 61:1).

To Declare (Heb. qārā, to “call” out to) in the sense of proclaiming, as a herald. For example, Sanballat accused Nehemiah of appointing “prophets to proclaim in Jerusalem concerning you” (Neh. 6:7, announce him as king); and the same word is used (8:8) of the Levites reading aloud the law and teaching the people (v. 9); and Jonah (3:2) was commanded to preach unto Nineveh, i.e., to proclaim judgment and mercy to its people.

To Address a Public Assembly (cf. Heb. qōhelet, an “assembler”). Thus Solomon is designated “the Preacher” (Eccles. 1:2; etc.), “the only true signification of which seems to be that given the earliest versions, e.g., Vulgate and Septuagint, i.e., one addressing a public assembly and discoursing of human things; unless one chooses to derive the signification of preacher or orator from the primary notion of calling and speaking” (Gesenius, Lex., s.v.).

To Announce (Gk. aggellō), in several combinations, as: euaggelizō, to announce good tidings, “evangelize” (Matt. 11:5; Luke 7:22; Heb. 4:2, 6), especially to instruct men concerning the things pertaining to Christian salvation (Luke 9:6; 20:1; Rom. 15:20; 1 Cor. 1:17; 9:16, 18; etc.); katangelō, to “proclaim publicly” (Acts 13:5; 15:36; etc.); proeuangelizomai, to announce or promise good tidings “beforehand,” i.e., before the event by which the promise is made good (Gal. 3:8).

To Discourse (Gk. dialegomai, to “think different things with one’s self”), to converse, discourse with anyone (Acts 20:9; cf. 18:4; 19:8; etc.).

To Speak (Gk. laleō, to “talk”), to speak to one about a thing, i.e., to teach (Mark 2:2; Acts 8:25; 13:42; 14:25; 16:6; etc.). That which is heard (Gk. akoē, “hearing”), especially the preaching of the gospel (John 12:38; Rom. 10:16).

To Be a Herald (Gk. kērussō, to be “a herald”), to officiate as a herald, used of the public declaration of the gospel and matters pertaining to it, by John the Baptist, Jesus, by the apostles and other Christian teachers (Matt. 11:1; Mark 1:4; 3:14; 16:20; Rom. 10:15; etc.).

Freedom of Utterance (Gk. parrēsia, “boldness in speaking,” Acts 9:27; cf. 2 Cor. 3:12).

Thus it will be seen that to some extent preaching had been recognized in the old dispensation; Noah being “a preacher of righteousness” (2 Pet. 2:5), the psalmist and the prophets delivering their messages of truth in song, and accusation and rebuke, pleading and exhortation, prophecy and promise. The reading and exposition of Scripture was from the beginning the chief object of the synagogue service and is frequently mentioned in the NT (Luke 4:16; Acts 13:15; 15:21). See Synagogue.

In the NT times the Lord and His apostles preached wherever the people could be gathered: in the synagogues, on the mountainside, by the shores of seas and rivers, in the public street, at the porch of the Temple. The preaching of the Word of God (the law and the gospel) is the chief means ordained by Christ Himself and is sufficient for all, by which the Holy Spirit brings about the commencement and continuance of saving faith in the heart of the sinner. So the apostle states (Rom. 10:17), "Faith comes from hearing, and hearing by the word of Christ." The history of God's kingdom furnishes a number of instances showing that the operation of the Holy Spirit for conversion and sanctification is inseparably united to the preaching of the word, as, for example, on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:37–39; 10:44–47) and in the many remarkable examples of the combined operation of the Word and Spirit in the apostolic age (Acts 9:31; 16:14; Gal. 3:5; Eph. 1:13; James 1:18). When we consider "what is written in praise of God's testimony under the old covenant (Ps. 19:8–11; 119; Jer. 23:29); and how the Lord himself spoke of the sufficiency of the testimony of Moses and the prophets (Luke 16:27–31); the testimony of Paul (Rom. 1:16) as to the power of God unto salvation; of Peter (1 Pet. 1:23) as to the seed of regeneration; of the epistle to the Hebrews (4:12) as to the sharp and two-edged sword of the word—[and compare] all this with what experience tells us in varied forms of ourselves and others, ... we shall no longer hesitate with the apostle to call the word of God, as nothing else on earth, 'the sword of the Spirit' (Eph. 6:17)" (Van Oosterzee, 2:736).

PRECIOUS STONES. For discussion of these in detail, see Mineral Kingdom.

PREDESTINATION. See Election; Sovereignty of God.

PREPARATION (Gk. paraskeuē, a "making ready"). In the Jewish sense, the day of preparation (Matt. 27:62; Mark 15:42; Luke 23:54; John 19:31) was the day on which the Jews made the necessary preparation to celebrate a Sabbath (which see) or festival (which see).

PRESBYTERY (Gk. presbuterion). The order or body of elders (1 Tim. 4:14) mentioned in connection with the ordination of Timothy. See Elder; Ordination.

PRESENCE (Heb. pāneh, "face"). Jehovah's promise to Moses was "My presence shall go with you, and I will give you rest" (Ex. 33:14). "The presence (face) of Jehovah is Jehovah in his own personal presence, and is identical with the 'angel' in whom the name of Jehovah was (23:20–21), and who is therefore called in Isa. 63:9 'the angel of his presence' (face)" (K. & D., Com.).

PRESENCE, BREAD OF THE. See Tabernacle: Typology of the Tabernacle and Furniture.

PRESENT. See Gift.

PRESIDENT. See Commissioner.

PRESS. The equipment used to extract oil or wine from the fruit (see Oil, no. 2; Wine Press). The word is also the KJV term for the crowd (so NASB) that surrounded Jesus (Mark 2:4; 5:27, 30; Luke 8:19; 19:3).

PRESSFAT (Heb. yeqeb; Hag. 2:16, KJV). A wine vat (so NASB and NIV) into which the juice flowed when pressed out of the grapes. See Wine Press.

PRESUMPTUOUS, PRESUMPTUOUSLY. Presumption is the act of taking upon one's self more than good sense and propriety warrant; excessive boldness or overconfidence in thought and conduct. In Scripture we have several Heb. words thus rendered:

1. To act overboldly (Heb. zûd, "to seethe"; figurative, "to be insolent"), spoken mostly of those who knowingly and purposely violate the commands of God and commit sin (Ex. 21:14; Deut. 1:43; 17:13).

2. Arrogance (Heb. zêd, "arrogant"; zādôn), as "presumptuous sins" (Ps. 19:13; NIV, "willful sins"); of resistance to priest or judge through pride. "Resistance to the priest took place when anyone was dissatisfied with his interpretation of the law; to the judge, when anyone was discontented with the sentence that was passed on the basis of the law. Such refractory conduct was to be punished with death, as rebellion against God."

3. Defiance (so NASB and NIV, Num. 15:30; "doeth aught presumptuously," KJV) is the synonym for "with a high hand" (from Heb. yād, "hand," rûm, "be high"); the one who acted in open rebellion against God blasphemed Him and was to be cut off (cf. Gen. 17:14).

4. Insolence (Gk. tolmētēs, "daring," "bold"), spoken (2 Pet. 2:10) of those who were self-willed, licentious, and contemptuous of authority.

Generally, presumptuous sins (Ps. 19:13) are those committed with knowledge (John 15:22), deliberation and contrivance (Prov. 6:14; Ps. 36:4), obstinacy (Jer. 44:16; Deut. 1:43), inattention to the remonstrances of conscience (Acts 7:51), opposition to the dispensations of Providence (2 Chron. 28:22), and repeated commission of the same sin (Ps. 78:17).

PRETENSE (Gk. prophasis, "show"). Under color as though they would, etc. (Matt. 23:14; Mark 12:40, "appearance"; Phil. 1:18). The Gk. term is rendered "pretext" in 1 Thess. 2:5, where Paul says that he never "came with flattering speech, ... nor with a pretext for greed," the meaning being that he had never used his apostolic office in order to disguise or to hide a greedy motive.

PRETORIUM. See Praetorium.

PREY. See Spoil.

PRICE. In the KJV of Zech. 11:12, the meaning of price is wages (so NASB).

PRICK. The rendering (Num. 33:55) of Heb. šēk, a briar or thorn; and so the expression "pricks in your eyes," etc., means to suffer the most painful injuries. The NIV renders "barbs." The term pricks in the KJV of Acts 9:5; 26:14 refers to a goad (which see; Gk. kentron).

PRIEST, PRIESTHOOD. The idea of a priesthood connects itself, in all its forms, pure or corrupted, with the consciousness, always more or less distinct, of sin. Men sense that they have broken a law. The power above them is holier than they are, and they dare not approach it. They crave for the intervention of one whom they can think of as likely to be more acceptable than themselves. He must offer up their prayers, thanksgivings, sacrifices. He becomes their representative in “things pertaining to God.” He may become also (though this does not always follow) the representative of God to man. The functions of the priest and prophet may exist in the same person.

In pre-Mosaic times the office of priest was occupied by the father of a family (cf. Job 1:5) or the head of a tribe for his own family or tribe. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob built altars, offered sacrifices, purified and consecrated themselves and their households (Gen. 12:7; 13:18; 26:25; 33:20; 35:1–3). Melchizedek combined kingship and priesthood in his own person (14:18). Jethro was not merely the spiritual but also the civil head of Midian (Ex. 2:16; 3:1).

In Egypt the Israelites came into contact with a priesthood of another kind, and that contact must have been for a time a close one. The marriage of Joseph with the daughter of the priest of On (a priest, as we may infer by her name, of the goddess Neith [Gen. 41:45]); the special favor Joseph showed to the priestly caste in the years of famine (47:26); the training of Moses in the palace of the pharaohs, probably in the colleges and temples of the priests (Acts 7:22)—all this must have impressed the constitution, the dress, the outward form of life upon the minds of Moses and his contemporaries. There is scarcely any room for doubt that a connection of some kind existed between the Egyptian priesthood and that of Israel. The latter was not indeed an outgrowth or imitation of the former, for the one was “from the earth, earthy,” whereas the other was ethical and spiritual.

PRIEST, THE HIGH (Heb. hakkōhēn, “the priest,” hakkōhēn haggādōl, “the great priest”). The high priest formed the culminating point in the Israelite hierarchy. The first to fill this high position was Aaron, who was succeeded by his eldest (surviving) son, Eleazar.

Selection. The high priest was required to satisfy all the necessary conditions of admission to the sacred office. See Priesthood, Hebrew.

Support. The source of the high priest’s support was the same as that of the other priests; his proportion probably varying according to circumstances. See Priesthood, Hebrew.

Dress. As befitted the superior dignity of his office, the high priest wore, in addition to the ordinary priest’s attire (namely, the coat, breeches, sash, and cap), an official dress entirely peculiar to himself, consisting of four parts: breastpiece, ephod, sash, and turban.

Breastpiece (Heb. hōshēn). The breastpiece, called also “the breastpiece of judgment” (Ex. 28:15), was a square piece of cloth made of the same material and wrought in the same fashion as the ephod (see below). It was doubled so as to form a pocket one span broad. Upon this breastpiece were twelve precious stones set in gold and arranged in four rows, while on the stones were engraved the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. At each of the four corners was a ring of gold. By the two upper rings small chains of wreathed gold were attached, at the other ends of which other chains were fastened for the purpose of attaching them to the ephod on the shoulders. Blue cords (laces) were attached to the two lower rings, the other ends of which were tied to rings that were fastened to the bottom of the front part of the ephod immediately above the sash. Thus the breastpiece was securely bound to the ephod and, at the same time, to the breast, both above and below, so that, held as it was by the chains and cords running obliquely in opposite directions, it could not possibly get displaced (Ex. 28:15–28; 39:8–21).

Into the breastpiece were put the Urim and Thummim (Heb. ūrîm w’tūmmîm, “lights and perfections”), in order that they might be upon Aaron’s heart when he went in before the Lord (28:30). Even such early writers as Josephus, Philo, and the rabbis, are unable to furnish any precise information as to what the Urim and Thummim really were. The only Scripture account given of them is in Ex. 28:30; Lev. 8:8, from which it seems evident that they were something of a material nature, which being put into the breastpiece after the latter had been prepared and put on, formed the means through which the high priest was enabled to ascertain the will of Jehovah in regard to any important matter affecting the theocracy (Num. 27:21). That the Urim and Thummim were placed in the pocket is made especially clear from Lev. 8:8, where, in the course of dressing himself, Aaron puts on the breastpiece and then puts the Urim and Thummim inside of it, showing that the things thus put into the breastpiece must be materially distinct from it. They were evidently some sort of small oracular objects. Some scholars connect them with the Babylonian tablets of destiny known as Urtu and Tamitu but this parallel is scarcely valid.

Ephod (Heb. ֵפֹד). The ephod was woven of blue, purple, scarlet, and fine linen yarn and was embroidered with figures of gold. It consisted of two pieces, the one covering the back, the other the breast and upper part of the body. The two parts were fastened together on the top of each shoulder by a golden clasp or fastening—an onyx set in gold—with the names of six tribes on each stone. Upon this ephod the breastplate was fastened (Ex. 28:6–12; 39:2–7; see Ephod in the general listing).

The robe of the ephod was of blue color, woven without any seam. It was worn immediately under the ephod and was longer than it, reaching a little below the knees, so that the priest's coat could be seen under it. The blue robe had no sleeves, but only slits in the sides for the arms to come through. It had a hole for the head to pass through, with a border around it of woven work, to prevent its being torn. The skirt of this robe had a remarkable trimming of pomegranates in blue, red, and crimson, with a bell of gold between each pomegranate alternately.

Sash (Heb. אַבְנֵת, a "belt"). The sash, or band, was of the same material and manufacture as the ephod and was used to bind the ephod firmly to the body (Ex. 28:8).

Turban (Heb. מִשְׁנֵפֶת, "wound around"). According to Josephus and Philo the turban of the high priest consisted of an ordinary priest's cap with a turban of dark blue color over it. On the front of this latter was a diadem of pure gold (i.e., a thin gold plate) on which was engraved "Holy to the Lord," fastened with a dark blue cord (Ex. 28:36–38; 39:30–31).

Duties. The functions peculiar to the high priest consisted partly in presenting the sin offering for himself (Lev. 4:3–12) and the congregation (vv. 13–21), as occasion required, and the atoning sacrifice and the burnt offering on the great Day of Atonement (Lev. 16). He also consulted the Lord by means of the Urim and Thummim, in regard to important matters affecting the theocracy, and informing the people thereon (Num. 27:21; 1 Sam. 30:7–8). The high priest had the supervision of the rest of the priests and of the entire worship and was at liberty to exercise all the other priestly functions as well. According to Josephus (Wars 5.5.7), he officiated, as a rule, every Sabbath and on new moons or other festivals in the course of the year. In addition to his strictly religious duties, the high priest was the supreme civil head of the people, the supreme head of the state, insofar, that is, as the state was not under the sway of foreign rulers. In the days of national independence the hereditary Hasmonaean high priests were priests and kings at one and the same time; at a later period, the high priests were—at least the presidents of the Sanhedrin, and even in all political matters—the supreme representatives of the people in their relations with the Romans.

Consecration. The consecration of the high priest is discussed in the article Priesthood, Hebrew.

Regulations. The regulations were still more stringent in the case of the high priest than of the ordinary priests. The high priest was not allowed to marry even a widow, but only a virgin of his own people; he was forbidden to approach a corpse or take part in funeral rites, the prohibition being absolute, though exceptions were made in the case of other priests; he was not to go out of the sanctuary to give way to his grief, nor to "profane the sanctuary of his God,” i.e., by any defilement of his person that he could and ought to avoid; and he was not to contract a marriage not in keeping with the holiness of his rank (Lev. 21:10–15).

History. In history the high priests naturally arrange themselves into three groups: (1) the Exodus to David’s reign, (2) David’s reign to the fall of Judah, and (3) following the captivity.

The Exodus to David’s Reign. On the death of Aaron the office of high priest passed to his eldest son, Eleazar (Num. 20:28), and, according to divine promise (25:13), was vested in his descendants from Phinehas downward (Judg. 20:28). The office continued in Phinehas’s family for a certain length of time. Josephus says both that the father of Bukki, Abishua, was the last high priest in Phinehas’s line before Zadok (Ant. 8.1.3; the name is given as Abiezer in 5.11.5) and that Ozi (Uzzi, KJV, NASB, NIV), Bukki’s son, held that position (5.11.5). Then, whenever the date and for whatever reason, the office of high priest passed in the person of Eli into the line of Ithamar, in which it continued till the deposition of Abiathar, Eli’s great-great-grandson, by Solomon, who, in appointing Zadok to the office, restored it once more to the exclusive possession of the house of Eleazar (1 Kings 2:26–27, 35).

Only seven of the high priests who served before the reign of David are listed in Scripture: Aaron, Eleazar (both Num. 20:28), and Phinehas (Eleazar’s son, Judg. 20:28); and then, from the line of Eleazar’s brother Ithamar (1 Chron. 24:3, 6, 31), Eli (1 Sam. 1:9–17), Ahitub (brother of Ichabod and grandson of Eli, Hofni and Phinehas being killed in battle, 2:34; 4:11; 14:3), Ahijah (1 Sam. 14:3; “Ahiah,” KJV), or Ahimelech (1 Sam. 22:16; 24:3), and Abiathar (22:20; 23:6; note that the name Ahimelech is given both to the father [1 Sam. 23:6] and the son [2 Sam. 8:17] of Abiathar). (The line of natural descent from Eleazar and his son Phinehas included Abishua, Bukki, Uzzi, Zerariah, Meraioth, Amariah, Ahitub [not the same, obviously, as Ichabod’s brother], and Zadok [1 Chron. 6:3–18, 51–53]).

David’s Reign to the Fall of Judah. There were two high priests in the reign of David, apparently of nearly equal authority, Zadok and Abiathar (1 Chron. 15:11; cf. 2 Sam. 8:17; 15:24, 35). It is not unlikely that after the death of Ahimelech and the secession of Abiathar to David, Saul may have made Zadok priest, and that David may have avoided the difficulty of deciding between the claims of his faithful friend Abiathar and his new and important ally Zadok by appointing them to a joint priesthood. The first place, with the ephod and Urim and Thummin, remained with Abiathar, who was in actual possession of them. It appears that Abiathar had special charge of the Ark and the services connected therewith, which agrees exactly with the possession of the ephod by Abiathar and his previous position with David before he became king. Abiathar, however, forfeited his place by taking part with Adonijah against Solomon, and Zadok was made high priest in his place.

The first considerable difficulty that meets us in the historical survey of the high priests of the second group is to ascertain who was high priest at the dedication of Solomon’s Temple. Josephus says (Ant. 10.8.6) that Zadok was, and the Seder Olam makes him the high priest in the reign of Solomon; but 1 Kings 4:2 distinctly asserts that Azariah (grand)son of Zadok was priest under Solomon, and 1 Chron. 6:10 tells us of an Azariah, grandson of the Azariah in v. 9, saying, “it was he who served as the priest in the house which Solomon built in Jerusalem,” as if meaning at its first completion. We can hardly be wrong in saying that Azariah the son of Ahimaaz was the first high priest of Solomon’s Temple.

Smith thus presents the matter: “In constructing the list of the succession of priests of this group our method must be to compare the genealogical list in 1 Chron. 6:8–15 (KJV) with the notices of high priests in the sacred history and with the list given by Josephus. Now, as regards the genealogy, it is seen at once that there is something defective; for, whereas from David to Jeconiah there are twenty kings, from Zadok to Jehozadak there are but thirteen priests. Then, again, while the pedigree in its six first generations from Zadok, inclusive, exactly suits the history, yet is there a great gap in the middle; for between Amariah, the high priest of Jehosphaphat's reign, and Shallum, the father of Hilkiyah, the high priest in Josiah's reign—an interval of about two hundred and forty years—there are but two names, Ahitub and Zadok, and those liable to the utmost suspicion from their reproducing the same sequence which occurs in the earliest part of the same genealogy—Amariah, Ahitub, Zadok. Besides they are not mentioned by Josephus, at least not under the same names. This part, therefore, of the pedigree is useless for our purpose. But the historical books supply us with four and five names for this interval, namely, Jehoiada, Zechariah, Azariah, Urijah, and Azariah in the reign of Hezekiah. If, in the genealogy of 1 Chron. 6, Azariah and Hilkiyah have been accidentally transposed, as is not impossible, then the Azariah who was high priest in Hezekiah's reign would be the Azariah of 1 Chron. 6:13, 14. Putting the additional historical names at four, and deducting the two suspicious names from the genealogy, we have fifteen high priests indicated in Scripture as contemporary with the twenty kings, with room, however, for one or two more in the history. The high priests of this series ended with Seraiah, who was taken prisoner by Nebuzar-adan and slain at Riblah by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings 25:18)."

Following the Captivity. An interval of about fifty-two years elapsed between the high priests of the second and third group, during which there was neither Temple, altar, Ark, nor priest. Jehozadak, who should have succeeded Seraiah, lived and died a captive at Babylon. The pontifical office revived in his son, Jeshua (which see, and he stands at the head of this series), honorably distinguished for his zealous cooperation with Zerubbabel in rebuilding the Temple and restoring the dilapidated commonwealth of Israel. His successors, so far as given in the OT, were Joiakim, Eliashib, Joiada, Jonathan, and Jaddua. Jaddua was high priest in the time of Alexander the Great. Jaddua was succeeded by Onias I, his son, and he again by Simon the Just, the last of the men of the great synagogue. Upon Simon's death, his son Onias being under age, Eleazar, Simon's brother, succeeded him. The high priesthood of Eleazar is memorable as being that under which the LXX version of the Scriptures was made at Alexandria.

After the high priesthood had been brought to the lowest degradation by the apostasy and crimes of the last Onias or Menelaus, and after a vacancy of seven years had followed the brief pontificate of Alcimus, his no less infamous successor, a new and glorious succession of high priests arose in the Hasmonaeon family. This family was of the division of Jehoiarib (1 Chron. 24:7), whose return from captivity is recorded in 9:10; Neh. 11:10 and lasted from 153 B.C. until the family was destroyed by Herod the Great. Aristobulus, the last high priest of his line, was murdered by order of Herod, his brother-in-law, 35 B.C. (see table 24, "The Maccabees [Hasmonaeans]").

"There were no fewer than twenty-eight high priests from the reign of Herod to the destruction of the temple by Titus, a period of one hundred and seven years. The New Testament introduces us to some of these later and oft-changing high priests, viz., Annas, Caiaphas, and Ananias. Theophilus, the son of Ananus, was the high priest from whom Saul received letters to the synagogue at Damascus (Acts 9:1, 14). Phannias, the last high priest, was appointed by lot by the Zealots from the course of priests called by Josephus Eniachim (probably a corrupt reading for Jachim" (Smith, Dict., s.v.; also Schürer, History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus).

Typology. Aaron as high priest is a type of Christ. The functions, dress, and ritual connected with the high priest's anointing are minutely instructive of the Person and work of Christ as a Priest. Although Christ is a Priest after the order of Melchizedek (Ps. 110:4; Heb. 5:6; 6:20; 7:17), He executes His priestly office after the pattern of Aaron. The order is expounded in Heb. 7, the pattern, in Heb. 9. Death often disrupted the Aaronic priesthood; therefore, Christ is a Priest after the order of Melchizedek as "king of righteousness" and "king of peace" (7:2) and in the perpetuity of His priesthood. Melchizedek as a messianic type was a king-priest, and the portrayal speaks of the royal authority and unending duration of Christ's high priesthood (7:23–24). The Melchizedek type was needed in addition to the Aaronic type to present a full-orbed typical picture of Christ in His high-priestly work of sacrifice for sin and His present ever-living, all-efficacious, intercessory ministry in behalf of His own (John 17; Heb. 7:24–25). PRIESTHOOD, HEBREW (Heb. kōhēn, one "officiating"; Gk. hiereus.) There is no consensus of opinion as to the etymology of the Heb. term kōhēn, but the supposition of Bähr (Symbolik, 2:15), in connecting it with an Arab. root that is equivalent to the Heb. root qārab ("to draw near") answers most nearly to the received usage of the word. In the precise terminology of the law it is used of one who may "draw near" to the divine presence (Ex. 19:22; 30:20), whereas others remain afar off, and it is usually applied to the sons of Aaron. It is, however, used in a wider sense when it is applied to Melchizedek (Gen. 14:18), Potiphera (41:45), Jethro (Ex. 2:16), and to the priests mentioned in 19:22, who exercised priestly functions before the appointment of Aaron and his sons. These last owed their position as priests to natural superiority of rank, either as firstborn or as elders.

In 2 Sam. 8:18 there is a case of great difficulty: the sons of David are described as "chief ministers" (Heb. kōhānîm). This conjecture is offered (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopaedia, s.v.): "David and his sons may have been admitted, not to distinctively priestly acts, such as burning incense (Num. 16:40; 2 Chron. 26:18), but to an honorary, titular priesthood. To wear the ephod in processions (2 Sam. 6:14), at the time when this was the special badge of the order (1 Sam. 22:18), to join the priests and Levites in their songs and dances, might have been conceded, with no deviation from the law, to the members of the royal house."

Keil and Delitzsch (Com., ad loc.) explain as follows: "David's sons were ... 'confidants'; not priests, domestic priests, court chaplains, or spiritual advisers, ... but, as the title is explained in the corresponding text of the Chronicles [18:17], when the title had become obsolete, 'the first at the hand (or side) of the king'. The correctness of this explanation is placed beyond the reach of doubt by 1 Kings 4:5, where the cohen is called, by way of explanation, 'the king's friend.' ... These cohanim, therefore, were the king's confidential advisers."

Essential Idea of Priesthood. Moses furnishes us with the key to the idea of OT priesthood in Num. 16:5, which consists of three elements—being chosen or set apart for Jehovah as His own, being holy, and being allowed to come or bring near. The first expresses the fundamental condition, the second the qualification, the third the function of the priesthood. According to Ex. 19:5–24, it is upon these three elements that the character of the whole covenant people is based. They were chosen to be God’s peculiar people (Deut. 7:6), a kingdom of priests and a holy nation (see Ex. 19:4–6). Their sinfulness, however, prevented its realization; and when brought before Jehovah at Sinai they could not endure the immediate presence of God and begged Moses to act as their mediator (20:18–21). The Aaronic priesthood was instituted in order to maintain fellowship between the holy God and the sinful nation, to bring the people’s gifts and sacrifices before God, and to convey God’s gifts, mercy, salvation, and blessing to the people. By an act of free favor God committed the priesthood to one particular family—that of Aaron (28:1), which priesthood they received as a gift (Num. 18:7, see marg.). In like manner the whole tribe of Levi was assigned to the priests as their servants and assistants (see Levites). This divine preference was confirmed by the miracle of the budding rod (Num. 17) and the priesthood as a heritage to the descendants of Aaron. The qualification, namely, holiness, was represented in outward form by the act of consecration and the robes of office.

The functions were shown by the fellowship with Jehovah into which the priests were allowed to enter in the course of the various acts of worship. Holiness is essential to fellowship with God, and Aaron and his sons, no less than the people whom they were to represent before God, were stained by sin. As the sanctity imparted to them by their consecration, their official robes, and other legal requirements, which fitted them to serve at the altar, was only of an outward character, it follows that these could only have had a symbolical meaning. It was doubtless intended that they should symbolize the sinless character of the human priesthood at the same time they served as a type of the perfect priesthood of the true and eternal High Priest.

Priests.

Selection. God selected as priests the sons (descendants) of Aaron (Ex. 6:18, 20; 28:1), but two of his sons, Nadab and Abihu, died without children, having been put to death for burning “strange fire” upon the altar (Lev. 10:1–2). The priesthood was then invested in the descendants of Aaron’s two other sons, Eleazar and Ithamar (10:6). The selection went still further, for among these all were disqualified who had any physical defect or infirmity—the blind, lame, disfigured, those with deformed limbs, a broken hand or foot, a hunchback or dwarf, anyone with defects, eczema, scabs, or crushed testicles. Those so disqualified were still supported as the other priests (21:17–23), for no one whose legitimate birth entitled him to admission could be excluded.

In later times the Sanhedrin inquired into the genealogy of the candidate, sitting daily for this purpose in the “Hall of Polished Stones.” If he failed to satisfy the court about his perfect legitimacy the candidate was dressed and veiled in black, and permanently removed. If his genealogy was satisfactory, inquiry was next made as to any physical defects, of which Maimonides enumerates 140 that permanently and 22 that temporarily disqualified for the exercise of the priestly office. Those who stood the twofold test were dressed in white raiment, and their names properly inscribed. To this custom pointed allusion is made in Rev. 3:5.

The age for entering the priesthood is not mentioned, but it was probably from twenty-five (Num. 8:24) to thirty years (4:3, 23, 30, 35, 47).

Support. On their settlement in Canaan the priestly families were assigned thirteen Levitical cities with pasturelands (Josh. 21:13–19). In addition the following were their chief sources of maintenance:

1. One-tenth of the tithes paid to the Levites by the people (Lev. 23:10), partly in the raw state, such as wheat, barley, grapes, fruits (Deut. 18:8), and partly as prepared for consumption, as wine, oil, flour, etc. (Lev. 23:17), and even to the firstfruits of sheep shearing (Deut. 18:4).

2. A special tithe every third year (14:28; 26:12).

3. The redemption money of the firstborn: those of the human race were redeemed for five shekels (Num. 18:16); those of unclean beasts were redeemed by a sum fixed by the priest with a fifth part of the value added (Lev. 27:27); those of clean beasts were not redeemed but offered in sacrifice, the priest receiving the waved breast and the right shoulder (Num. 18:17–18).

4. The redemption money paid for men or things specially dedicated to the Lord (Lev. 27).

5. A percentage of the spoil (which see) of war (Num. 31:25–47).

6. The bread of the Presence, the flesh of the offerings (see Sacrifices; also Num. 18:8–14; Lev. 6:26, 29; 7:6–10).

The income of the priests must have been moderate, even under the most favorable circumstances, for it depended largely on the varying religious state of the nation; no law existed by which either payment of tithes or any other offering could be enforced. And yet the law obviously was intended to provide against the dangers of a caste of pauper priests.

Dress. When not in actual service neither the priests, nor even the high priest, wore a distinctive dress; but when ministering in the sanctuary the priests were required to wear the following official dress: Linen breeches, i.e., short trousers (Ex. 28:42), reaching only from the loins to the thighs, and made of fine twisted linen (39:28); a long coat with sleeves, made of finely woven linen (v. 27); a sash of fine twisted linen woven of the same colors as were in the veil hung before the Holy Place (v. 29); and a cap of linen, probably resembling in shape the inverted calyx of a flower. They had nothing on their feet, as they were not allowed to tread the sanctuary without having their feet bare (see Ex. 3:5; Josh. 5:15). The additional dress of the high priest is given in the article Priest, the High.

Duties. The functions of the priesthood were clearly defined by the Mosaic law and remained substantially the same, whatever changes might be brought about in their social position and organization. The duties prescribed in Exodus and Leviticus are the same as those recognized in Chronicles and Ezekiel. Those functions could be entered upon the eighth day of the service of consecration (Lev. 9:1). They were such as pertained to coming “near to the furnishings of the sanctuary and the altar” (Num. 18:3):

1. In the Holy Place, to burn incense on the golden altar, morning and evening; to clean and trim lamps and light them every evening; and to put the bread of the Presence on the table every Sabbath (Ex. 30:7–8; 27:21; Lev. 24:5–8).

2. In the court, to keep the fire constantly burning on the altar of burnt offering (Lev. 6:9, 13); to clear away ashes from the altar (vv. 10–11); to offer the morning and evening sacrifices (Ex. 29:38–44); to bless the people after the daily sacrifice (Lev. 9:22; Num. 6:23–27); to wave different portions of the sacrifice; to sprinkle the blood and put various parts of the animal upon the altar and see to their burning; and to blow the silver trumpets and the Jubilee horn at particular festival seasons.

3. Generally, to inspect unclean persons, especially lepers and, when so warranted, to declare them clean (Lev. 13–14); to administer the oath of purgation to the woman accused of adultery (Num. 5:15–30); to appraise things dedicated to the sanctuary (Lev. 27:2–33).

4. Finally, to instruct the people in the law; to act as a high court of appeals in any difficult case (Deut. 17:8–12; 19:17–19; 21:5); and in times of war to address the troops, if deemed necessary, before going into action (20:2–4).

The large number of offerings brought up to the sanctuary at the festival times taxed the strength and endurance of the priests to such an extent that the Levites had to be called in to help them (2 Chron. 29:34; 35:14).

Consecration (Heb. qādāsh, “to be holy,” with causative or intensive force, “to make clean”). The ceremony of the consecration of the high priest, as well as of the ordinary priests, to their office is prescribed in Ex. 29:1–34 (cf. 40:12–15); and in the case of Aaron and his sons it was performed by Moses (Lev. 8:1–36). The candidate for consecration was conducted to the door of the Tabernacle and had his body washed with water; was invested with the official dress; was anointed with the holy oil (see Oil), which in the case of the high priest, was, according to tradition, poured upon the head, though in the case of the other priests it was merely smeared upon the forehead. In the consecration of Aaron and his sons the fact of anointing is not expressly mentioned, although it had been commanded (Ex. 28:41; 40:15) and the performance of it taken for granted (Lev. 7:36; 10:7; Num. 3:3).

A sacrificial service followed, with Moses officiating as priest. The sacrifice consisted of one young bull for a sin offering; one ram for the burnt offering; the ram of consecration; and a basket containing unleavened bread, unleavened cakes kneaded in oil, and thinner unleavened cakes sprinkled with oil.

The hands of the persons being consecrated (Ex. 29) were laid upon the head of the bull, which was then slaughtered and a portion of its blood sprinkled upon the horns of the altar of burnt offering, the rest being poured upon the ground at the base of the altar. The “fat that [covered] the entrails and the lobe of the liver, and the two kidneys and the fat that [was] on them” were consumed on the altar; while the skin, flesh, and dung were burned outside the camp (vv. 12–13).

The ram for the burnt offering was then brought, and, after the hands of those being consecrated were laid upon its head, it was offered as in the case of other burnt offerings (see Sacrifice). Then came the offering of the ram of consecration. The hands of the consecrated were laid upon its head, and it was slaughtered by Moses, who sprinkled some of its blood upon the tip of the right ear of Aaron and his sons, some upon their right thumbs, and some upon the great toes of their right feet, the rest of the blood being sprinkled upon the altar. Then Moses took the fat, the rump, the fat of the entrails, the lobe of the liver, the two kidneys with their fat, the right shoulder of this ram of consecration; and along with these an unleavened cake, a cake of oiled bread, and a thin cake sprinkled with oil, and laid them upon the fat and the right shoulder. Placing these all together on the hands of Aaron, Moses waved them before Jehovah. After this the whole was burned upon the altar.

The breast of the ram—the priest’s portion—Moses now waved before Jehovah, afterward sprinkling some of the anointing oil and blood upon the priests and their garments. This concluded the ceremony. The remainder of the flesh was cooked by Aaron and his sons at the door of the Tabernacle and eaten by them. Any portion remaining until the next day was burned. The consecration service lasted seven days (Ex. 29:35; Lev. 8:33–35), the sacrifice being repeated each day. Meantime those being consecrated were not allowed to leave the sanctuary.

After the consecration services, the consecrated, whether high priest or ordinary priest, were required to offer a special grain offering of one-tenth ephah of flour. This was kneaded with oil and baked in separate pieces—one-half being offered in the morning and the other in the evening, wholly burned upon the altar (6:19–23). On the eighth day of consecration, the exercise of the priestly function was begun by the newly consecrated in the offering of a calf for a sin offering, and a ram for a burnt offering, for themselves. This was immediately followed by the offering of sacrifices for the people (chap. 9).

Regulations. Above all Israel, the priests, whom Jehovah had chosen out of the whole nation to be the custodians of His sanctuary and had sanctified to that end, were to prove themselves the consecrated servants of God in their domestic lives and sacred duties. They were not to defile themselves by touching the dead, excepting such as formed part of one's immediate family, such as his mother, father, son, daughter, brother, or sister who was still living with him as a virgin (Lev. 21:1–6); by signs of mourning (vv. 10–12; the wife, though not mentioned, is probably included in the phrase “relatives who are nearest to him”); by marriage with a public prostitute, divorced woman, or a widow in the case of the high priest. Such marriage would be irreconcilable with the holiness of the priesthood (vv. 7–9, 14); but he might marry a virgin (v. 14) or the widow of a priest (Ezek. 44:22). Licentious conduct on the part of any of their own daughters was punished by the offenders' being burned to death (Lev. 21:9). If a priest unwittingly or unavoidably contracted Levitical uncleanness he was required to abstain from the holy things until he had become legally purified (22:2–7); and every transgression of the law of Levitical purity was regarded as a crime punishable by death (22:9).

Before entering the Tabernacle the priests washed their hands and feet (Ex. 30:17–21; 40:30–32); and during the time of their administration they were to drink no wine or strong drink (Lev. 10:9; Ezek. 44:21); they were not to shave their heads.

The priesthood ministering in the Temple was arranged into “ordinary” priests and various officials. Of the latter, besides the high priest were the following: the Sagan, or suffragan priest, who officiated for the high priest when he was incapacitated and generally acted as his assistant, taking oversight of the priests, whence he is called “second priest” (2 Kings 25:18; Jer. 52:24); two Katholikin, chief treasurers and overseers; seven Ammarcalin, subordinate to the Katholikin, and who had chief charge of the gates; and three Gizbarim, or undertreasurers. These fourteen officers, ranking in the order mentioned, formed the standing “council of the temple,” which regulated everything connected with the affairs and services of the sanctuary. Next in rank were the “heads of each division” on duty for a week, and then the “heads of families” of every division. After them followed fifteen overseers, as overseers of gates, guards, lots, etc.

History. The priests, at first, probably exercised their functions according to a definite principle of alternation. But when in the course of time their numbers greatly increased, David divided them into twenty-four divisions, sixteen of them consisting of the descendants of Eleazar and eight of the descendants of Ithamar, with a president of each division (1 Chron. 24:3–18; Matt. 2:4; Josephus Ant. 7.14.7). Each division was divided into subdivisions, ranging, according to the Talmud, from five to nine for each main division. Each main division and subdivision was ruled by a head. The order in which the divisions took their turn was determined by lot, a new one being appointed each week to conduct the services during that week, beginning and ending on the Sabbath (2 Kings 11:9; 2 Chron. 23:4). These divisions are named in 1 Chron. 24. In like manner the various duties were assigned by lot (Luke 1:9), for which purpose there was a special proefectus sortium (director of lots) in the Temple. According to rabbinical tradition four divisions returned from captivity, from which twenty-four divisions were chosen by lot.

At the disruption of the kingdom, the priests and Levites remained with the kingdom of Judah, and there alone exercised their functions, occupying themselves with matters of jurisprudence and instructing the people in the law (2 Chron. 17:7–9). King Jehoshaphat created a supreme court in Jerusalem (17:7–9), composed of princes, Levites, and priests; and so long and so far as king and people remained loyal to the law of Moses, the priests were highly esteemed and exercised a healthy influence upon the progress and development of the theocracy. Apostasy sank the priests into immorality, a departure from God, and into idol worship (Hos. 6:9; Mic. 3:11; Zeph. 3:4; Jer. 5:31; 6:13; Ezek. 22:26; Mal. 2). The officiating priests occupied rooms immediately adjoining the Temple, although subsequent to the Exile several priestly families took up their residence in private houses in Jerusalem (Neh. 11:10–18).

A few priests might enter more deeply into the divine life, and so receive, like Jeremiah, Zechariah, and Ezekiel, a special call to the office of a prophet; but others, doubtless, served Jehovah with a divided allegiance, acting also as priests of the high places, sharing in the worship of Baal (Jer. 2:8), the sun and moon, and the host of heaven (8:1–2). Some “ministered . . . before their idols” in the very Temple itself (Ezek. 44:12) and allowed others, “uncircumcised in heart and uncircumcised in flesh,” to join them (v. 7). They became sensual, covetous, tyrannical, drunkards, and adulterous (Isa. 28:7–8; 56:10–12), and their corruption was shared by the prophets (Jer. 5:31; Lam. 4:13; Zeph. 3:4).

Although chastened by the captivity, many of the priests disowning their heathen wives (Ezra 10:18–19) and taking part in the instruction of the people (3:2; Neh. 8:9–13), the root evils soon reappeared. The work of the priesthood was made the instrument of covetousness, every ministerial act being performed for a consideration (Mal. 1:10). They “corrupted the covenant of Levi” (2:8) and forgot the idea that the priest was the messenger of the Lord (2:7). They lost their influence and became “despised and abased before all the people” (2:9). This, however, is not to be understood as implying that the priests had now lost all their influence. Politically and socially they still occupied the foremost place quite as much as ever they did; and by virtue of their political standing, in virtue of the powerful resources at their command, and, lastly and above all, in virtue of their sacred prerogative—the priests continued to have an extraordinary significance for the life of the nation.

Symbolical and Typical. The priestly prerogatives and qualifications had an undoubted symbolical and typical meaning, which ought to be recognized but not carried to extremes. The following brief summary is abridged from Keil (Arch., 1:227ff.):

Symbolical. The symbolic aspects of the priesthood included the selection, holiness, and consecration of the priests; the dress of the ordinary priests; and the dress and anointing of the high priest.

1. Selection. In their being chosen to be Jehovah's peculiar possession, the priests had no inheritance in Canaan, the Lord Himself being their “portion and . . . inheritance” (Num. 18:20; Deut. 10:9; etc.). Jehovah, as the Lord of the whole earth and owner of Canaan, not only supplied sufficient dwellings for them, but also assigned an adequate allowance in tithes, firstfruits, etc. Thus as belonging to Jehovah and provided for by Him, they were taught to live by faith and to regard their whole good as centering in and coming from the Lord. They were also left free to devote themselves exclusively to the Lord's service, to the ministry of His word and law, and to their sacred duties.

2. Holiness. Being holy formed the indispensable condition of approach to God, the Holy One. Hence in the qualifications necessary for the priestly office—bodily defect or infirmity being regarded as the counterpart of spiritual defects and shortcomings—the bodily perfection of the priests was not intended merely to be a reflection in their persons of the sacredness of their functions and ministry and of the place where they officiated, but rather to symbolize the priest's spiritual blamelessness and sanctification of heart. For the same reason every Levitical defilement was to be avoided, and homelife and conjugal relations were to be such as would show consecration to God (Lev. 21).

3. Consecration. This was the outward sign of sanctification. The washing of the body symbolized the purifying of the soul from the pollution of sin. This negative preparation was succeeded by the positive impartation of the indispensable requisites for the holy office, namely, the dress and the anointing.

4. Dress of the Ordinary Priests. The color of the priest's garments and the individual elements of the clothing he wore were important.

The predominating color of the dress was white, symbolical of glory and holiness (Dan. 12:6–7; 10:5; Ezek. 9:3; 10:2, 7; Matt. 28:3; Rev. 7:9; etc.); and the priests wearing garments of that color appeared as holy servants of God.

The breeches were intended to “cover their bare flesh,” the parts having to do with secretions, and symbolized the native side of holiness.

The coat enveloped the whole body and was woven in one piece without a seam, forming the principal article of dress. It indicated spiritual integrity, the blamelessness and righteousness in which the idea of blessedness and life is realized. The four-cornered shape of the cloth of which the coat was made was for a sign that the one wearing it belonged to the kingdom of God.

The cap resembled in shape the calyx of a flower and pointed to the blooming character, i.e., the fresh vigorous life, of him who wore it. Hence the priest was forbidden to remove this headdress, but was to tie it on, lest it should fall off by accident; for, as the cap represented a flower, its falling off would have a significant resemblance to the falling of a flower (Ps. 103:15; Isa. 40:6–8; James 1:10; 1 Pet. 1:24).

The sash put on by an oriental when about to do active work was the priestly sign of service and typical of the towel-girded Christ, who in washing the feet of the disciples proved that He “did not come to be served, but to serve” (Mark 10:45). Consequently it was of the same colors and wrought in the same style as the veils of the sanctuary, in order to show that the wearer was an office bearer and administrator in the kingdom of God.

5. Dress and Anointing of the High Priest. The particular articles of the dress of the high priest had a distinctive symbolical meaning, as did his anointing. See also High Priest, Dress of.

Woven of blue yarn and in one piece, the upper robe indicated entireness of spiritual integrity, the blue pointing to the heavenly origin and character of the office. As every Israelite was to wear tassels of blue on the hem of his robe to remind him of the law (Num. 15:38–39), we may infer that in the fringe of pomegranates and little bells there lay some reference to the word and testimony of God; and that the tinkling of the bells was to be heard by the high priest to remind him that his calling was to be the representative, guardian, and promulgator of God's commandments.

Wearing the robe, the high priest appeared as the depository and organ of the word, and he could directly approach Jehovah only when clad in the robe of God's word, as the organ of that divine testimony on which covenant fellowship with the Lord was based.

The two parts of which the ephod consisted were called shoulders. It was upon the shoulder that the burden of the office rested, upon it the insignia of office was worn (Isa. 22:22). The principal function of the high priest was to appear before God as the reconciling mediator on behalf of the people; to show that this duty devolved upon him, he wore upon the shoulders of the ephod the names of the twelve tribes engraved upon two onyx stones. The breastpiece, with the names of the twelve tribes engraved on precious stones, with the Urim and Thummim in its pocket, was the breastplate of judgment. By this the high priest was distinguished as the judicial representative of Israel, bearing the people upon his heart, not merely to keep them in mind, but being, as it were, blended together with them by a living sympathy, to intercede with them before Jehovah.

In the Urim and Thummim (which see, under Urim) the high priest had a means through which God would communicate to him in every case in which the congregation needed divine light in order to know how to act; thus he had a measure of illumination as would enable him to maintain or reestablish the rights of Israel when they were disputed or infringed (Num. 27:21).

The significance of the headdress was not so much in its being a turban instead of the cap of the ordinary priests, as in the diadem with its description. The meaning of this diadem lies in its being designated a crown (Ex. 29:6; 39:30; Lev. 8:9; also the king's crown, 2 Sam. 1:10; 2 Kings 11:12), indicating that its wearer was the crowned one among his brethren, the supreme spiritual head of the priesthood. This was a holy crown bearing the inscription "Holy to the Lord." He who was thus crowned was consecrated to Jehovah (Ps. 106:10) and was required to wear the badge of his holiness upon his forehead. The high priest, in virtue of the holiness to the Lord conferred upon him, was to have the power to bear or take upon himself, and so to put away the sin that adhered to the people's gifts in consequence of their impurity, in order that those gifts might become acceptable to God, and the people in turn enjoy His favor (Ex. 28:38).

Being anointed with oil was symbolical of being endued with the Spirit of God (cf. 1 Sam. 10:1, 6; 16:13; Isa. 61); for the oil, with its power of giving light, furnished a significant symbol of the Spirit of God as the principle of spiritual light and life.

Typical. "All the requirements necessary to qualify for the office of the priest had a typical meaning in the fact that they were insufficient duly to sanctify the priests and to constitute them mediators between the holy God and the sinful people. Freedom from outward defect, cleansing of the body, investing with the official robes, nor the anointing with oil, could be said to purify the inward nature, but only served to represent a state of outward purity, without, however, truly and permanently producing even this. Consequently, the Levitical priests were required to repeat the washing of hands and feet every day before entering upon service at the altar or going into the holy place. On the Day of Atonement the high priest had to offer a sin offering for himself and the rest of the priests before he could perform similar service for the congregation, and make atonement for them before God. If, therefore, a priest who was holy, blameless, undefiled, and separate from sinners was alone qualified to represent sinners before God, and make atonement for them, and if the priests of the Old Testament did not really possess these attributes, but could only be said to be invested with them in a symbolical form in virtue of certain divine prescriptions and promises, it followed that the various regulations as to the qualifications of the priests for the exercise of the functions intrusted to them could have been designed merely as a divine arrangement whereby to foreshadow the nature and character of Him who was to be the true priest and high priest. Accordingly they must have been intended to prepare the way for the realization of the insufficiency of the Levitical priesthood for adequately representing the sinful people before the holy God, and typically to point to the future appearing of the perfect Mediator, who would redeem the people of Israel from all sin, invest them with true sanctification, and make them a genuine kingdom of priests" (Keil, Arch., 2:240).

PRINCE, PRINCESS. The rendering of a large number of Heb. and Gk. words, although the English terms prince and princess are more frequent in the KJV, the NASB and NIV sometimes replacing prince with leader (Num. 1:44; 4:34; 7:42; 31:13), ruler (1 Kings 20:14), official (1 Kings 4:1–6), or satrap (Dan. 6:1).

PRINCIPALITIES (Gk. archē, “first,” and so “rule, magistracy”). Used by Paul of angels and demons who were invested with power (Rom. 8:38), elsewhere rendered “rulers” (Eph. 1:21; 3:10; 6:12; Col. 1:16; etc.).

PRINCIPLES. The elements, or rudiments, of any art, science, or discipline (Gk. stoicheion, Heb. 5:12). In Heb. 6:1 (KJV) “principles” (from Gk. archē) refers to the fundamentals of the doctrine of Christ. The NASB reads “elementary teaching,” and the NIV, “elementary truths” and “elementary teachings,” respectively.

PRIS’CA (pris’ka; Lat. for “old woman”; 2 Tim. 4:19). See Priscilla.

PRISCIL’LA (pri-sil’a; Lat. for “little old woman,” diminutive of Prisca). The wife of Aquila (which see), in connection with whom she is always mentioned (Acts 18:2, 18, 26). She seems to have been in full accord with her husband in sustaining the “church that is in their house” (1 Cor. 16:19), in helping the apostle Paul (Acts 18:18), and in the theological teaching of Apollos (v. 26).

PRISON. In Egypt it is plain both that special places were used as prisons and that they were under the custody of a military officer (Gen. 40:3; 42:17). During the wandering in the desert we read on two occasions of confinement “in custody” (Lev. 24:12; Num. 15:34); but as imprisonment was not directed by the law, so we hear of none till the time of the kings, when the prison appears as an appendage to the palace or a special part of it (1 Kings 22:27). Later still it is distinctly described as being in the king’s house (Jer. 32:2; 37:21; Neh. 3:25, “court of the guard”). This was the case also at Babylon (2 Kings 25:27). But private houses were sometimes used as places of confinement (Jer. 37:15). Public prisons other than these, though in use by the Canaanite nations (Judg. 16:21, 25), were unknown in Judea previous to the captivity. Under the Herods we hear again of royal prisons attached to the palace, or in royal fortresses (Luke 3:20; Acts 12:4, 10). By the Romans Antonia was used as a prison at Jerusalem (23:10), and at Caesarea the Praetorium of Herod (v. 35). The most ancient prisons were simply water cisterns, out of which, since the sides came nearly together above, one could not easily escape unaided (Gen. 37:20, 22). See Punishment.

Figurative. Prison is used as a symbol of deep affliction (Ps. 142:7), of hell (Rev. 20:7), bondage to sin and Satan (Isa. 42:7; 61:1).

PRISONER. See Punishment.

PRIZE (Gk. brabeion, “award”). A reward bestowed on victors (1 Cor. 9:24; Phil. 3:14) in the public games (which see) of the Greeks.

PROCH’ORUS (prok’o-rus; Gk. for “leader in a choric dance,”) Procorus (NIV). The third on the list of deacons following Stephen and Philip (Acts 6:5), A.D. 33. This is the only mention of him made in the NT. There is a tradition that he was consecrated bishop of Nicomedia by the apostle Peter.

PROCLAMATION. The rendering of several Heb. words, denoting to call, or cry aloud, to express the publishing of the edict of a governing power in a formal manner. The laws of Moses, as well as the temporary edicts of Joshua, were communicated to the people by means of the genealogists, but those of the kings were proclaimed publicly by criers (Jer 34:8, 9; Jonah 3:5–7; cf. Dan. 3:4; 5:29). See Preacher, Preaching.

PROC’ORUS. See Prochorus.

PROFANE (Heb. from hālāl, to “open, give access to”; Gk. bebēloō, “to desecrate”). To profane is to make common, to defile, since holy things were not open to the people, e.g., a sanctuary (Lev. 19:8; 21:9), the Sabbath (Ex. 31:14), the name of God (Lev. 19:12), a father’s bed by incest (Gen. 49:4). In the NIV, these passages translate as either “defile” or “desecrate.” Esau, by despising his birthright, was called a “profane person” (KJV, Heb. 12:16; “godless,” NASB and NIV). In Jer. 23:11 (KJV) it is said “both prophet and priest are profane,” i.e., polluted (so NASB; Heb. ḥānēp, “defiled,” “polluted”; NIV, “godless”), implying the strongest opposite of holiness.

PROGNOSTICATORS. See Magic: Various Forms.

PROMISE. A solemn assertion, by which one pledges his veracity that he will perform, or cause to be performed, that which he mentions (1 Kings 8:56; 2 Chron. 1:9; Ps. 77:8).

Promises differ from the commands of God, the former being significations of the divine will concerning a duty to be performed, whereas the latter relate to mercies to be received. Some promises are predictions, as the promise of the Messiah and the blessings of the gospel (Rom. 4:13–14; Gal. 3:14–29). Hence the Hebrews were called the “children of the promise” (Rom. 9:8; Gal. 4:28), as all true believers in Christ are called those “who through faith and patience inherit the promises” (Heb. 6:12); “heirs of the promise” (v. 17). There are four classes of promises mentioned in Scripture: (1) those relating to the Messiah; (2) those relating to the church; (3) those relating to the Gentiles; and (4) those relating to Israel as a nation, now nationally set aside (Rom. 11:1–24), but yet to be restored (Ezek. 37:1–14; Zech. 8:1–12).

PROPERTY. See Law of Moses: Civil Division.

PROPHECY. The oral or written message of a prophet.

The Nature of Prophecy. The predictive element was a frequent part of the content of the prophet’s message. But this is not the only element. The prophets frequently appeared in the role of social and political reformers, stirring preachers of righteousness and religious revivalists in addition to being predictors of judgment or blessing, as the occasion demanded. The prophet’s message was ever religious and spiritual, announcing the will of God to men and calling for complete obedience. Often the prophetic element shone out in the prophet’s preaching and writing. This element cannot be dispensed with as some modern critics would think. Neither can the opposite extreme of regarding the prophet’s message as solely predictive be defended as tenable. Prophetic prognostication was not mere foretelling to appeal to idle curiosity nor even to maintain the integrity of the prophet, although that was occasionally the case (cf. Deut. 18:22). The genius of prophecy was rather a prediction of the future arising from the conditions of the present and was inseparably connected with the profoundly religious and spiritual message the prophet was called to proclaim to his own generation.

Besides being moral and spiritual in its purpose and frequently predictive in content, OT prophecy was coeval with the beginning of redemptive history. Critics commonly limit prophecy to the writing prophets and make it a comparatively late development in Israel, confining it to the eighth century or later, but prophecy and written prophetic oracles go back to the most ancient times and are coeval with the beginning of divine revelation (cf. the first prophecy of a divine Redeemer, Gen. 3:15–16). Enoch, the seventh from Adam, was a prophet (Jude 14–15). Noah uttered prophetic oracles (Gen. 9:25–27), Abraham was a prophet (20:7). Moses was a prophet in a very special sense (Num. 12:6–8) and a type of Christ, “the Prophet” par excellence (Deut. 18:18; John 6:14; 7:40). Prophecy occurred in the time of the Judges (Judg. 4:4). There was a dearth of prophetic vision in the time of Samuel (1 Sam. 3:1). Until the close of OT prophecy under Malachi, prophecy was continuously operative in Israel. It rose to great literary heights in Isaiah and Jeremiah. Moreover, prophecy was of divine origin. The various titles for the prophets in the original language, such as rō’eh (1 Sam. 9:9), ḥōzeh (2 Sam. 24:11), and nābî (1 Sam. 9:9), and the manner in which they received their message indisputably pointed to the divine authority and origin of their message.

Biblical Concept of Prophecy. Scripture plainly presents prediction as a manifestation of God's power glorifying His Person, exalting His redemptive work in Christ, and setting forth the divine character of His revealed Word. The words of fulfilled prophecies with regard to the first advent of Christ speak of the wisdom and power of God in interposing for man's need. Scripture not only presents the prophetic word as a demonstration of God's power and wisdom, but it presents His response to man's need. Since man is ignorant of what a day may bring forth, the revelation of God's will for the present and the disclosure of His plans and purposes for the future are of inestimable benefit to the believer. In the light of these facts, widespread neglect of biblical prophecy is not only tragic but inexcusable.

Rules for Interpretation of Prophecy. The prophetic portions of Scripture, constituting about one-fourth of its content, demand careful treatment if one is to avoid excesses and abuses in the study of prophecy.

1. Select a workable system of prophetic interpretation. One ought to investigate thoroughly the available systems, such as premillennialism, amillennialism, and postmillennialism. He must not rest until he is thoroughly persuaded that the system he adopts is the correct one.

2. Fix upon the background of the prophecies. Many details of the historical background are necessary to see the prophecy in its full sweep and meaning. Neglect of simple matters of history and light from archaeology may result in serious deficiency in interpretation.

3. Observe the context of prophecy. Its immediate setting must be carefully scrutinized and no interpretation permitted that will violate the immediate context. Moreover, the remote text must be handled just as diligently. Each individual prophecy must be related in the widest context to the full sweep of God's purposes from eternity past to eternity future.

4. Pursue normal literal interpretation rather than the mystical. A good rule is as follows: "When the plain sense of Scripture makes common sense, seek no other sense; therefore, take every word at its primary, usual literal meaning unless it is patently a rhetorical figure, or unless the immediate context, studied in the light of related passages and axiomatic and fundamental truths, clearly points otherwise."

5. Determine the correct relationship between the form of prophecy and the ideas conveyed by it. Satisfaction of one's thinking on this line will determine whether the interpreter is attracted to a premillennial, amillennial, or postmillennial interpretation. Whatever system he adopts, he must satisfy himself that his system of interpretation resolves the difficulties and meets the requirements of the specific details and not merely of generalization. Inductive logic must take precedence over inductive reasoning in the interpretation of prophecy and Scripture in general. See Prophet. M.F.U.

PROPHET. One who is divinely inspired to communicate God's will to His people and to disclose the future to them.

Names. The general Heb. word for prophet is nābî, from the verb nābā; cf. Akkad. nabū, "to announce, call a declarer, announcer." The primary idea of a prophet, therefore, is a declarer, announcer, one who utters a communication. The great majority of biblical critics prefer the active sense of announcing, pouring forth the declarations of God. Two other Heb. words, rō·eh and hōzeh, are used to designate the prophet, both meaning “one who sees,” and sometimes rendered “seer.” The three words occur in 1 Chron. 29:29, where they seem to be contrasted with each other: “Now the acts of King David, from first to last, are written in the chronicles of Samuel the seer [rō·eh], in the chronicles of Nathan the prophet [nābî], and in the chronicles of Gad the seer [hōzēh].” Rō·eh occurs twelve times (1 Sam. 9:11, 18–19; 2 Sam. 15:27; 1 Chron. 9:22; 26:28; 29:29; 2 Chron. 16:7, 10; Isa. 30:10), and in seven of these it is applied to Samuel. It was superseded in general use by the word nābî, by which Samuel was designated as well as by rō·eh (1 Sam. 3:20; 2 Chron. 35:18), and which seems to have been revived after a period of disuse (1 Sam. 10:5, 10–12; 19:20, 24). Hāzôn is the word consistently used for the prophetic vision and is found in Samuel, Chronicles, Psalms, Proverbs, and in most of the Prophets. Whether there is any difference in the usage of these words and, if any, what that difference is, has been much debated. On the whole, it would seem that the same persons are designated by the three words. Sometimes the prophets are called watchmen, Heb. šōpîm (Jer. 6:17; Ezek. 3:17; 33:2, 6–7); shōmēr, a watchman (Isa. 21:11; 62:6); and rō·eh, “pastoral,” a shepherd (Zech. 11:5, 16). The word is uniformly translated in the LXX by prophētēs and in the NASB and NIV by “prophet.” In classical Gk. prophētēs signifies “one who speaks for another,” especially “one who speaks for a god” and so interprets his will to man. Hence its essential meaning is “an interpreter.” The use of the word prophētēs in its modern sense is postclassical, and is derived from the LXX. From the medieval use of the word prophēteia (“prophecy”) passed into the English language in the sense of prediction, and this sense it has retained as its popular meaning. The larger sense of interpretation has not, however, been lost. In fact the English word prophet, like the word inspiration, has always been used in a larger and in a closer sense.

The Prophetic Order. The prophetic institution was not a temporary expedient, but provision was made for it in the law. That the Israelites might not consult with false prophets, such as diviners, observers of times, and enchanters, Moses gave the promise (Deut. 18:15) “The Lord your God will raise up for you a prophet like me from among you” (cf. vv. 16–22). Although this passage evidently refers to the Messiah, it does not exclude its reference to a succession of prophets, between Moses and Christ, running parallel with the kingdom of Israel. The Scriptures do not represent an unbroken series of prophets, each inducted into office by his predecessor, being silent on this point save in the cases of Joshua and Elisha, who were respectively inducted into office by Moses and Elijah. The prophets are described as deriving their prophetic office immediately from God, and not to have attached much importance to a series of incumbents, each receiving his commission from another or from others.

From the days of Joshua to Eli “visions were infrequent” (1 Sam. 3:1), for during the time of the Judges the priesthood, which was originally the instrument through which Israel was taught and governed in spiritual things, had sadly degenerated. The people were no longer affected by the acted lessons of the ceremonial service. They needed warnings and exhortations that were less enigmatic. Under these circumstances a new moral power was evoked—the prophetic order. Samuel, himself a Levite, of the family of Kohath (1 Chron. 6:28), and almost certainly a priest, was the instrument used at once for effecting a reform in the priestly order (9:22) and for giving to the prophets a position of importance that they had never before held. Nevertheless, it is not to be supposed that Samuel created the prophetic order as a new thing before unknown. The germs both of the prophetic and regal order are found in the law as given to the Israelites by Moses (Deut. 13:1; 18:18, 20–22), but they were not yet developed because there was not yet the demand for them.

Schools. Samuel took measures to make his work of restoration permanent as well as effective for the moment. For this purpose he instituted companies, or colleges, of prophets. One we find in his lifetime at Ramah (1 Sam. 19:19–20); others afterward at Bethel (2 Kings 2:3), Jericho (2:5), Gilgal (4:38), and elsewhere (6:1). Into them were gathered promising students, and there they were trained for the office that they were afterward destined to fulfill. So successful were these institutions that from the time of Samuel to the closing of the canon of the OT there seems never to have been wanting an adequate supply of men to keep up the line of official prophets. Their chief subject of study was, no doubt, the law and its interpretation—oral, as distinct from symbolical, teaching being henceforward tacitly transferred from the priestly to the prophetic order. Subsidiary subjects of instruction were music and sacred poetry, both of which had been connected with prophecy from the time of Moses (Ex. 15:20) and the Judges (Judg. 4:4; 5).

Manner of Life. The mode of life led by the prophets seems to have been subject to no uniform and rigid law, but, doubtless, changing according to circumstances. It must not be taken for granted that there was any peculiar dress adopted by them because of the instances of Elijah and John the Baptist's wearing hairy garments. Nor from their manner of living are we to conclude that all adopted an ascetic mode of life. Sometimes, perhaps as an example, or because of persecution, they lived in poverty (1 Kings 14:3; 2 Kings 4:1, 38, 42; 6:5). It is probable that the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews (11:37–38) alludes to the sufferings and privation of the prophets, a vivid description of which is given in the accounts of Elijah, Elisha, and Jeremiah (Jer. 20). Their persecution and consequent suffering did not arise from opposition to them as a distinct class, leading an unsociable, ascetic mode of life, but from opposition to their faithful ministry.

Prophetic Function. Robertson observes: "The prophets had a practical office to discharge. It was part of their commission to show the people of God 'their transgressions and the house of Jacob their sins' (Isa. 58:1; Ezek. 22:2; 43:10; Mic. 3:8). They were, therefore, pastors and ministerial monitors of the people of God. It was their duty to admonish and reprove, to denounce prevailing sins, to threaten the people with the terrors of divine judgment, and to call them to repentance. They also brought the message of consolation and pardon (Isa. 40:1–2). They were the watchmen set upon the walls of Zion to blow the trumpet, and timely warning of approaching danger (Ezek. 3:17; 33:7–9; Jer. 6:17; Isa. 62:6). Their function differed from that of the priests, the latter approaching God in behalf of men by means of sacrifice, the former coming to men as ambassadors from God, beseeching them to turn from their evil ways and live. The prophets do not seem to have had any official relation to the government, exerting an influence upon rulers and state affairs, not as officers of the state, but as special messengers from God. Nor must it be inferred that the prophetic and priestly classes were antagonistic. There were times when the priesthood settled down to formality and routine, or exercised their office for gain. At such time the prophetic voice was raised in scathing rebukes, whose terms almost lead one to conclude that in the prophetic estimation the whole priestly order, and all the ceremonies over which they presided, were in the essence wrong. Yet even in the midst of such rebukes there is a tone of respect for the law, and a recognition of the sacred function of the priest. So, also, when we come to any crisis in the history in which a positive advance is made, we perceive that it is not by a conquest of one party over the other, but by the hearty cooperation of both, that the movement of reform or advance succeeds. Moses, the forerunner of the prophets, has Aaron the priest beside him; and Joshua is still surrounded by priests in the carrying out of his work.

Samuel is both priest and prophet; David and Solomon, in the same way, are served or admonished by both” (Early Religion of Israel, p. 461).

In addition to the declaration of God’s will, the denunciation of His judgments, the defense of truth and righteousness, and bearing testimony to the superiority of the moral to the ritual, prophecy had an intimate relation to God’s gracious purpose toward Israel (Mic. 5:4; 7:20; Isa. 60:3; 65:25).

Contents and Sphere. The function of the prophet, as already seen, was not merely the disclosure of the future, but included the exposition and application of the law, the declaration of God’s will. It thus contained two elements—the moral, or doctrinal, and the predictive. The doctrinal element of prophecy teaches “of the existence of an eternal, self-conscious, intelligent, moral, and voluntary Being, who does all things according to the purpose of his will. It ascribes to him all the attributes of such a Being in infinite perfection. It is more or less a commentary upon the doctrine of divine providence, by representing the future even, which it brings to view, as a part of that system of things in which the Creator is present by the direction of his power and the counsels of his wisdom, appointing the issues of futurity, as well as foreseeing the acting with his ‘mighty hand and outstretched arm,’ seen or unseen, ruling in the kingdom of men, and ordering all things in heaven and earth” (Charles Elliott, Old Testament Prophecy, p. 44).

The prophets teach respecting man that he was created by God (Mal. 2:10); has a common origin; has the power of reason (Isa. 1:18); has a capacity for holiness, knowledge, and progress (2:3–5); is ruined and cannot save himself (Hos. 13:9; Jer. 2:22; 13:23); is a subject of God’s moral government and owes entire obedience to His law (Dan. 4:34–35; Ezek. 18:4–5, 9; Isa. 1:19–20; 23:11–16); and, lastly, must render worship and homage to God (Isa. 60:6–7; Mal. 1:11; 3:10). All duties arising out of human relations are also clearly stated and enforced. The prophets, moreover, inculcated, with remarkable clearness and decision, the doctrines of faith and repentance (Isa. 26:3–4; 55:7; Ezek. 14:6; 18:30; 36:31).

By the sphere of prophecy is meant both the parties to whom it was given and the objects that it more immediately contemplated. Its proper sphere, especially in its stricter sense of containing preintimations of good things to come, is the nation Israel in relation to the coming Messiah and the manner in which this relationship affects both the Jew and Gentile. The church, born on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2), is not in view in the OT Prophets but was a special mystery revealed to the apostle Paul (Eph. 3:1–10; Rom. 16:25). Future Gentile salvation was clearly revealed in the OT, but not the “mysteries of the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 13:11) that concern this present age. The bulk of OT prophecy concerns Israel’s future national conversion and restoration in the coming millennial kingdom inaugurated at the second advent of Christ (Isa. 35; Zech. 14; etc.).

Prophecy is not intended to open the future to idle curiosity but is for the higher purpose of furnishing light to those whose faith needs confirming. The revelation of future events may be needful in times of discouragement to awaken or sustain hope, to inspire confidence in the midst of general backsliding, and to warn of evil threatening the faithful. The predictions against Babylon, Tyre, Egypt, Nineveh, and other kingdoms were delivered to the people of God to comfort them, by revealing to them the fate of their enemies.

The prophecy of Jonah against Nineveh seems to be exceptional. He was sent to a pagan power to denounce the judgments of God against it. He did not, in his own land and among his own people, preach against Nineveh, but he entered the great city itself and delivered his message there. Thus his was a typical character, and his mission to Nineveh may have been typical of Israel to be “a light to the nations,” and was thus intended to remind ancient Israel of the mission that it had neglected and forgotten.

Prophetic Inspiration. The Scriptures teach that the prophets received their communications by the agency of the Spirit of God. When the seventy elders were appointed the Lord said to Moses, "I will take of the Spirit who is upon you, and will put Him upon them" (Num. 11:17, 25). Samuel said to Saul, "Then the Spirit of the Lord will come upon you mightily, and you shall prophesy with them and be changed into another man" (1 Sam. 10:6). "Then Saul sent messengers to take David, but when they saw the company of the prophets prophesying, with Samuel standing and presiding over them, the Spirit of God came upon the messengers of Saul; and they also prophesied" (19:20). According to Peter (2 Pet. 1:21), "no prophecy was ever made by an act of human will, but men moved by the Holy Spirit spoke from God."

The false prophets were those who "speak a vision of their own imagination, not from the mouth of the Lord" (Jer. 23:16); "foolish prophets who are following their own spirit and have seen nothing" (Ezek. 13:3). The true prophet was God's spokesman to man, communicating what he had received from God (Ex. 4:16; 7:1-2).

The modes of communication between God and man are clearly stated on the occasion of the sedition of Aaron and Miriam: "When they had both come forward, He said, 'Hear now My words: If there is a prophet among you, I, the Lord, shall make Myself known to him in a vision. I shall speak with him in a dream. Not so, with My servant Moses, he is faithful in all My household; with him I speak mouth to mouth, even openly, and not in dark sayings, and he beholds the form of the Lord'" (Num. 12:5-8). Three modes are given here: (1) vision, (2) dream, (3) direct communication and manifestation, the highest form being the last, and reserved for Moses. In this he resembled Christ, of whom he was a type. The other two were lower forms, whose comparative rank it is perhaps impossible to determine.

The state of the prophet while under the influence of the Holy Spirit has been a matter of considerable comment. Philo and the Alexandrine school held that the prophet was in a state of entire unconsciousness when under such influence. Athenagoras held that the prophets were entranced and deprived of their natural powers, "the Spirit using them as instruments, as a flute player might blow a flute." Montanus held the same theory: "The Almighty ruled alone in the prophet's soul, whose own self-consciousness retired back. God, therefore, spoke from the soul of the prophet, of which he took entire possession, as if in his own name." But such a theory identifies Jewish prophecy, in all essential points, with heathen divination. When the diviners of the heathen world were under the influence of inspiration, they were supposed to be in a state of mind expressed by the Gk. term ekstasis, i.e., a trance, their faculties held in complete abeyance. Such a state of mind was regarded as a natural and necessary sign of inspiration, the subject exhibiting the outward signs of violent excitement, resembling insanity.

The Hebrew prophets were not distinguished by such peculiarities. They were not subject to amentia, neither were they placed, as Montanus taught, in an altogether passive relation to the divine influence; but they were possessed of intelligent self-consciousness. They did not lose their self-possession but spoke with a full apprehension of existing circumstances. At the same time the mind of the prophet seems to have been raised above its ordinary condition, and he sometimes adopted measures to prepare himself for prophesying (see 2 Kings 3:15; 1 Sam. 10:5; 1 Chron. 25:1). The mind of the prophet was passive while he received divine communications in visions and in dreams; but in the announcement of their visions and dreams the prophets were in full possession of intelligent self-consciousness. They were conscious that they had a divine commission, that they were sent by God to communicate His purposes; and, accordingly, they prefaced their prophetic utterances by the formulae "the hand of the Lord was strong on me" (Ezek. 3:14; cf. 1:3; 33:22); "the vision of ..." (Isa. 1:1; Ezek. 1:1); "declares the Lord" (Jer. 1:8, 19; 2:19; 30:11; Amos 2:11; 4:5); "the word of the Lord came to ..." (Jonah 1:1; cf. Joel 1:1).

As for the question as to whether or not the prophets had a full knowledge of what they predicted, it would seem that their understandings were not so miraculously enlarged as to grasp the whole of the divine counsels that they were commissioned to enunciate. We have, as Oehler says, the testimony of the prophets themselves to this effect (Dan. 12:8; Zech. 4:5; 1 Pet. 1:10–11).

Prophetic Style. A writer's characteristic manner of expression we call his style. The sacred writers form no exception; each one maintains his individuality; and it is therefore perfectly proper to speak of the style of Isaiah, Jeremiah, etc. But apart from the style that is the expression of the mental and moral idiosyncrasies of the prophets there is a style that characterizes them as prophets. This arises from the method of prophetic revelation. When inspired of God their intellectual and emotional nature was quickened. They knew by intuition, and their hearts glowed with seraphic ardor. They were in the region of spirit as contradistinguished from that of sense and time. At the same time they retained their personal characteristics and native susceptibilities. We find that prophecy made large use of the present and past condition of the nation and of the Levitical institutions and ceremonies, as symbols in presenting good things to come: (1) the future was described in terms of the past (Hos. 8:13; 9:3; 11:5; cf. Rev. 2:14, 20); (2) great use was made of the present, and especially of the standpoint and personal circumstances of the one through whom the prophecy was given, to illustrate the future (Ezek. 48:35; cf. Rev. 21:22); (3) frequently the prophetic style received its completion and coloring from the diversified circumstances of the parties addressed and of the prophet himself (Dan. 8–9); and (4) the poetical element arose from the ecstatic condition of the prophet; but, as it was the primary aim of the Hebrew religious teachers to influence the heart and conscience, that poetical element, though never entirely suppressed, was held in restraint to further the ends of spiritual instruction.

PROPTIATION. The divine side of the work of Christ on the cross. Christ's atoning death for the world's sin altered the whole position of the human race in its relationship to God, for God recognizes what Christ accomplished in behalf of the world whether men enter into the blessings of it or not. The cross has rendered God propitious toward the unsaved as well as toward the erring saint (1 John 2:2). The fact that Christ has borne all sin renders God propitious. The Gk. words dealing with the doctrine of propitiation are hilasmos, signifying what our Lord became for the sinner (1 John 2:2; 4:10); hilastērion, denoting the place of propitiation (Rom. 3:25; cf. Heb. 9:5); and hilaskomai, indicating that God has become gracious, or propitious (Luke 18:13; Heb. 2:17). In this present age since the death of Christ, God does not have to be asked to be propitious, because He has become so through the death of Christ. To ask Him thus to become propitious, in view of Christ's sacrifice, manifests unbelief. In the OT the Mercy Seat in the Holy of Holies could be made a place of propitiation by sacrifice (Heb. 9:5). Now, however, the blood-sprinkled body of Christ on the cross has become the Mercy Seat for sinners once and for all. The Mercy Seat is thus a continual throne of grace. What otherwise would be an awful judgment throne becomes an altar of infinite mercy. The prayer of the publican (Luke 18:13), "God, be merciful to me, the sinner!" better translated, "God, be Thou propitiated to me, the sinner," was not a request for mercy as though God had to be persuaded to be propitious. Rather, it was expressive of the relationship then existing between God and the OT covenant people of God on the ground of offered sacrifice, when God was requested to be propitious on a special basis. Now the believer can rejoice that God is propitiated. To believe this is to enter into the benefits of it. M.F.U.

PROSELYTE (Gk. prosēlutos, a “newcomer”). The English term is found only in the NT, the Heb. gēr being rendered “alien,” sometimes “sojourner” and “stranger.” From the time of the covenant between Jehovah and Abraham, Israel had been a distinctive people, whose mission it was to proclaim among the nations that Jehovah alone was God. There were at all times strangers living in Israel to whom the Mosaic law did not grant the rights of citizenship, but to whom it did extend toleration and certain privileges, for which it obliged them to comply with certain of the religious enactments prescribed to Israel. They were required not to blaspheme the name of Jehovah (Lev. 24:16), not to indulge in idolatrous worship (20:2), not to commit acts of indecency (18:26), not to work on the Sabbath (Ex. 20:10), not to eat leavened bread during the celebration of the Passover (12:19), and not to eat blood or the flesh of animals that had died a natural death or had been torn by wild beasts (Lev. 17:10, 15).

Naturalization of. Should such strangers wish to become citizens, the law sanctioned their admission on the condition of their being circumcised. They thus bound themselves to observe the whole law and were admitted to the full privileges and blessings of the people of the covenant (Ex. 12:48, 49; cf. Rom. 9:4). The exceptions to strangers thus freely admitted were the Ammonites and Moabites, who were to be strictly excluded to the tenth generation (i.e., forever), and the Edomites, whose sons were not to be admitted until the third generation (Deut. 23:3, 7–8). The reason assigned for these exceptions was that those nations had shown unfriendliness to the Israelites when they left Egypt.

In Canaan. Among the proselytes at the time of the entrance into Canaan, the Kenites were the most conspicuous (Judg. 1:16). The presence of strangers was recognized in the solemn declaration of blessings and curses from Ebal and Gerizim (Josh. 8:33). The period after the conquest of Canaan was not favorable to the admission of proselytes, the people having no strong faith, no commanding position. The Gibeonites (9:16–27) furnish the only instance of conversion, and their position was rather that of slaves than of free proselytes.

Under the Monarchy. During the monarchy some foreigners rose to power and fortune, but they were generally treated by David and Solomon as a subject class brought under a system of compulsory labor from which others were exempted (1 Chron. 22:2; 2 Chron. 2:17–18). As some compensation for their sufferings they became the special objects of the care and sympathy of the prophets. During the period of the monarchy, when Israel developed into a powerful state, many foreigners were attracted for the sake of political and commercial relations. Foreign influence increased still more when Israel lost its independence and was made subject to heathen powers, whose yoke the Israelites were never able to remove, except for a somewhat limited period. In such circumstances, in which there was no longer any bond of national unity, the religious fellowship that the law, with its ceremonial regulations, had created among the people developed into an inward bond of union that every day became only more firmly knit. Notwithstanding the stiff formalism of Pharisaic piety, still the spirit that had animated the law and the prophets was able to resist the corrupting influence of an effete heathenism and to attract a considerable number of Gentiles, leading them to seek in the religion of the Jews the salvation that their own gods and idolatrous worship were unable to afford.

Consequently, the Talmud and the rabbinical teachers distinguished two classes of proselytes. Proselytes of the gate were Gentile strangers who, while they lived among the Jews, had bound themselves to observe the seven Noachian precepts: six prohibitions—those against idolatry, blasphemy, bloodshed, uncleanness, theft, and eating flesh with the blood; and a seventh, positive command—that of obedience to God. Proselytes of righteousness (or proselytes of the covenant) were those who had been formally admitted to participation in the theocratic covenant and had professed their adherence to all the doctrines and precepts of the Mosaic law. The rabbis gave three essentials for admission of males as proselytes to Judaism—circumcision, baptism, and a sacrifice; for females, baptism and sacrifice. Baptism was probably an adaptation of ablution or bathing in water, such as we may well suppose would in every case accompany the circumcision of a Gentile, the law forbidding the unclean to take part in any religious ceremony until they had bathed in water (Ex. 19:10).

“If the baptism of proselytes was of so late an origin, then it is, of course, impossible that the baptism of John and Christian baptism can have been borrowed from it. It is much more likely that the Jews, after the discontinuance of the temple worship, may have taken occasion from Christian baptism to transform the customary bathing with water that was required [for] purification, and which the person to be purified had to perform himself, into a formal act of baptism having the character of a rite of initiation” (Keil, Arch., 1:427).

After the Captivity. The proselytism of the period following the captivity was, for the most part, the conformity, not of a subject race, but of willing adherents. As early as the return from Babylon there is evidence that persons were drawn to a faith they recognized as holier than their own. With the extension of the Roman Empire, the Jews became more widely known and their power to proselytize increased. In most of the large cities of the empire there were men who had been rescued from idolatry and its attendant debasements and had been brought under the power of a higher moral law. The converts who were thus attracted joined, with varying strictness, in the worship of the Jews. In Palestine even Roman centurions learned to love the conquered nation, built synagogues (Luke 7:5), feasted, prayed, and gave alms (Acts 10:2, 30), and became preachers of the new faith to their soldiers (v. 7).

Then to almost every Jewish community there was attached a following of “God-fearing proselytes” (Acts 13:43), Gentiles who adopted the Jewish mode of worship and attended the synagogues but who in the observance of the ceremonial law restricted themselves to certain leading points and so were regarded as outside the fellowship of the Jewish communities.

Proselytism had its dark side; the Jews of Palestine were eager to spread their faith by the same weapons as those with which they had defended it. The Edomites had the alternative of death, exile, or circumcision, and the Ithraeans were converted in the same way. Where force was not used, converts were sought by the most unscrupulous fraud; the vices of the Jew were engrafted on those of the heathen. Their position was pitiable; at Rome and other large cities they were the butt of popular scurrility, bound to make public confession and pay a special tax. Among the Jews proselytes to Judaism gained but little honor, being looked upon with suspicion, as converted Jews often are now. The better rabbis did their best to guard against such evils. Anxious to exclude all unworthy converts, they grouped them, according to their motives, with a somewhat quaint classification. Love-proselytes were those who had been drawn to Judaism by the hope of gaining the beloved one. Man-for-woman, or Woman-for-man, proselytes were proselytes who had converted to the religion of a spouse, husband or wife. Esther-proselytes were those who conformed to Judaism in order to escape danger, as in the original Purim (Esther 8:17). King’s-table-proselytes were led to convert by the hope of court favor and promotion, such as must have been the case of many of the converts under David and Solomon. Lion-proselytes were those whose conversion originated in a superstitious dread of a divine judgment, as with the Samaritans of 2 Kings 17:26. None of these was regarded as fit for admission within the covenant (Smith, Bib. Dict.; Schürer, History of the Jewish People in the Time of Christ).

PROVERB (Heb. māshāl, “to be like”). In the early stages of social intellectual growth, when men begin to observe and generalize on the facts of human life, they clothe the results of observation in the form of short and pithy sentences. Every race not in savage condition has proverbs of this kind. The Heb. word rendered “proverb” has a special significance. The proverb of the Israelites and other people of the East was primarily and essentially a “similitude.” It was thus a condensed parable or fable, capable at any time of being expanded, sometimes presented with the lesson clearly taught, sometimes involved in greater or less obscurity, that its very difficulty might stimulate the desire to know and so impress the lesson more deeply on the mind. The proverb might be a “dark saying” requiring—and receiving—an interpretation, as for example is the case in Prov. 17:3, “The refining pot is for silver and the furnace for gold, but the Lord tests hearts,” a parable expanded in Mal. 3:3, “And He will sit as a smelter and purifier of silver, and He will purify the sons of Levi and refine them like gold and silver.” Other “dark sayings” are deliberately kept obscure, given without any interpretation, and capable of many. Such is the case with Prov. 1:17, “Indeed, it is useless to spread the net in the eyes of any bird.”

Individual proverbs are quoted in Scripture before there appears any collection of them. The saying “Out of the wicked comes forth wickedness” was a “proverb of the ancients” in the days of Saul (1 Sam. 24:13). An individual instance of strange inconsistency was generalized as a type of all like anomalies, and the question, “Is Saul also among the prophets?” became a proverb in Israel (10:11; 19:24). The inclination to transfer to others the guilt that has brought suffering to oneself is expressed in the proverb “The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children’s teeth are set on edge” (Jer. 31:29; cf. Ezek. 18:2), in both instances being condemned as an error.

The book of Job is full of short, pithy sayings of the proverb type, one of which became the motto of the book of Proverbs: “Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding” (Job 28:28). When Solomon came into contact with “the sons of the east” (1 Kings 4:30), whose wisdom clothed itself in this form, it was perfectly natural that he should express himself in and become the patron of maxims, precepts, and condensed parables in the shape of proverbs.

The Heb. word hîdâ, Hab. 2:6, has the meaning of a conundrum, something enigmatical. The passage is thus rendered by Keil and Delitzsch (Com.): “Will not all these lift up a proverb upon him, and a song, and a riddle upon him?”

The Lord Jesus employed proverbs in His teaching, such as “Physician, heal yourself” (Luke 4:23; cf. John 16:25, 29, marg.).

PROVERBS, BOOK OF. “The proverbs of Solomon the son of David, king of Israel” (1:1). The word proverb itself means “a sententious brief saying setting forth practical wisdom.” In the strictest sense it means a “repetition or comparison.” The LXX has “Proverbs or Parables” of Solomon. The Vulg. has Liber Proverbiorum. The book is part of the so-called Wisdom Literature of the OT.

Contents. The book consists of sententious sayings of practical wisdom and didactic poems of longer length. Not mere human wisdom is treated but divine wisdom, or God in revelation as Creator and goal of all things, is treated as well (cf. chap. 8).

Outline.

- I. Solomon’s proverbs (1:1–9:18)
 - A. Wisdom’s call (1:1–33)
 - B. Wisdom’s rewards (2:1–7:27)

Connection with Other Literature. The Proverbs of Amenemope of Egypt, who is dated variously between 1000 and 600 B.C., so closely resemble Prov. 22:17–25:22, usually considered non-Solomonic, that critics commonly see literary dependence of the latter (cf. O. Eissfeldt, Einleitung, p. 525). W. F. Albright, for instance, is of the persuasion that the Egyptian proverbs “were taken over, almost certainly through Phoenician intermediation” (Archaeology and the Religion of Israel [1942], p. 5). However, it may be said that both the author of this section of Proverbs and the Egyptian author may well have been influenced by a common third source. A much more probable and sounder view is that the biblical work is older, since Prov. 1–24 assuredly was regarded as Solomonic in Hezekiah’s time (eighth century B.C.).

Authorship and Date. Critics commonly ascribe little or none of the book to Solomon. Eissfeldt does this on the basis of Aramaisms, but Aram. elements may occur very early in Heb. literature as well as very late. It is now known that the inscription of Zakir, king of Hamath, around 800 B.C., is written in a mixture of Heb. and Aram. Two sections of the book of Proverbs are expressly attributed to Solomon (10:1–22:16; 25:1–29:27). Unless we view the introduction (1:1–6) as a later edition from the fifth or fourth century B.C., there is no reason for denying chaps. 1–9 to Solomon. The third section (22:17–24:34) is similar to the first (chaps. 1–9). This section does not seem to be intended as a separate division on the basis of authorship, for the expression “words of the wise” is not a title to a new section. The fourth section is described as being copied out by Hezekiah’s scribes, evidently from an old collection of Solomon’s sayings. Certainly this section was not composed by the scribes. Therefore, strong scriptural testimony exists that Solomon was the author of chaps. 1–29; that is, of the entire book except chap. 30 by Agur and chap. 31 by King Lemuel. First Kings 4:32, which attributes “3,000 proverbs” to Solomon, supports such a thesis, as does Solomon’s fame for wisdom (1 Kings 3:5–28; 10:1).

PROVIDENCE (Lat. providentia, “foreseeing”). A term that in theology designates the continual care that God exercises over the universe He has created. This includes the two facts of preservation and government.

The doctrine of providence is closely connected with that of creation. That God could create the world and then forsake it is inconceivable in view of the perfection of God. Accordingly, in the power and wisdom and goodness of the Creator declared in the Scriptures, we have the pledge of constant divine care over all parts of His creation. That idea finds expression in various places in both the OT and NT (e.g., Ps. 33:13, 15; Isa. 45:7; Acts 17:24–28). Thus there is sufficient explanation of the absence of any mention of providence in the Apostles' Creed. The great truth is implied in the declaration of faith "in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth." The faith of believers in revealed religion in all ages has been of the same character; and however often expressed it is still more frequently implied.

Belief in providence, although agreeable with and supported by reason, has its strongest ground in the truth of special divine revelation. It is not surprising that enlightened pagans, such as Cicero and Seneca, argued in its behalf. Even among the opponents of Christianity there have been those who have adhered to a belief in providence. For the idea of providence is not exclusively Christian but is a necessary feature of religion in general. Human history as a whole and the spectacle of the universe in particular furnish abundant illustrations, for broad observation and right reason preclude the idea of a government of the world by chance or blind force; rather, they sustain the belief that "there is a power in the world that makes for righteousness." In addition, the deep necessities of human nature and life are perpetually crying out "for the living God." That facts apparently opposed to faith at this point exist is what should be expected. For universal and perfect providence implies infinite knowledge; and "we know" only "in part." Every mind less than the infinite providence must have its mysteries. Our faith at this point, as at others, must therefore find its chief support and guidance from the Word of God.

The Scriptures bearing upon this subject are numerous and of great variety and force. Space does not admit here the attempt at reference. But aside from the large number of particular passages, the historical parts of the Bible are throughout illustrative of the great reality.

Five principles are of particular note in any discussion of the providence of God as it appears in the Scriptures. First, God's providence is unlimited. It includes all things and all creatures; it has respect to all that takes place in the universe (see e.g., Ps. 145:9–17). The distinction between great things and small, often unreasonable in view of the dependence of the great upon the small, is rightly regarded by the care of the infinite God. Things seemingly of only slight importance or accidental are under His overruling power (see, for example, 1 Kings 22:34; Esther 6:1; Matt. 6:26; 27:19; Luke 12:6–7; Acts 23:16).

Second, the exercise of God's providence nevertheless has respect to the nature of different objects. All objects cannot be alike precious in His sight. Thus there is ground in Scripture, as in reason, for the distinction between general and particular and special providence. Mankind holds a peculiar relation to God among all the works of His creation; and among mankind, the people of God, the faithful servants of His kingdom, are the objects of His special love and care (see Matt. 6:25–32; cf. Pss. 91:11–12; 147:19–20; Acts 14:16–17; Rom. 8:28–39). Thus Scripture clearly reveals God's special love and care of nationally elect Israel in the OT (Mal. 1:2–3) and of the church, the Body of Christ, in the NT (Eph. 1:3–23). Moreover, God's unbroken love to Israel is declared in Israel's future restoration after the period of Gentile visitation (Acts 15:14–16; Rom. 11:1–31). God's providential ways with Jew, Gentile, and the church of God (1 Cor. 10:32) must always be clearly differentiated.

Third, the constant and final aim of God's providence is the fulfillment of His purpose in creation. How broad and wonderful this is may defy our comprehension; but it is declared to be nothing less than the complete establishment of an all-embracing kingdom of God, under the rule of the Lord Jesus Christ (see Eph. 1:9–11; Col. 1:19–20).

Fourth, the particular steps in this divine process are often unintelligible to us, but the purpose of God is independent and eternal and is certain of its realization (see Ps. 97:2; Rom. 11:33–35; Eph. 1:4–5; etc.).

Fifth, belief in the providence of God, according to the whole purport of Scripture, is of the highest importance because of its connection with a life of trust and gratitude and patience and hope.

Upon the various philosophical speculations as to the methods of God in providence, and His relation to natural causes and to the free agency of man, we cannot here enter. For this we must refer the reader to the works mentioned below.

PROVINCE (Heb. mdînâ, “district” ruled by a judge; Gk. eparcheia).

In the OT the word province appears in connection with the wars between Ahab and Benhadad (1 Kings 20:14–15, 19), where it is observed that the victory of Ahab was gained chiefly “by the young men of the rulers of the provinces,” i.e., probably, of the leaders of tribes in the Gilead country.

More commonly in the OT province is used of the divisions of the Chaldean (Dan. 2:49; 3:1, 30) and the Persian (Ezra 2:1; Neh. 7:6; Esther 1:1, 22; 2:3) kingdoms. Several facts as to the administration of the Persian provinces come into view in those passages: Each province has its own governor, who communicates more or less regularly with the central authority for instructions (Ezra 4–5). Each province has its own system of finance, subject to the king’s direction (Herodotus 3.89). The total number of the provinces is given as 127 (Esther 1:1; 8:9). Through the whole extent of the kingdom there is carried something like a postal system. Lastly, the word is used of the smaller sections of a satrapy rather than of the satrapy itself.

The Gk. eparcheia (Acts 23:34; 25:1) is used of a region subject to a prefect; a province of the Roman Empire, either a larger province or an appendage to a larger one, as Palestine was to that of Syria. The classification given by Strabo (17, p. 840), recognized in the gospels and Acts, is that of provinces supposed to need military control and therefore placed under the immediate government of the Caesar, and those still belonging theoretically to the Republic and administered by the Senate; and of the latter again proconsular and praetorian. The right of any Roman citizen to appeal from a provincial governor to the emperor was asserted by Paul (Acts 25:1). In the council of 25:12 (Gk. sumboulion) we recognize the assessors who were appointed to take part in the judicial functions of the governor.

PROVOCATION. The rendering of several Heb. words and one Gk. word, with the meaning of bitterness, anger, strife. Provocation is used to designate the ungrateful, rebellious spirit and consequent conduct of the Israelites (Heb. 3:8, 15, KJV; “day of trial,” NASB, marg., “in the provocation”; NIV, “in the rebellion”). The expression in Job 17:2,

KJV King James Version

NASB New American Standard Bible

marg. margin, marginal reading

NIV New International Version

“my eye gazes on their provocation,” means that on the part of his friends Job sees nothing but disputings.

PRUDENCE, PRUDENT. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words, in all of which there is the underlying meaning of intelligence, understanding, and in the good sense of the word when allied with wisdom (Prov. 8:12).

PRUNING HOOK (Heb. mazmērâ, Isa. 2:4, 18:5; Joel 3:10; Mic. 4:3). A knife for pruning the vine.

PSALM. See Music.

PSALMS. Israel’s ancient collection of hymns of praise and worship, widely used in Temple and synagogue worship and particularly cherished by God’s people in every age. This collection of devotional material nearly always is found first in the third division of the Heb. canon called the Writings (cf. Luke 24:44, where it represents the entire third part of the Heb. canon).

Name. The ancient Hebrews called this collection Tehillim, that is, “songs of praise” or hymns. The fuller designation is Sefer Tehillim, that is, “the book of Psalms.” The expression psalms is from the Gk. term denoting “music on string instruments” or, more generally, “songs adapted to such music.”

Authorship. There are 150 psalms arranged in five books according to an ancient pre-Septuagint scheme. The beginning of each book is marked by Pss. 1, 42, 73, 90, and 107. Seventy-three psalms are ascribed to David in the Heb. titles. This explains the designation “the psalms of David.” Although modern critics such as Otto Eissfeldt, Robert Pfeiffer, Julius Beyer, and others customarily deny the Davidic authorship of the Psalms, there is ample internal evidence that David, the great poet and musician of Israel, was the principal author of the Psalter. This position, despite the contention of negative criticism, is indicated by the following reasons: (1) David’s name is famous in the OT period for music and song and is closely associated with holy liturgy (2 Sam. 6:5–15; 1 Chron. 16:4; 2 Chron. 7:6; 29:30). (2) David was especially endowed by the Holy Spirit (2 Sam. 23:1–2; Mark 12:36; Acts 2:25–31; 4:25–26). (3) David’s music and poetical gifts appear indelibly interwoven on the pages of OT history. He is called “the sweet psalmist of Israel” (2 Sam. 23:1). He was a skilled performer on the harp (1 Sam. 16:16–18). He was the author of the masterful elegy written upon the deaths of Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. 1:19–27). He is referred to as a model poet-musician by the prophet Amos (Amos 6:5). (4) Much internal evidence in the psalms themselves points to David’s authorship. Most of the songs attributed to him reflect some period of his life, such as Pss. 23, 51, and 57. In line with this evidence of Scripture, a number of the psalms indicate Davidic authorship. The common expression ledavid is normally construed as indicating Davidic authorship. (5) Certain psalms are cited as Davidic in Scripture in general. Acts 4:25–26 so cites Ps. 2. Acts 2:25–28 so cites Ps. 16; Rom. 4:6–8 cites Ps. 32. Acts 1:16–20 thus refers to Ps. 69, as does Rom. 11:9–10 (cf. Acts 1:20 with Ps. 109:6–20; also Matt. 22:44; Mark 12:36–37; Luke 20:42–44; Acts 2:34 with Ps. 110:1). In addition to the psalms ascribed to David, ancient tradition preserved in the superscription ascribes other psalms to Moses (Ps. 90), Solomon (Pss. 72 and 127), Heman (Ps. 88), Ethan (Ps. 89), Asaph (Pss. 50, 73–80), the sons of Korah (Pss. 42, 44–49, 84, 85, and 87). Forty-nine of the psalms are anonymous according to the Heb. text.

Composition and Date. Close affinity of many of the psalms with the style, forms, and expressions in the Ras Shamra epic poetry from ancient Ugarit, dating from the fourteenth century B.C., demonstrates the antiquity of those odes (cf. J. Patton, Canaanite Parallels in the Book of Psalms [1944]). Unless one’s thinking is distorted by the unsound presuppositions of the Wellhausen school, it is reasonable to view the bulk of the psalms as preexilic, some dating even from before the Davidic-Solomonic era. Even if one did concede that the book of Psalms in the precise form in which it has come down to us is a postexilic collection, there is not the slightest historical or archaeological reason to suppose with Pfeiffer that the great mass of the psalms was written between 400 and 100 B.C. or that “the real question with regard to the Psalter is not that it contains Maccabaeian psalms of the second century, but rather whether any psalms are preexilic psalms” (Introduction to the O. T., p. 629). Fortunately archaeology is silencing such radical, unbelieving criticism. Archaisms and ancient literary forms and expressions closely parallel ancient Canaanite poetic literature and speak eloquently for a preexilic date.

Contents. Although the Psalter is largely composed of devotional hymns, heartfelt praise, and personal testimonies of praise and thanksgiving to the Lord, yet many of these poetic gems give far-reaching predictions and are prophetic as well as devotionally didactic. Psalm 2 is a magnificent prophetic panorama of the Messiah’s redemptive career and His return as King of kings. Psalm 22 is an amazingly detailed prophecy of the suffering and death of Christ in His first advent. Psalm 110 is a far-reaching prophecy of Christ as a perpetual Priest. Psalm 16 heralds His future resurrection; Ps. 72 envisions the coming millennial kingdom; Ps. 45 brings into view a vast prophetic perspective. In all the OT there is no more practical, instructive, beautiful, or popular book than the Psalms. M.F.U.

PTOLEMA´IS (tol-e-mā´is). A city originally called Acco and located in Galilee. It was named after Ptolemy when he was in possession of Coele-Syria. Paul was there for one day on his return from his third missionary journey (Acts 21:7). See Acco.

PU´AH (pū´a). The name of two men and one woman.

2. Heb. pûâ, one of the two midwives to whom Pharaoh gave instructions to kill the Hebrew male children at their birth (Ex. 1:15). The two—Shiphrah and Puah—are supposed to have been the chief and representative of their profession.

3. Heb. pûâ, the father of Tola, who was of the tribe of Issachar and a judge of Israel (Judg. 10:1; Num. 26:23).

PUBLICAN. See Tax-gatherer.

PUB´LIUS (pub´li-us). The “leading man,” and probably governor of Malta, who received and lodged Paul and his companions after their shipwreck. The apostle miraculously healed the father of Publius of a fever and cured others who were brought to him (Acts 28:7–8), A.D. 62 or 59. Roman Catholic martyrologies assert that he was the first bishop of the island and afterward succeeded Dionysius as bishop of Athens. Jerome records a tradition that he was crowned with martyrdom.

PU'DENS (pū'denz; Gk. from Lat. for "modest, bashful"). A Christian at Rome who united with others in sending salutations to their friend Timothy (2 Tim. 4:21). This is the only mention of him in Scripture. He is commemorated in the Byzantine church on April 14 and in the Roman church on May 19. Modern researchers among the Columbaria at Rome, appropriated to members of the imperial household, have brought to light an inscription in which the name of Pudens occurs as that of a servant of Tiberius or Claudius. Although the identity of Paul's Pudens with any legendary or heathen namesake is not proved, yet it is probable that these facts add something to our knowledge of the friend of Paul and Timothy.

PUGNACIOUS (Gk. plēktēs). A contentious, quarrelsome person (1 Tim. 3:3; Titus 1:7).

PUL (pul). The name of an Assyrian king mentioned in the OT in several passages (2 Kings 15:19; 1 Chron. 5:26; but see also the reference to a nation "Pul" in the KJV of Isa. 66:19, the NASB being Put [which see]; cf. NIV marg.). According to those passages Pul received from Menahem, king of Samaria, a tribute of 1,000 talents of silver, in return for which he was, on his part, not to interfere with the exercise of royal authority by Menahem. The passages in Kings and Chronicles have given great trouble to the student of the OT. When the Assyrian inscriptions were first discovered, almost immediately were found in them the names of Sennacherib, Shalmaneser, Tiglath-pileser, and other Assyrian kings, but the name of Pul was found in no inscription. Furthermore, when the Assyrian lists of kings and of eponyms were found, the name of Pul did not appear in them, and at the period to which this king is assigned by the OT there was no gap in any of the lists in which the name of a king (Pul) could be inserted. To add to the difficulty, a king by the name of Phulus is mentioned by Alexander Polyhistor and by Eusebius, both of whom call him king of the Chaldeans, whereas the OT refers to him as an Assyrian king. Numerous efforts on the part of various biblical and Assyrian scholars were made to reconcile the difficulties, but in vain, until the suggestion of Henry Rawlinson, R. Lepsius, and Schrader that Pul was none other than the well-known Assyrian king, Tiglath-pileser III. The theory was that Tiglath-pileser did not belong to the ancient royal house of Assyria; that his name in reality was Pu-lu; that he came, perhaps, from Babylonia into Assyria, and when he had seized the throne called himself by the historical name Tiglath-pileser, a name made famous, about 1110 B.C., by one of the earliest Assyrian conquerors. This theory was supported by Schrader with a masterly array of facts and arguments. At last the Babylonian chronicle was found by Pinches in the British Museum, and on this Babylonian chronicle, at the year 728, stands the name Pul, written Pu-lu; whereas, on the other king lists of the Babylonians at that same year stands the name of Tiglath-pileser. All Assyriologists are now agreed that the Babylonian chronicle has settled the question and that Tiglath-pileser and Pul are one and the same person. It is not, however, certainly known whether the name Pul was the original name of the monarch, or whether it was a name assumed by him when he had become king of Babylon. (For particulars concerning his reign see the article Tiglath-pileser.) R.W.R.

PUNISHMENT. The rendering of a considerable variety of Heb. and Gk. words in the Scripture. The principal meanings expressed by these terms are reproof, chastisement, restraint, penalty, full justice, and vengeance. The specific meaning in each case must be determined by the terms employed and the connection.

Biblical View. The biblical view of punishment differs in the two testaments.

Old Testament. The punishments most frequently mentioned in the OT, and upon which chief stress is laid, are temporal. They were inflicted directly by God, or were divinely prescribed to be inflicted by persons duly authorized. Instances of the former are found in Gen. 3:16–24; 4:10–13; 6:12, 13; 19:24–25; Num. 16:28–33, and many other places. In early times we find punishment authorized to be inflicted by the hand of man (Gen. 9:5–6), but more and more plainly it appears that this was to be done in accordance with divinely appointed and developed social order. The penalties prescribed under the Jewish economy were of great variety and were related to every kind of crime and breach of civil and ecclesiastical regulations. Among capital offenses were blasphemy (Lev. 24:14, 16, 23), Sabbath-breaking (Num. 15:32–36), witchcraft (Ex. 22:18), adultery (Lev. 20:10; cf. 18:20), rape (Deut. 22:25), incest (Lev. 20:11–12, 14, 17, 19–21; cf. 18:6–18), kidnapping (Ex. 21:16), idolatry (Lev. 20:1–5; cf. 18:21), and murder (Ex. 21:12–14; Lev. 24:17, 21). (See further Ex. 21:15, 17; 22:19–24; Lev. 21:9; Deut. 19:16–19; 22:21–24.)

The ordinary mode of capital punishment was stoning, although other forms, such as hanging and burning, are also mentioned. It is believed, however, that these latter were preceded by death in the ordinary way of execution (Ex. 19:13; Lev. 21:9; Num. 25:4; Josh. 7:25).

The meaning of the phrase “cut off from his people” or “cut off from Israel,” as descriptive of punishment, is disputed. It is used many times in the OT, sometimes with reference to crimes the penalty for which is death, but frequently also with reference to offenses the penalties for which are not so clear (Ex. 12:15–19; 30:32–33, 38; Lev. 7:25; 17:9; 19:8). Among minor forms of punishment were exemplified the principles of retaliation (Ex. 21:24–25; Lev. 24:19–22) and of compensation (Ex. 21:18–36; 22:2–4, 6–7; Lev. 6:4–5; 24:8–22; Deut. 19:21; 22:18–19). Stripes, stocks, and imprisonment also appear among penalties prescribed or employed (Deut. 25:3; Jer. 20:2).

The severity of the OT dispensation in this respect has often been made a subject of unfavorable criticism. But the character of the people, the condition of the times, and the necessity for impressing the importance of morality and religion and of developing the right national life furnish the sufficient explanation. It is not to be forgotten, moreover, that the doctrine of a future life, as a state of reward and punishment, was not as strongly emphasized in those times as afterward. See Immortality.

New Testament. We find in the NT a relaxing of the severity of the OT with respect to temporal penalties; but in connection with this is the bringing into prominence of the motives and influences of the gospel revelation (Matt. 5:19–48; Luke 7:37–50; John 8:3–11).

That capital punishment is discountenanced by the NT is, however, an unwarranted opinion. The sanctity of human life still has around it its ancient safeguard (cf. Gen. 9:6 with Rom. 13:1–6; Matt. 26:52; Rev. 13:10). The retribution, however, upon which the NT lays chief stress is that of the future. The teachings of Christ and the apostles leave no room for doubt of the fact of future punishment and of the eternal duration of punishment in some form (Matt. 12:32; chap. 25; 26:24; Mark 3:29; 9:43; Rev. 14:11; 20:10). See Hell.

Theological and Ethical. The primary ground for the infliction of punishment is not the reformation of offenders. In the divine administration a distinction is clearly made between chastisement and punishments properly so called. In the administration of human government the object of reformation often has a proper recognition, though the reason and warrant for the penal sanctions of law are still deeper than that. The chief end is not the discouragement or prevention of crime or wrongdoing. This is often an important effect, and a proper though still subordinate object. The underlying idea—that most deeply fundamental—is justice.

PUNISHMENT, MOSAIC LAW. The law of retribution seems to underlie punishment in all ages. It is found in the form of blood revenge among many ancient peoples as a primitive (Gen. 27:45) custom, going back for its final basis to Gen. 9:5–6 (see Redeemer). Very naturally, in acting as redeemer the person would be tempted to inflict greater injury than that which he avenged. According to the Mosaic code, punishment was made to correspond to the heinousness of the offense, that there should fall upon the culprit what he had done to his neighbor, no more, thus giving no authority for personal revenge. It also limited the punishment to the guilty party without extending it to his children (Deut. 24:16). In the case of property, punishment was required only in order for restoration; and by way of restitution, if the guilty man had invaded his neighbor's property or violated the integrity of his house. What is said (19:19–21) in regard to the false witness holds good of all the penal enactments of the Mosaic law: "Then you shall do to him just as he had intended to do to his brother. Thus you shall purge the evil from among you. And the rest will hear and be afraid, and will never again do such an evil thing among you." Thus we see, at the root of all the enactments of the Mosaic penal code there lies the principle of strict but righteous retribution, and its intention is to extirpate evil and produce reverence for the righteousness of the holy God in the heart of the people.

Capital Punishment. That death was regarded as a fit punishment for murder appears plain from the remark of Lamech (Gen. 4:24). In the postdiluvian code, if we may so call it, retribution by the hand of man, even in the case of an offending animal, for bloodshed, is clearly laid down (9:5–6). In the Mosaic law we find the sentence of capital punishment, in the case of murder, clearly laid down. The murderer was to be put to death, even if he should have taken refuge at God's altar or in a city of refuge, and the same principle was to be carried out even in the case of animals (Ex. 21:12, 14, 28, 36; Lev. 24:17, 21; Num. 35:31; Deut. 19:11–13; etc.). The wide range of crimes punishable by death according to the Mosaic law may be accounted for by the peculiar conditions of the Israelites. A nation of newly emancipated slaves, they were probably intractable; and their wanderings and isolation did not permit penal settlements or remedial punishment. They were placed under immediate divine government and surveillance. Willful offenses under such circumstances evinced an incorrigibility that rendered death the only means of ridding the community of such transgressors, and this was ultimately resorted to in regard to all individuals above a certain age, in order that a better class might enter into Canaan (Num. 14:29, 32, 35).

Capital Crimes. Capital crimes in the OT can be divided into absolute and relative classes.

Absolute. Capital crimes for which no mitigating factor could alter the severity of the sentence included the following: (1) striking or reviling a parent (Ex. 21:15, 17); (2) blasphemy (Lev. 24:14, 16, 23); (3) Sabbath-breaking (Num. 15:32–36; Ex. 31:14); (4) witchcraft, and false pretension to prophecy (Ex. 22:18; Lev. 20:27; Deut. 13:5; 18:20); (5) adultery (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:22); (6) unchastity (Deut. 22:21, 23; Lev. 21:9); (7) rape (Deut. 22:25); (8) incestuous and unnatural connections (Lev. 20:11–17; Ex. 22:19); (9) kidnapping (Ex. 21:16; Deut. 24:7); (10) idolatry, actual or implied, in any shape (Lev. 20:2; Deut. 13:6, 10, 15; 17:2–7; see Josh. 7; 22:20; Num. 25:1–8); and (11) false witness, in certain cases (Deut. 19:16, 19).

Relative. There are some thirty-six or thirty-seven cases in the Pentateuch where the penalty named was that of "cutting off from the people." Controversy has arisen concerning the meaning of this expression, and some hold that only excommunication and not the death penalty was the punishment prescribed (see discussion below, under Capital Penalties, no. 7). The offenses included in this category were those involving a breach—either of morals, of the covenant, or of the Levitical ritual.

1. Breach of morals: willful sin in general (Num. 15:30–31); fifteen cases of incestuous or unclean connection (Lev. 18:23, 29; 20:9–21).

2. Breach of covenant: uncircumcision (Gen. 17:14); neglect of the Passover (Num. 9:13); Sabbath-breaking (Ex. 31:14); neglect of the Day of Atonement (Lev. 23:29); or work done on that day (v. 30); offering children to Molech (20:3); witchcraft (20:6); anointing a stranger with holy oil (Ex. 30:33).

3. Breach of ritual: eating leavened bread during the Passover (12:15, 19); eating the fat of sacrifices (Lev. 7:25); eating blood (7:27; 17:14); eating the sacrifice in an unclean condition (7:20–21; 22:3–4, 9); eating of the sacrifice on the third day after its being offered (19:7–8); making holy ointment for private use (Ex. 30:32–33); making incense for private use (30:34–38); neglect of purification in general (Num. 19:13–20); offering a sacrifice elsewhere than at the Tabernacle (Lev. 17:8–9); slaying an animal elsewhere than at the Tabernacle door (17:3–4); touching holy things illegally (Num. 4:15, 18, 20; cf. 2 Sam. 6:7; 2 Chron. 26:21).

Capital Penalties. Some capital penalties were natively Hebrew; others were borrowed from foreign lands.

Those Properly Hebrew. The Hebrew law prescribed a number of capital penalties.

1. Crucifixion (which see).

2. Stoning. Stoning was the ordinary mode of execution (Ex. 17:4; Luke 20:6; John 10:31; Acts 14:5). “So far as can be learned from the Pentateuch stoning is enjoined for those cases in which sentence of death was to be executed on individuals judicially; when, on the contrary, either the avenger of blood carried out the punishment, or where many were to be executed, the sword was used, the spear (Num. 25:7), or arrow (Ex. 19:13), to kill from a distance. Thus stoning is enjoined (Lev. 20:27; Deut. 17:3–5) to punish the individual who practiced idolatry and seduced others; on the contrary (13:16), for the punishment of a whole city which was given over to idolatry, it is commanded, ‘Thou shalt slay the inhabitants of that city with the sword.’ Accordingly it is no doubt stoning is meant when the law merely uses the formulas ‘He shall be put to death’ or ‘his blood be upon him’” (Keil, Arch., 2:357–58). If the crime had been proved by testimony, the witnesses were to cast the first stones at the condemned (Deut. 17:7; John 8:7; Acts 7:58). It was customary to add the raising of a heap of stones over the body or its ashes (Josh. 7:25; 8:29; 2 Sam. 18:17).

3. Hanging. Among the Jews hanging was generally spoken of as following death by some other means (Num. 25:4; Deut. 21:22; 2 Sam. 21:6, 9), as a way of aggravating capital punishment. The law provided that persons hanged should not be allowed to remain suspended overnight, but should be buried the same day, lest—he that was hanged being accused of God—Jehovah’s land should be defiled (Deut. 21:23).

4. Death by the sword, spear, or arrow; death by beheading. Death by the sword or spear was the mode adopted when either the avenger of blood carried out the punishment or where many were to be executed (Ex. 32:27; Num. 25:7–8); the arrow was used to kill at a distance (Ex. 19:13). Beheading, practiced in Egypt from most ancient times (Gen. 40:19), first appeared among the Jews in the Roman period (Matt. 14:10–12).

5. Burning. In pre-Mosaic times burning was the punishment for unchastity (Gen. 38:24). The Mosaic law enjoined burning for unchastity only in the case of a priest’s daughter (Lev. 21:9), or in the case of a man’s having carnal intercourse with both a mother and her daughter, all three to be put to death (20:14). Burning is mentioned as following death by other means (Josh. 7:25), and some have thought that it was never used except after death. Certainly this was not the case among other nations (Dan. 3).

6. Strangling. Death by strangulation is said by the rabbis to have been regarded as the most common but least severe of the capital punishments and to have been performed by immersing the convict in clay or mud and then strangling him by a cloth twisted around the neck.

7. "Cutting off." The penalty described by the expression "cutting off from the people" has been variously understood, some thinking that it meant death in all cases, others that in some cases only excommunication (which see) must be understood. Jahn (Arch., p. 258) says, "When God is introduced as saying in respect to any person, 'I will cut him off from the people,' the expression means some event in divine providence which shall eventually terminate the life of that person's family" (see 1 Kings 14:10; 21:21; 2 Kings 9:8). Saalschütz explains it to be premature death by God's hand. Knobel, Corn, and Ewald held that the death punishment absolutely was meant. Keil observed (Arch., 2:358): "From Lev. 20:2–6, so much only appears, that God himself will cut off the transgressor if the earthly magistrate shuts his eyes to the crime of idolatry and does not cut off the idolater. Certainly in Lev., ch. 20, all the abominations of which it holds in the comprehensive formula (18:29), 'Whosoever shall do any of these abominations, even the souls that do them shall be cut off from among their people,' have not the punishment of death attached to them. For some of the forbidden marriages only childlessness is threatened (20:20, sq.). But from this it merely follows that for certain cases God reserved the cutting off to be otherwise executed; and in these cases the civil magistrate was not to intervene. But in connection with all other offenses, for which the law prescribes cutting off without any such reserve, the civil magistrate was obliged to carry out sentence of death as soon as the guilt was judicially established; even for transgressions of the laws of purification and other matters of ritual, if the sin was proved to have been committed 'with a high hand,' i.e., in presumptuous rebellion against Jehovah, and not merely in thoughtlessness and haste."

We may, perhaps, conclude that the primary meaning of "cutting off" is a sentence of death to be executed in some cases without remission, but in others avoidable, either (1) by immediate atonement on the offender's part, or (2) by direct interposition of the Almighty, i.e., a sentence of death always "recorded," but not always executed.

Those Coming from Other Lands. Capital punishments borrowed from other lands were the following:

1. Beheading. The Egyptians knew and practiced beheading (Gen. 40:17–19), as did the Hebrews in the time of the early kings (2 Sam. 4:8; 20:21–22; 2 Kings 10:6–8). Herod and his descendants ordered decapitation (Matt. 14:8–12; cf. Acts 12:2).

2. Dichotomy, cutting in pieces (1 Sam. 15:33). Dichotomy was common among the Babylonians, Egyptians, and Persians.

3. Death by torture. Conscious suffering in death was inflicted by burning the offender alive in a furnace (Dan. 3:20–26); roasting him in the fire (Jer. 29:22; 2 Macc. 7:5); putting him to death in hot ashes (2 Macc. 13:5–8); casting him into the lion's den (Dan. 6:7, 16–24); beating him to death on the tumpanon (2 Macc. 6:19), probably a circular instrument of torture, on which prisoners were stretched and tortured or beaten to death. In war we find the sawing in pieces of captives (2 Sam. 12:31; 1 Chron. 20:3; cf. Heb. 11:37); the hurling of enemies from precipices (2 Chron. 25:12; cf. Ps. 141:6; Luke 4:29), the latter a frequent punishment among the Romans; the cutting open of the bodies of pregnant women (2 Kings 8:12; 15:16; etc.), and the dashing of children against walls, when hostile cities were taken (Isa. 13:16, 18; Hos. 13:16; etc.). In the NT are incidentally mentioned drowning (Matt. 18:6; Mark 9:42) and fighting with wild beasts (1 Cor. 15:32).

Secondary Punishments. Secondary punishments were of a less severe nature.

Retaliation. The law of retaliation, exacting "eye for eye" (Ex. 21:24–25) is, probably, the most natural of all kinds of punishment, and would be the most just of all, if it could be instantaneously and universally inflicted; but when delayed, it is apt to degenerate into revenge. To prevent this, the law specified the maximum revenge obtainable. It was thus illegal to demand a life when only an eye had been damaged. Moses accordingly adopted the principle, but lodged the application of it in the judge: "If a man injures his neighbor, just as he has done, so it shall be done to him: fracture for fracture, eye for eye, tooth for tooth" (Lev. 24:19–22). This law applied also to the beasts.

But the law of retaliation applied to the free Israelite only, not to slaves. In the case of the latter, if the master struck out an eye and destroyed it, i.e., blinded the slave with the blow, or struck out a tooth, he was to let him go free, as a compensation for the loss of the member. The willful murder of a slave was followed by capital punishment.

Compensation. If compensation was identical, then it was retaliation (see above); but it was also analogous, thus a payment for loss of time or power (Ex. 21:18–36; Lev. 24:18–21; Deut. 19:21). A stolen sheep (killed or sold) was to be compensated for by four others, a stolen ox by five others (Ex. 22:1). The thief caught in the act in a dwelling might be killed or sold; if a stolen animal was found alive in his possession, he might be compelled to restore double (22:2–4). Damage done by an animal was to be fully compensated (v. 5); as was damage caused to a neighbor's grain (v. 6). A stolen pledge found in the thief's possession was to be compensated double (v. 7); a pledge lost or damaged was to be compensated (vv. 12–13); whereas a pledge withheld was to be restored with 20 percent of the value (Lev. 6:4–5). All trespass was to pay double (Ex. 22:9). Slander against the woman by her newly married husband was to be compensated for by the payment of one hundred shekels, and the man further punished with stripes (Deut. 22:18–19).

Corporal. Stripes, consisting of forty blows with a rod, were to be applied (Deut. 25:2–3); whence the Jews took care not to exceed thirty-nine (2 Cor. 11:24; Josephus Ant. 4.8.21). If a man struck his servant with a rod so that he or she died, he was punishable (Ex. 21:20).

Scourging with thorns is mentioned (Judg. 8:16), as is scourging with "scorpions," i.e., whips with barbed points like the point of a scorpion's sting (1 Kings 12:11). In addition, there is mention of the stocks (Jer. 20:2); passing through fire (2 Sam. 12:31); mutilation (Judg. 1:6; 2 Macc. 7:4); plucking out hair (Isa. 50:6; Neh. 13:25); and later, imprisonment, confiscation, or exile (Ezra 7:26; Jer. 37:15; 38:6; Acts 4:3; 5:18; 12:4; Rev. 1:9).

The Scriptures mention the following corporal punishments inflicted by other nations: putting out the eyes of captives, flaying captives alive, tearing out the tongue. Exposure to wild beasts is mentioned by the apostle Paul (1 Cor. 15:32; 2 Tim. 4:17), but without any particulars.

Imprisonment. Although imprisonment was not unknown to the Israelites from their acquaintance with Egypt (Gen. 39:20; 40:3; 41:10; 42:19), it is not recognized in the Mosaic law as a mode of punishment. "They put him in custody" (Lev. 24:12) means that the offender was secured until a decision concerning his case had been made. Imprisonment is wholly superfluous where bodily punishments prevail and where fines in the case of those without means must be paid by servitude. At the time of the kings imprisonment was introduced, especially as a punishment of too outspoken prophets (2 Chron. 16:10; Jer. 20:2; 32:2). After the Exile imprisonment was quite a common punishment, along with others, in cases of debt (Ezra 7:26; Matt. 18:30). Prisoners were bound with chains (Judg. 16:21; 2 Sam. 3:34; Jer. 40:1); and when the punishment would be made severer, they were placed in stocks (20:2). The Roman custodia militaris (military imprisonment) consisted in chaining the prisoner by one or both hands to the soldier who watched him (Acts 12:4; 21:33), or if the offender was in prison, in putting his feet in the stocks (16:24).

PU'NITES (pū'nīts). The descendants of Puvvah or Puvah or Puah, of the tribe of Issachar (Num. 26:33). See Puite.

PU'NON (pū'non). A station of the Israelites in their journey to Canaan (Num. 33:42), E of the mountains of Edom, a tribal seat of the Edomite phylarch (Gen. 36:41). It lay next beyond Zalmonah, between it and Oboth. According to Jerome it was "a little village in the desert, where copper was dug up by condemned criminals, between Petra and Zoar." It is identified with present-day Feinan.

PUR (pūr; "lot"). Pur is mentioned only (Esther 3:7; 9:24, 26) in connection with Haman's consulting the astrologers to decide upon the auspicious day for destroying the Hebrews. See articles Festivals; Lot.

PU'RAH (pū'ra). The servant of Gideon, who went with him by night when he visited the camp of the Midianites (Judg. 7:10–11; "Phurah," KJV).

PURGE. See Uncleaness.

PURIFICATION. See Uncleaness.

PURIFIER, OF SILVER. See Silver.

PU'RIM (pū'rim). An annual festival of the Jews (Esther 9:26) in commemoration of the wonderful deliverance of the Israelites in Persia. See Festivals: Postexilic Festivals.

PURITY (Gk. hagneia, "cleanness"). Freedom from foreign mixture, but more particularly the temper directly opposite to criminal sensualities, or the ascendancy of irregular passions; chastity (2 Cor. 6:6; 1 Tim. 4:12; 5:2).

PURLOINING. See Pilfering.

PURPLE. A type of cloth and a color. See article Color.

PURPOSES OF GOD. See Election; Sovereignty of God.

PURSE (Heb. ḥārīt, Isa. 3:22, "money purses," NASB, "crisping pins," KJV; Heb. kîs, Prov. 1:14, "purse," NASB, KJV, NIV; Isa. 46:6, "purse," NASB, "bag," KJV and NIV; Heb. šārôr, Hag. 1:6, "purse," NASB and NIV, "bag," KJV; Gk. balantion, Luke 10:4; zōnē, Mark 6:8, a girdle, and so a "belt"). The Hebrews in journeying were provided with a bag in which they carried their money (Gen. 42:35; Prov. 1:14; 7:20; Isa. 46:6). Ladies wore ornamental purses (Heb. ḥārīt, 3:22; 2 Kings 5:23, "bags"). The name given to them by Isaiah is supposed to refer to the long, round form of the purse. The "money belt" was also used as a purse (Matt. 10:9; Mark 6:8). See Bag.

PUT (put; the KJV frequently reads Phut). The third name in the list of the sons of Ham (Gen. 10:6; 1 Chron. 1:8), elsewhere applied to an African country or people. In the list it follows Cush and Mizraim, and precedes Canaan. We cannot place the tract of Put outside of Africa, and it would thus seem that it was almost parallel to that of the Mizraites, as it could not be farther to the N; the position would well agree with Libya. Latest views of the identification of Put are with Punt, S of African Cush where it is commonly connected with the coast of Somaliland. The few mentions of Put in the Bible clearly indicate a country or people of Africa, and it was, probably, not far from Egypt (Isa. 66:19, KJV, NIV, and NASB marg., "Pul"; cf. Jer. 46:9; Ezek. 27:10; 30:5; 38:5; Nah. 3:9). From these passages we cannot infer anything as to the exact position of this country or people; unless indeed in the book of Nahum the countries of Cush and Put, Mizraim and Lubim are respectively connected, which might indicate that Put occupied a position S of Egypt. Jeremiah (Jer. 46:9) describes the Egyptian army as consisting of Ethiopians, Putites, and Lydians; and Ezekiel (Ezek. 30:5) prophesies that Ethiopia (NASB marg., Cush) and Put and Lud shall fall by the sword along with the Egyptians.

PUTE´OLI (pū-tē´o-li; “little wells”). A famous watering place of the Romans, located in a sheltered part of the Bay of Naples. Its Gk. name was Dicaearchia. It was the most accessible harbor near to Rome. Paul was brought to this port with other prisoners (Acts 28:13). Vespasian conferred great privileges upon the city. Cicero had a villa here, and Hadrian a tomb. Portions of its famous baths remain to this day, as does a part of the pier at which Paul must have landed on his way to Rome. The present name is Pozzuoli.

PU´THITE (pū´thīt; “Puhites,” KJV). According to 1 Chron. 2:53, the “Puthites” were of the “families of Kiriath-jearim,” descended from Shobal.

PU´TIEL (pū´ti-el; perhaps, “afflicted of God”). The father of the wife of Eleazar the priest, and mother of Phinehas (Ex. 6:25), before 1210 B.C.

PU´VAH. See Puvvah.

PU´VVAH (pū´va). One of the sons of Issachar (Gen. 46:13; NIV, “Puah,” but see marg.). The name is given as “Puvah” (Num. 26:23; NIV, “Puah”) and “Puah” (1 Chron. 7:1; so NIV). His descendants are called Punites (Num. 26:23; NIV, “Puite”).

PYGARG. See Animal Kingdom: Ibex.

PYR´RHUS (pir´rus). The father of Sopater of Berea, a companion of Paul on his journey from Philippi to Troas (Acts 20:4). See Sopater.

Q

QOPH(ק) (kōf). The nineteenth letter of the Heb. alphabet, corresponding to our English “q.” Ps. 119 in its nineteenth section is headed by this letter, in which each verse of the original Heb. begins with qoph.

QUAIL. See Animal Kingdom.

QUARRIES (Heb. pāsîl). Quarries in the KJV of Judg. 3:19, 26 may be rendered “idols” (so NASB, NIV). The term is derived from Heb. pāsal, “hew,” “hew into shape.”

QUART (Rev. 6:6, NIV). See Metrology: Measures of Capacity: Foreign Measures: Choenix.

QUAR´TUS (kwor´tus; a “fourth”). A Christian of Corinth whose salutations Paul sent to the church at Rome (Rom. 16:23). The usual tradition holds that he was one of the seventy disciples; it is also said that he ultimately became bishop of Berytus.

QUATERNION (Acts 12:4, KJV; Gk. tedradion, “a group of four”). Four squads of soldiers (so NASB). The NIV has “four squads of four soldiers each.” See Squad.

QUEEN. The Hebrews had no equivalent for our word queen, in the sense of a female sovereign; neither did the wives of the king have the dignity that the word queen now denotes.

1. Queen regnant or queen consort (Heb. malkâ, the feminine of melek, king). It is applied in the sense of queen regnant to the queen of Sheba (1 Kings 10:1). It is also applied to the queen consort, the chief wife, as distinguished from all other females in the royal harem (Esther 1:9, 11–12; 7:1–3; etc.).

2. A wife of the first rank (Heb. shēgāl) as distinguished from mere concubines; it is applied to the wives of the first rank in the harems of the Chaldean and Persian monarchs (Neh. 2:6; cf. Dan. 5:2–3).

3. Mistress (Heb. gbîrâ) is expressive of authority and dominion. Gebîr (“masculine, lord”) is the word that occurs twice with reference to Isaac’s blessing of Jacob: “Be master of your brothers,” and, “I have made him your master” (Gen. 27:29, 37). It would therefore be applied to the female who exercised the highest authority, and this, in an oriental household, is not the wife but the mother of the master. This is one of the inevitable results of polygamy—the number of wives, their social position before marriage, and their precarious hold upon their husband’s affections combine to annihilate their influence. This is transferred to the mother as being the only female who occupies a fixed and dignified position. The extent of the queen mother’s influence is well illustrated in the interview between Solomon and Bathsheba (1 Kings 2:19–22). The term gbîrâ is applied only twice with reference to the wife of a king—the wife of an Egyptian king (11:19), where the position of royal consort was more queenly than in Palestine; and Jezebel (2 Kings 10:13, “queen mother”), who as the daughter of a powerful king appears to have enjoyed peculiar privileges after marriage.

Where a woman can never become the head of state there can never be a reigning queen; and where polygamy is allowed or practiced there can be no queen consort. By queen, then, we understand the chief wife of the king’s harem. This rank may be obtained by being the first wife of the king or the first after accession, especially if she was of high birth and became mother of the firstborn son; otherwise she may be superseded by a woman of higher birth and connections subsequently married or by the one who gave birth to the heir apparent. The king, however, often acted according to his own pleasure, promoting or removing as he willed.

QUEEN OF HEAVEN (Heb. m^lleketh hashshāmayim, Jer. 7:18; 44:17–19, 25). Astarte, an ancient Semitic deity, identical with Babylonian Ishtar (Venus). (See Gods, False.) The epithet “of heaven” alludes to her elevated character. Special cakes were baked to this goddess (cf. the “raisin cakes” of Hos. 3:1, with which there may be some connection), which were symbolic representations of the goddess. Her worship belonged chiefly to the women (Jer. 44:17); Astarte represented the female principle of fertility. She was a “mother goddess.”

QUICK, QUICKEN. In the Psalms (71:20; 80:18; 119:25, 37, 40, 88; 143:11; and others) the causative form of Heb. hāyâ, “to live,” “to have life,” is used, signifying “to make alive,” “to comfort, refresh”; the NASB and NIV replace KJV quicken me in those passages with the expression revive me, or renew. When the priest examined one with leprosy he was commanded, if he saw “quick raw flesh in the rising” (“swelling,” NASB and NIV), to pronounce the person unclean (Lev. 13:10, 24). The meaning evidently was that the flesh showed life, i.e., the skin was growing and forming anew.

In the Gk., zōopoieō appears in Rom. 8:11; 1 Cor. 15:36; 1 Tim. 6:13; 1 Pet. 3:18; and elsewhere, with the meaning of “to make alive” (cf. NASB and NIV readings). The Gk. term zōntes signifies the living as opposed to the dead, as in the expression “the Judge of the quick [“living,” NASB and NIV] and the dead” (Acts 10:42; 2 Tim. 4:1; Heb. 4:12).

R

RA'AMAH (ra'a-ma). The fourth named son (descendant) of Cush and grandson of Ham (Gen. 10:7; 1 Chron. 1:9). The tribe of Raamah afterward became renowned as traders (Ezek. 27:22). Raamah occurs in the inscriptions of Sheba as a place in SW Arabia near Mā'în, referred to as Regma in the LXX and the Vulg.

RAAMI'AH (ra-am'i-a; "Jehovah has thundered"). One of the leaders of the Jews who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:7), about 445 B.C. In Ezra 2:2 he is called Reelaiah (which see).

RAAM'SES (ram'sēz; Ex. 1:11). See Rameses.

RAB'BAH (rab'a; "great," i.e., city). The name of several places:

1. A strong place on the E of the Jordan, which, when its name is first introduced in the sacred records, was the chief city of the Ammonites. In five passages (Deut. 3:11; 2 Sam. 12:26; 17:27; Jer. 49:2; Ezek. 21:20) it is called Rabbah of the sons of Ammon; elsewhere (Josh. 13:25; 2 Sam. 11:1; 12:27, 29; 1 Chron. 20:1; Jer. 49:3; Ezek. 25:5; Amos 1:14) simply Rabbah. It appears in the sacred records as the single city of the Ammonites. When first named it is in the hands of the Ammonites and is mentioned as containing the bed, or sarcophagus, of the giant Og (Deut. 3:11). It was not included in the territory of the tribes E of Jordan; the border of Gad stops at "Aroer which is before Rabbah" (Josh. 13:25). It was probably to Rabbah that Abishai led his forces while holding the Ammonites in check (2 Sam. 10:10, 14), whereas the main army, under Joab, rested at Medeba (1 Chron. 19:7). The next year Rabbah was made the main point of attack, Joab in command (2 Sam. 11:1); and after a siege, probably of two years, it was taken (12:26–29; 1 Chron. 20:1). We are not told whether the city was demolished or whether David was satisfied with the slaughter of its inhabitants. In the time of Amos, 2½ centuries later, it had again a "wall" and "citadels" and was still the sanctuary of Molech—the "king" (Amos 1:14–15). It was also at the date of the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 49:2–3), when its dependent towns are mentioned, and it is named in terms that imply it was of equal importance with Jerusalem (Ezek. 21:20). At Rabbah, no doubt, Baalis, king of the sons of Ammon (Jer. 40:14), held such court as he could muster; and within its walls was plotted the attack of Ishmael, which cost Gedaliah his life and drove Jeremiah into Egypt. It received the name Philadelphia from Ptolemy Philadelphus (285–247 B.C.), and it became one of the important cities of Decapolis; its ancient name, however, still adheres to it. It was once the seat of a bishopric and prosperous, until conquered by the Saracens. Its modern name is Amman, capital of Jordan, about twenty-two miles from the Jordan, in a valley that is a branch or perhaps the main course of the Wadi Zerka, usually identified with the Jabbok. Amman has the longest continuous occupational history of any city in the Near East. Modern Amman covers the ancient city so effectively that excavation is virtually impossible. A Roman theater with seating for 6,000 people stands in the middle of the city. Nearly everything visible on the ancient citadel is Roman, Byzantine, or Umayyad. See Rabbath.

2. A city of Judah, named with Kiriath-jearim (Josh. 15:60 only), but its location is entirely unknown. It apparently is mentioned in the el-Amarna Letters as Rubute.

RAB BATH OF THE SONS OF AMMON. The full name (Deut. 3:11; Ezek. 21:20; etc.) of Rabbah, no. 1 (which see).

RABBI (Heb. rabbi, Gk. hrabbi, “my teacher”). A respectful term applied by the Jews to their teachers and spiritual instructors (Matt. 23:7–8; John 1:38; 3:26; 6:25). The terms rabbi and rabboni both mean simply “master” (John 1:38; 20:16). The use of the title rabbi cannot be substantiated before the time of Christ. Later Jewish schools had three grades of honor: rab, “master,” the lowest; rabbi, “my master,” the second; and rabboni, “my lord, my master,” the most elevated. M.F.U.

RABBIT. See Animal Kingdom.

RAB BITH (rab’ith; “multitude”). A city in the tribe of Issachar (Josh. 19:20), supposed by Knobel to be Araboneh, NE of Arâneh, at the southern foot of Gilboa. Conder equates it with Rāba, eight miles S of Mt. Gilboa.

RABBONI. See Rabbi.

RABDOMANCY. See Magic: Various Forms.

RAB’-MAG (rab’mag; “chief magician, or priest”). A title ascribed (Jer. 39:3, 13) to Nergal-sar-ezer (which see), which title he, with certain other important persons, bears in the Babylonian inscriptions. The NIV translates “high official” in Jer. 39:3, 13 rather than as a title. It probably corresponds to Akkad. rab mugī (“great” prince).

RAB’-SARIS (rab’sa-ris; Heb. rab-saris; Assy. rabu-sha-reshi). Originally “first eunuch,” a title of a high Assyrian official and not a personal name.

1. The title is mentioned in the narrative of Sennacherib’s campaign against Judah in the days of Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:17). In the English translation the Assyrian monarch is represented as sending to Jerusalem “Tartan and Rab-saris and Rabshekeh from Lachish.” It is now known from the Assyrian monuments that tartan (Assyr. turtannu, “second in rank”), rabshakeh (Assyr. rabshaqu, “chief officer”) and rab-saris were all titles of high Assyrian officials; in fact, they are Assyrian words taken over into Heb. (See W. F. Albright, O. T. Commentary [1948], p. 161; Millar Burrows, What Mean These Stones? [1941], p. 43.)

2. The same title is found in Jer. 39:3 to designate one of the Babylonian princes present at the capture of Jerusalem. The other reference is Jer. 39:13, where the Rab-saris was of the group who set free the prophet Jeremiah from the prison court when he was placed under the custody of Gedaliah. The NIV consistently translates Rab-saris as “chief officer.” M.F.U.

RAB’SHAKEH (rab’sha-ki). Assy. rab-shaqu, “chief officer,” one of the high Assyrian officials mentioned several times in the narrative of Sennacherib’s campaign against Judah during Hezekiah’s reign (2 Kings 18:17; Isa. 36:2). The NIV translates “chief officer” in these passages. (See Tartan and Rab-saris.) The title is one of high rank, for in the inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser III an army is mentioned as being sent against Tyre under the command of a rabshakeh. M.F.U.

RAKA' (ra-ka'; Gk. from Aram. rêqā, "empty, worthless, good for nothing"). A common term of contempt in the time of Christ (Matt. 5:22), denoting a certain looseness of life and manners. It differs from "fool," which follows in that the latter conveys the idea of impious, godless, because such a one neglects and despises what relates to salvation. Thus there would be a greater criminality in calling a man a "fool," since foolishness in Scripture is the opposite of spiritual wisdom.

RA'CAL (ra'kal). A town in the tribe of Judah that David made a depository for spoil taken from the Amalekites (1 Sam. 30:29).

RA'CHEL (rā'chel; "ewe"). The younger daughter of Laban, and one of Jacob's wives.

Meeting with Jacob. When Jacob came to Haran he met some shepherds, who told him, in answer to his inquiries, that they knew Laban and that Rachel was already coming to the well near by to water her father's sheep. He rolled the stone from the well's mouth, watered the sheep, greeted her with a kiss, and told Rachel who he was. Rachel then hastened to her father with the tidings of what had happened (Gen. 29:1–12), about 1960 B.C.

Jacob's Wife. Laban received Jacob as his relative, and, after a month's service, an agreement was entered into between them that Jacob should serve Laban seven years for his daughter Rachel. The motive on the part of Jacob was, doubtless, that his relations with Esau made a protracted stay with Laban advisable, whereas Laban was probably influenced by greed. At the expiration of the period of service Jacob claimed his reward, but he was deceived by Laban, who led his elder daughter, Leah, into the bridechamber. Complaining of the deception, Jacob was told to let Leah's marriage week pass by and then he should have Rachel (Gen. 29:13–30). Mention is made of her jealousy toward her sister on account of Leah's having children, whereas she herself was childless, and of her removing and secreting the household gods of her father. This incident indicates either that she was not altogether free from the superstition and idolatry that prevailed in the land or that she sought by possession of the household gods (teraphim) to gain some special family or inheritance benefits for her husband. She at length became the mother of two sons, Joseph (30:22–24) and Benjamin, and died shortly after the latter's birth (35:16–19). She "was buried on the way to Ephrath (that is, Bethlehem)." The traditional site of her tomb is about one mile N of Bethlehem, but that seems too far S. She died "some distance" from Bethlehem (Gen. 35:16), and probably her tomb was actually located near Jerusalem (the tower of Eder [Migdal-eder], v. 21, was likely on the outskirts of Jerusalem; cf. 1 Sam. 10:2; Jer. 31:15).

Character. "From what is related to us concerning her character there does not seem much to claim any high degree of admiration and esteem. The discontent and fretful impatience shown in her grief at being for a time childless, moved even her fond husband to anger (Gen. 30:1–2). She appears, moreover, to have shared all the duplicity and falsehood of her family. See, for instance, Rachel's stealing her father's images, and the ready dexterity and presence of mind with which she concealed her theft" (chap. 31). In Jer. 31:15–16 the prophet refers to the exile of the ten tribes under Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, and the sorrow caused by their dispersion (2 Kings 17:20), under the symbol of Rachel, the maternal ancestor of the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, bewailing the fate of her children. This lamentation was a type of that which was fulfilled in Bethlehem when the infants were slaughtered by order of Herod (Matt. 2:16–18). H.F.V.

RAD'DAI (rad'a-ī; “treading down”). The fifth son of Jesse and brother of King David (1 Chron. 2:14), about 1025 B.C.

RAFT. A device used for conveying bulky substances by water. Thus Solomon contracted with Hiram king of Tyre to have cedars cut on the western side of Mt. Lebanon and floated to Joppa (1 Kings 5:9; 2 Chron. 2:16; “floats,” KJV).

RA'HAB (rā'hab; “broad, wide”). A woman of Jericho at the time of Israel's entrance into Canaan.

Entertains Spies. Just before crossing the Jordan Joshua sent two men to spy out Canaan as far as Jericho. In this city dwelt Rahab, “a harlot,” in a house of her own, although she had a father, a mother, brothers, and sisters living in Jericho. From the presence of the flax upon the roof and a scarlet (or crimson) thread in the house, it has been supposed that she was engaged in the manufacture of linen and the art of dyeing. She had heard of the wonderful progress of Israel, the passage of the Red Sea, and the overthrow of their enemies and was convinced that Jehovah purposed to give Canaan to the Israelites. The spies found in her one who was ready to befriend them. Fearful of their being discovered, she hid them among the stalks of flax on the roof and informed the officers sent in to search that they had departed from her house before the closing of the city gates. The officers started in pursuit, and when it was night Rahab informed the spies of what had happened and secured from them a pledge to spare her life and the lives of her kindred, on the condition that she hang out a scarlet “thread” at the window from which they had escaped, and that her family should remain under her roof. She then assisted them to escape by letting them down by a rope from her window, which overlooked the city wall (Josh. 2:1–21), 1440 B.C.

Is Spared. At the taking of Jericho the spies, under the command of Joshua, took Rahab and her relatives out of her house and moved them to a place of safety outside the camp of Israel (Josh. 6:22–23) and thus made good their oath. The narrator adds, “And she has lived in the midst of Israel to this day” (v. 25), not necessarily implying that she was alive at the time he wrote, but that the family of strangers, of which she was reckoned the head, continued to dwell among the children of Israel. Regarding Rahab herself, we learn from Matt. 1:5 that she became the wife of Salmon, the son of Nahshon, and the mother of Boaz, Jesse's grandfather. The suspicion naturally arises that Salmon may have been one of the spies whose life she saved and that gratitude for so great a benefit led in his case to a more tender passion and obliterated the memory of any past disgrace attaching to her name. But however this may be, it is certain, on the authority of Matthew, that Rahab became the mother of the line from which sprang David and, eventually, Christ; that the Rahab (Rachab, KJV) mentioned by Matthew is Rahab the harlot is as certain as that David in the genealogy is the same person as David in the books of Samuel.

Her Character. Both Jewish and Christian writers, for very obvious reasons, have been unwilling to admit the disreputable character of Rahab when introduced into Scripture history and have chosen to interpret the word zōnâ, “harlot,” as “hostess,” as if from zun, “to nourish.” “Dismissing, as inconsistent with truth, the attempt to clear her character of stain by saying that she was only an innkeeper, and not a harlot, we may yet notice that it is very possible that to a woman of her country and religion such a calling may have implied a far less deviation from the standard of morality than it does with us, and, moreover, that with a purer faith she seems to have entered upon a pure life. As a case of casuistry, her conduct in deceiving the king of Jericho's messengers with a false tale, and, above all, in taking part against her own countrymen, has been much discussed. With regard to the first, strict truth either in Jew or heathen, was a virtue so utterly unknown before the promulgation of the Gospel that, as far as Rahab is concerned, the discussion is quite superfluous. With regard to her taking part against her own countrymen, it can only be justified, but is fully justified, by the circumstance that fidelity to her country would in her case have been infidelity to God, and that the higher duty to her Maker eclipsed the lower duty to her native land" (Smith, Dict., s.v.). Her faith is commended in the epistle to the Hebrews (11:31) and by James (2:25).

RA'HAB (Heb. rāhāb, "insolence, pride, violence"). A symbolical or poetical name applied to Egypt. It suggests the character of the "sea monster" (Pss. 87:4; 89:10; Isa. 51:9).

RA'HAM (ra'ham; "compassion, pity"). Among the descendants of Caleb, the son of Hezron, Raham is mentioned (1 Chron. 2:44) as the son of Shema and father of Jorkeam. By some Jorkeam is regarded as a place of which Raham was the founder.

RAHEL. See Rachel.

RAIL. A KJV expression meaning to upbraid, reproach (2 Chron. 32:17), calumniate (Mark 15:29; Luke 23:39); or to reproach, abuse (1 Cor. 5:11; 1 Tim. 6:4. The NASB and NIV render "insult," "hurling abuse," "reviler," "abusive language.")

RAIMENT. Clothing, garments. See Dress.

RAIMENT, CHANGES OF. Handsome garments, often given as presents. See Dress.

RAIN. The Heb. term for rain generically is mātār; a burst of rain or shower is geshem; a poetical word is rbībīm, i.e., "many," from the multitude of drops (Deut. 32:2; Jer. 3:3; 14:22; Mic. 5:7, "showers"; etc.); zerem expresses violent rainstorm, tempest, accompanied with hail (Job 24:8). George Adam Smith (Hist. Geog., p. 63) says, "The ruling feature of the climate of Syria is the division of the year into a rainy and a dry season. Toward the end of October heavy rains begin to fall, at intervals, for a day or several days at a time. These are what the Bible calls the early or former rain (Heb. yôreh) literally the pourer. It opens the agricultural year. The soil, hardened and cracked by the long summer, is loosened, and the farmer begins plowing. Till the end of November the average rainfall is not large, but it increases through December, January, and February, begins to abate in March, and is practically over by the middle of April. The latter rains (Heb. malqôsh) of Scripture are the heavy showers of March and April. Coming as they do before the harvest and the long summer drought, they are of far more importance to the country than all the rains of the winter months, and that is why these are passed over in Scripture, and emphasis is laid alone on the early and the latter rains. This has given most people to believe that there are only two intervals of rain in the Syrian year, at the vernal and autumnal equinox; but the whole of the winter is the rainy season, as indeed we are told in the well-known lines of the Song of Songs:

'Lo, the winter is past,
The rain is over and gone.'

Hail is common, and is often mingled with rain and with thunderstorms, which happen at intervals through the winter, and are frequent in spring. In May showers are very rare, and from then till October not only is there no rain, but a cloud seldom passes over the sky, and a thunderstorm is a miracle." See Dew; Palestine.

Figurative. Rain frequently furnishes the writers of the OT with forcible and appropriate metaphors: (1) Of the word of God (Isa. 55:10); as rain and snow return as vapor to the sky, but not without having first of all accomplished the purpose of their descent, so the word of God shall not return to Him without fulfilling its purpose. (2) The wise and refreshing doctrine of faithful ministers (Deut. 32:2; Job 29:23). (3) Of Christ in the communications of His grace (2 Sam. 23:4; Pss. 72:6; 84:6; Ezek. 34:26; Hos. 6:3). (4) Destructive, God's judgments (Job 20:23; Ps. 11:6; Ezek. 38:22), of a poor man oppressing the poor (Prov. 28:3).

RAINBOW (Heb. qesheth, "bow in the cloud," Gen. 9:13–16; Ezek. 1:28; Gk. iris, Rev. 4:3; 10:1). The token of the covenant that God made with Noah when he came out from the ark, that "never again shall the water become a flood to destroy all flesh." Although some interpreters have concluded that in establishing the rainbow as the sign of His love and the witness of His promise (Eccles. 43:11) God was appropriating something that already existed, we agree with Keil and Delitzsch (Com. on Gen. 9:13ff.) that "the establishment of the rainbow as a covenant sign of the promise that there should be no flood again, presupposes that it appears then for the first time in the vault and clouds of heaven. From this it may be inferred, not that it did not rain before the flood (see 2:5–6), but that the atmosphere was differently constituted." M.F.U.

Figurative. Springing as it does from the effect of the sun upon the dark mass of the clouds, it typifies the readiness of the heavenly to pervade the earthly; spread out as it is between heaven and earth, it proclaims peace between God and man; and while spanning the whole horizon, it teaches the all-embracing universality of the Noahic covenant. In the wondrous vision shown to John in the Apocalypse (Rev. 4:3), it is said that "there was a rainbow around the throne, like an emerald in appearance"; amid the awful vision of surpassing glory is seen the symbol of hope, the bright emblem of mercy and of love, looking forward from the awful judgments of the Great Tribulation to the establishment of the millennial kingdom and finally to the sinless eternal state.

RAISINS, RAISIN CAKES. Raisins appear in Scripture either as clusters or bunches of raisins (1 Sam. 25:18; 30:12; 2 Sam. 16:1; 1 Chron. 12:40; all from Heb. šimmûq), or as raisin cakes (2 Sam. 6:19; 1 Chron. 16:3; Song of Sol. 2:5; Isa. 22:24; Hos. 3:1; all from Heb. Lashîshâ). NASB "raisin cake" replaces KJV "flagon." See Vine.

RA'KEM (ra'kem; "variegated"). A descendant of Machir the son of Manasseh by his wife Maacah (1 Chron. 7:16).

RAK'KATH (rak'ath; Aram. "bank, shore"). A fortified city in the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35 only). From its relation to Hammath and Chinnereth it would seem to have been located on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, not far distant from the warm baths of Tiberias, which is on the site of ancient Hammath.

RAK'KON (rak'on; probably "shore"). One of the towns belonging to Dan (Josh. 19:46), apparently near Joppa. Location unknown, but Conder suggests Tell er-Reqqait, six miles N of Joppa.

RAM. The English rendering of two distinct Heb. words. The first, Heb. rām, “high,” is the name of three persons:

1. The son of Hezron, a descendant of Perez, of the tribe of Judah, born in Egypt after Jacob’s migration, as his name does not appear in Gen. 46:12. He is mentioned first in Ruth (4:19) and appears in the genealogy in 1 Chron. 2:9–10; Matt. 1:3–4; Luke 3:33, after 1875 B.C. In the KJV of Matt. 1:3–4; Luke 3:33, he is called Aram.

2. The firstborn of Jerahmeel and nephew of the preceding (1 Chron. 2:25, 27). The names of his sons were Maz, Jamin, and Eker.

3. A son of Barachel the Buzite is described as “of the family of Ram” (Job 32:2). Ewald identifies Ram with Aram, mentioned in Gen. 22:21, in connection with Uz and Buz, but Aram and Ram are differentiated in Heb., and Aram was not descended from Buz.

The second term, Heb. ayil, refers to the ram, or male sheep. See Animal Kingdom: Sheep; and also the article Sacrificial Offerings.

RAM, BATTERING. See Armor, Arms.

RA´MA (Matt. 2:18). See Ramah, no. 2.

RA´MAH (ra´ma; a “height”; cf. Ezek. 16:24). Many ancient cities and towns of Palestine were located on the tops of hills for safety purposes, and those that were specially conspicuous came to be called the Height; and this in time came to be used as a proper name. Several places in Palestine were called by this name. In the NASB we have several forms of the word—Ramath-mizpeh (Josh. 13:26), in Gilead (21:38), Ramoth of the Negev (1 Sam. 30:27), and Ramathaim-zophim (1:1).

1. Ramah of Asher, a town mentioned only (Josh. 19:29) in the description of the boundaries of Asher. It was evidently near the seacoast. Robinson (Bibl. Res., p. 63) supposes that Ramah was to be found in the village of Rameh, on the SE of Tyre, where several sarcophagi are to be seen. Smith (Bib. Dict.) prefers a place of the same name about three miles E of Tyre.

2. Ramah of Benjamin, one of the cities allotted to the tribe of Benjamin, mentioned with Gibeon and Beeroth, and in the same group with Jerusalem (Josh. 18:25). The next reference to it is in Judg. 4:5, where it is said that Deborah dwelt between Ramah and Bethel. Its position is clearly indicated in the story of the Levite (Judg. 19). In the account of his return from Bethlehem to Mt. Ephraim (v. 13) Ramah is mentioned with Gibeah as lying on the N of Jerusalem. Ramah and Gibeah were near the road on the right, about two miles apart. When Israel was divided with Ramah lying between the rival kingdoms, we read of Baasha, king of Israel, going up and fortifying it (1 Kings 15:17). His object was to guard the approach from the N to Jerusalem and thus prevent any of his subjects from going there to worship and so fall away to the king of Judah. The latter was alarmed at the erection of a fortress so near his capital and stopped the work by bribing the Syrians to invade northern Palestine (vv. 18–21), and then carrying off all the building material (v. 22). The position of Ramah is specifically given in the catalog of places (Isa. 10:28–32) disturbed by the gradual approach of the king of Assyria. At Michmash he crossed the ravine; and then successfully dislodged or alarmed Geba, Ramah, and Gibeah of Saul. Each of these may be recognized with almost absolute certainty at the present day. Geba is Jeba, on the S brink of the great valley; and a mile and a half beyond it, directly between it and the main road to the city, is er-Râm (its name the exact equivalent of ha-Râmah), on the elevation that its ancient name implies. Its distance from the city is two hours by foot, i.e., five English or six Roman miles. Nebuchadnezzar established his headquarters on the plain of Hamath, at Riblah (Jer. 39:5), and from thence sent his generals, who took Jerusalem. It was here that the Jewish captives were assembled in chains, among whom was Jeremiah himself (39:8–12; 40:1). Here were probably slaughtered those who, from weakness, age, or poverty, were not believed worthwhile to transport to Babylon, thus fulfilling part of the prophecy: “A voice is heard in Ramah, lamentation and bitter weeping. Rachel is weeping for her children,” etc. (31:15 cf. Matt. 2:18). Ramah was rebuilt and reoccupied by the descendants of its former inhabitants after the captivity (Ezra 2:26; Neh. 7:30). The Ramah in 11:33 is believed by some to occupy a different position in the list and may be a distinct place farther W, nearer the plain.

3. Ramah of Gilead (2 Kings 8:29; 2 Chron. 22:6), elsewhere Ramoth-gilead (which see).

4. Ramah of Naphtali, one of the fortified cities of Naphtali (Josh. 19:36), named between Adamah and Hazor. It would appear, in light of the order of the list, to have been in the mountainous country NW of the Sea of Galilee. It is the present Rameh, a large, well-built village, inhabited by Christians and Druses, surrounded by extensive olive groves, and provided with an excellent well. It stands upon the slope of a mountain in a beautiful plain SW of Safed, but without any relics of antiquity.

5. Ramah of Samuel, the birthplace and home of that prophet (1 Sam. 1:19; 2:11; etc.), elsewhere called Ramathaim-zophim (which see).

6. Ramah of the Negev. A place on the southern border of Simeon (Josh. 19:8), simply called Baal (1 Chron. 4:33) and probably the same as Bealoth (Josh. 15:24). It cannot be positively identified, though by some the supposition of Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 342) appears probable, that it is identical with Ramath-lehi. Some locate it at Khirbet Ghazzah, SE of Arad and on the SE edge of the Negev. See Ramoth of the Negev.

7. A place occupied by the Benjamites after their return from captivity (Neh. 11:33), which may be the Ramah of Benjamin (see no. 2), or the Ramah of Samuel; but its position in the list (remote from Geba, Michmash, Bethel, v. 31; cf. Ezra 2:26, 28) seems to move it farther W, to the neighborhood of Lod, Hadid, and Ono. The situation of the modern Ramleh agrees with this, a town too important and too well placed not to have existed in ancient times.

RAMATHA ʾIM-ZOʾPHIM (raʾma-thaʾim-zōʾfim; the “double height, watchers”). The birthplace of the prophet Samuel (1 Sam. 1:1), his permanent and official residence (7:17; 8:4), and the place of his burial (25:1). The name in its full form occurs only in 1 Sam. 1:1, everywhere else in the NASB and NIV it is called Ramah. Some locate this place near Gibeah of Saul (10:26; 14:16; 22:6; 26:1), whereas Keil and Delitzsch (Com., on 1 Sam. 1:1) say, “It is identical with Ramah of Benjamin, and was situated upon the site of the present village of er-Ram, two hours NW of Jerusalem.” It is not possible to locate the town with certainty.

RA ʾMATHITE (rāʾma-thīt; “inhabitant of Ramah”). An epithet of Shimei, who was over the vineyards of David (1 Chron. 27:27).

RA ʾMATH-LE ʾHI (rāʾmath-leʾhī; “lifting up of the jawbone”). Mentioned in Judg. 15:15–17 as the place where Samson slew a thousand Philistines with the jawbone of a donkey. Then he threw away the jawbone, and as a memorial of the event, and by a characteristic play upon the old name, he called the place Ramath-lehi, i.e., the lifting (or wielding) of the jawbone.

RA ʾMATH-MIZ ʾPEH, RA ʾMATH MIZ ʾPAH (rāʾmath-mizʾpe; the “height of the watchtower”). One of the northern landmarks of the territory of Gad (Josh. 13:26). It was probably the same as that early sanctuary at which Jacob and Laban set up their heap of stones (Gen. 31:48–49) and which received the names of Mizpeh, Galeed, and Jegar-sahadutha: and it seems probable that all these are identical with Ramoth-gilead, notorious in the later history of the nation.

RAM'ESSES, RAAM'SES, RAM'SES (ram'e-sēz; ram'sēz).

1. A NE Egyptian city of Goshen, first mentioned in Gen. 47:1–11, where it is related that a possession was given to Jacob and his sons “in the land of Rameses,” which was in “the land of Goshen.” The name Raamses occurs in Ex. 1:11 as one of the two store cities built together with Pithom by the enslaved Hebrews. Archaeology has fixed Pithom at Tell el-Retabah and Rameses at Qantir, Hyksos Avaris, and indicates that these cities were (allegedly, at least) built by the famous Rameses II (c. 1290–1224 B.C.). But it seems these towns were merely rebuilt or enlarged by the great pharaoh. The reference in 1:11 must be to the older city Zoan-Tanis, where the oppressed Israelites labored centuries earlier. Accordingly 1:11 does not conflict with 1 Kings 6:1, which places the Exodus about 1441 B.C., and the name Raamses is to be construed as a modernization of an archaic place name like Dan for Laish in Gen. 14:14. Since Zoan-Tanis was a flourishing city during the Hyksos Period (before 1570 B.C.), there was ample time for the enslaved Israelites to have built the earlier city; according to the early date of the Exodus, they entered Egypt c. 1870 B.C. However, many scholars employ this verse and archaeological data to substantiate a 1280 B.C. date for the Exodus, or even later, and do not recognize Raamses as a modernization for Zoan-Tanis.

2. The name of eleven kings who ruled Egypt between about 1300 and 1075 B.C. Two of the Ramessides have special significance for the biblical narrative. Rameses II (1299–1232) is commonly considered to be the pharaoh of the Exodus by those who subscribe to the late date of the Exodus. If one holds to the early date, the Israelites were established on the hills of Palestine while Rameses marched along the Mediterranean coastal plain to do battle with the Hittites and rebuild the Egyptian Empire. Rameses III (1198–1167) repelled the Philistines from the shores of Egypt. They then settled in the plain of Philistia in Canaan and became a continuing threat to the Hebrews.

RAMI'AH (ra-mī'a; “Jehovah is lifted up”). An Israelite of the sons of Parosh who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:25), 456 B.C.

RA'MOTH (ra'moth; “heights”). One of the four Levitical cities of Issachar (1 Chron. 6:73), although Jarmuth appears (Josh. 21:28–29) in place of Ramoth. See also Jeremoth, no. 8; Ramoth-Gilead; and Ramoth of the Negev.

RA'MOTH-GIL'EAD (ra'moth-gil'i-ad; “heights of Gilead,” 1 Kings 4:13; 22:3; 2 Kings 8:28; etc.; “Ramoth in Gilead,” Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:8; 21:38; 1 Chron. 6:80; etc.; “Ramah” [NASB, KJV; “Ramoth,” NIV] simply, 2 Kings 8:29; 2 Chron. 22:6). One of the chief cities of Gad, on the E of the Jordan. It was allotted to the Levites and appointed a city of refuge (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:8), which would indicate that it was a place of importance even at the period of the conquest. In the time of Solomon it was the residence of one of his twelve deputies and was the center of a district that comprised the towns of Jair and the entire region of Argob (1 Kings 4:13). Later it fell into the hands of Ben-hadad, king of Syria, and proved the occasion of Ahab's death, who with Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, endeavored to retake it (22:3–40; 2 Chron. 18:1–34). It appears to have been won back by Israel, for it was in holding it against Hazael that Joram received the wounds that obliged him to return to Jezreel (2 Kings 8:28; 9:14); and it was while Jehu was maintaining possession of Ramoth that he was anointed king of Israel and set out at the head of the army to slay his master (9:1–14). It has been identified by Nelson Glueck with Tell Ramith in N Transjordan, after previous incorrect identifications with Jerash (Gerasa) and es-Salt by former scholars.

RA'MOTH OF THE NEGEV (ra'moth of the ne'gev). Mentioned (1 Sam. 30:27, "south Ramoth," KJV) as one of the cities to which David sent portions of the spoils of the Amalekites. It is doubtless the same as Ramah of the Negev (which see, Ramah, no. 6).

RAMS' HORNS. See Music.

RAMS' SKINS. Dyed red rams' skins formed part of the offering made by the Israelites to the Tabernacle (which see).

RANGE. A KJV term used (1) for a cooking stove (Heb. kîr, Lev. 11:35), (2) a rank or row of soldiers (Heb. śdērâ, 2 Kings 11:8, 15; 2 Chron. 23:14), (3) planks of cedar (Heb. śdērâ, 1 Kings 6:9), or (4) a range of mountains (Num. 27:12; Deut. 34:49, NIV).

RANSOM (Heb. from pādâ, "release"; kōper, "forgiveness"; or gā'al). A price paid to recover a person or thing (1 Cor. 6:19–20). A ransom is that which is substituted for the party (Ex. 21:30). The people of Jehovah are redeemed by wonderful miracles (Isa. 35:10) and are called "the ransomed of the Lord" (51:11; cf. 35:9; 62:12). See Redemption; Redeemer.

RA'PHA, or RA'PHAH (ra'fa; "He, i.e., God, has healed").

1. The last named of the sons of Benjamin, son of Jacob (1 Chron. 8:2, "Rapha"), after 1900 B.C.

2. The son of Binea and father of Eleasah, the eighth in descent from Jonathan, the son of Saul (1 Chron. 8:37, "Raphah"; Rephaiah in 1 Chron. 9:43), after 1000 B.C.

RA'PHU (ra'fû; "healed, cured"). The father of Palti, which latter represented the tribe of Benjamin among those sent to spy out the Promised Land (Num. 13:9), 1440 B.C.

RAS SHAM'RA (ras sham'ra). Present-day Minet el-Beida, an important archaeological site excavated 1929–37, located on the N Syrian coast about eight miles N of Latakia and opposite the pointed peninsula of Cyprus. The French under C. F. A. Schaeffer began excavation of Ras Shamra (ancient Ugarit) in 1929 and conducted eleven seasons of excavation before the outbreak of World War II. Following the war Schaeffer again assumed leadership of the dig (1948–69). After others had briefly directed the work, Marguerite Yon of the University of Lyons, France, was appointed new director in 1978 and is currently responsible for the excavation of the site. The archaeologists have uncovered a great palace (400 by 270 feet), temple areas, a residential area, an artisans' quarter and especially archives in the palace, the temple of Dagon, and private homes. The total collection is in no less than seven languages written in five scripts, mostly during the fifteenth through the thirteenth centuries B.C. Of special interest and most numerous in the archives were materials written in a new Canaanite alphabetic script of thirty letters. This body of literature is composed in a dialect closely allied to the Heb. of the Mosaic era. The cuneiform material is to be dated in the early fourteenth century B.C. The language is called "Ugaritic," after the ancient city that was known as Ugarit. The great value of these cuneiform texts lies in the remarkable light they shed on the character of Canaanite religion. We now know the Canaanite picture well. El and Baal were the two great gods. Anath, Astarte, and Asherah were the three goddesses that were patronesses of sex and war. The Ugaritic literature has shown the moral depravity and decadence of Canaanite cultures and demonstrates that the divine command to completely destroy Canaanite cults and their devotees was justified (cf. Gen. 15:16). Canaanite religion with its orgiastic nature worship, the cult of fertility in the form of serpent symbols, sensuous nudity, and gross mythology is revealed in its stark reality in these texts. No longer can critics accuse the God of Israel of injustice in ordering the extermination of these debilitating cults. It was a question of Israel's destroying or being destroyed. Ugaritic epic literature is of first-rate importance in understanding OT religion; and these religious texts themselves have shed abundant light on OT poetry, vocabulary, and Heb. etymology and syntax. The discovery at Ras Shamra-Ugarit constitutes one of the major archaeological triumphs of the twentieth century. M.F.U.

RAVEN. See Animal Kingdom.

RAVENOUS, RAVIN. Mentioned in Gen. 49:27, "Benjamin is a ravenous wolf," NASB and NIV; "shall ravin as a wolf," KJV; cf. Nah. 2:12; Ezek. 22:25, 27. In Ps. 22:13 the Heb. in some versions is rendered "ravening": "They open wide their mouth at me, as a ravening and a roaring lion."

RAZOR. See Barber; Hair.

REAI'A, REAI'AH (re-a'ya; "Jehovah has seen").

1. A descendant of Shobal, the son of Judah (1 Chron. 4:2). In 2:52 he is called (apparently) Haroeh (harō'eh, "the seer").

2. A Reubenite, son of Micah, and apparently leader of his tribe (1 Chron. 5:5; "Reaia," KJV), before 720 B.C.

3. The children of Reaiah were a family of Temple servants who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:50), before 536 B.C.

REAPING.

Figurative. The relation between reaping and sowing, recognized among all people, has suggested many illustrations. In the Scripture reaping is frequently used in the figurative sense: (1) The reward of wickedness (Prov. 22:8; Hos. 8:7; 10:13; Gal. 6:8). (2) The reward of righteousness (Hos. 10:12; Gal. 6:8-9); ministers receiving temporal support for spiritual labors (1 Cor. 9:11). (3) The final judgment (Matt. 13:30, 39; Rev. 14:14-16). (4) "The plowman will overtake the reaper" (Amos 9:13) is another form of "Indeed, your threshing will last for you until grape gathering" (Lev. 26:5), the meaning of which is that while one is plowing the land another shall be cutting the ripe grain, so abundant and continuous shall be the harvests. See Agriculture.

RE'BA (re'ba; "fourth"). One of the five Midianite kings slain by the Israelites in Moab (Num. 31:8; Josh. 13:21), about 1200 B.C.

REBEC'CA, REBEK'AH (re-bek'a; a "rope, noose," as of a maiden who ensnares by her beauty). The daughter of Bethuel, Abraham's nephew (Gen. 22:23).

Marriage. In arranging for the marriage of his son Isaac, Abraham entrusted the commission to his servant (generally supposed to be Eliezer) and made him swear not to take a wife for him from the daughters of the Canaanites but to bring one from Abraham's native country and his kindred. He went, therefore, to the city of Nahor, and stopped by the well outside the city at the time when the women came out to draw water. He then prayed to Jehovah, fixing upon a sign by the occurrence of which he might decide upon the maiden whom Jehovah had chosen to be the wife of Isaac. Rebekah did just what had been fixed upon as a token, and Abraham's servant pressed his suit so earnestly that she and her family consented to her marriage, and she started for her future home the following day. Arriving in Canaan, she was received by Isaac and became his wife (Gen. 24).

Mother. For nineteen years after marriage Rebekah remained childless; then, after the prayers of Isaac and her journey to inquire of the Lord, Esau and Jacob were born (Gen.

25:21–26). Jacob was the favorite of his mother (25:28), whereas Esau was a source of grief both to her and Isaac (26:35).

In Philistia. Driven by famine into the country of the Philistines, Isaac was fearful lest the beauty of his wife should be a source of danger to him and therefore declared that she was his sister. Before long the deception was discovered, and Abimelech, the king, commanded that no one should molest her, on punishment of death (Gen. 26:1–11).

Suggests Deception. Some time after that Rebekah suggested the deceit that Jacob practiced upon his father, assisted him in carrying it out, and prevented the consequences of Esau's anger by sending Jacob away to her own kindred (Gen. 27:5–46).

Death and Burial. The Scriptures do not state when or where the death of Rebekah took place, but it has been conjectured that it occurred while Jacob was absent in Paddan-aram, probably before 1950 B.C. The place of her burial, mentioned by Jacob on his deathbed (Gen. 49:31), was in the field of Machpelah. Paul (Rom. 9:10–12) referred to Rebekah as being made acquainted with the purpose of God regarding her children before they were born.

RE' CAH (re'ka). In 1 Chron. 4:12 Beth-rapha, Paseah, and Tehinnah the father of Ir-nahash are said to have been “the men of Rechah” (“Rechah,” KJV). It is an unidentified place in Judah.

RECEIPT OF CUSTOMS (Matt. 9:9, KJV). The tax office (so NASB). See Tax-gatherer.

RECEIVER (Heb. shāqal, to “weigh,” Isa. 33:18, KJV). One who tested the weight of gold and silver. The NASB renders “he who weighs,” and the NIV, “the one who took the revenue.”

RE' CHAB (re'kab; “charioteer, horseman, rider”).

1. One of the two “sons of Rimmon the Beerothite” who slew Ish-bosheth, the son of Saul, in the hope of obtaining favor with David. But when the king heard of their crime he was so filled with abhorrence that he caused them to be put to death (2 Sam. 4:2–12), about 992 B.C.

2. The father of Jehonadab (or Jonadab), who assisted Jehu in destroying the worshippers of Baal (2 Kings 10:15–28), before 842 B.C. He was the ancestor of the Rechabites (Jer. 35:6, 8, 14, 16, 19).

3. The father of Malchijah, which latter was ruler of part of Beth-haccherem and repaired the Refuse Gate of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 3:14), 445 B.C.

RECH' ABITES (rek'a-bīts). Descendants (assuming “father,” Jer. 35:8, to be taken literally) of Jonadab the son of Rechab. They appear in sacred history but once, as is fully told in chap. 35, their mode of life being described in vv. 6–11. Their ancestor Jonadab son of Rechab is presumably the same as Jehonadab son of Rechab (2 Kings 10:15, 23). This is all that we know of him, though John of Jerusalem says he was a disciple of Elisha.

In 1 Chron. 2:55 “the house of Rechab” is connected in kinship with the Kenites. Jehonadab's connection with Jehu shows that Jehonadab was at that time in the land of Israel, but the two facts are not definite enough to conflict.

The Rechabite movement, like that of the Nazirites of Amos 2:11, seems to have been the result of an attempt to stem the tide of luxury and license that threatened to sap the strength of the people and the state. A return to the simplicity of nomadic life was required of the Rechabites and was enforced from generation to generation, though the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar drove them to seek other shelter in Jerusalem. It was here that they were tested by Jeremiah under divine command and for their fidelity received the blessing, “Jonadab the son of Rechab shall not lack a man to stand before Me always” (Jer. 35:19). This is sometimes understood in a liturgical sense of ministering before the Lord (Deut. 10:8; 18:5, 7; cf. Gen. 18:22; Judg. 20:28) and is held, not unreasonably, to imply that the Rechabites were adopted into Israel and incorporated with the Levites. R. Judah is cited as having mentioned a Jewish tradition that their daughters married Levites and that their children ministered in the Temple.

The LXX in the title of Ps. 71 mentions the sons of Jonadab. In Neh. 3:14 Malchijah, son of Rechab, repairs a gate of the city. In 1 Chron. 2:55 the “Kenites who came from Hammath, the father of the house of Rechab,” are scribes. According to Hegesippus, “one of the priests of the sons of Rechab, the son of Rechabim, who are mentioned by Jeremiah the prophet,” cried out protesting against the slaying of James the Just. Followers of the sect still are to be found in Iraq and Yemen.

A parallel has been sought in the Wahabys, followers of Asd-ul-Nahab, during the last and present century. Zealous to protect his countrymen from the vices of Turkish civilization, he forbade the use of opium and tobacco as Muhammad did wine. They have been called the Puritans of Islam; and their rapid and formidable development has been thought to present a strong analogy to the political influence and tenacious vitality of Jehonadab and his descendants. RECONCILIATION. The restoration of friendship and fellowship after estrangement. OT reconciliation contains the idea of an “atonement” or covering for sin (Lev. 6:30; 16:20; Ezek. 45:20). In the NT it possesses the idea “to change thoroughly” (Gk. katallassō, 2 Cor. 5:18–19), “to change thoroughly from one position to another” (apokatallattō, Eph. 2:16; Col. 1:20, 22). Reconciliation, therefore, means that someone or something is completely altered and adjusted to a required standard (cf. Rom. 5:6–11). By the death of Christ the world is changed in its relationship to God. Man is reconciled to God, but God is not said to be reconciled to man. By this change lost humanity is rendered savable. As a result of the changed position of the world through the death of Christ the divine attitude toward the human family can no longer be the same. God is enabled to deal with lost souls in the light of what Christ has accomplished. Although this seems to be a change in God, it is not a reconciliation; it is rather a “propitiation.” God places full efficacy in the finished work of Christ and accepts it. Through His acceptance of it He remains righteous and the justifier of any sinner who believes in Jesus as his reconciliation. When an individual sees and trusts in the value of Christ’s atoning death, he becomes reconciled to God, hostility is removed, friendship and fellowship eventuate. M.F.U.

RECORDER (Heb. mazkâr, “rememberer”). A state officer of high rank among the Jews. Among the several new posts created by David when he ascended the throne, was the “recorder” (2 Sam. 8:16; 20:24; 1 Kings 4:3; 2 Kings 18:18, 37; 2 Chron. 34:8; Isa. 36:3, 22). The recorder had to keep the annals of the kingdom; and his office was a different one from that of the “commander” (which see). The latter had to draw up the public documents; the recorder had to keep them and incorporate them in the connected history of the nation. Both of these offices are met with throughout the East, and David apparently followed Egyptian models in instituting this office.

RED. See Color.

REDEEM. See Redeemer; Redemption.

REDEEMED. The children of Israel are called “the redeemed of the Lord” (Isa. 62:12; cf. 35:9), as being emancipated from Babylonian captivity and with further reference to spiritual deliverance from the bondage of sin. See Redeemer; Redemption.

REDEEMER (Heb. gō·ēl, the “nearest kinsman”). According to the custom of retribution, it fell to the nearest kinsman to avenge the blood of a slain relative; to protect the life and property of a relative. This obligation was called by the Israelites redeeming, and the man who was bound to fulfill it a redeemer. The law and duty of the redeemer are assumed by Moses as a matter of tradition and brought under theocratic principle. Redeemers are reckoned full brothers, next to them the father’s brothers, then full cousins, finally the other blood relatives of the clan (Lev. 25:48–49). Since the Hebrews were an agricultural people, the chief function of the redeemer (gō·ēl) was to “redeem” the land that had been sold by a brother in distress. When the nation came into bondage it needed a redeemer through the “redemption” of the lands to be secured, and they looked to Jehovah to become their gō·ēl. Thus the Exile gave a force and a meaning to the term more striking than it could have had before. Of thirty-three passages in the OT in which gō·ēl is applied to God, nineteen occur in Isaiah, and in that part of the compilation that deals with conditions existing in the Babylonian Exile (Isa. 48:20; 52:9; 62:12; Ps. 107:2). In spiritualizing the term gō·ēl, Isaiah (Isa. 49:26; cf. Ps. 19:14) places it on a par with “savior.” See Kinsman; Redemption.

REDEMPTION (Heb. pādâ, to “deliver,” to “sever”). The thoughts constantly impressed upon the Israelites were that they were a people belonging to Jehovah, that He had redeemed them (i.e., severed them from bondage), and that Canaan, with all it might produce, was the gift of God, used by the Israelites as a bounty from Jehovah. Therefore all Israel owed service to God and were, in spirit at least, to be priests unto the Most High. But because Levi and his descendants were set apart for the service of the sanctuary, all others were to be redeemed in the person of the firstborn both of man and beast. Firstborn sons, so far as the mothers were concerned, were presented to the Lord on the fortieth day after their birth and were redeemed for five shekels (Num. 18:16; cf. Ex. 13:15; Luke 2:27). The firstlings of oxen, sheep, and goats were to be brought to the sanctuary within a year, dating from the eighth day after birth, and sacrificed (Num. 18:17; see Sacrifices). The firstborn of a donkey, an unclean animal, was required by the original prescription (Ex. 13:13; 34:20) to be redeemed with a lamb, and if not redeemed, put to death; later, the law provided that it was to be redeemed with money, the amount being according to the priest’s valuation, with a fifth part added (Lev. 27:27; Num. 18:15). With regard to the products of the soil, the best of the firstlings were sacred to Jehovah as the Lord of the soil (Ex. 23:19) and were given to the priest to present to Jehovah. In addition to individual offerings, the congregation as a body was required annually to offer to the Lord, by way of thanksgiving for the blessing of the harvest, a firstling sheaf at the Passover (which see). These were not to be burned but given to the priests for their use, with the provision that only those who were ceremonially clean could eat thereof. The amount of offerings of this kind was not specified by the law but was left to each individual’s discretion. See Tithes.

REDEMPTION (Gk. apolutrōsis, a “loosing” away; lutrōsis, a “loosing,” particularly by paying a price; for other terms, see Strong’s Concordance). A comprehensive term employed in theology with reference to the special intervention of God for the salvation of mankind. Its meaning centers in the atoning work of Christ as the price paid for human redemption, and on account of which Christ is called the Redeemer. But along with this are other conceptions relating to the necessity for redemption, also the various stages and measures in the redemptive economy and the effects of God's gracious work.

1. Christ is man's Redeemer; but as such He is divinely appointed. The redemption He wrought manifests not only the love of the Son but also that of the Father. The Holy Spirit as well is active in the administration of redemption. The Trinity is a redemptional Trinity (see Rom. 5:8; John 3:16; Matt. 28:19). Still, for the reason above named, the Son of God is the Redeemer of mankind (see Rom. 3:24; Gal. 3:13; Eph. 1:7; 1 Pet. 1:18–19; 1 Cor. 1:30; cf. Matt. 20:28; 1 Tim. 2:6).

2. Redemption implies antecedent bondage. Thus the word refers primarily to man's subjection to the dominion and curse of sin (see Gal. 3:13; 1 Cor. 15:56). Also in a secondary sense to the bondage of Satan as the head of the kingdom of darkness, and to the bondage of death as the penalty of sin (see Acts 26:18; Heb. 2:14–15). Redemption from this bondage is represented in the Scriptures as both universal and limited. It is universal in the sense that its advantages are freely offered to all. It is limited in the sense that it is effectual only with respect to those who meet the conditions of salvation announced in the gospel. For such it is effectual in that they receive forgiveness of sins and the power to lead a new and holy life. Satan is no longer their captor, and death has lost its sting and terror. They look forward to the redemption of the body (see Heb. 2:9; Acts 3:19; Eph. 1:7; Acts 26:18; 2 Tim. 2:26; 1 Cor. 15:55–57; Rom. 8:15–23). See Incarnation; Atonement; Resurrection. E.MCC.

RED HEIFER. See Sacrifices; Uncleanness.

RED SEA (Heb. yam sūp, “sea of reeds”). The Reed, or Papyrus, Sea that the Israelites miraculously crossed “may reasonably be supposed to be the Papyrus Lake or Papyrus Marsh, known from the Egyptian documents from the thirteenth century, to be located near Tanis” (W. F. Albright, O. T. Commentary [1948], p. 142). The topography of this region has been altered to some degree since the digging of the Suez Canal. Lake Ballah has disappeared. In the fifteenth century B.C. (taking the early date of the Exodus) the vicinity of Lake Timsah between Lake Ballah and the Bitter Lakes may well have been more marshy than it is at the present day. Israel's crossing of the “Reed Sea” was undoubtedly in the vicinity of Lake Timsah or just N of it (cf. G. E. Wright and F. Filson, The Westminster Historical Atlas to the Bible [1945], p. 38). The question of whether the Israelites crossed the Red Sea (the northern tip of the Gulf of Suez) or Sea of Reeds (the Bitter Lakes area to the N of the Gulf of Suez) is much debated and cannot be argued in detail here. It is of some interest to note, however, that in support of the Red Sea the LXX (and Acts 7:36; Heb. 11:29) rendered yam sūp in the OT by the Red Sea. Also, if according to Ex. 10:19 a mighty W wind blew the locusts from the entire land of Egypt into the yam sūp, it would seem that the body of water large enough and properly placed to drown the locusts would have to be the Red Sea and not Sea of Reeds.

The Red Sea is a 1,350-mile-long body of water extending from the Indian Ocean to the Suez Gulf. It is more than 7,200 feet deep and more than 100 miles wide. The Arabian Peninsula borders on its E coast. Egypt, Cush, and Punt of ancient times border on the W. It has two arms, one the Gulf of Suez and the other the Gulf of Aqaba. Aqaba figures prominently in the OT (cf. 1 Kings 22:48–49; 2 Chron. 9:21). M.F.U.; H.F.V.

RED SEA, PASSAGE OF. See Exodus.

REED.

Figurative. “A reed shaken by the wind” (Matt. 11:7; Luke 7:24) is a symbol of a fickle person; “a bruised reed ... and a dimly burning wick” (Isa. 42:3; Matt. 12:20) represent those who are spiritually miserable and helpless. A forceful figure is used by the prophet Ahijah (1 Kings 14:15), “The Lord will strike Israel, as a reed is shaken in the water,” meaning that as the reeds are swept by the raging current, so shall Israel be helpless before the judgments of God. A “crushed reed” (Isa. 36:6), or “staff made of reed” (Ezek. 29:6), represents an uncertain support, since it is liable to break when one leans on it and its jagged edges pierce the shoulder of the man who grasps it. See Vegetable Kingdom: Reeds, Rushes.

REED. Better, measuring rod or reed, a linear measure in biblical times. See Metrology.

REELA'IAH (re-el-a'ya; “Jehovah has caused to tremble”). One of the “people of the province” who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2), about 536 B.C. In Neh. 7:7 his name is given as Raamiah.

REFINE, REFINER. For refining as an occupation, see Handicrafts: Refiner.

Figurative. The Bible notices of refining are chiefly of a figurative nature: of the corrective judgments of God (Isa. 1:25; 48:10; Jer. 9:7; Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:2–3); the purity of God’s word (Pss. 119:140; 18:30, “tried”); failure of means to effect an end is graphically depicted in Jer. 6:29, “The bellows blow fiercely, the lead is consumed by the fire; in vain the refining goes on, but the wicked are not separated.”

REFORMATION (Gk. diorthōsis, “a setting right,” “a making straight,” Heb. 9:10). Refers to the times of perfecting things, by a change of external forms into vital and spiritual worship, referring to the times of the Messiah and the salvation He brought.

REFUGE, CITIES OF. These were six in number (Num. 35): Kadesh, in Naphtali; Shechem, in Mt. Ephraim; Hebron, in Judah (these were W of Jordan); Golan, in Bashan; Ramoth in Gilead, in Gad; Bezer, in Reuben (E of Jordan). See Cities of Refuge.

REFUGE, CITY OF. See Cities of Refuge.

REFUSE. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words.

1. In the case of sacrifices, the refuse (“dung,” KJV; “offal,” NIV) was burned outside the camp (Ex. 29:14; Lev. 4:11; 8:17; Num. 19:5); hence the extreme disgrace of the threat in Mal. 2:3. Particular directions were laid down in the law to enforce cleanliness with regard to human excrement (Deut. 23:12–13). It was the grossest insult to turn a man’s house into a receptacle for it (2 Kings 10:27; Ezra 6:11; Dan. 2:5; 3:29, “dunghill,” KJV); public establishments of that nature are still found in the large towns of the East. The use of this substance among the Jews was twofold: as manure and as fuel (which see).

2. The “refuse of the wheat” (Heb. mapāl; Amos 8:6) was the waste, the chaff, which was sold to the poor by their rich oppressors.

REFUSE GATE (Neh. 2:13; 3:13–14; 12:31; “dung port,” or “gate,” KJV and NIV). A gate of ancient Jerusalem located at the SW angle of Mt. Zion. It was doubtless so called because of the piles of sweepings and garbage in the valley of Tophet below.

RE'GEM (re'gem; perhaps from Arab. ragm, “a friend”). The first named of the sons of Jahdai, who appears to have been of the family of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:47), after 1440 B.C.

RE'GEMME'LECH (re'gem-me'lek; “friend of the king”). The name of a person sent, with Sharezer, by “the town of Bethel ... to seek the favor of the Lord” (Zech. 7:2), 518 B.C.

REGENERATION (Gk. paliggenesia, “a being born again”). The spiritual change wrought in man by the Holy Spirit, by which he becomes the possessor of a new life. It is to be distinguished from justification, because justification is a change in our relation to God, whereas regeneration is a change in our moral and spiritual nature. The necessity, in the one case, is in the fact of guilt; in the other, depravity. They coincide in point of time and are alike instantaneous, and thus are both covered by the general term conversion, as that term is popularly and loosely applied (see Conversion). Still they are distinct in that the one is the removal of guilt by divine forgiveness, and the other is the change from the state of depravity, or spiritual death, to that of spiritual life. Regeneration is also to be distinguished from sanctification, inasmuch as the latter is the work of God in developing the new life and bringing it to perfection, whereas the former is the beginning of that life. See Sanctification.

Regeneration is represented in the Scriptures principally by such terms as “born again,” “born of God,” “born of the Spirit” (see John 3:3–13; 1 John 3:9; 4:7; 5:1; 1 Pet. 1:23). There are also other forms of expression of deep significance with reference to the same great fact (see Ezek. 36:25–26; Eph. 4:22–24; 2 Cor. 5:17; Col. 3:9–10).

The work of regeneration is specially ascribed in the Scriptures to the Holy Spirit (see John 3:5–8; Titus 3:5). This is in full accord with the whole tenor of special revelation in representing the agency of the Spirit in the economy of salvation. (See Holy Spirit.)

Regeneration by baptism, or baptismal regeneration, has been a widely prevalent error. This is due in part to an improper use of the term. A proselyte from heathenism to the Jewish religion was said to be “born again.” A corresponding use of the term crept into the early Christian church. Those who received baptism, the initiatory rite of church membership, were said to be regenerated; but this was probably without any intention of denying the deeper work of the Holy Spirit. It was only a loose and improper way of indicating the change in a man’s external relationship. And it is proper to say that some of the advocates of the baptismal regeneration in the Church of England still use the term in this sense and make a distinction between regeneration as effected by baptism and the great work of spiritual renewal. But the error has its broader basis in an unscriptural idea of the character and efficiency of the sacraments. And thus it is held not only by Roman Catholics but also by many Lutherans and many in the Church of England. (See Sacraments.)

REHABI’AH (re-ha-bī’a; “Jehovah is enlarged”). The only son of Eliezer, the son of Moses (1 Chron. 23:17; 24:21; 26:24), after 1400 B.C.

RE’HOB (re’hob; “wide street, open space”).

1. The father of Hadadezer, king of Zobah, whom David defeated at “the River,” i.e., the Euphrates (2 Sam. 8:3, 12), before 986 B.C.

2. A Levite who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:11), 445 B.C.

3. A city on the northern border of Palestine, marking the limit of the exploration of the spies in that direction (Num. 13:21; 2 Sam. 10:8; “Beth-rehob” in 10:6). It was probably in the tribe of Naphtali, the modern Tell el-Kadhy (Judg. 18:28).

4. A town allotted to Asher (Josh. 19:28), close to Sidon.

5. Another town in Asher (Josh. 19:30). One of these two towns was assigned to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. 21:31; 1 Chron. 6:75) and was not possessed by the Israelites (Judg. 1:31).

REHOBOS’AM (rē-ho-bō’am; “enlarger of the people”). The son of Solomon by the Ammonite princess Naamah (1 Kings 14:21, 31). He was born about 972 B.C.

Accession. Rehoboam selected Shechem as the place of his coronation, probably as an act of concession to the Ephraimites, who were always dissatisfied with their inferior position in the confederation of the tribes (1 Kings 12:1; 2 Chron. 10:1), about 931 B.C.

Insurrection. The people demanded a remission of the severe burdens imposed by Solomon, and Rehoboam promised them an answer in three days, during which time he consulted first his father's counselors and then the young men "who grew up with him and served him." Rejecting the advice of his elders to conciliate the people at the beginning of his reign, he returned as his reply the bravado of his contemporaries. Thereupon rose the formidable song of insurrection, heard once before when the tribes quarreled after David's return from the war with Absalom. Rehoboam sent Hadoram to reduce the rebels to reason, but he was stoned to death by them; whereupon the king and his attendants fled to Jerusalem. He then assembled an army of 180,000 men from the two faithful tribes of Judah and Benjamin, in the hope of reconquering Israel. The expedition, however, was forbidden by the prophet Shemaiah (1 Kings 12:1–24); still, during Rehoboam's lifetime peaceful relations between Israel and Judah were never restored (2 Chron. 12:15; 1 Kings 14:30).

Reign. Rehoboam now strengthened the territories that remained to him by building a number of fortresses (2 Chron. 11:6–10). The pure worship of God was maintained in Judah. But Rehoboam did not check the introduction of pagan abominations into his capital; the worship of Astoreth was allowed to exist, "Asherim" were set up, and the worst immoralities were tolerated (1 Kings 14:22–24; 2 Chron. 12:1).

Egyptian Invasion. In the fifth year of Rehoboam's reign the country was invaded by Egyptians and other African nations under Shishak (Sheshonk I), numbering 1,200 chariots, 60,000 horses, and a vast multitude of infantry. The fortresses about Jerusalem and that city itself were taken, and Rehoboam purchased peace by delivering up the Temple treasures. Shishak left a record of this military venture on the wall of the temple of Amon-Re at Karnak (Luxor), where it may be seen today. After this great humiliation the moral condition of Judah seems to have improved (2 Chron. 12:12) and the rest of Rehoboam's life to have been unmarked by any events of importance. He died in 913 B.C., after a reign of seventeen years, having ascended the throne in 931 B.C. at the age of forty-one (1 Kings 14:21; 2 Chron. 12:13). He had eighteen wives, sixty concubines, twenty-eight sons, and sixty daughters. Of all his wives Maacah was his favorite, and to her son Abijah he bequeathed his kingdom (2 Chron. 11:18–22).

REHO'BOTH (rē-ho'both; "broad places").

1. One of the four cities founded by Asshur (Gen. 10:11–12), the others being Nineveh, Calah, and Resen. Rehoboth was evidently a part of the great city of Nineveh.

The words "rehoboth ir" are probably to be translated as they are in the Vulg. and in the margin of the KJV, "the streets of the city," i.e., of Nineveh. Rehoboth-Ir is best regarded as a suburb of greater Nineveh, which in course of time came to be included in the city's vast marketplaces.

2. The third of the series of wells dug by Isaac (Gen. 26:22). A Wadi Ruhaibeh, containing the ruins of a town of the same name, with a large well, is crossed by the road from Khan en-Nukhl to Hebron, by which Palestine is entered on the S. It lies about nineteen miles SW of Beersheba.

3. The city of a certain Shaul, one of the early Edomite kings (Gen. 36:37; 1 Chron. 1:48). Its location is uncertain.

RE'HUM (rē'hum; "compassionate").

1. One of the “people of the province” who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2), about 536 B.C. In Neh. 7:7 he is called Nehum.

2. An officer of the king of Persia, called the “commander,” perhaps lieutenant governor of the province of Samaria, who united with Shimshai in writing a letter to Artaxerxes that influenced him against the Jews (Ezra 4:8–9, 17, 23), 465 B.C.

3. A Levite, son of Bani, who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:17), 445 B.C.

4. One of the “leaders of the people” who signed with Nehemiah the covenant to serve Jehovah (Neh. 10:25), 445 B.C.

5. One of the priests who accompanied Zerubbabel at the same time as no. 4 (Neh. 12:3).

RE'I (rē'i; “friendly, sociable”). One of David’s friends who refused to espouse the cause of Adonijah (1 Kings 1:8), 960 B.C.

REINS. A KJV term used to translate Heb. kilyâ, “kidneys,” and ḥālāṣayim, “loins” (Isa. 11:5); and Gk. nephros, “kidneys.” In Isa. 11:5, the NASB uses “loins” and “waist.” The NIV translates “waist.” Elsewhere “reins” is replaced by “kidneys” (Job 16:13); “heart” (Job 19:27, marg., “loins”); “mind,” or “heart” (NIV; see Pss. 7:9; 16:7; 26:2; Jer. 12:2; 17:10; 20:12; Rev. 2:23; in all verses in the NASB, marg., “kidneys”); and “pierced within” (Ps. 73:21), or “inward parts” (139:13; Lam. 3:13; both NASB marg., “kidneys”). See Loins; Kidney.

RE'KEM (re'kem; “variegation”).

1. One of the five Midianite kings slain by the Israelites along with Balaam (Num. 31:8; Josh. 13:21), c. 1380 B.C.

2. One of the sons of Hebron and father of Shammai, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:43–44), after 1380 B.C.

RELEASE A term used in various ways in the KJV, NIV, and NASB. Heb. sh□mittâ, “a remitting,” appears in Deut. 15:1–3; 31:10, with the meaning of release or remission, and is discussed under the latter term. Another term, Heb. ḥānāḥâ, appears in the KJV of Esther 2:18 as release, but in the NASB and NIV as holiday (which see).

The Gk. term apoluō, “to release,” referred to a custom that prevailed of allowing some prominent criminal to go free at the Passover (Matt. 27:15; Luke 23:17; John 18:39). The origin of the custom is unknown, but it is probable that it was common among the Jews before they were subject to the Romans, for Pilate said, “You have a custom.” Perhaps it was memorial of the great national deliverance that was celebrated at the feast of the Passover. The Romans, who prided themselves in respecting the usages of conquered people, had fallen in with the custom.

For release in the KJV, see Remission.

RELIGION. A term, when viewed etymologically, of uncertain derivation. Cicero refers it to religare, to read over again, to consider, and thus regards it as meaning attention to divine things. Lactantius and Augustine derive the word from religare, to bind back, thus representing religion as the ground of obligation. The word thus translated in the NT, where it occurs but three times, is thrēskeia, and it means outward religious service (see Acts 26:5; James 1:26–27). In philosophical, as well as in common use, the word has a variety of meanings, e.g., Schleiermacher defines religion as “the feeling of absolute dependence”;

Kant, “the observance of moral law as a divine institution”; Fichte, “Faith in the moral order of the universe.” In general it refers to any system of faith and worship, such as the religion of the Jews, of pagan nations, or of Christians. In the popular language of believers in Christianity it means especially and almost exclusively the Christian religion. The term calls attention to the all-important fact that man is a religious being. There is that in his nature that prompts him to some sort of faith and worship. With or without special revelation from God, he requires the satisfaction and consolation and guidance that comes from faith in the unseen and the eternal. The limits of this article do not admit of representations of the various forms of religion that have appeared in the history of the race. For these see articles under their appropriate heads. Scientific research and comparative study in this direction began in the nineteenth century. The distinction between natural and revealed religion, their relative value and importance, the inadequacy of the one and the completeness of the other properly fall under the head of theology. See Theology. E.MCC.

RELIGIOUS PROSELYTES. See Proselytes.

REMALI’AH (rem-a-li’a; perhaps, “Jehovah adorns”). The father of Pekah, king of Israel (2 Kings 15:25, 27, 30, 32, 37; 16:1, 5; 2 Chron. 28:6; Isa. 7:1, 4–5, 9; 8:6), before 735 B.C.

RE’METH (re’meth; “height”). A city of Issachar (Josh. 19:21), called in 1 Chron. 6:73 Ramoth. See Ramoth, no. 2.

REMISSION (Heb. shāmat, to “let alone”). The Sabbatic year was also called “the year of remission” (Deut. 31:10; “release,” KJV; “canceling debts,” NIV), because Moses commanded that during that year the poor were not to be oppressed. The specific command was: “Every creditor shall release what he has loaned to his neighbor; he shall not exact it of his neighbor and his brother, because the Lord’s remission has been proclaimed” (15:1–3, 9). The Heb. term does not signify a remission of the debt, the relinquishing of all claim for payment, but simply the lengthening of the term, not pressing for payment. Exodus 23:11 says of the land, “But on the seventh year you shall let it rest [Heb. shāmat] and lie fallow,” etc. This does not mean an entire renunciation of the field or possessions; so in the case of the debt it does not imply an absolute relinquishment of what has been lent, but simply leaving it, i.e., not pressing for it during this year.

REM’PHAN (rem’fan). Better, Rephan. See Gods, False: Rompha.

REND (Heb. qāra, and several other terms). The Heb. term qāra is the only one that calls for special notice. It refers to the tearing of one’s clothes as a sign of grief, and its figurative use; thus, “Rend your heart and not your garments” (Joel 2:13) signifies contrition of heart and not mere outward signs of grief.

The expression rentest (also from qāra) appears in the KJV of Jer. 4:30, “Though thou rentest thy face with painting, in vain shalt thou make thyself fair,” but the allusion is not to tearing but rather to the Eastern practice of painting the eyes, as the NASB (“enlarge your eyes with paint”) and NIV (“shade your eyes with paint”) make clear.

REPENTANCE (Gk. metanoia, a “change” of mind). In the theological and ethical sense a fundamental and thorough change in the hearts of men from sin and toward God. Although faith alone is the condition for salvation (Eph. 2:8–10; Acts 16:31), repentance is bound up with faith and inseparable from it, since without some measure of faith no one can truly repent, and repentance never attains to its deepest character till the sinner realizes through saving faith how great is the grace of God against whom he has sinned. On the other hand, there can be no saving faith without true repentance. Repentance contains as essential elements (1) a genuine sorrow toward God on account of sin (2 Cor. 7:9–10; Matt. 5:3–4; Ps. 51); (2) an inward repugnance to sin necessarily followed by the actual forsaking of it (Matt.

3:8; Acts 26:20; Heb. 6:1); and (3) humble self-surrender to the will and service of God (see Acts 9:6, as well as Scriptures above referred to). Repentance, it should be observed, has different stages of development. (1) In its lowest and most imperfect form it may arise from fear of the consequences or penalty of sin. If it goes no farther than this it is simply remorse and must end in despair. (2) It deepens in character with the recognition of the baseness of sin itself. But here again it is merely a burden of soul from which man may seek to free himself in vain till he recognizes the great hope before him in the gospel. (3) It becomes more complete and powerful in those who have experienced the saving grace of God and thus realize more fully the enormity of sin and the depths of the divine compassion that has been operative in their salvation.

Repentance, it is thus to be seen, is the gift of God (Acts 5:31; 11:18; Rom. 2:4). It is so because God has given His word with its revelations concerning sin and salvation; also the Holy Spirit to impress the truth and awaken the consciences of men and lead them to repentance. But as with faith so with repentance—it is left with men to make for themselves the great decision. E.MCC.; M.F.U.

REPETITION (Gk. battologeō, to “stutter, prate”). Our Lord, in His Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 6:7), cautions us against using “meaningless repetition” in prayer. This injunction is not directed against simple repetition, which may often arise in the fervency of earnest prayer, but against such repetition on the ground of supposed merit. The Gentile nations were accustomed to attach merit to much speaking in their prayers. The Jews adopted this bad practice to such an extent that it was one of their maxims that “he that multiplieth prayer shall be heard.”

RE'PHAEL (re'fa-el; “God heals”). A son of the Levite Shemaiah of the house of Obed-edom, appointed one of the gatekeepers of the house of God by David (1 Chron. 26:7), about 960 B.C.

RE'PHAH (re'fa; “wealth, opulence”). A son of Beriah of the tribe of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7:25).

REPHA'IAH (re-fa'ya; “Jehovah heals”).

1. The sons of Rephaiah, the sons of Arnan, etc. (1 Chron. 3:21), were, it is supposed, branches of the family of David whose descent or connection with Zerubbabel is for us unascertainable. Rephaiah is probably the same as Rhesa (which see), mentioned in Luke 3:27.

2. A son of Ishi, and one of the leaders of Simeon in the time of Hezekiah, who led the expedition of 500 men against the Amalekites of Mt. Seir (1 Chron. 4:42), about 715 B.C.

3. One of the six sons of Tola and head of a family in Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2), before 1440 B.C.

4. The son of Binea and eighth in descent from Jonathan the son of Saul (1 Chron. 9:43), long after 1000 B.C. He is called Raphah in 8:37.

5. The son of Hur and the “official of half the district of Jerusalem.” He repaired part of the wall of the city (Neh. 3:9), 445 B.C.

REPH'AIM (ref'a-im; “spirits of the deceased, giant aborigines”). A race first mentioned in Gen. 14:5 as dwelling in Ashteroth-karnaim (probably not the same as Ashtaroth, the residence of Og, Deut. 1:4; etc.) and being defeated by Chedorlaomer and his allies. In Gen. 15:20 they appear among the nations to be dispossessed by Israel. As they are not mentioned in 10:15–18, they were probably not Canaanites but an older, perhaps aboriginal race. Their few recorded names “have, as Ewald remarks, a Semitic aspect,” though, to be sure, they may have been Semitized. They are mentioned in Deut. 2:11, 20; 3:11, 13; Josh. 12:4; 13:12; 17:15, and with the Perizzites (Gen. 15:20). See Giant.

In the Heb. text rpāîm is used of the dead in Job 26:5; Ps. 88:10; Prov. 2:18; 9:18; 21:16; Isa. 14:9; 26:14, 19. The translation in the NASB and NIV is “departed spirits,” “the dead,” or “spirits of the dead.”

REPH'AIM, VALLEY OF (“valley of the giants”). First mentioned in Joshua’s description of the northern border of Judah (Josh. 15:8). It was the scene of several conflicts between the Philistines and David (2 Sam. 5:17–22; 23:13–17; 1 Chron. 14:9–11). From 11:15–16 it seems clear that Rephaim was not distant from Bethlehem. The valley was proverbial for its crops of grain (Isa. 17:5). It apparently is to be identified with the valley about three miles in length lying SW of Jerusalem and extending halfway to Bethlehem, called Baqa’.

REPH'AITES. See Rephaim.

RE'PHAN. See Gods, False: Rompha.

REPH'IDIM (ref'i-dim). One of Israel’s camping sites on their journey from the wilderness of Sin to Mt. Sinai. At this now-unknown site the episode of the murmuring of the children of Israel occurred because of a lack of water. Accordingly Moses struck the rock in Horeb and obtained an abundance of water (Ex. 17:1–7; 19:2). Moses named the place “Meribah,” or strife. At Rephidim also occurred the clash between the Israelites and the Bedouin Amelekites. During this celebrated encounter Aaron and Hur supported Moses’ hands in prayer while Joshua secured a great victory (17:8–16). M.F.U.

REPROACH (Heb. usually herpâ; Gk. oneidos). A severe expression of censure or blame. It is sometimes directed against God and is then often equivalent to blasphemy (2 Kings 19:4, 16; Isa. 37:4, 17; etc.). It is also the object of contempt, scorn, derision, as in “let us rebuild the wall of Jerusalem that we may no longer be a reproach” (Neh. 2:17; cf. Pss. 22:6, 79:4; Jer. 6:10; 24:9; etc.).

REPROBATE. A KJV expression. In the NASB and NIV it is replaced by rejected (Jer. 6:30; 2 Tim. 3:8), depraved (Rom. 1:28), fail the test (2 Cor. 13:5–6), appear unapproved (2 Cor. 13:7; “seem to have failed,” NIV), and worthless for any good deed (Titus 1:16).

RE'SEN (re'sen). An ancient city of Assyria (Gen. 10:12), one of a number of towns forming the composite city called Nineveh (which see). Resen stood midway between Nineveh and Calah.

RESH (ר) (resh). The twentieth letter of the Heb. alphabet, corresponding to English “r.” It stands at the beginning of the twentieth section of Ps. 119, in which portion each verse in the Heb. begins with this letter. M.F.U.

RE'SHEPH (re'shef; “flame”). A son of Beriah, of the tribe of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7:25).

RESURRECTION OF CHRIST. The return of Christ to bodily life on the earth on the third day after His death.

Scripture Doctrine. Only within recent years have rationalistic interpretations of the Scriptures ventured to assert that the phrase “raised from the dead” does not mean an actual bodily resurrection, and that it simply declares that Christ as a spirit did not remain in hell, but was raised to heaven. That this is a most irrational interpretation is seen from the explicit declaration and the whole tenor of the Scriptures upon this point. Likewise the “vision hypothesis,” that Christ after His death only appeared to His disciples in a way purely subjective, is contrary to the Scriptures; neither can it be, as we shall see, sustained upon grounds of reason. The resurrection of our Lord is set before us in the NT as the miraculous restoration of His physical life, the reunion of His spirit with His body, and yet in such a way that the material limitations in which He had previously confined His life were set aside. The resurrection was the beginning of the glorification. It occurred on the morning of the third day after His death, counting, according to custom, parts of days as days (cf. Matt. 16:21; Luke 24:1).

The body in which the disciples saw the risen Lord was real, that in which they had seen Him living, and that which had died (see Luke 24:39; John 20:24–29). And yet, as is manifest from the gospel accounts of His appearances during the forty days and of His visible ascension, His body was undergoing the mysterious change of that glorification of which the resurrection was the beginning and the ascension into heaven the end (see 20:4, 14, 26, 21:4; Luke 24:37). What the change was that adapted the Lord's body to its destined heavenly environment is a question of profitless speculation. But it is evident from the Scriptures that in the resurrection Christ's glorification only began and also that Christ now dwells in heaven in a glorified body (Phil. 3:21; Col. 3:4). The resurrection of Christ is represented in the Scriptures as wrought by the power of God. Its miraculous power is strongly proclaimed (see Acts 13:30; Rom. 1:4; 1 Cor. 15:15); and thus it presents no difficulty for faith to one who really believes in God. Indeed, the Scriptures represent it as in the deepest sense not unnatural but natural that Christ should be raised from the dead (see Acts 2:24). The testimony of the Scriptures as to the reality of the resurrection is most ample and without a note of discord as to the essential fact itself. The witnesses were not few, but many (see, in addition to accounts in the gospels, 1 Cor. 15:1–8). The declaration of the apostle Paul that he had "seen Jesus our Lord" (1 Cor. 9:1) properly places him among the witnesses to the great reality.

The proclamation of the resurrection lies at the basis of apostolic teaching (see Acts 1:22; 4:2, 33; 17:18; 23:6; 1 Cor. 15:14; etc.). It ranks first among the miracles that bear witness to Christ's divine character (Rom. 1:4). It is the divine seal of approval upon Christ's atoning work and thus is in close connection with the justification of sinners (4:25; 5:10; 8:34). It is connected with our spiritual renewal, as the new life of believers comes from the risen Christ (Col. 3:1–3). It is the pledge of the resurrection and glorification of the true followers of Christ (Rom. 8:11; 1 Cor. 15:20–21; Phil. 3:21; 1 Thess. 4:14).

Theological. The denial of this great fact has always come from the enemies of Christianity. This is but natural, as Christianity must stand or fall with the resurrection. That Christ "rose from the dead" has always been a cardinal article of faith in the Christian church. The historic proofs of this fact are most weighty when the relation of the fact to the whole body of saving truth is duly considered. They may fail to convince unbelievers who have no appreciation of the great realities of sin and salvation. But still they are of great value for the defense of the faith and for the comfort of believers. The matter resolves itself mainly into two considerations, namely, the credibility of the witnesses and the difficulties of denial as greater than those of belief. As to the credibility of the witnesses, account is to be taken not only of their number and variety but also of the essential harmony of their reports, the absence of all motive to falsehood, and their self-sacrificing devotion to the gospel that based itself upon the resurrection. The difficulties that beset denial are found (1) in the impossibility of explaining the empty grave except upon the grounds that the resurrection actually took place; (2) the attitude of the enemies of Christ after the resurrection, revealing as it did their helpless confusion; (3) the disciples' sudden transition from hopelessness to triumphant faith, which would be inexplicable except upon the actuality of the resurrection; (4) the founding of Christianity in the world, which can be rationally accounted for only in view of the fact that Christ actually rose from the dead. RESURRECTION OF THE BODY (Gk. anastasis, “to make to stand,” or “rise up”). The reunion of the bodies and souls of men that have been separated by death. This is rightly held to be an important article of Christian belief, though it is left by the revelation of Scripture obscure in many details.

Spiritual. The OT in the earlier parts does not speak explicitly upon this subject. Christ, however, declares the doctrine to be generally presupposed in the old economy (see Luke 20:37–38). Allusions to it are to be found in Gen. 22:5, cf. Heb. 11:19; Pss. 16:10–11; 49:14–15; Isa. 26:19; 53:10; Ezek. 37. A clear reference appears in Dan. 12:3. It is plainly taught also in the apocryphal books of the OT (Wisd. 3:1; 4:15; 2 Macc. 7:14, 23, 29). It was a belief held commonly among the Jews in the time of Christ (see Matt. 22:30; Luke 20:28–39; John 11:24; Acts 23:6, 8). The Sadducees were the exceptions in their denial of the doctrine. Christ appeared and confirmed this belief, though He was careful to guard against erroneous conceptions held by some in connection with it, as appears in some of the passages to which reference has been made. Naturally it was a marked feature of apostolic doctrine (see Acts 4:2; 26:23; 1 Cor. 15; 1 Thess. 4:14; Phil. 3:20–21; Rev. 20:6–14; etc.). The teaching of the Scriptures sums up as follows: (1) The body shall rise again. The integrity of man's being, a creature of soul and body, shall be restored. (2) In some sense the identity of the body shall be preserved. (3) The body is to be changed and refined to fit it for the new surroundings of the future life. For the saints it is to be a “glorified body.” (4) The resurrection of the righteous will take place at the coming of Christ (1 Thess. 4:13–18; 1 Cor. 15:53), of the unsaved at the great white throne judgment after the Kingdom age (Rev. 2:11–15). (5) The power is of God in Christ, who said, “I am the resurrection and the life” (John 11:25).

Theological. The article in the Apostles' Creed containing this doctrine was doubtless intended to express the faith of the early church in the teaching of Christ and the apostles. It was also intended to meet the Manichean heresy that there is an essential antagonism between matter and spirit, that matter is by nature evil, and accordingly the soul of man is degraded by union with the body. That this simple but great statement of the dignity of the human body, and that both soul and body are destined to immortality, have been overlaid by many crude speculations is what might have been expected. That in no measure detracts from the great truth of revelation to which the statement points. As to the sense in which the resurrection body shall be identical with the body laid aside in death, that is a matter upon which the Scriptures open the way to no definite conclusion. It may be remarked, however, that the continued identity of the body even in this present life does not depend upon its possession continuously of the same substance, neither is it identity of size or form or appearance. It is identity of relationship and functions. The substance of which the body is composed is constantly changing. Likewise there are changes in respect to other material features. Still the body remains as the vestiture and in some degree the expression of the Spirit in union with it. The coarse representation of bodily resurrection, in which many have indulged, based upon the idea of the literal return of the same fleshly parts laid aside in death, is therefore without warrant in reason. And this is not required nor warranted by Scripture. A careful study of Paul's great chapter upon the subject (1 Cor. 15) must show this. The most that can be affirmed is that God will reinvest the souls of men with bodies, and that these bodies, while changed, shall have in some important sense identity with the bodies that have experienced death and dissolution. It is not strange that this doctrine has been denied by rationalists and materialists and skeptics generally. But it is logically held by Christians because of their faith in Christ and in the teachings that bear His authority. It has great religious and ethical value, inasmuch as it recognizes the dignity of the body and its true relation to the soul in union with it, opening to us the hope of complete glorification. RETINUE (Heb. hayil, “strength”). A term used respecting the queen of Sheba (1 Kings 10:2, “caravan,” NIV; see 1 Kings 10:13; 2 Chron. 9:12) and pointing to her great wealth and position. KJV, “train.”

RETRIBUTION. See Punishment, Future.

RE’U (re’u; “friend”). The son of Peleg and father of Serug, in the ancestry of Abraham (Gen. 11:18–21; 1 Chron. 1:25; Luke 3:35; “Ragau,” KJV, Luke 3:35).

REU’BEN (rū’ben; “see a son”). The firstborn son of Jacob and Leah (Gen. 29:32), about 1952 B.C.

His Crime. When Jacob dwelt in Eder, Reuben committed an offense that was too great for Jacob to forget (Gen. 35:22) and of which he spoke with abhorrence even upon his dying bed.

Befriends Joseph. When his brothers were planning for the destruction of Joseph in Dothan, Reuben, as the eldest son, interfered in his behalf. By his advice Joseph’s life was spared—he was merely stripped of his garment and cast into a pit. In Reuben’s absence Joseph was sold to the Ishmaelites. When Reuben returned with the intention of rescuing his brother, he found that Joseph was gone (37:21–22, 29).

In Egypt. Reuben accompanied his brothers into Egypt in search of food and accepted Joseph’s harsh treatment of himself and his brothers as a proper judgment upon them because of their sin (42:22). He delivered to Jacob Joseph’s message demanding Benjamin’s presence in Egypt and offered his two sons as pledges for his brother’s safe return (v. 37). Upon the removal of Jacob into Egypt, c. 1876 B.C., Reuben had four sons—Hanoah, Pallu, Hezron, and Carmi (46:9).

Character. Reuben seems to have been of an ardent, impetuous, unbalanced, but not ungenerous nature; not crafty and cruel, as were Simeon and Levi, but rather, to use the metaphor of the dying patriarch, “uncontrolled as water,” i.e., boiling up like a vessel of water over the wood fire in the nomad tent and as quickly subsiding into apathy when the fuel was spent.

The Tribe of Reuben. At the time of the migration into Egypt Reuben’s sons were four, and from them sprang the chief families of the tribe. The census of Mt. Sinai (Num. 1:20–21; 2:11) shows that the numbers of this tribe at the Exodus was 46,500 men above twenty years of age and fit for military service, ranking seventh in population. At the later census, taken thirty-eight years after and just before entering Canaan, its numbers had decreased to 43,730, which made it rank ninth (26:7).

Position. During the journey through the wilderness the position of Reuben was on the S side of the Tabernacle. The “camp” that went under his name was formed of his own tribe, that of Simeon, and of Gad.

Inheritance. The country allotted to this tribe was E of Jordan, extending on the S to the river Arnon, on the E to the desert of Arabia; on the W were the Dead Sea and the Jordan, and the northern border was probably marked by a line running eastward from the Jordan through Wadi Heshbân (Josh. 13:17–21; Num. 32:37–38).

REU´BENITE (rū´ben-īt). A descendant of Reuben (Num. 26:7; etc.).

REU´EL (rū´el; “friend of God’s,” or “God is a friend”).

1. The son of Esau by his wife Basemath (Gen. 36:4, 10). His four sons (36:13; 1 Chron. 1:37) were chiefs of the Edomites (Gen. 36:17).

2. A priest of Midian and a herdsman, who gave a hospitable reception to Moses when he fled from Egypt, and whose daughter Zipporah became the wife of Moses (Ex. 2:18). Reuel is undoubtedly the same person as Jethro (which see), the first being probably his proper name and the latter a title or surname, indicating his rank.

3. In the KJV of Num. 2:14, Reuel is given for NASB and NIV Deuel (which see).

4. The son of Ibrijah and father of Shephatiah, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 9:8).

REU´MAH (rū´ma; “exalted, elevated”). Nahor’s concubine, and by him mother of Tebah and others (Gen. 22:24).

REVELATION (Gk. apokalupsis, an “uncovering or unveiling”). A term expressive of the fact that God has made known to men truths and realities that men could not discover for themselves.

An important distinction is commonly recognized between general and special revelation.

By general revelation is meant that which is given to all men, in nature and history, and in the nature of man himself. The reality and validity of revelation in this sense is declared in Scripture verses such as Ps. 19:1; Isa. 40:26; Rom. 1:19–20; Ex. 9:16; Acts 14:15–17; Rom. 2:14–15; Matt. 6:22–34. But the actual power of this revelation over men has, in numberless cases, been reduced or nullified by sin (see Rom. 1:18–21). And, besides, the coming of sin into the world and the establishment of the economy of redemption has necessitated the making known of truths not made known by general revelation. Therefore God has given the special revelation brought to us in the holy Scriptures. The Scriptures reiterate the truths proclaimed in nature, in history, and in man himself; and, in addition, declare the salvation that God has provided for mankind in Jesus Christ.

It is true that Scripture contains many things not in the nature of revelation—matters of fact, the knowledge of which lay within the reach of unaided human powers. But these are only the framework of the great revelation in connection with them. It is to be observed further that revelation is not to be confounded with inspiration. Revelation refers to the truths or facts that God has made known; inspiration to the process by which the knowledge has come. The proofs of revelation and of inspiration, however closely related and in some measure interwoven, are therefore not identical. See Inspiration.

The reality of special revelation is proved by evidence both external and internal. The external proof is found in miracles and prophecy. See Miracles; Prophecy.

The internal proofs are the contents of the revelation itself. The greatness of the truths, their adaptation to the necessities of human life, their practical effects when accepted, and above all the personal character of Jesus Christ, who is the center of the whole revelation and the supreme medium thereof, form sufficient proof that the revelation of the Scriptures has come from God. Thus the revelation is to be recognized as the sun is known, by its own shining. It will not be recognized by those who ignore the reality of sin and the necessity for salvation. But to everyone who truly feels this sad reality, not only will the special revelation of salvation seem possible but also real and indispensable.

They who seek and find the salvation proclaimed by the Scriptures find a peculiar personal evidence of their divine authority. (See Assurance.) The term “continuous revelation” has come somewhat prominently into use in recent years. By this is commonly meant that special revelation did not cease with the closing of the Scripture canon.

REVELATION, BOOK OF THE. The last book of the NT and the consummation of biblical prophecy disclosing the future of the Jew, the Gentile, and the church of Christ. This great prophetic unfolding deals mainly with the events preceding the second coming of Christ, the establishment of the millennial kingdom, and, finally, the eternal state.

Name. The name of the book comes from Lat. revelatio, “an unveiling”; Gk. apokalypsis, “the removing of a veil.” It is thus a book written to be understood. The book is not correctly called the Revelation of the apostle John. It is precisely “the Revelation of Jesus Christ” (1:1). That is, it is an unveiling of His future plan for the earth and for His redeemed saints both for time and eternity. It is necessary to view the book as in no sense sealed (22:10; cf. Dan. 12:9). A distinct blessing is vouchsafed to the person that reads and to those who hear the words of this prophecy (Rev. 1:3). It is mere pious chatter to say that God does not intend this book to be understood or that the symbolism and figures of the prophecy are incomprehensible. The figures and symbols of the book, which furnish the basis of its interpretation, are found elsewhere in divine revelation and can only be understood in the light of coherent and connected comparative study of all other lines of prophecy and prophetic type and symbolism. Interpretation of the book demands a thorough acquaintance with all the other great prophecies that merge in this book, which is “like a great Union Station where the trunk lines of prophecy come in from other portions of Scripture” (J. Vernon McGee, Briefing the Bible [1949], p. 122).

Great Themes. About a dozen great prophetic themes find their consummation in the book of the Revelation: (1) The Lord Jesus Christ (Gen. 3:15), whose present session (Rev. 3:21), future triumph over evil, redemption of the earth, destruction of the ungodly, and establishment of His earthly kingdom are consummated at His second advent (4:1–19:16). Christ’s kingdom rule and His ministry in the eternal state (chaps. 21–22) constitute the grand fulfillment of all prophecy. (2) The church, the Body of Christ (Matt. 16:18; 1 Cor. 12:13; Rev. 2–3). (3) The resurrection and translation of saints (4:1–2). (4) The Great Tribulation (Deut. 4:29–30; Jer. 30:5–8; Rev. 4–19). (5) Satan and demon power (Isa. 14:12–14; Ezek. 28:11–18; Rev. 12:7–12; 16:13; 20:1; etc.). (6) The man of lawlessness (2 Thess. 2:1–8; Rev. 13:1–10). (7) The false prophet (Rev. 13:11–18). (8) Destruction of Gentile world power (Dan. 2:31–45; Rev. 5–19). (9) The redemption of the earth (Rev. 5) with the loosing of the seals, trumpets, and bowls (chaps. 6–19). (10) The second advent of Christ (Rev. 19:1–10). (11) The judgment of sinners (Rev. 20:11–15). (12) The first resurrection and the Kingdom age (Rev. 20:4–6). (13) The new heaven and the new earth (Rev. 21). (14) The eternal state (chap. 22).

Methods of Interpretation. Various interpretations of the book prevail.

The Preterist Interpretation. This views the book as referring chiefly to events contemporary to that day, to comfort the then-persecuted church, written in symbols in a general sense intelligible to the saints of that period.

Continuous Historical Interpretation. This considers the book as forecasting the entire period of church history from the revelator's time to the present, in which the chief phases of the church's struggle to final victory are set forth. This has been a commonly accepted view.

The Spiritualist Interpretation. This separates the symbolism of the book from any historical revelation and regards the book as a pictorial representation of the great principles of divine government for all-time application.

The Futuristic Interpretation. This construes the bulk of the book as future in John's day. It accepts the divinely given key of interpretation in Rev. 1:19 and interprets the "things which you have seen" as embracing 1:9–20; the "things which are," chaps. 2–3, referring to the church period; and the "things which shall be after these things" as referring to the yet future period after the glorification of the church and its removal from the earthly scene, with chaps. 4 to the end concerning chiefly Israel and the Gentile nations in the still-future period preceding the second coming of Christ.

Background and Destination. The author is John the beloved (1:1). The apostle came to Ephesus around A.D. 70. He seems to have been a circuit minister at Ephesus, Pergamum, Smyrna, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea. He was put in prison on Patmos Isle in the Aegean in the fifteenth year of Domitian, according to Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 3.18). The Apocalypse was doubtless intended especially for the seven churches of Asia (cf. 1:4 and 10–11 and chaps. 2–3). The book was also evidently intended for other churches in Asia Minor.

Occasion and Date. John wrote by express command of Christ (1:10–20). The "angels" of the seven churches of chaps. 2–3 are apparently the "ministers" of those churches, and the apostle wrote to comfort them and their congregations. Quite a few scholars date the book about A.D. 68 or 69 (Westcott, Lightfoot, Hort, and Salmon). The reasons for this, however, are not convincing. The best date seems to be A.D. 95 or 96 (cf. Swete, Milligan, Moffatt, and Zahn). This date accords with evidence from Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and Eusebius to the effect that the banishment to Patmos was in the later reign of Domitian, A.D. 81–96. This view is in agreement with the fact that the Domitian persecution, unlike the Neronian, was the result of the Christians' refusal to worship the emperor (cf. 1:9; 13:9–10, 12).

Authenticity. External witness to the book is sufficiently strong. Traces of the book are found in literature immediately after the apostolic age. Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, the Muratorian Fragment, etc., lend their support to its genuineness. The internal evidence is also adequate. The writer calls himself John four times (1:1, 4, 9; 22:8). He calls himself the "bond-servant" of Christ (1:1) and "brother and fellow partaker in the tribulation and kingdom and perseverance which are in Jesus" (1:9). The fact that he does not call himself an apostle has been urged against authorship by John the apostle, but this argument is invalid to one who believes that the apostle is the author of the fourth gospel where the author's humility is reflected. The early church accepted the fact that it was John who was in exile, and the witness to the fact by Clement of Alexandria, Eusebius, and Irenaeus give this claim good support. The claim that grammatical irregularities of the Apocalypse rule out Johannine authorship are not sustained. Many factors, including the apocalyptic and highly figurative and symbolic meaning of the book, offer sufficient explanation of this phenomenon.

REVELING. See Carousing.

REVENGE, REVENGER. See Avenge, Avenger.

REVENUE. See King.

REVERENCE. We are taught to reverence God (Pss. 89:7; “and awesome above all,” NASB, cf. KJV; 111:9, “fear,” KJV) and His sanctuary (Lev. 19:30, “revere,” NASB; “have reverence for,” NIV). See Fear.

Reverence in the sense of paying respect to some distinguished person is mentioned in the KJV in 2 Sam. 9:6; 1 Kings 1:31; Esther 3:2, 5 (where the NASB reads “prostrated” or “paid homage,” and the NIV, “bowed down” and “paid honor”); in the parable of the vineyard (Matt. 21:37; Mark 12:6; Luke 20:13; “respect,” NASB and NIV); and in Heb. 12:9; Eph. 5:33 of the respect given to fathers and husbands.

REVILE, REVILER, REVILING. The translation of several Gk. and Heb. terms. The Hebrews were warned not to “revile the gods” (KJV), or, more specifically, not to “curse God,” as the NASB reads (from Heb. qālāl, “be slight, trifling,” and ʾēlōhîm, “gods, God”).

Another Heb. term, giddûpîm, “vilification,” or “reviling words,” is used by Isaiah (Isa. 51:7; “insults,” NIV) and Zephaniah (Zeph. 2:8) in reference to the revilings of men. Kindred to giddûpîm is the Gk. term loidoreō, which means to villify, heap reproach on, and is used to represent the treatment of the Lord by His enemies (John 9:28; 1 Pet. 2:23), the question put to Paul by the high priest (Acts 23:4), and the “revilers” (or “slanderers,” NIV) in the catalog of evildoers (1 Cor. 6:10). In the expression “they that passed by reviled him” (KJV; “hurling abuse,” NASB) the evangelist uses Gk. blasphēmēō, a very strong term, signifying to rail at, or calumniate, showing an utter lack of reverence for the divine Sufferer. In Mark 15:32 it is recorded that those who were crucified with Him “reviled him” (KJV), or “were casting the same insult at Him” (NASB; “heaped insults,” NIV), both from Gk. ʔoneidizō, meaning that they unjustly reproached Him.

REVIVE (from Heb. hāyâ, to “live”). In the Psalms (71:20; 80:18; 119:25, 37, 40, 88; 143:11; etc.) the word is used to signify being “made alive,” to be “comforted, refreshed.” The KJV is quicken (which see).

REWARDS (Gk. misthos, meaning “hire, wage, reward,” Matt. 5:12, 46; 6:1; 10:41; Mark 9:41; 1 Cor. 3:8; etc.). Rewards are offered by God to a believer on the basis of faithful service rendered after salvation. It is clear from Scripture that God offers to the lost salvation and for the faithful service of the saved, rewards. Often in theological thinking salvation and rewards are confused. However, these two terms must be carefully distinguished. Salvation is a free gift (John 4:10; Rom. 6:23; Eph. 2:8–9, whereas rewards are earned by works (Matt. 10:42; cf. Luke 19:17; 1 Cor. 9:24–25; 2 Tim. 4:7–8). Then, too, salvation is a present possession (Luke 7:50; John 5:24). On the other hand, rewards are future attainment to be dispensed at the second coming of Christ for His own (Matt. 16:27; 2 Tim. 4:8). Rewards will be dispensed at the judgment seat of Christ (2 Cor. 5:10; Rom. 14:10). The doctrine of rewards is inseparably connected with God’s grace. A soul is saved on the basis of divine grace; there is no room for the building up of merit on the part of the believer. Yet God recognizes an obligation on His part to reward His saved ones for their service to Him. Nothing can be done to merit salvation, but what the believer has achieved for God’s glory, God recognizes with rewards at the judgment seat of Christ. For the central passages on rewards see 1 Cor. 3:9–15 and 9:16–27; 2 Cor. 5:10. A principal point of contention between Roman Catholics and Protestants concerns the basis of reward. Roman Catholics hold that reward is based on the actual merit of the good works of believers, whereas Protestants regard rewards as wholly of grace. M.F.U.

RE'ZEPH (re'zef; "glowing stone or coal"). A stronghold near Haran, taken by the Assyrians (2 Kings 19:12; Isa. 37:12). There were nine cities of this name. This was probably located W of the Euphrates, called now Rusafah, on the route to Palmyra.

REZI'A. See Rizia.

REZ'IN (rez'in).

1. A king of Damascus who was contemporary with Pekah in Israel and with Jotham and Ahaz in Judah. Allying himself with Israel, he carried on constant war against Judah, attacking Jotham toward the close of his reign (2 Kings 15:37), 742 B.C. His chief war was with Ahaz, whose territories he invaded in company with Pekah, about 741 B.C. The combined army laid siege to Jerusalem, where Ahaz was, but "could not overcome him" (2 Kings 16:5; Isa. 7:1). Rezin, however, "recovered Elath for Aram" (2 Kings 16:6). Soon after this he was attacked, defeated, and slain by Tiglath-pileser III, king of Assyria (16:9). Compare Tiglath-pileser's own inscriptions, where the defeat of Rezin and the destruction of Damascus are distinctly mentioned.

2. One of the families of the Temple servants (Ezra 2:48; Neh. 7:50).

RE'ZON (re'zon; "prince"). The son of Eliada, a Syrian in the service of Hadadezer, king of Zobah. When David defeated Hadadezer (2 Sam. 8:3) Rezon forsook his lord and, gathering a band about him, established himself as king of Damascus (1 Kings 11:23–25). The settlement of Rezon at Damascus could not have been till some time after the disastrous battle in which the power of Hadadezer was broken, for we are told that David at the same time defeated the army of Damascene Syrians who came to the relief of Hadadezer and put troops in Damascus, about 984 B.C. From his position at Damascus, Rezon harassed the kingdom of Solomon during the latter part of his reign.

RHE'GIUM (re'ji-um; "broken off," alluding to the abrupt character of the coast). A town on the SW coast of Italy, at the southern entrance of the Strait of Messina, mentioned incidentally (Acts 28:13) in the account of Paul's voyage from Syracuse to Puteoli. It is now called Reggio, a city of about 165,000 inhabitants.

RHE'SA (rē'sa). A name given in the genealogy of Christ (Luke 3:27) as the son of Zerubbabel and father of Joanan. He is probably the same as Rephaiah (which see).

RHO'DA (rō'da; "rose bush"). Servant girl who announced the arrival of Peter at the door of Mary's house after his release from the prison by the angel (Acts 12:13–14), 44 B.C.

RHODES (rōdz; "a rose"). An island in the Mediterranean Sea, near the coast of Asia Minor. Its capital was also called Rhodes and was an ancient center of commerce, literature, and art. It was built in the fifth century B.C. The Colossus, one of the wonders of the world, was erected at its harbor; the island is about eighteen miles broad and forty-six miles long. In the Middle Ages it was famous as the home of the Knights of St. John. Its population now is about 75,000. Paul touched here (Acts 21:1) on his return voyage to Syria from his third missionary journey, but it is not stated whether or not he landed.

RI'BAI (ri'bī; "my contention"). A Benjamite of Gibeah, whose son Ittai was one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:29; 1 Chron. 11:31), 1000 B.C.

RIBAND (Num. 15:38, KJV). A cord (so NASB, NIV).

RIB'LAH (rib'la; "fertility," cf. Arab. rabala, "to increase, multiply").

1. A landmark on the eastern boundary of Israel, as given by Moses (Num. 34:11), the position being given with much precision. It was between Shepham and the Sea of Chinnereth, to the E of Ain (i.e., the fountain). This shows that it was different from Riblah of Hamath.

2. Riblah of Hamath (2 Kings 23:33; etc.), the camping ground of the kings of Babylon, from which they directed operations against Palestine and Phoenicia. Pharaoh Neco brought King Jehoahaz here in chains (see 25:6, 20, 21; Jer. 39:5–6; 52:9–10, 26–27). Riblah was W of the modern town of Rableh, on the Orontes River just N of the Lebanese border.

RICHERS. This term is frequently used in a figurative sense to represent the gifts and graces of God’s Holy Spirit, as, “Do you think lightly of the riches of His kindness,” etc. (Rom. 2:4; cf. 9:23; Eph. 1:7, 18; 2:7; 3:8; Phil. 4:19).

RIDDLE (Heb. ḥîdâ, “tied” in a knot, “twisted”). Elsewhere “dark sentence,” “hard question,” “dark saying,” etc. The Heb. word is derived from an Arab. root meaning “to bend off,” “to twist,” and is used for a proverb (Prov. 1:6), a song (Ps. 49:4; cf. 78:2), an oracle (cf. Num. 12:8), and a parable (Ezek. 17:2), as well as a riddle in our sense of the word (Judg. 14:12–19). Riddles were generally proposed in verse, like the celebrated riddle of Samson, which, however, was properly no riddle at all, because the Philistines did not possess the only clue on which the solution could depend. Keil (Com., 1 Kings 10:1) says that a riddle is “a pointed saying which merely hints at a deeper truth, and leaves it to be guessed.” According to Josephus (Ant. 8.5.3), Solomon was fond of the riddle. They were also known to the Egyptians and were used at banquets by Greeks and Romans. “Riddle” is used once in the NT (1 Cor. 13:12, marg., NASB; “poor reflection,” NIV); being translated “dimly” (Gk. ainugma, an “obscure saying”). The gospel revelation is an enigma, “inasmuch as it affords to us no full clearness of light upon God’s decrees, ways of salvation, etc., but keeps its contents sometimes in a greater, sometimes in a less degree (Rom. 11:33; 1 Cor. 2:9) concealed, bound up in images, similitudes, types, and the like forms of human limitation and human speech, and, consequently, is for us of a mysterious and enigmatic nature, standing in need of future light, and vouchsafing faith, indeed, but not the external figure” (Meyer, Com., ad loc.).

RIDER (Heb. rōkēb). It would seem natural that horses should have been used for riding as early as for work; and the book of Job clearly indicates such use in the description of the chase of the ostrich, “She laughs at the horse and his rider” (Job 39:18). The horse and chariot were introduced into the land of the Nile by the Hyksos invaders, c. 1750 B.C. Camels were widely domesticated by the time of Gideon (Judg. 6:5), about 1200 B.C., greatly facilitating desert mobility. By the Egyptians, Babylonians, and early Greeks, war chariots were used instead of cavalry, the drivers of the chariot horses being called “riders” (Ex. 15:1, 21). The Persians discovered the value of cavalry, in which the Hebrews were always deficient. White donkeys were ridden in the time of the Judges, and mules in the age of the kings, horses being generally reserved for chariots. See Army; Horses; Chariot.

RIGHTEOUSNESS (Heb. šedeq; Gk. dikia). Purity of heart and rectitude of life; being and doing right. The righteousness or justice (which see) of God is the divine holiness applied in moral government and the domain of law. As an attribute of God it is united with His holiness as being essential in His nature; it is legislative or rectoral, as He is the righteous governor of all creatures; and is administrative or judicial, as He is a just dispenser of rewards and punishments. The righteousness of Christ denotes not only His absolute perfection but is taken for His perfect obedience to the law and suffering the penalty thereof in our stead. It is frequently used to designate His holiness, justice, and faithfulness (Gen. 18:25; Deut. 6:25; Pss. 31:1; 119:137, 142; Isa. 45:23; 46:13; 51:5–8). The righteousness of the law is that obedience that the law requires (Rom. 3:10, cf. 19–20; 8:4). The righteousness of faith is the justification (which see) that is received by faith (3:21–28; 4:3–25; 5:1–11; 10:6–11; 2 Cor. 5:21; Gal. 2:21). The perfect righteousness of Christ is imputed to the believer when he accepts Christ as his Savior (1 Cor. 1:30; 2 Cor. 5:20–21).

RIGHT MIND (Gk. sōphroneō). The being of a sound mind, as of one who has ceased to be under the power of an evil one (Mark 5:15; Luke 8:35), the opposite of ekstēnai, to be beside one's self (2 Cor. 5:13), elsewhere the exercise of self-control, so as to (1) place a moderate estimate upon one's self (Rom. 12:3, "sound judgment") and (2) to curb one's passion (Titus 2:6, "sensible").

RIM'MON (rim'on; "pomegranate").

1. A Benjamite of Beeroth, whose sons, Baanah and Rechab, murdered Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. 4:2–9), before 988 B.C.

2. A Syrian deity, Akkad. "a thunderer" (2 Kings 5:18), worshiped in Damascus. See Gods, False.

3. A town in the S of Judah (Josh. 15:32), allotted to Simeon (19:7; 1 Chron. 4:32); in each passage the name Rimmon follows that of Ain, also one of the cities of Judah and Simeon. The two are joined in Neh. 11:29 as En-rimmon (which see). The only other notice in the Bible is in Zech. 14:10. It is identified with the village Umm er-Rumāmīn ("mother of pomegranates"), about nine miles N of Beersheba.

4. One of the landmarks of the E boundary of Zebulun (Josh. 19:13) and described as reaching as far as Neah. It is probably identical with Rimmono (which see).

RIMMON'O (rim-on'ō). A city of Zebulun assigned to the Merarite Levites (1 Chron. 6:77). It is thought by some to be identical with the Rimmon "which stretches to Neah" (Josh. 19:13), although others believe that Dimnah (21:35) may have originally been Rimmon, as the D and R in Heb. are easily confused.

RIM'MON-METHO'AR (Josh. 19:13, KJV). See Rimmon, no. 4; Rimmono.

RIM'MON-PE'REZ (rim'on-pe'rez; "pomegranate of the breach"). One of the seventeen camping grounds (Num. 33:19) of the Israelites during their thirty-seven years of wandering about in the desert after leaving Kadesh (14:25). Of these seventeen places, Ezion-geber is the only one that can be pointed out with certainty.

RIM'MON, THE ROCK OF. The cliff or mountain pass to which the Benjamites fled when pursued after the slaughter at Gibeah. Six hundred reached it and maintained themselves there for four months, until they were released by the rest of the tribes (Judg. 20:45, 47; 21:13). It is mentioned as being in the wilderness, i.e., no doubt the desert that rises from Jericho to the mountains of Bethel (Josh. 16:1). Rimmon has been preserved in the village of Rammūn, about fifteen miles N of Jerusalem, which stands upon and around the summit of a conical limestone mountain and is visible from all directions.

RIMS. The NASB and NIV rendering in 1 Kings 7:33 of Heb. gab, "hollow," or "curved." It replaces KJV nave, the center or hub of a wheel. See Nave; Hub; Spoke.

RING. The ring was at a very ancient date a symbol of authority and dignity. That it was so among the ancient Egyptians is evident from the fact that Pharaoh gave his ring to Joseph (Gen. 41:42) as a token that he transferred to him the exercise of royal authority. Such a transfer is twice related of Ahasuerus, once in favor of Haman and again in favor of Mordecai (Esther 3:10–11; 8:2). These were probably signet rings. A probable early instance of a signet ring is to be found in the history of Judah (Gen. 38:18, “seal”); but ḥātham signifies a signet ring worn on the hand or suspended by a cord from the neck (Jer. 22:24). In the NT the ring is a symbol of honor and dignity, though no longer of power and authority (Luke 15:22). A man “with a gold ring” (James 2:2, Gk. chrusodaktulios, “gold-ringed”) was a man of wealth. The ring was generally worn on the fourth finger of the left hand, under the belief that a vein ran from that finger direct to the heart. The wearing of rings on the right hand was a mark of effeminacy, but they were frequently worn in considerable numbers on the left. See Jewelry; Tabernacle.

RINGSTRAKED. The KJV term for the striped rams of Jacob’s flock (Gen. 30:35; etc.).

RIN’NAH (rin’a; “a shout”). A son of Simeon, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20).

RIOT. See Dissipation; Carouse; Glutton.

RI’PHATH (ri’fath). The second son of Gomer, and grandson of Japheth (Gen. 10:3; 1 Chron. 1:6, in which latter passage the name Diphath is given by a clerical error).

RIS’SAH (ri’sa; “a ruin”). One of the stations of Israel in the wilderness (Num. 33:21–22), possibly to be located at el-Kuntilla, about thirty-five miles NW of Ezion-geber.

RITH’MAH (rith’ma; “broom plant”). An encampment of Israel (Num. 33:18–19), probably NE of Hazeroth.

RIVER. The rendering of seven Heb. words. In the case of some of them other terms are employed, such as canal, stream, channel, and flood, but in certain passages the word river stands as an equivalent for every one of them.

A Canal (Heb. ṡūbāl from yābal, to “flow”). This term is used only in Dan. 8:2–3, 6.

Water Channel (Heb. ṡpīq). This expression is applied to streams or rivers, with a primary respect to the channels, often in Palestine deep rock walls or ravines that contain or bind them; and so channel comes usually to be a quite suitable rendering for it (2 Sam. 22:16), though Keil and Delitzsch render it beds of the sea (Ps. 18:15; Isa. 8:7).

A River (Heb. yōr). A word of Egyptian origin, and frequently used of the Nile, this term appears to have been the common designation for the Nile in Egypt. Subsequent writers, when speaking of the river of Egypt, generally borrow the same word, sometimes using it in the plural for the Nile and its branches (Isa. 7:18; Ezek. 29:3; “streams” in the NIV). The word is sometimes used of rivers or streams generally (2 Kings 19:24; Isa. 37:25; Dan. 12:5–6).

A Flowing Stream (Heb. yūbal). This expression, found only in Jer. 17:8, is identical with a Canal, above.

A Stream (Heb. nāhār). In a great number of passages, this expression stands for river in the strict and proper sense, being often applied to the Jordan, the Nile, and other rivers. As the Euphrates was the most eminent river in the East, it was often known simply as hannāhār (“the river”). Wherever the expression “the river” is used it is to be understood as the Euphrates (Gen. 31:21; Josh. 1:4; 24:2, 14–15; 2 Sam. 10:16; etc.).

A Wadi (Heb. naḥal, “flowing”). This expression comes nearer to our torrent than to the deeper and steadier volume of water that properly bears the name of river; the term was applicable to the many temporary currents in Palestine and surrounding regions, which sometimes flow with great force after heavy rains, but soon become dry channels. The word thus came to mean both a stream and its channel, or valley; and sometimes it is applied to a valley or glen, apart altogether from the idea of a stream (Gen. 26:17). In Lev. 11:9–10, it is applied to the stream itself; while we have the “Wadi” and the “brook” Zered (Num. 21:12; Deut. 2:13; the NIV reads “Valley” in both verses), the “stream” and the “river” Jabbok (Gen. 32:23; Deut. 2:37), the “river” and “brook” Kishon (Judg. 4:7; 1 Kings 18:40; in the last references, “Valley,” NIV).

A Gushing Fountain Stream (Heb. peleg, to “gush,” or “flow over”). This expression is used for streams, without respect, apparently, to their size, but to the distribution of their waters through the land. It is used ten times in the Scripture, always in the poetical or prophetic books (Pss. 65:9; 119:136; Job 20:17; 29:6; Prov. 5:16; Isa. 30:25; etc.).

A Channel, Conduit (Heb. ālā). The Heb. term is commonly rendered “conduit,” or “aqueduct” (2 Kings 18:17; 20:20; Isa. 7:3; 36:2); once “waters” (Job 28:25); also rendered “channels” (Ezek. 31:4). It means simply a channel, or conduit, for conveying water.

A River, Stream. The Gk. word potamos, “running water,” corresponds to a River, and a Stream, above.

Figurative. “Rivers” and “waters” are frequently used in Scripture to symbolize abundance, as of the grace of God (Pss. 36:8; 46:4; Isa. 32:2; 41:18; John 7:38), of peace (Isa. 66:12), of good things of life (Job 20:17; 29:6), of God’s providence (Isa. 43:19–20), affliction (Ps. 69:2; Isa. 43:2). The fruitfulness of trees planted by rivers is figurative of the permanent prosperity of the righteous (Ps. 1:3; Jer. 17:8). Drying up of rivers represents God’s judgments (Isa. 19:1–8; Jer. 51:36; Nah. 1:4; Zech. 10:11), as does also their overflowing (Isa. 8:7–8; 28:2, 17; Jer. 47:2).

RIVER OF EGYPT (ē’jipt).

1. The Nile (Gen. 15:18). In the NASB and NIV the word “river” is found, referring especially to the E channel or Pelusiac branch.

2. The great wadi (Heb. naḥal, called “the brook of Egypt”). The Heb. word naḥal signifies a stream that flows rapidly in winter or in the rainy season. This is a desert stream, called now Wadi el-‘Arish (Num. 34:5; Josh. 15:4, 47; 2 Kings 24:7; Ezek. 47:19). The NIV translates in all these passages “Wadi of Egypt.”

RIZI’A (ri-zi’a; “delight”). One of the sons of Ulla, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:39; “Rezia,” KJV).

RIZ’PAH (riz’pa; “a live coal”). A concubine of King Saul. Rizpah was a foreigner, the daughter (or descendant) of Aiah, a Hivite. She is first mentioned as the subject of an accusation leveled against Abner (2 Sam. 3:7), 997 B.C. We next hear of her in the tragic story narrated in 21:1–11, the particulars of which are as follows: A famine, which lasted three successive years, induced David to seek the face of Jehovah and to ask the cause of the judgment. The Lord replied, “It is for Saul and his bloody house, because he put the Gibeonites to death.” David therefore sent for the Gibeonites to inquire of them as to the wrong that had been done them by Saul and how he should make atonement for it. They asked for the crucifixion at Gibeah of seven men of Saul’s sons. David granted the request, because, according to the law (Num. 35:33), bloodguiltiness resting upon the land could only be expiated by the blood of the criminal; thus David gave up to the Gibeonites two sons of Rizpah and five sons of Merab, the daughter of Saul. The victims were killed “at the beginning of barley harvest,” about the middle of Nisan (our April) and their bodies hung in the full blaze of the summer sun until the fall of rain in October (2 Sam. 21:9–10). During all this time, without any tent to protect her and only a garment of sackcloth to rest upon, Rizpah watched the bodies and “allowed neither the birds of the sky to rest on them by day nor the beasts of the field by night” (v. 10), c. 970 B.C.

ROAD. Not only the trade but the migrations of races from the most ancient times prove that journeys of great extent were made in early antiquity. Commerce and military expeditions necessitated the making of roads and paths, of which the earliest trace is perhaps to be found in the “king’s highway” (Num. 20:17; 21:22). At first roads were mere tracks formed by caravans passing from one point to another; afterward regular paths were made by laying earth and stones. These roads were required by law, especially for the approaches to the cities of refuge (Deut. 19:3). In earlier times the roads between different cities were in a miserable condition, hardly passable in winter or in the rainy season, though the hard, rocky ground in the mountainous parts of Palestine made it easy to construct good roads. The king’s highway, mentioned above, was the public road—probably constructed at the royal cost and kept up for the king and his armies to travel upon. Perhaps toll was taken for the king from the trading caravans. Regular military roads provided with milestones were first constructed in Palestine by the Romans. Jacob and his family traveled a well-known road from Beersheba to Egypt—the middle, or “Shur road,” portions of which have been found. The Hebrews probably became acquainted with road making in Egypt, where, in the Delta especially, the nature of the country would require roads and highways to be thrown up and maintained.

Six roads in Palestine are worthy of mention, three connecting areas outside of Jerusalem, and three leading from Jerusalem: (1) The first road ran from Ptolemais, on the coast of the Mediterranean, to Damascus, which remains to this day. (2) The second passed along the Mediterranean coast southward to Egypt. Beginning at Ptolemais, it ran first to Caesarea, thence to Disopolis, then through Ascalon and Gaza down into Egypt, with a branch through Disopolis to Jerusalem. Down this branch Paul was sent on his way to Felix (Acts 23:23). (3) The third connected Galilee with Judea, running through the intervening Samaria (Luke 17:11; John 4:4). The journey from Galilee to Judea took three days. (4) The fourth, fifth, and sixth were the three chief roads running from Jerusalem: (a) One ran in the NE direction over the Mount of Olives, by Bethany, through openings in hills and winding ways on to Jericho (Matt. 20:29; 21:1; Luke 10:30; 19:1, 28–29, 37), crossing the Jordan into Perea. This was the road taken by the Galilean Jews in coming to and returning from Jerusalem in order to avoid the unfriendly Samaritans. It was the one over which the Israelites came into Canaan, and by which the Syrian and Assyrian armies advanced on Israel (2 Kings 8:28; 9:14; 10:32–33; 1 Chron. 5:26). (b) Another ran from Jerusalem southward to Hebron, between mountains and through pleasant valleys, whence travelers went through the wilderness of Judea to Aila, as the remains of a Roman road still show; or took a westerly direction on to Gaza, a way still pursued, which is of two days’ duration. (c) Still another went from Jerusalem to the Mediterranean at Joppa (Jaffa) and has been used since the time of the Crusades, by pilgrims to the holy city from Europe and Egypt.

The highway (Heb. māsillâ, “an embanked highway, a thoroughfare”) was frequently prepared for temporary purposes, such as the visit of royalty (Isa. 45; 62:10), and also for permanent use (Num. 20:19; Judg. 20:31; 1 Sam. 6:12; etc.).

ROADMARKS (Heb. šiyyûn, “conspicuous”). Pillars to mark the road for returning exiles (Jer. 31:21). Caravans set up pillars or pointed heaps of stone to mark the way through the desert against their return.

ROAST. See Food.

ROASTED GRAIN (Heb. qālî, “roasted”). Roasted ears or grains of wheat (Lev. 23:14; Ruth 2:14; 1 Sam. 17:17; 25:18; “parched corn,” KJV). In 2 Sam. 17:28 the word occurs twice, once as parched grain and once as parched seeds (“parched corn,” “parched pulse,” KJV).

ROB, ROBBER, ROBBERY. These words are each the rendering of a number of Heb. and Gk. words. Theft and plunder, systematically organized, have ever been principal employments of the nomad tribes of the East since Ishmael the Bedouin became a “wild donkey of a man” and a robber by trade (Gen. 16:12), and robbery has been considered in the highest degree creditable. In the singular history of Abimelech we are told that “the men of Shechem set men in ambush against him on the tops of the mountains, and they robbed all who might pass by them along the road” (Judg. 9:25). Job suffered serious loss from a predatory incursion of the Chaldeans (Job 1:17), as did the people of Keilah, a lowland Judean town, from the Philistines (1 Sam. 23:1). Other instances are recorded of invasions of spoilers (Judg. 2:14; 6:3–4; 1 Sam. 11, 15; 2 Sam. 8, 10; 2 Kings 5:2; 1 Chron. 5:10, 18–22; etc.).

The Mosaic law strictly forbade robbery, as it did other wrongs against others (Lev. 19:13; see Law of Moses), and robbery was denounced in the Proverbs (22:22) and by the prophets (Isa. 10:2; 17:14; Ezek. 22:29; 33:15). Hosea (Hos. 6:9) compares the apostate priests to “raiders” who “wait for a man.”

In NT times, civilization and Roman power had done much to subdue these predatory hordes; but even then we learn from the parable of the good Samaritan what was to be expected by travelers; and the road from Jerusalem to Jericho was as dangerous a few years ago as in the time of our Lord. Paul mentions “dangers from robbers” (2 Cor. 11:26), and it would appear that he was especially subject to dangers of this kind while passing through Pisidia. These were plunderers, brigands (Gk. lēstēs), not to be confounded with thief (Gk. kleptēs), one who takes property by stealth (John 10:8, where both are mentioned).

Luke, in describing the uproar in Ephesus (Acts 19:23–41), says that the clerk of the city, in endeavoring to appease the multitude, told them that Paul and his companions were neither “robbers of temples nor blasphemers of our goddess.” The Gk. term used for “robbers of temples” is hierosulos (temple despoiler), used in its verbal form, “do you rob temples” (Rom. 2:22). The plundering of heathen temples was indirectly forbidden to the Jews (Deut. 7:25).

The apostle Paul, speaking of Christ Jesus (Phil. 2:6), says, “Who, although He existed in the form of God, did not regard equality with God a thing to be grasped” (Gk. harpagmos, the act of seizing, with the secondary sense of a thing to be seized; cf. KJV).

ROCK.

Figurative. A rock is illustrative of God, as the Creator of His people (Deut. 32:18); as the strength of His people (32:4; 2 Sam. 22:2–3; Pss. 18:1–2; 62:7; Isa. 17:10); as their defense and refuge (Pss. 31:2–3; 94:22; etc.), and salvation (Deut. 32:15; Pss. 89:26; 95:1).

ROCK, CHRIST THE. As a Rock, Christ is portrayed as smitten that the Spirit of life may flow from Him to all who will drink (John 4:13–14; 7:27–39; 1 Cor. 10:4; Ex. 17:6). To the church, Christ as the Rock is the foundation (Matt. 16:18) and the chief cornerstone (Eph. 2:20). To the Jews at the first advent, Christ the Rock was a “stumbling stone” (Rom. 9:32; cf. Ps. 118:22; 1 Cor. 1:23). To Israel at the second advent, Christ will be the “top stone” (Zech. 4:7). To the Gentile world governments, Christ the Rock will be the stone “cut out without hands” (Dan. 2:34). As the Rock, Christ will be the stone that will fill the whole earth in the Kingdom age after the destruction of the Gentile world power. To unbelievers, Christ the Rock is a crushing stone of judgment (Matt. 21:44). M.F.U.

ROCK BADGER. See Animal Kingdom.

ROCK OF ESCAPE (Heb. selahammah□qōt; “cliff of divisions”). A rock in the wilderness of Maon and the scene of one of David’s most remarkable escapes from Saul (1 Sam. 23:28). Not identified with certainty. The KJV and NIV readings for this place are transliterations of the Heb. text.

ROD. The rendering of several Heb. words and one Gk. term.

1. A stick for punishment (Heb. shēbeṭ, Ex. 21:20; 2 Sam. 7:14; Job 9:34; Prov. 10:13; Isa. 11:4) and, in a few instances, a shepherd’s staff (Ezek. 20:37; Mic. 7:14, “scepter”).

Figurative. “He who spares his rod hates his son” (Prov. 13:24) and “the rod and reproof give wisdom” (29:15) are proverbs in which rod is used as a figure for punishment. “I shall make you pass under the rod” (Ezek. 20:37; “staff,” NIV) refers to a custom among shepherds who let the sheep pass under their shepherd’s rod for the purpose of counting them and seeing whether they are in good condition or not. The figure is here applied to God, who will cause His flock, the Israelites, to pass under the rod, i.e., to be taken into His special care. Rod is used as a symbol of power and authority (Ps. 2:9), and of afflictions as the means by which God disciplines His people (Job 9:34).

2. A walking staff (Heb. maṭṭeh, “branch”; elsewhere “staff,” Ex. 4:2; 7:9; 1 Sam. 14:27, 43). In the case of Moses and Aaron the rod was a shepherd’s staff, belonging to Moses but sometimes employed by Aaron in performing miracles. It was also called “the staff of God” (Ex. 4:20; 17:9), probably because through it Jehovah wrought wonders. Aaron’s priesthood was confirmed by a miracle calculated to silence the murmurings of the people. God commanded Moses to take twelve rods from the tribal princes of Israel and to write upon each the name of the tribe. As only twelve rods were taken for all the tribes of Israel, and Levi was included among them, Ephraim and Manasseh must have been reckoned as the one tribe of Joseph (see Num. 17:1–10). The rods were to be laid in the Tabernacle before the Ark of the Covenant; and there the rod of the man whom Jehovah chose, i.e., entrusted with the priesthood (Num. 16:5), would put forth shoots. On the following morning “the rod of Aaron for the house of Levi had sprouted and put forth buds and produced blossoms, and it bore ripe almonds” (Num. 17:1–9; cf. Heb. 9:4).

3. Paul, in recounting his afflictions, writes (2 Cor. 11:25), “Three times I was beaten with rods” (Gk. hrabdizō, “to strike with a stick”), i.e., bastinadoed.

Using rods as a means of divination was a common heathen practice. See Magic: Rhabdomancy.

ROE, ROEBUCK. See Animal Kingdom: Doe; Gazelle; Roebuck.

RO’GELIM (rō’ge-lim; “treaders,” i.e., “fullers”). A town in Gilead, the residence of Barzillai (2 Sam. 17:27; 19:31). Nothing further is known respecting it.

ROH’GAH (rō’ga). The second son of Shemer, of the tribe of Asher, and fifth in descent from that patriarch (1 Chron. 7:34), about 1440 B.C.

ROLL, ROLL OF A BOOK. See Scroll; Book. The Heb. term in Isa. 8:1 (KJV) is different from those elsewhere translated roll and is given as tablet in the NASB and scroll in the NIV. The “house of the rolls” (Ezra 6:1, KJV) evidently was the royal library and was made up of clay tablets. The NASB and NIV read “archives.”

ROLLER (Heb. hittûl, “swathed”). A bandage (so NASB; the NIV reads “splint”) wrapped around a broken limb (Ezek. 30:21).

ROMAM'TI-E'ZER (rō-mam'ti-e'zer; “I have raised a help”). One of the sons of Heman the seer. In the arrangement of the Temple service by David, Romamti-ezer was appointed head of the twenty-fourth section, consisting of twelve persons of his family (1 Chron. 25:4, 31), a little before 960 B.C.

RO'MAN. A designation referring (1) to a citizen of the Roman Empire (Acts 22:25–29; 23:27; see Citizenship, no. 2), (2) to an inhabitant of Rome (cf. Acts 2:10), and (3) to those who represent the Roman government (John 11:48; Acts 28:17).

RO'MAN EMPIRE. The government of the Romans under the emperors, beginning with Augustus, as well as the territory controlled by the Romans.

Its Inauguration. By the victory of Actium (31 B.C.), Octavianus became the undisputed master of the Roman world; but he shrank from taking the name of king or dictator, which were repugnant to the Roman people. But long before he had taken the title of Caesar and now allowed himself to be called Augustus, retaining the old official title of imperator. He was in theory simply the first citizen of the Republic, entrusted with temporary powers to settle the disorders of the state. The empire was nominally elective, but practically it passed by adoption, the emperors officially adopting their political successors. The Julio-Claudian line ruled from 31 B.C. to A.D. 68, the Flavians from 69 to 96, and the “Five Good Emperors” from 96 to 180. And until Nero’s time a sort of hereditary right seemed to have been recognized.

Extent. Before the conquests of Pompey and Caesar the Roman Empire was confined to a narrow strip encircling the Mediterranean Sea. Pompey added Asia Minor and Syria; Caesar added Gaul. The generals of Augustus overran the northwestern portion of Spain and the country between the Alps and the Danube. The boundaries were now the Atlantic on the W; the Euphrates on the E; the deserts of Africa, the cataracts of the Nile, and the Arabian deserts on the S; the British Channel, the Rhine, the Danube, and the Black Sea on the N. The only subsequent conquests of importance were those of Britain by Claudius and Dacia by Trajan. The population of the empire at the time of Augustus has been calculated at 85 million.

The Provinces. The usual fate of a country conquered by Rome was to become a subject province, governed directly from Rome by officers sent out for that purpose. Sometimes, however, petty sovereigns were left in possession of a nominal independence (e.g., Herod in Palestine). There were differences, too, in the political condition of cities within the provinces. Some were free cities, i.e., were governed by their own magistrates and were exempted from occupation by a Roman military post. Other cities were “colonies,” i.e., communities of Roman citizens transplanted, like garrisons of the imperial city, into a foreign land. Augustus divided the provinces into two classes: (1) imperial and (2) senatorial, retaining in his own hands, for obvious reasons, those provinces where the presence of a large military force was necessary and committing the peaceful and unarmed provinces to the Senate. The imperial provinces at first were: Gaul, Lusitania, Syria, Phoenicia, Cilicia, Cyprus, and Egypt. The senatorial provinces were: Africa, Numidia, Asia, Achaia, and Epirus, Dalmatia, Macedonia, Sicily, Crete, and Cyrene, Bithynia and Pontus, Sardinia, Baetica. Cyprus and Gallia Narbonensis were subsequently given up by Augustus, who in turn received Dalmatia from the Senate. Many other changes were made afterward. The NT writers invariably designate the governors of senatorial provinces by the correct title of anthupatoi, proconsuls (Acts 13:7; 18:12; 19:38). For the governor of an imperial province, properly styled “Legatus Caesaris,” the word hēgemōn (governor) is used in the NT. The provinces were heavily taxed for the benefit of Rome and her citizens. They are said to have been better governed under the empire than under the Republic, and those of the emperor better than those of the Senate. Two important changes were introduced under the empire. The governors received a fixed pay, and the term of their command was prolonged. The condition of the Roman Empire at the time when Christianity appeared has often been dealt with as affording obvious illustrations of the apostle Paul's expression that the "fulness of time came" (Gal. 4:4). The general peace within the limits of the empire, the formation of military roads, the suppression of piracy, the march of the legions, the voyages of the grain fleets, the general increase of traffic, the spread of the Latin language in the West as Greek had already spread in the East, and the external unity of the empire offered facilities up to this time unknown for the spread of worldwide religion. The tendency, too, of a despotism like that of the Roman Empire to reduce all its subjects to a dead level was a powerful instrument in breaking down the pride of privileged races and national religions and familiarizing men with the truth of "the God who made the world and all things in it" (Acts 17:24, 26). But still more striking than this outward preparation for the diffusion of the gospel was the appearance of a deep and widespread corruption that seemed to defy any human remedy. The chief prophetic notices of the Roman Empire are found in the book of Daniel.

ROMANS, EPISTLE TO. The greatest of Paul's epistles and considered by many as the greatest book in the NT. Galatians has been called the "Magna Charta" of Christian liberty and the Roman epistle has been called the "constitution" of Christianity. Its subject material, its logical reasoning, its vigor of style, and its relevance to human need give it a foremost place in biblical revelation. It is a book, in one sense, simple and clear, but in another sense so magnificent that it baffles complete comprehension.

Occasion. The epistle appears to have been occasioned by the apostle's interest in the church at Rome. He tells us that he intended to pay a visit in the near future (Acts 19:21; Rom. 1:13; 15:22–29). The fact that Phoebe, a deaconess of the church at Cenchraea, was going to Rome presented an opportunity to send the epistle to the Christians in that city (16:1–2). Paul was all the more compelled to write to this church since it had come into existence apparently without authoritative leadership and needed thorough instruction in the fundamentals of salvation.

Date. The letter was written in Corinth during Paul's three-month visit in Greece (Acts 20:2–3). This fact is made evident by reference to the apostle's journey to Jerusalem with a collection for the poor at the time of writing (Rom. 15:25–27). Since this collection was emphasized in the earlier letters to Corinth (1 Cor. 16:1–4; 2 Cor. 8–9), it is quite evident that these letters were written about the same time. It clearly appears from these considerations that Romans is later than 2 Corinthians because the apostle is about to leave for Jerusalem (Rom. 15:25). The second Corinthian epistle was written from Macedonia, and from Macedonia Paul went to Greece. Numerous instances in the Corinthian epistles point to the fact that the epistle to the Romans was written from Corinth not long after Paul penned 2 Corinthians, that is, A.D. 56.

Genuineness. The external evidence comes from quotations and reminiscences of this epistle in Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Justin Martyr, Polycarp, Hippolytus, Marcion, the Muratori Canon, and the Old Latin and Syriac versions. From the time of Irenaeus onward the epistle was universally recognized as Pauline and canonical. The internal evidence of genuineness is also strong. The writer claims to be Paul (1:1) and makes personal references that can only be identified with the great apostle (cf. 11:13; 15:15–20). Style, argument, theology, and many other factors point to Pauline authenticity. At the beginning of the modern critical period a few Dutch, Swiss, and English scholars contested the authenticity of the book on the ground that the apostle was acquainted with so many individuals by name in a city where he had never been (see chap. 16). But this argument has been repeatedly shown to be weak because travel was extensive in Paul's day, and he probably met these individuals elsewhere in the empire before they went to Rome to live.

Background. The origin of Christianity in Rome must be traced to converts scattered throughout the empire who came to visit or live in the imperial city. That Peter was the founder of the church is indefensible since it would be unthinkable that Paul would omit his name if he had been bishop in the city. It is possible that the sojourners at Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:10) may also have been instrumental in the founding of the Roman church. Some critics have denied the authenticity of chaps. 15 and 16, but there is no valid internal evidence supporting this, neither is there support for it in the ancient manuscripts. Moreover, his greeting of many persons by name was a studied effort to establish rapport with a church he had never met. Such greetings of individuals would have been unnecessary and unwise in writing Philippians, Corinthians, Ephesians, and others. Furthermore, any omission of members of the church would have incurred the risk of offending someone in the churches with which Paul was familiar. In this case, however, omissions would have hurt no one because he could not possibly have known all the members of the church.

Contents. After introductory matters, the apostle demonstrates the universal sinfulness of the human race and the need for divine righteousness (1:18–3:20). He then sets forth the justifying righteousness that God has provided for every believer through the redemptive work of Christ (3:21–5:11). He refutes three objections against God's way of salvation through the work of Christ on the basis of faith alone.

The First Objection. Men may be saved and yet continue in sin. This is shown to be untrue because of the believer's union with Christ into a new moral life (6:1–14).

The Second Objection. Deliverance from the law releases men from moral obligation. But this is impossible since the believer undertakes a new and higher obligation, devoting himself to the law of God (6:15–7:6).

The Third Objection. The law of God is made an evil thing by justifying grace. But this is not so because the law's inability to save is not that it is evil but that man is incapable of keeping it (7:7–25). In chap. 8 the apostle Paul deals with the triumphs of the redeemed life and the believer's assurance not only of justification but of glorification and full conformity to Christ. The believer is to rejoice in full security. Chapters 9–11 deal with the great truths of salvation in dispensational relation to the Jew: his past (chap. 9), his present (chap. 10), his future (chap. 11). The rest of the epistle consists of exhortations to Christian living (chap. 12), to the doing of civil and social duties (chap. 13), and living according to Christian love and unity (14:1–15:13), ending with personal salutations (15:14–16:27).

ROME (Lat. Roma). One of the most famous cities of the world. Its name was once a synonym for political power and territorial expansion.

Founding. The story of origin of the city is mythological rather than historical. Romulus, its founder and first king, was according to tradition the son of Mars and was preserved, when cast out by his cruel relatives, through the kind attention of a wolf and a shepherd's wife.

The foundation of Rome traditionally dates from 753 B.C. It takes its name, according to Cicero, from the name of its founder, Romulus. It was located upon marshy ground by the river Tiber, in Italy, about seventeen miles from the Mediterranean Sea, into which the Tiber flows. The Tiber itself is navigable only for small provision boats.

Originally the settlement of Rome was confined to the Palatine hill, but it came to include the Capitoline, Quirinal, Caelian, Aventine, Esquiline, and the Viminal. Servius Tullius was supposed to have enclosed the whole seven hills with a stone wall. Hence it has been called Urbs Septicollis, "the city of the seven hills."

Early Monarchy. The monarchical government existed under seven princes according to the early traditional accounts: Romulus, Numa Pompilius, Tullus Hostilius, Ancus Marcius, Tarquinius Priscus, Servius Tullius, and Tarquin the Proud, who was expelled in 509 B.C. Apparently the last three kings were Etruscans, who did more than the Latins would have admitted for the development of the city. They seem to have been responsible for the urbanization process, for draining of swamps, the introduction of various trades, and the development of commerce.

Republic. The abolition of the kingly office and the rule of alien princes were succeeded by a period of government under consuls. Two consuls were elected annually from the patrician families until 367 B.C. when the first plebeian consul was created. The two consuls had equal authority, and together they possessed full authority as the chief executives. Gradually other magistrates were elected as the need arose to create additional departments of government. New assemblies were established also and shared power with the Senate.

Empire. Under the monarchical period and under the Republic the power of Rome steadily increased, and the foundations for the later empire were laid. By 266 Italy was subjugated as far N as the Po Valley. The Punic Wars took place between 264 and 146 B.C., resulting in the destruction of Carthage in 146 and domination of the western basin of the Mediterranean. Between 200 and 146 Rome destroyed Macedonia and worsted the Seleucids, annexing Greece and dominating the eastern basin of the Mediterranean. Gradually she took chunks of territory in the eastern Mediterranean and organized them into provinces. Pompey added Palestine in 63 B.C. For numerous complex reasons Rome endured a period of civil war during much of the first century B.C. Julius Caesar (who had conquered Gaul) fought it out with Pompey and made himself dictator. When Caesar was assassinated in 44 B.C., Brutus and Cassius and others responsible were dispatched by Mark Antony and Octavian, who subsequently fought each other for control of the empire. Octavian won at the battle of Actium in 31 B.C., added Egypt to the territory he controlled, and terminated the Republic and instituted the empire. As Augustus he then ruled until A.D. 14. He was the first of the Julio-Claudian line, which lasted until A.D. 68.

Jesus was born during the reign of Augustus and the NT era inaugurated. Under Tiberius (14–37) occurred the ministry of John the Baptist and Jesus. Caligula followed (37–41), succeeded by Claudius (41–54). During Claudius's reign Britain was conquered, and Paul conducted his great missionary campaigns. Under Nero (54–68) Rome was burned, the Christians were persecuted, and Paul was martyred. The death of the infamous Nero inaugurated another struggle for power. The result was that Vespasian won and began the Flavian line. Three Flavian emperors ruled: Vespasian (69–79), during whose reign Jerusalem revolted and was destroyed in A.D. 70, Titus (79–81), and Domitian (81–96). Under the latter, persecution of Christians took place, and John evidently was exiled to the Isle of Patmos and wrote the Revelation.

This period was followed by an era of expanding power. Nerva ruled 96–98; Trajan 98–117, conquering Mesopotamia and bringing the empire to its greatest extent; and Hadrian 117–138, when Jerusalem was rebuilt as a pagan city called Aelia Capitolina. Persecution of Christians heightened during the third century. Diocletian (284–305) was the most intense persecutor. After his death there was another clash for power. Constantine the Great became sole ruler from 323 to 337. His conversion made Christianity a legal religion, and persecution ceased.

The City in Paul's Day. When Paul came to Rome, it was a sprawling metropolis of more than 1 million people. It was indeed not only the first city of the empire but the largest and most splendid city of the day. The metropolis was served by many famous roads, including the well-known and ancient Via Appia and Via Latina from the S, the Via Labicana and Via Tiburtina on the E, the Via Salaria, Via Pinciana, and the Via Flaminia from the N, the Via Cornelia and Via Aurelia from the W.

Buildings. Theaters, amphitheaters, baths, circuses, and luxurious private dwellings filled the city. The populace had much leisure. There were no less than 159 holidays in the year. Of these 93 were devoted to games and performances at governmental expense. In the circus the famous chariot races were held. The oldest and largest was the Circus Maximus, which Paul must have passed by after entering the Porta Capena on the Appian Way. This circus at the time of Nero probably seated about 200,000 people. The Circus Flaminius, built in the third century B.C., the Circus of Caligula, and the Circus of Nero were famous for chariot racing and other sports. The famous theaters included the Theater of Pompey, built in 55 B.C., the Theater of Balbus (13 B.C.) seating 7,700, the well-preserved Theater of Marcellus (11 B.C.), seating 14,000. The Flavian Amphitheater, or Colosseum, had not yet been constructed. The Baths of Titus and the Baths of Trajan were not yet built, but there were numerous public baths in the city as early as the beginning of Augustus's reign.

The Forum. In the valley lying between the Capitoline and Palatine hills was the Forum, surrounded by many famous buildings. The Roman emperor resided on the Palatine Hill. In addition to the imperial palace, the Palatine Hill was the site of the famous temple of Apollo and the temple of the Magna Mater, or Cybele.

The city was adorned by many fine parks and gardens, one-eighth of the area being given over to these beauty spots. Amidst this wealth and beauty were scores of temples given over to superstitious idolatry. To such a city came the apostle to the Gentiles with the saving message of the gospel of Christ. H.F.V.

ROM'PHA. See Gods, False.

ROOF. See House.

Figurative. To receive one under the shelter of the roof represents hospitality; in the case of Lot this was so greatly estimated that he was willing to sacrifice his duty as a father to maintain it (Gen. 19:8); and by the centurion who considered it too great an honor for him to receive the Lord as a guest (Matt. 8:8).

ROOM. As an apartment (see House). The term is sometimes used in the present sense of entrance, opportunity, as in the proverb, "A man's gift makes room for him" (Prov. 18:16).

"The place of honor" at a wedding (Luke 14:8; "highest room," KJV) is the rendering of Gk. prōtoklisia (the "first reclining place"), the chief place at the table.

ROOT (Heb. shōresh; Gk. hriza, a common figure often referred to in Scripture).

Figurative. From the important relation that the root bears to the plant we have in Scripture many beautiful and forceful illustrations.

1. The root of a family is the progenitor from whom the race derives its name; thus, "from the serpent's root a viper will come out" (Isa. 14:29), meaning that though the Davidic kingdom was broken down by the Syro-Ephraimitish war, another would arise to be a scourge to Israel's oppressors. The Messiah is called "the root of Jesse" (11:10), as containing its sap and strength in His divine capacity (cf. Rev. 5:5; and 22:16, as "the root and the offspring of David," referring to both His divine and human nature). The progenitor of a race is also called its root (Prov. 12:3).

2. Root means the essential cause of anything, as "the love of money is a root of all sorts of evil" (1 Tim. 6:10; cf. Heb. 12:15, "that no root of bitterness springing up causes trouble").

3. "Rooted" means firmly established, "being rooted and grounded in love" (Eph. 3:17; cf. Col. 2:7); also "taking root" (Job 5:3; to take "deep root," Ps. 80:9; also Isa. 27:6; 37:31; 40:24).

4. Opposed to this is to "uproot," which has the sense of to destroy, remove (1 Kings 14:15; Job 31:12; Ps. 52:5; Luke 17:6).

5. The roots of a plant being near water is symbolic of prosperity; “my root is spread out to the waters” (Job 29:19); lit., “open to water,” and so never lacking. Ezekiel (Ezek. 31:7) says of Assyria, “For its roots extended to many waters,” which accounted for “the multitude of its branches” (v. 9). The opposite figure is of a root “dried up” (Hos. 9:16).

6. “Though its roots grow old in the ground” (Job 14:8) denotes loss of vitality; whereas of sinners it is said, “Their root will become like rot and their blossom blow away as dust” (Isa. 5:24).

7. Of our Lord in His humiliation it was said, “He grew up before Him like a tender shoot, and like a root out of parched ground” (Isa. 53:2), “both figures depicting the lowly and unattractive character of the small though vigorous beginning, the miserable character of the external circumstances in the midst of which the birth and growth of the servant had taken place” (Delitzsch, Com., ad loc.).

ROPE, ROPEMAKERS. See Handicrafts.

ROSE. See Vegetable Kingdom: Crocus; Rose.

ROSH (rōsh; “the head”). In the genealogy of Gen. 46:21, Rosh is reckoned among the sons of Benjamin, but the name does not occur elsewhere, and it is probable that “Ehi and Rosh” (עֵהוּ וְרוֹשׁ) is a corruption of “Ahiram” (cf. Num. 26:38). It is also possible that Rosh is the correct reading, but like Er and Onan of Judah he died childless.

ROT, ROTTEN, ROTTENNESS. The rendering of several Heb. words, used mostly figuratively. Job says (Job 13:28) that he is “decaying like a rotten thing,” i.e., a symbol of gradual decay. Bronze and “rotten wood” are contrasted (41:27) as representing strength and weakness. “The name of the wicked will rot” (Prov. 10:7) is illustrative of the speedy oblivion into which they go. “Rottenness [“decay,” NIV] in his bones” (12:4; 14:30) means an incurable disease, robbing one of power.

ROUND TIRES. A KJV expression for crescent-shaped ornaments. See Dress.

ROW, ROWERS. See Ship.

RUBIES. See Mineral Kingdom.

RUDDER. See Ship.

RUDDY (Heb. אָדוֹם, from אָדַם, “to be red”). Applied to David (1 Sam. 16:12; 17:42) and understood by many to mean red-haired. It seems rather to refer to the complexion. This view is confirmed by the application of kindred words, as “Her consecrated ones were purer than snow, they were whiter than milk; they were more ruddy in body than corals” (Lam. 4:7); and “My beloved is dazzling and ruddy” (Song of Sol. 5:10), who is immediately described as black-haired (v. 11).

RUDE. Paul writes in 2 Cor. 11:6 (KJV) “But though I be rude in speech, yet not in knowledge.” The Gk. term idiōtes means properly a private person, as opposed to a magistrate, and in this instance in 2 Corinthians it means unlearned, illiterate, as opposed to the learned or cultured. The NASB renders “unskilled in speech.” A similar use of idiōtes appears in Acts 4:13 (“ignorant,” KJV; “untrained,” NASB; “unschooled,” NIV); idiōtes in 1 Cor. 14:16, 23, 24 is given as “unlearned” in the KJV and as “ungifted” in the NASB (marg., “unversed in spiritual gifts”). The NIV translates “who do not understand.”

RUDIMENTS (Gk. stoicheion, “any first thing”). Letters of the alphabet, the “elements” (2 Pet. 3:10), from which all things have come; “primary principles”; see Col. 2:8, 20, where reference is made to “the elementary principles of the world” (NASB; “rudiments,” KJV; “basic principles,” NIV).

RUE. See Vegetable Kingdom.

RU'FUS (rū'fus; "red"). Brother of Alexander and son of Simon the Cyrenian, whom the Jews compelled to bear the cross of Jesus when on His way to the crucifixion (Mark 15:21). Rufus is included by the apostle Paul (Rom. 16:13) among those in Rome to whom he sends salutations. It is generally supposed that this Rufus is identical with the one mentioned by Mark, and yet, as this was a common name, they may be different individuals.

RUHA'MAH (rū-ha'ma; "she has received mercy"). A figurative title applied to the daughter of the prophet Hosea, signifying that God would restore Israel to favor (Hos. 2:1) on condition of their repenting and returning to Him. Both Peter (1 Pet. 2:10) and Paul (Rom. 9:25–26) quote this prophecy with evident application to the Gentiles, as well as Jews. Through its apostasy from God, Israel has become like the Gentiles and has fallen from the covenants of promise; consequently the readoption of the Israelites as the children of God will be a practical proof that "the gifts and the calling" of God (Rom. 11:29) with respect to Israel are "irrevocable."

RUIN. The rendering of expressive Heb. terms: Derivatives from Heb. nāpal (to "fall"), the ruin of a city by dilapidation, separating all its stones (Isa. 25:2, "Thou hast made ... a fortified city into a ruin"; 17:1); of a country (Isa. 23:13; Ezek. 31:13; cf. 27:27). Other terms occur in the original, and numerous mounds of ruined cities (tells) dot the ancient biblical world. Excavation of the various strata of occupational history of these tells has made possible the modern science of biblical archaeology and immeasurably increased the knowledge of Bible backgrounds.

Figurative. Ruin is a fall or stumbling because of temptation to sin. The "gods of Damascus ... were the ruin" of King Ahaz (2 Chron. 28:23, KJV; cf. Ezek. 18:30; 21:15, in the KJV, and Prov. 10:29; 18:7, in the NASB). The NIV translates "downfall" in 2 Chron. 28:23; Ezek. 18:30, and "undoing" in Prov. 18:7.

RULER. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words, used to designate a large number of officials, although the term ruler does not always appear in the same verses in the various translations and versions: the King (1 Sam. 25:30; 2 Sam. 6:21); a prince (which see) or other ruler of the people; a prime minister, such as Joseph (Gen. 41:43, KJV), or Daniel (Dan. 2:48; 5:7); a town prefect (Judg. 9:30; 2 Chron. 29:20; Neh. 3:9); a chief adviser (2 Sam. 8:18; 20:26); the steward of a large house (Matt. 24:45, 47; Luke 12:42); a superintendent of workmen, such as herdsmen (Gen. 47:6) or laborers (1 Kings 11:28); an overseer of the king's property (1 Chron. 27:31); the ruler, or governor, of the feast (John 2:8–9); the "ruler of the synagogue" (see Synagogue); the chief treasurer (1 Chron. 26:24). The high priest was "chief officer of the house of God" (1 Chron. 9:11; cf. 2 Chron. 35:8), as so was sometimes his assistant (Neh. 11:11). See Law, Administration of; Pastor.

RU'MAH (rū'ma; "elevation"). A city named as the home of Pedaiah, the father of Zebidah, Jeboiakim's mother (2 Kings 23:36). Some believe it is the same as Arumah (Judg. 9:41), in the neighborhood of Shechem. Others identify it with Khirbet Rume, six miles N of Nazareth.

RUMP. See Fat Tail.

RUN, RUNNING. See Footman; Games.

RUNNER (Heb. rāš). Primarily the person who conveyed any message with speed; and subsequently the means of regular communication. Job declares, "Now my days are swifter than a runner" (Job 9:25), showing that at an early time persons possessing swiftness of foot were so commonly employed as couriers as to render such an allusion both intelligent and appropriate. See Courier.

RUNNING SORE. See Diseases: Wen.

RUSH. See Vegetable Kingdom: Reeds, Rushes.

RUST (Gk. brōsis, “eating”; ios). The first of these Gk. terms is rendered “rust” (Matt. 6:19–20) in the wider sense of corrosion. It is, however, generally used, as almost everywhere in Greek writers, of that which is eaten, food (cf. Heb. 12:16; 2 Cor. 9:10). The second term means poison, and is so rendered (Rom. 3:13; James 3:8); but in 5:3 is rendered “rust” (“corrosion,” NIV) in speaking of the tarnish that spreads over silver. In Ezek. 24:6, 11–12 Jerusalem is likened to a pot with spots of rust (Heb. hebâ) that cannot be removed. The uncleanness of the pot is this rust, which is to be burned away by heat.

RUTH (rūth, “a female friend”). A Moabitess, first the wife of Mahlon and then of Boaz, and an ancestress of David and of Christ.

Wife of Mahlon. In the time of the Judges Elimelech, an inhabitant of Bethlehem in Judah, emigrated into the land of Moab with his wife, Naomi, and his two sons, Mahlon and Chilion, because of a famine in the land (Ruth 1:1–2). There he died, and his two sons married Moabite women, named Orpah and Ruth, the latter becoming the wife of Mahlon (4:10), before 1100 B.C.

Return to Bethlehem. After the death of her two sons Naomi resolved to return to her own country and kindred, and Ruth determined to accompany her, notwithstanding her mother-in-law’s entreaty that she should follow her sister-in-law and return to her own people and her god. Ruth answered her in beautiful and earnest words: “Do not urge me to leave you or turn back from following you; for where you go, I will go, and where you lodge, I will lodge. Your people shall be my people, and your God, my God. Where you die, I will die, and there I will be buried. Thus may the Lord do to me, and worse, if anything but death parts you and me” (1:16–17). They arrived at Bethlehem just at the beginning of the barley harvest.

Marries Boaz. Ruth went out to glean for the purpose of procuring support for herself and her mother-in-law, and in gleaning came by chance upon Boaz, a relative of Naomi. When he heard that she had come with Naomi from Moab, Boaz spoke kindly to her and gave her permission not only to glean in the field and even among the sheaves but to appease her hunger and thirst with the food and drink of his reapers (2:1–16). His kindness to her induced Naomi to counsel Ruth to seek an opportunity to tell Boaz the claim she had upon him as the nearest kinsman of her deceased husband. Ruth followed this advice, and Boaz promised to fulfill her request provided the nearer redeemer, who was still living, would not perform his duty (3:1–13). As this relative was unwilling to do so, Boaz obtained from him a release, redeemed himself the patrimony of Elimelech, and took Ruth to be his wife (4:1–13). In process of time she became the mother of Obed, the father of Jesse and grandfather of David (vv. 13, 17; Matt. 1:5).

The artifice that Naomi suggested and Ruth adopted to induce Boaz to act as her redeemer (chap. 3) appears, according to our customs, to be objectionable from a moral point of view; judged, however, by the customs of that time it was not. Boaz, who was an honorable man, praised Ruth for having taken refuge with him instead of looking for a husband among younger men and took no offense at the manner in which she had approached him and proposed to become his wife. The anxiety manifested by Ruth is explained by the desire to continue the family name and to have the possessions of her father-in-law redeemed and restored to the family.

RUTH, BOOK OF. This book bears as its title its principal character (for plot of book see Ruth). Its purpose may be viewed as threefold: (1) to provide part of the lineage of David, (2) to show God's grace in welcoming Gentiles into the family of God, and (3) to demonstrate the function of the kinsman-redeemer as a foregleam of the work of the Messiah.

Date and Authorship. The author of the work is unknown. The Babylonian Talmud ascribes the book to Samuel, and that is a possibility because Samuel anointed David king over Israel. Thus Samuel considered David to be king even though the repudiated Saul was still ruling when Samuel died; and if penned by Samuel, the reference in the book to David as a figure of significance would be quite in order. The historical setting of the book is laid in the time of the Judges (Ruth 1:1), and it seems to have been composed about the same time as the longer work. Some critics argue for a postexilic date of authorship, in part because of alleged Aramaisms in the text. But these Aramaisms have not been proved; Heb. words for the supposed Aram. words are virtually identical. In fact, a strong argument for an early date can be presented by the general character of the Heb. vocabulary, syntax, and classical purity of style. Moreover, after the Exile, and certainly in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah, mixed marriages of the sort indicated here would not have been approved. Therefore the supposed later fabrication of the genealogical note (as suggested by some critics) seems highly unlikely, if not impossible. The book also furnishes a logical historical explanation of David's friendly contacts with the Moabite king, when he fled from Saul and sought asylum in Moab for his parents (1 Sam. 22:3, 4).

SABACH'THANI (sa-bak'tha-ni), or Sabachtha'ni (sa-bak-tha'ni; Gk. for Aram.

shabaqtanî; “thou has left me”), quoted by our Lord upon the cross from Ps. 22 (cf. Matt. 27:46; Mark 15:34). See Jesus.

SABAE'ANS (sa-bē'anz). See Sabeans.

SAB'AOTH (Gk. sabaōth, for Heb. שָׁבָאֹת, “armies,” Rom. 9:29; James 5:4; “Almighty,” NIV). In the OT it frequently occurs in the epithet “Jehovah, God of hosts,” or simply “Jehovah of hosts.” This epithet “Jehovah, God of hosts” designates Him as the supreme head and commander of all the heavenly forces, so that the host of Jehovah and the host of heaven are the same (1 Kings 22:19), that is, the angels, who are the Lord's agents, ever ready to execute His will. It is never applied to God with reference to the army of Israel, although once the companies composing it are called “the hosts of the Lord” (Ex. 12:41), because they were under His guidance and were to fight for His cause.

SABBATH (Heb. shabbāt, “repose,” i.e., “cessation” from exertion; Gk. sabbaton). The name Sabbath is applied to various great festivals but principally and usually to the seventh day of the week, the strict observance of which is enforced not merely in the general Mosaic code but also in the Ten Commandments.

Origin. The account of the creation states that God “rested on the seventh day” (Gen. 2:2). The assertion that the Sabbath rest was a Babylonian as well as a Hebrew institution and the inference that the Hebrews may have borrowed the idea from the Babylonians requires some ingenuity to demonstrate. By way of answer the following should be noted: (1) The Babylonians paid special attention to the nineteenth day as well as those that were multiples of seven; they called only the fifteenth day shabatum. (2) The Babylonian tablets call the seventh day “an evil day” or “an unlucky day,” whereas Scripture describes it as “a holy day.” (3) The Babylonians placed prohibitions only on the “king,” “seer,” and “the physician,” whereas the OT makes the Sabbath binding on all. (4) There was no cessation of business activity on Babylonian special days. (5) Though Babylonians had special regard for days that were multiples of seven, those days rarely ever fell on the seventh day of the week in their lunar calendar and thus were not equivalent to the Hebrew Sabbath.

Jewish Sabbath. The Jewish Sabbath was distinctive and was treated at length in the Bible.

Origin. The Sabbath was of divine institution and is so declared in passages where ceasing to create is called “resting” (Gen. 2:3; Ex. 20:11; 31:17). The blessing and sanctifying of the seventh day have regard, no doubt, to the Sabbath, which Israel, as the people of God, was afterward to keep; but we are not to suppose that the theocratic (Jewish) Sabbath was thus early instituted. The Sabbath was instituted by Moses. It is in Ex. 16:23–29 that we find the first indisputable institution of the day, as one given to and to be kept by the children of Israel. Shortly afterward it was reenacted in the fourth commandment. Many of the rabbis date its first institution from the incident recorded in Ex. 15:25. This, however, seems to lack foundation. We are not on sure ground until we come to the unmistakable institution in chap. 16, in connection with the gathering of manna. The opinion of Grotius is probably correct, that the day was already known, and in some measure observed as holy, but that the rule of abstinence from work was first given then, and shortly afterward more explicitly imposed in the fourth commandment.

Purpose. The Sabbath was a means of binding together more closely the chosen people and keeping them apart from the rest of mankind. Two reasons are given for its observance in Israel—God’s resting on the seventh day of creation (Ex. 20:8–11; 31:16–17) and Israel’s having been a “slave in the land of Egypt” and having been brought “out of there by a mighty hand and by an outstretched arm” (Deut. 5:15). “These are not the subjects of Sabbath celebration; indeed, the Sabbath has no one event as the subject of its observance, but is only the day which Israel is called to sanctify to the Lord its God, because God blessed and hallowed the day at the creation by resting on it. The completion of creation, the rest of God, is His blessedness in the contemplation of the finished work, the satisfaction of God in His work, which overflows in blessing upon His creatures. This blessedness was lost to the world through the Fall, but not forever, for, through redemption, divine mercy will restore it. The rest of God is the goal which the whole creation is destined to reach. To guide to this goal, the Sabbath was enjoined by way of compensation for the losses which accrue to man under the curse of sin, from that heavy, oppressive labor which draws him from God. Thus the Sabbath was hallowed, i.e., separated from other days of the week to be a holy day for man, by putting the blessing of his rest on the rest of this day. The return of this blessed and hallowed day is to be to him a perpetual reminder and enjoyment of the divine rest. This significance of the Sabbath explains why its keeping through all future generations of Israel is called a perpetual covenant and a sign between Jehovah and the children of Israel forever (Ex. 31:17)” (Keil, Arch., 2:2ff.).

Observance. According to Mosaic law the Sabbath was observed: (1) By cessation from labor (Ex. 20:10). The idea of work is not more precisely defined in the law, except that the kindling of fire for cooking is expressly forbidden (35:3), and the gathering of wood is treated as a transgression (Num. 15:32–36); wherefore it is evident that work, in its widest sense, was to cease. “Accordingly, it was quite in keeping with the law when not only labor, such as burden-bearing (Jer. 17:21–27), but traveling, as forbidden by Ex. 16:29, and trading (Amos 8:5) were to cease on the Sabbath, and when Nehemiah, to prevent marketing on this day, ordered the closing of the gates” (Neh. 10:31; 13:15, 19). (2) By a holy assembly, the doubling of the daily offering by two lambs of the first year, with the corresponding meat and drink offerings (Num. 28:9–10) and the providing of new bread of the Presence in the Holy Place (Lev. 24:8). Thus the Sabbath was to Israel a “day of ... gladness” (Num. 10:10; cf. Hos. 2:11), “a delight, the holy day of the Lord honorable” (Isa. 58:13). From such passages it will appear that the essence of Sabbath observance is placed in the most unconditional and all-embracing self-denial, the renunciation of the whole natural being and natural desires, the most unconditional dedication to God (see Isa. 56:2; Ezek. 20:12, 21). The object of this cessation from labor and coming together in holy convocation was to give man an opportunity to engage in such mental and spiritual exercises as would tend to the quickening of soul and spirit and the strengthening of spiritual life. In this higher sense it is evident that our Lord meant that “the Sabbath was made for man” (Mark 2:27).

Reward. According to Ezekiel (20:12, 20) the Sabbath was to be a sign between Jehovah and Israel, “that they might know that I am the Lord who sanctifies them.” That is, “that Jehovah was sanctifying them—viz., by the Sabbath rest—as a refreshing and elevation of the mind, in which Israel was to have a foretaste of that blessed resting from all works to which the people of God was ultimately to attain” (Keil, Com., ad loc.). The penalty of defiling the Sabbath was death (Ex. 31:15; cf. Num. 15:32–36). But if the law of the Sabbath was broken through ignorance or mistake, pardon was extended after the presentation of a sin offering. At times the Jews dispensed with the extreme severity of the law (Isa. 56:2; Ezek. 20:16; 22:8; Lam. 2:6; Neh. 13:16); indeed, the legal observance of the Sabbath seems never to have been rigorously enforced until after the Exile. See Lord’s Day; Sunday; Synagogue.

Typology. The Sabbath commemorates God’s creation rest. It marks a finished creation. After Sinai it was a day of legal obligation. The Sabbath is mentioned often in the book of Acts in connection with the Jews. In the rest of the NT it occurs but twice (Col. 2:16; Heb. 4:4). In these passages the Sabbath is set forth not as a day to be observed but as typical of the present rest into which the believer entered when he “also rested [ceased] from his works” (v. 10) and trusted Christ.

Contrast to the First Day of the Week. As the Sabbath commemorates God’s creation rest, the first day speaks of Christ’s resurrection. The seventh day marks God’s creative rest. On the first day Christ was unceasingly active. The seventh day commemorates a finished creation, the first day a finished redemption. In the present dispensation of grace Sunday perpetuates the truth that one-seventh of one’s time belongs to God. In every other particular there is contrast.

SABBATH, COVERED WAY FOR THE (Heb. mûsak hashshabbât, 2 Kings 16:18). This was, no doubt, a covered place, stand, or hall in the court of the Temple used by the king whenever he visited the Temple with his attendants on the Sabbath on feast days. In what the removal of it consisted it is impossible to determine from lack of information. Some believe it means to change the name; others believe it to have been a taking down thereof. The motive may have been fear of the king of Assyria or King Ahaz’s own idolatry (cf. 2 Chron. 28:24).

SABBATH, DAY AFTER THE (Heb. māh̄arat hashshabbāt). A term of disputed meaning (Lev. 23:11, 15) occurring in connection with the feast of the Passover. The Sabbath referred to is not the weekly Sabbath but the day of rest, the first day of holy convocation of the Passover, the fifteenth Abib (Nisan). As a day of rest on which no laborious work was to be performed (v. 8), the first day of the feast is called “Sabbath,” irrespective of the day of the week upon which it fell. Thus “the day after the Sabbath” is equivalent to “the day after the Passover” (Josh. 5:11).

SABBATH, SECOND AFTER THE FIRST (Gk. sabbaton deuteroprōton, Luke 6:1, a “certain Sabbath,” see marg.). This expression has given rise to much discussion, and many views of its meaning are given. Of these we mention only a few. Bleek supposes an interpolation. Wetstein and Storr say that the first Sabbaths of the first, second, and third months of the year were called first, second, and third; the second first-Sabbath would thus be the first Sabbath of the second month. Louis Cappel suggests the following: The civil year of the Israelites commenced in autumn, in the month Tizri, and the ecclesiastical year in the month Nisan (about mid-March to mid-April), and there were thus every year two first-Sabbaths—one at the commencement of the civil year, of which the name would have been first-first; the other at the beginning of the ecclesiastical year, which would be called second-first. Edersheim (Life of Jesus, 2:54) and Strong (Concordance, s.v.) advocate the probable view that the second first-Sabbath was the one following immediately after the Paschal week, the twenty-second Nisan.

SABĒ'ANS (sa-bē'anz). The inhabitants of a kingdom in SW Arabia, S of Ma'in, N of the kingdom of Qataban in the Yeman-Hadhramaut region of S Arabia. This general region was explored in 1950–51 by the Arabian Expedition of the American Foundation for the Study of Man organized by Wendell Phillips (see Qataban and Sheba [1955]). The excavations in S Arabia have helped to outline its general history. The kingdoms of Ma'in, Saba, Qataban, Ausan, and Hadhramaut are now much better known. Before 1200 B.C. there was a southward migration of Sheba and allied tribes. About 1000 B.C. to 700 B.C. there was a great expansion of Sabean influence. From about the ninth century to the middle of the fifth century B.C. priest-kings of Sheba are known. From c. 400 to 25 B.C. the kingdom of the Minaeans and the kingdom of Qataban flourished. The ruins of Mariaba (Mareb) are a mute evidence of the splendor that the Sabean monarchs possessed. About 950 B.C. the biblically famous Queen of Sheba (Saba) set out on a 1,200-mile trek to visit the rich and powerful king of Israel in the N, taking with her lavish gifts (1 Kings 10:1–13). Although accustomed to wealth and splendor, the queen was so overwhelmed by Solomon's majesty that "she was breathless" (2 Chron. 9:4). In Matt. 12:42 and Luke 11:31 this ruler is designated as "the Queen of the South." The queen's strenuous journey to Jerusalem over inhospitable terrain was almost certainly dictated by commercial reasons. Her conference with Solomon must have involved defining the limits of commercial interests and arranging trade treaties that regulated the equitable exchange of the products of Arabia, including the lucrative incense trade and Palestinian products. Although the Queen of Sheba of Solomon's day has not been attested as yet in S Arabian inscriptions, there is not the slightest reason for denying either her or her visit to the Israelite monarch. The account is definitely not a "romantic tale" as generally used to be supposed (cf. James A. Montgomery, Arabia and the Bible [1934], p. 180). Although queens played little part in the later history of southern Arabia, they ruled large tribal confederacies in northern Arabia from the ninth to the seventh centuries B.C., as the cuneiform inscriptions relate. W. F. Albright's researches in S Arabia and the vast quantity of material being studied promise to shed important light on S Arabian history and on the Sabaeans. Much is now known of Sabean religion from excavated tablets. It was of the astral type; their chief deity was Attar, the male counterpart of the goddess of procreation, the Babylonian Ishtar. M.F.U.

SACHI'A (sa-ki'a). The sixth named of the seven sons of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (1 Chron. 8:10). See Sakia (NIV).

SACKBUT (sabka). See Music.

SACKCLOTH (Heb. śaq; Gk. sakkos, "a mesh," i.e., coarse, loose cloth). A coarse texture of a dark color, made of goat's hair (Isa. 50:3; Rev. 6:12) and resembling the cilicium of the Romans. It was used (1) for making sacks (cf. Gen. 42:25; Lev. 11:32; Josh. 9:4) and (2) for making the rough garments used by mourners (Gen. 37:34; Esther 4:1–4), which were in extreme cases worn next to the skin (1 Kings 21:27; 2 Kings 6:30; Job 16:15), and this even by females (Isa. 32:11; Joel 1:8; 2 Macc. 3:19), but at other times were worn over the coat (Jonah 3:6) in place of the outer garment.

Figurative. Girding with sackcloth is a figure for heavy afflictions (Ps. 35:13; 69:11; Isa. 3:24; 15:3; 22:12; 32:11). Putting off, of joy and gladness (Ps. 30:11; Isa. 20:2). Covering the heavens, of severe judgments (Isa. 50:3; Rev. 6:12). Prophets and ascetics wore it over the underclothing to signify the sincerity of their calling (Isa. 20:2).

SACRAMENT (Lat. sacramentum, a military "oath" of enlistment). The term applied to baptism and the Lord's Supper, which are generally believed to have been instituted for the perpetual observance of the Christian church and placed among its means of grace. As signs they represent in action and by symbols the great blessings of the covenant; as seals they are standing pledges of the divine fidelity in bestowing them on certain conditions, being the Spirit's instrument in aiding and strengthening the faith that they require and in assuring to that faith the present bestowment of its object.

The Roman Catholic church holds to seven sacraments: baptism, confirmation, the eucharist, penance, extreme unction, orders, and matrimony. It teaches that a sacrament is "a visible sign of invisible grace instituted for our justification" (The Rom. Catechism, p. ii, chap. 1, no. 4). The Catholic Dictionary (art. "Sacraments") says: "Just as Christ appeared in flesh, just as virtue went forth from that body which he took, just as he saved us by that blood which he willingly shed in love for us, so he continues to make sensible things the channel of that grace by which our lives are elevated and sanctified. In baptism we are born again; in confirmation we grow up to perfect men in Christ," etc.

SACRIFICE. The general subject of sacrificial offerings in the Bible is discussed in this article and in two other articles: (1) Sacrifices, Mosaic; and (2) Sacrificial Offerings. There is also an article on the general subject Human Sacrifice.

Scripture Terms. The following terms are used to express the sacrificial act:

1. Something given; a gift (Gen. 32:13, 18, 20–21; 43:11; etc.); tribute (2 Sam. 8:2, 6; 2 Kings 17:4); an offering to God (1 Chron. 16:29; Isa. 1:13), spoken especially of a bloodless offering (Heb. minhâ; see Meat Offering, below).

2. Something brought near, an offering as a symbol of communion or covenant between man and God (Heb. qorbân).

3. A bloody sacrifice (Heb. zebah from zābah, "to stay"), in which the shedding of blood is the essential idea. Thus it is opposed to minhâ (Ps. 40:6) and to ōlâ, the whole burnt offering (Ex. 10:25; 18:12; etc.).

4. Whole burnt offering (Heb. ōlâ), that which is completely consumed by fire (Lev. 1:3).

5. Gk. thusia, is used both of the sacrifice offered and the act of burning, whether literal or figurative; prospora, “present”; in the NT a sacrifice (Acts 21:26; 24:17; Eph. 5:2; Heb. 10:5; etc); holokautōma, “wholly consumed” (Lat. holocaustum), a whole burnt offering, i.e., a sacrifice the whole of which is burned (Mark 12:33; Heb. 10:6, 8), same as no. 4.

Origin. The beginnings of sacrifice are found in the primitive ages of man and among all the nations of antiquity. Cain and Abel offered sacrifices to God (Gen. 4:3–4)—Cain “of the fruit of the ground” and Abel “of the firstlings of his flock and of their fat portions.” Noah expressed his gratitude for deliverance from the Flood by presenting burnt offerings unto the Lord (8:20). The patriarchs were in the habit of building altars and offering sacrifices on them, calling upon God at the places where He had revealed Himself to them (12:7; 13:4; 26:25; 31:54; 33:20; 35:7; 46:1). “Indeed, to sacrifice seems as natural to man as to pray; the one indicates what he feels about himself, the other what he feels about God. The one means a felt need of propitiation, the other a felt sense of dependence” (Edersheim, The Temple, p. 81).

Fundamental Idea. The fundamental idea of sacrifices may be gathered partly from their designation, partly from their nature. Sacrifices do not appear to have been instituted at first by divine command; though they must not, on that account, be looked upon as human inventions. They are spontaneous expressions of reverence and gratitude that man feels toward God. But we must not fail to note that with gratitude and reverence there was also the thought of securing a continuance of God’s favor and mercy. Neither must we lose sight of their expressing the idea of propitiation and substitution. Nor can we afford to forget that in all ages blood has been the symbol of life and its shedding the symbol of the offering of one’s life. Abundant testimony is given of this in The Blood Covenant, by H. C. Trumbull. He says that in the earliest recorded sacrifice “the narrative shows Abel lovingly and trustfully reaching out toward God with substitute blood, in order to be in covenant oneness with God; while Cain merely proffers a gift from his earthly possessions. Abel so trusts God that he gives himself to him. Cain defers to God sufficiently to make a present to him. The one shows unbounded faith; the other shows a measure of affectionate reverence” (p. 211).

Again in the sacrifice of Noah we have an expression not only of gratitude and reverence but of a desire for further communications of divine grace. This seems to be implied in the answer given by the Lord to Noah, “I will never again curse the ground on account of man” (Gen. 8:21). In the presentation of the best of his possessions the worshiper symbolized the giving of himself, his life, his aims, to God. “The most direct surrender of himself that a man can make to God is realized in prayer, an act in which the soul merges itself in Him from whom it came, in which the spirit unites itself with its God. Now that which corresponds to this inward surrender, as being an outward, visible, tangible verification of it, is sacrifice, which, on this account, has been called ‘embodied prayer.’” In the “burnt offerings” of Job for his children (Job 1:5) and for his three friends (42:8), the idea of expiation is distinctly set forth; for in the first instance the influencing thought with Job was, “Perhaps my sons have sinned”; and in the latter God said to Job’s friends, “My servant Job will pray for you. For I will accept him....”

In the Pentateuch the fundamental idea of sacrifice is that of substitution, which again seems to imply everything else. In the Levitical sacrifices the firstfruits go for the whole products; the firstlings of the flock, the redemption money for that which cannot be offered, and the life of the sacrifice, which is in its blood, for the life of the sacrificer.

Mosaic Sacrifices. We have seen that in the time of the patriarchs sacrifices were the spontaneous outward expression of grateful reverence and faithfulness toward God. Under the Mosaic law the offering of sacrifices was enjoined as a covenant duty; the material of the sacrifices and the rites to be observed in offering them were minutely described; and the sacrifices thus offered acquired the character of means of grace.

The ground on which the legal offering of sacrifices is based is the commandment “None shall appear before Me empty-handed” (Ex. 23:15; Deut. 16:16), i.e., “Every man shall give as he is able, according to the blessing of the Lord your God which He has given you” (v. 17). These gifts were not in the nature of tribute, which they were to present to Jehovah as the King of Canaan, but in recognition of their deliverance by Him from Egypt and of their adoption by Him as His peculiar people. Through these gifts they were to enjoy the benefits and blessings of the covenant, forgiveness of sins, sanctification, and true happiness. These gifts were to be accompanied by the consecration of the offerers; and the assurance of God’s acceptance of such gifts was to the pious Israelite a divine promise that he would obtain the blessings he sought.

“They thus possessed a sacramental virtue and efficacy; and in the OT worship no religious act was regarded as complete unless accompanied with sacrifice. The sacrificial system was framed with the view of awakening a consciousness of sin and uncleanness; of impressing upon the worshipper the possibility of obtaining the forgiveness of sin, and of becoming righteous before God” (Keil, Arch., 1:252).

At the very threshold of the Mosaic dispensation is the sacrifice of the paschal lamb, a substitute for Israel’s firstborn, and resulting in Israel’s redemption. This was commanded to be renewed yearly at the feast of Passover.

But there was one sacrifice that even under the OT required no renewal, offered when Jehovah entered into covenant relationship with Israel, and they became the people of God (see Sacrificial Offering: Heifer, The Red). An altar was built at the foot of Mt. Sinai, indicating the presence of Jehovah; it had twelve boundary stones, or pillars, representing the twelve tribes. These were most likely around the altar, and at some distance from it, preparing the soil upon which Jehovah was about to enter into communion with Israel (Ex. 24). The blood of the oxen was divided into two parts, one-half being sprinkled upon the altar, signifying that “the natural life of the people was given up to God, as a life that had passed through death, to be pervaded by his grace; and then through the sprinkling upon the people it was restored to them again, as a life renewed by the grace of God.” This covenant was made upon “all the words” that Jehovah had spoken and which the people had promised to observe. Consequently it had for its foundation the divine law and right, as the rule of life for Israel. On the ground of this covenant-sacrifice all others rested.

Symbolical Meaning. The presenting to God as a gift a portion of the results of one’s toil implied a surrender of the person of the offerer himself. That God did not require the death of the man, but the surrender of his heart, the Israelites could not fail to learn in the case of Abraham when called upon to offer up Isaac. The presenting of sacrifices under the impression that they embodied the fact of man’s surrender of himself to God is insisted upon by Mosaic law as a covenant obligation. But from his being unholy and sinful, man is unable to surrender himself to the holy God. This view was impressed upon the Israelites, and they were reminded of the fundamental principle of the covenant to be holy as Jehovah is holy, by the commandment that the animal offered be free from physical defects.

Leaning the hand upon the head of the animal was a symbol of transferring to the victim the disposition of the offerer in approaching the altar, and to devote it to the object that the sacrifice was intended to secure. It thus took the place of the offerer. Becoming his substitute, its further treatment and disposal were supposed to be fraught with benefit to him. The slaughtering of the animal, as a preliminary to its being offered upon the altar, pointed to the necessity of death in the case of the man inwardly alienated from God by sin, if he ever expected to attain loving fellowship with Him.

When the blood, in which the soul resides, flowed from the animal on its being slaughtered, the soul was understood to be at the same time separated from the body, and it was not till the blood was sprinkled that, in virtue of the divine promise (Lev. 17:11), the soul of the offerer of the sacrifice was brought within the range of the divine favor.

Then, when the flesh of his sacrifice came to be burned upon the altar, the man's own body was understood to be at the same time surrendered to the purifying fire of divine love, so that in this way he was symbolically covered in body and soul from God's wrath and brought within the sphere of the justifying, sanctifying, and saving grace of God.

Typical Meaning. There is a power ascribed (Lev. 17:11) to the blood of the sacrifice, when sprinkled upon the altar, of covering the unholy man from the divine wrath, because the soul was supposed to be in the blood. But that power the blood could not be said to possess, either on account of its being shed for the man or in virtue of its being shed on the altar. Sacrifices, merely as such, had no virtue to procure for the offerer forgiveness of sin, justification, sanctification, and felicity, all of which the Israelites not only looked for through their sacrifices, but which so far as the OT dispensation admitted of it, they actually received.

The object of the sacrifice is to establish a moral relation between the man as a personal being and God the absolute Spirit, to heal the separation between God and man that had been caused by sin. Now, as free personality is the soil out of which sin has sprung, so must the atonement be a work rooted in free personality as well. Being outside the sphere of moral freedom, the animal may be regarded as innocent and sinless; but for the same reason it cannot possess innocence in the true sense of the word and thus have a righteousness that could form an adequate satisfaction for the sin and guilt of man.

But even a perfect human being, if such could be found, would be unable by laying down his life to offer a sacrifice of such atoning efficacy as would reconcile another to God. The truth is that, in relation to God, everyone must answer for his own soul and not for another as well (cf. Ps. 49:7–8). Much less could such a result be effected by means of animal sacrifices and meat offerings; these could not possibly take away sin (Heb. 10:4, 11). If, then, God did invest the animal sacrifice with such significance as is here in question, He can only have done so in view of the true and perfect sacrifice, which in the fullness of time was to be offered through the eternal Spirit (9:14) by Christ, the Son of God and Son of Man.

Although there was no express mention of the typical character thus attaching to the sacrifices prescribed in the law, it was hinted at in the special regulations with regard to the mode of offering them; in time it came to be revealed through prophecy, although it was not till Christ voluntarily offered Himself as a sacrifice at Golgotha that it was completely unveiled. For detailed Typology see Sacrificial Offerings.

SACRIFICE, HUMAN. As a supreme test of Abraham's loyalty to Jehovah, he was asked to offer up his son Isaac. From this it has been argued that human sacrifice was customary among the early Israelites. But of this there is no proof. Such sacrifice was in harmony with the fierce ritual of Syria. "The belief in the efficacy of the sacrifice of the firstborn was deeply enrooted in the minds of the people of Canaan. In time of distress and necessity they offered to the gods their best and dearest, 'the fruit of their body for the sin of their soul' (Mic. 6:7). Phoenician mythology related how when war and pestilence afflicted the land, Kronos offered up his son Yeoud as a sacrifice, and human sacrifices were prevalent late into historical times. The OT tells us that Ahaz ‘made his son to pass through the fire,’ a euphemistic expression for those offerings of the firstborn that made the valley of Tophet an abomination (Jer. 7:31).”

The king of Moab, when he saw that “the battle was too fierce for him,” “took his oldest son who was to reign in his place, and offered him as a burnt offering upon the wall” (2 Kings 3:26–27).

But there is nothing in Scripture to show that the Israelites practiced human sacrifice, or that it was enjoined by Jehovah. The case is thus put by Robertson (The Early Religion of Israel, p. 254): “To Abraham, not unfamiliar with various ways in which among his heathen ancestors the deity was propitiated, the testing question comes, ‘Art thou prepared to obey thy God as fully as the people about thee obey their gods?’ and in the putting forth of his faith in the act of obedience, he learns that the nature of his God is different. Instead, therefore, of saying that the narrative gives proof of the existence of human sacrifice as an early custom in Israel, it is more reasonable to regard it as giving an explanation why it was that, from early time, this had been a prime distinction of Israel that human sacrifice was not practiced as among the heathen.”

SACRIFICES, MOSAIC. The sacrifices prescribed by the Mosaic law are included under two classes: those offered for the sake of communion with Jehovah; and those offered in communion, and may be tabulated as follows: (1) For communion, or propitiatory, including sin offerings and trespass offerings. (2) In communion (a) burnt offerings; (b) peace offerings, including thank offerings, votive offerings, and freewill offerings; (c) grain and drink offerings.

The propitiatory offerings were intended to lead to the worshiper’s being pardoned and brought into communion with God. The others were offered after being admitted to this state of grace. Each of these sacrifices is considered in detail below. It should be carefully borne in mind that, when several sacrifices were offered on the same occasion, those of a propitiatory nature took precedence of the burnt offerings, the latter being followed by the peace offering. The grain and drink offerings were presented alike with the burnt and thank offerings, or simply by themselves.

Material. In this respect the sacrifices were divided into two classes: the bloody, those that were slaughtered; and the bloodless, i.e., the grain and drink offerings.

The material for altar sacrifices included both animal and vegetable offerings.

Animal. These included oxen, sheep, goats, and fowls (i.e., turtledoves and young pigeons). The pigeons were intended for those who could not afford more costly offerings (Lev. 5:7; 12:8) and to serve as sin offerings of an inferior order. Male and female cattle (both large and small) might be offered (3:1, 6), although among sheep special prominence was given to the ram (Num. 15:5–6; 28:11; etc.) and to the male of goats (7:16, 22; etc.).

The animal intended for sacrifice was required to be (1) of a certain age, eight days at least (Ex. 22:30; Lev. 22:17), although sheep and goats were usually offered when a year old (Ex. 29:38; Lev. 9:3; etc.), oxen when they reached their third year; (2) absolutely free from blemish (Lev. 22:20–24).

Vegetable. These were grain, olive oil, and wine; the incense, partly vegetable and partly mineral; and salt.

The grain was offered (1) roasted in the ear (Lev. 2:14); (2) as fine flour (2:1), to both of which incense and oil were added (2:1, 15–16); or (3) as unleavened bread, or biscuits. This last was of three kinds—bread baked in the oven, bread baked on a griddle, bread baked in a pan. In each case the flour was mixed with oil (2:1–7).

Every grain offering had to be salted (2:13), as well as the animal sacrifices (Ezek. 43:24; cf. Mark 9:49). Leaven and honey were not allowed in any offering to Jehovah made by fire (Lev. 2:11).

Principle Underlying Selection. The animals, etc., selected for sacrifice were from the ordinary articles of diet among the Hebrews, thus expressing gratitude to God for blessings bestowed and prayer for continuance of His goodness. Further, as those offerings were the fruit of their life and labors, presenting them symbolized consecration to God of their lives with all their energies and endowments.

Presentation of Offerings. The manner of presentation was regulated by the sacrificial ritual and in the case of animal sacrifices was generally as follows:

The animal was brought to the door of the Tabernacle, near which the altar was placed; the person bringing the sacrifice leaned with his hand upon the animal's head, and then slaughtered it at the N side of the altar (Lev. 1:4–5, 11; 3:2, 8; 6:25; 7:2). In the case of sacrifices connected with the regular services of the sanctuary, those offered on festival occasions and in behalf of the whole people, the animals were slaughtered, skinned, and cut up by the priests.

When the animal was slain, the priest caught the flowing blood in a vessel and, according to the nature of the sacrifice, sprinkled some of it either on the side of the altar, its horns, or on the horns of the altar of incense, or upon (i.e., in the direction of) the Ark, emptying what remained at the base of the great altar (Ex. 29:12; Lev. 4:17–18; etc.).

The animal was then skinned by the offerer, cut into pieces (Lev. 1:6; 8:20), and either burned entirely upon the altar or the fat burned on the altar, whereas the remainder of the flesh was burned outside the camp. It was then eaten by the priests or partly by the priests and partly by the one bringing the sacrifice.

If the sacrifice consisted of a pigeon the priest wrung off the pigeon's head and allowed the blood to flow upon the side of the altar. He then took away the viscera and flung it upon the ash heap beside the altar. The head and body were then burned upon the altar (1:15).

In regard to vegetable offerings, if connected with burnt offerings, part of the flour and oil, some of the ears of grain and the cakes, with the incense, were burned upon the altar. The remainder fell to the priests, who had to consume it without leaven in the court of the Tabernacle (2:2–3, 10–11; 6:9–11; 7:9–10; 10:12–13). If, in connection with a thank offering, one cake was presented as a wave offering to Jehovah, that cake fell to the priest who sprinkled the blood (7:14), and the remainder of the offering was to be eaten by those who presented it.

SACRIFICIAL OFFERINGS. The sacrificial offerings were of various types and they were presented according to a regular schedule.

Types of Offering. Seven types of sacrificial offerings were made: sin, guilt (trespass, KJV), burnt, peace, grain (meat, KJV), heave and wave, and the red heifer.

Sin Offering (Heb. ḥattā't, an “offense”). A penalty, or an offering for sin, first directly enjoined in Lev. 4. The Heb. word is not applied to any sacrifice in pre-Mosaic times, and it is therefore peculiarly a sacrifice of the law.

Meaning. In Lev. 4:2 we read that “if a person sins unintentionally in any of these things which the Lord has commanded not to be done, and commits any of them,” that conduct would furnish reason for a sin offering. The meaning is that of sinning “in error.” This does not mean merely sinning through ignorance, hurry, want of consideration, or carelessness (cf. 5:1, 4, 15) but also sinning unintentionally (Num. 35:11, 15, 22–23); hence such sins as spring from weakness of flesh and blood, as distinguished from those committed “defiantly,” i.e., in haughty, defiant rebellion against God and His commandments. The one sinning presumptuously was to be cut off from among his people (15:30).

The object and effect of the sin offering were declared to be the forgiveness of sin (Lev. 4:20, 26, 31, 35; 5:10) and cleansing (ceremonial purgation) from the pollution of sin (12:8; 14:20; 16:19; etc.). It was thus the offering among the Hebrews in which the ideas of propitiation and of atonement for sin were most distinctly marked. Its presentation presupposed the consciousness of sin on the part of the person presenting it (cf. 4:14, 23, 28; 5:5). The laying on of the hands of the offerer was understood to typify the fact that the sin for which pardon and cleansing were being sought was transferred to the sacrifice, which thereby became sin (4:4, 15). The soul of the offerer, being represented by the blood, was, through the sprinkling of the latter, brought into the fellowship with or within the sphere of operation of the divine grace. When the blood of the sin offering was sprinkled upon the horns of the altar, which were symbolic of power and might, the soul was thereby symbolically brought within the efficacy of that divine grace in which it was required to participate in order that its sin might be duly atoned for.

The burning of the fat of the sacrifice upon the altar as an offering made by fire for a soothing aroma unto Jehovah (Lev. 4:31) was symbolic of the handing over of the better part of the man, the part that is susceptible of renewal, to the purifying fire of the divine holiness and love, in order that the inward man might be renewed from day to day by the Spirit of the Lord and at length be changed into the glory of the children of God.

Material. The material for the sin offering was regulated partly by the position of the one in whose behalf it was offered and partly by the nature of the offense for which an atonement was to be made.

1. A young bull. Consecration of priests and Levites to their office (Ex. 29:10–14, 35; Num. 8:8–9). For the high priest on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:3). Sin of the high priest (4:3), or sin of the whole congregation (4:13).

2. A male goat. New moon and annual festivals (Num. 28:15, 22, 30; 29:5, 11, 16, 19; etc.). Dedication of the Tabernacle and Temple (Num. 7:16, 22; Ezra 6:17; cf. 8:35). Sin of a leader (Lev. 4:23).

3. A female goat. Sin by one of the common people (Lev. 4:28, 32; 5:6).

4. A ewe, of a year old. A Nazirite released from his vow (Num. 6:14). Cleansing of a leper (Lev. 14:10).

5. A turtledove or young pigeon. Purifying of a woman after childbirth (Lev. 12:6); a man with a discharge (15:14); a woman who had a protracted discharge of blood (15:29); a Nazirite defiled by contact with a dead body (Num. 6:9–10). A turtledove or young pigeon, as a substitute for the lamb in case of poverty, on occasion of an ordinary offense (Lev. 5:7); for purification of the leper (14:22).

6. Tenth of an ephah of flour. Flour was prescribed as a substitute for the pigeon when poverty prevented the latter, and on the occasion of any ordinary offense (Lev. 5:11).

Occasions. The sin offerings were:

1. Regular, offered upon the following occasions: (a) For all the people, at the new moon, Passover, Pentecost, feast of Trumpets, feast of Booths (Num. 28:15–29:38; “Tabernacles,” KJV), and the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16). (b) Consecration of priests and Levites (Ex. 29:10–14, 36). (c) The sacrifice of the red heifer, from the ashes of which was made the water of purification (Num. 19:1–10).

2. Special, offered on the following occasions: (a) For any sin of ignorance against the commandment of the Lord on the part of priest, people, or individual (Lev. 4). (b) For ceremonial defilement (5:2–3), such as of women (12:6–8), leprosy (14:10–11, 31), discharges in men and women (15:15, 30), defilement of a Nazirite, or at expiration of his vow (Num. 6:6–11, 16).

Ritual, or Mode of Presentation. After the animal had been brought forward, and the hand duly laid upon it, it was slaughtered. If the animal was a young bull offered in behalf of the high priest or of the whole congregation, its blood was taken into the Holy Place and there sprinkled seven times toward the inner veil, then upon the horns of the altar of incense; after that the remainder was poured out at the base of the altar of burnt offering (Lev. 4:5–7, 16–18).

If the animal was a ram, a female goat, or a lamb, the blood was merely put upon the horns of the altar of burnt offering, and the remainder was poured out at the base of the altar (4:24–25, 28–30, 32–34). Upon the Day of Atonement the high priest took the blood of the sin offering (the bull) for himself, and the blood of the goat offered in behalf of the people, into the most Holy Place and sprinkled it upon and before the Mercy Seat (16:14–15).

The next step was, in all cases except pigeons, to separate the fatty portions from the animal, that is, the fat covering the intestines and such as was upon them, the kidneys and their fat, the fat on the loins, the lobe of the liver, and, in the case of a certain kind of sheep, the fat of the tail, and then burn them upon the altar (4:8–10, 19, 26, 31, 35).

In those cases in which the blood was sprinkled in the Holy Place, or the Holy of Holies (and in the case of the bull sacrifice as a sin offering at the consecration of the priests, Ex. 29:14), the flesh, along with the skin, head, bones, intestines, and refuse was carried outside the camp (afterward the city) to a clean place where the ashes of sacrifice were usually emptied, and there consumed by fire (Lev. 4:11–12, 21; 16:27). In the case of the other sin offerings, the blood of which was not applied as above, the flesh was eaten by the priests in the Holy Place (6:26; Num. 18:9–10). The skin probably went, as in the trespass offering, to the officiating priest.

The additional regulations respecting the sin offering were: “whoever touches them shall become consecrated” (Lev. 6:18, 27), i.e., every layman touching the flesh became as holy as the priest and was obliged to guard against defilement in the same manner (cf. 21:1–8); the vessel, in which it was boiled for the priests to eat, was broken if earthenware and scoured if bronze; garments upon which its blood had been sprinkled were to be washed (6:27–28).

Typology. The sin offering as a non-sweet savor presents Christ atoning for the guilt of sin (Heb. 13:11–12). It portrays our Lord as actually burdened with the believer’s sin, standing in the sinner’s place. It is in contrast to the sweet-savor offering that presents Christ’s own perfections. The sin offering tells forth our Lord’s death as presented in Isa. 53, Ps. 22, and 1 Pet. 2:24. This offering, however, carefully guards the infinite holiness of Him “who knew no sin to be sin on our behalf” (2 Cor. 5:21; cf. the law of this offering, Lev. 6:24–30). The sin offerings were efficacious and substitutionary and in their expiatory aspect vindicate the law through substitutionary sacrifice.

Guilt Offering (Heb. āshām, “fault”).

Meaning. Although the guilt offering was propitiatory in character, it differed from the sin offering in that the latter made atonement for the person of the offender, whereas the former only atoned for one special offense. “In fact, the trespass offering may be regarded as representing ransom for a special wrong, while the sin offering symbolized general redemption” (Edersheim, Temple, p. 100).

Material. The guilt offering consisted of a ram, which was valued by a priest according to the shekel of the sanctuary (Lev. 5:15, 18; 6:6; 19:21). The only exception was in the case of a leper and a Nazirite, when the offering consisted of a lamb, without any mention of valuation (14:12; Num. 6:12).

Occasions. The guilt offerings, being prescribed for special sins, are not included in the general festal sacrifices. They were offered for the following offenses:

1. “If a person acts unfaithfully and sins unintentionally against the Lord’s holy things” (Lev. 5:15), i.e., to inadvertently take away from Jehovah that which belonged to Him, of sacrifice, firstfruits, tithes, etc. The ram for sacrifice was to be accompanied by compensation for the harm done and the gift of a fifth part of the value to the priest.

2. Ignorant transgression of any definite prohibition of the law (v. 17).
3. Fraud, suppression of the truth, or perjury against a neighbor; with compensation and with the addition of a fifth part of the property in question to the person wronged (6:1–6).
4. Rape of a betrothed slave (19:20–22).
5. At the purification of a leper (14:12) and the polluted Nazirite (Num. 6:12).

Ritual. The sacrifice was slaughtered on the N side of the altar, its blood sprinkled upon the latter, the fat burned upon it, and the flesh eaten by the priests in the Holy Place (as in the sin offering). The skin also belonged to the officiating priest. With reference to the accompanying grain offering, everything baked in the oven and everything prepared in a pan or pot was to belong to the priest officiating; whereas such portions as were mixed with oil or were dry were to belong to “all the sons of Aaron,” i.e., divided among all the priests.

Typology. This ritual prefigures Christ’s atoning for the damage of sin. It is a non-sweet-savor offering. It has in view not so much the guilt of sin, which is the aspect in the sin offering, but rather the injury. Psalm 51:4 expresses this aspect of the offering: “Against Thee, Thee only, I have sinned, and done what is evil in Thy sight, so that Thou art justified when Thou dost speak, and blameless when Thou dost judge.” In other words, that which is due God as an infinitely Holy Being in every sinner is typically signified.

Burnt Offering. The name given this offering (Heb. ‘ōlâ, “ascending” as smoke), was given because it was to be wholly consumed and to rise in smoke toward heaven. There is also in use the poetical term kālîl “complete” (Deut. 33:10; 1 Sam. 7:9; Ps. 51:19; Gk.

holokautōma; Mark 12:33; Heb. 10:6), alluding to the fact that, with the exception of the skin, it was wholly and entirely consumed. The victims in the other sacrifices were only partially consumed upon the altar.

Meaning. The burnt offering symbolized the entire surrender to God of the individual or of the congregation. God’s acceptance thereof had a view to the renewal and sanctification of the entire man and consecration to a course of life pleasing to God. The law of sacrifice does not teach that the burnt offering had any reference to atonement or forgiveness of sins, provision being made for that by the atoning sacrifices (sin and trespass offerings). The burnt offering was based solely on the assumption that Israel had been admitted into a covenant of grace with Jehovah, and it could only be offered by those Israelites who retained their standing in the covenant. Strangers were permitted, if not guilty of any notorious offense, to offer burnt and thank offerings to Jehovah without being fully (i.e., by circumcision) admitted into covenant with the God of Israel.

Anyone forfeiting his covenant rights by sin or transgression was required to be again reconciled to God by means of a sin offering before he could venture to present a burnt offering. If there was any atoning element in the burnt offering it was only to a limited extent. And yet, inasmuch as sin adheres to all, even in a state of grace, it was necessary that in the burnt offering there should be so much of the element in question as would cover any defects and imperfections.

Expressing as it did the inward religious disposition expected of every true Israelite, the burnt offering was required to be presented in the morning and evening of every day, the Sabbath, the new moons, and festival occasions. At the new moons and festivals the burnt offerings had to be preceded by a sin offering, it being necessary in this way to make atonement for those sins that had been committed in the interval between one festival and another.

Material. The animals prescribed for this sacrifice by the law were a young bull, a ram or male lamb, and a male goat—always a male. In case of poverty, turtledoves or young pigeons might be offered, irrespective of sex (Lev. 1:3, 10, 14). The command for a male was probably to teach that the act of surrender was to be of an active, energetic character.

Occasions. There were regular, special, and freewill burnt offerings.

1. Regular burnt offerings were offered as follows: (a) Every morning and evening (Ex. 29:38–42; Num. 28:3–8). (b) Each Sabbath, double that of the daily offering (Num. 28:9–10). (c) At the new moon, the three great festivals, the Day of Atonement, and feast of Trumpets (see Num. 28:11–29:39).

2. Special burnt offerings were offered as follows: (a) At the consecration of priests (Ex. 29:15; Lev. 8:18; 9:12). (b) At the purification of women (Lev. 12:6–8). (c) At the cleansing of lepers (14:19). (d) Removal of other ceremonial uncleanness (15:15, 30). (e) On any accidental breach of the Nazirite vow, or its conclusion (Num. 6:11, 14).

3. Freewill burnt offerings on any solemn occasion, e.g., dedication of the Tabernacle (Num. 7) and of the Temple (1 Kings 8:64).

The burnt offering was the only sacrifice that non-Israelites were allowed to bring. The emperor Augustus had a daily burnt offering brought for him of two lambs and a bull; and ever afterward this sacrifice was regarded as indicating that the Jews recognized him as their ruler. Hence, at the commencement of the Jewish war, Eleazar carried its rejection, which was considered as a mark of rebellion.

Ritual. The victim was led to the altar by the person offering it, duly consecrated by the laying on of hands, and then slain by the offerer. The priest then took the blood and sprinkled it about upon the altar. The animal was flayed, the skin falling to the officiating priest as a perquisite (Lev. 7:8); the flesh was next cut up, the intestines and hind legs washed, and then the several parts, including the head and fat, were laid upon the burning wood, the whole being consumed.

In case the offering was a pigeon the priest wrung off its head and allowed the blood to flow beside the altar; he then took the crop and feathers and flung them on the ash heap beside the altar. He made an incision at the wings and placed the bird upon the altar fire and there burned it (1:14–17). When the burnt offering consisted of a bull or smaller cattle, the law required it to be followed by a grain and drink offering varying in quantity according to the kind of animal offered—a regulation, however, that did not apply in the case of pigeons.

Typology. This ritual sets forth Christ offering Himself without spot to God in performing the divine will with joy, even to the point of death. In the offering the note of penalty is not conspicuous (Heb. 9:11–14; 10:5–7). The offering is a soothing aroma. These offerings are so-called because they deal with Christ in His own perfections and in His perfect devotion to the Father's will. They are in contrast to the nonsoothing offerings that typify Christ as carrying the sinner's demerit. The whole burnt offering is both atoning and substitutionary: Christ dies in the believer's stead. The sacrificial animals, the bull, the sheep, the goat, and turtledove or pigeon all symbolize Christ in some aspect of His redeeming character. The young ox portrays His patient endurance as a Savior (1 Cor. 9:9–10; Isa. 52:13–15; Phil. 2:5–8). The sheep or ram portrays Christ in unresisting abandonment to death (Isa. 53:7). The goat typifies a sinner and, when used of Christ, as He who was "numbered with transgressors." The turtledove or pigeon symbolizes mourning innocence (Isa. 38:14; Heb. 7:26). It also portrays poverty (Lev. 5:7). It shows forth Him who became poor that we might become rich (2 Cor. 8:9; Phil. 2:6–8).

Peace Offering (Heb. zebah shlamûm, "sacrifice of peace"), another sacrifice offered in communion with God. It was divided into three kinds: the thank offering (zebah hattôdâ, "sacrifice of thanksgiving," Lev. 7:12; 22:29); the votive offering (zebah neder, "sacrifice of a vow," Num. 6:2; 15:3, 8); the freewill offering (zebah nedabâ, Lev. 7:16; 22:18, 21). It always followed all the other sacrifices.

Meaning. The peace offerings have their root in the state of grace with its fellowship with God and find their culminating point in the sacrificial feast. They served to establish the Hebrew more firmly in the fellowship of the divine grace; to be mindful of God when in possession and enjoyment of His mercies; and when adversity threatened to obscure his feeling and consciousness of God's nearness and mercy, he might be enabled through the peace offering to maintain this feeling and consciousness and quicken them afresh.

In times of prosperity and success he would naturally feel thankful to God and embody his act by means of sacrifice; hence thank offering. In case anyone desired to secure a certain blessing, he would endeavor by means of a vow to prevail upon God to bestow it; hence the votive offering. The motive impelling the freewill offering seems to have centered in the desire to thank God for the enjoyment of His bounties and to be assured of their continuance (see Ritual below).

Material. The animals prescribed for these sacrifices were unblemished oxen or smaller cattle of either sex (Lev. 3:1, 6; 9:4, 18; etc.), although deformed animals were allowable in freewill offerings (22:23). These sacrifices were always accompanied by a grain and drink offering (7:11–13; etc.). No mention is found of pigeons being used in the peace offerings.

Occasions. Peace offerings were made on public occasions and on occasions of only private significance.

1. Public peace offerings were customary on occasions of festive inauguration (Ex. 24:5; 2 Sam. 6:17–18; 1 Kings 8:63), the election of kings (1 Sam. 11:15), and upon the fortunate result of important enterprises (Deut. 27:7; Josh. 8:31). They were expressly prescribed for the feast of Pentecost (Lev. 23:19). The festivals were observed with peace offerings (Num. 10:10; 2 Chron. 30:22), and Solomon arranged three times a year a sacrificial festival of burnt and peace offerings (1 Kings 9:25).

2. Private peace offerings were the result of free impulse, or in fulfillment of a vow (Lev. 7:16; 22:21; Num. 15:8), in recognition of a special favor from Jehovah (Lev. 7:12; 22:29), and regularly at the expiration of a Nazirite vow (Num. 6:14).

Ritual. The offerer led the animal to the altar, laid his hand upon its head, and killed it. The priest caught the blood and sprinkled it upon the altar. At this stage the fat of the intestines—the same parts as in the case of the sin offering—was taken from the animal and burned upon the altar on the burnt offering (Lev. 3:3–5, 9–11, 14–16; 9:18–20). The breast and the right shoulder were then separated from each other, the shoulder being heaved—laid aside—as the portion of the officiating priest, directly from the offerer, whereas the breast was waved, i.e., symbolically presented to the Lord, from whom the priests received it for their use. The priest's part might be eaten by him, either boiled or roasted, in some clean place (7:30–34; 10:13–14). All the flesh of public peace offering (not burned upon the altar) belonged to the priests (23:20).

The rest of the flesh belonged to the offerer, furnishing material for the sacrificial feast. In the case of the thank offering it must be eaten the same day, in other cases no later than the second day. Whatever was not eaten within the prescribed time had to be burned, but not on the altar (7:15–17; 22:30).

One cake of each of the three kinds making up the grain offering was the portion of the officiating priest (7:13–14).

The meaning of the sacrificial proceedings in the case of the peace offering is worthy of study. As stated above, the fat of the peace offering was to be consumed on the top of the burnt offering, “which is on the wood that is on the fire,” as an “offering by fire of a soothing aroma to the Lord” (3:5). Thus the peace offering presupposed the previous reconciliation of the offerer with God and the sanctification of his life as the basis of admission into fellowship with God, which was realized in the sacrificial feast. As he partook of this meal, the material food was transformed into a symbol of his being spiritually fed with the mercies of God, of his being satisfied with fullness of joy in the presence of the Lord (Ps. 16:11).

Keil observes: “In consecrated character imparted to the whole victim by assigning the choicest portions of the flesh to the Lord and the officiating priest, the sacrificial feast was transformed into a covenant feast, a feast of love and joy, which symbolized the privilege of dwelling in the house and family of the Lord, and so shadowed forth the rejoicing of his people before him (Deut. 12:12, 18) and the blessedness of eating and drinking in the kingdom of God” (Luke 14:15; 22:30) (Arch., 1:330).

Typology. As a sweet-savor offering this ritual portrays Christ as our peace (Eph. 2:14–18). Christ made peace (Col. 1:20); preached peace (Eph. 2:17). The offering sets forth God as propitiated and the sinner reconciled; God and the sinner brought together in peace, both satisfied with the finished work of Christ. Closely associated with peace is fellowship. With this idea in mind the peace offering afforded food for the priests (Lev. 7:31–34).

Grain and Drink Offerings. “Grain” is the rendering of the Heb. minhâ, “offering,” whereas “drink offering” is the rendering of Heb. nesek, “libation.”

Meaning. One meaning of these offerings, which is analogous to that of the offering of the tithes (firstfruits and the bread of the Presence), appears to be expressed in the words of David: “Everything that is in the heavens and the earth ... all things come from Thee, and from Thy hand we have given Thee” (1 Chron. 29:10–14). It recognized the sovereignty of Jehovah and His bounty in the bestowal of earthly blessings by dedicating to Him the best of His gifts—flour, as the main support of life; oil, the symbol of richness; wine, as the symbol of vigor and refreshment (see Ps. 104:15).

Another meaning is ascribed to these offerings, that of a symbol of the spiritual food that Israel strove after as the fruit of its spiritual labor, or those good works in which true sanctification must necessarily embody itself.

Material. The material of the grain offering consisted either of grain—offered partly unground, in the shape of roasted ears, and partly fine flour; in both instances oil was poured on and incense added—or of cakes, prepared in three different ways with oil but without any leaven (see Sacrifices: Classification of). Both kinds of grain offerings were required to be seasoned with salt (Lev. 2:13).

The drink offering consisted in every instance of wine.

Occasion. Grain offerings were either public or private, and were brought either in conjunction with burnt or peace offerings (never with sin or trespass offerings) or by themselves.

The three public grain offerings were the twelve loaves of the bread of the Presence; the omer, or sheaf, of wheat, on the second day of Passover (which see); and the two wave loaves at Pentecost.

Four private grain offerings were prescribed by law: (1) the daily grain offering of the high priest, according to the Jewish interpretation of Lev. 6:14–18; (2) that at the consecration of priests (6:20); (3) that in substitution for a sin offering, in case of poverty (5:11–12); and (4) that of jealousy (Num. 5:15).

The following were voluntary: that of fine flour with oil, unbaked (Lev. 2:1); that “baked in an oven,” “on the griddle,” and the “wafers,” which were “made in a pan” (2:4–7).

Ritual. In all baked grain offerings an “omer” was always made into ten cakes—except the high priest’s daily grain offering, of which twelve cakes were baked as representative of Israel. In presenting a grain offering the priest first brought it in the golden or silver dish in which it had been prepared, and then transferred it to a holy vessel, putting oil and frankincense upon it. Standing at the SE corner of the altar, he took the “handful” that was to be burned, put it in another vessel, laid some of the frankincense on it, carried it to the top of the altar, salted it, and then placed it on the fire.

The rest of the offering belonged to the priests (Lev. 6:16–18), except in the grain offering of the high priest and at the consecration of the priests (6:20–23), when it was entirely burned and none allowed to be eaten.

Every grain offering was accompanied by a drink offering of wine; but the law contained no regulation as to the mode in which it was to be presented or how the wine was to be disposed of.

Typology. This offering exhibits Christ in His human perfections tested by suffering. The fine flour represents the sinless humanity of our Lord. The fire is testing by suffering even unto death. Frankincense symbolizes the aroma of His life toward the Father (cf. Ex. 30:34). The absence of leaven, a type of evil, shows forth His character as “the Truth.” The oil mingled with the offering speaks of His conception by the Spirit (Matt. 1:18–23). Oil poured upon the offering speaks of His enduement with the Spirit (John 1:32; 6:27).

Heave and Wave Offerings. These offerings took their names from the special ceremonies connected with their presentation.

Heave Offering (Heb. tārûmâ, “lifted up, raised”). Everything that the Israelites voluntarily (Ex. 25:2–7; 35:24; 36:3, see marg.), or in compliance with a legal prescription (Ex. 30:15; Lev. 7:14; Num. 15:19–21; 18:27–30; 31:29–30, see marg.), separated from what belonged to them and presented (Ex. 29:28; Num. 18:8, marg.; 5:9, marg.) to Jehovah, not as a sacrifice but as an offering (Isa. 40:20) by way of contribution for religious purposes, such as the erection and maintenance of the sanctuary (Ex. 25:2, 8; 30:13; 35:5, 21, 24; 36:3, 6; Ezra 8:25; etc.) or for the maintenance of the priests.

Those portions of the offerings that were waved were also regarded as gifts to Jehovah, which He was understood to hand over to the priests; every heave offering could likewise be regarded as a wave offering. The heave offerings could only be used by the priests and their children (Num. 18:19; Lev. 22:10).

Wave Offering (Heb. tānûpâ, “undulation”). When this offering was presented the offering was placed upon the hands of the offerer and, after putting his hands under those of the offerer, the priest moved the offering backward and forward horizontally. The rabbinical suggestion that there was a distinct rite of “heaving,” besides that of “waving,” seems to rest on a misunderstanding of such passages as Lev. 2:2, 9; 7:32; 10:15; etc. Some believe that “heaving” applies to an upward movement as well as the horizontal, but there is little ground for that opinion.

The following were the offerings to be waved before the Lord—the breast of a private thank offering (Lev. 7:30); the fat, breast, and shoulder of the thank offerings at the consecration of the priests, the so-called consecration of offerings (Ex. 29:22–26; Lev. 8:25–29); the firstling sheaf offered on the second day of the Passover (Lev. 23:11); the two lambs as a thank offering at the feast of Pentecost (23:20); the lamb and the log of oil as a trespass offering for the purification of the leper (14:12); the thank offering of the Nazirite (Num. 6:20); the jealousy offering (5:25).

Heifer, The Red. The medium appointed for the purification of such as might be rendered unclean by contact with the dead was composed of running water and the ashes of the “red heifer” (Num. 19:1–5). The ashes were prepared as follows: A heifer, without blemish and that had never been yoked, was slaughtered outside the camp. Eleazar (the son and successor of the high priest) dipped his finger in the blood and sprinkled it seven times toward the sanctuary. Then the heifer, along with the skin, flesh, blood, and refuse, was burned in the presence of the priest, who at the same time took cedar wood, hyssop, and scarlet material and cast them into the flames. A man free from defilement gathered the ashes and carried them to a clean place outside the camp, where they were stored. All persons connected with the ceremony were rendered unclean till evening.

The purifying medium was applied as follows: A man who was himself free from defilement took some of the ashes, put them in a vessel, and poured fresh running water over them. Dipping a bunch of hyssop into the mixture, he sprinkled it upon the person to be purified on the third and seventh days. In like manner the tent in which the corpse had lain and its furniture were all sprinkled with the same water.

The red heifer is called a sin offering (Num. 19:9, 17); and as death is the result of sin, it followed that the removal of the defilement of death would naturally call for a sin offering. The color, condition, and sex of the victim represented a full, fresh, and vigorous life; and possessing this, the animal, as a sin offering, was perfectly adapted to the purpose of bearing the guilt of the sins of the congregation that were imputed to it, as well as of vicariously suffering death as the wages of sin. The heifer was burned outside the camp by way of exhibiting the necessary fruit and consequence of sin.

Typology. The red heifer portrays the sacrifice of Christ as the medium of the believer's cleansing from the pollution contracted in his walk as a pilgrim through the world. The order of cleansing is: (1) The slaying of the sacrifice. (2) The sevenfold sprinkling of the blood, showing forth the completed putting away of the believer's sins before God (Heb. 9:12–14). (3) The burning of the sacrifice to ashes and their preservation as a memorial of the sacrifice. (4) The cleansing by sprinkling with the ashes mingled with water. The water is typical of the Holy Spirit and the Word (John 7:37–39; Eph. 5:26). The whole ritual portrays the fact that the Holy Spirit employs the Word of God to convict the believer of sin allowed in the life. Thus convicted, the believer is made conscious of the fact that the guilt of sin has been borne in the sacrifice of Christ. Instead of losing hope the convicted believer confesses the unworthy act and is forgiven and cleansed (John 13:3–10; 1 John 1:7–10).

Schedule of Offerings. The offerings prescribed by the Mosaic ritual were presented on a regular schedule—some daily, some on the Sabbath, and some during the various festivals.

Daily (Num. 28:3–8). The daily sacrifice was offered morning and evening, each consisting of a yearling lamb, for a burnt offering; a tenth ephah of flour, for a grain offering; and one-fourth hin of wine, for a drink offering.

Sabbath (Num. 28:9–10; Lev. 24:8). The daily offerings (see above); and two yearling lambs, for a burnt offering; two one-tenth ephahs of flour, mingled with oil, for a grain offering; one-half hin of wine, for a drink offering; twelve loaves of the bread of the Presence.

New Moon (Num. 28:11–15). The daily offerings; and two young bulls, one ram, seven lambs, for a burnt offering; flour mingled with oil, three one-tenth ephahs for each bull, two one-tenth ephahs for the ram, and one-tenth an ephah for each lamb; drink offering.

Feast of Trumpets, or Seventh New Moon (Num. 29:1–6). The daily and new moon offerings; and one bull, one ram, seven yearling lambs, for a burnt offering; flour mingled with oil; three one-tenth ephahs for the bull, two one-tenth ephahs for the ram, one-tenth an ephah for each lamb, for a grain offering; one kid of the goats, for a sin offering; drink offerings.

Passover (Ex. 12:1–7). The daily offerings; and a kid (lamb or goat, Ex. 12:5) was selected on the 10th of Abib, slain on the 14th, and its blood sprinkled on the doorposts and lintels.

Unleavened Bread (Num. 28:17–24). The daily offerings; and one goat, for a sin offering; two young bulls, one ram, and seven yearling lambs, burnt offering; flour mingled with oil, three one-tenth ephahs for each bull, two one-tenth ephahs for the ram, one-tenth an ephah for each lamb, grain offering. The above offerings were for each day of the feast (15th to 21st Abib). On the second day of the feast (16th Abib) the first sheaf of the new harvest (barley) was offered by waving, not burning. With this sheaf was offered a male yearling lamb, for a burnt offering; two one-tenth ephahs of flour and oil, for a grain offering; one-fourth hin of wine, for a drink offering.

Pentecost (Feast of Weeks) (Num. 28:26–31; Lev. 23:16–20). The daily offerings; and a kid of the goats for a sin offering; two young bulls, one ram, seven yearling lambs, for a burnt offering; three one-tenth ephahs of flour and oil for each bull, two one-tenth ephahs for the ram, one-tenth an ephah for each lamb, grain offering; one-half hin of wine for the bull, one-third hin of wine for the ram, one-fourth hin of wine for each lamb, drink offering. After the above was presented, the new grain offering of two wave loaves, made of two one-tenth ephahs of wheat flour, baked with leaven, was offered. With these were offered seven yearling lambs, one young bull, and two rams, for a burnt offering, with the prescribed grain and drink offerings; a male goat, for a sin offering; two yearling lambs for a peace offering.

Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:3; Num. 29:7–11). The daily offerings; and a bull for a sin offering and a ram for a burnt offering, for the priesthood; two goats for a sin offering and a ram for a burnt offering, for the people; followed by one young bull, one ram, seven lambs, for a burnt offering; flour mingled with oil, three one-tenth ephahs for a bull, two one-tenth ephahs for a ram, and one-tenth an ephah for each lamb, grain offering; one-half hin of wine for a bull, one-third hin of wine for a ram, and one-quarter hin of wine for each lamb, drink offering.

Feast of Booths (Tabernacles) (Num. 29:13–38). The daily offerings; and bulls, rams, lambs, and goats according to a prescribed schedule (see table 29).

1. The sin offering

The bulls, rams, and lambs together made the burnt offerings, whereas the ram was for a sin offering. Each bull, ram, and lamb was accompanied by its prescribed grain and drink offerings.

Grain Offering. The grain offering consisted of three one-tenth ephahs of flour for a bull, two one-tenth ephahs for a ram, one-tenth an ephah for a lamb; the flour in each case was to be mingled with oil.

Drink Offering. The drink offering consisted of one-half hin of wine for a bullock, one-third hin of wine for a ram, one-fourth hin of wine for a lamb. M.F.U.

SAD'DUCEE (sad'ū-sē). A member of one of the religious parties that existed among the Jews in the days of our Lord; the others were the Essenes and the Pharisees.

Name. The Heb. word by which they were called is ṣaddûqîm; Gk. Saddoukaios (Matt. 3:7; 16:1, 6, 11–12; 22:23, 34; Mark 12:18; Luke 20:27; Acts 4:1; 5:17; 23:6–8). The ordinary Jewish statement is that the Sadducees were named from a certain Zadok, a disciple of Antigonus of Socho, who is mentioned in the Mishna as having received the oral law from Simon the Just. Epiphanius states that the Sadducees called themselves such from Heb. ṣedeq, “righteousness,” and that there was anciently a Zadok among the priests, but that they did not continue in the doctrines of their chief. Edersheim suggests (Life of Jesus, 1:324) “that the linguistic difficulty in the change of the sound i into u □ Tsaddiqim into Tsadduqim, may have resulted, not grammatically, but by popular witticism. Some wit may have suggested: Read not Tsaddiqim, the ‘righteous,’ but Tsadduqim (from Tsad-u, ‘desolation,’ ‘destruction.’ Whether or not this suggestion approves itself to critics, the derivation of Sadducees from Tsaddiqim is certainly that which offers most probability.”

Aristocratic. We gain but a distorted image of the Sadducees if we only look at the points of differences between them and the Pharisees. Still, each party had its strong characteristic, that of the Pharisees being a rigid realism, while the Sadducees were aristocratic. Josephus repeatedly designates them as those who gain only the rich and have not the people on their side (Ant. 13.10.6). “This doctrine is received but by a few, yet by those still of the greatest dignity” (Ant. 18.1.4). What Josephus really means is that the Sadducees were the aristocrats, the wealthy euporoi, the persons of rank (prōtoi tois axiōmasin), i.e., from the priesthood. The NT (Acts 5:17) and Josephus (Ant. 20.9.1) testify that the high-priestly families belonged to the Sadducean party. The Sadduceans were not, however, merely the priestly party but aristocratic priests.

Tenets. The Sadducees were distinctive in many of the positions they took regarding the law, ritual, and doctrine.

The Law. The Sadducees acknowledged only the written law as binding and rejected the entire traditional interpretation and further development of the law during the centuries by the scribes. Thus, according to Josephus (Ant. 13.10.6), the Sadducees say only what is written is to be esteemed as legal and what has come down from tradition of the fathers need not be observed. Although they rejected the tradition of the elders, they did not, as some of the fathers supposed, reject the Prophets.

In legal matters the Sadducees were, according to Josephus (Ant. 20.9.1), “very rigid in judging offenders above all the rest of the Jews,” whereas the Pharisees were much milder and more merciful. This may be connected with the fact that the Sadducees strictly adhered to the letter of the law, whereas the Pharisees sought to mitigate its severity by interpretation, although the latter in some instances were the more severe. “They saw in the tradition of the elders an excess of legal strictness which they refused to have imposed upon them, while the advanced religious views were, on the one hand, superfluous to their worldly-mindedness, and on the other, inadmissible by their higher culture and enlightenment” (Schürer, History of the Jewish People, div. 2, 1:41).

Levirate marriage. The Sadducees held that the levirate law was obligatory only when marriage was not consummated, i.e., when a woman’s betrothed husband died without cohabiting with her, then his surviving brother could perform the duty of levir without committing incest, as she was still a virgin. This restriction of the levirate law on the part of the Sadducees imparts additional force to the incident recorded in Matt. 22:23–28; Mark 12:18–23; Luke 20:27–33. According to the understanding of the Sadducees, the marriage would have been consummated only between the woman and the seventh brother; whereas the Pharisees would have made them all cohabit with the woman. The Sadducees would say only the last brother could be her husband, but according to the Pharisaic practice she would have been the real wife of them all.

The ceremony of taking off the shoe (Deut. 25:9) was understood literally by the Sadducees, who insisted that the rejected widow should spit into the man's face; the Pharisees held that spitting before his face met all the requirements of the case.

The right of retaliation. With the same conservatism and rigor the Sadducees insisted upon the literal carrying out of the law "eye for eye," etc. (Ex. 21:23–25); the Pharisees, with due regard for the interests of the people, maintained that monetary compensation was sufficient.

False witnesses. The Sadducees insisted that false witnesses should be put to death only when the accused had been executed in consequence of their false testimony (Deut. 19:19–21); the Pharisees required that this should take place as soon as sentence had been passed. In this case the Pharisees were the more severe. The Sadducees required compensation, not only if an ox or a donkey (Ex. 21:32, 35–36), but also if a manservant or a maidservant had injured anyone, arguing that the master is far more answerable for him than his cattle, as he is to watch over his moral conduct. The Pharisees denied this, submitting that the slave was a responsible creature, and that, if the master be held responsible for his conduct, a dissatisfied slave might, out of spite, commit crimes in order to make his master pay.

Inheritance. The law of inheritance formed another distinctive feature of the Sadducees. They maintained that when a son, being heir presumptive and having sisters, died leaving a daughter, that the daughter was not to receive all the property but that the sisters of the deceased were to have an equal share with the daughter. They urged that the daughter was only second degree, whereas the sisters were the first degree. The Pharisees, on the contrary, maintained that the deceased brother's daughter was the rightful and sole heir, inasmuch as she was the descendant of the male heir, whose simple existence disinherited his sisters.

Ritual. Respecting questions of ritual, the Sadducees did not regard as binding Pharisaic decrees with respect, e.g., to clean and unclean. They derided their Pharisaic opponents on account of the oddities and inconsistencies into which their laws of cleanness brought them. But they did not renounce the principle of Levitical uncleanness in itself, for they demanded a higher degree of cleanness for the priest who burned the red heifer (which see) than did the Pharisees. They differed somewhat from the Pharisees regarding the festival laws, but the only difference of importance was that the Sadducees did not acknowledge as binding the confused mass of Pharisaic enactments.

In short, "the difference in principle between the two parties is confined, on the whole, to this general rejection of Pharisaic tradition by the Sadducees. All other differences were such as would naturally result from the one party not accepting the other's exegetical tradition. The Sadducee theoretically agreed with Pharisaic tradition in some, perhaps many, particulars—he only denied its obligation, and reserved the right of private opinion" (Schürer, div. 2, 2:38).

Doctrine. The Sadducees refused to believe in a resurrection of the body and retribution in a future life or in any personal continuity of the individual (Matt. 22:23; Mark 12:18; Luke 20:27; Josephus Ant. 18.1.4.; Wars 2.8.14). The Jews "would not consider themselves bound to accept any doctrine as an article of faith, unless it had been proclaimed by Moses, their great lawgiver; ... and it is certain that in the written law of the Pentateuch there is a total absence of any assertion by Moses of the resurrection of the dead. This fact is presented to Christians in a striking manner by the well-known words of the Pentateuch, which are quoted by Christ in argument with the Sadducees on this subject (Ex. 3:6; Mark 12:26–27; Matt. 22:31–32; Luke 20:37). It cannot be doubted that in such a case Christ would quote to his powerful adversaries the most cogent text in the law; and yet the text actually quoted does not do more than suggest an inference on this great doctrine. It is true that in other parts of the OT there are individual passages that express a belief in a resurrection, such as in Isa. 26:19; Dan. 12:2; Job 19:26; and in some of the psalms; and it may at first sight be a subject of surprise that the Sadducees were not convinced by the authority of those passages. But although the Sadducees regarded the books that contained these passages as sacred, it is more than doubtful whether any of the Jews regarded them as sacred in precisely the same sense as the written law.” Hence, scarcely any Jew would have believed it necessary to believe in man’s resurrection, “unless the doctrine had been proclaimed by Moses; and as the Sadducees disbelieved the transmission of any oral law by Moses, the striking absence of that doctrine from the written law freed them from the necessity of accepting the doctrine as divine” (Smith, Bib. Dict., s.v.).

According to Acts 23:8, the Sadducees denied that there was angel or spirit, i.e., independent spiritual realities besides God. To this category of spirits, denied by them, belonged also the spirits of the departed; for they held the soul to be a refined matter, which perished with the body (Josephus Ant. 18.1.4; Wars 2.8.14). The two principal explanations that have been suggested as to the belief of the Sadducees on this point are, either they regarded the angels of the OT as transitory unsubstantial representations of Jehovah, or they disbelieved merely the angelical system that was developed among the Jews after the captivity.

Regarding the question of free will and predestination, if we may believe Josephus (Wars 2.8.14), the Sadducees, in dissenting from the fantastic, imaginary development of Judaism, came to lay great stress upon human freedom. With a strong insistence upon personal liberty there came a decrease of the religious motive. They insisted that man was placed at his own disposal, and they rejected the belief that a divine cooperation takes place in human action as such. The difference between the Pharisees and the Sadducees seems to have amounted to this—the former accentuated God’s preordination, the latter man’s free will; and, whereas the Pharisees admitted only a partial influence of the human element on what happened, or the cooperation of the human with the divine, the Sadducees denied all absolute preordination and made man’s choice of evil or good to depend entirely on the exercise of free will and self-determination.

The Pharisees accentuated the divine to the verge of fatalism and insisted upon absolute and unalterable preordination of every event in its minutest detail. We can well understand how the Sadducees would oppose notions like these. Neither the NT nor rabbinic writings bring the charge of the denial of God’s prevision against the Sadducees.

History. Milligan (Imperial Bible Dictionary) says of the party of Sadducees: “Its origin, like that of the Pharisees, is in all probability to be sought in that remarkable period of Jewish history which is embraced between the restoration of Israel to its own land, or rather between the cessation of prophecy after that event, and the Christian era. No traces of Sadduceeism are to be found in Israel previous to the captivity.... In the presence of the divinely inspired prophet of Jehovah, the representative of the theocracy in its noblest form and most glorious anticipations, no tendency like that of the Sadducees, so denationalized, so cold, so skeptical, and so worldly, could have taken root. The very nature of the case, therefore, requires us to seek its origin at a more recent date, and naturally carries us to that strange period, of both outward and inward confusion through which, after the death of Alexander the Great, Palestine had to pass.” In this Greek period, political interests were combined with Greek culture; and to effect anything in the political world one must of necessity have stood on a more or less friendly footing with Hellenism. In the higher ranks of the priesthood Hellenism gained ground. In the same proportion, it was alienated from the Jewish religious interest. This tendency was checked by the rising of the Maccabees, at which time the religious life was revived and strengthened. It was then that the rigidly legal party of the “Chasidees” gained more and more influence. And therewith their pretensions also increased. Those only were to be acknowledged as true Israelites who observed the law according to the full strictness of the interpretations given to it by the scribes. This made the aristocratic party the more strenuous in its opposition, and there resulted a firmer consolidation of parties, the “Chasidees” becoming “Pharisees,” and the aristocratic party being called “Sadducees” by their opponents.

Under the earlier Maccabees (Judas, Jonathan, and Simon) this “Zadokite” aristocracy was necessarily in the background. The ancient, high-priestly family, which, at least in some of its members, represented the extreme philo-Hellenistic standpoint, was supplanted. The high-priestly office remained for a time unoccupied. In the year 152 Jonathan was appointed high priest, and thus was founded the new high-priestly dynasty of the Hasmonaeans, whose whole past compelled them at first to support the rigidly legal party. Nevertheless there was not in the times of the first Hasmonaeans (Jonathan, Simon) an entire withdrawal of the Sadducees from the scene. The Hasmonaeans had to come to some kind of understanding with it and to yield to it at least a portion of seats in the “Gerusia.” Things remained in this position till the time of John Hyrcanus, when the Sadducees again became the ruling party. John Hyrcanus, Aristobulus I, and Alexander Jannaeus became their followers. The reaction under Alexandra brought the Pharisees back to power. Their political supremacy was, however, of no long duration. Although the spiritual power of the Pharisees had increased greatly, the Sadducean aristocracy was able to keep at the helm in politics. The price at which the Sadducees had to secure themselves power at this later period was indeed a high one, for they were obliged in their official actions actually to accommodate themselves to Pharisaic views. With the fall of the Jewish state the Sadducees altogether disappear from history. Their strong point was politics. When deprived of this, their last hour had struck. While the Pharisaic party only gained strength, only obtained more absolute rule over the Jewish people in consequence of the collapse of political affairs, the very ground on which the Sadducees stood was cut away from them. Therefore it is not to be wondered that Jewish scholars soon no longer knew who the Sadducees really were.

SADOC (Matt. 1:14, KJV). See Zadok.

SAFFRON. See Vegetable Kingdom.

SAIL. The rendering of the Heb. nēs (Isa. 33:23; Ezek. 27:7), usually a standard, or flagstaff; and in the passages cited a flag of a ship. In Acts 27:17 it represents the Gk. skeuos and seems to be used specially and collectively of the sails and ropes (“sea anchor,” NIV) of a ship (which see).

SAILOR. The translation of one Gk. and several Heb. terms (1 Kings 9:27; Ezek. 27:9, 27, 29; Jonah 1:5; Acts 27:27, 30; Rev. 18:17). Frequently shipmen or mariners in the KJV. See Ships.

SAINTS. Positionally, every NT believer; experientially, a person eminent for piety and virtue: a consecrated person. Applied to the pious Israelites (Pss. 16:3; 34:9), Heb. qādōsh, elsewhere “godly ones,” “holy ones.” Also applied to members of the Body of Christ. All the saved of the NT era are saints (hagioi) by virtue of their position “in Christ” (1 Cor. 1:2; cf. Rom. 6:3–4; 8:1; Eph. 1:3; etc.). The NT refutes the idea of a special class of “saints.” Although it is true that in experience some believers are more “holy” than others, yet in their position before God all believers are “sanctified,” i.e., saints by virtue of what they are “in Christ.” The Christian’s perfect position (Rom. 6:1–10) is made a comfortable experience of Christ by faith (v. 11); “considering” themselves to be what they are in their person before God, they became such in their everyday experience. The more one’s experience conforms to one’s position, the more practical holiness is manifested in the child of God (saint).

The term saint in the NASB and NIV is always the translation of either Heb. qādōsh or Gk. hagios; both the Heb. and Gk. terms are frequently translated “holy” in those translations. KJV “saint” is sometimes replaced in the NASB by “holy one.” The KJV similarly translates qādōsh and hagios, as well as Heb. qōdesh and hāsîd. See Holiness; Godly Ones. M.F.U.

SAL’AMIS (sal’a-mis). A city at the E extremity of the island of Cyprus, and the first place visited by Paul and Barnabas after leaving the mainland at Selucia (Acts 13:5). From the use of “synagogues” in the plural it may be inferred that there were many Jews in the city. And it is probable that from them came some of those early Cypriot Christians mentioned in 11:19–20.

From the eleventh century B.C. until the end of the Roman period, Salamis was the chief city of Cyprus. Unfortunately, because of destructive earthquakes in the region (e.g., 76/77, 332) it may be impossible ever to visualize the city as it was when Paul and Barnabas preached there about A.D. 45. Serious archaeological work was not done at the site until the Cyprus Department of Antiquities began annual campaigns there in 1952. They excavated the Byzantine gymnasium and bath complex N of the city, the large fourth-century basilica of St. Epiphanius, the first-century A.D. theater with seating for more than 15,000, the necropolis, the harbor area, and the city forum. The latter is considered to be the largest in the Roman Empire; it measured 750 feet long and 180 feet wide. At its S end stood a temple of Zeus on a high podium. H.F.V.

SALA’THIEL. See Shealtiel, no. 1.

SAL’CAH, SAL’CHAH. See Salecah.

SAL’ECAH (sabi-ka; KJV, Salcah, Salchal). A city of Bashan, named in the early records of Israel (Deut. 3:10; Josh. 13:11) and apparently one of the capitals of Og’s kingdom (12:5). From 1 Chron. 5:11 it would seem that Salecah was on the eastern confines of both Manasseh and Gad. Salecah is the modern Salkhad, a town on the NE border of the mountainous kingdom of Bashan, E of the river Jordan.

SA'LEM (sā'lem, "peaceful"). The name of a place mentioned in connection with Melchizedek as its king (Gen. 14:18; Heb. 7:1–2). It is perhaps the name of Jerusalem (Ps. 76:2). The name appears as Uru-salim ("City of Peace") in the Amarna Letters.

SA'LIM (sā'lim; peaceful). The place W of the Jordan where John was baptizing (John 3:23). It may be identified with Salem, above.

SAL'LAI (sal'a-ī).

1. A leading Benjamite who, with 928 of his tribesmen, settled in Jerusalem on the return from the captivity (Neh. 11:8), 445 B.C.

2. One of the heads of the priests who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:20), about 536 B.C. In v. 7 he is called Sallu.

SAL'LU (sal'ū). The name of two Hebrews, spelled differently in the original.

1. A son of Meshullam, a Benjamite dwelling in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:7; 1 Chron. 9:7), about 445 B.C.

2. Another form (Neh. 12:7) of the name Sallai (which see, no. 2).

SAL'MA (sal'ma).

1. Another form (1 Chron. 2:11) for Salmon (which see).

2. The second named of the sons of Caleb, and father (founder) of Bethlehem (1 Chron. 2:51), and of the Netophathites (v. 54), probably about 1400 B.C.

SAL'MON (sa'mon). The son of Nahshon and ancestor of Boaz (Ruth 4:20–21; 1 Chron. 2:11, Salma; Matt. 1:4–5; Luke 3:32), before 1150 B.C.

SALMO'NE (sal-mō'ne). A promontory of E Crete (Acts 27:7); present-day Cape Sidero.

SALO'ME (sa-lō'me; feminine of Solomon).

1. The sister of Herod the Great (see article Herod). She is not named in the Bible, but is mentioned in Josephus.

2. The daughter of Herodias by her first husband, Herod Philip (Josephus Ant. 18.5.4). She is the "daughter of Herodias," mentioned in Matt. 14:6 as dancing before Herod Antipas and securing, at her mother's instigation, the death of John the Baptist. To do honor to the day and to the company Salome broke through the rule of strict seclusion from the other sex and condescended, though a princess and the daughter of kings, to dance before Antipas and his guests. "The dancing then in vogue in both Rome and the provinces, from its popularity under Augustus, was very like that of our modern ballet. The dancer did not speak, but acted some story by gestures, movements, and attitudes, to the sound of music. Masks were used in all cases to conceal the features, but all other parts of the body, especially the hands and arms, were called into action, and a skillful pantomimist could express feelings, passions, and acts with surprising effect. The dress of the performer was planned to show the beauty of the figure to the greatest advantage, though it varied with the characters represented" (Geikie, Life of Christ, p. 300). Salome was married first to Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis, her paternal uncle, who died childless; and, second, to her cousin Aristobulus, son of Herod, king of Chalcis, by whom she had three sons.

3. The wife of Zebedee, as appears by a comparison of Matt. 27:56 with Mark 15:40. Many modern critics are of the opinion that she was the sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus, alluded to in John 19:25. Others make the expression "His mother's sister" refer to "Mary the wife of Clopas," immediately following. We can hardly regard the point as settled, though the weight of modern criticism is decidedly in favor of the former view. The only events recorded of Salome are that she made a request on behalf of her two sons for seats of honor in the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 20:20), that she attended the crucifixion of Jesus (Mark 15:40), and that she visited His sepulcher (16:1). She is mentioned by name on only the two latter occasions.

SALT. Not only did the Hebrews make general use of salt in the food both of man (Job 6:6) and beast (Isa. 30:24), but they used it in their religious services as an accompaniment to the various offerings presented on the altar (Lev. 2:13, "every grain offering of yours, moreover, you shall season with salt"). The salt of the sacrifice is called "the salt of the covenant of your God," because in common life salt was the symbol of a covenant. The meaning that the salt (with its power to strengthen food and preserve it from putrefaction and corruption) imparted to the sacrifice was the unbending truthfulness of that self-surrender to the Lord embodied in the sacrifice, by which all impurity and hypocrisy were repelled. In addition to the uses of salt already specified, the inferior sorts were applied as a manure to the soil or to hasten the decomposition of dung (Matt. 5:13; Luke 14:35). Too large a mixture, however, was held to produce sterility; and hence also arose the custom of sowing with salt the foundations of a destroyed city (Judg. 9:45), as a token of its irretrievable ruin.

See also Mineral Kingdom.

Figurative. As one of the most essential articles of food, salt symbolized hospitality (see Covenant of Salt). Of the ministry of good men, as opposing the spiritual corruption of sinners (Matt. 5:13); of grace in the heart (Mark 9:50); of wisdom or good sense in speech (Col. 4:6); graceless believers as salt without savor (Matt. 5:13; Mark 9:50); from the belief that salt would, by exposure to the air, lose its virtue; salt pits was a figure of desolation (Zeph. 2:9); "salted with fire" (Mark 9:49) refers to the purification of the good and punishment of sinners.

SALT, CITY OF. A city in the wilderness of Judah (Josh. 15:62), probably at the SW extremity of the Dead Sea, where some of the hills are of pure salt, hence its name. Robinson (Biblical Researchers, 2:109) believes that it lay near the plain at the S end of the Dead Sea, which he would identify with the Valley of Salt (which see).

SALT, COVENANT OF. See Covenant of Salt.

SALT, VALLEY OF. A name employed five times in Scripture. The ravine is on the border between Judah and Edom, S of the Dead Sea. It was the scene of several battles (2 Sam. 8:13; 2 Kings 14:7; 1 Chron. 18:12; 2 Chron. 25:11).

SALT SEA. See Dead Sea.

SALTWORT. See Vegetable Kingdom: Mallows.

SA'LU (sa'lū). The father of Zimri, which latter was slain by Phinehas for bringing a Midianite woman into the camp of Israel (Num. 25:14), about 1400 B.C.

SALUTATION (Heb. bārak, in some forms "to bless"; shālôm, "well, happy," to be "friendly"; Gk. aspasmos, a "greeting"). The friendly greeting that in ancient as in modern times took place when meeting or parting. Salutations may be classed under two heads:

Conversational. The salutation at meeting consisted in early times of various expressions of blessing, such as: "May God be gracious to you" (Gen. 43:29); "May you be blessed of the Lord" (Ruth 3:10; cf. 1 Sam. 15:13); "May the Lord be with you," "May the Lord bless you" (Ruth 2:4); "The blessing of the Lord be upon you; we bless you in the name of the Lord" (Ps. 129:8). Hence the term bless received the secondary sense of "salute." The Heb. term used in these instances (shālôm) has no special reference to "peace," but to general well-being, and strictly answers to our "welfare."

The salutation at parting consisted originally of a simple blessing (Gen. 24:60; 28:1; 47:10; Josh. 22:6), but in later times the term shālôm was introduced here also in the form “Go in peace,” or rather, “Farewell” (1 Sam. 1:17; 20:42; 2 Sam. 15:9). In modern times the ordinary mode of address current in the East resembles the Hebrews’: Es-selám aleykum, “Peace be on you,” and the term salaam has been introduced into our own language to describe the oriental salutation. Eastern salutations were often complicated and tedious, taking up much of one’s time. Our Lord’s injunction “Greet no one on the way” (Luke 10:4) seems to mean that the apostles were to travel like men absorbed in one supreme interest, which would not permit them to lose time in idle ceremonies.

Epistolary. The epistolary salutations in the period subsequent to the OT were framed on the model of the Latin style; the addition of the term peace may, however, be regarded as a vestige of the old Hebrew form (2 Macc. 1:1). The writer placed his own name first, and then that of the person whom he saluted; it was only in special cases that this order was reversed (2 Macc. 1:1; 9:19; 1 Esdr. 6:7). A combination of the first and third persons in the terms of the salutation was not unfrequent (Gal. 1:1–2; Philem. 1; 2 Pet. 1:1). A form of prayer for spiritual mercies was also used. The concluding salutation consisted occasionally of a translation of the Lat. valete (Acts 15:29; 23:30) but more generally of the term aspazomai, “I salute,” or the cognate substantive, accompanied by a prayer for peace or grace.

SALVATION. A term that stands for several Heb. and Gk. words, the general idea being safety, deliverance, ease, soundness. In the OT the term refers to various forms of deliverance, both temporal and spiritual. God delivers His people from their enemies and from the snares of the wicked (see Pss. 37:40; 59:2; 106:4). He also saves by granting forgiveness of sins, answers to prayer, joy, and peace (79:9; 69:13; 51:12). The OT prophecies center upon One who was to come as the bringer of salvation (see Messiah).

In the NT salvation is regarded almost exclusively as from the power and dominion of sin. And of this Jesus Christ is the author (see Matt. 1:21; Acts 4:12; Heb. 2:10; 5:9). It is freely offered to all men but is conditioned upon repentance and faith in Christ (see John 3:16; Heb. 2:3). Salvation proceeds from the love of God, is based upon the atonement wrought by Christ, is realized in forgiveness, regeneration, and sanctification, and culminates in the resurrection and glorification of all true believers. See Atonement; Forgiveness; Justification; Regeneration; Sanctification; Resurrection. SAMARIA, CITY OF (sa-mā’ri-a; “watch” mountain). An important place in central Palestine, noted as the capital of the Northern Kingdom. Its name was given to the surrounding region, and later to a sect.

Geography. Samaria stood upon a hill about three hundred feet high, in a wide basin formed by the valley that runs from Shechem to the coast—the present Wadi esh-Sha’ir, or Barley Vale—and an incoming glen. Surrounded by mountains on three sides, Samaria has a great view to the W. The broad vale is visible for eight miles, then a low range of hills, and over them the sea, about twenty-three miles away.

History. Samaria was purchased from its owner, Shemer, for two talents of silver, by Omri, king of Israel, who “built on the hill, and named the city which he built Samaria, after the name of Shemer, the owner of the hill” (1 Kings 16:24). From that time until the captivity of the ten tribes—about two hundred years—it continued to be the capital.

During all this time it was the seat of idolatry (Isa. 9:9; Jer. 23:13; Ezek. 16:46–55; Amos 6:1; Mic. 1:1). There Ahab built a temple to Baal (1 Kings 16:32–33; cf. 2 Kings 10:35). On the other hand, it was the scene of the ministry of the prophets Elijah and Elisha (which see). Jehu broke down the temple of Baal but does not appear to have otherwise injured the city (10:18–28). The city was twice besieged by the Syrians, about 863 B.C. (1 Kings 20:1) and about 850 B.C. (2 Kings 6:24–7:20); but on both occasions the siege was ineffectual. It was taken in 721 B.C. by Shalmaneser's successor, Sargon king of Assyria (18:9–10), and the kingdom of the ten tribes was destroyed. In 331 it yielded to Alexander the Great, who visited it on his way back from Egypt in order to punish the Samaritan murderers of the governor he had appointed over Coele-Syria. Ptolemy Lagos deemed it dangerous enough to have it dismantled before he gave over Coele-Syria to Antigonos; and, being rebuilt, it was again destroyed fifteen years later. It withstood a year's siege by John Hyrcanus, the Maccabee, before being taken by him. It was rebuilt by Gabinius, the successor of Pompey. Augustus gave Samaria to Herod, who fortified and embellished it and named it Sebaste, the Greek for Augustus. Herod built a Greco-Roman theater, a temple to Augustus, and a Roman-style forum and colonnaded road at the site.

In the NT it is recorded (Acts 8:5) that Philip “went down to the city of Samaria,” which more literally means “into a city of the Samaritans.” Still it is likely that the evangelist would resort to the capital city. Thus ends the Bible history of Samaria.

Archaeology. From 1908 to 1910 the site of Samaria was excavated by Harvard University under the direction of G. A. Reisner, D. G. Lyon, and C. S. Fisher (cf. Harvard Excavations at Samaria [1908–10], 2 vols. [1924]). From 1931 to 1933 excavation was continued by Harvard University, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the British Academy, the British School of Archaeology in Jerusalem, and the Palestine Exploration Fund under J. W. Crowfoot's direction. Further work was done in 1935 (cf. J. W. Crowfoot, Kathleen M. Kenyon, and E. L. Sukenik, The Buildings at Samaria [1942]). These various excavations have revealed the following periods: (1) The Omri-Ahab Era, Periods I and II. (2) The Jehu Era, Period III. (3) The eighth century, when the city reached its acme of prosperity, Periods IV-VI. Stout walls from the Omri-Ahab Period and other fortifications reveal how Samaria could have held out against the Syrians (2 Kings 6:24–30) and against the powerful Assyrians (17:5). Large numbers of cisterns were also discovered, compensating for the lack of natural water supply. The famous Samarian ostraca are usually placed in the reign of Jeroboam II in the eighth century. These inscribed pieces of pottery were recovered in one of the palace storehouses. They are accounts of royal revenue received in the form of oil and wine. Numerous stewards are mentioned, recalling biblical names such as Nimshi, Ahinoam, and Gomar (Gomer). Also numerous ivories in the form of plaques or furniture inlays were recovered. Portrayed on the ivories are papyrus reeds, lotus, lions, bulls, sphinxes, and Egyptian gods such as Isis and Horus. The high artistic quality and the Egyptian gods indicate strong foreign influence at this period. These ivories recall the “beds of ivory” and “houses of ivory” denounced by Amos (Amos 3:15; 6:4; cf. 1 Kings 22:39). Some of the significant remains at the site today include the palace of Omri and Ahab, the temple to Augustus, the Greco-Roman theater, a gate complex with Hellenistic towers, a basilica adjacent to the forum, and part of the colonnaded street. SAMARIA, REGION OF (Gk. usually Samareia). This term includes all the tribes over which Jeroboam made himself king, whether E or W of the Jordan River. The expression

“cities of Samaria” (1 Kings 13:32) is used for the kingdom of the ten tribes, which did not receive this name till after the building of the city of Samaria as the capital of the kingdom and the residence of the kings of Israel (16:24). It is used elsewhere in the same sense; thus, by “Ephraim and the inhabitants of Samaria” is meant Israel (Isa. 9:9–12). Israel, Ephraim, and Samaria are equivalent terms in Hosea, who also calls the calf of Bethel “your calf, O Samaria” (Hos. 8:5). In Amos 3:9 the “mountains of Samaria” are spoken of; and we find the expression in Ezekiel (16:53), the “captivity of Samaria and her daughters.”

SAMARITANS (sa-mar'i-tanz; Heb. shōmrōnîm). Mentioned in 2 Kings 17:29 as “the people of Samaria.” It is customary to refer the Samaritans in this passage to the colonists brought by the king of Assyria in place of the deported Israelites; but the text seems rather to mean that these colonists put their gods into the houses of the high places that the Samaritans, i.e., the former inhabitants of Samaria, had made for their own religious use. But the Samaritans of subsequent history and of the NT are the descendants of the colonists brought in by the king of Assyria.

The Captor and the Captivity. It was Shalmaneser V, who reigned five years, beginning with 727, who laid siege to Samaria; but his successor, Sargon II, claimed to have taken it. At least he did the mopping up at the end of the campaign in 722 B.C. Sargon carried off 27,290 inhabitants as he himself recounts. He took fifty chariots as “the portion of his royalty” and contented himself with the same tribute as “the former king.” Thus it is plain that he neither desolated nor depopulated the land. But he put an end to its independence and set over it an Assyrian governor. In 720 we find Samaria, with Arpad, Simyra, and Damascus, joining in the revolt headed by Hamath.

Extent of the Captivity. The captivity must have been confined to Samaria and a small surrounding region. In Hezekiah’s time (2 Chron. 30:11), in Josiah’s (34:9), and even in Jeremiah’s (Jer. 41:5) there were Israelites in the Northern Kingdom who clung to the worship of God at Jerusalem. The 27,290 captives taken away by Sargon may, indeed, have been increased afterward by him or by other monarchs. But all the indications are that the depopulation was not thorough and was limited to the city of Samaria and its vicinity. This would account for the fact that the Galilee of our Lord’s day was a Jewish region. The Samaria of Josephus, indeed, embraced what was formerly the territory of Ephraim, but the Cuthaeen Samaritans “possessed only a few towns and villages of this large area” and western Manasseh.

Repeopling. The repeopling was not done all at once. In settling the affairs of that unquiet region more than one band of colonists was brought in. Heathen colonists were introduced by Sargon in 721 and again in 715 B.C. (2 Kings 17:24), by Esarhaddon, 680 B.C. (Ezra 4:2), and finally by Osnapper, i.e., Ashurbanipal, the last great Assyrian emperor (669–626 B.C.), who added people from Elam, etc., to the population.

Resultant Population. The Samaritans were a mixed race with a pagan core (Ezra 4:2). Their blood would become more and more Hebraized by the addition of renegade Jews and by the intermarriage with surrounding Israelites, who would find among them the familiar worship of former times.

Worship. Since the priest who was sent to “teach them the custom of the god of the land” was of the Samaritan captivity, and not from Jerusalem (2 Kings 17:27), their worship must have descended from that of Jeroboam. The schism headed by Jeroboam was not religious, but political (1 Kings 12:4, 16), and his object was to separate Israel not from God but from Jerusalem. His golden calves were designed as images of the God who had brought them up out of the land of Egypt. The notion of plurality is not so clearly marked in Hebrew as in English, “hinnēh, lo!” being an interjection (“Behold, your gods!”). There is no sign of plurality, except the verb he-ēlūkā. But ēlōhīm, even when it refers to the one God, sometimes has a plural verb, and that in cases where we should not expect it (Gen. 20:13; 35:7; 2 Sam. 7:23, in reference to this very deliverance from Egypt; Ps. 58:11, a participle. Thus, Jeroboam’s sin may have been a violation not so much of the first commandment as of the second. Indeed, archaeological research suggests that the two golden calves served not as idols but as supports for the invisible presence of Yahweh. This is indicated by popular contemporary Near Eastern iconography, where the gods of the heathen, such as Baal, are pictured enthroned on the back of a bull or some other animal. With all the Jewish horror of Jeroboam’s worship, the charge is not usually that he introduced other gods (perhaps only in 1 Kings 14:9, where the reference is possibly to images; and 2 Chron. 11:15), but that it was schismatic (13:9) and irregular (1 Kings 12:31–33). Now, while he decisively separated the people from Jerusalem, it would be altogether for his interest to conciliate them by making the new worship as much like the old as possible (in 1 Kings 12:32 note the phrase “like the feast which is in Judah”). For a few needful changes he might plausibly argue that David and Solomon had taken great liberties; that the Temple with its burdensome cost was far enough from the simple Tabernacle, for whose construction God Himself had given minute directions; that Jerusalem had no special divine sanction; and finally that he himself had just as good a divine call as David and better than Solomon or Rehoboam. Putting all these things together with what is said under the next head of the probability that copies of the Pentateuch would be preserved in the Northern Kingdom, we may be reasonably sure that Jeroboam’s ritual would not be very far from that handed down from Moses. This would act as a purge on the imported polytheism of the transplanted peoples but would result in little more than a dual worship—a mixture of paganism and Judaism.

Samaritan Pentateuch. Whether the Northern Kingdom would be likely, in separating from the Levitical worship, to carry the Pentateuch with it is a question that, in the lack of positive evidence, everyone must answer according to his own judgment. The Tabernacle was most of the time in the territory that afterward belonged to the kingdom of Israel. It was in Shiloh till the time of Eli, about 1051 B.C. (1 Sam. 4:3). Shiloh was long remembered as its resting place (Ps. 78:60; Jer. 7:12, 14; 26:6). At the close of David’s reign, 960 B.C., it was no farther S than Gibeon (1 Chron. 21:29), a little S of the border. The focus of the old worship thus having been in the Northern Kingdom, of course there would be copies of the ceremonial law there, and it is hardly conceivable that there should not be copies of the whole Pentateuch, if not more of the Bible, at least in the Levitical cities. It is therefore not impossible that the Samaritan Pentateuch came into the hands of the Samaritans as an inheritance from the ten tribes whom they succeeded. However, it is much more probable to conclude that it was introduced by Manasseh (cf. Josephus Ant. 11.8.2, 4) at the time of the foundation of the Samaritan sanctuary on Mt. Gerizim.

First Discord Between Jews and Samaritans. That the Samaritans who wished to join with the Jews are called “enemies” in Ezra 4 may mean either that they were then seen to be enemies in disguise or that they were enemies when the account was written. Perhaps the latter; for in the refusal no charge of hypocrisy was made against them. It was only that the right to build belonged to others and that they could have no part in it. The genealogies were carefully kept (Ezra 8), and it is probable that considerations of birth were so prominent that there was no need of inquiry into anything else.

Were the Jews right? It is not for us to judge. We can only inquire for our own instruction. We must believe that they knew their own business best and presume that they were right. Yet there are some facts that cannot escape our notice. Their course in regard to aliens and children of mixed marriages, as shown in Ezra 10:3 and indicated in Neh. 13:1, 3

(cf. “ever” of v. 1, with “to the tenth generation” of Deut. 23:3), though natural and probably justifiable under the circumstances, was yet, so far as we know, somewhat in advance of what God had required. Aliens and slaves were allowed to eat the Passover if they were circumcised (Ex. 12:44, 48–49; see Moabites).

Subsequent History. The subsequent history of the Samaritans is touched on in the Bible and in extrabiblical literature.

Ancient. The relation between Jew and Samaritan was one of hostility. The expulsion of Manasseh by Nehemiah for an unlawful marriage, and his building of the Samaritan temple on Mt. Gerizim by permission of Darius Nothus, took place about 409 B.C. The inhospitality (Luke 9:52–53) and hostility of the Samaritans induced many pilgrims from the N to Jerusalem to go on the E of the Jordan. The Samaritans sometimes, using rival flames, perplexed the watchers for the signal fires that announced the rising of the paschal moon from Mt. Olivet to the Euphrates. They rejected all the OT except the Pentateuch, concerning which they claimed to have an older copy than the Jews and to observe the precepts better. The Jews repaid hate with hate. They cast suspicion on the Samaritan copy of the law and disallowed the steadfast claim of the Samaritans to Jewish birth (John 4:12). Social and commercial relations, although they could not be broken off (4:8), were reduced to the lowest possible figure. “The Samaritan was publicly cursed in their synagogues—could not be adduced as a witness in the Jewish courts—could not be admitted to any sort of proselytism, and was thus, so far as the Jew could affect his position, excluded from eternal life.” It ought to be said, however, that the rabbinic regulations for the relationships of Jews and Samaritans varied greatly at different times and that the older Talmudical authorities inclined to treat the Samaritans more like Jews. In 332 the Samaritans desired Alexander the Great to exempt them from tribute in the sabbatical year, on the ground that, as Israelites, they did not cultivate the land during that year. Becoming satisfied that they were not actually Jews, he deferred granting their request (Josephus Ant. 11.8.6, cf. 9.14.3) and on account of their conduct besieged and destroyed Samaria. John Hyrcanus took “Shechem and Gerizzim, and the nation of the Cutheans, who dwelt at that temple which resembled the temple which was at Jerusalem, and which Alexander permitted Sanballat, the general of his army, to build for the sake of Manasseh, who was son-in-law to Jaddua the high priest, as we have formerly related; which temple was now deserted two hundred years after it was built” (Josephus Ant. 13.9.1; as for Manasseh, cf. Ant. 11.7.1–2). The temple on Gerizim was “deserted,” 130 B.C. This gives about 330 for the date of its building. The “Sanballat the Horonite” (see Horonite) of the Bible was contemporary with Nehemiah, 445 B.C., and was father-in-law of one of the sons of Joiada the son of Eliashib, the high priest (Neh. 13:28). But the Sanballat of Josephus was a Cuthaeon, of the same race as the Samaritans, and was sent to Samaria by Darius Codomanus, the last king of Persia (d. 330). He was father-in-law to Manasseh, the brother of the high priest Jaddua, who was the son of John, the son of Judas, the son of Eliashib (Josephus Ant. 11.7.1–2). There must, therefore, have been two Sanballats, unless Josephus has confused the account. In the persecution under Antiochus, 170 B.C., the Samaritans disowned their relation to the Jews and consecrated their temple on Mt. Gerizim to Jupiter.

Later History. After the destruction of Samaria by Alexander the Great, Shechem became more prominent, and there, after the conquest by John Hyrcanus they built a second temple. With lapse of time they reacted from their polytheism into an “ultra Mosaism.” In our Lord’s time they still preserved their identity after seven centuries; and “though their limits had been gradually contracted, and the rallying place of their religion on Mount Gerizim had been destroyed one hundred and sixty years before by John Hyrcanus (130 B.C.) and though Samaria (the city) had been again and again destroyed, and though their territory had been the battlefield of Syria and Egypt, still preserved their nationality, still worshipped from Shechem and their other impoverished settlements toward their sacred hill; still retained their nationality, and could not coalesce with the Jews.” In the first century the Samaritans were numerous enough to excite the fears of Pilate, whose severity toward them cost him his office (Josephus Ant. 18.4.1–2), and of Vespasian, under whom more than 10,000 were slaughtered after refusing to surrender (B. J., 3.7.32). They greatly increased in numbers, particularly under Dositheus, about the time of Simon Magus. In the fourth century they were among the chief adversaries of Christianity. They were severely chastised by the emperor Zeno and thereafter were hardly noticed till the latter half of the sixteenth century, when correspondence was opened with them by Joseph Scaliger. Two of their letters to him and one to Job Sudolf are still extant and are full of interest. Shechem is represented by the modern Nâblus, corresponding to Neapolis, which was built by Vespasian, a little W of the old town. Here has been a settlement of about two hundred, who have observed the law and kept the Passover on Mt. Gerizim “with an exactness of minute ceremonial which the Jews have long since intermitted.” W.H.; M.F.U.; H.F.V.

SA'MEKH (ם) (sa'mek). Fifteenth letter of the Heb. alphabet, heading the fifteenth section of Ps. 119.

SAM'GAR-NE'BU (sam'gar-nē'bū; apparently from Akkad. Shumgir-nabū, “Nebo, be gracious”; Samgar-nebo, KJV; Samgar, Nebo-Sarsekim, NIV). One of the officers of Nebuchadnezzar's army present at the taking of Jerusalem (Jer. 39:3), 587 B.C.

SAM'LAH (sam'la; “a garment”). One of the kings of Edom before the establishment of the Israelite monarchy (Gen. 36:36–37; 1 Chron. 1:47–48). He was the successor of Hadad (Hadar) and was of the city of Masrekah.

SA'MOS (sa'mos). A noted island in the Aegean Sea, near the coast of Lydia, in Asia Minor, separated by a narrow strait; in its narrowest part not quite a mile wide. When Paul touched there on his voyage from Greece to Syria (Acts 20:15), it was a free city in the province of Asia. It was the seat of the worship of Juno, and her temple, called the Heraeon, was enriched by some of the finest works of art known in Greece. Its chief manufacture was pottery of fine red clay, the Samian ware celebrated all over the civilized world. Its wine (“Levantine”) ranks high.

SA'MOTHRACE (sa'mō-thrās). A Greek island in the Aegean Sea that lay on Paul's sea route from Troas to Neapolis in the course of his second missionary journey (Acts 16:11).

SAM'SON (Heb. shimshôn, “little sun”). The renowned judge and deliverer of Israel, Samson was the son of Manoah of Zorah, in the tribe of Dan, whose birth was foretold to his parents by an angel, accompanied with the announcement that he was to be a “Nazirite to God from the womb” (Judg. 13:2–5, 24). Samson grew up under special influences of the Spirit of God and at last was impelled to commence the conflict with the Philistines, which only terminated with his death.

Marries a Philistine. When he was about twenty years old Samson saw at Timnath a Philistine girl who pleased him and on his return asked his parents to take her for him as a wife. They were averse to such a marriage, but Samson persisted, perhaps being convinced that it would in some way aid him in visiting vengeance upon the Philistines. On his first visit to his future bride he killed a lion with his hands, and when he went to espouse her he found the skeleton occupied by a swarm of bees. At the wedding feast he proposed a riddle, conforming to the oriental custom of furnishing entertainment for the guests, and promised “thirty changes of clothes” if they could give him an answer. Unable to solve it, they urged his wife to secure the answer from him and inform them. He yielded but, seized with indignation, went to Ashkelon, killed thirty Philistines, and gave the changes of “clothes” to those who had solved the riddle. He returned to his father’s house, and his wife was given to his companion (Judg. 14:1–20).

His Revenge. Samson soon after visited his wife but was refused admission to her by her father. He interpreted the treatment that he had received from his father-in-law as the effect of the general attitude of the Philistines toward the Israelites and resolved to avenge his wrong upon the whole nation. He secured 300 foxes (jackals) and, by tying torches to their tails, set fire to the grainfields, vineyards, and olive groves of his enemies (15:1–5). The Philistines retorted by burning Samson’s wife and father-in-law; and this provocation so aroused Samson that he “struck them ruthlessly with a great slaughter,” after which he went down and dwelt in the “cleft of the rock of Etam” (15:6–8).

Delivered up to the Philistines. The Philistines came to avenge themselves and encamped in Judah. The Judeans, instead of recognizing Samson as a deliverer, went to Etam, to the number of 3,000, for the purpose of binding him and handing him over to their enemies. He consented on condition that they themselves would not kill him. They bound him with two new cords, brought him to Lehi (lhî, “a jaw”), and in this apparently helpless condition delivered him to the Philistines. When he heard their shout of joy his extraordinary strength suddenly put itself forth, and, snapping the cords asunder, he seized upon a fresh jawbone of a donkey and killed a thousand men. Casting away his weapon, he called the name of the place Ramath-lehi (“the jawbone height”). Weary and thirsty, Samson, conscious that he was fighting for the cause of Jehovah, prayed unto the Lord, who caused a stream to flow from the rock, which Samson called En-hakkore (i.e., “the well of him that prayed”). Samson drank and was revived (15:9–20).

At Gaza. After this Samson went to the city of Gaza and became intimate with a woman of loose character residing there. The Gazites fastened the city gates, intending to kill him in the morning, when, as they supposed, he would leave the house. But at midnight Samson arose and, breaking away bolts, bars, and hinges, carried the gates to the top of a neighboring hill looking toward Hebron (16:1–3), about 1070 B.C.

Delilah. After this Samson became infatuated with a woman of Sorek, named Delilah, through whom the Philistine lords determined to seize him. They supposed that his supernatural strength arose from an amulet that he wore and offered to Delilah a tempting bribe if she would discover for them his secret. She entered into the agreement and used all her arts and blandishments to persuade Samson to reveal it to her. He deceived her three times by false statements, but at last, teased into compliance, “he told her all that was in his heart,” and said, “If I am shaved, then my strength will leave me and I shall become weak and be like any other man.” Delilah, satisfied that Samson had spoken the truth this time, sent word to the Philistines, who came bringing the promised reward. Then she made him sleep, his head upon her lap, cut off his hair, and gave the predetermined signal, “The Philistines are upon you, Samson!” Forsaken by Jehovah, he fell an easy prey to his enemies.

Imprisonment and Death. The Philistines put out Samson’s eyes and led him, bound with bronze chains, to Gaza, where he was made to grind grain in the prison. As this was an employment that in the East was usually done by women, to assign it to such a man as Samson was virtually to reduce him to the lowest state of degradation and shame. After a time Samson’s hair began to grow, and the Philistines for some reason seemed inattentive to it. With it such a profound repentance seems to have been wrought in his heart as virtually reinvested him with the character and powers he had lost. His captivity was regarded by the Philistines as a great victory, and he seems to have been kept by them, like a wild beast, for show and insult. On the occasion of a sacrificial festival to Dagon, to whom they ascribed the capture of their enemy, they brought Samson from the prison that he might make sport for them. Determined to use his recovered strength against his enemies, a large number of whom crowded the building, Samson persuaded the attendant to place him between the pillars upon which the roof rested. After a brief prayer he grasped the pillars and, leaning forward with resistless force, brought down the building, causing his own death and that of 3,000 Philistines. His relatives came to Gaza, took away his body, and placed it in the burying place of his father, between Zorah and Eshtaol (16:21–31). He judged Israel about 1070 B.C. Though a mournful victory, it was still a victory, and a pledge to Israel that their temporary backslidings and defeats, if sincerely repented of and improved, would lead to ultimate triumph.

Character. The mention of Samson’s name in the list (Heb. 11:32) of ancients who “by faith conquered kingdoms, performed acts of righteousness,” warrants us a favorable estimate of his character as a whole. And yet the inspired narrative records infirmities that must forever mar the luster of his heroic deeds. In Samson the Nazirite we see a man towering in supernatural strength through his firm faith in, and confident reliance upon, the gift of God committed to him. On the other hand we see in Samson an adventurous, foolhardy, passionate, and willful man, dishonoring and frittering away his God-given power by making it subservient to his own lusts.

Samson’s Strength. The superhuman strength of Samson did not really lie in his hair but in the fact of his relation to God as a Nazirite, of which his uncut hair was the mark or sign. As soon as he broke away from his Naziritiship by sacrificing his hair, which he wore in honor of the Lord, Jehovah departed from him, and with Jehovah went his strength.

Overthrow of Dagon’s Temple. “So far as the fact itself is concerned, there is no ground for questioning the possibility of Samson’s bringing down the whole building by pulling down two middle columns.... In all probability we have to picture this temple of Dagon as resembling the modern Turkish kiosks, viz., as consisting of a ‘spacious hall, the roof of which rested in front upon four columns, two of them standing at the ends, and two close together in the center. Under this hall the leading men of the Philistines celebrated a sacrificial meal, while the people were assembled upon the top of the roof, which was surrounded by a balustrade’” (K. & D., Com., ad loc.).

SAMUEL. The prophet and judge of Israel (which see, below) and other Bible characters.

1. Son of Ammihud, appointed from the tribe of Simeon to divide the land of Canaan (Num. 34:20), c. 1400 B.C. The NIV reads “Shemuel.”

2. A descendant of Tola, and one of the leaders of the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2).

SAM’UEL (sam’ū-el; “asked or heard of God”). The son of Elkanah (which see), a Levite (1 Chron. 6:27–28, 33–38) of Ramathaim-zophim, on the mountains of Ephraim, and Hannah, to whom he was born in response to her earnest prayer (1 Sam. 1:1–20), probably 1080 B.C.

As a Child. When Hannah prayed for a son she vowed to dedicate him to the Lord as a Nazirite (1 Sam. 1:11) and as soon as he was weaned brought him to Shiloh and gave him over to Eli (1:24–28). Thus Samuel served as a boy before the Lord, clothed with an ephod.

Com. Commentary

NIV New International Version

He received every year from his mother a robe reaching down to his feet, such as was worn only by high personages, or women, over their other dress (2:11, 18–19).

Call. At the time when Samuel served the Lord before Eli, both as a boy and as a young man, “word from the Lord was rare ... visions were infrequent.” A revelation from God presupposed susceptibility on the part of men. The unbelief and disobedience of the people might restrain the fulfillment of this and all similar promises, and God might even withdraw His word to punish the idolatrous nation. The word of the Lord was then issued to Samuel for the first time. While sleeping in his place, probably in the court of the Tabernacle, where cells were built for the priests and Levites, Samuel heard his name called. Supposing it was Eli who had called him, he hastened to receive his commands, but Eli told him to lie down again, as he had not called. When, however, this was repeated a second and a third time, Eli perceived that the Lord had called Samuel and instructed him how to act should he hear the voice again. The Lord revealed to Samuel the doom of Eli’s house, which he reluctantly made known the next morning to the aged priest. Other revelations followed, and their exact fulfillment secured to Samuel a reputation for trustworthiness that made Shiloh an oracle (3:1–21).

Judge. After the disastrous defeat of the Israelites by the Philistines (4:1–11), Samuel does not appear again in history for a period of twenty years. During most of this time the Ark of the Lord rested in Kiriath-jearim, and all the house of Israel lamented after the Lord (7:1–2). Samuel, who had learned that loyalty to Jehovah was necessary to secure to Israel deliverance from its foes, issued a proclamation exposing the sin of idolatry and urging religious amendment. He summoned the tribes to assemble at Mizpah to spend a day in penitence and prayer. At this assembly Samuel seems to have been elected, or in some way recognized, as judge (7:3–6), 1050 B.C.

Ebenezer. When the Philistines heard of the gathering at Mizpah they made war upon the Israelites, who in their fear entreated Samuel not to cease to pray for their deliverance. The Philistines advanced while Samuel was engaged in sacrifice and prayer but were thrown into confusion by a terrific thunderstorm sent by Jehovah. This was an unprecedented phenomenon in that climate at that season of the year. The enemies of Israel were defeated and pursued to a place called Beth-car. As a memorial of the victory, Samuel placed a stone between Mizpah and Shen and named the place Ebenezer (“stone of help”; 7:7–12).

Judicial Labors. Samuel had now the entire government of the nation and visited, in the discharge of his official duties, Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah. His own residence was in his native city, Ramah (or Ramathaim), where he judged Israel and also built an altar to conduct the religious affairs of the nation. This was contrary to the letter of the law, but the prophets seem to have had power to dispense with ordinary usage; and, moreover, the Tabernacle at Shiloh had lost what was most essential to it as a sanctuary since it had been despoiled of the Ark by the Philistines (7:15–17).

The Monarchy. Samuel had appointed his sons as judges in his old age, and as they had perverted justice the elders of Israel entreated him to appoint them a king to judge them after the manner of all the nations (8:1–5). The proposed change of government displeased Samuel; nevertheless he laid the matter before Jehovah in prayer and was instructed to consent to their request, although not without setting before them the perils and tyranny of a monarchical government (8:6–19). The people were sent to their homes, and Samuel proceeded to the election of a sovereign. Saul was pointed out by Jehovah as the man whom he was to set apart as king of Israel and was anointed and saluted as monarch (8:19–10:8). After Samuel had privately anointed Saul king, he made provision for his recognition as such by the people. He summoned the people to Mizpah, but before proceeding to the election itself charged the people with their sin in rejecting God by their demand for a king. He then caused the sacred lot to be taken, and the lot fell upon Saul, who was formally introduced to the people (10:17–25).

Renewal of the Monarchy. There were certain “worthless men” who were opposed to Saul’s elevation to the throne, but the victory of the Ammonites so influenced the people in his favor that Samuel convened the people at Gilgal to “renew the kingdom.” This consisted, probably, of a ratification of the new constitution and the installation of the sovereign. This solemn service was concluded by the farewell address of Samuel, in which he handed over the office of judge to the king. The address was confirmed by the miraculous sign of a thunderstorm in answer to the prayer of Samuel. It was then wheat harvest, which occurs in Palestine between the middle of May and the middle of June, during which time it scarcely ever rains (11:14–12:25).

Reproves Saul. Although Saul had begun his reign, Samuel continued to exercise his functions as prophet and judge. He judged Israel “all the days of his life” (7:15) and from time to time crossed the path of the king. Saul was engaged in war against the Philistines and, having mustered his forces at Gilgal, awaited the coming of Samuel to sacrifice to Jehovah. As Samuel did not appear at the time appointed, Saul, in his anxiety lest the people should lose heart and desert him, resolved to offer the sacrifice himself—a fearful violation of the national law. The offering of the sacrifice was hardly finished when Samuel arrived. Rebuking Saul for his presumption, Samuel made known to him the short continuance of his kingdom. He then left him and went to Gibeah of Benjamin (13:1–15).

Parts with Saul. Later we find Samuel charging Saul with the extermination of the Amalekites, who had attacked, in a most treacherous manner, the Israelites on their journey from Egypt to Sinai. Saul was instructed to put to death man and beast, but he not only left Agag, the king, alive, but spared the best of the cattle, merely executing such as were worthless. Samuel announced to him that his disobedience had secured for him his rejection by Jehovah. Saul entreated Samuel to remain and worship with him but the latter refused and turned to depart. Saul endeavored to retain the prophet by force, and in the struggle the robe of Samuel was torn. In this event Samuel foresaw the rending away of the kingdom from Saul. Samuel yielded to the renewed entreaty of Saul that he would honor him by his presence before the elders and the people and remained while Saul worshiped. After Saul had prayed, Samuel directed him to bring Agag, king of the Amalekites, whom he killed before the altar of Jehovah, and then returned to his own home at Ramah. From that time they met no more, although Samuel did not cease to grieve for Saul (15:1–35).

Anoints David. Since Saul had been rejected by God, and the government was not to remain in his family, it was necessary, in order to prevent strife and confusion, that his successor should be appointed before the death of the king. Samuel was therefore instructed by the Lord to go to Bethlehem and anoint David, the youngest son of Jesse, as the chosen one. The sacrificial meal over, Samuel returned to Ramah (16:1–13).

Befriends David. Later when Saul, in his insane rage, endeavored to slay David, the latter fled to Samuel, and they both went to and lived in Naioth. The king pursued David, but when he came to Naioth and saw Samuel and the prophets, the Spirit of the Lord came upon him also, and he was obliged to relinquish the attempt to seize him (19:18–24).

Death. In 25:1 we have a brief account of the death of Samuel and the great mourning made for him by the Israelites, who buried him at his own house (about 1017 B.C.). The place long pointed out as his tomb is the height, most conspicuous of all in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, immediately above the town of Gibeon, known to the Crusaders as “Montjoye,” as the spot from whence they first saw Jerusalem, now called Neby Samwil, “the prophet Samuel.”

Character. In studying the character of Samuel it is impossible not to be impressed with his piety. He was dedicated to the service of God by his mother and that service never became an irksome routine. God was the center around which he, as well as heaven, turned. In all his difficulties he turned to God for counsel. In all his acts and decisions he was guided by the word of Jehovah. His advice to the Israelites was the motto of his own life, "Do not turn aside from following the Lord, but serve the Lord with all your heart." Neither was his patriotism less apparent. His object was not the possession of power but the welfare of his people. Place, honor, and power were not sought by him, but he by them. And when the people, without respect to his gray hair and long service, called upon him to resign his office there was no cry for pity, neither peevish reproach for their ingratitude. He challenged inspection of his character and official life; remonstrated with Israel on their choice as being an act of disloyalty not against himself, but Jehovah; and warned them of the evils that would result from the establishment of a monarchy. And when Saul was selected as his successor, Samuel received him with the utmost courtesy and treated him with even paternal kindness.

SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. The name of these two books can only find a logical explanation in the fact that Samuel was the principal character in the first part and anointed the other two principal characters. First and Second Samuel were originally a single book. The LXX translators divided them into two books called 1 and 2 Kings. The other books of Kings, which deal with the later historical period, were called 3 and 4 Kings. This designation was carried over into the Old Latin and the Vulg. The same division was transferred to the Heb. Bible in 1448, but with the difference that each book retained the title that it possessed in the Heb. manuscript; 1–4 Kings became 1 and 2 Samuel and 1 and 2 Kings.

Purposes. These two historical books carry on Israelite history from the closing years of the era of the Judges to the establishment of David's kingdom. They also delineate Samuel's personal history. The moral failure of the priesthood and judgeship is recorded in the death of Eli and his sons. The rise of the prophetic office alongside the kingly office is set forth. Samuel, the prophet-judge, is portrayed as the founder of both, as well as of the schools of the prophets (1 Sam. 19:20; 2 Kings 2:3–5). Samuel anointed both Saul and David. The book recounts David's accession to the kingship at Hebron and later at Jerusalem after its conquest (2 Sam. 5:6–12). The great Davidic covenant (7:8–17) is set forth and forms a basis of all subsequent kingdom truth.

Authorship. The book is anonymous. In all probability the author was a prophet in the monarchial period who employed earlier sources left by Samuel, Gad, Nathan (1 Chron. 29:29), and possibly others. This is suggested by the fact that the work possesses unity as well as plan and purpose and is thus to be regarded as the production of a single author or compiler. The date of its composition is likely to be placed not later than David's reign. That the book ends just previous to David's death suggests that it was written at that period. The reference to Judah and Israel (1 Sam. 27:6) need not rule out this date since such a distinction prevailed as early as the Davidic period before the consolidation of the monarchy (18:6; 2 Sam. 2:10; 24:1).

Composition and Date. Otto Eissfeldt (Einleitung, pp. 306–7; Die Komposition der Samuelisbeucher [1931]) disconnects the text into three sources—L, J, and E—which are regarded as continuations of the sources of the Heptateuch. This theory has not been widely received. It is commonly held that the books of Samuel consist of at least two principal sources, J, the earlier, about the tenth century B.C., and E, the latter, about the eighth century B.C. (R. Pfeiffer, Intr., pp. 341–65). The relationship of these documents is claimed to be similar to J and E in the Pentateuch and the Judges, if not a continuation of these documents, as K. Budde maintained. It is claimed that in the seventh century these two sources were united and allegedly contain contradictions, confections, differences in style, etc. Later a deuteronomic editor of the sixth century deleted certain portions contrary to his religious convictions, but these were supposedly subsequently restored. The critical theory is to be rejected because it is at variance with the unity of the books, making out the compiler or editor to be a mere blunderer. It is unsound to insist that differences of viewpoint are evidences of variety of authorship. The critical argument that style and diction indicate composite authorship is weak and inconclusive. SANBAL'LAT (san-bal'at; cf. Akkad. Sin; The moon god; "has given life"). He is called "Sanballat the Horonite" (Neh. 2:10, 19; 13:28). This scarcely means that he was from Horonaim in Moab but more likely that he was a resident of Beth-horon in Samaria. All that we know of him from Scripture is that he had apparently some civil or military command in Samaria, in the service of Artaxerxes (4:1–2), and that, from the moment of Nehemiah's arrival in Judea, he set himself to oppose every measure for the welfare of Jerusalem and was a constant adversary to the Tirshatha, the official title of the Persian governor of Judah, borne by Nehemiah (8:9; 10:1). His companions in this hostility were Tobiah the Ammonite and Geshem the Arab (2:19; 4:7), 445 B.C. The only other incident in his life is his alliance with the high priest's family by the marriage of his daughter with one of the grandsons of Eliashib (13:28), which, by the similar connection formed by Tobiah the Ammonite (13:4), appears to have been part of a settled policy concerted between Eliashib and the Samaritan faction. The expulsion from the priesthood of the guilty son of Joiada by Nehemiah must have still further widened the breach between him and Sanballat and between the two parties in the Jewish state. Here, however, the scriptural narrative ends—owing, probably, to Nehemiah's return to Persia—and with it likewise our knowledge of Sanballat.

SANCTIFICATION (Gk. hagiasmos, "separation, a setting apart"). The Heb. term qōdesh, rendered "sanctify," has a corresponding meaning. The dominant idea of sanctification, therefore, is separation from the secular and sinful and setting apart for a sacred purpose. As the holiness of God means His separation from all evil (see Holiness of God), so sanctification, in the various Scripture applications of the term, has a kindred lofty significance.

In the OT economy, things, places, and times, as well as persons, were sanctified, i.e., consecrated to holy purposes (see Gen. 2:3; Ex. 13:2; 40:10–13; etc.). Connected with this were the Mosaic rites of purification (see, e.g., Num. 6:11; Lev. 22:16, 32; Heb. 9:13). These rites, however, when applied to persons were efficacious only in a ceremonial and legal sense and did not extend to the purifying of the moral and spiritual nature. They were symbolical and thus were intended not only to remind the Jew of the necessity of spiritual cleansing but also of the gracious purpose of God to actually accomplish the work. So David prayed not only, "Purify me with hyssop, and I shall be clean," but also, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a steadfast spirit within me" (Ps. 51:7–10).

Although in the OT, as well as in the NT, men are sometimes called upon to sanctify themselves, i.e., to consecrate themselves truly to God (see Ex. 19:22; Lev. 11:44; 20:7–8; 1 Pet. 3:15), the thought everywhere prevails that inward cleansing is the work of God. See Holy Spirit.

SANCTIFICATION, ENTIRE. Is it the privilege of believers to be wholly sanctified in this life? The doctrine of the Roman Catholic church is that baptism, rightly administered, washes away not only guilt but also depravity of every kind; and thus, in its own peculiar way, that church answers the question in the affirmative (see Baptism). Among Protestant theologians there is wide difference of belief; and there are undoubtedly greater differences of statement, because of confusion in the use of terms. We have space only to indicate in a most general way the two leading views and to add a few suggestions for guidance.

The Calvinistic View. To the Calvinists, sanctification is imperfect in this life. Corruption of nature remains even in the regenerate so that during this life no man is able to live without sin. For formal expression of this doctrine the reader is referred to the Westminster Confession and to the Larger Catechism of the Presbyterian church.

The Methodist View. The Methodists, on the other hand, despite various shades of opinion and form of statement, see entire sanctification in a true and scriptural sense as being attainable in this life; and accordingly, Christians may arrive at a state of spiritual purity in which they are able to remain free from condemnation. This view is in agreement with the Calvinistic in regarding sanctification as distinct from regeneration (see Regeneration). But it is in strongest contrast thereto in regarding the work of spiritual purification as one that may be wrought instantaneously and in the present life. It should be said that the essential features of Methodist doctrine are held by many other denominations.

Summary of New Testament Statement. The NT presents the doctrine of sanctification in three aspects: positional, experiential, and ultimate. Positional sanctification is the possession of everyone “in Christ.” The great doctrinal epistles of the NT first present the marvels of saving grace manifested in the believer’s position and then close with an appeal for life consonant with this divinely wrought position (Rom. 12:1; Eph. 4:1; Col. 3:1–2). Positional sanctification is just as complete for the weakest and youngest believer as it is for the strongest and oldest. It depends only upon one’s union with and position “in Christ.” All believers are “saints” and are “sanctified” (Acts 20:32; 1 Cor. 1:2; 6:11; Heb. 10:10, 14; Jude 3). First Corinthians presents proof that imperfect believers are nevertheless positionally sanctified and therefore “saints.” The Corinthian Christians were carnal in life (1 Cor. 5:1–2; 6:1–8), but they are twice said to have been “sanctified” (1:2 and 6:11). Thus this positional aspect of sanctification is absolutely essential if the doctrine as a whole is to be clearly understood.

Experiential. The basis of experiential sanctification, or actual holiness of life, is positional sanctification, or what one is in Christ. Only those “in Christ,” that is, regenerate and thus concomitantly sanctified, are candidates for experiential sanctifications. This phase of sanctification is effected by faith that reckons upon one’s position in Christ (Rom. 6:1–10). One’s position is true whether or not he reckons or counts it as true. But it becomes experientially real only in proportion as one reckons it to be true (6:11).

Ultimate. This is glorification or complete conformity to Christ at His coming (1 John 3:1–3; Rom. 8:29–30; Jude 24, 25). A.E.MCC.; M.F.U.

SANCTUARY. A sacred place of resort and worship. Israel’s early sanctuary was at Shiloh, which was the center of the nation’s religious institutions after the conquest. About this central shrine the twelve tribes were grouped. The close parallel between this institution and the amphictyonies that were found in other Mediterranean lands a few centuries later has been set forth by Martin Noth in Das System der Zwölf Stämme Israels (1930), pp. 39–60. Classical writers report numerous amphictyonies of which a number are explicitly stated to have had twelve tribes. The best known is the famous Delphic amphictyony traceable back at least to the eighth century B.C. Characteristic of these systems was a central sanctuary that formed a bond by which the political structure was cemented together. The Danish excavations at Shiloh have revealed evidences of the destruction of Israel’s sanctuary by the Philistines c. 1050 B.C. Shiloh was recognized by the Israelites as their inter-tribal focus from about 1375 B.C. (cf. Judg. 21:19; 1 Sam. 1:3, 7, 9; etc.). Other ancient Near Eastern countries had their great central sanctuary to which pilgrimages were made. Nineveh in Assyria and Nippur in Babylonia were such places of religious resort during the third quarter of the second millennium. The temple of Sin in Harran and Belit-ekalli in Qatna were popular in the eighteenth century B.C., as shown by the Mari Tablets. The temple of Baaltis in Byblos received votive offerings from Egypt for many centuries. Other shrines in early Israel were at Gibeon, Bethel, Gilgal, Dan, and presumably at Beersheba. Possibly every Israelite town had at least one place where sacrifice might conveniently be offered to the Lord. Such a meeting place was called a bamah, a Canaanite word meaning “back” or “ridge.” The Conway High Place at Petra, excavated by W. F. Albright in 1934, belongs to the circular processional type and is to be compared to pre-Islamic sanctuaries. The Great High Place of Petra, discovered by George L. Robinson in 1900, and numerous other sites were clearly intended for sacrificial feasts in the open air. Several of them possess rock-cut dining rooms with couches. Rustic bamoth were customarily built on hills or under trees, ostensibly for the purpose of catching the cool W wind and obtaining shelter from the sun. At these places of religious resort were held festal gatherings on new moons, Sabbaths, and other occasions. Sacrifices of sheep, goats, and cattle were made as well as offerings of grain, wine, oil, flax, wood, figs, and raisin cakes. Gifts were dispensed to the priest and Levites who had charge of the place, or were consumed in picnic fashion by the worshipers (cf. W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel [1942], pp. 102–7). When the Temple was constructed at Jerusalem by Solomon it became the religious mecca of all the Israelites. M.F.U.

SAND (Heb. hōl, “whirling”). Small loose bits of disintegrating rocks, found abundantly along the southern shores of the Mediterranean and conspicuous in the shifting dunes of the wilderness and desert regions of Arabia, Egypt, and Palestine.

Figurative. The sand of the seashore is often used to express a great multitude; thus God promised Abraham and Jacob to multiply their posterity as the stars of heaven and the sand of the sea (Gen. 22:17; 32:12). Job (Job 6:3) compares the weight of his misfortunes to that of the sand of the sea; and Solomon says (Prov. 27:3), “A stone is heavy and the sand weighty; but the provocation of a fool is heavier than both of them.” The omnipotence of God is expressed by His placing the sand as the boundary of the sea (Jer. 5:22). The shifting sand is used as symbolic of instability (Matt. 7:26).

SANDAL (Gk. sandalion, representing the Heb. na'al). The sandal, apparently the article used by the Hebrews for protecting the feet, consisted simply of a sole attached to the foot by thongs. The Gk. hupodēma properly applies to the sandal exclusively, as it means what is bound under the foot.

Material. We learn from the Talmudists that the materials employed in the construction of the sole were either leather, felt, cloth, or wood, and that it was occasionally shod with iron. In Egypt various fibrous substances, such as palm leaves and papyrus stalks, were used in addition to leather, whereas in Assyria wood or leather were employed. In Egypt the sandals were usually turned up at the toe like our skates, though other forms, rounded and pointed, are also exhibited. Royal Egyptian sandals from the Eighteenth Dynasty (the New Kingdom) exist (from about 1546 to 1319 B.C.). In Assyria the heel and the side of the foot were encased, and sometimes the sandal consisted of little less than this. Sandals were worn by all classes of society in Palestine, even by the very poor (Amos 8:6), and both the sandal and the thong were so cheap and common that they passed into a proverb for the most insignificant thing (Gen. 14:23; Eccles. 46:19).

Use. They were not, however, worn at all periods; they were dispensed with indoors and were only put on by persons about to undertake some business away from their homes, such as a military expedition (Isa. 5:27; Eph. 6:15) or a journey (Ex. 12:11; Josh. 9:5, 13; Acts 12:8). On such occasions persons carried an extra pair. During mealtimes the feet were undoubtedly uncovered, as implied in Luke 7:38; John 13:5–6.

Figurative. It was a mark of reverence to take off the shoes in approaching a place or person of eminent sanctity (Ex. 3:5; Josh. 5:15). In Ruth 4:7 (cf. Deut. 25:9–10) it is recorded: “Now this was the custom in former times in Israel concerning the redemption and the exchange of land to confirm any matter: a man removed his sandal and gave it to another; and this was the manner of attestation in Israel.” From the expression “former” and from the description of the custom we infer that it had largely gone out of use when the book was written. The custom itself, which existed among the Indians and ancient Germans, arose from the fact that fixed property was taken possession of by treading upon the soil; and hence taking off the shoe and handing it to another was a symbol of the transfer of possession of right of ownership. From this thought we have the expression “Over Edom I shall throw My shoe” (Pss. 60:8; 108:9), i.e., claim it as My own.

It was also an indication of violent emotion or of mourning if a person appeared barefoot in public (2 Sam. 15:30; Isa. 20:2; Song of Sol. 7:1; Ezek. 24:17, 23). To carry or to unloose a person’s sandal was a menial office betokening great inferiority on the part of the person performing it (Matt. 3:11; Mark 1:7; John 1:27; Acts 13:25). A sandal thong (or lace), or even sandals themselves (Gen. 14:23; Amos 2:6; 8:6) stand for anything of little value; this is easily understood when one sees a pair of sandals shaped in a few minutes out of a piece of hide, and which would be expensive at a few cents. Sandals with blood on them were figurative of being engaged in war (1 Kings 2:5).

SAN HEDRIN (san-hē’drin; Aram. form of Gk. sunedrion, a “council, assembly session”).

History. The rise of this great council of the Hebrews took place in the time of Greek supremacy, though the rabbis endeavor to trace its origin to the college of seventy elders named by Moses. The first occasion on which it is mentioned, and that under the designation of gerousia (Gk., the “eldership”), is in the time of Antiochus the Great, 223–187 B.C. From its designation, gerousia, it is evident that it was an aristocratic body, with the hereditary high priest at its head. It continued to exist and exercise its functions under the Asmonaean princes and high priests (2 Macc. 1:10; 4:44; 11:27). When the Roman order of affairs was introduced by Pompey the high priest still retained the position of “governor of the nation” (Josephus Ant. 20.10.1), thus making it likely that the gerousia still remained. Gabinius, 57–55 B.C., divided the whole Jewish territory into five “conventions” (Josephus Wars 1.8.5), or “councils” (Josephus Ant. 14.5.4). As things now stood the council of Jerusalem no longer exercised sole jurisdiction. After ten years Caesar reappointed Hyrcanus II to his former position of ethnarch, and the jurisdiction of the council of Jerusalem once more extended to Galilee (Josephus Ant. 14.8.3–5). Here for the first time the council of Jerusalem was designated by the term Sanhedrin. Herod the Great inaugurated his reign by ordering the whole of the Sanhedrin to be put to death (Josephus Ant. 14.9.4) and evidently formed a Sanhedrin of those who were disposed to be tractable. After Herod’s death Archelaus obtained only a portion of his father’s kingdom—Judea and Samaria—and in consequence the jurisdiction was probably restricted to Judea proper. Under the procurators the internal government of the country was to a greater extent in the hands of the Sanhedrin than during the reigns of Herod and Archelaus. In the time of Christ and the apostles the Sanhedrin is frequently mentioned as being the supreme Jewish court of justice (see marg., Matt. 5:22; 26:59; Mark 14:55; 15:1; Luke 22:66; Acts 4:15, 21–23; 6:12–15; 22:30; 23:1, 6; 24:20).

Sometimes the terms presbuterion (Luke 22:66; Acts 22:5) and gerousia (Acts 5:21) are substituted for Sanhedrin. The Sanhedrin was undoubtedly abolished, so far as its existing form was concerned, after the destruction of Jerusalem, A.D. 70.

Composition. This great council was formed (Matt. 26:3, 57, 59; Mark 14:53; 15:1; Luke 22:66; Acts 4:5–6; 5:21; 22:30) of high priests (i.e., the acting high priest, those who had been high priests, and members of the privileged families from which the high priests were taken), elders (i.e., tribal and family heads of the people and priesthood), and scribes (i.e., legal assessors), Pharisees, and Sadducees alike (cf. Acts 4:1, 5–6; 5:17, 34). According to the Mishna the number of members was seventy, with a president, a vice president, and servants of the court (John 18:22; Mark 14:65; etc.). Josephus and the NT state that the acting high priest, as such, was always head and president. Wherever names are mentioned we find that it is the high priest for the time being that officiates as president—Caiaphas in the time of Christ (Matt. 26:3, 57) and Ananias in the time of Paul (Acts 23:2; 24:1). It is believed that membership was for life and that new members were appointed either by the existing members or by the supreme political authorities. We may well assume that the one requirement of legal Judaism, that none but Israelites of pure blood should be eligible for the office of judge in a criminal court, would also be insisted upon in the case of the supreme Sanhedrin. New members were admitted through the ceremony of laying on of hands.

Jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the Sanhedrin was restricted in the time of Christ to the eleven districts of Judea proper; hence it had no judicial authority over Jesus, so long as He remained in Galilee, but only when He entered Judea. “In a certain sense, no doubt, the Sanhedrin exercised such jurisdiction over every Jewish community in the world, and in that sense over Galilee as well. Its orders were regarded as binding throughout the entire dominion of orthodox Judaism. It had power to issue warrants to the congregations (synagogues) in Damascus for the apprehension of Christians in that quarter (Acts 9:2; 22:5; 26:12). At the same time, however, the extent to which the Jewish communities were willing to yield obedience to the orders of the Sanhedrin always depended upon how far they were favorably disposed toward it. It was only within the limits of Judea proper that it exercised any direct authority.” It would not be proper to say that the Sanhedrin was the spiritual or theological in contradistinction to the civil judicatories of the Romans. It was rather that supreme native court that here, as almost everywhere else, Rome continued to allow, only imposing certain restrictions with regard to competency. “To this tribunal then belonged all those judicial matters and all those measures of an administrative character which either could not be competently dealt with by inferior local courts, or which the Roman procurator had not specially reserved for himself. The Sanhedrin was, above all, the final court of appeal for questions connected with the Mosaic law, but not in the sense that it was open to anyone to appeal to it against the decision of the inferior courts but rather in so far as it was called upon to intervene in every case in which the lower courts could not agree as to their judgment. And when once it had given a decision in any case the judges of the local court were, on pain of death, bound to acquiesce in it” (Schürer, History of the Jewish People, div. 2, 1:185ff.). From the NT, we learn that Jesus appeared before the Sanhedrin on a charge of blasphemy (Matt. 26:65; John 19:7). Peter and John were charged with being false prophets and deceivers of the people (Acts 4–5), Stephen with being a blasphemer (6:9–12), and Paul with being guilty of transgressing the Mosaic law (chap. 23). The Sanhedrin enjoyed a considerable amount of criminal jurisdiction. It had the right of ordering arrests to be made by its own officers (Matt. 26:47; Mark 14:43; Acts 4:3; 5:17–18) and of finally disposing of cases that did not involve the sentence of death (4:5–23; 5:21–40). When it pronounced sentence of death it was required to be ratified by the procurator (John 18:31). Such instances as the stoning of Stephen must be regarded as an excess of jurisdiction or an act of irregular mob justice. Thus the Sanhedrin had a tolerably extensive jurisdiction, the serious restriction being that the Roman authorities could at any time take the initiative and proceed independently, as, for example, when Paul was arrested. Further, the procurator, or even the tribune of the cohorts stationed at Jerusalem, might call the Sanhedrin together for the purpose of submitting to it any matter requiring investigation from the standpoint of Jewish law (Acts 22:30; cf. 23:15, 20, 28).

Time and Place of Meeting. The local courts usually sat on the second and fifth days of the week (Monday and Thursday); but whether this was the practice of the Sanhedrin we have no means of knowing. There were no courts held on festival (which see) days, much less on the Sabbath. The place in which the Sanhedrin usually met was situated, according to Josephus (Wars 5.4.2), close to the so-called Xystos (Xistus), on its E side toward the Temple mount. In cases that did not admit of delay it assembled in the high priest's house (Matt. 26:3, 57; Mark 14:53).

Judicial Procedures. According to the Mishna, the members sat in a semi-circle that they might be able to see one another. In front stood the two clerks of the court, one on the right hand and the other on the left, whose duty it was to record the votes of those who were in favor of acquittal on the one hand and of those who were in favor of condemnation on the other. There also sat in front of them three rows of disciples of the learned men, each of whom had a special seat. The prisoner was required to appear in a humble attitude, dressed in mourning. The following order was observed in capital cases: arguments first in favor of acquittal, then those in favor of conviction; if anyone had spoken in favor of the accused he could not afterward say anything unfavorable, though the converse was allowed; student disciples might speak in favor but not against the accused, although, if the case did not involve a capital sentence, they could speak for or against the accused; sentence of acquittal might be pronounced on the day of trial, but one of condemnation not until the day following. The voting, each member standing, began with the youngest members of the court, although on some occasions it began with the most distinguished member. For acquittal a simple majority was sufficient; for condemnation a majority of two was required. If twelve of the twenty-three judges necessary to form a quorum voted for acquittal and eleven for conviction the prisoner was discharged; but if twelve were for conviction and eleven for acquittal, then the number of the judges had to be increased by adding two, which was repeated if necessary until either an acquittal was secured or the majority requisite for a conviction was obtained. But, of course, they had to restrict themselves to the maximum number of seventy-one (Keil, Arch., 1:350; Schürer, div. 2, 1:163).

SANSAN'NAH (san-san'a; "palm branch"). A city in Judah (Josh. 15:31), identified with Khirbet esh-Shamsāniyāt about ten miles NE of Beersheba.

SAPH (saf; “a threshold or dish”). A Philistine giant, of the race of Raphah (see marg.) slain by Sibbecai the Hushathite (2 Sam. 21:18; 1 Chron. 20:4).

SAPHIR. See Shaphir.

SAPPHI'RA (sa-fi'ra; Gk. from Aram., “beautiful”). The wife of Ananias and accomplice in the sin for which he died. About three hours after the death of her husband she entered the place, unconscious of what had happened. Questioned by Peter as to the price obtained for the land they had sold, she repeated the lie of her husband and exposed herself to the fate of Ananias. Peter replied to her: “Why is it that you have agreed together to put the Spirit of the Lord to the test? Behold, the feet of those who have buried your husband are at the door, and they shall carry you out as well.” On hearing these words she fell dead (Acts 5:1–2, 7–10).

The offense of Ananias and Sapphira, according to the average standard of human morality, was not a heinous one. They had devoted a large sum to charity; they had defrauded no one but had simply retained their own and then denied the fact. The following considerations are offered in explanation by Whedon (Com., ad loc.): “1. The divine Spirit being present with unparalleled power in the Church, the sin, as Peter says (vers. 3, 4) is directly against him. 2. The reason for this selection was to present and record at this beginning of the Christian Church a representative and memorial instance of the just doom of the hypocrite. This couple were deliberate, positive, conceited, and intentionally permanent hypocrites. Their death was God’s declaration to all future ages of the true deserts of all deliberate hypocrites in the Church of Christ.” 3. In addition it may be added that this was evidently a “sin leading to death” (i.e. “physical” death), cf. 1 John 5:16. Similar cases occur in 1 Cor. 5:1–5; 11:30. The deaths of Samson and Saul give typical illustrations of a believer’s “sin leading to [physical] death” in the OT.

SA'RA, SA'RAH (sā'ra; “a princess”; “Sara,” KJV, Heb. 11:11). The wife of the patriarch Abraham, although in the KJV only of Num. 26:46 it refers to a daughter of Asher, known in the NASB and NIV as Serah (which see). The original name of Abraham’s wife Sarah was Sarai (which see) and was changed at the same time that Abram’s name was changed to Abraham, on the establishment of the covenant of circumcision. The Heb. name of Sarah is śārâ (“princess”). Of her birth and parentage we have no certain account in Scripture. In Gen. 20:12 Abraham speaks of her as “my sister, the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother,” which would make her his half sister; but the statement of Abraham is held by many to mean no more than that Haran, her father, was his half brother, for the colloquial usage of the Hebrews in this matter makes it easy to understand that he might call a niece a sister. In that case Abraham was really her uncle as well as husband.

As his wife, the history of Sarah is substantially that of Abraham. She came with him from Ur to Haran (Gen. 11:31), from Haran to Canaan (12:5), and accompanied him in all his wanderings.

Taken by Pharaoh. When Abraham went down into Egypt apparently under the powerful and splendid Twelfth Dynasty of the Middle Kingdom (c. 2000–1775), he arranged with Sarah that she should announce herself as his sister, fearing for his life on account of her beauty. Although she was then sixty-five, she was so beautiful to the Egyptians that she was taken by Pharaoh; but, plagued by Jehovah, he returned her to Abraham with a reproof for his untruthfulness (12:10–20).

Hagar. Having no children of her own, Sarah gave to Abraham her Egyptian handmaid, Hagar, who became the mother of Ishmael (chap. 16). Later she demanded that Hagar and Ishmael should be cast out from all rivalry with herself and Isaac (21:9–10), a demand symbolically applied (Gal. 4:22–31) to the displacement of the Old Covenant by the New.

Abimelech. After the destruction of Sodom, Abraham moved to the south country and remained for some time in Gerar. Here Abimelech, the Philistine king, took Sarah, whom Abraham had again announced to be his sister, into his harem, probably to ally himself with Abraham, the rich nomad prince. Warned by God in a dream, Abimelech restored Sarah to her husband (Gen. 20).

Birth of Isaac. Jehovah fulfilled His promise to Sarah, and at the appointed time she gave birth to Isaac (21:1–3). This was recognized at the time, and later by Paul (Rom. 4:19), as a miracle, since both Sarah and Abraham were advanced in years.

Death. Thirty-seven years after the birth of Isaac, and when she had reached the age of 127, Sarah died at Hebron and was buried in the cave of Machpelah (Gen. 23:1–3), c. 1980 B.C. Isaiah is the only prophet who names Sarah (51:2). Paul alludes to her hope of becoming a mother (Rom. 4:19) and afterward cites the promise that she received (9:9), and Peter eulogizes her submission to her husband (1 Pet. 3:6).

SA'RAI (sa'ri; perhaps "contentious"). The original name of Sarah, always used in the history from Gen. 11:29 to 17:15.

SA'RAPH (sa'raf; "burning or serpent"). One of the descendants of Shelah, the son of Judah (1 Chron. 4:22), who seems to have lived about the time of the entrance of Israel into Canaan, as he is said to have had dominion in Moab (about 1400 B.C.).

SARDINE, SARDIUS. See Mineral Kingdom: Sardine, or Sardinus.

SAR'DIS (sar'dis). A city of western Asia Minor about fifty miles E of Smyrna, which was the fifth named of the seven churches addressed by John (Rev. 1:11; 3:1, 4). This important city was founded probably as early as the beginning of the Iron Age and located on important commercial routes running E and W through the rich kingdom of Lydia, of which it was the capital. It was also made wealthy by textile manufacturing and jewelry making. Here are said to have been minted the first coins under the opulent Croesus. Cyrus the Great overcame the city in 546 B.C. Antiochus the Great did the same in 218 B.C. Wealthy Sardis citizens took up with mystery cults, notably with that of Cybele.

As a result of extensive archaeological investigation of Sardis the site is gradually becoming better known. Howard C. Butler of Princeton worked there on behalf of the American Society for the Excavation of Sardis from 1910 to 1914. His efforts were chiefly centered on the great temple of Artemis (300 by 160 feet) to the W of the acropolis, and he opened more than one thousand graves in the so-called "Cemetery Hill." In 1958 the Fogg Art Museum of Harvard, Cornell University, and the American Schools of Oriental Research began a joint excavation at Sardis. George M. A. Hanfmann of Harvard was the director for many years. Along the Pactolas River a Roman villa and bath, two Byzantine churches, and the gold-smelting establishment of King Croesus have been found. Along the Izmir-Ankara highway finds have been extensive. On the N side of the road stood more than thirty Byzantine shops. Behind the shops a synagogue was discovered, three times larger than any synagogue preserved in Palestine. Dating to the first half of the third century, it is four hundred feet long and sixty feet wide. This structure has been partially restored. North of the synagogue lay a gymnasium complex consisting of a large court for athletic exercise and a bath establishment. The monumental entrance gate, two stories high, has now been completely restored. H.F.V.

SAR'GON (sar'gon). The name of an Assyrian king mentioned only once in the Bible (Isa. 20:1), and then merely to give the date to an important prophecy of Isaiah. The Assyrian form of the name is Sharrukin. Sargon was the successor of Shalmaneser V (see Shalmaneser) and the father of Sennacherib (see Sennacherib), and he ruled in Assyria 722–705 B.C. Abundant historical materials concerning his reign have come down to us. Remains of the walls that he built, colossal carved bulls covered with inscriptions, tools, palace utensils, and beautifully inscribed prisms have all been found in different parts of Assyria, and all bear their witness to his glory and success.

Lineage. Sargon began to reign in Assyria in the same month in which Shalmaneser V died. This would seem to indicate that there was no doubt or difficulty about the succession. Yet it is clear that he was not the son of Shalmaneser, or apparently any relative of his predecessor. Indeed, he never alludes in any of his known inscriptions to his ancestors. It is therefore, with justice, believed that he was not of royal origin at all. In the reign of his grandson Esarhaddon a genealogical table was made out, by which Sargon's ancestry was traced back to Bel-bani, an early ruler in Assyria. This was evidently only an attempt to gain the honor of noble lineage. Whatever his origin—and it was probably humble, since nothing is said of it—Sargon seems to have been accepted as king without question. He may, therefore, have been adopted by Shalmaneser and designated as his successor.

Exploits. Sargon was one of the greatest soldiers ever produced in Assyria, and his coming upon the scene was at the very time when he was sorely needed by a weakened empire. The reign of Shalmaneser had been brief. His death left the state in confusion. Babylonia was overrun by the Chaldeans and under the leadership of Merodach-baladan was in open revolt. There was a siege in progress at Samaria at the end of Shalmaneser's reign, and the king of Egypt was threatening and ill-tempered. The northern boundary of Assyria was dangerously beset by the tribes of Armenia, and northern Syria again had to be reduced to subjection. With a weak man upon the throne of Assyria, all would have been lost that Tiglath-pileser III had gained and perhaps the empire's very existence would have been in jeopardy. The occasion was great, and Sargon was equal to it.

The first event in the reign of Sargon, according to his own inscription, was the fall of Samaria. He speaks of it in these words: "The city Samaria I besieged, and twenty-seven thousand two hundred and ninety people, inhabitants of it, I took away captive. Fifty chariots in it I seized, but the rest I allowed to retain their possessions. I appointed my governor over them, and the tribute of the late king I imposed upon them." We do not know whether Sargon was actually present at Samaria or not. The city may have been taken by one of his generals, though he says that he took it. We know from other clear instances that the Assyrian kings were not careful to distinguish their own from the successes of their generals in the field. Whether he or his representative was the real conqueror, Sargon was proud of the achievement. In his Cylinder Inscription he calls himself "subjugator of the broad land of Beth-Omri," and again elsewhere "the conqueror of the city of Samaria and the whole land of Beth-Omri." In his treatment of Israel Sargon followed the plans first matured by Tiglath-pileser; he "carried Israel away into exile to Assyria, and settled them in Halah and Habor, on the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes” (2 Kings 17:6), and to fill the place thus vacated he brought men from Babylon, Cuthah, Avva, Hamath, and Sephar-vaim, placing them in the cities of Samaria instead of Israel (17:24). This colonization as begun by Tiglath-pileser and extended by Sargon was handed on from people to people till it found its fullest extension in the Roman Empire.

After the downfall of Samaria Sargon was speedily confronted by another confederation. A leader in Hamath, Ilu-bi'di by name, had formed a coalition to throw off the Assyrian supremacy. He was aided by several provinces nearby, among them Arpad and Damascus, and was supported by Hanno, king of Gaza. Sargon made haste from Assyria in order to attack Ilu-bi'di before his allies could join him. He met Ilu-bi'di at Qarqar (or Karkar) and completely overcame him. He then moved southward and found that Hanno was supported by Seveh of Egypt. A battle was fought at Rapichi (modern Refah), and again Sargon was victorious. Seveh and his troops fled in confusion to Egypt, and Hanno was taken prisoner and carried off to Assyria. These victories brought enforced peace in Palestine, and Sargon was free to undertake conquest and pacification elsewhere. In 719 he was carrying on war in the N as far as Lake Urmiah; in the next year he was collecting tribute in Cappadocia. In the year 718 Sargon crossed the Euphrates and attacked Carchemish. The ancient Hittite Empire had fallen about 1200 B.C., but several Hittite city-states continued to maintain themselves in Syria. Carchemish and its provinces alone remained. They were now reduced and the territory completely absorbed into Assyria. The following years were full of abundant labors in the putting down of insurrections in Armenia, Que (eastern Cilicia), and in Arabia, and another attack upon an Egyptian king is recorded. In every case peace was achieved for a season by force, but new disturbances were always breaking forth elsewhere.

In 711 difficulties again attracted Sargon's attention in Syria. Azuri, king of Ashdod, thought that the time was ripe for refusing to pay the Assyrians tribute. Sargon hastily dispatched a Tartan against him (Isa. 20:1), who removed Azuri from the throne and put in his place his brother Achimit, who was an Assyrian sympathizer. The people of Ashdod would not endure a man of such sentiments and deposed him by force. Suddenly Sargon appeared, took Ashdod and Gath, which had joined in the rebellion, carried away the chief inhabitants to Assyria, and filled their places with colonists from the E. This ended the troubles for the present, and Sargon could now turn his attention to Babylonia. The state of this land might well cause alarm. The whole country was in open revolt, under the leadership of Merodach-baladan, who had formed also a confederacy with Elam (see Merodach-baladan). Sargon realized that this would be a severe struggle. His plans were carefully laid. He attacked the confederate forces separately, won victories, and soon was in possession of Babylon. In 709 he was again acknowledged as king in Babylon, and the rebellion that had begun with the beginning of his reign was over. The years 709–707 were brilliant indeed. Tribute was sent to him from the island of Dilmun in the Persian Gulf and from Cyprus in the far-away Mediterranean. He was at the zenith of his power, and many lands did him homage.

Last Years. For the last few years of his reign we have no Assyrian documents. Only brief hints show that his armies were engaged till the very last in subduing insurrections here and there over his vast empire. It was indeed impossible that peoples so widely separated and so diverse in all their thoughts and emotions should be speedily welded into a unified and symmetrical empire. Conquests might be made quickly; concourse of feeling must be of slow growth. Sargon died in 705. The broken fragments of the Eponym list seem to say that he was murdered, but they are too badly mutilated to make us perfectly sure. So ended the career of the greatest conqueror who ever ruled in Assyria. He was not so great a pacificator as was Esarhaddon, neither were his works of peace so magnificent as those of Ashurbanipal, but in war he surpassed all who preceded or followed him upon that throne.

Royal City. But he was not only a warrior; he has left at least one magnificent evidence of his skill in the arts of peace. When he began his reign the Assyrian capital was Calah. He determined to erect a new city and place within it a palace that should surpass in magnificence all that had preceded it. The site selected was at the foot of Mt. Musri, N of Nineveh. The city built there he named after himself, Dur-Sharrukin (Sargonsburg), or Khorsabad, and the palace within its square of walls was the first Assyrian ruin explored by moderns. It was first excavated in the years 1842–45 by Botta and was surprising for its magnificence even in ruins. The ruins were further excavated by Victor Place (1851–55) and by Edward Chiera and Henri Frankfort for the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago (1929–35). Sargon also began the collection of thousands of cuneiform tablets continued by his great grandson Ashurbanipal. These were recovered in the famous library at Nineveh. But Sargon did not long enjoy his own magnificence. The man of war was not to rest in the results of peace.

SA'RID (sa'rid; "survivor"). A place at the center, probably, of the southern boundary of Zebulun (Josh. 19:10), from which the line is traced in a westerly direction (v. 11) and in an easterly direction (v. 12). It is now identified with Tell Shadua, SW of Nazareth and N of the Plain of Esdraelon.

SA'TAN (sā'tan; Heb. śāṭān, Gk. Satanas, an "adversary, opponent"). The chief of fallen spirits.

Scripture Names and Titles. Satan is also called the devil, the dragon, the evil one, the angel of the abyss, the ruler of this world, the prince of the power of the air, the god of this world, Apollyon, Abaddon, Belial, and Beelzebub. But Satan and the devil are the names most frequently given. The term Satan is used in its generic sense in 1 Kings 11:14, "The Lord raised up an adversary [śāṭān] to Solomon, Hadad the Edomite." It is used in the same sense in 1 Kings 11:23; 1 Sam. 29:4; Num. 22:22 (cf. 2 Sam. 19:22; 1 Kings 5:4; 11:25; Ps. 109:6).

Scripture Doctrine. Satan is mentioned first in the book of Job (1:6–12; 2:1–7). He mixes with the sons of God (angels), among whom he no longer has any rightful place; he arbitrarily roams about and seeks his own but is still used as a servant by God, on whom he remains dependent. His independent activity in this passage is mainly that of the spy of evil, of the accuser of man to God, especially the accuser of the pious, and he maintains the assertion that even their fear of God stems from personal interest. Job is delivered into the hands of Satan for testing. Satan's intention was to lead Job into apostasy and ruin; but the conduct of Job proves that disinterested fear of God may be a truth. The luster of a fidelity and love that in the loss of all external goods regards God as the highest good is revealed by Job as a triumph over Satan.

Satan is mentioned as a personality in Zech. 3:1, where after the Exile he would hinder the reinstatement of the divine worship, asserting that Israel is rejected by the just judgment of God and is not worthy of the renewal of the priesthood. But the filthy garments are stripped off the high priest, and he receives festal garments instead, with the declaration that his sins are taken away. The vision expresses that the restoration of the priesthood after the Exile is a victory of the gracious God over Satan. It also foreshadows the restoration of the nation Israel as a high-priestly nation in the future Kingdom age. Still in the OT Satan never appears openly as the enemy of God Himself. "Though he has his special purposes and aims, he is yet the servant of God for punishment or trial, the asserter or executor of the negative side of the divine justice" (Dorner, Christ. Doct., 3:79).

In the NT mention is made of a plurality of evil spirits, with Satan as their head (Matt. 8:28; 9:34; 12:26; Luke 11:18–19). They were endowed with high talents, power, and knowledge (Matt. 8:29; Mark 1:24). Although Satan is used in the NT in a figurative sense (Matt. 16:23), Jesus said the enemy is the devil (13:19, 39; Mark 4:15), and the history of the temptation is no misunderstood parable (Matt. 4:10; cf. Luke 22:31). It is declared that Satan was a murderer from the beginning (John 8:44), the enemy and falsifier of God's word (Matt. 13:19, 39); that he aroused hatred to Jesus and put treason into the heart of Judas (John 13:27, cf. 6:70; Luke 22:53); that the prince of this world is already judged by Christ, or, as Luke puts it, Satan falls "from heaven like lightning" (10:18), i.e., is inwardly and fundamentally vanquished. The whole history of the world subsequent to Christ is a struggle against the empire of Satan. Thus the Apocalypse especially depicts the history of Satan, particularly in the future as he affects the church (Rev. 2:9, 13, 24), the Jew, and the Gentiles (chaps. 4–19).

SA'TAN, SYNAGOGUE OF (Rev. 2:9, 13; 3:9). Satan's assembly; probably of Jews who persecuted the Christians, because of their misguided zeal for the law of Moses; who, professing to worship God, really served Satan.

SA'TAN, THE DEEP THINGS OF. The false teachings developed in the church of Thyatira (the Roman church of the Dark Ages), preceding the Protestant Reformation (Rev. 2:24). They included every kind of worldliness and demon-inspired corruption of the truth (1 Tim. 4:1–4). These doctrines were called by their advocates "the deep things of God," but the Lord calls them "the deep things of Satan."

SATISFACTION. See Atonement; Propitiation.

SATON. A foreign measure of capacity. See Metrology.

SATRAP (Aram. šāhashdarpanîm; "lieutenants," KJV). The title of the viceroys who governed the provinces of the Persian Empire (Ezra 8:36; Esther 3:12; 8:9; 9:3; Dan 3:2; 6:1; etc.).

SAT'YR. See Gods, False: Shaggy Goat; Animal Kingdom.

SAUL (sawl; "asked for"). In Gen. 36:37, KJV, inaccurately Saul for Shaul (which see, no. 2); in the NT, the Heb. name of the apostle Paul (which see); and in the OT, the name of the first king of Israel. This king was the son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, a powerful and wealthy chief, although the family to which he belonged was of little importance (1 Sam. 9:1, 21). The time and place of Saul's birth are not given. Since Joshua the Israelites had been under the rule of judges raised up by God to meet emergencies that arose through the defection and idolatry of the people. "In those days there was no king in Israel; everyone did what was right in his own eyes" (Judg. 21:25). The corrupt administration of Samuel's sons furnished the Hebrews an occasion for rejecting the theocracy (1 Sam. 8). This, together with an invasion of the Ammonites and a love of novelty, conspired in prompting the demand for a king. Samuel, instructed by God, granted it, but told the people the evils that would follow. They still persisted in their demand, and Saul was introduced into history. The reign of Saul may be divided into two periods: (1) The establishment and vigorous development of his regal supremacy (chaps. 8–15). (2) The decline and overthrow of his monarchy (chaps. 16–31).

Monarchy Established. The establishment of a monarchy is introduced by the negotiations of the elders of Israel with Samuel concerning the appointment of a king (1 Sam. 8).

Meeting of Saul with Samuel. Having been sent by his father after some strayed donkeys, Saul went with his servant through the mountains of Ephraim, through Shalishah and Shaalim, and after that through the land of Benjamin, without finding the donkeys. Arriving at Zuph, he determined to return home, because he was afraid that his father would worry about them (Saul and the servant). But his servant proposed that they should go and consult the man of God who was in the city near at hand, and learn from him what they should do. Samuel, having been forewarned by God, met Saul at the gate of the city, told him he was the one for whom he looked, and invited him to a feast, assuring him that the donkeys were found. He awakened the expectation of Saul by the question, “And for whom is all that is desirable in Israel? Is it not for you and for all your father’s household?” (9:20).

Saul Anointed. Early the next day they arose and, after the servant was sent on, Samuel took a flask of oil and poured it upon Saul’s head, kissed him, and said, “Has not the Lord anointed you a ruler over His inheritance?” (9:27; 10:1). To confirm the consecration Samuel gave him three signs that should occur on his journey home—first, two men at the tomb of Rachel should meet him and tell him of the finding of the donkeys and the anxiety of Saul’s father for him; second, three men would be met in the plain of Tabor, going with sacrifices to Bethel, and they would give Saul two loaves from their offerings; third, at Gibeah he would meet a company of prophets, and he himself would prophesy (10:2–13).

Chosen King. The mysterious interview with Samuel did not seem to suffice for the full acknowledgment of Saul as king. Samuel, therefore, called a national assembly at Mizpah and here instructed the tribes to choose a king by lot. The result of the lot was regarded as a divine decision, and Saul was accredited in the sight of the whole nation as the king appointed by the Lord; also he himself was more fully assured of the certainty of his own election on the part of God. Saul had hidden but was found, brought before the people, introduced to them by Samuel, and received by them with the cry “Long live the king!” He returned to his home in Gibeah, followed by a band of men “whose hearts God had touched.” But he already began to taste the bitterness of royalty, for there were some who said, “How can this one deliver us?” (10:13–27), c. 1025 B.C.

Victory over the Ammonites. Nahash, king of the Ammonites, laid siege to Jabesh in Gilead and consented to save its inhabitants only on the condition that he should put out their right eyes. They asked for seven days in which to send among their brethren for help. They dispatched messengers to Gibeah and, probably unaware of the election of Saul, stated their case to the people. Returning from the field, Saul heard the news, and the Spirit of the Lord came upon him. Deeply angered, he hewed in pieces a yoke of oxen and sent them through all Israel, calling the people to rally about him for the defense of their countrymen. Three hundred thousand came together at Bezek. The next day Saul arranged the army into three divisions, who forced their way into the camp of the foe from three different sides and routed them completely (11:1–11).

Renewal of the Monarchy. After the victory the people were so enthusiastic in favor of Saul that they demanded the death of those who had spoken against him as king. Saul refused to grant them their request, saying, “Not a man shall be put to death this day, for today the Lord has accomplished deliverance in Israel.” Samuel called the people to Gilgal, where the election of Saul was confirmed (11:12–15).

Saul's First Transgression. In the second year of his reign Saul set to work systematically to deliver Israel from their enemies. He gathered 3,000 select men (the beginning of a standing army), 2,000 being with himself and the other 1,000 with his son Jonathan. Jonathan struck the garrison of the Philistines in Geba, which became the signal of war; Saul summoned the people to assemble in Gilgal. The Philistines gathered a great army—30,000 chariots, 6,000 horsemen, and foot soldiers “like the sand which is on the seashore”—and encamped in Michmash. Saul waited seven days for Samuel’s coming, but as he did not come the people began to disperse and leave Saul, who then resolved that he would offer the sacrifices without the presence of the prophet. Scarcely was the ceremony over when Samuel arrived and asked Saul what he had done. Saul pleaded the danger he was in and his desire to secure the favor of heaven; but the prophet rebuked him and told him that his kingdom should not continue, i.e., to his descendants (13:1–14).

Saul Deserted. Saul did not even accomplish the object of his unreasonable sacrifice, namely, the prevention of the dispersion of the people. When he mustered the people still with him there were only 600 men (13:15). The Philistines overran the country, and the Israelites could not offer a successful resistance, for the Philistines possessed the secret of smelting iron (see Iron), and “no blacksmith could be found in all the land of Israel, for the Philistines said, ‘Lest the Hebrews make swords or spears’” (v. 19).

Saul's Oath. Jonathan, with a few faithful followers, made an assault upon the Philistine garrison at Michmash, which resulted in a panic in the camp, so that they killed one another. The spies of Saul at Gibeah saw the engagement, and the king called for the Ark and high priest to consult as to what he should do. The tumult in the camp of the Philistines increased, and Saul rushed to the pursuit, driving the foe down the pass of Beth-aven as far as Aijalon. But by a rash denunciation he (1) impeded his success (14:30), (2) involved the people in a violation of the law (vv. 32–33), and (3) unless prevented by the people would have put Jonathan to death for tasting innocently of food. Saul returned from the pursuit of the Philistines (14:1–46).

Other Wars. By this victory over the Philistines Saul first really secured the regal authority over the Israelites. He afterward gained victories over Moab, the Ammonites, Edom, the kings of Zobah, the Philistines again, and the Amalekites (14:47–48). Mention is now made of his family and of his commander in chief, Abner (vv. 49–50), c. 1022 B.C.

Disobedience and Rejection. Samuel, by divine commission, commanded Saul, as the king anointed by Jehovah, to destroy Amalek. He was to utterly destroy everything belonging to it, man and beast (15:3). Saul mustered the people at Telaim 200,000 foot soldiers and 10,000 men of Judah. “So Saul defeated the Amalekites, from Havilah as you go to Shur, which is east of Egypt.” But he disobeyed the divine injunction by taking alive Agag, the king, and sparing all the best of the cattle and all that was valuable, destroying only that which was “despised and worthless.” Instead of pursuing the campaign and finishing the destruction of the fugitives, he returned to Gilgal. Samuel, informed by God of the king’s disobedience, went to Saul, who told him that he had fulfilled the divine command; but the bleating of the sheep and the lowing of the oxen revealed his crime. Saul pleaded that the people wished to offer sacrifice to the Lord in Gilgal. Samuel then reminded the king of the low estate from which God had brought him, of the superiority of obedience to sacrifice, and, although Saul acknowledged his sin, repeated the sentence of rejection. As Samuel turned to depart, Saul seized the prophet’s robe with such despairing energy that it was torn, whereupon Samuel said that even so had Jehovah torn his kingdom from him and given it to another. Samuel then sent for Agag, hewed him in pieces, and departed in grief from Saul to see him no more (chap. 15).

Saul's Decline and Overthrow. Saul was not immediately deposed, but the consequences of his rejection were speedily brought to light.

David's Introduction to Saul. "The Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from the Lord terrorized him." When his attendants perceived the condition of the king, they advised him to have the evil spirit charmed away by music. They recommended David, who was still residing with his father, although he had been anointed king by Samuel. David was sent for and played upon his harp. "And Saul would be refreshed and be well, and the evil spirit would depart from him" (1 Sam. 16:14–23).

Saul's Conduct Toward David. The overthrow of the Philistine giant (Goliath) by David and his conduct when brought before Saul had won for him the love of Jonathan. The wisdom of his subsequent conduct made him acceptable to the men of war and the people and secured for him the praise of the women who celebrated the overthrow of the Philistines. This aroused the jealousy and rage of Saul, who commenced a series of murderous attempts upon the life of David, whom he seems to have regarded as a rival. He twice attempted to assassinate him with his own hand (18:10–11; 19:10); he sent him on dangerous military expeditions (18:13–17); he gave him Michal, his daughter, to be his wife, hoping that the dowry demanded (a hundred foreskins of the Philistines) would endanger David's life (18:22–27). He seems to have been willing to make any sacrifice in order to effect his purpose against David—sending men even to Samuel at Ramah, where David had fled (19:18–24); attempting, as the text (20:33) would seem to indicate, to take the life of his son Jonathan; slaying Ahimelech, the priest (22:11–19), under pretense of his being a partisan of David, and the eighty-five other priests of the house of Eli, to whom nothing could be imputed, as well as the whole population of Nob. This crime of Saul put David in possession of the sacred lot, which Abiathar, the only surviving member of Eli's priestly family, brought with him and by which he was enabled to obtain divine direction in his critical affairs (22:20, 23; 23:1–2). Having compelled David to assume the position of an outlaw, Saul then took measures to apprehend and destroy him (23:9–24). Although spared by David when in the latter's power at Engedi (chap. 24), Saul took Michal and gave her to Palti as his wife (25:44). After David had again shown his respect for the Lord's anointed by sparing the king while asleep in his camp upon the hill of Hachilah, Saul acknowledged his fault and said to David, "Blessed are you, my son David; you will both accomplish much and surely prevail." And he pursued after David no more (chap. 26).

Saul with the Medium at En-dor. Another invasion of Israel by the Philistines drove King Saul to despair, so that in utter helplessness he had recourse to ungodly means of inquiring into the future. He had "removed from the land those who were mediums and spiritists" (28:3). But now Samuel was dead and, receiving no oracle from God, Saul, in desperation, commanded his servants (v. 7) to seek for a woman who was a medium. They directed him to the woman of En-dor. Assured by Saul that no evil should happen to her, she asked, "Whom shall I bring up for you?" And he said, "Bring up Samuel for me." The woman began her conjuring arts, and when she saw Samuel, she cried aloud. "Why have you deceived me? For you are Saul." The king quieted her fear and then asked her what she had seen. From her description Saul immediately recognized Samuel. Then followed a conversation in which Saul told of his deep distress because of the Philistines. Samuel replied that Jehovah had torn the kingdom out of his hand and given it to David, because he had disobeyed Him in sparing the Amalekites. He foretold his defeat by the Philistines. Samuel added that on the next day Saul and his sons should be with him among the dead. Saul fell prostrate to the earth, faint with terror and exhaustion, for he had fasted all day and night. Urged by the woman and his servants, he partook of food and returned to his camp (28:7–25).

Death and Burial. The two armies arrayed against each other soon came to an engagement in the plain of Jezreel (29:1). The Israelites, obliged to yield, fled up the mountains of Gilboa and were pursued and slain there (31:1). The hottest pursuit was made after Saul and those who rallied around him. His three sons, Jonathan, Abinadab, and Malchishua, were slain, and he himself was mortally wounded. He begged his armor bearer to slay him, that he might not fall into the hands of the “uncircumcised.” On his refusal Saul fell upon his own sword and died. The day following, when the Philistines stripped the dead, they found Saul and his three sons and, having cut off their heads, sent them as trophies into their own land. They also fastened their bodies to the wall of Beth-shan; but the men of Jabesh-gilead came, took down the bodies, burned them, and buried them under a tree in Jabesh (chap. 31), about 1000 B.C. The news of Saul’s death was speedily brought to David at Ziklag. He mourned deeply and slew the Amalekite who claimed to have killed the king (2 Sam. 1:1–15). Besides the children already mentioned Saul left another son, Ish-bosheth, who was shortly afterward proclaimed king by Abner, and two sons, Armoni and Mephibosheth, by his concubine Rizpah (21:8).

Character. There is not in sacred history a character more melancholy to contemplate than that of Saul. He was naturally humble and modest, though of strong passions. His natural rashness was controlled neither by a powerful understanding nor a scrupulous conscience, and the obligations of duty and ties of gratitude, always felt by him too slightly, were totally disregarded when ambition, envy, and jealousy took possession of his mind. He seems never to have accepted God unconditionally and to have trusted Him implicitly but, as the names of his children would indicate, wavered between the worship of God and pagan superstition. Now he would be under the influence of prophetic inspiration, then the slave of his common pursuits; at one time pleading with the prophet to reveal to him the will of Jehovah, at another disobeying His commands; now driving out of the land all mediums, only to consult afterward the medium of En-dor. In him, also, is seen that moral contradiction that would be incredible did we not so often witness it, of an individual pursuing habitually a course that his better nature pronounces not only sinful but insane (1 Sam. 24:16–22).

Saul and Archaeology. Saul’s capital at Gibeah (Tell el-Ful), three miles N of Jerusalem, has been explored and his citadel there excavated. Long ago this was identified with Saul’s fortress by the brilliant pioneer Palestine explorer Edward Robinson and was excavated by W. F. Albright in 1922 and 1933 (see Annual of the Am. Schools 4 [1922, 1923]; Bulletin 52 [1933]: 6–12; Archaeology of Palestine [1949], pp. 120f.). Gibeah yielded at the bottom of the mound fortress no. 1, which showed traces of destruction by fire and is probably referred to in Judg. 20:40. Directly above this were the remnants of a second stronghold identified as Saul’s. The structure measuring 170 by 155 feet had separately bonded corner towers and casemated walls. The principal building at Gibeah with massive stone construction and deep walls “was like a dungeon rather than a royal residence in comparison with the Canaanite masonry with which Solomon graced Jerusalem” (Madeleine S. and J. Lane Miller, Ency. of Bible Life [1944], p. 176). W. F. Albright says, “Saul was only a rustic chieftain as far as architecture and the amenities of life were concerned” (From the Stone Age to Christianity, p. 224). What was true of Saul was in a general sense culturally true of all Israel up to the dawn of the Davidic-Solomonic era. Palestinian excavations have fully demonstrated Israel’s rusticity of life and poverty in the premonarchial period.

SAVIOR. A term applied in Scripture, in its highest sense, to Jesus Christ, but in a subordinate manner to human deliverers.

Names. In the OT Savior is usually some derivative of the verb yāsha, to “save.” Beyond this ordinary sense, this term expresses assistance and protection of every kind—aggressive assistance, “to fight for you against your enemies, to save you” (Deut. 20:4); of protection against attack, “He sets up walls and ramparts for security” (Isa. 26:1); of victory, “The Lord helped David” (i.e., gave him victory, 2 Sam. 8:6); of prosperity, “But you will call your walls salvation” (Isa. 60:18). No better instance of this last sense can be adduced than with the exclamation “Hosannah!” meaning “do save, we beseech Thee,” which was uttered as a prayer for God’s blessing on any joyous occasion (Ps. 118:25).

The Greek representative of the above is sōtēr. The LXX has sōtēr where the KJV has “salvation”; and thus the word Savior was more familiar to the ear of the reader of the OT in our Lord’s age than to us.

Person. The title Savior is applied to Jehovah in the OT (2 Sam 22:3; Ps. 106:21; Isa. 43:3, 11; 45:15, 21; 49:26; 60:16; 63:8; Jer. 14:8). The judges were called “saviors,” as having rescued their country from oppressors (Judg. 3:9, 15, “deliverer”). Jeroboam II is also called a “deliverer” (“savior”), rescuing Israel from the Syrians (2 Kings 13:5). See Atonement; Redeemer; Salvation.

SAVOUR, SAVOURS, SAVOUREST. For the use of the term savour in the KJV of Ex. 29:18; Lev. 1:9, 13, 17; Joel 2:20; 2 Cor. 2:14–16; Eph. 5:2. (See Aroma.) The expression “thou savourest not” in the KJV of Matt. 16:23; Mark 8:33 has the meaning of “setting one’s mind” to something; cf. NASB, NIV. When Jesus speaks of salt’s losing its savour in the KJV of Matt. 5:13; Luke 14:34, He refers to its becoming tasteless (NASB), or losing its saltiness (NIV).

SAW (Heb. māgērâ, 2 Sam. 12:31; 1 Kings 7:9; 1 Chron. 20:3; maśśôr, Isa. 10:15).

Egyptian saws, so far as has yet been discovered, were single-handed, although Jerome is believed to allude to circular saws. As is the case in modern oriental saws, the teeth usually incline toward the handle instead of away from it, as ours. They have, in most cases, bronze blades, apparently attached to the handles by leather thongs, but some of those in the British Museum have blades inserted into them like our knives. A double-handed iron saw has been found at Nimrud. No evidence exists of the use of the saw applied to stone in Egypt, neither without the double-handed saw does it seem likely that this should be the case; but we read of sawn stones used in the Temple (1 Kings 7:9). The expression “set them under saws” (2 Sam. 12:31) has been understood to mean hard labor, but “cut them with saws” (1 Chron. 20:3) can hardly be other than torture. The NIV, however, translates here, “consigning them to labor with saws.”

SCAB. See Diseases.

SCABBARD (Heb. ta'ar; Jer. 47:6, KJV, NIV; also 1 Sam. 17:51; Ezek. 21:3, 5, 30, NIV). A sheath (cf. NASB readings) for a sword, dagger, or bayonet. See Armor, Arms.

SCAFFOLD (Heb. kiyyôr; 2 Chron. 6:13, KJV only). The platform (so NASB, NIV) upon which Solomon kneeled as he prayed during the dedicatory services of the Temple.

SCALE. For the medical use, see Diseases. The term appears also in non-medical connections.

1. Heb. qaśqešet: (a) Of fishes (Lev. 11:9–10, 12; Deut. 14:9–10; Ezek. 29:4); (b) Of the laminae of a coat of mail (1 Sam. 17:5); similarly the Gk. lepis, a “flake,” incrustation from the eyes (Acts 9:18).

2. Strong scales (Heb. māgēn, Job 41:15; “shields,” NIV), of the scaly armor of the “Leviathan,” i.e., crocodile.

3. Of balances (Heb. peles, Isa. 40:12), or rather a steelyard. See Balances.

4. To scale the walls of a city, Prov. 21:22 (Heb. ālâ).

SCALL. See Diseases: Scale.

SCALP (Heb. qodqōd). The crown (which see) of the head, the Heb. variously translated in the KJV, NASB, and NIV (Lev. 13:41; Ps. 68:21; Isa. 3:17; Jer. 48:45). Heb. qorhâ, “baldness” (so KJV, NIV, Isa. 3:24) is rendered “plucked-out scalp” in the NASB.

SCAPEGOAT. See Azazel; Festivals; Day of Atonement.

SCARLET. A brilliant crimson, the coloring substance for which was obtained from an insect (Coccus ilicis) called qirmiz in Arab., whence the English word crimson. The color-producing insect is found on the holm oak. The female alone produces the coloring matter, feeding on the leaves of the tree and yielding eggs containing a red substance. The Greeks called the insect kokkos, meaning “berry,” because being pealike it resembles a berry. The Hebrews called the color shānî, “brilliance,” “crimson”; shnîtôla.at, “brightness of (produced by) the worm”; tôla.atshānî, “worm of brightness,” “crimson-producing worm”; or simply tôlā, “worm.” In Gk. kokkinos was an adjective meaning “pertaining to the coccus worm.” The oriental worm is akin to the cochineal insect of Mexico (Coccus cacti), but has been supplanted commercially by its New World rival, which yields a much more valuable dye. Scarlet was used in the vestments of the high priest and the hangings of the Tabernacle, in the purification of the leper (Lev. 14:4) and in the water of separation (Num. 19:6; Heb. 9:19). M.F.U.

SCENT (Heb. rêah “odor”). See Aroma.

The KJV expression in Jer. 48:11, “his scent is not changed,” referring to Moab, has the meaning of retaining one’s character (“flavor,” NASB; “taste,” NIV); “the scent thereof” in the KJV of Hos. 14:7 refers to renown (NASB), or fame (NIV).

SCEPTER (Heb. shebet, “rod”; Gk. hrados, Heb. 1:8). A staff borne by a ruler as the badge of his authority. Scepters are depicted on many bas-reliefs of Assyrian and Persian kings. Sometimes scepters were short like a mace, sometimes long and garnished with royal insignia. We know that in some cases the scepter was a strong rod (Ezek. 19:11, 14), about the height of a man, which ancient kings and chiefs bore as an insignia of honor. It is believed to originate in the shepherd’s staff, since the first kings were mostly nomad princes (Micah 7:14; cf. Lev. 27:32). Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca historica 3.3) informs us that the scepter of the Egyptian kings bore the shape of a plow; of Osiris a flail and crook; whereas that of the queens, besides the crown, was two loose feathers on the head.

Figurative. The allusions to the scepter are all metaphorical and describe it simply as one of the insignia of supreme power (Gen. 49:10; Num. 24:17; Ps. 45:6; Isa. 14:5; Amos 1:5; Zech. 10:11). The use of the staff as a symbol of authority was not confined to kings; it might be used by any leader (cf. Judg. 5:14, “staff of office”).

SCEVA (sē’va). A Jew of Ephesus, described as a “chief priest” (Acts 19:14–16), either as having exercised the office at Jerusalem or as being chief of one of the twenty-four divisions. His seven sons attempted to exorcise spirits by using the name of Jesus, and on one occasion severe injury was inflicted by the demoniac on two of them (as implied in the term amphoterōn, “both,” the true reading in v. 16).

SCHOOL (Gk. scholē, Acts 19:9). A place where there is leisure, a place of instruction. See Tyrannus.

SCHOOLMASTER. See Tutor.

SCHOOLS, HEBREW.

Elementary. We have no account of education specifically before the time of Moses. This much is certain, that the mother looked to the training of the children in their earliest years (Prov. 31:1; 2 Tim. 3:15), whereas the boys were trained by their fathers, or in well-to-do families by tutors. This instruction was chiefly in reading and writing, but especially in the law. That reading and writing must have formed part of education from the very settlement of Palestine is evident from the fact that the Israelites were commanded to write the precepts of the law upon the doorposts and gates of their houses (Deut. 6:9; 11:20); and upon their passage over Jordan, to write the law upon great stones (27:2–8), so as to be easily read by every Israelite. These admonitions unquestionably presuppose that the people could read plain writing (which see). Arithmetic must have been taught, as the days of the week, the months, the festivals, etc., were not designated by proper names but by numerals. In fact, every art or science that occurs or is alluded to in the OT (and upon the understanding of which depended the understanding of the Scriptures) must have to some extent formed a part of the strictly religious Jewish education. There is, however, no trace of schools for the instruction of youth or of the people in preexilic times. Only in a single instance (2 Chron. 17:7–9) have we any information as to how far and in what way the priests fulfilled their calling to teach the people all the ordinances that God gave through Moses (Lev. 10:11). Although there were no national or elementary schools before the Exile, there were cases in which professional teachers were resorted to—when the position or official duties of the parent rendered his teaching impossible, when the parents were incapacitated; when the child’s attainments surpassed the parent’s abilities; or when the son was preparing himself for a vocation different from that of his father.

Schools After the Captivity. We possess minute information of the schools after the captivity and at the time of Christ. “The regular instruction of the child commenced with the fifth or sixth year (according to strength), when every child was sent to school.... Tradition ascribes to Joshua the son of Gamala the introduction of schools in every town, and the compulsory education in them of all children above the age of six.... It was even deemed unlawful to live in a place where there was no school. Such a city deserved to be either destroyed or excommunicated” (Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, 2:230–31). Joshua arranged that in every province and in every town schoolmasters be appointed who should take charge of all boys from six or seven years of age. A school or teacher was required for every twenty-five children. When there were only forty children in a community, they were allowed to have one master and an assistant. The father himself, as a rule, saw to it that the child should be in the class at the proper time.

Course of Study. “The grand object of the teacher was moral as well as intellectual training. To keep children from all intercourse with the vicious; to suppress all feelings of bitterness, even though wrong had been done to one’s parents; to punish all real wrongdoing; not to prefer one child to another; rather to show sin in its repulsiveness than to predict what punishment would follow, either in this or the next world, so as not to ‘discourage’ the child—such are some of the rules laid down” (Edersheim, Sketches of Jewish Life, pp. 135–36). The teacher was to strictly fulfill all promises made to the child, to avoid bringing up disagreeable or indelicate thoughts, be patient, punish without excessive severity—with a strap but never with a rod. At ten the child began to study the Mishna; at fifteen he had to be ready for the Talmud. In the study of the Scriptures the pupil was to proceed from Leviticus to the rest of the Pentateuch, thence to the Prophets, and lastly to the Hagiographa. Instruction was imparted in questions and answers, or in a catechetical form. After the master had lectured, the pupils asked questions (Luke 2:46), which were frequently answered by parables or counter questions (Matt. 16:13; etc.; 22:17–22; Luke 10:25–26; etc.). Sometimes the teacher introduced the subject by asking a question; the replies of the pupils constituted the discussion, which was concluded by the master pointing out the most appropriate answer.

This mode of instruction is strikingly illustrated by the questions put by our Savior to His disciples (Mark 8:27–30).

Theological Schools. The schools of the prophets, called into life by Samuel (1 Sam. 10:5, 10; 19:20) and more firmly organized under Elijah and Elisha in the kingdom of the ten tribes (2 Kings 2:3, 5; 4:38; 6:1), were not theological schools. Not till after the Exile, when prophecy began to fail, did the study of the law become a matter of scholastic learning; and the priest Ezra is first mentioned as one who set his heart to search and do the law of Jehovah and to teach His statutes and ordinances in Israel (Ezra 7:10). He is described as “skilled in the law of Moses” (7:6; cf. vv. 12, 21); he must have made the study of the law his chief business. From Ezra onward notable scribes or lawyers are mentioned, who not only applied themselves to the faithful observing and handing down of the letter of the law and of the Scriptures but made the contents of Scripture their special study. They especially applied the law of Moses to the practical duties of life and also gave decisions in doubtful cases (Matt. 2:4; Luke 2:46). Thus a complete system of casuistry, founded on the law, was gradually formed for all the relations of life. This was orally transmitted by the scribes (which see) and their associates; and as the “tradition of the elders” (Mark 7:5) was ranked on an equality with, and eventually above, the written law of Moses. On the institution of these schools we lack more exact information for the period from the Exile to the dissolution of the Jewish state. Students seeking a deeper knowledge of the law turned to eminent scribes for instruction. This was given by the teachers, partly at their homes, partly in the synagogues, partly in the porticoes of the Temple, in the form of conversations or disputations. Instruction was gratuitous, the scribes earning their livelihood by following a trade, unless having means of their own or acquired by marriage. The teachers sat while instructing; the scholars at first stood, but afterward sat at the feet of their teachers (Acts 22:3).

Schools of the Prophets. From 1 Sam. 19:20 we learn that there was a “company” of prophets at Ramah under the superintendency of Samuel, whose members lived in a common building. The origin and history of these schools are involved in obscurity but would seem to have been called into existence by Samuel. We have no direct evidence that there were other such unions besides the one at Ramah, but it is probable that there was one at Gibeah (10:5, 10). The next mention of them is in the times of Elijah and Elisha, called “sons of the prophets” (1 Kings 20:35), living in considerable numbers at Gilgal, Bethel, and Jericho (see 2 Kings 4:38; 2:3, 5, 7, 15; 9:1). About one hundred sons of the prophets sat down before Elisha at meals in Gilgal (4:38, 42–43). The number at Jericho may have been as great, for fifty of the sons of the prophets went with Elijah and Elisha to the Jordan (cf. 2:7 with vv. 16–17). From these passages we feel warranted in the belief that the sons of the prophets lived in a common house (see also 6:1). Those who were married most likely lived in their own houses (4:1). We must not conclude, from their living together and performing certain duties in common, that these prophets were an OT order of monks. The prophets did not wish to withdraw from active life for the purpose of carrying on a contemplative life of holiness, but their unions were formed for the purpose of mental and spiritual training that they might exert a more powerful influence upon their contemporaries. The name “schools of the prophets” expresses most fully the character of these unions; only we must not think of them as merely educational institutions in which the pupils of the prophets received instruction in prophesying or in theological studies.

“Prophesying could neither be taught nor communicated by instruction, but was a gift of God which he communicated to whomsoever he would. But the communication of this divine gift was by no means an arbitrary thing, but presupposed such a mental and spiritual disposition on the part of the recipient as fitted him to receive it; while the exercise of the gift required a thorough acquaintance with the law and the earlier revelations of God, which the schools of the prophets were well adapted to promote. It is therefore justly and generally assumed that the study of the law and of the history of the divine guidance of Israel formed a leading feature in the occupations of the pupils of the prophets, which also included the cultivation of sacred poetry and music and united exercises for the promotion of the prophetic inspiration” (K. & D., Com., on 1 Sam. 19:18–24). Thus we find that from the time of Samuel the writing of sacred history formed an essential part of the prophet’s labor.

The cultivation of sacred music and poetry may be inferred partly from the fact that, according to 1 Sam. 10:5, musicians walked in front of the prophesying prophets, playing as they went along, and partly from the fact that sacred music not only received a fresh impulse from David, who stood in close relation to the association of prophets at Ramah, but was also raised by him into an integral part of public worship. Music was by no means cultivated merely that the sons of the prophets might employ it in connection with their discourses but also as a means of awakening holy susceptibilities and emotions in the soul, of lifting up the spirit to God and so preparing it for the reception of divine revelations (see 2 Kings 3:15). Occasion of forming such schools is to be found in the decline of the priesthood under Eli and his sons and the utter absence of the sanctuary in the times of Elijah and Elisha, thus furnishing the faithful with places and means of edification; and in the advantages that would naturally arise from association, in bringing the young men under the influence of their elders, who were under the powerful influence of the Holy Spirit, thus uniting them with their spiritual fathers in fighting for the honor of Jehovah.

SCIENCE (Heb. maddāc, Dan. 1:4; Gk. gnōsis, 1 Tim. 6:20; both KJV). The two instances are better rendered “knowledge.” The NIV of Dan. 1:4 reads “quick to understand.”

SCOFFER, SCOFFING. Several terms in the original are so translated. Heb. lûš, “to make mouths, deride,” refers to a frivolous and impudent person who scoffs at the most sacred precepts and duties of religion, piety, and morals (Ps. 1:1; Prov. 9:7–8; 13:1; 14:6; 15:12; 19:25; 22:10; 24:9; “mockers,” or “mocking,” in most of these passages, NIV.) In Pss. 44:13; 79:4, Heb. lāʿaz, to “stammer, imitate” in derision, is used to describe Israel as being “a scoffing [“scorn,” NIV] and a derision to those around us,” whereas in 123:4 “the scoffing [“ridicule,” NIV] of those who are at ease” is contrasted with those who look to God as their master. See Mock; Mockers.

SCORCHED LAND (Heb. shārāb, “a mirage”). The mirage, especially the appearance of water that is produced as if by magic in the dry, sandy desert (literally perhaps the “desert shine,” just as we speak of the “alpine glow”). The sense in which it is used here is figurative. “The [shārāb] scorched land will become a pool” (Isa. 35:7; “burning sand,” NIV); i.e., the illusive appearance of a lake or pool will become a real pool of refreshing waters.

SCORN (Heb. šāhōq). Spoken of the wild donkey, having contempt for civilization (Job 39:7). In 39:18 the same word is used of the ostrich who “laughs at the horse and his rider.” In Isa. 29:20 the “scorner” (“mockers,” NIV) is one who “will be finished” (Heb. lûš, “to make mouths, deride,” elsewhere “scoffer”). See Scoffer; Laugh; Derision; Disdain; Mock.

SCORPION. An instrument of scourging, a whip with barbed points like the point of a scorpion’s sting. See Animal Kingdom.

Figurative. This instrument was used figuratively by Rehoboam, king of Judea, to represent the harsher measures with which he would deal with the people than had his father (1 Kings 12:11). See Scourge.

SCOURGE. Heb. generally shûṭ, to “whip”; noun shôṭ, a “whip” (Job 9:23; Isa. 10:26; 28:15, 18); Gk. mastigoō, “flog” (Matt. 10:17; 20:19; 23:34; Luke 18:33; John 19:1; Acts 22:24); phraggelloō, to lash, as a public punishment (Matt. 27:26; Mark 15:15), and its derivative, a whip (John 2:15). A common punishment in the East. The instrument of punishment in ancient Egypt, as it is also in modern times generally in the East, was usually the stick, applied to the soles of the feet—bastinado. Under the Roman method the culprit was stripped, stretched with cords or thongs on a frame, and beaten with rods. In case a man was sentenced to stripes the judge was to confine the number to forty, i.e., to forty at most, lest “your brother be degraded in your eyes” (Deut. 25:1–3). There were two ways of scourging—one with thongs or whips made of rope ends or straps of leather, the other with rods or twigs. Scourging is frequently mentioned in the NT (Matt. 10:17; 23:34; Acts 5:40, “flogged”), with thirty-nine stripes as the maximum (2 Cor. 11:24). The scorpion (which see) was probably a severer instrument.

Figurative. “The scourge of the tongue” (Job 5:21; “lash of the tongue,” NIV) is symbolical of wordy strife (see Ps. 31:20). In Heb. 12:6 “scourges” is used of the chastisement sent upon men by God.

SCREECH OWL. See Animal Kingdom: Owl.

SCRIBE (Heb. sōpēr; Gk. grammateus). The grammateus of a Greek state was not the mere writer but the keeper and registrar of public documents (Thucydides 4.118; 7.10; so in Acts 19:35, “town clerk”). The name of Kiriath-sepher (Josh. 15:15; Judg. 1:12) may possibly connect itself with some early use of the title. In the song of Deborah (Judg. 5:14) the word in the original Heb. appears to point to military functions of some kind. Thus the NASB replaces KJV “pen of the writer” with “staff of office,” marg., “the staff of the scribe,” and the NIV reads “commander’s staff.” The Heb. expression probably refers to the rod or scepter of the commander numbering or marshaling his troops. Three men are mentioned as successively filling the office of “secretary” or scribe under David and Solomon (2 Sam. 8:17; 20:25; 1 Kings 4:3). We may think of them as the king’s secretaries, writing his letters, drawing up his decrees, managing his finances (2 Kings 12:10). At a later period the word again connects itself with the act of numbering the military forces of the country (Jer. 52:25, and probably Isa. 33:18). Other associations, however, began to gather around it at about the same period. The zeal of Hezekiah led him to foster the growth of a body of men whose work it was to transcribe old records or to put in writing what had been handed down orally (Prov. 25:1). To this period, accordingly, belongs the new significance of the title. It no longer designates only an officer of the king’s court, but a class, students and interpreters of the law, boasting of their wisdom (Jer. 8:8). See Scribes; Writing.

SCRIBES, JEWISH. Heb. and Gk. as above; also Gk. nomikos, “lawyer,” i.e., expert in the Mosaic law (Matt. 22:35; Luke 7:30; 10:25; 11:45, 52; 14:3); nomodidaskalos, “teacher of the law” (5:17; Acts 5:34).

Institution. The period of the Sopherim, scribes, began with the return of the Jews from captivity. The law read by Ezra (Neh. 8–10) was the Pentateuch in essentially the same form as we have it now; and from that time it was acknowledged by Israel as the binding rule of life, i.e.:

Canonical. Obedience to it was the condition of membership among the chosen people and a share in the promises given to them. The entire Pentateuch came to be regarded as dictated by God, even to the last eight verses, containing the account of Moses’ death. From insisting upon divine dictation the next step was to declare that the law had been handed to Moses by God, the only question being whether it was all delivered at once or in volumes. As an addition to the law the writing of the prophets and preexilic history of Israel attained to similar authority. At a still later period there was added to this body of the “prophets” a third collection of writings, which gradually entered into the same category of canonical Scriptures. In proportion as the law became comprehensive and complicated there arose the necessity of its scientific study and of a professional acquaintance with it. Its many details and the application of its several enactments to everyday life necessarily involved patient study. In the time of Ezra and long after this was chiefly the concern of priests, Ezra himself being both priest and scribe. This was naturally the case, as the Pentateuch related largely to priestly functions and privileges. The higher the law rose in the estimation of the people, the more did its study and exposition become an independent business; and an independent class of “biblical scholars or scribes,” i.e., of men who made acquaintance with the law a profession, was formed, besides the priests. When under Greek influence the priests, at least those of the higher strata, often applied themselves to pagan culture and more or less neglected the law, the scribes appeared as the zealous guardians of the law. From this time on they were the teachers of the people, over whose life they bore complete sway. In NT times the scribes formed a finely compacted class, holding undisputed supremacy over the people. Everywhere they appear as the mouthpiece and representative of the people; the scribe pushes to the front, the crowd respectfully giving way and eagerly hanging on his utterances as those of a recognized authority. The great respect paid them is expressed by the title of honor bestowed upon them, “my master” (Heb. rabbî; Gk. hrabbi, Matt. 23:7; etc.). From this respectful address the title rabbi was gradually formed; but its use cannot be proved before the time of Christ.

Respect. The rabbis required from their pupils absolute reverence, surpassing even the honor felt for parents. Thus it was taught that “respect to a teacher should exceed respect for a father, for both father and son owe respect to a teacher” (Kerithoth 6.9, fin.). The practical application of this principle was: “If a man’s father and teacher have lost anything, the teacher’s loss should have the precedence—i.e., he must first be assisted in recovering it—the burden of a teacher is to be born in preference to that of a father, a teacher must be ransomed from captivity before one’s own father.” The rabbis in general everywhere claimed the first rank (Matt. 23:6–7; Mark 12:38–39; Luke 11:43; 20:46).

Employment. This referred, if not exclusively, yet first and chiefly, to the law and the administration of justice.

As jurists. As such the task of the scribe was threefold: The theoretic development of the law. The scribes developed with careful casuistry the general precepts of the law; and where the written law made no direct provision they created a compensation, either by establishing a precedent or by inference from other valid legal decisions. In this way, during the last centuries before Christ, Jewish law became gradually an extensive and complicated science. This law was unwritten and propagated by oral tradition; intense study was necessary to obtain even a general acquaintance with it. In addition to having an acquaintance with the law, the scribes assumed that it was their special province to develop what was already binding into more and more subtle casuistic details. In order to settle a system of law binding upon all, it was necessary to come as near as possible to a general consensus of opinion. Hence the whole process of systematizing the law was carried on by oral discussion; the acknowledged authorities instructed their pupils in the law and debated legal questions with each other. This made it necessary that the heads at least of the body should dwell in certain central localities, although many would be scattered about the country to give instruction and render legal decisions. The central point till A.D. 70 was Jerusalem; after that at other places, such as Jamnia and Tiberias. Gradually the theories of the scribes became valid law; hence, the maxims developed by the scribes were recognized in practice as soon as the schools were agreed about them. The scribes were, in fact, though not by formal appointment, legislators, especially after the destruction of the Temple; for since there was then no longer a civil court of justice like the Sanhedrin, the judgment of the rabbinical scribes determined what was valid law. In case of doubt the matter was brought “before the learned,” who pronounced an authoritative decision.

Teaching the Law. This was the second chief task of the scribes. The ideal of legal Judaism was that every Israelite should have a professional acquaintance with the law; if this was impracticable, then the greatest possible number. As a consequence the famous rabbis gathered about them large numbers of pupils. Because the oral law was never committed to writing, constant repetition was necessary in order to fix it in the minds of the students. Thus, in rabbinic diction, “to repeat” means exactly the same as “to teach.” Questions were propounded to pupils for their decision, and pupils asked questions of the teachers. As all knowledge of the law was strictly traditional, a pupil had only two duties—to keep everything faithfully in memory and to teach only what had been delivered to him. For such instruction there were special localities, called “houses of teaching,” often mentioned in connection with synagogues as places that in legal respects enjoyed certain privileges. In Jerusalem the catechetical lectures were held “in the temple” (Matt. 21:23; 26:55; Mark 14:49; Luke 2:46; 20:1; John 18:20), i.e., in the colonnades or some other space of the outer court.

Judicial. A third duty of the scribes was passing sentence in the court of justice; for so far as men were learned in the law they would be called to the office of judge. With respect to the great Sanhedrin it is expressly stated in the NT that scribes were among its members. After the fall of the Jewish state, A.D. 70, the scribes, being recognized as independent legislators, were also regarded as independent judges. Their sentences were voluntarily acquiesced in, whether they gave judgment collectively or as individuals. Being learned in the law and the elaboration of the historical and didactic portions of Scripture, the scribes were specially qualified for delivering lectures and exhortations in the synagogues. They also had the care of the text of Scripture as such.

Literature. In the developing and establishment of the law there was evolved a law of custom, besides the written Torah (law), called the Halachah (Heb. hālākâ, “that which is current and customary”). The manipulation of the historical and didactic portions of the Holy Scriptures produced an abundant variety of historical and didactic notions, usually comprised under the name of the Haggadah (Heb. hāggādâ, “narrative, legend”).

The Halachah. The Halachah contained “either simply the laws laid down in Scripture, or else derived from or traced to it by some ingenious and artificial method of exegesis; or added to it, by way of amplification and for safety’s sake; or, finally, legalized customs. They provided for every possible and impossible case, entered into every detail of private, family, and public life; and with iron logic, unbending rigor, and most minute analysis pursued and dominated man, turn whither he might, laying on him a yoke which was truly unbearable. The return which it offered was the pleasure and distinction of knowledge, the acquisition of righteousness and the final attainment of rewards” (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, 1:98).

The Haggadah. The Haggadah was “an amplification and remodeling of what was originally given, according to the views and necessities of later times. It is true that here also the given text forms the point of departure, and that a similar treatment to that employed in passages from the law takes place in the first instance. The history is worked up by combining the different statements in the text with each other, completing one by another, settling the chronology, etc. Or the religious and ethical parts are manipulated by formulating dogmatic propositions from isolated prophetic utterances, by bringing these into relation to each other, and thus obtaining a kind of dogmatic system. A canonical book of the Old Testament (Book of Chronicles) furnishes a very instructive example of the historical Midrash (i.e., exposition, exegesis). A comparison of its narrative with the parallel portions of the older historical books (Kings and Samuel) will strike even the cursory observer with the fact that the chronicler has enlarged the history of the Jewish kings by a whole class of narratives, of which the older documents have as good as nothing” (Schürer, History of the Jewish People, div. 2, 1:339ff.).

History. This is properly divided into five periods, indicated by the appellations given to the scribes in successive times:

The Sopherim (see above), or “scribes,” properly so called, lasting from the return from Babylon and ending with the death of Simon the Just, c. 458–300 B.C., about 160 years.

The Tanaim (“repeaters,” i.e., “teachers” of the law), in NT times, “teachers of the law” (Luke 5:17; Acts 5:34).

The Amoraim, or later doctors of the law (Heb., to “expound”), “wise men” and “doctors of the law,” who alone constituted the authorized recorders and expositors of the Halachah (A.D. 220—completion of the Babylonian Talmud, about A.D. 500).

The Saboraim, or teachers of the law after the conclusion of the Talmud (Heb. to “think, discern”), who determined the law from a careful examination of all the pros and cons urged by the Amoraim in their controversies on divine, legal, and ritual questions contained in the Talmud, A.D. 500–657.

The Gaonim, the last doctors of the law in the rabbinic succession. The period of the Gaonim extends from A.D. 657 to 1034 in Sora, and to 1038 in Pumbeditha (Schürer, History of the Jewish People; Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus; McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia, s.v.).

SCRIP. (Heb. yalqûṭ; Gk. pēra). The KJV term scrip does not appear in the NASB or the NIV, being replaced in those versions by shepherd’s bag (1 Sam. 17:40) or bag (Matt. 10:10; Mark 6:8; Luke 9:3; 10:4; 22:35–36; marg., NASB, is usually “knapsack” or “beggar’s bag”). The scrip of the KJV OT was the bag or wallet in which shepherds carried food or other necessities. The scrip of the KJV NT was the leather bag Galilean peasants used to carry their food when they were on a journey. See Bag; Purse.

SCRIPTURE (Heb. kātûb, “written”; Gk. graphē, “document”). It is not till the return from the captivity that the word meets us with any distinctive force. In the earlier books we read of the law, the book of the law. In Ex. 32:16 the commandments written on the tablets of testimony are said to be “God’s writing,” but there is no special sense in the word taken by itself. The thought of Scripture as a whole first appears in 2 Chron. 30:5, 18. In the singular it is applied chiefly to this or that passage quoted from the OT (Mark 12:10; John 7:38; 13:18; 19:37; Luke 4:21; Rom. 9:17; Gal. 3:8; etc.). In two difficult passages some have seen the wider, some the narrower sense. (1) Pasa graphē theopneustos (2 Tim. 3:16) has been translated in the NASB and NIV, “All Scripture is inspired by God.” Others render it, “Every Scripture being inspired, is also profitable....” The RV renders it, “Every Scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching,” etc. (2) The meaning of the genitive in pasa prophēteia graphēs (2 Pet. 1:20) seems at first sight distinctly collective: “No prophecy of [i.e., contained in] Scripture.” A closer examination of the passage will perhaps lead to a different conclusion. (3) In the plural, as might be expected, the collective meaning is prominent. In 2 Pet. 3:16 we find an extension of the term to the epistles of Paul; but it remains uncertain whether “the rest of the Scriptures” are the Scriptures of the OT exclusively or include other writings then extant, dealing with the same topics. (4) In one passage, ta hiera grammata (2 Tim. 3:15) answers to “the sacred writings,” i.e., Scriptures, of the NASB. See Bible; Canon.

SCRIPTURE MANUSCRIPTS, NEW TESTAMENT. The text of the NT is attested by manuscript testimony more voluminous in quantity and more reliable than that of any of the writings of the same period. Indeed there are no ancient writings whose evidence of a correct text is stronger than the NT. “At present there are 88 catalogued papyri manuscripts, an additional 274 uncial manuscripts in codex format, and 245 lectionaries in uncial script. In addition 2,795 manuscripts and 1,964 lectionaries have been catalogued” (N. L. Geisler and W. E. Nix, A General Introduction to the Bible [1986], p. 387, from B. M. Metzger, Manuscripts of the Greek Bible [1981], pp. 54–56). This testimony to the NT text is not only remarkable for its bulk but also for its substantial agreement. Although numerous textual variations occur, they are of a relatively minor nature and do not affect any doctrine. Substantial variations affect only about a thousandth part of the entire text, according to the estimation of careful students (cf. Gregory, Canon and Text of the N.T. p. 528). Also amazing is the close relationship in point of time between the oldest NT manuscripts and the original texts. Not more than a century and a half intervenes between the oldest copies of the Pauline letters preserved in the Chester Beatty papyri and their original composition, and scarcely three centuries come between the Codex Vaticanus and the Codex Sinaiticus and the period of the composition of the NT. When it is remembered that knowledge of classical authors depends on manuscripts between the ninth and eleventh centuries A.D., or a thousand years removed from their originals, as used to be the case also with the OT, until the discovery of the Dead Sea manuscripts (1947–55), it can be comprehended why the certainty with which the NT text is established surpasses any other book of antiquity.

The Greek manuscripts are the most important materials for textual criticism because the NT books were originally written in Gk. Although the theory that various books of the NT were penned in Aram. and that the respective books of the Gk. NT are merely translations from these originals is held by some scholars, notably C. C. Torrey (all the gospels and the first half of Acts), the discovery of large numbers of papyri has done much to undermine this theory. Supposed mistranslations in the gospels appear in regular idiom in the Gk. papyri of the general period. Manuscripts written in Gk., therefore, incontestably constitute the most important materials for textual criticism. These are made up of papyri, uncial manuscripts, and minuscules or cursive manuscripts.

Papyri. These manuscripts were written on papyrus (which see). Since a number of the papyri contain portions of the NT from a century to a century and a half earlier than the oldest uncial manuscripts now available, the importance of the papyri for the study of the NT is inestimable. When Sir Frederic Kenyon first published Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts in 1895, there existed but one or two papyri that contained a portion of Scripture, but by 1931 the number had increased to fifty-three important ones, and now stands at eighty-eight.

By far the most important manuscripts of this class are the Chester Beatty Papyri. These manuscripts, named for the man who purchased the collection, Chester Beatty of London, first became known in 1931. They consist of portions of codices of various books of the OT and the NT; altogether seven manuscripts of the OT and three of the NT, besides some extracanonical books. The material was dated by U. Wilcken to be c. A.D. 200 (Archiv für Papyrusforschung 11 [1935]: 112), and thus we have a text 125 to 150 years earlier than that of the Codex Vaticanus. P⁴⁵ Chester Beatty Papyrus originally contained all the gospels and Acts, but is extant only in about one-seventh of its original content. P⁴⁶ Chester Beatty Papyrus contains most of the Pauline epistles in an aggregate of 86 leaves out of a total of 104; Philemon and the pastoral epistles are not included. P⁴⁷ Chester Beatty Papyrus contains a considerable portion of the book of Revelation (9:10–17:2).

Uncial Manuscripts. Uncial manuscripts are written in separated half-capital characters and are early. They are distinguished from the cursives in which the letters are bound together by ligatures. Uncial script looks like letters printed with pen or pencil in contrast to letters written in regular script. At present 274 are known. The most important of these textually are the Codex Vaticanus (B), Codex Sinaiticus (Ⲁ [Aleph]), Codex Alexandrinus (A), Codex Ephraemi Rescriptus (C), Codex Bezae (D), and Codex Washingtonianus I (W).

Codex Vaticanus (B). Codex Vaticanus has been in the Vatican Library at Rome since 1481. It dates around A.D. 340. The complete codex contains 759 leaves, 142 belonging to the NT.

Codex Sinaiticus (Ⲁ [Aleph]). Codex Sinaiticus (Ⲁ [Aleph]), was discovered in St. Catherine's Monastery by Constantin Tischendorf in 1844 and 1859 and apparently dates about A.D. 350. It contains all the NT and a large part of the OT.

Codex Alexandrinus (A). Codex Alexandrinus (A) is in the National Library of the British Museum. It is called Alexandrinus because it was believed to have come from Alexandria, Egypt, and "A" because it was the first important uncial to be used by biblical textual critics. It contains 733 leaves of the original 822, and dates c. A.D. 400 or a little later.

Codex Ephraemi Rescriptus (C). Codex Ephraemi Rescriptus (C) is in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris. It is a palimpsest and belongs to the fourth century (c. 345).

Codex Bezae (D [Codex Cantabrigiensis]). Codex Bezae (D) is bilingual—being written in Gk. and Lat. Robert Stephanus (Estienne) used some of the readings in the margin of his Gk. Testament in 1550, and Théodore de Bèze (Beza) employed it in the later editions of his Gk. Testament.

Codex Washingtonianus I (W). Codex Washingtonianus I (W) has 187 leaves containing "the four gospels, portions of all the Pauline epistles except Romans, Hebrews, Deuteronomy, Joshua, and Psalms"; it dates "from the fourth or early fifth century" (Geisler and Nix, p. 400). It was purchased in Egypt in 1906 by C. L. Freer of Detroit and is in the Freer Collection at the Smithsonian Institution.

Codex Claromontanus (D² or D^{p2})²⁴. Codex Claromontanus (D² or D^{p2})²⁴ dates from the sixth century and constitutes a leading Western authority for the text of the epistles of Paul.

Discovered at Clermont, France, it was taken to Paris in 1656. It is bilingual, containing both Gk. and Lat. texts. At one time it belonged to Beza. Codex Basilensis (E) contains the four gospels with some lacunae. It dates from the eighth century and is in Basel, Switzerland.

Codex Laudianus (E^2 or E^a). Codex Laudianus (E^2 or E^a) is in the Bodleian Library at Oxford and is a late sixth or early seventh-century copy of the book of Acts in Gk. and Lat. The Codex Regius (L) contains the gospels and is placed in the eighth century. It is now in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris.

Codex Borgianus (T). Codex Borgianus (T) contains an Alexandrian text of 179 verses of Luke and John, and dates probably from the fifth century. It is now in Rome.

Codex Koridethianus (Θ [Theta]). Codex Koridethianus (Θ [Theta]) belonged to a monastery at Koridethi and is now in the Library of Tiflis. It contains only the gospels and dates from the ninth century. The manuscript was published in 1913, and its discovery is ranked in importance to that of Codex Sinaiticus.

Minuscule Manuscripts. These are written in the cursive, or flowing, style of script to which the formal and cumbersome uncial style gave way from the eighth century on. The word minuscule is taken from the Lat. minusculus, “somewhat small,” and refers to the small cursive letters connected in script, as differentiated from the capital, or uncial, which were written separately. Thousands of cursives exist. At present 2,795 are known (Metzger, in Geisler and Nix). The importance of the minuscule manuscripts is normally less than the uncials, since they are for the most part later. But there are exceptions, and textual critics often rank certain minuscules higher than certain uncials. The minuscules sometimes run in groups or families and can be traced back to the same uncial. Of the individual minuscules, manuscript 33, from the ninth or possibly tenth century, containing the gospels, Acts, and the epistles, is one of the best. Other important cursives are minuscules 81, 157, and 565.

Lectionaries. These are reading lessons employed in public worship services. Those selected from the gospels are known as Evangelioria or Evangelistaria. Those selected from the Acts of the Apostles or the epistles are called Apostoli or Praxapostoli and are found from the sixth century onward. More than 2,209 Greek lectionaries have been identified and cataloged, and they are more and more being valued for textual criticism (Geisler and Nix, p. 387). M.F.U.

SCRIPTURE MANUSCRIPTS, OLD TESTAMENT. The word Scripture is derived from the Lat. scriptum, or scriptura, and has for its Gk. equivalent graphē, and Heb. miqrā (Neh. 8:8). In its English use in the Bible it means “the writings,” as in Ex. 32:16; Dan. 10:21.

The NT employs the plural graphai, “writings.” The precise writing referred to by the word Scripture is not always clear. The word is found thirty-two times in the KJV. The plural, Scriptures, is found twenty-one times, all except one in the NT. In the singular the word refers to passages in the OT, which are quoted or alluded to in the NT. In the plural the reference is to books or collections of books of the OT. The epithet “holy” or “sacred” is applied to the Scriptures in Rom. 1:2 and 2 Tim. 3:15. Their inspiration is distinctly attested in 3:16, “All Scripture is inspired by God.” Other translations, “Every Scripture being inspired,” or, “Every Scripture is inspired,” do not modify the clear declaration of the inspiration of the OT Scriptures. Every separate portion of the holy Book is inspired and forms a living portion of a living and organic whole. Although this expression does not exclude such verbal errors that are the result of transmission of the text over many centuries, it still does certainly assure us that these writings, as we have seen them, are individually pervaded by God’s Spirit and warrant our belief that they are (in the words of Clement of Rome, Epistle to the Corinthians 1:45) the true utterances of the Holy Spirit and an assertion of the full inspiration of the Bible. See Canon; Inspiration.

Preservation of the Text. The sacred writings were preserved down to the time of the invention of printing by the process of transcription. Hence there arose at an early period a class of scholars known as scribes (Heb. sōprîm), meaning writers. Their business was to copy the Scriptures (Jer. 8:8). In the reign of Artaxerxes, king of Persia, Ezra was well known as a scribe and went up from Babylon to Jerusalem, “and he was a scribe skilled in the law of Moses” (Ezra 7:6). The scribes became teachers and expounders of the law. In the time of our Lord they were generally hostile to His claims as the Messiah and were among His most bitter persecutors. Through a succession of scribes the Holy Scriptures were transmitted from generation to generation. The ancient Heb. differed in its written character from the Heb. current in our modern Heb. Bibles. It was written in the old Phoenician letters, of which one of the most ancient specimens is found on the Moabite Stone discovered in 1868 at Dibon in Moab and dating about 850 B.C., and also in the Gezer Calendar dating from about 925 B.C. Gradually this early character was displaced, and in the time of Christ the present Heb. characters were in use. It is said in Matt. 5:18, “not the smallest letter or stroke shall pass away from the Law.” Hebrew yodh is the smallest letter in the Heb. alphabet, but the equivalent letter in the early Phoenician character was not small, showing that the old character had given place at this time to the later Heb. The word manuscript, abbreviated MS for singular and MSS for plural, is from the Lat. codices manuscripti, i.e., codices written by hand. The word codex, from the Lat. codex, or caudex, the stock of a tree, board covered with wax for writing; hence, book; plural codices, books.

Hebrew manuscripts were originally without accents, vowels, or marks of punctuation. The Heb. vowel points were not introduced until about the sixth century of the Christian era by a body of learned men called the Masoretes, who studied the Heb. Scriptures with great minuteness and made a collection of writings called “the Masora,” or the Traditions. By means of their system of vowel points they established the pronunciation and meaning of the original Heb. on a firm foundation.

Until the modern sensational manuscript finds in the Dead Sea area from 1947 to 1956, Heb. manuscripts of the OT were not earlier than the tenth century A.D. Now the Isaiah manuscript of the Dead Sea Scrolls, dating about 150 B.C., together with other fragmentary finds of various OT books, pushes the date of OT manuscripts back about a millennium. But the work of the Masoretes is nevertheless of immense importance, despite recent manuscript discoveries. See Dead Sea Scrolls.

The proper task of the Masora was the guarding of the Bible manuscripts against degeneration through carelessness and willfulness on the part of transcribers, and, in consequence, the most painful and minute supervision was exercised upon them; but just in this way the Masora affords a glimpse into the form of the text transmitted from early times, which cannot be too highly valued.

There are two words in our Heb. Bible that served the purpose of modern textual emendations; they are qere, “read,” and kethib, “written.” When a word was found in the text that was believed incorrect, instead of substituting the true word, placing it in the text, the Masoretes wrote the correct word in the margin and left the incorrect word in the text, with the vowels of the correct word. The word in the text would be thus shown to be wrong, and by placing these vowels with the word in the margin the true text would be clear. This fear to remove the incorrect word from the text showed a reverence amounting to superstition for the exact wording of their sacred writings. The Heb. manuscripts that have been preserved, except the manuscript finds since 1947, are not nearly so ancient as many of those of the Greek NT, nor are complete manuscripts so numerous, the greater part of the 2,000 extant Heb. manuscripts containing only fragments or portions of the OT.

Some Important Manuscripts. Several manuscripts of particular interest are the following:

The Nash Papyrus. The Nash Papyrus contains “one damaged copy of the Shema (from Deut. 6:4–9) and two fragments of the Decalogue (Ex. 20:2ff.; Deut. 5:6ff.). It is dated between the second century B.C. ... and the first century A.D.” (N. L. Geisler and W. E. Nix, A General Introduction to the Bible [1986], p. 358; the early date is advocated by W. F. Albright in “A Biblical Fragment from the Maccabean Age: The Nash Papyrus,” Journal of Biblical Literature 56 [1937]: 145–76).

Orientalis 4445. The manuscript known today as Orientalis 4445 “contains Genesis 39:20—Deuteronomy 1:33 (less Numbers 7:47–73 and Numbers 9:12–10:18)” and has been dated as early as the ninth century (A.D. 820 to 850, the Masora notes a century later) and as late as the tenth (see Geisler and Nix, p. 358; Christian D. Ginsburg supports the former date; Paul E. Kahle, The Cairo Geniza, 2d ed. [1959], the latter, on the basis of the consonantal Heb. text and the pointing).

Codex Cairensis. Codex Cairensis “contains the Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings) and the Latter Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and the Twelve)”; it was “written and vowel-pointed in A.D. 895 by Moses ben Asher in Tiberias in Palestine” (Geisler and Nix, p. 358–59, based on E. Würthwein, The Text of the O.T. [1959, 1979]).

The Aleppo Codex. The Aleppo Codex of the Whole Old Testament “was written by Shelomo ben Baya’a [but] pointed (i.e., the vowel marks were added) by Moses ben Asher (c. A.D. 930)” (Geisler and Nix, p. 359, from F. G. Kenyon, Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, 4th ed. [1958], p. 359).

The Babylonian Codex (MS Heb. B3). The Babylonian Codex of the Latter Prophets (MS Heb. B3), “sometimes called the Leningrad Codex of the Prophets ... or the St. Petersburg Codex ..., is dated A.D. 916” (Geisler and Nix, p. 359; the former name is that used by F. G. Kenyon, Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, p. 85; the latter name is used by E. Würthwein, The Text of the O.T., p. 26).

Codex Leningradensis (B19^A). A colophon attached to Codex Leningradensis (B19^A), “one of the oldest manuscripts of the complete Hebrew Bible that is known,” indicates that Samuel ben Jacob copied it in A.D. 1008 from a manuscript written some eight years earlier by Aaron ben Moses ben Asher, although some believe B19^A is a copy of the Aleppo Codex (mentioned above; Geisler and Nix, p. 359; Paul E. Kahle, The Cairo Geniza, p. 132, holds to the former history; Ginsburg to the latter).

Codex Laudianus. Codex Laudianus is also of the eleventh century. It is in the Bodleian Library in Oxford, England. It agrees quite closely with the Samaritan Pentateuch.

The Reuchlin Codex. The Reuchlin Codex of the Prophets, now at Karlsruhe, is dated A.D. 1105. It “contains a recension of Ben Naphtali, a Tiberian Masorete” (Geisler and Nix, p. 359).

Codex Caesenoe. Codex Caesenoe is in the Maltesta Library in Bologna and is assigned to the end of the eleventh century. It contains the Pentateuch, sections of the Prophets, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther.

Codex Parisiensis. Codex Parisiensis is in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris and is assigned to the twelfth century. It contains the entire OT.

Codex 634 of Giovanni de Rossi. Codex 634 of De Rossi contains a small part of the law—Lev. 21:19 and Num. 1:50. It belongs to the eighth century.

Codex Norimbergensis. Codex Norimbergensis, in Nuremberg, contains the Prophets and Hagiographa. It is assigned to the twelfth century.

Agreement in the Manuscripts. The remarkable thing about the Heb. text is the agreement of the old manuscripts that have come down to us. The Heb. text of the OT has been rendered into the Gk. of the LXX version, which many regard as a witness to the true text, even when it varies from our present Heb. text. The exact value of the LXX in determining the original Heb. is yet undetermined, but the question is being illuminated by the Dead Sea manuscript finds.

That the Heb. text has been carefully preserved is evident from the great care taken by Jewish scholars in its preservation. The care of the Masoretes and other scholars in preserving the text indicates care also in ascertaining the true text and serves to assure us of the genuineness of the present Heb. Scriptures.

SCROLL. A book in ancient times consisted of a single long strip of papyrus or parchment, which was usually kept rolled up on a stick and was unrolled when a person wished to read it.

Hence arose the term māgillâ from gālal, “to roll,” strictly answering to the Lat. volumen, whence comes our volume. The use of the term māgillâ implies, of course, the existence of a soft and pliant material, perhaps parchment. The scroll was usually written on one side only, and hence the particular notice of one that was “written on the front and back” (Ezek. 2:10). The writing was arranged in columns.

“Scroll” is sometimes given as the translation of Heb. sēper, a “writing,” or a “book” (see Num. 5:23; Deut. 17:18; Isa. 30:8; 34:4; and also the article Book); or as the translation of the two Heb. terms, sēper and māgillâ, taken together (Jer. 36:2, 4; Ezek. 2:9; for all, see marg.).

In Rev. 6:14 the sky is said to be “split apart like a scroll when it is rolled up” (from Gk. biblion).

SCYTH'IAN (sith'i-an). One of a nomad race, or collection of races, dwelling mostly on the N of the Black Sea and the Caspian, stretching indefinitely into inner Asia. They called themselves Scoloti, and the native traditions traced their origin to Targetaus, son of Zeus, or perhaps son of their corresponding god Papaeus (Hd. 4.59), and a daughter of the river Borysthenes (ibid. 4.5.6). In the name Targetaus some have seen the origin of the name Turk.

The Scoloti were fierce barbarians who “scalped their enemies, and used their skulls as drinking cups [ibid. 4.64.65], and offered human sacrifices” (Smith). Their “justice,” so highly praised by the earlier poets, was probably a rough and ready impartiality, which is easy when there is no regard for human life or suffering. In the only place where Scythians are mentioned (Col. 3:11) they are evidently taken as representatives of the barbarian world.

It has been inferred, however, and is by no means impossible, that there were Scythians in the early church.

In the time of Psammetichus, king of Egypt, the contemporary of Josiah, the Scythians invaded Palestine and plundered the temple of Venus Urania in Ashkelon; and they were only prevented from entering Egypt by prayers and presents (Hd. 1.105). Some suppose that their possession of Beth-shean gave it its name Scythopolis (LXX, Skuthōnpolis, Judg. 1:27; cf. Judith 3:10; 2 Macc. 12:29; and 1 Macc. 5:52; Josephus, Skuthopolis). They took Sardis, 629 B.C.; defeated Cyaxares of Media, 624; and occupied “Asia” for twenty-eight years, till they were expelled, 596 B.C.

Most moderns, following Josephus (Ant. 1.6.1) and Jerome, identify the Magog of Ezek. 38:2; 39:1, 6, the land of which Gog was prince, with the land of the Scythians, who in Ezekiel’s time inhabited the region between the Caspian and Black seas. The Scythians of the time of Herodotus and Ezekiel are believed to have been a Japhetic race. They were backward in civilization so that their name became proverbial for wildness or barbarity much as the Greeks used the epithet “barbarian” (cf. Col. 3:11). W.H.; M.F.U.

SEA (Heb. yām, “roaring”; Gk. thalassa, probably “salty”). Yām is used in Scripture in the following senses:

1. The “gathering of the waters,” i.e., the ocean (Deut. 30:13; 1 Kings 10:22; Ps. 24:2; Job 26:12; 38:8).

2. With the article, of some part of the great encompassing water, namely: (a) Of the Mediterranean Sea, called “eastern” and the “western” sea (Deut. 11:24; 34:2; Joel 2:20); “sea of the Philistines” (Ex. 23:31); “the Great Sea” (Num. 34:6–7; Josh. 15:47); “the sea” (Pss. 80:11; 107:23); “the seashore” (Gen. 49:13; 1 Kings 4:20; etc.). (b) Of the Red Sea (Ex. 15:4; Josh. 24:6), or of one of its gulfs (Num. 11:31; Isa. 11:15), and perhaps the sea (1 Kings 10:22) traversed by Solomon’s fleet. The place “where two seas met” (Acts 27:41) is understood by Smith and approved by Ramsay to be “a neck of land projecting toward the island of Samonetta, which shelters St. Paul’s Bay on the northwest.”

3. The term is also applied to the great lakes of Palestine, whether fresh or salt; e.g., (a) The Sea of Chinnereth (Num. 34:11) called in the NT “the Sea of Galilee” (Matt. 4:18), the “Sea of Tiberias” (John 21:1), and the Sea (or lake) of Gennesaret (Matt. 14:34; Mark 6:53; Luke 5:1). (See Galilee, Sea of). (b) The Dead Sea, called also the Salt Sea (Gen. 14:3), the sea of the Arabah (Deut. 4:49), and the eastern sea (Joel 2:20; Ezek. 47:18; Zech. 14:8). It is neither named nor alluded to in the NT. (c) The Lake Merom is named only in Josh. 11:5, 7, as the “waters of Merom.”

4. Yām is also applied to great rivers, as the Nile (Isa. 19:5; Amos 8:8; Nah. 3:8; Ezek. 32:2) and the Euphrates (Jer. 51:36).

Figurative. To enclose “the sea with doors” (Job 38:8) is a symbolical expression for restraining, fixing a bound thereto. “The sea speaks” (Isa. 23:4) is figurative for the rock island upon which new Tyre stood and made her lamentation; the noise of hostile armies is likened to the “roaring of the sea” (5:30; Jer. 6:23); “waves of the sea” represent righteousness (Isa. 48:18), a devastating army (Ezek. 26:3–4), and in their restlessness the wicked (Isa. 57:20) and the unsteady (James 1:6); the diffusion of spiritual truth over the earth is symbolized by the covering waters of the sea (Isa. 11:9; Hab. 2:14); “wild waves of the sea, casting up their own shame like foam” (Jude 13) is a figurative description of false teachers who threw out their obscene teachings like wreckage upon the shore. “The abundance of the sea” (Isa. 60:5) is everything of value that is possessed by islands and coastlands; “the princes of the sea” (Ezek. 26:16) is a figurative term for the merchants of Tyre; “from sea to sea” (Amos 8:12; Mic. 7:12) stands for “from one end of the world to the other.”

SEA, BRONZE (1 Kings 7:23–44; 2 Kings 25:2; 2 Chron. 4:2; Jer. 52:17). The great laver (which see) in Solomon’s Temple. This immense bronze bowl was placed on twelve oxen and orientated toward the four points of the compass. It was a new feature of the sanctuary court (1 Kings 7:23–26). It took the place of the laver of the Tabernacle, was ornately decorated with flowers and high relief, and was for the purpose of ceremonial washings. In the name given to it by Solomon (“sea”) and in its construction it demonstrates Syro-Phoenician influence as well as cosmic significance. The sea in the ancient Near East was widely recognized as possessing cosmic import (I. Benzinger, Hebraeische Archäologie [1927], p. 329). Solomon’s “bronze sea” can hardly be thought of as completely unconnected with the Mesopotamian “sea” (apsu), a term used both as a designation of the subterranean fresh water ocean, the source of life and fertility, and of a basin of holy water set up in the Temple (W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel, pp. 148f, 217, n. 67; G. E. Wright, The Biblical Archaeologist 7 [1944]: 74). Moreover, these various cosmic sources of water were pictured in mythological imagery as dragons, both in Akkad. (Apsu and Tiamat), Canaanite (“sea”) yammu, and “river,” naharu, and in biblical Heb. (“sea”) yām, “rivers,” nāḥārôt (Isa. 51:10; Ps. 72:8) for “sea” and for “streams” and “rivers” (Ps. 74:15; Hab. 3:8–9). In Mesopotamia the term sea denoted the supposed subterranean source of the great life-giving rivers of that land. Among the Phoenicians and Syrians this expression was used of the Mediterranean as the main source of Canaanite livelihood. The relation of the sea to the portable basins that Solomon made (1 Kings 7:38), which correspond to Phoenician portable basins discovered at Cyprus, was similar to that between the “sea” (apsu) and “the portable basins of water” (egubbe) in Babylonian temples (W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel, p. 149). M.F.U.

SEAL, SIGNET (Heb. ḥōtām; Gk. sphragis). A portable instrument used to stamp a document or other article, instead of or with the sign manual. The impression made therewith had the same legal validity as an actual signature, as is still the case in the East. Indeed, the importance attached to this method is so great that without a seal no document is considered authentic. In a similar manner coffers, doors of houses, and tombs were sealed.

Egyptian. The most familiar form of Egyptian jewelry is that of the so-called scaraboid seals; in these an elliptical piece of stone was carved on its upper convex surface into the likeness of a scarabeus, the sacred beetle of the Egyptians; and on the lower flat side bore inscriptions in intaglio. Examples of these seals are known as far back as the Fourth Dynasty, c. 2550 B.C. Sometimes they were made of blue pottery or porcelain and in many cases consisted of a lump of clay, impressed with a seal and attached to the document by strings.

Mesopotamian. At Uruk, biblical Erech (Gen. 10:10), modern Warka, c. 3500 B.C., the cylinder seal was introduced. In the White Temple two small square tablets of gypsum plaster were uncovered that contained impressions of cylinder seals. Such early seals were made in the form of a small engraved cylinder that left its impression by being rolled across soft clay. A jar or package was sealed with moist clay, and the cylinder seal was rolled over it. From their origin somewhere in the fourth millennium B.C., cylinder seals were constantly used until they gave way to the stamp seals of Persian times. They thus have a demonstrable history of more than three millennia. From Mesopotamia their manufacture and employment spread to peripheral regions as widely distant as India and Egypt. The adornment of the seals shows Mesopotamia's original contribution to art. The Uruk seals display amazing vitality and excellence. Henri A. Frankfort, formerly research professor of oriental archaeology at the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, made monumental studies in the development of the cylinder seal from the prehistoric period to the dynasties of ancient Sumer and Babylon down to the Persian period. See Frankfort's book, Cylinder Seals, supplemented by the book Cylinder Seals from the Diyala Region. Professor Frankfort dealt with almost 1,000 stratified seals discovered during the course of his direction of work for seven years in Iraq. Leon Legrain of the University of Pennsylvania also published two volumes in the field of cylinder seals. Of special interest is the lapis lazuli seal of Queen Puabi (or Shubad) uncovered by Woolley at Ur. Cylinder seals were incised on various hard surfaces including gold, silver, rock crystal, blue chalcedony, carnelian, marble, ivory, jasper, glazed pottery, and simple baked clay. The well-known seal of Darius the Great displays the king in his two-wheeled chariot between two date palms. Often seals contain both pictures and written material. Jar-handle seals were also common from c. 2500 B.C. These were used not only in signing Babylonian clay documents but in safekeeping jars containing valuable papers or commodities for shipment to distant lands. A cloth was placed over the neck of the container, soft clay smeared on top of the binding cord, and the cylinder rolled over the wet clay. If the seal was undisturbed at its destination, the merchandise was safe.

Hebrew. The use of clay in sealing is noticed in the book of Job (38:14) and the signet ring as an ordinary part of a man's equipment in the case of Judah (Gen. 38:18), who probably, like many modern Arabs, wore it suspended by a string from his neck or arm (Song of Sol. 8:6). The ring or the seal, as an emblem of authority in Egypt, Persia, and elsewhere is mentioned in the cases of Pharaoh with Joseph (Gen. 41:42), of Ahab (1 Kings 21:8), of Ahasuerus (Esther 3:10, 12; 8:2), of Darius (Dan. 6:17; also 1 Macc. 6:15), and as an evidence of a covenant in Jer. 32:10, 14; Neh. 9:38; 10:1; Hag. 2:23. Engraved signets were in use among the Hebrews in early times, as is evident in the description of the high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28:11, 36; 39:6); and the work of the engraver is mentioned as a distinct occupation (Ecclus. 38:27).

Figurative. "It is changed like clay under the seal," i.e., "it changes like the clay of a signet ring" (Delitzsch, Com., ad loc.), is an allusion to a cylinder seal, revolving like day and night (Job 38:14). In Song of Solomon 8:6 is the prayer "Put me like a seal over your heart," implying the approaching absence of the bridegroom and that the bride wished that her impression might be engraved on his arm and heart, i.e., his love and power. The meaning of the figurative expression "I will make you [Zerubbabel] like a signet ring" (Hag. 2:23; marg., "seal ring") is evident from the importance of the signet ring in the eyes of an oriental, who is accustomed to carry it continually with him and to take care of it as a valuable possession; also in the same sense when Jehovah says, "Though Coniah [i.e., Jehoiachin] ... were a signet ring on My right hand, yet I would pull you off" (Jer. 22:24). The term sealed is used for that which is permanent (Isa. 8:16), confirmed (John 6:27; Rom. 4:11), that which is to be kept secret (Dan. 12:4, 9), impenetrable to men but known to Christ (Rev. 5:2), approval (John 3:33). To set "a seal upon the stars" (Job 9:7) means to cover them with clouds so that their light is excluded from men, whereas to seal "the hand of every man" (37:7) is to prevent men from working by reason of the cold. The "seal of the living God," on which is supposed to be engraved the name of Jehovah, impressed upon the foreheads of the faithful, symbolizes safety and deliverance from judgment (Rev. 7:2–8). A seal also denotes the indwelling of the Holy Spirit (Eph. 1:13; 4:30; 2 Cor. 1:22; see Mark). The seals upon the “foundation of God” (2 Tim. 2:19) are inscriptions upon this mystical building, proper to be impressed upon the minds of all professing Christians, both for encouragement and for warning. SEAM. Our Lord’s inner garment, for which the soldiers cast lots (John 19:23), was “seamless,” i.e., it was woven entire, from the neck down.

SEA MONSTER. See Animal Kingdom: Dragon; Whale.

SEA OF GLASS (Gk. thalassa hualinē, “glassy sea,” Rev. 4:6; 15:2). The “sea of glass” recalls the typology of the OT, which enters richly into the structure of the Apocalypse. The allusion is evidently to the Tabernacle laver (Ex. 30:18–21) and possibly more directly to the molten sea in the Solomonic Temple (1 Kings 7:23–37); both were used for priestly ablutions. However, the “sea of glass” points to a fixed state of holiness, both inward and outward, and its being “around the throne” would indicate that the purity is in keeping with the holy character of the throne itself. The “sea of glass” is said to be “like crystal.” The crystal denotes the splendor and beauty of that scene of holiness spread out before the throne. The two symbols, glass and crystal, are closely allied but are not quite the same. The former is a manufactured article; the latter a native substance. The sea of glass is expressive of smoothness, and this heavenly sea is of crystal, demonstrating that the peace of heaven is not like earthly seas, disturbed by winds, but is crystallized into an eternal peace. M.F.U.

SEA OF JA’ZER (Jer. 48:32). A lake, now represented by some ponds in the high valley in which the city of Jazer (which see) is situated.

SEAR (Gk. kautēriazō, “to brand”). The term is used (1 Tim. 4:2) figuratively of the conscience. Those of whom the apostle speaks were branded with the marks of sin, i.e., carry about with them the perpetual consciousness of sin. But the meaning seems more precisely to be that their conscience, like cauterized flesh, was deprived of sensation.

SEASHORE, SEACOAST.

1. The shore of a seacoast (Heb. ḥôp, “chafed” by waves, Gesenius; or enclosed, Fuerst; cf. English cove; see Deut. 1:7; Judg. 5:17; Jer. 47:7; Ezek. 25:16; Josh. 9:1; “coast,” NIV).

2. The extremity of the land (Josh. 15:2, KJV, “shore,” Heb. qāṣeh, “end,” “extremity”; several translations for the Heb. term appear in the NASB).

3. The edge, or lip, of the land, in our sense of seashore (Gen. 22:17; Ex. 14:30; etc.; Heb. šāpâ, “lip”).

4. The beach on which the waves dash (Gk. algialos; Matt. 13:2, 48; John 21:4; Acts 21:5; 27:39, 40; “beach,” NASB; “shore,” KJV; “shore,” “beach,” NIV).

5. The “lip” of the shore, or the “sea shore” (Heb. 11:12, KJV, from Gk. thalassa, “sea,” and cheilos, “lip”; NASB, NIV, “seashore”), as the place on which or from which the waves pour (cf. Matt. 15:8; Mark 7:6; Rom. 3:13, “lip,” from Gk. cheilos).

SEASON. See Time.

SEAT. As furniture. See House. Other usages in the Bible are as follows:

1. A throne, as usually rendered, but also any seat occupied by a king (Judg. 3:20) or other distinguished person, as the high priest (1 Sam. 1:9; 4:13, 18; Heb. kissē). In the NT we have Gk. bēma, of the “judgment seat” (Matt. 27:19; John 19:13; Acts 18:12, 16–17); of God

(Rom. 14:10); of Christ (2 Cor. 5:10); “seat on the tribunal” (Acts 25:6, 10, 17); kathedra, in the usual sense of place (Matt. 21:12; Mark 11:15); but generally of the exalted seat occupied by men of eminent rank or influence, as teachers and judges; thus “the Pharisees have seated themselves in the chair of Moses,” i.e., consider themselves as Moses’ successors in explaining and defending the law (Matt. 23:2).

2. An abode (Heb. môshāb, “a seat”; 1 Sam. 20:18, 25; Job 29:7); a “sitting,” i.e., assembly of persons sitting together (Ps. 1:1); the site of an image (Ezek. 8:3).

Figurative. “I sit in the seat of gods” (Ezek. 28:2). The language ascribed to the prince of Tyre is that of pride. “The Tyrian state was the production and seat of its gods. He, the prince of Tyre, presided over this divine creation and divine seat; therefore, he the prince, was himself a god, a manifestation of the deity, having its work and home in the state of Tyre” (Kliefoth). The prophetic meaning sets forth Satan in his connection with the government of this world system (Dan. 10:13, 20; Eph. 6:10).

3. A place, or dwelling (Job 23:3). Heb. t□-kûnâ.

4. In the KJV seat (Gk. thronos) is used figuratively for kingly power (Luke 1:52); of Satan (Rev. 2:13, 13:2; 16:10); of the elders (which see; 4:4; 11:16). Translated “throne” in NASB and NIV.

5. “The front seats” (Luke 11:43), “chief seats” (20:46), is the rendering of Gk. prōtokathedria, the first or principal seats, and means preeminent in council.

SE’BA (sē’ba).

1. The oldest son of Cush and hence a country and people among the Cushites (Gen. 10:7; 1 Chron. 1:9).

2. The name of a people (Ps. 72:10; Isa. 43:3). See Sabeans.

SE’BAM (sē’bam). Shebam, KJV; one of the towns in the pastoral district E of Jordan—demanded by, and finally ceded to, the tribes of Reuben and Gad (Num. 32:3 only). It is probably the same that appears in the altered form of Sibmah (which see).

SE’BAT (sē’bat) or She’bat (shē’bat). The fifth month of the Hebrew civil year. See Calendar; Time.

SECA’CAH (se-ka’ka; “thicket, enclosure”). A town in the wilderness of Judah, near the Dead Sea (Josh. 15:61). Noted for its “great cistern,” identified by some with Sikkeh but position uncertain.

SECOND COMING OF CHRIST. The great event that will wind up this present age. Premillennialists believe that Christ will come to establish a visible earthly kingdom over Israel for at least 1,000 years. Amillennialists hold that the second coming of Christ will initiate the eternal state. The amillennialist rejects the future earthly program for Israel and mysticizes the great OT prophecies concerning Zion and Jerusalem, etc., to refer to the Christian church. The postmillennialist believes that Christ will return to the earth after the Millennium. Premillennialists believe that the return of Christ consists of two events or stages. Pretribulation premillennialists hold that Christ will return for His church (1 Cor. 15:51–55; 1 Thess. 4:13–18), glorify it, and take it to heaven before a seven-year period known as the Great Tribulation (Jer. 30:5; Dan. 9:27; etc.). At the end of this cataclysmic seven-year period Christ will return in power and glory to judge the nations and set up His millennial kingdom. Midtribulationists believe that Christ will return in the middle of Daniel’s seventieth week. Posttribulationists reject the idea of a separate appearance of Christ for the church and have the church going through the entire Tribulation. Exhaustive inductive study of Scripture seems to favor the pretribulation-rapture view. M.F.U.

SECOND QUARTER (Heb. mishneh, “repetition,” 2 Kings 22:14). The residence of the prophetess Hulda (which see). The word mishneh should be taken as a proper name referring to a district or suburb of the city. The NIV translates “Second District.” The same term is used in Zeph. 1:10, where the different quarters of Jerusalem are spoken of.

SECOND SABBATH. (Luke 6:1). See Sabbath, Second After the First.

SECRET. See Mystery.

SECT (Gk. hairesis, a “choice”). A religious party such as Sadducees (Acts 5:17), Pharisees (15:5), or Nazarenes (24:5; cf. 26:5; 28:22).

SE'CU (se'ku; “a lookout place”). A site of a large well, probably lying on the route between Saul's residence, Gibeah, and that of Samuel, Ramathaim-zophim (1 Sam. 19:22). The modern Suweikeh, immediately S of Beeroth, is suggested as its site.

SECUN'DUS (se-kun'dus, “second”). A Thessalonian Christian and one of the party who went with the apostle Paul from Corinth as far as Asia, probably to Troas or Miletus, on his return from his third missionary visit (Acts 20:4).

SECURITY. The doctrine that maintains the continuation of salvation for those who are saved. It must be distinguished from the doctrine of assurance (which see). It must also be clearly remembered that it concerns only the regenerate. The doctrine of security is based upon twelve undertakings of God for His people, four related to the Father, four to the Son, and four to the Holy Spirit.

The Father's Undertakings. (1) The efficacy of the perpetual prayer of the Son upon the Father (John 17:9–12, 15, 20). (2) Infinite divine power made available to save and keep (John 10:29; Rom. 4:21; 8:31–39; Eph. 1:19–21). (3) God's infinite love (Eph. 1:4–5; Rom. 5:7–10). (4) God's sovereign purpose or covenant, which is unconditional (John 3:16; 5:24; 6:37).

The Son's Undertakings. (1) His intercession (John 17:1–26; Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:23–25). (2) His advocacy (Rom. 8:34; Heb. 9:24; 1 John 2:1–2). (3) His substitutionary death (Rom. 8:1–4; 1 John 2:2). (4) His glorious resurrection (John 3:16; 10:28; Eph. 2:6).

The Spirit's Undertakings. (1) Regeneration, or quickening into eternal life, which is the partaking of the divine nature and an entrance into that which cannot be removed (John 1:13; 3:3–6; Titus 3:4–6; 1 John 3:9). (2) Baptism, by which the believer is united to Christ so as to partake eternally in the new creation glory and blessing (1 Cor. 6:17; 12:13; Gal. 3:27). (3) Sealing, by which the Holy Spirit stamps and thus secures the Christian as God's child (Eph. 1:13–14; 4:30). (4) Indwelling, by which the Spirit inhabits the redeemed body forever (John 7:37–39; Rom. 5:5; 8:9; 1 Cor. 6:19; 1 John 2:27).

The NT clearly teaches that God offers no salvation at the present time that is not eternal. Although this doctrine has been greatly misunderstood and abused, when rightly understood it offers a powerful boon to a holy life (cf. 1 John 2:1). Arminian doctrines reject security, employing experience as a proof. However, the Scriptures commonly so employed, when clearly classified, do not favor insecurity: (1) Passages concerning false teachers of the last days of the church (1 Tim. 4:1–3; 2 Pet. 2:1–22; Jude 17:19) that concern apostates or those who were never saved. (2) Passages comprehending no more than moral reform: for example, Luke 11:24–26. (3) Passages dispensationally misapplied (Ezek. 21:1–48; 33:7–8; Matt. 18:23–35; 24:13; 25:1–13). (4) Passages relating to loss of rewards and chastisement (John 15:2; 1 Cor. 3:15; 9:27; 11:27–32; Col. 1:21–23; 1 John 1:5–9; 5:16). (5) Passages relating to falling from grace, that is, leaving the grace way of life for the legal way of life (Gal. 5:4). (6) Passages containing various admonitions (Heb. 6:4–9; 10:26–31).

The doctrine of security has suffered much confusion and misuse. It is rejected by many theologians and subscribed to by others but abused by antinomian teaching and living. It is nevertheless a clear teaching of Scripture, and when properly understood and faithfully believed it is a doctrine of immense spiritual benefit and blessing. M.F.U.

SEDITION (Heb. eshtaddûr, “revolt”; Gk. stasis, a “standing”), Seditious (Gk. dichostasia). The term sedition appears more frequently in the KJV than the NASB or NIV.

It has the sense of rebellion (Ezra 4:15, 19; “revolt,” NASB), insurrection (Luke 23:19, 25), or dissension (Acts 15:2; 24:5; “troublemaker,” NIV). The Gk. word behind the English term seditious (Gal. 5:20, KJV; “dissensions,” NASB, NIV) has the meaning of “a standing apart.”

SEDUCERS. The term seducer in the KJV of 2 Tim. 3:13 (from Gk. goēs) has the meaning of “impostors” (so NASB and NIV).

SEED. See Agriculture.

Figurative. As the prolific principle of future life, seed in Scripture is taken for the posterity of man (Gen. 3:15; 4:25, marg.; etc.), of beasts (Jer. 31:27), trees (Gen. 1:11–12, 29; etc.). The seed of Abraham denotes not only those who descend from him by natural issue but those who imitate his character, independent of natural descent (Rom. 4:16, see marg.). In this sense the NIV usually translates “offspring.” Seed is figurative of God’s Word (Luke 8:5, 11; 1 Pet. 1:23), and its preaching is called “sowing” (Luke 8:5; Matt. 13:32; 1 Cor. 9:11). Sowing seed is symbolical of scattering or dispersing a people (Zech. 10:9, marg.), of dispensing liberally (Eccles. 11:6; 2 Cor. 9:6), of working evil (Job 4:8), righteousness (Hos. 10:12), or deeds in general (Gal. 6:8). Christ compares His death to the sowing of seed with its results (John 12:24); Paul likens the burial of the body to the sowing of seed (1 Cor. 15:36–38).

SEEDTIME. See Agriculture.

SEER. See Prophet.

SEETHE (Heb. bāshal), Seething pot (Heb. nā-paḥ). The archaic English terms refer to boiling (so NASB and NIV, Ex. 16:23; 23:19; Job 41:20; Jer. 1:13; etc.).

SE’GUB (se’gub; “elevated”).

1. The youngest son of Hiel the Bethelite and builder of Jericho. Segub died for his father’s sin (1 Kings 16:34), according to Joshua’s prediction (cf. Josh. 6:26), between 875 and 854 B.C.

2. The son of Hezron (grandson of Judah) by the daughter of Machir the “father” of Gilead. He was himself the father of Jair (1 Chron. 2:21–22), perhaps about 1900 B.C.

SE’IR (sē’ir; “rough, hairy”). A chief of the Horites (which see), the former inhabitants of the country afterward possessed by the Edomites (Gen. 36:20–21; 1 Chron. 1:38). Whether he gave the name to the country or took it from it is uncertain.

SE’IR, LAND OF. The mountainous territory of Edom (Gen. 32:3; 36:30). See Seir, Mount.

SE’IR, MOUNT (mownt sē’ir; Gen. 14:6). References to “Seir” in the Bible are to three locations.

Mount Seir. This is the range of mountains running southward from the Dead Sea, E of the valley of Arabah to the Elanitic Gulf. The earliest mention of Mt. Seir is in the Bible account of Chedorlaomer’s campaign in the days of Abraham. This was long before the birth of Esau; and it is said that the Horites (which see) were then its inhabitants. The Israelites were forbidden to enter this region, as Jehovah had given it to Esau for a possession (Deut. 2:5). The mention of Esau's move to Mt. Seir follows immediately on the mention of Isaac's death and burial (Gen. 35:27–36:8). At the base of this chain of mountains are low hills of limestone or argillaceous rocks, then lofty masses of porphyry, which constitute the body of the mountain; above these is sandstone broken into irregular ridges and grotesque groups of cliffs; and again, farther back and higher than all, are long elevated ridges of limestone without precipices. Beyond all these stretches off indefinitely the high plateau of the great eastern desert. The height of the porphyry cliffs is estimated by Robinson at about two thousand feet above the Arabah (the great valley between the Dead Sea and Elanitic Gulf), whereas the limestone ridges farther back do not fall short of three thousand feet. The whole breadth of the mountainous tract between the Arabah and the eastern desert above is not more than fifteen or twenty miles. These mountains are quite different in character from those that front them on the W side of the Arabah. The latter seem to be not more than two-thirds as high, whereas those on the E appear to enjoy a sufficiency of rain and are covered with tufts of herbs and occasional trees. The general appearance of the soil resembles that around Hebron, although the face of the country is different. It is, indeed, the region of which Isaac said to his son Esau, "Behold, away from the fertility of the earth shall be your dwelling, and away from the dew of heaven from above" (27:39).

The Land of Seir. This is the land located to the S and E of Beersheba. Esau married and had children long before he permanently left his old home near Beersheba, and that region over which Esau extended his patriarchal stretch came to be known as "the land of Seir" (or Esau) and the "country [or field] of Edom" (Gen. 32:3). Here Esau was living when Jacob came back from Paddan-aram, for Isaac was not yet dead, and it was not until after his death that Esau moved to Mt. Seir (35:27–36:8). When the brothers had met, Jacob spoke of himself as journeying by easy stages toward the home of Esau, in Seir—Esau's present "Seir," not Esau's prospective "Mount Seir" (cf. 33:13–20; 35:27). Then it was—and even until the very day of Jacob's return—that Esau was a dweller in "the land of Seir, the country of Edom" (32:1–3), not the Mt. Seir, or the Edom that as the equivalent of Mt. Seir. This designation of the land of Esau's occupancy in southern Canaan by the name "Seir," which existed at the time of Jacob's return from Paddan-aram, was never lost to it. It was found there when the Israelites made their unauthorized raid northward from Kadesh-barnea (Deut. 1:44). To the present time there remain traces of the old name of "Seir" in the region SE of Beersheba and yet N of the natural southern boundary line of the land of Canaan. The extensive plain "Es Seir" is there, corresponding with the name and location of "Seir" (1:44) at which, or unto which, the Israelites were chased by the Amorites when they went up in foolhardiness from Kadesh-barnea.

Another Mount Seir. This mountain formed one of the landmarks on the N boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:10 only). It was to the W of Kiriath-jearim and between it and Beth-shemesh. It is a ridge of rock to the SW of Kureyet el Enab, a lofty ridge composed of rugged peaks with a wild and desolate appearance, upon which Saris and Mishir are situated (Robinson, Biblical Researches, p. 155).

SEI'RAH (se-ī'ra; "woody district, shaggy"). A place in the mountains of Ephraim, bordering on Benjamin, to which Ehud went for refuge after killing Eglon at Jericho (Judg. 3:26).

SE'LA (sē'la; "rock"; Judg. 1:36; cf. Obad. 3, marg.). Probably the capital city of the Edomites, later known as Petra. It took its name from its situation and the mode in which it was built, since it was erected in a valley surrounded by rocks and in such a manner that the houses were partly hewn in the natural rock. It was still flourishing in the first centuries of the Christian era, and splendid ruins still exist. The excavations are remarkable, consisting of what appear to be the facades of great temples and immense theaters, hewn in rock of variegated colors. The place seems to have been the center of interest and trade from time immemorial. It was taken by Amaziah, king of Judah, and called by him Joktheel (2 Kings 14:7; cf. 2 Chron. 25:11–12). In about 300 B.C. Sela (Gk. Petra, “rock”) passed from the Edomites to the Nabataean Arabs, whose remarkable kingdom lasted till A.D. 105, when Arabia Petrea became a province of the Roman Empire.

SE’LAH (se’la). Probably a musical notation indicating an intended pause.

SE’LA-HAMMAH’LEKOTH. See Rock of Escape.

SE’LED (se’led; “exultation”). A descendant of Jerahmeel, of the tribe of Judah. He was the elder of two sons of Nadab and died childless (1 Chron. 2:30).

SELEU’CIA (se-lū’shi-a). A town near the mouth of the Orontes and the seaport of Antioch (which see) from which Paul sailed forth on his first missionary journey (Acts 13:4). It is almost certain that he landed there on his return (14:26). It was built by Seleucus Nicator, who built so many other cities of the same name that this was one called Seleucia Pieria, being near Mt. Pierus, and also Seleucia ad Mare, being nearer the sea. It retained its importance in Roman times and was a free city in the days of Paul. Now called Magaracik.

SELF-CONTROL (Gk. egkrateia); “temperance,” KJV. The virtue of one who masters his desires and passions, especially his sensual appetites (Acts 24:25; 1 Cor. 9:25; Gal. 5:23; 2 Pet. 1:6, where it is named as one of the Christian graces).

SELF-WILL (Heb. rāṣôn, “pleasure,” and, in a wicked sense, “wantonness,” Gen. 49:6). In the NT, self-willed is the rendering of Gk. authadēs, “self-pleasing, arrogant, overbearing” (Titus 1:7; 2 Pet. 2:10).

SELVEDGE. The edge of a woven or knitted fabric so prepared as not to ravel. The English term, from Heb. qāṣā, “end,” “extremity” (TWOT), does not appear in the NASB or NIV.

SEMACHI’AH (sem-a-kī’a; “Jehovah his sustained”), Semaki’ah (NIV). The last named of the six sons of Shemaiah, the son of Obed-edom (1 Chron. 26:7).

SEMAKI’AH. See Semachiah.

SEM’EIN (sem-ine). The son of Josech and father of Mattathias; in our Lord’s genealogy (Luke 3:26) probably Shemaiah (which see).

SENA’AH (se-na’a). The “sons of Senaah” are enumerated among the “people of Israel” who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:35; Neh. 7:38). In 3:3 the name is given with the article, has-Senaah. (See Hassenaah.) The names in these lists are mostly those of towns; but Senaah does not occur elsewhere in the Bible as attached to a town. The Magdal-Senna, or “great Senna,” of Eusebius and Jerome, seven miles N of Jericho (“Senna”), however, is not inappropriate in position.

SENATE (Gk. gerousia, “eldership”). A deliberative body, and in the NT (Acts 5:21) of not only those elders of the people who were members of the Sanhedrin but the whole body of elders generally, the whole council of the representatives of the people (Meyer, Com., ad loc.).

SENATORS (Heb. zāqēn, “old”; Ps. 105:22, KJV). Elders (so NASB, NIV).

SE’NEH (se’ne; “thornbush”). The name of one of the two isolated rocks that stood in the passage of Michmash, climbed by Jonathan and his armor-bearer, when he went to examine the Philistine camp (1 Sam. 14:4). It was the southern one of the two (14:5) and the nearest to Geba. The name in Hebrew means a “thorn,” or thornbush. Josephus mentions that the last encampment of Titus’s army was at a spot “which in the Jews’ tongue is called the valley,” or perhaps the plain “of thorns, near to a village called Gabath-saoulé,” i.e., Gibeah of Saul.

SE’NIR (se’nîr; Deut. 3:9; 1 Chron. 5:23; Song of Sol. 4:8; Ezek. 27:5, “pointed,” and so “peak”). The name given by the Amorites to Mt. Hermon (which see). The Sidonians called it Sirion, and in Ps. 29:6 Sirion is used poetically for Hermon.

SENNACH’ERIB (se-nak’er-ib; Akkad. “Sin,” i.e., the moon god, “has multiplied the brothers”). Sennacherib, one of the kings of Assyria, son of Sargon, ascended the throne on the twelfth day of Ab (July-August), 705 B.C. His father, Sargon, had been a usurper, and having gained his position by the sword, he also lost his life by it at the hands of a murderous soldier. There seems to have been no opposition to Sennacherib’s accession, as so often happened in the history of Assyria. He inherited a vast empire from his father, with abundant opportunities for its further extension. He had, however, not inherited his father’s boldness or daring, or his resources. All the powers of his mind were employed in holding together that which he had received. It is indeed doubtful whether he left his empire as strong as he had received it.

The records of Sennacherib’s reign have not come down to us in as complete a form as those of his predecessor or successor. Of the later years of his reign we have no Assyrian accounts. The earlier years are, however, well covered by the beautiful and well-preserved prism called the Taylor Cylinder, now in the British Museum. Of all Assyrian documents that have come down to us not one is in better preservation than this. It was found by Colonel Taylor in 1830. It is fourteen and one-half inches high and is covered on all of its six sides with fine Assyrian script, which sets forth the annals of the king. Complete translations of the records of Sennacherib can be found in Daniel D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, vol. 2, and in James Pritchard’s Ancient Near Eastern Texts (1950).

Against Babylon. Sargon had left a powerful empire, but not all sources of possible difficulty had been blotted out; neither had all peoples within the great territory been reduced to complete submission. Sennacherib was sure to meet with troubles in Babylonia. The people of Babylon had been brought into the Assyrian empire by force. They could not be expected to forget that they had had a magnificent history behind them while the people of Assyria were but laying the foundations of their state. It was hard for a city with so grand a history as Babylon’s to yield submission to the upstart power of Assyria. In the confusion that followed the close of Sargon’s reign the Babylonians saw the opportunity for another rebellion. The leader of this uprising was Merodach-baladan, who came from the lowland country far S of Babylon, near the Persian Gulf, called, in the texts of that period, the land of Kardunyash. It was probably a national uprising that Merodach-baladan led (see Merodach-baladan), but he had allies from the mountain land of Elam, and with their help he had himself crowned king in Babylon. Once more there was national rule in Babylonia, and the Assyrian supremacy was temporarily overthrown. For nine months Merodach-baladan reigned undisputedly. Then Sennacherib invaded Babylonia with an army that Merodach-baladan could not effectively resist. The contest was fought at Kish, and the defeat of the Babylonians was complete. Merodach-baladan fled alone and escaped with his life. The victorious Sennacherib entered Babylon and plundered everything that had belonged to his unfortunate adversary but seems not to have disturbed the possessions of the citizens. He then marched S into the land of Kaldi, from where the rebels had drawn their supplies. The overthrow was complete in every particular. Seventy-five cities and four hundred smaller towns and hamlets were taken and despoiled. This invasion was carried out with heartless cruelty, as the description of the taking of one city testifies. Sennacherib said, “The men of the city Khirimme, a rebellious enemy, I cast down with arms; I left not one alive; their corpses I bound on stakes and placed them around the city.” Over the reduced country an Assyrian named Bel-ibni was made king, subject to Sennacherib. But this was not the end of Sennacherib’s difficulties with Babylonia.

Against the Kassites. Sennacherib’s next campaign was directed against people called the Kassi, together with the Medes and other races living along and beyond the upper waters of the Tigris. Although he boasted of victory, there seems to have been little result from it. He claimed to have “widened his territory,” but we can find no evidence that Assyrian supremacy was actually carried much farther. The chief result of the campaign was probably “a heavy tribute” and the intimidating of some peoples who otherwise might have been troublesome when campaigns against the West were undertaken.

Against Palestine-Syria. The third campaign of Sennacherib was directed against the land of the Hittites, 701 B.C. At this period this term did not mean the same as it did before the days of Sargon, who had destroyed the last of the Hittite city-states in 709 B.C. Land of the Hittites now meant only the land of Phoenicia and Palestine. This western country had often before been invaded by Babylonia and Assyria (see articles Assyria; Sargon; Shalmaneser; Tiglath-pileser; and Chedorlaomer), but conquests had temporary effect. Rebellions were frequent. It would be yet a long time before autonomy would die out among the commercial Phoenicians and the patriotic and religious Hebrews. Sennacherib seems to have come suddenly into the W, and his success at first was probably because of the unpreparedness of the native kings and princes. Elulaeus, king of Sidon, offered no resistance but fled from the invader. His cities of Sidon, Sarepta, Acco (now Acre), Ekdippa, and others were quickly subdued and plundered. Ethbaal was made king over them, and a heavy annual tribute was assessed upon the inhabitants. The news of this great Assyrian victory spread southward, and many petty kings sent presents and acknowledged Sennacherib as their suzerain, hoping thereby to save their cities from destruction and their lands from plunder. Among those who thus yielded without a blow for freedom were the rulers of Arvad, Byblos, Moab, and Edom. The king of Ashkelon, Tsidqa, did not send tribute, and his land was therefore next attacked. The resistance seems to have been slight, and Ashkelon was soon taken. The king and all his family were deported to Assyria as captives, and his cities of Beth-dagon, Joppa, Beneberak (Josh. 19:45), and Azuru were plundered. The people of Ekron had also refused to submit to Sennacherib. Their ruler, Padi, who had been set over them by the Assyrians, was chained and delivered over to Hezekiah, king of Judah. This move on their part probably signifies their allegiance to the league of Judah and Egypt, which proposed to resist Sennacherib. When Sennacherib was ready to attack Ekron the Egyptian army appeared accompanied by its allies from Melukhkha. A battle took place at Eltekeh (19:44; 21:23), and once more Sennacherib claimed a victory. Of the fight he says little, except that a few captives were taken. He did not, however, follow up the Egyptians, and it is therefore probable that he respected their prowess and was desirous of avoiding the risk of a second and desperate conflict. He was content rather with taking Eltekeh and Timnah (Gen. 38:12; Josh. 15:10; etc.; modern Tibneh), then falling back to punish Ekron. His own words describe his deeds: “To the city of Ekron I went; the governors (and) princes, who had committed a transgression, I killed and bound their corpses on poles around the city. The inhabitants of the city who had committed sin and evil I counted as spoil; to the rest of them who had committed no sin and wrong, who had no guilt, I spoke peace. Padi, their king, I brought forth from the city of Jerusalem; upon the throne of lordship over them I placed him. The tribute of my lordship I laid upon him.”

Invasion of Judah. Immediately upon this victory over Ekron came Sennacherib’s invasion of the kingdom of Judah. This is known to us from the biblical account in 2 Kings 18:13–19:36. It fills a large space in Israel’s history, and it was a moment of thrilling interest when Sennacherib’s own version of the invasion was found. His story is so important for the student of the Bible that it is here translated entire: “As for Hezekiah the Jew, who did not submit to my yoke, forty-six of his strong walled cities, as well as the small cities in their neighborhood, which were without number—by constructing a rampart out of trampled earth and by bringing up battering rams, by the attack of infantry, by tunnels, breaches and the use of axes, I besieged and took. Two hundred thousand one hundred and fifty men, young and old, male and female, horses, mules, asses, camels, oxen and sheep without number I brought out from them, I counted as spoil. Hezekiah himself I shut up like a caged bird in Jerusalem, his royal city; the walls I fortified against him, and whosoever came out of the gates of the city, I turned back. His cities, which I had plundered, I divided from his land and gave them to Mitinti, king of Ashdod, to Padi, king of Ekron, and to Sillibel, king of Gaza, and thus diminished his territory. To the former tribute, paid yearly, I added the tribute of alliance of my lordship and laid that upon him. Hezekiah himself was overwhelmed by the fear of the brightness of my lordship; the Arabians and his other faithful warriors whom, as a defense for Jerusalem his royal city he had brought in, fell into fear. With thirty talents of gold and eight hundred talents of silver, precious stones, rouge dakkasi, lapis lazuli, couches of ivory, thrones of ivory, ivory, ushu wood, ukarinnu wood, various objects, a heavy treasure, and his daughters, his women of the palace, male and female musicians, to Nineveh, the city of my lordship, I caused to be brought after me; and he sent his ambassadors to give tribute and to pay homage.” Sennacherib does not name the place where he received this great tribute from Hezekiah. From the Bible we learn that it was Lachish (18:14). From Sennacherib we also learn that he had besieged and taken the same city of Lachish, present-day Tell ed-Duweir, now well known as a result of archaeological excavation. A splendid wall relief from his palace at Nineveh and now in the British Museum depicts the event. Sennacherib is represented seated upon a throne receiving men bearing presents. In front of the king’s head are these words: “Sennacherib, the king of the world, the king of Assyria, sat on his throne, and the spoil of the city of Lachish marched before him.” With the words, given above, of tribute and embassies of homage Sennacherib concluded his account of his campaigns to the W. The biblical account adds one detail more in these words: “Then it happened that night that the angel of the Lord went out, and struck 185,000 in the camp of the Assyrians; and when men rose early in the morning, behold, all of them were dead” (2 Kings 19:35). Of this great destruction there is no hint in Sennacherib’s inscriptions. It was indeed not to be expected that such a record would be made under any circumstances. The Assyrians reported only victories. At any rate Sennacherib never invaded Palestine again. The chronological data of the Assyrians locate this famous Judean campaign in the year 701 B.C.

Later Campaigns. After the Judean campaign Sennacherib found opposed to him a powerful coalition of Elamites, Babylonians, Aramaeans, and Medians, with whom he fought at Chalule in the year 691 B.C. The result was a doubtful victory for the Assyrian army. It seems indeed that Sennacherib did little more than ward off destruction and postpone for a time the inevitable ruin of the empire.

Again and again there was trouble and rebellion in Babylonia. Now it is the once-defeated Merodach-baladan, again it is Suzub, the Chaldean. Indeed so numerous were the uprisings in Babylonia that it is now almost impossible to distinguish them and understand their significance. After several invasions and fruitless peacemakings, Sennacherib took Babylon, broke down its walls, and practically ruined the city. This was in 689 B.C. In this year came thus to an end for a time the glory of this once invincible city. The destruction can only be regarded as an act of revengeful folly. It did not quell the turbulent spirits of the Babylonians, who could not be brought into subjection by such means, and it only left a legacy of trouble to Sennacherib’s sons and successor. Sennacherib’s own opinion of the people of Babylonia was expressed in the phrase “evil devils.” He could not understand them, and their patriotic love of the city by the Euphrates was not a sentiment to be admired but passion to be destroyed.

The result of all these wars was only retention of what Sargon had won. Of real expansion there was none.

In spite of wars and dissensions Sennacherib was able also to give attention to the arts of peace. In Nineveh he constructed two magnificent palaces, and the city walls and gates he rebuilt or restored. By constructing the huge so-called Aqueduct of Jerwan, Sennacherib made Nineveh a garden city. This, the first Mesopotamian aqueduct known, brought water from some thirty miles distant. He also introduced the shadūf or well sweep from Egypt.

The inscriptions give no hint concerning the manner of Sennacherib's death in the year 681 B.C. The Bible, however, supplies the missing detail by showing that he died at the hands of his two sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer, while he was engaged in worship (19:37). These statements agree well with the known facts that Sennacherib had preferred Esarhaddon above his brothers and that there was jealousy among the other members of the family.

SENSE.

1. (Heb. śekel “intelligence”). Thus it is said that Ezra and others “read from the book, from the law of God, translating to give the sense” (Neh. 8:8), i.e., caused the people to understand.

2. Gk. aisthētērion, “faculty of the mind” for perceiving, understanding, judging (Heb. 5:14).

SENSUAL. The KJV use of the term in James 3:15; Jude 19 is taken from Gk. psuchikos, given as “natural” or “worldly-minded” in the NASB, and “unspiritual,” or “natural” in the NIV. It refers to having the nature and characteristics of the psuchē, i.e., of the principle of animal life, which men have in common with the beasts (1 Cor. 15:44). It has also the meaning of being governed by the psuchē, i.e., by the sensuous nature with its subjection to appetite and passion (Jude 19; cf. 1 Cor. 2:14). So in James 3:15, sensual wisdom is that which is in harmony with the corrupt desires and springing from them.

The term in the NASB is taken from other Gk. and Heb. words in the original and has the meaning of voluptuous (Isa. 47:8), sensual (Ezek. 33:32), physical desire (1 Tim. 5:11), or sensuality (2 Pet. 2:7).

SENSUALITY (Gk. aselgeia, that which “excites disgust”; the term does not appear in the KJV, the Gk. term usually being given there as “lasciviousness”). Unbridled lust, licentiousness, lasciviousness, wantonness. It is included in the list of evil products named by our Lord (Mark 7:22), and is included with drunkenness and carousing (1 Pet. 4:3) and “the deeds of the flesh” such as immorality and impurity (2 Cor. 12:21; Gal. 5:19; Eph. 4:19). In Jude 4 the Gk. is rendered “licentiousness” and is used to describe what ungodly persons turn the grace of God into. The NIV uses the word only in Eph. 4:19.

SENTENCES. The “hard sentences” of Dan. 5:12, KJV, are enigmas (so NASB), or riddles (so NIV); the ability to understand “dark sentences” (Dan. 8:23, KJV) refers to skill in intrigue (so NASB, NIV) or skill in “ambiguous speech,” the marginal reading.

SEPARATION. The Levitical law provided that persons contaminated by certain defilements should be excluded for a longer or shorter period from the fellowship of the sanctuary and sometimes even from relations with their fellow countrymen. These defilements comprised the uncleanness of a woman in consequence of childbearing (Lev. 12), leprosy (chaps. 13–14), both natural and diseased secretions from the sexual organs of either male or female (chap. 15), and from a human corpse (Num. 19:11–22). See Uncleanness.

SE'PHAR (se'far; "numbering"). "The hill country of the east," mentioned in connection with the Joktanite boundaries (Gen. 10:30). The immigration of the Joktanites was probably from W to E, and they occupied the SW portion of the Arabian peninsula. There is some agreement that Sephar is preserved in the ancient city of Zhafar—now pronounced Isfôr—in the province of Hadramaut, of South Arabia, not far from the seaport Mirbat.

SEPHA'RAD (se-fa'rad). In Obadiah (v. 20) it is said that the exiles of Jerusalem were "in Sepharad." Sepharad may possibly be Sardis in W Asia Minor or a part of Media SW of the Caspian Sea. The name occurs in Assyrian inscriptions and may have a connection with Shaparda mentioned by Sargon as a district of SW Media (cf. 2 Kings 17:6).

SEPHARVAIM (se-far-va'yim). The name of a city under Assyrian rule, from which people were transported and settled in Samaria, in the reign of Sargon, along with other people from Cuthah, Babylon, Avva, and Hamath (2 Kings 17:24). It appears from other biblical allusions that Sepharvaim was in a country that had but a short time before this been conquered by the Assyrians; it was not in a land that formed an integral portion of the Assyrian empire (2 Kings 18:34; 19:13; Isa. 36:19; 37:13). It has been identified commonly with the city Sippar, the ruins of which were found by Hormuzd Rassam, at Abu Habba, SW of Baghdad, and near the Euphrates. This identification is, however, fraught with great difficulty and may indeed be regarded as practically impossible. Sepharvaim has a different form from Sippar; it is mentioned always in connection with Hamath, as though it were located in the vicinity; it was recently conquered by the Assyrians while Sippar was an ancient city in Babylonian territory. For these and other reasons scholars have with practical unanimity ceased to connect Sepharvaim with the ancient Babylonian city of Sippar. Instead of this the identification proposed by Halevy has received common acceptance, namely, that Sepharvaim is the same as the city Sibraim (Ezek. 47:16) and that this is the city mentioned in the Babylonian chronicle under the name of Saberim, which lies in the Hamath district and was conquered by Shalmaneser V in 727 B.C. In these particulars it exactly suits the requirements of the biblical Sepharvaim. The proof is, however, not positive, although the case is at least plausible.

SE'PHARVITE (se'far-vīt). A native of Sepharvaim (which see; 2 Kings 17:31).

SEP'TUAGINT. See Versions of the Scripture.

SEPULCHER. See Tomb.

SE'RAH (se'ra). The daughter of Asher, the son of Jacob (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:46, "Sarah," KJV; 1 Chron. 7:30). The mention of her name in a list of this kind, in which no others of her sex are named, and contrary to the usual practice of the Jews, seems to indicate something extraordinary in connection with her history or circumstances. The Jews have a tradition that she was remarkable for piety and virtue and was therefore privileged to be the first person to tell Jacob that his son Joseph was still living; on which account she was translated to paradise, where, according to the ancient book Zohar, are four mansions, each presided over by an illustrious woman: Serah, daughter of Asher; the daughter of Pharaoh, who brought up Moses; Jochebed, the mother of Moses; and Deborah, the prophetess.

SERA'IAH (se-ra'ya; "Jehovah has prevailed").

1. The scribe (or “secretary”) of David (2 Sam. 8:17), 986 B.C. In other places the name is corrupted into “Sheva” (20:25), “Shisha” (1 Kings 4:3), and “Shavsha” (1 Chron. 18:16).

2. The son of Azariah and high priest in the reign of Zedekiah (2 Kings 25:18; 1 Chron. 6:14; Ezra 7:1). When Jerusalem was captured by the Chaldeans, 587 B.C. he was sent as a prisoner to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah and there was put to death (Jer. 52:24–27).

3. An Israelite, the son of Tanhumeth the Netophathite, and one of those to whom Gedaliah advised submission to the Chaldeans (2 Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8), 588 B.C.

4. The second son of Kenaz and father of a Joab, who was the “father of Ge-harashim,” i.e., head of a family of the tribe of Judah, in the “valley of craftsmen” (1 Chron. 4:13–14, see marg.).

5. Son of Asiel and father of Joshibiah, of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:35).

6. A priest who returned from the captivity (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 12:1, 12), 536 B.C. He is, perhaps, the same who is mentioned (Neh. 10:2) as signing the covenant with Nehemiah as “leader of the house of God” (11:11).

7. The son of Azriel and one of the persons commanded by King Jehoiakim to apprehend Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer. 36:26), about 606 B.C.

8. The son of Neriah and brother of Baruch (Jer. 51:59; 61). He went with Zedekiah to Babylon in the fourth year of his reign and is described as śar-m□nūhâ, “quartermaster,” a title that is interpreted by Kimchi as that of the office of chamberlain. Perhaps he was an officer who took charge of the royal caravan on its march and fixed the place where it should halt. Seraiah was sent on an embassy to Babylon about four years before the fall of Jerusalem and was commissioned by the prophet Jeremiah to take with him on his journey the scroll in which he had written the doom of Babylon. He was to sink it in the midst of the Euphrates as a token that Babylon would sink, never to rise again (Jer. 51:60–64), 595 B.C.

SERAPHIM. (Heb. perhaps śārāp, “burning, fiery”). The meaning of the word seraph is extremely doubtful; the only word that resembles it in the current Hebrew is śārap, “to burn,” whence the idea of brilliance has been extracted; but it is objected that the Heb. term never bears this secondary sense. Gesenius connects it with an Arab. term shrafa signifying “high” or “exalted”; and this may be regarded as the generally received etymology.

Nature. An order of celestial beings, whom Isaiah beheld in vision standing above Jehovah as He sat upon His throne (Isa. 6:2, 6). They are described as each of them having three pairs of wings; with one they covered their faces (a token of humility), with the second they covered their feet (a token of respect), while with the third they flew. They seem to have borne a general resemblance to the human figure, for they are represented as having face, voice, feet, and hands (v. 2).

Occupation. The seraphim that Isaiah saw hovered above on both sides of Him that sat upon the throne, forming two opposite choirs and presenting antiphonal worship. Their occupation was twofold—to celebrate the praises of Jehovah’s holiness and power (v. 3) and to act as the medium of communication between heaven and earth (v. 6). They are beings expressive of the divine holiness and demand that the saint shall be cleansed before serving (Isa. 6:6–8). From their antiphonal chant (“one called out to another”) we may conceive them to have been ranged in opposite rows on each side of the throne. See Cherubim.

SERAPHS. See Seraphim.

SE’RED (se’red; cf. Syr. s□rad, “to be affrighted”). The firstborn of Zebulun (Gen. 46:14) and head of the family of the Seredites (Num. 26:26).

SERGEANTS. See Policemen.

SER'GIUS PAUL'US (sur'ji-us-pawl'us). The Roman proconsul of Cyprus at the time when Paul, with Barnabas, visited that island on his first missionary tour. He is described as an intelligent man, and hence entertained Elymas, desiring to learn the truth. On becoming acquainted with Barnabas and Paul he was convinced of the truth and accepted the gospel (Acts 13:7–12).

SERMON ON THE MOUNT. The name usually given to a discourse delivered by Jesus to His disciples and a multitude on a mountain near Capernaum, A.D., perhaps 28 (Matt. 5–7; Luke 6:20–49). The time, however, is no more distinctly given than is the place. Meyer (Com., ad loc.) believes that it was after Jesus had chosen His first four apostles and that “His disciples,” in addition to these four, were His disciples generally. Edersheim (Life and Times of Jesus, 1:524) locates it immediately after the choice of the twelve, grouping together Luke 6:12–13, 17–19; cf. with Mark 3:13–15 and Matt. 5:1–2.

The Discourse Itself. “It is the same as that found in Luke 6:20–49; for, although differing in respect of its contents, style, and arrangement from that of Matthew, yet, judging from its characteristic introduction and close, its manifold and essential identity as regards the subject-matter, as well as from its mentioning the circumstance that, immediately after, Jesus cured the sick servant in Capernaum (Luke 7:1, ff.), it is clear that Matthew and Luke do not record two different discourses” (Meyer, Com.).

The plan, according to Gess, is as follows: the happiness of those who are fit for the kingdom (Matt. 5:3–12); the lofty vocation of Jesus’ disciples (5:13–16); the righteousness, superior to that of the Pharisees, after which they must strive who would enter the kingdom (5:17–6:34); the rocks on which they run the risk of striking, and the help against such dangers (7:1–27).

Its Application. This remarkable discourse of Jesus has first of all an all-time moral application, and hence its principles are applicable to the Christian. It is a perennial truth that the pure in spirit, rather than the proud, are blessed and that those who mourn because of their sins, who are meek and hunger and thirst after righteousness are filled. The merciful are always blessed, and the pure in heart “see God.” However, in the Jewish slant of Matthew, presenting Christ as King, premillennialists frequently hold the application to be literally the establishment of the future Davidic kingdom. This discourse gives the divine constitution for the righteous government of the earth. It will be the fulfillment of “righteousness” as used by the prophets in describing this kingdom that is to be restored to Israel (cf. Isa. 11:4–5; 32:1; Dan. 9:24). In the time of our Lord the Jews rejected the kingdom because they had made “righteousness” to mean mere ceremonialism and had missed its deeper meaning as a matter of motive and of the heart. The Jews were never rebuked for expecting a visible messianic kingdom. Had they heeded the prophets, however, they would have plainly seen that only the spiritually poor, the meek, and the pure in heart would have a share in it (Isa. 11:4; Ps. 72). Careful exegesis of the Sermon on the Mount must not confuse it with the era of grace initiated by the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ. The sermon is commonly construed by expositors as applicable solely to the Christian church. This interpretation, however, can scarcely be reconciled with its scope and purpose, particularly in the gospel of Matthew.

SERPENT. See Animal Kingdom; Temptation.

Figurative. The malice of the wicked is compared to the “venom of a serpent” (Ps. 58:4; cf. 140:3); the poisonous bite of the serpent is a figure of the harmful influence of wine (Prov.

23:31–32); unexpected evil is like the bite of a serpent lurking in a wall (Eccles. 10:8), and there is no profit for the charmer of an uncharmed serpent that bites (10:11); enemies who harass and destroy are compared to serpents (Isa. 14:29; Jer. 8:17), whereas the voice of discomfited Egypt is likened to serpents roused from their lair by the woodcutter (46:22). The serpent is a figure for hypocrites (Matt. 23:33), those who are prudent (10:16); and the handling of serpents (Mark 16:18) is mentioned as a proof of supernatural protection (cf. Acts 28:36). See Brazen Serpent; Satan.

SERPENT, BRONZE. See Bronze Serpent.

SERPENT, FIERY (Heb. śārāp “burning,” Num. 21:6; Deut. 8:15). As the Israelites traveled around the land of Edom they found food and water scarce and rebelled against Jehovah. In consequence they were afflicted by a plague of fiery serpents (lit., “burning snakes”), so called from their burning, i.e., inflammatory, bite, which filled the victim with heat and poison. The punishment brought the people to reflection and confession of sin. They were pardoned through faith, which they manifested by looking to the bronze serpent (which see). The fiery flying serpents (Isa. 30:6) may be so called because of rapid movement, which appears like a flight, or it may refer to a species of serpent, the Naja tripudians, which dilates its hood into a kind of shining wing on each side of the neck and is poisonous.

SERPENT CHARMING. The art of taming serpents (Heb. laḥash, a “whisper,” Jer. 8:17; Eccles. 10:11); those who practiced the art were known as mnaḥashîm. There can be no question at all of the remarkable power that, from time immemorial, has been exercised by certain people in the East over poisonous serpents. The art is most distinctly mentioned in the Bible and is probably alluded to by James (James 3:7). The usual species operated upon, both in Africa and in India, are the hooded snakes (Naja tripudians and Naja haje) and the horned Cerastes. It is probable that the charmers frequently, and perhaps generally, take the precaution of extracting the poison fangs before the snakes are subjected to their skill, but that this operation is not always attended to is clear from the testimony of Bruce and numerous other writers. Some have supposed that the practice of taking out or breaking off the poison fangs is alluded to in Ps. 58:6, “Shatter their teeth in their mouth.” The serpent charmer’s usual instrument is a flute.

SE’RUG (se’rug; “shoot, tendril”; “Seruch,” KJV, Luke 3:35). The son of Reu, father of Nahor, the grandfather of Abraham (Gen. 11:20; 1 Chron. 1:26; Luke 3:35). When thirty years of age he begat Nahor and lived two hundred years afterward, before 2300 B.C. A city by this name in Mesopotamia near Harn attests the presence of the Hebrew patriarchs in this region.

SERVANT. See Service.

SERVANT OF JEHOVAH (“My servant,” etc.). A term used figuratively in several senses:

1. A worshiper of God (Neh. 1:10) and Daniel in particular (Dan. 6:20); pious persons, such as Abraham (Ps. 105:6, 42), Joshua (Josh. 24:29; Judg. 2:8), and many others.
2. A minister or ambassador of God on some special service (Isa. 49:6), e.g., Nebuchadnezzar, whom God used to chastise His people (Jer. 27:6; 43:10); but usually some favorite servant, such as the angels (Job 4:18); prophets (Ezra 9:11; Jer. 7:25; Dan. 9:6; Amos 3:7); and especially Moses (Deut. 34:5; Josh. 1:1, 13, 15; Ps. 105:26). Paul and other apostles call themselves the “bond-servant of Christ Jesus” and “of God” (Rom. 1:1; Col. 4:12; Titus 1:1; James 1:1; 2 Pet. 1:1; Jude 1; Rev. 1:1).
3. The Messiah is typified as the servant of the Lord for accomplishing the work of redemption (Isa. 42:1; 52:13; cf. Matt. 12:18).

4. The term servant is also applied to the relation of men to others occupying high positions: such as Eliezer, who had a position in Abraham's household something similar to that of a prime minister at court (Gen. 15:2; 24:2); Joshua, in relation to Moses (Ex. 33:11); Gehazi, in relation to Elisha (2 Kings 4:12), etc. See Service.

SERVICE. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words: Heb. ʿabad, to “serve, work”; shārat, to “attend”; Gk. diakonia, “attendance”; leitourgia, “public function,” as of a priest; douleuō, to “be a slave”; latreuō, to “minister.”

Although there were persons employed for wages (see Hireling), the servants of the Israelites, as of other ancient peoples, consisted chiefly of slaves—men and women servants—held as property. These were bought from neighboring nations or from foreign residents in Canaan, were captives taken in war, or were children of slaves born in the house of the master. Insofar as anything like slavery existed, it was a mild and merciful system, as compared to that of other nations. It cannot be said to be a Mosaic institution at all, but, being found by the Jewish lawgiver, it was regulated by statute with the purpose and tendency of mitigating its evils and of restricting its duration. One source of slavery was branded with utter reprobation by Moses; the punishment of death was the penalty for stealing or making merchandise of a human being, whether an Israelite (Deut. 24:7) or foreigner (Ex. 21:61). With regard to the kind of service that might be exacted by Hebrew masters from their servants, a distinction was made between those who were of their own brethren and foreigners.

Hebrew. Because the Israelites were the servants of God they were not to be treated, when they became servants to their brethren, as bond-servants but as hired servants and sojourners, and their masters were to rule over them with kindness (Lev. 25:39). In several ways a Hebrew might become the servant of his brethren:

1. When he, through poverty, became unable to maintain himself as an independent citizen, in which case he might pass by sale under the power of another (Ex. 21:2). “The passage which lays down the law in such a case (Lev. 25:39) does not imply that the sale was compulsory, but is understood by Rosenmüller, Gesenius, Knobel, and others, as meaning that the individual sold himself, or rather the right to his labor, to some one of his brethren, that he might obtain the means of subsistence for himself and family” (Lindsay, in Imperial Bible Dictionary).

2. By the commission of a theft. The law required restitution to the extent at least of double the value of the amount stolen and in some cases even five times more. If the thief could not make the required restitution, then he was to be sold for his theft (Ex. 22:3) and so by his labor make the restitution.

3. The children of a Hebrew servant became, by the condition of their birth, servants of the master (Ex. 21:4).

4. Although it is not clearly stated in the law that a man might be claimed personally and with his children sold by his creditors, in fact the person and children of a debtor were claimed (2 Kings 4:1; Neh. 5:5; cf. Isa. 50:1; Job 24:9). From Lev. 25:39, 47, it may be understood that while the impoverished man might sell himself it was only to work off his debt till the Jubilee year.

5. Every Israelite, male or female, who had become a slave might be redeemed at any time by relatives. If not thus redeemed he was bound to receive his freedom without payment after six years' service, with a present of cattle and food (Ex. 21:2; Deut. 15:12–15). If he brought a wife with him into service, she received her freedom with him; if he received a wife from his master, then she and her children remained in bondage (Ex. 21:3; Jer. 34:8–10).

6. Respecting a female Israelite sold to another Israelite as housekeeper and concubine, these conditions prevailed: (a) She could not “go free as the male slaves do,” i.e., she could not leave at the termination of six years or in the year of Jubilee, if her master was willing to fulfill the object for which he had purchased her (Ex. 21:7). (b) If she did not please her lord she was to be immediately redeemed, not sold to a foreign people (v. 8). (c) If he betrothed her to his son, he was bound to make such provision for her as he would for one of his own daughters (v. 9). (d) If either he or his son, having married her, took a second wife, it should not be to the prejudice of the first, either in respect to support, clothing, or cohabitation (v. 10). (e) In failure of these, she was freed without money (v. 11).

7. If a Hebrew servant, from love for master or wife and children, preferred not to accept freedom in the seventh year, but wished to remain in his master’s house, he was brought before the elders and had his ear bored against a door or post with an awl in token of lifelong servitude (Ex. 21:6; Deut. 15:17). The boring of the ear is found among many Eastern people as a token of servitude, not only in the case of slaves but also of dervishes and others devoted to a deity. This act was not prescribed in the law as symbolizing anything shameful or despicable; for Moses sought to protect and restore personal freedom and could not therefore approve of anyone’s voluntarily devoting himself to perpetual slavery. It was allowed because love and the allegiance of love were prized more highly than loveless personal freedom (Keil, Biblical Archaeology). The custom of reducing Hebrews to servitude appears to have fallen into disuse subsequent to the Babylonian captivity. Vast numbers of Hebrews were reduced to slavery as war captives at different periods by the Phoenicians (Joel 3:6), the Philistines (Amos 1:6), the Syrians (1 Macc. 3:41; 2 Macc. 8:11); the Egyptians (Josephus Ant. 12.2.2–3), and, above all, by the Romans.

Hebrew Slave and Foreign Master. Should a Hebrew become the servant of a “stranger,” meaning a non-Hebrew, the servitude could be terminated only in two ways, by the arrival of the year of Jubilee or by the repayment to the master of the purchase money paid for the servant, after deducting the value of the services already rendered. The estimate was based upon the pay of a hired laborer (Lev. 25:47–55).

Non-Hebrew Slaves. The source of non-Hebrew slaves and their legal standing were treated in the Pentateuch; information concerning the procedures for freeing them comes from extrabiblical sources.

Source. The majority of non-Hebrew slaves were war captives, either of the Canaanites who had survived the general extermination of their race under Joshua, or such as were conquered from the other surrounding nations (Num. 31:26–28). Besides these, many were obtained by purchase from foreign slave dealers (Lev. 25:44–45); and others may have been resident foreigners who were reduced to this state either by poverty or crime. The children of slaves remained slaves, being the class described as “born in the house” (Gen. 14:14; 17:12; Eccles. 2:7), and hence the number was likely to increase as time went on. The average value of a slave appears to have been thirty shekels (Ex. 21:32).

Legal Standing. The slave is described as the “possession” of his master, apparently with a special reference to the power that the latter had of disposing of him to his heirs as he would any other article of personal property (Lev. 25:45–46); the slave is also described as his master’s “property” (Ex. 21:21), i.e., as representing a certain money value.

Freeing. That the slave might be set free appears in Ex. 21:26–27. As to the methods by which this might be effected we are told nothing in the Bible; but the rabbinites specify the following four methods: (1) redemption by a money payment, (2) a bill or ticket of freedom, (3) testamentary disposition, or (4) any act that implied freedom, such as making a slave one’s heir.

Protection. Both respecting the Israelite and the stranger, provision was made for the protection of his person (Lev. 24:17, 22; Ex. 21:20). A minor personal injury, such as the loss of an eye or a tooth, was to be recompensed by giving the servant his liberty (21:26–27). The position of the slave in regard to religious privileges was favorable. He was to be circumcised (Gen. 17:12) and therefore was entitled to partake of the paschal sacrifice (Ex. 12:44) as well as to participate in the other religious festivals (Deut. 12:12, 18; 16:11, 14) and enjoy the rest of the Sabbath (Ex. 20:11; Deut. 5:14).

SETH (seth). The third son of Adam and father of Enos when he was 105 years old. He died at the age of 912 (Gen. 4:25–26; 5:3–8; 1 Chron. 1:1; Luke 3:38). The significance of his name is “appointed” or “put” in the place of the murdered Abel; but Ewald believes that another signification, which he prefers, is indicated in the text, namely, “seedling,” or “germ.”

SE’THUR (se’thur; “hidden”). Son of Michael, the representative of the tribe of Asher among the twelve spies sent by Moses to view the Promised Land (Num. 13:13), c. 1440 B.C.

SEVENTH NEW MOON (or feast of Trumpets). See Festivals; Sacrifices.

SEVENTY DISCIPLES OF OUR LORD (Luke 10:1, 17). These were, doubtless, persons other than the “twelve,” whom our Lord seems to have kept by His side. Considerable speculation has arisen owing to the number seventy; some believe that Jesus had in view the ancient Hebrew analogue of the seventy—originally seventy-two—elders of the people (Num. 11:16–25). Godet (Com., on Luke) says, “There is another explanation of the number which seems to us more natural. The Jews held, agreeably to Gen. 10, that the human race was made up of seventy (or seventy-two) peoples—fourteen descended from Japhet, thirty from Ham, and twenty-six from Shem.”

SEVENTY WEEKS. These are seventy weeks of years referred to in Daniel’s prophecy (Dan. 9:20–27). During these seventy weeks of seven years each Daniel prophesied that Israel’s national chastisement would be terminated and the nation reestablished in “everlasting righteousness” (v. 24). In Daniel’s vision the weeks are divided into three parts, seven weeks equaling 49 years; sixty-two weeks, totaling 434 years; one week equaling 7 years (vv. 25–27). In the seven weeks, or 49 years, Jerusalem was to be reconstructed in “times of distress.” This was brought to pass as recorded in the books of Ezra-Nehemiah. In the sixty-two weeks, or 434 years, the Messiah was to come at His first advent (v. 25), fulfilled in the Messiah’s birth and His being “cut off” and having “nothing” at the crucifixion. The date of Christ’s crucifixion is evidently not specified except that it is to be after the “sixty-two weeks.” The city was to be destroyed by “the people of the prince who is to come.” This was fulfilled by the Romans under Titus in A.D. 70. Verse 27, by many commentators, is connected immediately with the events of the first advent. However, many premillennialists place it in the end time and between vv. 26 and 27. In this extended period they place the church age as an era unrevealed in OT prophecy (Matt. 13:11–17; Eph. 3:1–10). During this time it is maintained that the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 13:1–50) and the out-calling of the church are consummated. According to this view, the church age will terminate at an unspecified moment and will usher in Daniel’s seventieth week. The personage of v. 27 thus, under their interpretation, is identical with the little horn of Dan. 7, who will make a covenant with the Jews to restore their Judaic ritual for one week—seven years. In the middle of the week he will break the covenant and fulfill 12:11 and 2 Thess. 2:3–11. This interpretation views v. 27 as dealing with the last three-and-one-half years of the Great Tribulation (Matt. 24:15–28). This era is connected with the “time of distress” spoken of by Daniel (Dan. 12:1), with the “abomination of desolation” (Matt. 24:15) and with the “hour of testing” (Rev. 3:10). It is thus apparent that Dan. 9:27 is a battleground between the various millennial schools of eschatological thought. See Daniel, Book of; Weeks. M.F.U.

SEXTARIUS or Xestes. A foreign measure of capacity. See Metrology.

SHAALAB´BIN (sha-a-lab´in; Josh. 19:42), or Shaalbim sha-^l-^{al}-^{bi}-^m; Judg. 1:35; 1 Kings 4:9). A town in Dan named between Ir-shemesh and Aijalon (Josh. 19:42). It is frequently mentioned in the history of David and Solomon under the latter form. It may possibly be the present Selbit, three miles NW of Aijalon.

SHAAL´BONITE (sha-al´bō-nit). Eliahba the Shaalbonite was one of David’s thirty-seven mighty men (2 Sam. 23:32; 1 Chron. 11:33). He was a native of a place named Shaalbon, which is not mentioned elsewhere, unless it is identical with Shaalbim or Shaalabbin, of the tribe of Dan.

SHA´ALIM, LAND OF (sha´a-lim; “foxes”). The region through which Saul passed in looking for the donkeys of Kish, which were lost (1 Sam. 9:4). Possibly Shual, near Ophrah (13:17).

SHA´APH (sha´af; Aram. “balsam”).

1. The last named of the sons of Jahdai of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:47).
2. Third named of the four sons of Caleb by Maacah, his concubine. He was the “father” (i.e., founder) of Madmannah (1 Chron. 2:49), after 1380 B.C.

SHAARA´IM (sha-a-ra´im; “two gates”).

1. A city near Azekah, in Judah (Josh. 15:36, “Sharaim,” KJV; 1 Sam. 17:52).
2. A town in Simeon (1 Chron. 4:31), evidently identical with Sharuhen (which see), between Gaza and Beersheba.

SHAASH´GAZ (sha-ash´gaz). The eunuch who had charge of the concubines in the court of Ahasuerus (Esther 2:14), c. 478 B.C.

SHAB´BETHAI (shab´e-thāi; perhaps “sabbath-born”). A Levite who assisted in taking account of those who had married Gentile wives (Ezra 10:15), 457 B.C. He is probably the same as the one mentioned (Neh. 8:7) as assisting in the instruction of the people in the law, and as one of the “leaders of the Levites, who were in charge of the outside work of the house of God” (11:16).

SHACHIA. See Sachia.

SHAD´DAI (shad´ī). An adjunct used with the Canaanite-Hebrew name for God, El. El Shaddai denotes the particular character in which God revealed Himself to the patriarchs (Gen. 17:1; 28:3; 35:11; 43:14; 48:3, see marg.). The name is consistently translated in the NIV as God Almighty. Exodus 6:2–3 specifically states that God appeared “to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as God Almighty [El Shaddai]” and that He was not known to them by the

KJV King James Version

marg. margin, marginal reading

NIV New International Version

name Jehovah, that is revealed to them under the meaning of that name. Some present-day critics insist that El Shaddai means “God of mountain(s)” and that the Genesis passages inaccurately are translated “God Almighty.” This view, however, is unacceptable, and Shaddai is best taken from the root shādad, “to be strong or powerful,” as in Arab. Thus Shaddai would be an epithet intensifying the thought of power or strength inherent in the word El (cf. the Vulg. and the LXX “Omnipotens”). The word el is a generic name for god in NW Semitic (Heb. and Ugaritic) and was almost certainly an adjectival formation from the root ʾwl, “to be strong, powerful,” and so meaning “the strong or powerful one.” In the Ugaritic tablets El is the head of the pantheon, and this is the name by which God is called in the OT (Gen. 33:20). In prose El occurs more often with the adjunct El Elyon, “God Most High” (14:18), El Hai, “the living God” (Josh. 3:10), as well as “El Shaddai.” In Hebrew poetry El is much more frequent, where it often stands without an adjunct (Pss. 18:31, 33, 48; 68:21; Job 8:3). SHADOW (Heb. šēl; Gk. skia).

Figurative. The English term is used figuratively in a number of ways.

1. “Deep shadow” (Heb. šalmāwet, “shadow of death,” KJV) is taken from the shadow representing darkness, gloom, etc., and so is figurative of the grave (Job 10:21, elsewhere “deep darkness,” 12:22; 16:16; Isa. 9:2; Jer. 2:6); also severe trial (Ps. 23:4); state of ignorance (Matt. 4:16).

2. A shadow, swiftly moving, is symbolic of the fleetness of human life (1 Chron. 29:15; Job 8:9; 14:2; Ps. 102:11).

3. Covering and protection from heat; as in “Hide me in the shadow of Thy wings” (Pss. 17:8; cf. 63:7; 91:1; Isa. 49:2).

4. An image cast by an object and representing the form of that object, as opposed to the “body” or thing itself (Col. 2:17); hence a sketch, outline, as the Jewish economy (Heb. 8:5; 10:1).

The second Gk. term means “a shadow caused by revolution,” as used in James 1:17, “the Father of lights, with whom there is no variation, or shifting shadow.” The sun appears to us to have changes, from which come summer and winter, day and night, but in reality those changes are caused by the rotation and orbit of the earth. So God, the source of all good, does not change, though He may appear to do so.

SHA'DRACH (sha'drak; apparently Akkad. Shudur, “command of,” and Sumerian Aku, the moon god). The name, however, may be simply a corruption of Marduk, the city god of Babylon. It is the Babylonian name given to Hananiah, the chief of the three Hebrew youths.

Captive. He was one of the Jewish captives carried to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar c. 605 B.C. Being of goodly appearance and of superior understanding, he was selected, with his three companions, for the king's service and was instructed in the language and learning of the Chaldeans as taught in the college of the magicians. Like Daniel he lived on vegetables and water. When the time of his probation was over, he and his three companions, being found superior to all the other magicians, were advanced to stand before the king (Dan. 1:7–19).

Promotion. When Nebuchadnezzar determined to slay the magicians because they could not tell him his forgotten dream, Shadrach united with his companions in prayer to God to reveal the dream to Daniel (Dan. 2:17–18). When Daniel was successful, Shadrach shared in the promotion, being appointed to a high civil office (v. 49).

Fiery Furnace. At the instigation of certain envious Chaldeans an ordinance was published that all persons should worship the golden image to be set up in the plain of Dura, the exact site of which is uncertain as there are several places called Dura in Babylonia. For example, there is a river Dura with Tulūl Dūra nearby. For refusing to comply, Shadrach, with Meshach and Abed-nego, was cast into the fiery furnace, but their faith remained firm, and they escaped unhurt. The king acknowledged Jehovah to be God and promoted His faithful servants (Dan. 3:1–30). After their deliverance from the furnace we hear no more of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego in the OT; neither are they spoken of in the NT, except in the pointed allusion to them in the epistle to the Hebrews, as having through faith “quenched the power of fire” (Heb. 11:34). But there are repeated allusions to them in the later apocryphal books, and the martyrs of the Maccabean period seem to have been much encouraged by their example (1 Macc. 2:59, 60; 3 Macc. 6:6; 4 Macc. 13:9; 16:3, 21; 18:12).

SHAFT. The translation of various Heb. terms in the NASB, NIV, and KJV, although the two Heb. terms translated “shaft” in the KJV (yārēk; ḥēṣ) are not among those so translated in the NASB. Thus shaft in the KJV of Ex. 25:31; 37:17; Num. 8:4 is from Heb. yārēk, “thigh,” and is replaced in the NASB by the word base, in the first two verses and in the NASB and the NIV by base in the last verse. (Conversely, the NASB and NIV appearance of shaft in Ex. 25:31; 37:17 is from Heb. qāneh and replaces KJV branch, or branches.) The shaft of Isa. 49:2 (KJV) is from Heb. ḥēṣ and is replaced in the NASB and NIV, by arrow.

SHA´GEE (sha´gē; “wandering, erring”). A Hararite, and father of Jonathan, one of David’s guard (1 Chron. 11:34). See Shammah, no. 5.

SHAGGY GOAT. See Gods, False.

SHAHARA´IM (sha-ha-ra´im; “double dawn,” i.e., morning and evening twilight). A Benjamite who became the father of several children in the land of Moab (1 Chron. 8:8).

SHAHAZU´MAH (sha-ha-zū´ma, “toward the heights,” “Shahazimah,” KJV). A place in the tribe of Issachar, between Tabor and the Jordan (Josh. 19:22). Identical with Tell el Mekarkash in the Tabor-Jordan region.

SHA´LIM. See Shaalim, Land of.

SHALI´SHAH (sha-li´sha; “triangular”), Shalisha (NIV). A district adjoining Mt. Ephraim (1 Sam. 9:4), N of Lydda. Unquestionably the country around Baal-shalishah (2 Kings 4:42). It is mentioned in connection with Saul’s search for his father’s donkeys.

SHAL´LECHETH, SHALLEKETH, THE GATE OF (shal´e-keth; a “casting down”). One of the gates of the Temple through which refuse was thrown, by the causeway going up out of the Tyropoeon Valley (1 Chron. 26:16). It was the lot of Hosah to act as gatekeeper.

SHAL´LUM (shal´ūm; “recompense, retribution”).

1. The sixteenth king of Israel. His father’s name was Jabesh. Shallum conspired against Zechariah, son of Jeroboam II, killed him, and thus brought the dynasty of Jehu to a close, as was predicted (2 Kings 10:30), 752 B.C. He reigned only a month, being in turn dethroned and slain by Menahem (15:10–15).

2. The son of Tikvah and husband of the prophetess Huldah (2 Kings 22:14; 2 Chron. 34:22), 626 B.C. He was keeper of the priestly wardrobe and was probably the same as Jeremiah's uncle (Jer. 32:7).

3. Son of Sisamai and father of Jekamiah, and a descendant of Sheshan of Judah (1 Chron. 2:40–41).

4. The third son of Josiah, king of Judah, known in the books of Kings and Chronicles as Jehoahaz (1 Chron. 3:15; Jer. 22:11). See Jehoahaz.

5. Son of Shaul, the son of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:25).

6. A high priest, son of Zadok and father of Hilkiah (1 Chron. 6:12–13), and an ancestor of Ezra (Ezra 7:2), after 950 B.C. He is the Meshullam of 1 Chron. 9:11; Neh. 11:11.

7. The youngest son of Naphtali (1 Chron. 7:13; Shillem, NIV), called Shillem (Gen. 46:24), about 1925 B.C.

8. A descendant of Kore, and chief of the gatekeepers of the sanctuary in the time of David (1 Chron. 9:17, 19, 31), about 980 B.C. He seems to have been the same Shallum whose descendants returned from the Exile (Ezra 2:42; 10:24; Neh. 7:45). With this Shallum we may identify Meshelemiah and Shelemiah (1 Chron. 26:1–2, 9, 14). He is perhaps the “father” of Maaseiah (Jer. 35:4).

9. The father of Jehizkiah, which latter was one of the leaders of Ephraim who took part in returning the prisoners carried away from Judah (2 Chron. 28:12), before 741 B.C.

10. A Jew of the descendants of Bani, who put away his idolatrous wife (Ezra 10:42), 456 B.C.

11. A Levitical porter who did the same as no. 10 (Ezra 10:24), 456 B.C.

12. The son of Hallohesh, the “official of half the district of Jerusalem,” who with his daughters assisted in building its walls (Neh. 3:12), 445 B.C.

SHAL LUN (shal'un; another form of Shallum, “retribution”). The son of Co-hozeh, the official of the district of Beth-haccherem who repaired the Refuse Gate (Neh. 3:15), 445 B.C.

SHAL MAI (shal'mī). The sons of Shalmal were among the Temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:46; Neh. 7:48), about 536 B.C.

SHAL MAN. An abbreviated form of Shalmaneser, king of Assyria (Hos. 10:14), although some scholars connect the name with a Moabite monarch Salamanu, whose name occurs in an inscription of Tiglath-pileser III (745–727 B.C.) and who was alive in Hosea's day.

SHALMANE'SER (shal-man-ē'zer; Assyr., “the god Shulman is chief”). The Assyrian inscriptions have made known to us five kings with the name Shalmaneser. Of these only one is mentioned by name in the OT, and he is Shalmaneser V, of Assyrian history. But though Shalmaneser III is not named in the OT, the evidence is there of his influence and his work. Without some knowledge of him it is impossible to understand the reign of Ahab, king of Israel, with whom he was contemporary.

Shalmaneser III. The reign of Ashurnasirpal (883–859 B.C.) was one of the most brilliant and daring of all Assyrian history. In him the spirit of the mighty Tiglath-pileser I (about 1110 B.C.) seemed to live again. The boundaries of the Assyrian empire were carried far beyond their previous limits, and Assyrian influence began to be counted a force far and near. Under his leadership the Assyrians invaded Armenia and ravaged the country S of Lake Van. With the sword went also Assyrian commerce and culture. The Assyrian system of cuneiform writing was introduced into the land where later the kingdom of Van held sway, and so a center of influence was located. Ashurnasirpal also marched victoriously westward, reaching even the Mediterranean and receiving tribute from Tyre and Sidon. But there his work ceased. Would his successor be able to retain what he had won; would he be able to increase it? He was succeeded by his son Shalmaneser III, whose glorious reign (859–824 B.C.) surpassed even his father's.

Of the reign of Shalmaneser III we possess several well-preserved original monuments. The most beautiful of them is the famous Black Obelisk, now in the British Museum. A solid block of basalt, more than six feet high, it is covered on all four sides with inscriptions cut into the stone. Accompanying these are well-executed pictures of the objects that the king had received as gifts or in payment of tribute. A second important text is the Monolith Inscription, a large slab with a nearly life-size portrait of the king, covered with two columns of writing. Besides these, several colossal bulls covered with inscriptions have also been found. From these original sources of information we can now reconstruct the king's reign.

At the beginning of his reign, Shalmaneser set himself to strengthen the kingdom of his father in Mesopotamia and in Armenia. Five years were devoted to this task. His land was now strong, and he could turn his attention to the outside. In the sixth year of his reign (854 B.C.) he turned westward to take up the work of conquest where his father had left it. Ashurnasirpal II had not disturbed Israel; that was reserved for his son. The fame of the exploits of Shalmaneser had passed through Syria and into Palestine. It was evident to the peoples of all that country that no single nation could successfully oppose so great a warrior as he. The only hope was in a coalition. A union for the general defense was composed of the peoples of Damascus, Hamath, Israel, Phoenicia, Que (eastern Cilicia), and Musri (western Cappadocia). These combined forces Shalmaneser III met in battle at Qarqar (sometimes written Karkar), in 853 B.C., and thus tells the story of the battle: "From Argana I departed; to Qarqar I approached, Qarqar, his royal city, I wasted, destroyed, burned with fire; 1,200 chariots, 1,200 horses, 20,000 men of Adadidri, of Damascus; 700 chariots, 700 horses, 10,000 men of Ithuleni, the Hamathite; 2,000 chariots, 10,000 men of Ahab, the Israelite." Shalmaneser lists eleven kings with their forces and continues thus: "These 12 [there must be a mistake here, for only 11 have been mentioned] kings he took to his assistance; to make battle and war against me they came. With the exalted power which Ashur, the lord, gave me, with the powerful arms which Nergal, who goes before me, had granted me, I fought with them, from Qarqar to Gilzan. I accomplished their defeat; 14,000 of their warriors I slew with arms; like Ramman I rained a deluge upon them, I strewed hither and yon their bodies." This is a bold claim of an overwhelming victory. It was a victory for the Assyrians beyond a doubt, but it does not appear at this distance that the victory was won without great sacrifices. It is clear, at any rate, that Shalmaneser did not feel it sufficiently great to justify his attempting to seize Hamath or Damascus.

In the year 849 Shalmaneser III again invaded the western land, and again his inscriptions record victory. He was, however, in this campaign not endeavoring to attack Israel, and hence his deeds do not interest students of the Bible. Another expedition followed in 845, and this also was without effect upon Israel. The king was beating down Syria by successive blows, and this time he seems to have dealt a severe blow to the northern confederation, for Damascus was left to stand alone. In 842 Shalmaneser, upon a new invasion, found new rulers to oppose him. Ben-hadad (which see) no longer lived, and Hazael was ruler in Damascus. This campaign again excites the interest of biblical students. Jehu was now king of Israel, a man daring enough to usurp a throne but not courageous enough to face the Assyrians. Jehu attempted to buy off the Assyrians by sending costly presents to Shalmaneser. On the Black Obelisk, Shalmaneser has left a picture of Jehu's ambassadors stooping to kiss his feet and bringing him presents. Accompanying the picture are the words "The tribute of Jehu, son of Omri: silver, gold, etc." Jehu was not the son of Omri, but would be so called by the Assyrians, who long spoke of Israel as the "land of Omri." In 839 Shalmaneser received the tribute of Tyre, Sidon, and Byblos, and this was his last expedition to the W. Thereafter he was occupied near home with a rebellion in 827. In 825 he died, and Shamshi-Ramman II, his son, ruled in his stead.

Shalmaneser V, a king of Assyria, who reigned 727–722. He was the successor of Tiglath-pileser III (see Tiglath-pileser) and ascended the throne in the month in which his predecessor died. Few historical inscriptions of this king have been found. A weight containing his name and a boundary stone dated in his reign are the monuments of his time that have come into our possession. Our knowledge of his reign begins with the eponym lists. These are lists of the names of Assyrian kings, accompanied in some cases with a brief note mentioning the campaigns conducted by the monarch. In the eponym list for the year 727 B.C. is the record that Shalmaneser ascended the throne. Under the same year is the record of a campaign against a city, the name of which unhappily is broken off. As this record stands before the words recording the king's accession, it may be that the campaign was begun by his predecessor and continued by him. The Babylonian chronicle sets down in this same accession year, during the last three months, the destruction of the city of Shamara'in, or Shabara'in. This city was once thought by some to be the city of Samaria. This view is improbable on philological grounds. With more probability it is now supposed by many to be the biblical Sepharvaim (2 Kings 17:24), but even this view is uncertain. In the year 726 the eponym list says that there was no campaign. For the remaining three years of the king's reign there were campaigns, but the lands against which they were directed are unknown, for the eponym list is broken at this point. It is now known, however, that Shalmaneser V warred against Phoenicia, capturing the mainland of Tyre and taking Sidon and Acre. The next definite information of the events in the reign of Shalmaneser V is found in the OT. Hoshea was king of Israel in Samaria at the time that Shalmaneser was reigning in Assyria. He had paid tribute to the Assyrians but decided to make a bold attempt to throw off the yoke. He therefore sought aid from the Egyptian king So (or Seveh), and this was naturally construed as rebellion by the Assyrians (17:4). Shalmaneser invaded Palestine and laid siege to Samaria. The siege continued for three years, and at its conclusion many of the inhabitants of Samaria were carried into captivity. Samaria fell in 722 B.C., the year of Shalmaneser's death. The inscriptions of his successor, Sargon, claim that the city was taken by him and not by Shalmaneser (see Sargon). This may have been the case. If so, Samaria fell at the beginning of 721 B.C., or it may be merely a boast of Sargon. In any case the historical character of the book of Kings is not impugned. R.W.R.; M.F.U.

SHA'MA (sha'ma; "He," i.e., God, "has heard"). The eldest son of Hothan, and, with his brother Jeiel, a member of David's guard (1 Chron. 11:44), about 1000 B.C.

SHAMARI'AH. See Shemariah, no. 2.

SHAMBLES (1 Cor. 10:25, KJV). The Gk. term, makellon, refers to a meat market, and it is so translated in the NASB and NIV.

SHAMER. See Shemer, no. 2, no. 3; Shomer, no. 1.

SHAM'GAR (sham'gar; apparently a Hurrian name, "Shimigar," i.e., a god, "gave"). The third judge of Israel (Judg. 5:6). Nothing is recorded about the descent of Shamgar, except that he was the son of Anath. He may have been of the tribe of Naphtali, since Beth-anath is in that tribe (1:33). In the days of Shamgar, Israel was in a most depressed condition, and the whole nation was cowed. At this juncture Shamgar was raised up to be a deliverer. With nothing but an oxgoad he made a desperate assault upon the Philistines and killed 600 of them (3:31; cf. 1 Sam. 13:21), probably before 1150 B.C. He does not seem to have secured for the Israelites any permanent victory over the Philistines, nor is an account given of the length of his services. Moreover, he is not called a judge but is probably so reckoned because he answered the description as given in Judg. 2:16.

SHAM'HUTH (sham'huth; "desolation"). The fifth captain for the fifth month in David's arrangement of his army (1 Chron. 27:8), about 1000 B.C. From a comparison of the lists in 1 Chron. 11 and 27, it would seem that Shamhuth is the same as Shammoth the Harorite.

SHA'MIR (sha'mir; "a flint, thorn").

1. A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:48). It is to be sought in the ruin Sōmerah, thirteen miles SW of Hebron, or at nearby El-Birch.

2. A town upon the mountains of Ephraim, the residence and burial place of judge Tola (Judg. 10:1–2). Its situation is still unknown.

3. A Kohathite Levite, son of Micah, appointed by David to the service of the sanctuary (1 Chron. 24:24).

SHAM'MA (sham'a; "desolation"), the eighth named of the eleven sons of Zophah, an Asherite (1 Chron. 7:37), after 1440 B.C.

SHAM'MAH (sham'a; "desolation").

1. The third named of the sons of Reuel, the son of Esau (Gen. 36:13; 1 Chron. 1:37), and head of one of the families (Gen. 36:17).

2. The third son of Jesse, David's father, and one of the brothers not chosen by Jehovah to be anointed king (1 Sam. 16:9), before 1000 B.C. With his two elder brothers he joined the Hebrew army (17:13). He is elsewhere, by a slight change in the name, called Shimea (1 Chron. 2:13; 20:7) and Shimeah (2 Sam. 13:3, 32).

3. The son of Agee the Hararite, and one of the three captains of David's mighty men, 992 B.C. The exploit by which he obtained this high distinction was the invaluable assistance he rendered to David against the Philistines. By a comparison of the two accounts (2 Sam. 23:11–12; 1 Chron. 11:13–14) it seems that David had joined battle with the Philistines at Pasdammim. Shammah took his stand in the middle of a cultivated field, where the Philistines were in great numbers, and wrested it from the foe. Shammah may also have shared in the dangers of forcing a way through the Philistine host to gratify David's thirst for the waters of Bethlehem (2 Sam. 23:13–17), but Keil and Delitzsch (Com., ad loc.) think that this deed was performed by three of the thirty mighty men whose names are not given.

The scene of Shammah's exploit is said in 2 Samuel to be a field of lentils and in 1 Chronicles a field of barley. It is more likely that it was a field of barley, and that by a slight change and transposition of letters in the original one word was substituted for the other. The reason Shammah is not mentioned in 1 Chronicles is that "three lines have dropped out from the text" in consequence of a copyist's error (K. & D., Com., ad loc.).

Com. Commentary

K. & Johann Karl Friedrich Keil and Franz Julius Delitzsch, Old Testament Commentaries (1875)

4. “Shammah the Harodite” was another of David’s mighty men (2 Sam. 23:25). He is called “Shammoth the Harorite” (1 Chron. 11:27) and “Shamhuth the Izrahite” (27:8). In the latter passage he is mentioned as the leader of the fifth division of David’s army.

5. In the list of mighty men (2 Sam. 23:32, 33) we find “Jonathan, Shammah the Hararite”; whereas in 1 Chron. 11:34, it is “Jonathan, the son of Shagee the Hararite.” Combining the two, Kennicott proposes to read “Jonathan, the son of Shamha, the Hararite” (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

SHAMMAI (sham’î).

1. The elder son of Onam, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:28), about 1350 B.C.

2. The son of Rekem, and father of Maon, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:44–45), after 1370 B.C.

3. Named, apparently, as the sixth child of Ezrah, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:17), after 1190 B.C. Bertheau suggests, however, that the last clause of v. 18 be inserted in v. 17 after the name Jalon. If this suggestion is accepted, then Shammai would be the son of Mered by his wife Bithia.

SHAMMOTH (sham’ôth; “desolation, ruins”). “The Harorite,” one of David’s guard (1 Chron. 11:27); apparently the same as “Shammah the Harodite” (2 Sam. 23:25) and “Shamhuth” (1 Chron. 27:8).

SHAMMU’A (sha-mû’a; “renowned, heard-about”).

1. The son of Zaccur, and the man who represented the tribe of Reuben among the twelve spies (Num. 13:4), c. 1440 B.C.

2. One of the sons of David (by his wife Bathsheba, cf. 1 Chron. 3:5, where he is called Shimea), born in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:14, “Shammuah,” KJV; 1 Chron. 14:4), about 989 B.C.

3. A Levite, the father of Abda (Neh. 11:17), before 445 B.C. The same as Shemaiah, the father of Obadiah (1 Chron. 9:16).

4. The representative of the priestly family of Bilgah, or Bilgai, in the days of Joiakim (Neh. 12:18), about 500 B.C.

SHAMMUAH. See Shammua.

SHAM’SHERAI (sham’she-rî), or Shamshera’i (sham-she-rî). The first named of the six sons of Jeroham, resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:26), about 1120 B.C.

SHA’PHAM (shā’fam). The chief second in authority among the Gadites in the days of Jotham (1 Chron. 5:12), about 750 B.C.

SHA’PHAN (shā’fan; “hyrax, rock badger”). The scribe or secretary of King Josiah. He was the son of Azaliah (2 Kings 22:3; 2 Chron. 34:8), father of Ahikam (2 Kings 22:12; 2 Chron. 34:20), Elasa (Jer. 29:3), and Gemariah (36:10–12), and grandfather of Gedaliah (39:14; 40:5, 9, 11; 41:2; 43:6), Micaiah (36:11), and probably of Jaazaniah (Ezek. 8:11). There seems to be no sufficient reason for supposing that Shaphan the father of Ahikam, and Shaphan the scribe, were different persons.

The history of Shaphan brings out some points regarding the office of scribe. He appears to be on a level of equality with the governor of the city and the royal recorder, with whom he was sent by the king to Hilkiyah to take an account of the money that had been collected by the Levites for the repair of the Temple and to pay the workmen (2 Kings 22:3–4; 2 Chron. 34:8–9; cf. 2 Kings 12:10), about 622 B.C. Ewald calls him minister of finance (Geschichte, 3:697). It was on this occasion that Hilkiyah communicated his discovery of a copy of the law, which he had probably found while making preparations for the repair of the Temple. Shaphan was entrusted to deliver it to the king, who was so deeply moved upon hearing it read that he sent Shaphan, with the high priest and others, to consult Huldah the prophetess. Shaphan was then apparently an old man, for his son Ahikam must have been in a position of importance, and his grandson Gedaliah was already born. Be this as it may, Shaphan disappears from the scene. He probably died before the fifth year of Jehoiakim, eighteen years later, when we find that Elishama was scribe (Jer. 36:12).

SHA'PHAT (sha'fat; "He, i.e., God, judges").

1. The son of Hori, and the spy chosen from the tribe of Simeon to assist in exploring the Promised Land (Num. 13:5), c. 1440 B.C.

2. The father of the prophet Elisha (1 Kings 19:16, 19; 2 Kings 3:11; 6:31), before 865 B.C.

3. One of the six sons of Shemaiah in the royal line of Judah, after the captivity (1 Chron. 3:22), perhaps about 350 B.C.

4. One of the chiefs of the Gadites in Bashan in the time of Jotham (1 Chron. 5:12), about 738 B.C.

5. The son of Adlai, who was over David's cattle in the valleys (1 Chron. 27:29), after 1000 B.C.

SHA'PHER. See Shepherd.

SHA'PHIR (sha'fir; "beautiful"). One of the towns in Judah addressed by the prophet Micah (1:11; "Sapir," KJV; the marg. of the NASB gives "pleasantness"), possibly identified with es-Suafir, SE of Ashdad. Robinson found several villages of this name in the vicinity.

SHA'RAI (sha'ri), one of the "sons" of Bani, who put away his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:40), 456 B.C.

SHARA'IM. See Shaaraim.

SHA'RAR (sha'rar; Aram. "firm"). An Ararite, the father of Ahiam (2 Sam. 23:33), before 990 B.C. In 1 Chron. 11:35 he is called Sacar, which Kennicott thinks is the true reading.

SHARE'ZER (sha-rē'zer; Akkad. "protect the king").

1. A son of Sennacherib (which see), who, with his brother Adrammelech, murdered their father while he was worshiping in the temple of the god Nisroch (2 Kings 19:37; Isa. 37:38), 681 B.C.

2. A messenger sent, with Regem-melech, in the fourth year of Darius, to inquire at the Temple regarding the day of humiliation in the fifth month (Zech. 7:2; "Sherezzer," KJV), 518 B.C.

SHAR'ON (shar'un; "a plain"; KJV, Acts 9:35, Saron), a part of the coastal plain of Palestine extending from Joppa to Mt. Carmel, proverbially fertile and noted for its flowery beauty (Isa. 35:2; Song of Sol. 2:1). It has a width of six to twelve miles. The plain was well watered and was a garden spot (1 Chron. 27:29). In modern Palestine it is dotted with citrus farms and numerous settlements. In antiquity it was a favorite caravan route along the sea, connecting Asia Minor, Egypt, and Mesopotamia. The plain furnished a home for very early man, as discovery of cave burial places has indicated. Dor, Lydda, Joppa, Caesarea, Rakkon, and Antipatris were well-known biblical cities located in this plain. M.F.U.

SHAR'ONITE (shar'un-it). The designation (1 Chron. 27:29) of Shitrai, David's chief herdsman in the plain of Sharon.

SHARU'HEN (sha-rū'hen). A town originally in Judah but afterward allocated to Simeon (Josh. 19:6), hence in the Negev, or S country. It is called Shilhim (15:32) and Shaaraim (1 Chron. 4:31). Its present location is Tell el-Far'ah, a short distance SW of Lachish (Tell ed-Duweir) on the main ancient road between Palestine and Egypt. The site reveals impressive evidence of Hyksos, Egyptian, and Roman fortifications. It rises 150 feet above the surrounding desert terrain and was of immense strategic importance in antiquity. It is NW of Beersheba.

SHA´SHAI (sha´shī; “whitish, or noble”). One of the “sons” of Bani, who put away his Gentile wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:40), 456 B.C.

SHA´SHAK (sha´shak), son of Beriah, a Benjamite (1 Chron. 8:14). He was the father of Ishpan and others (vv. 22–25), after 1360 B.C.

SHA´UL (sha´ul; “asked,” i.e., of God).

1. The son of Simeon by a Canaanite woman (Gen. 46:10; Ex. 6:15; Num. 26:13; 1 Chron. 4:24), c. 1900 B.C.

2. An Edomite king, called “Shaul of Rehoboth by the River” (1 Chron. 1:48–49; cf. Gen. 36:37–38).

3. Son of Uzziah, a Kohathite (1 Chron. 6:24).

SHA´ULITES (sha´ul-its). The family founded by Shaul, no. 1 (Num. 26:13).

SHA´VEH, VALLEY OF (sha´ve; “valley of the plain”). A valley called also the “King’s Valley” or Kidron, on the E of Jerusalem (Gen. 14:17; 2 Sam. 18:18; “king’s dale,” KJV). Here Absalom had erected a monument to himself; whether in the form of a column, an obelisk, or a monolith cannot be determined. It was situated about two stadia (one-fourth of a mile) E of Jerusalem.

SHA´VEH-KIRIATHA´IM (sha´ve-kir-ya-tha-im; “plain of Kiriathaim”). A plain near the city of Kiriathaim of Moab (Gen. 14:5). It belonged afterward to Reuben (Num. 32:37; Josh. 13:19). Chedorlaomer defeated the Emim here. “It is probably still to be seen in the ruins of el Teym, or et Tueme, about a mile to the W of Medabah” (K. & D., Com., on Gen.). See also Kiriathaim, no. 2.

SHAVING. See Hair.

SHAV´SHA (shav´sha). The secretary of King David (1 Chron. 18:16), and apparently the same as Seraiah (which see).

SHEAF. The rendering of three Heb. words:

1. Bundle of grain (Heb. ʾălūmmâ, “bound”; Gen. 37:7; Pss. 126:6; 129:7).

2. Bunch (Heb. ʿāmîr, “handful,” hence a sheaf; Jer. 9:22; Amos 2:13; Mic. 4:12; Zech. 12:6).

3. A heap (Heb. ʿōmer).

The Mosaic law contains the following prescriptions respecting sheaves:

1. One accidentally dropped or left upon the field was not to be taken up but left for the benefit of the poor (Deut. 24:19). See Glean.

2. The day after the feast of the Passover the Hebrews brought into the Temple a sheaf of the firstfruits of the harvest, with accompanying ceremonies (Lev. 23:10–12). See Festivals.

SHE´AL (shē´al; “asking”), one of the “sons” of Bani, who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:29), 456 B.C.

SHEAL´TIEL (shē-al´ti-el; I have “asked God”; in Matt. 1:12; Luke 3:27, LXX, Salathiel).

1. Son of Jeconiah, king of Judah, and father of Zerubbabel, according to 1 Chron. 3:17–19 and Matt. 1:12; but son of Neri and father of Zerubbabel, according to Luke 3:27. Upon the incontrovertible principle that no genealogy would assign inferior and private parentage to the true son and heir of a king and, that on the contrary, the son of a private person would naturally be placed in the royal pedigree on becoming the rightful heir to the throne, we may assert with the utmost confidence that Luke gives us the true state of the case when he informs us that Shealtiel was the son of Neri and a descendant of Nathan the son of David. And from the insertion of Shealtiel in the royal pedigree, both in 1 Chronicles and Matthew’s gospel, after the childless Jeconiah, we infer, with no less confidence, that, on the failure of Solomon's line, he was next heir to the throne of David. Keil (Com., ad loc.) supposes that Assir may have left only a daughter, who married a man belonging to a family of her paternal tribe, Neri, and that from this marriage sprang Shealtiel. Coming into the inheritance of his maternal grandfather, he would be legally regarded as his legitimate son.

2. Father of Zerubbabel (Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; Neh. 12:1; Hag. 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2, 23).

SHEARI'AH (shē-a-rī'a; "Jehovah esteems"), the fourth of Azel's six sons, and one of the descendants of Saul (1 Chron. 8:38; 9:44), long after 1000 B.C.

SHEARING HOUSE (KJV, 2 Kings 10:12). See Beth-eked (Beth Eked) of the Shepherds.

SHE'AR-JA'SHUB (shē'ar-ja'shub; "a remnant shall return"), the son of Isaiah, who accompanied his father when he went to deliver to King Ahaz the prophecy contained in Isa. 7:3, about 735 B.C. The name, like that of Maher-shalal-hash-baz, had a prophetic significance.

SHE ASS. See Animal Kingdom: Donkey. See Shibah.

SHE'BA (shē'ba).

1. A son of Raamah, son of Cush (Gen. 10:7; 1 Chron. 1:9). He is supposed to have settled somewhere on the shores of the Persian Gulf.

2. A son of Joktan, son of the patriarch Eber (Gen. 10:28; 1 Chron. 1:22). The Joktanites were among the early colonists of southern Arabia and the kingdom that they founded there was for many centuries called the kingdom of Sheba, after one of the sons of Joktan.

3. The elder son of Jokshan, son of Keturah (Gen. 25:3; 1 Chron. 1:32), probably after 2000 B.C. He evidently settled somewhere in Arabia, probably on the eastern shore of the Arabian Gulf, where his posterity appear to have become incorporated with the earlier Sabeans (which see) of the Joktanic branch.

4. The son of Bichri, a Benjamite from the mountains of Ephraim (2 Sam. 20:1–22), the last leader of the Absalom insurrection. He is described as a "worthless fellow," but he must have been a person of some consequence from the immense effect produced by his appearance. It was, in fact, all but an anticipation of the revolt of Jeroboam. The occasion seized by Sheba was the rivalry between the northern and southern tribes on David's return (20:1–2). The king might well say, "Sheba the son of Bichri will do us more harm than Absalom" (v. 6). Sheba traversed the whole of Palestine, apparently rousing the population. Joab followed in full pursuit. It seems to have been his intention to establish himself in the fortress of Abel Beth-maachah, famous for the prudence of its inhabitants (v. 18). That prudence was put to the test on the present occasion. Joab's terms were severe: the head of the insurgent chief. A woman of the place undertook the mission to her city and proposed the execution to her fellow citizens. The head of Sheba was thrown over the wall, and the insurrection ended, about 967 B.C.

5. One of the Gadite leaders residing in Bashan in the reign of Jeroboam II (1 Chron. 5:13), about 784 B.C.

6. The kingdom of Sheba. The kingdom of the Sabeans (which see), which, according to some, embraced the greater part of the Yemen, or Arabia Felix. When the fame of Solomon came to the ears of the queen of Sheba (Saba), she undertook a journey to Jerusalem to convince herself of the truth of the report that had reached her. She proposed to test his wisdom by posing "difficult questions" (1 Kings 10:1–13; 2 Chron. 9:1–12). A large number of inscriptions have been found in SW Arabia written in the so-called Sabean characters. They show, among other things, that besides the famous kingdom of Sheba, there was another monarchy called Ma'in, hence the classical and now current term "Minean." The Sabeans were governed by priest-kings (Ps. 72:10). The ruins of their capital city, Mariaba (Mareb), reveal the advancement of their culture. Solomon was able to answer all the queen of Sheba's riddles, and this demonstration of his wisdom, with the wonders of his retinue, his table, and his palace, filled her with amazement. She then said with astonishment to Solomon that of what her eyes now saw she had not heard the half. After an exchange of valuable presents, she returned to her own country. Jesus spoke of her as the "Queen of the South" (Matt. 12:42). Reference is made to the commerce that took the road from Sheba along the western borders of Arabia (Job 6:19; Isa. 60:6; Jer. 6:20; Ezek. 27:22–23).

7. One of the towns allotted to Simeon (Josh. 19:2), between Beersheba and Moladah. Sheba is lacking in the Chronicles, probably omitted through a copyist's error. It is rendered Shema in Josh. 15:26, where it stands before Moladah, just as Sheba does here.

SHE'BAH. See Shibah.

SHEBAM. See Sebam.

SHEBANI'AH (sheb-a-nī'a; perhaps, "Jehovah has brought back or returned").

1. One of the priests who blew the trumpet before the Ark of the Lord when it was removed from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:24), about 986 B.C.

2. One of the Levites who stood upon the "platform," offered the prayer of confession and thanksgiving (Neh. 9:4–5), and joined in the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (10:10), 445 B.C.

3. Another Levite who signed the covenant (Neh. 10:12).

4. A priest who also signed the covenant (Neh. 10:4). His son is prominently mentioned in 12:14, and he is probably the same as Shecaniah (v. 3).

SHE'BAT. See Sebat.

SHE'BER (she'ber; cf. Arab. sabr, "lion"). A son of Caleb by his concubine, Maacah (1 Chron. 2:48), about 1365 B.C.

SHEB'NA (sheb'na). A person occupying a high position in Hezekiah's court, officially described as "in charge of the royal household." The office he held included the superintendence of all the domestic affairs of the sovereign (Isa. 22:15), about 719 B.C. He subsequently held the subordinate position of scribe (36:3; 37:2; 2 Kings 19:2), his former post having been given to Eliakim. In his post of eminence Shebna had helped to support a spirit of self-security and forgetfulness of God, and Isaiah was sent to pronounce against him the prophecy of his fall (Isa. 22:15–25).

SHEBU'EL (sheb'u-el; perhaps "Return, O God" or "captive of God,") or Shubael.

1. A descendant of Gershon (1 Chron. 23:16; 26:24), who was officer over the treasures of the house of God; called also Shubael (24:20), before 960 B.C. He is the last descendant of Moses of whom there is any trace.

2. One of the fourteen sons of Heman the musician (1 Chron. 25:4), called also Shubael (25:20), before 960 B.C.

SHECANI'AH (shek-a-nī'a; "Jehovah has dwelt").

1. Apparently the son of Obadiah, and presumably a descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:21–22). Keil (Com., ad loc.) thinks that the list from v. 21 to the end of the chapter is a genealogical fragment inserted into the text at some later time.

2. The tenth in order of the priests who were appointed by lot in the reign of David (1 Chron. 24:11), about 960 B.C.

3. One of the priests appointed by Hezekiah to distribute tithes among their brethren (2 Chron. 31:15), 719 B.C.

4. One of the "sons" of Parosh, and ancestor of the Zechariah who, with 150 males, accompanied Ezra from the Exile (Ezra 8:3), before 457 B.C.

5. Another Israelite, and progenitor of Jahaziel, who with 300 males went up with Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:5), before 457 B.C.

6. The son of Jehiel, of the “sons of Elam,” and one of the Jews who proposed to Ezra the repudiation of the Gentile wives (Ezra 10:2), 457 B.C.

7. The father of Shemaiah, who was “keeper of the East Gate” and assisted in repairing the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:29), before 445 B.C.

8. The son of Arah, and father-in-law of Tobiah the Ammonite, who opposed Nehemiah (Neh. 6:18), 445 B.C.

9. One of the “priests and the Levites” (probably the former), who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:3), about 536 B.C.

SHECHANIAH. See Shecaniah.

SHE´CHEM (she´kem; a “shoulder, ridge”). The name of an ancient city in Palestine (which see) and of several persons in the Bible.

1. The son of Hamor, the Hivite prince at Shechem (Gen. 33:18). Charmed with the beauty of Dinah, Jacob’s daughter, Shechem took her with him and seduced her. This wrong was terribly avenged by the girl’s brothers Simeon and Levi (chap. 34; Judg. 9:28; Acts 7:16).

2. A man of Manasseh, of the family of Gilead, and head of the family of Shechemites (Num. 26:31). His family is mentioned in Josh. 17:2.

3. A son of Shemida, a Gileadite (1 Chron. 7:19).

SHECHEM (she´kem; a “shoulder, ridge”). An ancient and important city of Palestine (Gen. 12:6; Acts 7:16), also called Sychar (John 4:5).

Name. It is not known whether the city was named after Shechem (Gen. 33:18; see article above) or whether he received his name from it. The etymology of the Heb. word shekem indicates that the place was situated on some mountain or hillside. That presumption agrees with Josh. 20:7, which places it “in the hill country of Ephraim” (see also 1 Kings 12:25), and with Judg. 9:6–7, which represents it as under the summit of Gerizim, which belonged to the Ephraim range.

Location. After Vespasian destroyed the Samaritan temple on Mt. Gerizim, he built his new city (“Neapolis”) farther up the valley, leaving ancient Shechem in ruins. Archaeology has shown that Shechem was Tell Balâtah, not the site of the later Roman city Neapolis or Nablûs, which was considered for a long time to be Shechem, but is NW of it (see W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine).

Archaeology. Excavations at Tell Balâtah by the Germans between 1913 and 1934 show that the ancient city of Shechem was a prosperous place between 2000 and 1800 B.C. and later between 1400 and 1200 B.C. Important Bronze Age fortifications were discovered at the site. The ruins include a wall thirty feet high, dated from the seventeenth-sixteenth centuries. A fourteenth-century B.C. temple was also found. Walls evidently dating from the middle of the eleventh century and attributable to the era of Abimelech (Judg. 9) also came to light. Clay tablets inscribed in Akkad. writing were also dug up at the site. A Drew University–McCormick Theological Seminary team began a new excavation at Shechem in 1956, working there again in 1957, 1960, 1962, 1964, 1966, 1968, and 1969. Remains of a fortress-temple fifty-three feet wide and forty-one feet long have been identified as the house of Baal-berith destroyed by Abimelech (c. 1150 B.C.; Judg. 9:3–4, 46).

Bible Allusions. Abraham, on his migration to the land of promise, pitched his tent and built an altar under the oak (or terebinth) of Moreh, at Shechem. “The Canaanite was then in the land”; and it is evident that the region, if not the city, was already in possession of the aboriginal race (see Gen. 12:6). At the time of Jacob’s arrival here, after his sojourn in Mesopotamia (33:18; chap. 34), Shechem was a Hivite city, of which Hamor, the father of Shechem, was the head. It was at this time that the patriarch purchased “the piece of land” from him that he subsequently bequeathed as a special patrimony to his son Joseph (Gen. 33:19; Josh. 24:32; John 4:5). The field undoubtedly lay on the rich plain of the Mukhna, and its value was greater because of the well Jacob had dug there so that he wouldn’t be dependent on his neighbors for a supply of water. The defilement of Dinah, Jacob’s daughter, and the capture of Shechem and massacre of all the male inhabitants by Simeon and Levi are events that belong to this period (Gen. 34). In the distribution of the land, Shechem fell to Ephraim (Josh. 20:7) but was assigned to the Levites and became a city of refuge (21:20–21). It was the scene of the promulgation of the law, when its blessings were heard from Gerizim and its curses from Ebal (Deut. 27:11; Josh. 8:33–35). Here Joshua assembled the people shortly before his death and delivered to them his last counsels (24:1, 25). After the death of Gideon, Abimelech, his illegitimate son, induced the Shechemites to revolt and make him king (Judg. 9). After a reign of three years he was expelled from the city. In revenge he destroyed the place and, as an emblem of the fate to which he would consign it, sowed it with salt (vv. 25, 45). It was soon restored, however, for we are told in 1 Kings 12 that all Israel assembled at Shechem, and Rehoboam, Solomon’s successor, went there to be inaugurated as king. Here, at this same place, the ten tribes renounced the house of David and transferred their allegiance to Jeroboam (12:16), under whom Shechem became for a time the capital of his kingdom. Most of the people of Shechem were carried into captivity (cf. 2 Kings 17:5–6; 18:9–12), but Shalmaneser sent colonies from Babylon to occupy the place of the exiles (17:24). Another influx of strangers came under Esarhaddon (Ezra 4:2). From the time of the origin of the Samaritans the history of Shechem blends with that of this people and their sacred mount, Gerizim. It was to the Samaritans that Shechem owed the revival of its claims to be considered the religious center of the land, but this was in the interest of a narrow and exclusive sectarianism (John 4:5–40). SHECHI’NAH (shek-ī’na). Another spelling of Shekinah (which see).

SHED’EUR (shed’ur; “Shaddai is light”). The father of Elizur, chief of the tribe of Reuben at the time of the Exodus (Num. 1:5; 2:10; 7:30, 35; 10:18), c. 1440 B.C.

SHEEP. The rendering of several words in the original (see also Animal Kingdom):

1. A ram just old enough to butt (Ex. 12:5; Job 31:20), Heb. kebes.
2. A young sheep, a lamb (Gen. 30:32, 35; Lev. 1:10, etc.; Num. 18:17), Heb. keseb.
3. A flock of sheep (rendered “flock,” Gen. 4:2; 29:10; 31:19; 38:13; etc.), the most frequent word thus rendered, Heb. šōn.
4. One of a flock, a single sheep (Gen. 22:7, 8; Ex. 12:5, “lamb,” etc.), though sometimes used collectively (Jer. 50:17), Heb. šeh.
5. Any four-footed tame animal accustomed to graze, but always a sheep in the NT (Matt. 7:15; 10:16; 12:11–12, Gk. probaton).

Sheep were an important part of the possessions of the ancient Hebrews and of Eastern nations generally. They were used in the sacrificial offerings, both the adult animal (Ex. 20:24; 1 Kings 8:63; 2 Chron. 29:33) and the lamb, i.e., a male from one to three years old, but young lambs of the first year were used more frequently (see Ex. 29:38; Lev. 9:3; 12:6; Num. 28:9; etc.). No lamb under eight days old was allowed to be killed (Lev. 22:27). A very young lamb was called tāleh (1 Sam. 7:9, “suckling lamb”; Isa. 65:25). Sheep and lambs formed an important article of food (1 Sam. 25:18; 1 Kings 1:19; 4:23; Ps. 44:11; etc.). The wool was used for clothing (Lev. 13:47; Deut. 22:11; Prov. 31:13; Job 31:20; etc.). “Rams’ skins dyed red” were used as a covering for the Tabernacle (Ex. 25:5). Sheep and lambs were sometimes paid as tribute (2 Kings 3:4). It is striking to notice the immense numbers of sheep that were reared in Palestine in biblical times. Sheep-shearing is alluded to in Gen. 31:19; 38:13; Deut. 15:19; 1 Sam. 25:4; Isa. 53:7; etc. Sheep dogs were employed in biblical times, as is evident from Job 30:1, “the dogs of my flock.” Shepherds in Palestine and the East generally go before their flocks, which they induce to follow by calling to them (cf. John 10:4; Pss. 77:20; 80:1), though they also drive them (Gen. 33:13).

Figurative. The nature of sheep and their relation to man have given rise to many beautiful figures. Jehovah was the Shepherd of Israel, and they were His flock (Pss. 23:1; 74:1; 78:52; 79:13; 80:1; Isa. 40:11; Jer. 23:1, 2; etc.). The apostasy of sinners from God is likened to the straying of a lost sheep (Ps. 119:176; Isa. 53:6; Jer. 50:6). Jesus came to earth as the Good Shepherd (Luke 15:4–6; John 10:8–11). As the sheep is an emblem of meekness, patience, and submission, it is expressly mentioned as typifying these qualities in the Person of our blessed Lord (Isa. 53:7; Acts 8:32; etc.).

SHEEP BREEDER. (Heb. nōqēd, “marker,” 2 Kings 3:4). A term signifying both a shepherd (Amos 1:1) and also a possessor of flocks. In Arab. it is properly the possessor of a superior kind of sheep or goats.

SHEEPCOTE. A term used once in the KJV for Heb. gāḏērâ (1 Sam. 24:3; the NASB renders “sheepfold” in this verse, and the NIV, “sheep pens”) and twice for Heb. nāweh (2 Sam. 7:8; 1 Chron. 17:7; both the NASB and NIV of the passages render “pasture”). See Sheepfold; Shepherd.

SHEEPFOLD. The rendering of the following Heb. and Gk. terms:

1. Heb. gāḏērâ, an enclosure (1 Sam. 24:3; Num. 32:16, 24, 36; Zeph. 2:6), a built pen, such as joins buildings, and used for cattle as well as sheep.

2. Heb. miklâ, a fold or pen (Pss. 78:70; 50:9; Hab. 3:17), probably what we understand by stalls.

3. Gk. aulē, a court (John 10:1), the roofless enclosure in the open country into which flocks were herded at night.

When sheep are exposed to the depredations of robbers, it is customary in the East to shelter them in well-built enclosures, which are impregnable once the flock is within them. When no danger from this source is feared the flocks are put in folds only when they are to be shorn.

SHEEP GATE (shaar, “gate”; haṣṣōn, “flock,” i.e., “gate of the flock”; NASB and NIV “sheep gate” is KJV “sheep market”). One of the gates of Jerusalem rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh. 3:1, 32; 12:39). It was located between the Tower of the Hundred (“Tower of Meah,” KJV) and the upper room of the corner (3:1, 32), or Gate of the Guard (12:39). It is probably the “sheep gate” mentioned in John 5:2.

SHEEP MARKET. See Sheep Gate.

SHEEP MASTER. See Sheep Breeder.

SHEEPSHEARER (Heb. from gāzaz, to “shear”). What the harvest was to an agricultural people, the sheepshearing was to a pastoral people: celebrated by a festival corresponding to our harvest home, marked often by the same revelry and merrymaking (Gen. 31:19; 1 Sam. 25:4, 8, 36; 2 Sam. 13:23–28; etc.). Sheepshearers are mentioned in Gen. 38:12; 2 Sam. 13:23–24.

SHEEPSKINS (Gk. mēlōtē). A simple garment made of the sheep’s pelt (see Dress, no. 1); used figuratively (Heb. 11:37) to represent a condition of extreme poverty.

SHEE’RAH (shē’ra; “kinswoman”). Daughter of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7:24). She founded the two Beth-horons, “upper and lower,” and Uzzen-sheerah, probably about 1169 B.C. This Ephraim was probably a descendant of the patriarch and lived after Israel took possession of Canaan.

SHEET. See Fine Linen.

1. Rendered “fine linen” (Prov. 31:24; Isa. 3:23, KJV), and meaning probably a shirt (Judg. 14:12, KJV, Heb. sādīn).

2. A “sail” (Gk. ōthonē, Acts 10:11; 11:5; NIV, “sheet”).

SHE GOAT. See Animal Kingdom: Goat.

SHEHARI’AH (shē-ha-rī’a; “sought by Jehovah”). The second of the six sons of Jeroham, Benjamites residing in Jerusalem at the captivity (1 Chron. 8:26), 588 B.C.

SHEKEL. A weight and a unit of money. See Metrology.

SHEKI’NAH (shek-ī’na; Aram. and late Heb. shkīnāh, “residence,” i.e., of God). A word not in Scripture but used by later Jews and by Christians to express the visible divine Presence, especially when resting between the cherubim over the Mercy Seat. See discussion of the Ark, in the article Tabernacle.

SHE’LAH (shē’la).

1. The youngest son of Judah by the daughter of Shua (Gen. 38:5, 11, 14, 26; 46:12; Num. 26:20; 1 Chron. 2:3; 4:21), after 1925 B.C. His descendants (1 Chron. 4:21–23) were called Shelanites.

2. The son of Arpachshad (Gen. 10:24; 11:12–15; 1 Chron. 1:18). At 30 years of age he became the father of Eber; he lived to be 433 years old (Gen. 11:14–15). Sometimes “Salah,” KJV.

3. The son of Cainan and father of Heber in the genealogy of Christ (Luke 3:35–36).

SHE’LANITE (shē’la-nīt). A descendant of Shelah (which see), son of Judah (Num. 26:20).

SHELEMI’AH (shel-e-mi’a; “Jehovah repays”).

1. The gatekeeper of the E entrance to the Tabernacle; his son Zechariah had the northern gate (1 Chron. 26:14), about 960 B.C. He is called Meshelemiah (9:21; 26:1–2), Meshullam (Neh. 12:25), and Shallum (1 Chron. 9:17, 31).

2. One of the “sons” of Bani in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:39), 456 B.C.

3. Another of the “sons” of Bani in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:41), 456 B.C.

4. The father of Hananiah, who repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:30), 445 B.C. He was probably an apothecary, or manufacturer of incense (v. 8).

5. A priest appointed by Nehemiah to serve as a treasurer of the Levitical tithes (Neh. 13:13), 445 B.C.

6. The grandfather of Jehudi, who was sent by the officials to invite Baruch to read Jeremiah's scroll to them (Jer. 36:14), about 606 B.C.

7. Son of Abdeel, one of those who received the orders of Jehoiakim to take Baruch and Jeremiah (Jer. 36:26).

8. The father of Jehucal, or Jucal, in the time of Jedekiah (Jer. 37:3), about 597 B.C.

9. The father of Irijah, the captain of the guard who arrested Jeremiah (Jer. 37:13; 38:1), before 586 B.C.

SHE'LEPH (she'lef; "a drawing forth," but cf. Arab. salafa, "to cultivate"). The second of the thirteen sons of Joktan (Gen. 10:26; 1 Chron. 1:20). The tribe that sprang from him has been satisfactorily identified, and is found in the district of Sulaf.

SHE'LESH (she'lesh; "triplet, triad," but cf. Arab. salis, "meek, obedient"). A son of Helem, and great-grandson of Asher (1 Chron. 7:35), perhaps about 1290 B.C.

SHELO'MI (shel-ō'mi; "at peace"). The father of Ahihud, who represented the tribe of Asher among those appointed to divide the Promised Land (Num. 34:27), 1171 B.C.

SHEL'OMITH (shel-ō'mith; feminine of Shelomi, "peaceful").

1. The daughter of Dibri, of the tribe of Dan, and mother of the man who was stoned for blasphemy (Lev. 24:11), c. 1439 B.C.

2. The daughter of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:19), perhaps after 536 B.C.

3. First named of the three sons of Shimei, head of the Gershonites in the time of David (1 Chron. 23:9), about 950 B.C. The NIV renders "Shelomoth." In v. 10 his name should probably take that of "Shimei."

4. A Levite, chief of the Izharites in the time of David (1 Chron. 23:18), before 960 B.C. In 24:22 he is called Shelomoth.

5. The last child of Rehoboam by his wife Maacah (2 Chron. 11:20), about 934 B.C.

6. According to the present text, the sons of Shelomith, with the son of Josiphiah at their head, returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:10). There appears, however, to be an omission, and the true reading is probably "of the sons of Bani, Shelomith the son of Josiphiah."

SHEL'OMOTH (shel'ō-moth).

1. A Levite and leader of the Izharites (1 Chron. 24:22), elsewhere called Shelomith (23:18).

2. A Levite, and descendant of Eliezer, the son of Moses, who in the reign of David was one of the Temple treasurers (1 Chron. 26:25–26, 28), before 960 B.C. The NIV reads "Shelomith."

SHELU'MIEL (shel'u'mi-el; "peace of God"). The son of Zurishaddai, and leader of the tribe of Simeon at the time of the Exodus (Num. 1:6; 2:12; 7:36, 41; 10:19), c. 1440 B.C.

SHEM (shem; "name"). One of the three sons of Noah, born when his father was 500 years of age (Gen. 5:32), perhaps before 5000 B.C. At the age of 98 years he entered the ark, being married but childless (7:7), and two years after the Flood (i.e., the beginning of the Flood) he became the father of Arpachshad; other children were born still later (11:10–11; 10:22). He assisted Japheth in covering the nakedness of his father when it was made known by Ham. In the prophecy of Noah that is connected with this incident (9:23–27) the first blessing falls on Shem. His death at the age of 600 years is recorded in 11:11. The portion of the earth occupied by the descendants of Shem (10:21–31) intersects the portions of Japheth and Ham and stretches in an uninterrupted line from the Mediterranean Sea to the Indian Ocean. It includes Syria (Aram), Chaldea (Arphachshad), parts of Assyria (Asshur), of Persia (Elam), and of the Arabian peninsula (Joktan). The servitude of Canaan under Shem, predicted by Noah (9:26), was fulfilled primarily in the subjugation of the people of Palestine (Josh. 23:4;

2 Chron. 8:7–8). The eminent spiritual blessings of Shem are fulfilled in the Messiah, who came from the line of Shem (cf. Rom. 9:3–5).

SHE´MA (she´ma; “report, rumor, fame”).

1. The last-named son of Hebron and father of Raham, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:43–44).

2. The son of Joel and father of Azaz, of the tribe of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:8). He is probably the same as Shemaiah of v. 4.

3. One of the sons of the Benjamite Elpaal, and one of those who drove out the inhabitants of Gath (1 Chron. 8:13), after 1170 B.C.

4. One of those who stood at Ezra’s right hand when he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), about 445 B.C.

5. A town in S Judah, between Amam and Moladah (Josh. 15:26). In the parallel list of towns set off from Judah to Simeon (Josh. 19:2) it is given as Sheba, which is perhaps the more nearly correct.

SHEMA´AH (she-ma´a; “report, fame”). A Benjamite of Gibeah, and father of Ahiezer and Joash, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:3), about 1002 B.C.

SHEMA´IAH (she-ma´ya; “Jehovah has heard”).

1. A prophet in the reign of Rehoboam. When the king had assembled 180,000 men of Benjamin and Judah to reconquer the Northern Kingdom after its revolt, Shemaiah was commissioned to charge them to return to their homes and not to war against their brethren (1 Kings 12:22–24; 2 Chron. 11:2–4), after 934 B.C. His second and last appearance was upon the occasion of the invasion of Judah and siege of Jerusalem by Shishak, king of Egypt (12:5, 7). He wrote a chronicle containing the events of Rehoboam’s reign (v. 15).

2. The son of Shecaniah, among the descendants of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:22). He was keeper of the East Gate of the city and assisted Nehemiah in restoring the wall (Neh. 3:29), 445 B.C. He is probably the same as Semein (Luke 3:26).

3. Father of Shimri and ancestor of Ziza, a leader of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:37), before 726 B.C. Perhaps the same as Shimei (vv. 26–27).

4. The son of Joel, a Reubenite, and father of Gog (1 Chron. 5:4). He is probably the same as Shema (v. 8).

5. Son of Hasshub, a Merarite Levite who lived in Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:14). He was one of those who were “very able men for the work of the service of the house of God” (9:13; Neh. 11:15), 445 B.C.

6. The son of Galal and father of the Levite Obadiah (or Abda), who “lived in the villages of the Netophathites” after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:16), before 445 B.C. In Neh. 11:17 he is called Shammua.

7. Son of Elizaphan, and chief of his house of two hundred men in the reign of David (1 Chron. 15:8, 11). He took part in the removal of the Ark from Obed-edom (15:1–8, 14–15, 25), about 988 B.C.

8. A son of Nethanel the scribe. In the time of David, he registered the division of the priests into twenty-four orders (1 Chron. 24:6), about 960 B.C.

9. The eldest son of Obed-edom the Gittite, and a gatekeeper of the Temple (1 Chron. 26:4, 6–7), before 960 B.C.

10. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat, in his third year, to teach the people of the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8), 872 B.C.

11. A descendant of Jeduthun the singer, who assisted in the purification of the Temple in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:14), 719 B.C. He is perhaps the same as the Shemiah who distributed tithes among his brethren (31:15).

12. A Levite in the reign of Josiah, who, with others, made large contributions of sacrifices for the Passover (2 Chron. 35:9), 621 B.C.

13. One of the sons of Adonikam, who, with his two brothers, brought sixty males from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:13), about 457 B.C.

14. One of the leading men whom Ezra sent for while camped by the river of Ahava for the purpose of obtaining Levites and ministers for the Temple from “the place Casiphia” (Ezra 8:16, 17), about 457 B.C.

15. A priest of the family of Harim, who put away his foreign wife at Ezra’s bidding (Ezra 10:21), 456 B.C.

16. A layman of Israel, son of another Harim, who also had married a foreigner (Ezra 10:31), 456 B.C.

17. Son of Delaiah, the son of Mehetabel, a prophet in the time of Nehemiah who, bribed by Tobiah and Sanballat, pretended fear and proposed to Nehemiah that they should seek safety in the Temple (Neh. 6:10), 445 B.C.

18. A head of a priestly house who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:6, 18), 536 B.C. If the same, he lived to sign the covenant with Nehemiah (10:8), 445 B.C. The Shemaiah son of Mattaniah and father of Jonathan mentioned in 12:35 is perhaps the same.

19. One of the leaders of Judah at the time of the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:34), 445 B.C.

20. One of the musicians who took part in the dedication of the new wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:36), 445 B.C.

21. One of the priestly trumpeters on the same occasion (Neh. 12:42).

22. The father of the prophet Uriah (which see), of Kiriath-jearim (Jer. 26:20), before 609 B.C.

23. Shemaiah the Nehelamite, a false prophet in the time of Jeremiah (Jer. 29:24–32).

24. The father of Delaiah, one of the officials who heard Baruch’s scroll (Jer. 36:12), before 607 B.C.

SHEMARI’AH (shem-a-rī’a; “Jehovah keeps or preserves”).

1. One of the Benjamite warriors who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:5), about 1002 B.C.

2. The second son of Rehoboam by his wife Abihail (2 Chron. 11:19; Shamariah, KJV), about 934 B.C.

3. One of the family of Harim, a layman of Israel, who put away his foreign wife in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:32), 456 B.C.

4. Another of the family of Bani under the same circumstances (Ezra 10:41).

SHEME’BER (shem-e’ber). King of Zeboim, and ally of the king of Sodom when he was attacked by the northeastern invaders under Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:2), about 2065 B.C.

SHE’MED (she’med), properly She’mer (shē’mer; “preserved”). The third named son of Elpaal, and builder of Ono and Lod. He was a Benjamite (1 Chron. 8:12), 1380 B.C.

SHE’MER (she’mer; “preserved”).

1. The owner of the hill on which the city of Samaria was built (1 Kings 16:24). King Omri bought it for two talents of silver and named it Samaria, after Shemer, about 886 B.C.

2. The son of Mahli and father of Bani, of the tribe of Levi (1 Chron. 6:46), perhaps about 1440 B.C.

3. The second son of Heber, an Asherite (1 Chron. 7:32, where he is called Shomer), and father of Ahi and others (v. 34), perhaps before 1440 B.C.

SHEMI'DA (she-mi'da; "the name," i.e., descendants, "has known"). One of the six sons of Gilead and founder of the family Shemidaites, of the tribe of Manasseh (Num. 26:32; Josh. 17:2). His three sons are mentioned in 1 Chron. 7:19.

SHEMI'DAITES (she-mi'da-its). Descendants (Num. 26:32) of Shemida, who obtained their inheritance among the male posterity of Manasseh (Josh. 17:2).

SHEM'INITH (shem'i-nith). A musical term (1 Chron. 15:21, marg.; titles of Pss. 6, 12), perhaps referring to eight strings or octaves.

SHEMIR'AMOTH (shem-ir'a-moth; possibly "name of the heights" or "name most high").

1. A Levite musician of the second degree in the choir founded by David (1 Chron. 15:18), playing "with harps tuned to alamoth" (v. 20; cf. 16:5), about 986 B.C.

2. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the law to the inhabitants of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8), after 875 B.C.

SHEMU'EL (she-mū'el; "heard of God"). The same Heb. word commonly translated Samuel, the name of several Bible personages. In the KJV Shemuel appears three times: (1) in Num. 34:20 for the son of Ammihud, appointed from the tribe of Simeon, to divide the land of Canaan, c. B.C. 1400; (2) in 1 Chron. 6:33 for Samuel the prophet (which see); and (3) in 1 Chron. 7:2 for descendant of Tola who was one of the chiefs of the tribe of Issachar.

SHEN (shen; Heb. with article hashshēn, "the tooth"). Between this place and Mizpah Samuel set up the stone Ebenezer to commemorate the rout of the Philistines (1 Sam. 7:12). The name may indicate a projecting point of rock (14:4) or a place situated upon such a point. Its exact locality is unknown.

SHENAZ'ZAR (shen'a-zar; Akkad., "O Sin," i.e., moon god, "protect"). One of the sons of Jeconiah and brother of Shealtiel (1 Chron. 3:18), after 606 B.C.

SHE'NIR. See Senir.

SHE'OL (shē'ol; "Hades," or the world of the dead). A word usually derived from shā'al, "to ask or seek," perhaps with the meaning expressed in English, "the insatiable sepulcher." We have no clue to the origin of the word and must seek for its meaning in the several passages in which it occurs. In Gen. 37:35, "And he [Jacob] said, 'I will go down to Sheol in mourning for my son,'" the meaning is obvious. In Num. 16:30 Moses declares that Korah shall go down alive into Sheol (v. 33). In 2 Sam. 22:6 we read, "The cords of Sheol surrounded me." In Job 11:8 there seems to be an allusion to the belief that there is a dark and deep abyss beneath the center of the earth, tenanted by departed spirits, but not necessarily a place of torment. "Sheol from beneath is excited over you," etc. (Isa. 14:9), is thus rendered by Delitzsch (Com., ad loc.), "The kingdom of the dead below is all in uproar on account of thee"; and its meaning thus interpreted, "All Hades is overwhelmed with excitement and wonder, now that the king of Babel ... is actually approaching."

In the great majority of cases in the OT, Sheol is used to signify the grave; and it can have no other meaning in Gen. 37:35; 42:38; 1 Sam. 2:6; 1 Kings 2:6; Job 14:13; 17:13, 16, and in many passages in the writings of David, Solomon, and the prophets. The darkness and gloom of the grave was such that the word denoting it came to be applied to the abiding place of the miserable. Some passages are doubtful, but concerning others scarcely a question can be entertained (e.g., 11:8; Ps. 139:8; Amos 9:2), in which the word denotes the opposite of heaven. Still more decisive are Ps. 9:17; Prov. 23:14; in which Sheol can only mean the abode of the wicked, as distinguished from and opposed to the righteous. In nearly every instance Sheol is translated as “grave” in the NIV.

In the NT the Gk. hadēs is used in much the same sense as Sheol in the OT, except that in fewer cases can it be construed to signify “the grave.” It takes this meaning in Acts 2:31, but in general the Hades of the NT appears to be the world of future punishment (e.g., Matt. 11:23; 16:18; Luke 16:23). See Hades; Hell; Gehenna.

SHE'PHAM (she'fam). A place mentioned by Moses in his specification of the eastern boundary of the Promised Land (Num. 34:10–11). Location on NE near Riblah.

SHEPHATI'AH (shef-a-tī'a; “Jehovah judges”).

1. The fifth of the six sons born to David in Hebron. His mother's name was Abital (2 Sam. 3:4; 1 Chron. 3:3), about 994 B.C.
2. Son of Reuel and father of Meshullam, a Benjamite leader dwelling in Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:8), before 536 B.C.
3. The Haruphite, or Hariphite, one of the Benjamite warriors who joined David in his retreat at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:5), about 1002 B.C.
4. Son of Maacah and head of the Simeonites in the time of David (1 Chron. 27:16), before 960 B.C.
5. The last named of the six sons of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, all of whom were richly endowed by their father (2 Chron. 21:2–3), after 875 B.C.
6. The family of Shephatiah, 372 in number, returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:4; Neh. 7:9). A second detachment of 80, with Zebadiah at their head, came up with Ezra (Ezra 8:8), before 536 B.C.
7. The family of another Shephatiah were among the children of Solomon's servants who came up with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59), before 536 B.C.
8. A descendant of Perez, the son of Judah and ancestor of Athaiah (Neh. 11:4), long before 536 B.C.
9. The son of Mattan, one of the officials of Judah, who counseled Zedekiah to put Jeremiah to death (Jer. 38:1, 4), 589 B.C.

SHEPHE'LAH, THE (she-fay'la; “the low,” i.e., “land”). The name given to the southern division of the low-lying district between the central highlands of Palestine (which see) and the Mediterranean. Though the name may originally have been used to include the maritime plain, the Shephelah proper was the region of low hills between that plain and the high central range. It is about forty miles long, N to S, and eight miles wide, E to W. Its altitude ranges from 500 to 1,000 feet. It contained the strategic defense cities of Lachish, Debir, Libnah, and Beth-shemesh.

SHE'PHER (Heb. sheper, “brightness,” Num. 33:23–24; “Shapher,” KJV.) A mountain at which the Israelites camped during their wilderness journeying, between Kehelathah and Haradah. Its identification is doubtful.

SHEPHERD (from Heb. rō'eh, “one who tends,” to “tend”; Gk. poimēn).

Duties. The routine of the shepherd's duties appears to have been as follows: In the morning he led forth his flock from the fold (John 10:4), which he did by going before them and calling them, as is still usual in the East. Arriving at the pasturage, he watched the flock with the assistance of dogs (Job 30:1), and, should any sheep stray, he had to search for it until he found it (Ezek. 34:12; Luke 15:4). He supplied them with water, either at a running stream or at troughs attached to wells (Gen. 29:7; 30:38; Ex. 2:16; Ps. 23:2). At evening he brought them back to the fold and checked to see that none was missing by passing them “under the rod” as they entered the door of the enclosure (Lev. 27:32; Ezek. 20:37), checking each sheep as it passed, by a motion of the hand (Jer. 33:13). Finally, he watched the entrance of the fold throughout the night, acting as gatekeeper (John 10:3). The shepherd’s office thus required great watchfulness, particularly by night (Luke 2:8; cf. Nah. 3:18). It also required tenderness toward the young and feeble (Isa. 40:11), particularly in driving them to and from the pasturage (Gen. 33:13). In large establishments there were various grades of shepherds; the highest were those “put . . . in charge” (Gen. 47:6), or “chief shepherds” (cf. 1 Pet. 5:4). In a royal household the title abbîr, “chief,” was bestowed on the person who held the post (1 Sam. 21:7). Shepherds in Bible lands were of two varieties—those who were nomadic, and migrated to new pastures and sources of water, and those who resided in towns and tended flocks in nearby meadows.

Life. The office of the Eastern shepherd, as described in the Bible, involved much hardship and even danger. He was exposed to extremes of heat and cold (Gen. 31:40); his food frequently consisted of the precarious supplies afforded by nature, such as the “sycamore fig” or Egyptian fig (Amos 7:14), the “pods” of the carob tree (Luke 15:16), and perhaps the locusts and wild honey that supported John the Baptist (Matt. 3:4); he had to encounter attacks of wild beasts, occasionally of the larger species, such as lions, wolves, leopards, and bears (1 Sam. 17:34; Isa. 31:4; Jer. 5:6; Amos 3:12); nor was he free from the risk of robbers or predatory hordes (Gen. 31:39). To meet these various foes, the shepherd’s equipment consisted of the following articles: a robe, made probably of sheepskin, with the fleece on, which he turned inside out in cold weather, as implied in the comparison in Jer. 43:12 (cf. Juv. 14. 187); a pouch, containing a small amount of food (1 Sam. 17:40); a sling, which is still the favorite weapon of the Bedouin shepherd (17:40); and, last, a staff, which served the double purpose of a weapon against foes and a crook for the management of the flock (1 Sam. 17:40; Ps. 23:4; Zech. 11:7). If the shepherd was at a distance from his home, he was provided with a light tent (Song of Sol. 1:8; Jer. 35:7), the removal of which was easily effected (Isa. 38:12). In certain localities, moreover, towers were erected for the double purpose of spying on an enemy at a distance and protecting the flock; such towers were erected by Uzziah and Jotham (2 Chron. 26:10; 27:4), whereas their existence in earlier times is testified by the name Migdal-Eder (Gen. 35:21, “tower of Eder”; Mic. 4:8, “tower of the flock”). Shepherds found shelter in caves such as those near Bethlehem or at ‘Ain Feshka, where the Dead Sea Scrolls were uncovered, or the Cave of Pan at Baniyas. Often the shepherd simply slept under the stars or in a light, easily transported tent (Song of Sol. 1:8).

The hatred of the Egyptians toward shepherds (Gen. 46:34) may have been mainly due to their contempt for the sheep itself, which appears to have been valued neither for food nor generally for sacrifice. They were offered for sacrifice only in the district of the Natron lakes.

Figurative. The shepherd is used frequently in Scripture as illustrative:

1. Of God as the Leader of Israel (Pss. 77:20; 80:1).
2. Of Christ as the Good Shepherd (Ezek. 34:23; Zech. 13:7; Isa. 40:11; John 10:14; Heb. 13:20).
3. Of kings as leaders of the people (Isa. 44:28; Jer. 6:3; 49:19).
4. Of ministers (Jer. 23:4), foolish shepherds as bad ministers (Isa. 56:11; Jer. 50:6; Ezek. 34:2, 10; Zech. 11:8, 15–17).

SHE'PHI (shef'i; "bareness"). The fourth of the five sons of Shobal, the son of Seir of Edom (1 Chron. 1:40), called in the parallel passage (Gen. 36:23) Shepho (Shephi in the NIV).

SHE'PHO (shef'o; Gen. 36:23). See Shephi.

SHE'PHUPHAM (she'fū-fam). Mentioned in Num. 26:39 as one of the "sons" of Benjamin and head of the family of Shuphamites. He is doubtless the same person elsewhere (1 Chron. 8:5) called Shephuphan (which see). He was, if the same person, a son of Bela the son of Benjamin and was reckoned among Benjamin's sons because, like them, he founded an independent family (K. & D., Com., ad loc.). The NIV reads Shupham.

SHEPHU'PHAN (she-fū'fan). One of the sons of Bela, the firstborn of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:5). His name is also written Shephupham or Shupham (Num. 26:39) and Muppim (Gen. 46:21).

SHERAH. See Sheerah.

SHERD. A piece of broken pottery. The numerous potsherds found in ancient biblical and near-biblical sites are of inestimable value to the archaeologist in dating occupational strata and in determining density of population in any era. Pottery chronology is now a precise science. Perhaps more than any one factor it has lifted modern archaeology out of the category of a treasure hunt and placed it on a solid scientific basis. Sir Flinders Petrie in 1890 worked out sequence dating by types of pottery found in different strata. Petrie's initial methods have been greatly refined. Two basic principles underlying scientific archaeology are (1) stratigraphy, or the examination of the kinds of pottery found in occupational levels and (2) typology, the study of the relation of the forms of pottery found at a given level. At Ras Shamra in N Syria pottery excavated shows influences as far distant as Turkistan, Susa, and Nineveh. Palestinian pottery gives evidence of great artistic ability, showing Israel's creative skill. See Potsherd. M.F.U.

SHEREBI'AH (sher-e-bī'a; "Jehovah has sent scorching heat"). A Levite of the family of Mahli, the son of Merari, who, with eighteen of his brethren, joined Ezra at the river Ahava (Ezra 8:18, 24). When Ezra read the law to the people, Sherebiah was among the Levites who assisted him (Neh. 8:7), about 445 B.C. He took part in the psalm of confession and thanksgiving that was sung at the solemn fast after the feast of Tabernacles (9:4-5), and signed the covenant with Nehemiah (10:12). He is again mentioned among the chief Levites who belonged to the choir (12:8, 24).

SHE'RESH (she'resh; "root"). Son of Machir the Manassite by his wife Maacah (1 Chron. 7:16).

SHEREZER. See Sharezer, no. 2.

SHERIFF. See Magistrate.

SHE'SHACH, SHESHAK (she'shak). This is supposed to be a symbolical name for Babel, or Babylon (Jer. 25:26; 51:41). It is thought by some critics to be a cabalistic plan called "Athbash." The letters of the alphabet were numbered both in their correct and reverse orders. When the cypher of a name was devised, its consonants were replaced by the identical numbers in the reverse numbering. Since "B" is the second letter of the Heb. alphabet and "S" or "Sh" the second from the end, and "L" the twelfth from the beginning and "K" the twelfth from the end, the cypher for Babel was Sheshak.

SHE'SHAI (she'shī; "whitish"). One of the three sons of Anak, who dwelt in Hebron (Num. 13:22) and were driven thence and slain by Caleb at the head of the children of Judah (Josh. 15:14; Judg. 1:10), c. 1364 B.C.

SHE´SHAN (she´shan). A son of Ishi, in the posterity of Jerahmeel, of the tribe of Judah. Having no sons, he gave his daughter, probably Ahlai, to his Egyptian slave, Jarha, through which union the line was perpetuated (1 Chron. 2:31, 34–35), about 1190 B.C.

SHESHBAZ´ZAR (shesh-baz´er; Akkad., apparently “Sun-god, guard the lord or son”). The Chaldean name given, apparently, to Zerubbabel (Ezra 1:8, 11; 5:14, 16). That Sheshbazzar means Zerubbabel is evident from (1) his being called the “prince [hannāšû] of Judah” (1:8), a term marking him as head of the tribe in the Jewish sense; (2) his being characterized as “governor” pehâ, appointed by Cyrus, both which Zerubbabel was (5:14); and yet more distinctly by the assertion (5:16) that “Sheshbazzar came and laid the foundations of the house of God in Jerusalem,” compared with the promise to Zerubbabel (Zech. 4:9), “The hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundation of this house, and his hands will finish it.”

SHETH (sheth; “a placing, compensation”). In Num. 24:17 (KJV, NASB, NIV) the Heb. term is rendered as a proper name, Sheth, but there is reason to regard it as an appellative and to translate, instead of “the sons of Sheth,” “the sons of tumult,” or confusion, the wild warriors of Moab (cf. Jer. 48:45, “riotous revelers,” NASB, with marg., “sons of tumult”). The NIV gives “noisy boasters” as the marginal reading of Num. 24:17 but as the textual reading of Jer. 48:45).

SHE´THAR (she´thar; foreign derivation). One of the seven princes of Persia and Media, who had access to the king’s presence and were the first men in the kingdom in the third year of Ahasuerus (Esther 1:14).

SHE´THAR-BOZ´ENAI (she´thar-boz´e-nī). A Persian officer of rank, having a command in the province “beyond the River,” under Tattenai, the governor, in the reign of Darius Hystaspes (Ezra 5:3, 6; 6:6, 13). He joined with Tattenai and “his colleagues the officials” in trying to obstruct the progress of the Temple in the time of Zerubbabel and in writing a letter to Darius, of which a copy is preserved in Ezra 5. As for the name Shethar-bozenai, it certainly seems to be Persian. The first element of it appears as the name Shethar, one of the seven Persian princes in Esther 1:14 (Smith).

SHE´THAR-BOZ´NAI. See Shethar-bozenai.

SHE´VA (shē´va; “vanity”).

1. The scribe or royal secretary of David (2 Sam. 20:25). He is called elsewhere Seraiah (8:17), Shisha (1 Kings 4:3), and Shavsha (1 Chron. 18:16).

2. Son of Caleb the son of Hezron, by his concubine Maacah (1 Chron. 2:49).

SHEWBREAD. See Showbread.

SHI´BAH (shē´ba; “seven, an oath”). The famous well that gave its name to the city of Beersheba (Gen. 26:33). According to this version of the occurrence, Shibah (“Shebah,” KJV) was the fourth of the series of wells dug by Isaac’s people and received its name from him, apparently in allusion to the oaths that had passed between himself and the Philistine chieftains the day before. It should not be overlooked that the well owed its existence and name to Isaac’s father (21:32). Some commentators, looking to the fact that there are two large wells at Bir es Sēba, propose to consider the two transactions as distinct, the one belonging to the one well, the other to the other. Others see in the two narratives merely two versions of the circumstances under which this renowned well was first dug.

SHIB´BOLETH (shib´bō-leth; a “stream, as flowing”; or an “ear” of grain, as growing out). This word came into notice in the OT history merely with respect to its proper pronunciation. After the defeat of the Ephraimites by Jephthah and the Gileadites on the farther side of Jordan, the latter seized the fords of the river, with the view of cutting off the return of the Ephraimites. To test whether those who approached the river were really Ephraimites, they asked them to pronounce the word shibboleth. If any pronounced it sibboleth—the way the Ephraimites did—doing away with the aspirate—he was adjudged an Ephraimite and put to death. Thus 42,000 Ephraimites fell (Judg. 12:5–6).

SHIBMAH. See Sibmah.

SHICRON. See Shikkeron.

SHIELD. See Armor, Arms.

SHIERON. See Shikkeron.

SHIGGAION (shi-ga'yon). Used in the title of Ps. 7, meaning not certain.

SHIGIONOTH (shi-gi-o'nōth). Shigionoth, pl. of Shiggaion (Hab. 3:1).

SHIHON. See Shion.

SHIHOR (shi'hor). One of the Heb. names given to the Nile in Scripture (see Isa. 23:3; Jer. 2:18, where Sihor is given in the KJV and Shihor in the NIV, but Nile in the NASB). Shihōr means “black, dark, turbid,” suggested by Egyptian Shi-hrw, “lake or pool of Horus.” The name Sihor (KJV), or Shihor (NASB, NIV) appears also in Josh. 13:3; 1 Chron. 13:5, as the border of a region still to be possessed by the Israelites. Opinions vary as to the identity of this place, but Keil (Com.) believes it to be the brook of Egypt, the modern Wadi el-Arish.

SHIHOR-LIBNATH (shi'hor-lib'nath; “turbid or muddy stream of Libnath”). It is generally believed to be a river of Carmel, on the borders of Asher, probably the modern Nahr-Zerka, or crocodile brook (Josh. 19:26). Crocodiles are still found in the Zerka.

SHIKKRON (shik'eron; “drunkenness”; KJV Shicron). A town near the western end of the northern boundary of Judah, between Ekron and Mt. Baalah (Josh. 15:11). As it is not named among the cities of Judah (vv. 21–63), it would seem to have been in Dan. It is, perhaps, the present ruined village Beit Shit, about halfway between Ekron and Ashdod.

SHILHI (shil'hi; perhaps, “He,” i.e., Jehovah, “has sent”). The father of Azubah, the mother of King Jehoshaphat (1 Kings 22:42; 2 Chron. 20:31), before 875 B.C.

SHILHIM (shil'him; “missiles”). A place in the S of Judah (Josh. 15:32). It is also called Sharuhēn (Josh. 19:6) and Shaaraim (1 Chron. 4:31). See Sharuhēn.

SHILLEM (shil'em; “recompense”). A son of Naphtali (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:49), elsewhere (1 Chron. 7:13) called Shallum (which see). The NIV retains Shillem throughout.

SHILLEMITE (shil'e-mīt), a descendant of Shillem (which see), mentioned in Num. 26:49.

SHILOAH (shī-lō'a; Isa. 8:6). See Siloam.

SHILOAH, WATERS OF (shī-lō'a). Used (Isa. 8:6) “as a symbol of Davidic monarchy enthroned upon Zion, which had the promise of God, who was enthroned upon Moriah, in contrast with the imperial or world kingdom, which is compared to the overflowing waters of the Euphrates” (Delitzsch, Com., ad loc.). There is no reason to doubt that the “waters” are the same as the pool of Siloam (which see).

SHILOH (shī'lo). The name, apparently, of a person.

A title of the Messiah (Gen. 49:10), Heb. shilōh. Though there has been much discussion as to the grammatical interpretation of the word, Jewish officialdom and the Christian church agree as to the fact that the patriarch is here proclaiming the coming of the Messiah. The NIV renders “until he comes to whom it belongs,” thus taking Shiloh as the Heb. phrase shelōh; i.e., “that which is to him” or “that which belongs to him.” See NIV margin. “The objection that the expectation of a personal Messiah was foreign to the patriarchal age, and must have been foreign to the nature of that age” (Kurtz) is not valid. For the expectation of a personal Savior did not arise for the first time with Moses, Joshua, and David, but was contained in the germ of the promise of the seed of the woman and in the blessing of Noah upon Shem, and was still further expanded in the promises of God to the patriarchs. When Jacob had before him the founders of the twelve-tribed nation the question naturally arose, from which of the twelve tribes would the promised Savior proceed? Reuben (which see) had forfeited the right of primogeniture by his incest, and it could not pass over to either Simeon or Levi on account of their crime against the Shechemites. Consequently the dying patriarch transferred, both by his blessing and prophecy, the chieftainship and promise to his fourth son, Judah. Judah was to bear the scepter with victorious, lionlike courage, until in the future “Shiloh” was to descend from Judah.

The gradual advance of messianic prophecy places the personal meaning of Shiloh beyond all possible doubt. Balaam’s prophecy transfers Jacob’s proclamation of the lion nature of Judah to Israel as a nation (Num. 23:24; 24:9) and introduces the figure of the scepter from Gen. 49:9–10. As champion even after the death of Joshua, Judah by divine direction opened the attack upon the Canaanites (Judg. 1:1–10) and also the war against Benjamin (20:18). From Judah was raised up the first judge in the person of Othniel (3:9). The election of David raised Judah to the rank of ruling tribe, and it received the scepter over all the rest (1 Chron. 28:4). The authority of Zerubbabel as “governor of Judah” (Hag. 2:2) would seem to have rested upon a recognition of this traditional supremacy.

Solomon sang of the “king’s son” who should have dominion from sea to sea and from the river to the ends of the earth (Ps. 72). The prophets after Solomon prophesied of the Prince of Peace, who should increase government and peace without end upon the throne of David, and of the sprout out of the rod of Jesse, whom the nations should seek (Isa. 9:6–7; 11:1–10; cf. Ezek. 21:27). “Thus did the kingdom of Judah arise from its temporary overthrow to a new and imperishable glory in Jesus Christ (Heb. 7:14), who conquers all foes as the Lion of the tribe of Judah (Rev. 5:5) and reigns as the true Prince of Peace, as ‘our peace’ (Eph. 2:14), forever and ever” (K. & D., Com., on Gen.).

SHILOH (shī’lo). The site of Israel’s early sanctuary in the time of the Judges, is identified with Seilun, thirty miles N of Jerusalem. It was located E of the main road from Jerusalem to Shechem, about nine miles N of Bethel. Considering all factors, Shiloh was a good choice of a sanctuary from the point of view of a central location. It was the focal point of Israel’s tribal organization before the establishment of the kingdom. Such a central religious institution of a common shrine around which were grouped the twelve tribes has close parallels in Mediterranean lands (cf. Martin Noth, Das System der Zwoelf Staemme Israel [1930], pp. 39–60). Numerous associations such as the Delphic in the eighth century B.C. and the Etruscan, centering on the temple of the goddess Voltumna, are illustrations. Israel, moreover, was not the only country in the ancient Near East that had its central sanctuary to which pilgrimages were made. Nippur in Babylonia and Nineveh in Assyria in the early second millennium B.C. were such places, as is known from contemporary documents. Other examples are the temple of Sin at Haran and the shrine of Belit-ekalli at Qatna. The sanctuary of Baaltis at Byblos performed a similar function. Excavations by the Danish Expedition (1922, 1926–32, 1969) have uncovered pottery and other evidence demonstrating that Shiloh was destroyed c. 1050 B.C., presumably at the hands of the Philistines when the Ark was carried away (1 Sam. 4). Jeremiah takes this destruction for granted (Jer. 7:12–15; 26:6), and findings at the site offer an interesting instance of archaeology’s ability to supplement information contained in the biblical account. When the Philistines brought back the Ark to Israel it was not set up again at Shiloh (1 Sam. 6:21–7:2).

SHILO'NI (Neh. 11:5, KJV). This word should be rendered “the Shilonite,” which see. The NIV reads, “a descendant of Shelah.”

SHI'LONITE (shī'lo-nīt).

1. The native or resident of Shiloh—a title ascribed only to the prophet Ahijah (1 Kings 11:29; 12:15; 15:29; 2 Chron. 9:29; 10:15; Neh. 11:5).

2. The Shilonites are mentioned among the descendants of Judah dwelling in Jerusalem at a date difficult to fix (1 Chron. 9:5). They are doubtless the members of the house of Shelah, who in the Pentateuch are more accurately designated Shelanites.

SHIL'SHAH (shil'sha; “triad”). Son of Zophah, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:37), before 960 B.C.

SHIM'EA (shim'i-a; “report, rumor, fame”).

1. Son of David by Bathsheba (1 Chron. 3:5; Shammua, NIV), called in 2 Sam. 5:14; 1 Chron. 14:4, Shammua (which see).

2. A Merarite Levite, son of Uzzah and father of Haggiah (1 Chron. 6:30), before 987 B.C.

3. A Gershonite Levite, ancestor of Asaph the singer (1 Chron. 6:39).

4. The brother of David and father of Jonathan (1 Chron. 2:13; 20:7), elsewhere called Shammah (1 Sam. 16:9) or Shimei (2 Sam. 21:21, NASB; “Shimeah,” KJV and NIV).

SHIM'EAH (shim'i-a). A descendant of Jeiel, the father or founder of Gibeon (1 Chron. 8:32), perhaps 536 B.C. He is called Shimeam (9:38).

SHIM'EAM (shim'i-am; “their fame”). The descendant of Jeiel (1 Chron. 9:38), called (8:32) Shimeah (which see).

SHIM'EATH (shim'i-ath; fem. of “Shimeah”). An Ammonitess, mother of Jozacar or Zabad, one of the murderers of King Joash (2 Kings 12:21; 2 Chron. 24:26), before 797 B.C.

SHIM'EATHITES (shim'i-a-thīts). One of the families of “scribes” resident at Jabez, in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:55); descendants, apparently, of a Shimeah not of the Kenites, possibly the brother of David (1 Chron. 2:13; 20:7).

SHIM'EI (shim'i; perhaps, “a renowned one”).

1. Son of Gershon, the son of Levi (Ex. 6:17; Num. 3:18; 1 Chron. 6:17, 29; 23:7, 9–10; Zech. 12:13). In 1 Chron. 6:29, he is called the son of Libni, and both are reckoned as sons of Merari; but there is reason to suppose that there is something omitted in this verse, as he is everywhere else represented to be Libni's brother. Strong (Cyclopaedia) conjectures that Shelomith should be read instead of Shimei in 1 Chron. 23:10. Keil (Com., ad loc.) thinks the Shimei of vv. 7 and 10 to be another than the one in v. 9. See Shimeites.

2. The son of Gera, a Benjamite of the house of Saul, and resident, during David's reign, of Bahurim, on the other side of the Mount of Olives (2 Sam. 16:5).

When David, in his flight from Absalom, had come to Bahurim, Shimei ran out of the place, cursing the king and pelting him and his servants with stones. Abishai wanted to put an end to this cursing and requested permission to “cut off his head,” but was forbidden by the king, who said, “Perhaps the Lord will look on my affliction and return good to me instead of his cursing this day.” The royal party passed on; Shimei followed them and cast stones and dirt as long as they were in sight (2 Sam. 16:5–13), about 967 B.C.

The next we learn of Shimei is his pleading for pardon at the hands of the king. When David crossed the Jordan in the ferryboat (2 Sam. 19:18), the first person to welcome him was Shimei, who may have seen him approaching from the heights above. He threw himself at David's feet in abject penitence, and, notwithstanding the desire of Abishai that he should be put to death, his life was spared (19:16–23).

But the king's suspicions were not set at rest by this submission, and on his deathbed he recalled the whole scene to his son Solomon. Solomon gave Shimei notice that from henceforth he had to consider himself confined to the walls of Jerusalem on pain of death. He was to build a house in Jerusalem (1 Kings 2:36–37). For three years the agreement was kept. At the end of that time, for the purpose of capturing two slaves who had escaped to Gath, Shimei went out on his donkey and made his journey successfully. On his return the king kept his word, and Shimei was slain by Benaiah (vv. 38–46), around 955 B.C.

3. The brother of David and father of Jonathan (2 Sam. 21:21), elsewhere called Shimea, "Shimma," KJV (1 Chron. 2:13; 20:7), Shimeah, NIV, or Shammah (1 Sam. 16:9), which see.

4. An adherent of Solomon at the time of Adonijah's usurpation (1 Kings 1:8), 958 B.C. Unless he is the same as Shimei the son of Ela (4:18), Solomon's deputy, or with Shimea, or Shammah, David's brother, it is impossible to identify him.

5. Son of Ela, and Solomon's deputy in Benjamin (1 Kings 4:18), 954 B.C.

6. Son of Pedaiiah and brother of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:19), 536 B.C.

7. A Simeonite, son of Zaccur. Special mention is made of his large family (1 Chron. 4:26–27), perhaps before 1210 B.C.

8. A Reubenite, son of Gog and father of Micah (1 Chron. 5:4).

9. A Gershonite Levite, son of Jahath (1 Chron. 6:42).

10. A Benjamite (1 Chron. 8:21, "Shimhi," KJV), apparently the same as Shema, the son of Elpaal (v. 13).

11. Son of Jeduthun, and head of the tenth division of the singers in David's reign (1 Chron. 25:17), before 960 B.C.

12. The Ramathite who was over David's vineyards (1 Chron. 27:27), before 960 B.C.

13. A Levite of the sons of Heman, who took part in the purification of the Temple under Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:14), c. 720 B.C.

14. The Levite who, with his brother Conaniah, had charge of the offerings in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:12–13), 719 B.C. Perhaps the same as the preceding.

15. A Levite in the time of Ezra who had married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:23), 456 B.C.

16. One of the family of Hashum who put away his foreign wife at Ezra's command (Ezra 10:33).

17. A son of Bani, who also had married a foreign wife and put her away (Ezra 10:38).

18. Son of Kish, a Benjamite and ancestor of Mordecai (Esther 2:5), before 518 B.C.

SHIM'EITES, SHIMITES (shim'e-its, shim'its; "Shimite," KJV). A descendant of Shimei (no. 1), the son of Gershon (Num. 3:21; cf. Zech. 12:13).

SHIM'EON (shim'i-on; "a hearing," i.e., in prayer). A layman of Israel, of the family of Harim, who had married a foreign wife and divorced her in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:31).

SHIMHI. See Shimei, no. 10.

SHIMI. See Shimei, no. 1.

SHIMMA. See Shimei, no. 3.

SHI'MON (shi'mon). The four sons of Shimon are enumerated in an obscure genealogy of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20).

SHIM'RATH (shim'rath; "a guarding, watching"). A Benjamite, the ninth named of the sons of Shimei, no. 10 (1 Chron. 8:21).

SHIM'RI (shim'ri; "vigilant, watchful").

1. Son of Shemaiah, and head of a Simeonite family (1 Chron. 4:37), probably after 1170 B.C.
2. The father of Jediahel, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:45), before 982 B.C.
3. "Simri," KJV. Son of the Merarite Levite Hosah. He was not the firstborn, but for some reason his father made him "first." He was appointed by David to be gatekeeper for the Ark (1 Chron. 26:10), before 960 B.C.
4. The son of Elizaphan, and one of the Levites who aided in the purification of the Temple under Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:13), c. 720 B.C.

SHIM'RITH (shim'rith; fem. of "Shimri"), a Moabitess, mother of Jehozabad, one of the assassins of King Joash (2 Chron. 24:26; in 2 Kings 12:21, Shomer).

SHIMROM. See Shimron.

SHIM'RON (shim'ron; "guardianship").

1. The fourth son of Issachar (Gen. 46:13; Num. 26:24; 1 Chron. 7:1, "Shimrom," KJV), and the head of the family of the Shimronites, about 1910 B.C.
2. A town of Zebulun (Josh. 19:15), one of those that joined the confederacy under Jabin against Joshua (11:1-5), more fully called Shimron-meron (12:20).

SHIM'RONITE (shim'ron-it). A descendant (Num. 26:24) of Shimron, the son of Issachar.

SHIM'RON-ME'RON (shim'ron-mē'ron). A town conquered by Joshua (Josh. 12:20), and probably the same as elsewhere (11:1) called simply Shimron (which see).

SHIM'SHAI (shim'shī; "sunny"). The scribe or secretary of Rehun, who was a kind of satrap of the conquered province of Judea and of the colony of Samaria, supported by the Persian court (Ezra 4:8, 9, 17, 23). He was apparently an Aramean, for the letter that he wrote to Artaxerxes was in Aramaic (4:7), and the form of his name is in favor of this supposition.

SHIN (שׁ) (shēn). The twenty-first letter of the Heb. alphabet. It is given the English sound "sh," as in "sheen." It heads the twenty-first section of Ps. 119 (which see). The Heb. letter sin (שׁן), pronounced seēn, looks exactly like it, except for the placement of the dot above the left arm of the character.

SHI'NAB (shi'nab). The king of Admah in the time of Abraham (Gen. 14:2), c. 1965 B.C.

SHI'NAR (shi'nar). The name of a country (Gen. 10:10; 11:2). In the biblical story, Shinar is the name of the land in which were located the cities of Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh. It was, therefore, a part of the land of Babylonia and may be roughly spoken of as southern Babylonia, though some of these cities, perhaps, would more strictly be included in northern Babylonia. Though some in the past have equated Shinar with Sumer (southern Babylonia), scholars do not now consider the two terms to be linguistically equatable. It is best just to identify the plain of Shinar as the plain of southern Mesopotamia. The land to which it is applied in the OT is alluvial and was celebrated in the ancient world not only by the Babylonians but also by the Greeks and Romans as a region of prodigious fertility. Largely because of salinization, this is no longer true.

Before the fourth millennium B.C., a non-Semitic people known as the Sumerians entered this fertile region and developed a high degree of civilization and a pictograph cuneiform writing that was the precursor of Semitic cuneiform. Isaiah named Shinar as one of the places from which the Jews would be regathered at the end time (Isa. 11:11). Zechariah 5:11 mentions Shinar in connection with the woman and the ephah, symbolizing the spirit of godless commercialism as originating in Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar carried away Temple treasures taken from Jerusalem to the Shinar area (Dan. 1:2). H.F.V.

SHINAR, BEAUTIFUL MANTLE FROM. See Beautiful Mantle from Shinar.

SHI'ON (shi'on; "overturning, a ruin"). A city in Issachar (Josh. 19:19), between Hapharaim and Anaharath. A name resembling it at present in that neighborhood is ᵿAyunesh-Shōian, three miles WNW of Mt. Tabor.

SHIPBUILDER. See Handicrafts.

SHIPHI. See Shipphi.

SHIPH'MITE (shif'mīt). An epithet of Zabdi, officer over David's stores of wine (1 Chron. 27:27); probably as a native of Shepham (which see). See also Siphmoth.

SHIPH'RAH (shif'ra; "splendor, beauty"). The name of one of the two midwives of the Hebrews who disobeyed the command of Pharaoh to kill the male children (Ex. 1:15–21). See Puah.

SHIPH'TAN (shif'tan; "judicial"). Father of Kemuel, a leader of the tribe of Ephraim, and one of those appointed to divide Canaan (Num. 34:24), after 1400 B.C.

SHIPMASTER (Gk. kubernētēs). The captain of a boat (Rev. 18:17; cf. Acts 27:11).

SHIPMEN. Sailors (1 Kings 9:27; Acts 27:27, 30; all KJV and NIV). See Ships; Sailor.

SHIP'PHI (shi'fi; "abounding, abundant"). A Simeonite, father of Ziza, a leader of the tribe in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:37), before 719 B.C.

SHIPS (Heb. ᵿōnīyyā, "conveyance"; spīnā, "a boat"; Gk. plōion).

Navigation. Shipbuilding and navigation were important both in Egypt and Mesopotamia. Very early in history the Egyptians made boats. Besides the small vessels used for fishing in the Nile, immense barges transported building stones from Upper Egypt. Funeral barges as well as passenger boats of wood propelled by oars were a common sight in ancient Egyptian times. Egyptians also ventured out into the Mediterranean in larger, more seaworthy vessels. The ancient story of Wen-amon tells of the purchase of cedar for the construction of Egyptian sacred barges. Babylonians built boats that plied the Tigris-Euphrates as well as larger ones that sailed into the Persian Gulf on extended commercial voyages. The Phoenicians were famous boat builders and sailors from early times. Byblos seamen ran a close second to the Egyptians. The famous "Byblos travelers" carried on trade with the Egyptians. This name was given to these vessels because they transported from Phoenicia to Egypt cargoes of wine, papyrus pith, oils, cedar, mummy cases, masts, and flagpoles. In exchange the Phoenicians carried back jewelry, perfumes, gold, metal-work, and luxury wares. By the time of Solomon, Phoenician trading vessels on the Mediterranean went as far as Spain. Skilled Phoenician craftsmen built Solomon's tarshish or copper-refining fleet at Ezion-geber, and Tyrian sailors manned them.

Ancient Ships. The types of ships, or boats, used in ancient times varied from region to region.

Egyptian. Long before the time of Menes (c. 2900 B.C.), Egyptians employed ships on the Nile. By the end of the fifth millennium B.C. evidence of ships is found. Amratan vases depict large galleys. Predynastic ships had sharply upturned prows and looked like the gondolas of Venice. During many centuries the Egyptian navy was strong. "Celestial barks" carried deceased pharaohs to their final resting place. James Breasted refers to some of these being 770 cubits long.

Mesopotamian. Round, reed, basketlike barks were calked with bitumen for Mesopotamian river traffic. These common boats were the precursors of later Assyrian craft made of skin and timber rafts supported on inflated skins. Even to the present day the round guffahs are still to be seen on the Euphrates. Seafaring vessels came up the Persian Gulf transporting luxury wares to the Tigris-Euphrates region. The Gulf of Suez was also a common water route in antiquity. Caravans picked up the cargoes and followed regular desert routes.

Phoenician. Phoenician ships were not large but were skillfully made and manned. They had masts of cedar, oars of oak, and were often lavishly adorned. They furnished a picturesque sight with varicolored sails. Happily, the Phoenicians had plenty of wood in the forests of Lebanon at their back door. Their famous ships, often no larger than a good-sized coastal fishing boat of the present day, made a brilliant record in ancient history.

Cretan. Early in the second millennium B.C., the island of Crete became famous as a seafaring power. The Minoan sea kings, because of their great commercial wealth, were able to build the famous Minoan culture. From Heracleion near Knossos, Cretan vessels plied trade with such distant places as Troy, Athens, the cities of Asia Minor, and Ugarit in northern Syria. Phaestos on the southern coast of Crete carried on extensive trade with North Africa and Egypt.

Greek. By the seventh century B.C. the Greeks became conspicuous in sea traffic. They improved upon Phoenician boats. The famous Corinthian warships had two decks, one for rowers and one for fighters. The Greeks increased the size of their ships and had to resort to anchors. They also employed slave labor. Corinth was a famous trading center, being situated on a strategic isthmus.

Roman. In antiquity the difference between the long, narrow ship of war and the short-prowed merchant vessel was pronounced (cf. Odyssey 5.250; 9.323). Merchant vessels were mostly sailing vessels. Warships were customarily also propelled by oars. Early Roman vessels had from one to three banks of oars. Later vessels were constructed with four, five, or more banks of oars. The rowers were crowded together and faced the stern. The number of rowers in an ancient trireme (that is, a ship with three banks of oars) was 170; that of a Roman quinquereme, five banked, in the Punic wars was 300. Some ships were much larger than this. One eight-banked vessel is said to have had a crew of 1,600. Oars were long, and rhythm was maintained by a stroke of a hammer or the music of a flute.

Bible Reference. The following allusions to seafaring are found in the OT: the prophecy concerning Zebulun (Gen. 49:13); in Balaam's prophecy (Num. 24:24); in one of the warnings of Moses (Deut. 28:68); in Deborah's song (Judg. 5:17); and in the illustrations and descriptions in Job (9:26), the Psalms (48:7; 104:26; 107:23), and Proverbs (23:34; 30:19; 31:14). We have already referred to Solomon's ships (1 Kings 9:26; 2 Chron. 8:18; 9:21) and the disastrous expedition of Jehoshaphat's ships from the same port of Ezion-geber (1 Kings 22:48-49; 2 Chron. 20:36-37). Tyre is depicted allegorically as a splendid ship (Ezek. 27), and Isaiah speaks of the "ships of Tarshish" (Isa. 2:16; 23:1, 14). In the narrative of Jonah (1:3-16), several nautical terms are introduced; and Daniel (11:40) speaks of ships of war.

Frequent mention is made in the NT of vessels on the Sea of Galilee. There Jesus addressed the multitude from on board a boat (Matt., Gk. plōion), i.e., a small fishing vessel; and frequent mention is made of His sailing up and down the lake (Matt. 8:23; 9:1; 14:13; John 6:17). Some of His earliest followers were owners of boats that sailed on this inland sea (Matt. 4:21; Luke 5:3; John 21:3). Josephus calls these vessels skaphē, "skiff" (cf. Acts 27:16, 30, 32); probably like our modern fishing smack, generally propelled by oars but also employing sails.

Construction and Equipment. Although ancient ships differed from one another, they shared many features of construction and equipment.

The Hull. The hull of ancient vessels presents no special peculiarities; the bow and stern were similar in shape; merchant ships had no hold, the cargo being stowed away upon the deck, the sides of which were protected by an open rail, the stempost and the sternpost rising in a curve, most frequently terminating in an ornament representing a waterfowl bent backward. On the stern projections we sometimes see an awning represented, and on the bow the anchors were stowed. Capstans were evidently used to raise anchors. The personification of ships led to the painting of an eye on each side of the bow, a custom still prevalent in the Mediterranean. Indeed, Western sailors speak of the “eyes” of a ship, and it is said in Acts 27:15 that the ship “could not face the wind.” A badge, sign, or emblem was also placed at the prow (28:11).

Masts, Rigging. These, in distinction from the hull or vessel itself, were called skevē, “gear” (Acts 27:19, “tackle”). The principal feature was a large mast with one large, square sail fastened to a yard of great length. Other masts were sometimes used, arranged as the mainmast. The sail that was hoisted when the ship of Paul was run aground was a “foresail,” or a small sail substituted for the larger sail in stormy weather (Gk. artemōn, 27:40). The mast or “sail” is mentioned in Isa. 33:23, and from Ezek. 27:5 we learn that Lebanon cedar was sometimes used to make them; “oaks from Bashan” for the oars (v. 6) and “fir trees from Senir” (Anti-Lebanon) for the sheathing of the hull. Ropes and sails were made of byssus linen, the latter being woven in party colors.

Anchors. Although ships rigged and constructed like those of the ancients might, under favorable circumstances, be able to work to windward, it must have been “slowly and with difficulty”; and in the event of a ship’s being caught in a gale on a lee shore, the only mode of escape was to anchor. No better proof could be given of the superiority in this branch of seamanship than the successful manner in which Paul’s ship was brought to anchor in the face of a lee shore in a gale, and finally run ashore, when it could be done in safety to the lives of all on board (Imperial Bible Dictionary, s.v.). The anchors were much like those of modern make, except that in place of the palms, or iron plates attached to the extremities of the arms, the arms themselves were beaten flat, as in Dutch anchors.

Undergirders (Gk. hupozōmata, Acts 27:17). The imperfection of the build, and the tendency to strain the seams, led to taking on board “helps” (Gk. boētheia), cables or chains, that in case of necessity could be passed around the hull, at right angles to its length and made tight—a process called frapping in the English navy.

Steering. Ancient ships were steered by means of two paddle rudders, one on each quarter, acting in a rowlock or through a porthole, as the vessel was large or small. The same thing is true not only of the Mediterranean ships, but of the early vessels of the Northmen. There is nothing out of harmony with this early system of steering in James 3:4, where Gk. pēdalion, helm, occurs in the singular; for the pilot (Gk. euthunōn) would only use one paddle rudder at a time.

Officers and Crew. Luke mentions (Acts 27:11; cf. Jonah 1:6; Rev. 18:17) two principal officers of the ship: the pilot (Gk. kubernētēs, and the captain (Gk. nauklēros), a shipowner or master of a trading vessel, who took passengers and freight for hire. The “pilot” of James 3:4 (Gk. euthunōn) is merely the man at the helm. The “shipmen” (Gk. nautai) were common sailors.

Figurative. An industrious housewife is likened to a merchant ship, bringing “her food from afar” (Prov. 31:14). “Shipwreck” is symbolical of one departing from the faith (1 Tim. 1:19).

SHIRTS. See Dress.

SHI'SHA (shi'sha). Father of Elihoreph and Ahijah, the royal secretaries in the reign of Solomon (1 Kings 4:3), before 960 B.C. He is apparently the same as Shavsha, who held the same position under David. See Shavsha.

SHI'SHAK (shi'shak). Egyptian Sheshonk I (Sheshonq I). Founder of Libyan Dynasty XXII. Shishak is usually dated c. 945–924 B.C. He is the first pharaoh referred to specifically by name in the Bible. He is famous for his plundering expedition in the fifth year of Rehoboam (1 Kings 14:25–28) when he seized Solomon's golden shields and other Temple and royal treasures. Egyptian records do not give the date of Shishak's expedition. The chronology of the early kings of the Davidic line is debated. Albright sets the accession of Rehoboam c. 922 B.C. making the fifth regnal year c. 917 B.C. (Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 87 [1942]: 28; 130 [April 1953]: 7). Thiele put the accession in 931 and the invasion in 925. The gold-masked body of Shishak was uncovered intact in his burial chamber at Tanis (1938–39). In the temple of Karnak (ancient Thebes) his triumphal inscription is recorded. It enumerates his conquests, which include towns in all parts of Judah, extending up the coastal plain and crossing Esdraelon into Gilead indicating that he invaded the Northern Kingdom as well as the Southern Kingdom, in spite of his previous friendship with Jeroboam (11:40; cf. W. F. Albright, O. T. Commentary [1948], p. 151). A part of a stela of Shishak has been dug up at Megiddo, evidence that he actually did capture and occupy this important fortress city as recounted in the Karnak inscription. A triumphal Karnak relief displays captives of Shishak taken in his incursions into Palestine.

SHIT'RAI (shit'rī). The Sharonite who had charge of David's herds that grazed in Sharon (1 Chron. 27:29), before 970 B.C.

SHITTAH TREE, SHITTIM WOOD. See Vegetable Kingdom: Acacia.

SHIT'TIM (shit'im; “acacias”).

1. Israel's last camping place E of the Jordan before entering Palestine (Num. 25:1; Josh. 3:1; Mic. 6:5); an abbreviation of Abel-shittim (Num. 33:49). It was the place from which Joshua sent forth spies into Canaan (Josh. 2:1). See Abel-shittim.

2. The barren valley of the Jordan above the Dead Sea; it was chosen by the prophet Joel (Joel 3:18; “valley of acacias,” NIV) to denote a very dry valley, as the acacia grows in a dry soil. It was probably W of the Jordan. In the prophecy the spring that waters this valley and proceeds from the house of Jehovah, the physical as well as spiritual blessings that will come to Palestine and its inhabitants in the Kingdom age, are portrayed (cf. Zech. 14:8; Ezek. 47:1–12).

SHI'ZA (shi'za). The father of Adina, one of David's Reubenite warriors (1 Chron. 11:42), before 1000 B.C.

SHO'A (sho'a). A people listed with the Babylonians, Chaldeans, and Assyrians (Ezek. 23:23). They may be the Sutu mentioned in the Amarna Letters, Syrian nomads who invaded the E Tigris country and, joining with Aramean peoples, were never conquered by the Assyrians.

SHO´BAB (shō´bab; “backsliding, rebellious”).

1. Second named of the sons born to David in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:14; 1 Chron. 3:5; 14:4), about 1000 B.C.

2. Apparently the son of Caleb, the son of Hezron, by his wife Azubah (1 Chron. 2:18), about 1390 B.C.

SHO´BACH (shō´bak). The general of Hadadezer, king of the Arameans of Zobah, who was defeated by David in person at Helam. Shobach was wounded and died on the field (2 Sam. 10:15–18). In 1 Chron. 19:16, 18, he is called Shophach, c. 1001 B.C.

SHO´BAI (shō´bāi; possibly, “one who takes prisoner”). The sons of Shobai were a family of Temple gatekeepers who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45), before 536 B.C.

SHO´BAL (shō´bal).

1. The second son of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:29–30; 1 Chron. 1:38), and one of the “chiefs,” or phylarchs, of the Horites (Gen. 36:29), about 1840 B.C.

2. One of the three sons of Hur, the son of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:50). He became the founder (“father”) of Kiriath-jearim, about 1390 B.C. The passage should probably be rendered, “These are the sons [i.e., descendants] of Caleb, through his son Hur,” etc. In 1 Chron. 4:1–2, Shobal appears with Hur among the sons of Judah. He is possibly the same as the preceding.

SHO´BEK (shō´bek; cf. Arab. sabiq, “victor, one who goes before”). One of the heads of the people who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:24), 445 B.C.

SHO´BI (shō´bi; possibly, “one who takes captive”). Son of Nahash, of Rabbah, of the sons of Ammon. He was one of the first to meet David at Mahanaim, on his flight from Absalom, and supply him with bedding, cooking utensils, and food (2 Sam. 17:27), about 970 B.C.

SHO´CHO. See Soco.

SHO´CHOH. See Soco.

SHOCK OF CORN (Heb. gādîsh, a “heap”; hence “a tomb,” Job 21:32). A “stack” (Ex. 22:6; Job 5:26) of grain reaped (Judg. 15:5).

SHO´CO. See Soco.

SHOE. See articles Dress; Sandal.

SHOE LATCHET. See Latchet.

SHOEMAKER. See Handicrafts: Leatherworker.

SHO´HAM (shō´ham; “beryl, onyx”). A Merarite Levite, son of Jaaziah, employed about the Ark by David (1 Chron. 24:27), about 983 B.C.

SHO´MER (shō´mēr; “guard, keeper”).

1. Second named of the three sons of Heber, an Asherite (1 Chron. 7:32), called in v. 34 Shemer (which see); Shamer, KJV.

2. The father of Jehozabad, who killed King Joash (2 Kings 12:21). In the parallel passage in 2 Chron. 24:26, the name is converted into the feminine form Shimrith, who is further described as a Moabitess. This variation may have originated in the dubious gender of the preceding name Shimeath, which is also made feminine by the chronicler. Others suppose that in Kings the father is named and in Chronicles the mother.

SHO´PHACH (shō´fak). The general of Hadadezer (1 Chron. 19:16, 18), called in 2 Sam. 10:16, Shobach (which see).

SHOPHAN. See Atroph-shophan.

SHORE. See Seashore, Seacoast.

SHOULDER. The neck, as the place to receive a burden (Gen. 21:14; 24:45; etc.). Twice (Num. 6:19; Deut. 18:3) it represents Heb. word for arm, the foreshoulder offered in sacrifice; cf. the right, or “heave” offering, i.e., “shoulder” (Ex. 29:27; Lev. 7:32–34; etc.). The shoulder, properly so called, is the spot from which garments are suspended (Ex. 28:12; 39:7), especially of the “shoulder pieces” of the high priest (which see). The Gk. term ōmos (Matt. 23:4; Luke 15:5) is the common word for shoulder.

Figurative. To turn a stubborn shoulder (Neh. 9:29; “turned their backs,” NIV), i.e., to refuse an appointed burden, is figurative of disobedience, rebellion; whereas to relieve one’s shoulder from his burden (Ps. 81:6) is to deliver him from bondage. Job, in assurance of innocence, exclaims, “Oh ... the indictment which my adversary has written,” i.e., an indictment made out in legal form, and adds, “Surely I would carry it on my shoulder” (Job 31:35–36). The meaning doubtless is that he would wear it upon his shoulder as a mark of his dignity. “The staff on their shoulders” (Isa. 9:4) is the staff that strikes the shoulder; or the wood, like a yoke, on the neck of slaves, the badge of servitude. “The government will rest on His shoulders” (9:6), like the expression “Then I will set the key of the house of David on his shoulder” (22:22) refers to the custom of wearing the ensign of office upon the shoulder, in token of sustaining the government. The same idea is expressed by the epaulets worn in the army and navy. To lay heavy loads on men’s shoulders, etc. (Matt. 23:4) is selfishly to burden men with obligations that the scribes and Pharisees would not concern themselves with.

SHOULDER PIECE (Heb. kātēp, “clothed”). The side pieces on the upper part of the high priest’s ephod, which came over the shoulder, where the front and back flaps were fastened (Ex. 28:7, 12, 25; 39:4).

SHOVEL. The implement used for removing ashes from the altar (Ex. 27:3; etc.). See Tabernacle. It is also the rendering of Heb. raḥat (Isa. 30:24), a winnowing fork.

SHOWBREAD. A KJV term replaced in the NASB and NIV with bread of the Presence. See Tabernacle: Typology of the Tabernacle and Furniture.

SHOWER. See Rain.

SHRINE (Gk. naos, a “temple,” Acts 19:24). A miniature representation of the splendid temple of Artemis, with a statue of the goddess. In the OT the Heb. term bêth ʾēlōhîm (“house of God/gods”) is rendered “shrine” by the NIV in Judg. 17:5. Miqdāsh appears as “shrine” in the NIV in Isa. 16:12.

SHROUD (Heb. ḥoresh, “thicket”; Ezek. 31:3, KJV; “forests,” 2 Chron. 27:4, KJV, “wooded areas,” NIV; “bough,” Isa. 17:9, KJV, “thickets,” NIV). Probably a shadowing thicket.

SHRUB (Heb. šîṭaḥ, Gen. 2:5). Elsewhere bush (which see; 21:15; Job 30:4, 7).

SHU´A (shū´a).

1. A Canaanite of Adullam, whose daughter was the wife of Judah and the mother of his first three children (Gen. 38:2, 12; “Shuah,” KJV), elsewhere called Bath-shua (1 Chron. 2:3).

2. The daughter of Heber, the grandson of Asher (1 Chron. 7:32).

SHU´AH (shū´a).

1. The last named of the six sons of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chron. 1:32).

2. See Shua, no. 1.

3. See Shuhah.

SHU´AL (shū´al; “fox, jackal”).

1. The third named of the eleven sons of Zophah (1 Chron. 7:36).

2. The “land of Shual” (1 Sam. 13:17) is named as invaded by one of the marauding companies of Philistines; probably five or six miles NE from Bethel in Benjamin. It has not been identified.

SHU´BAEL (shū´ba-el). Two Levites (1 Chron. 24:20; 25:20); called elsewhere Shebuel (which see).

SHU´HAH (shū´ha). A brother (although some manuscripts have son) of Chelub, among the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. 4:11; “Shuah,” KJV).

SHU´HAM (shū´ham). The son of Dan (Num. 26:42); elsewhere (Gen. 46:23), called Hushim (which see).

SHU´HAMITE (shū´ham-īt). The descendants of Shuham numbered 4,460 when Israel entered Canaan (Num. 26:42–43).

SHU´HITE (shū´hīt). A term only used as an epithet of Bildad in Job 2:11; 18:1; 25:1; 42:9. It is quite probably a patronymic from Shuah, son of Abraham of Keturah (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chron. 1:32). His descendants formed an Arab tribe, doubtless the Shuhites who resided near the land of Uz (Job 2:11). Assyrian Suhu, on the W of the Euphrates near the mouths of the Balikh and Habur, is a likely identification. In this case the Shuhites would be in the extreme N, toward the Euphrates. This identification would favor a NE, or Aramaic, location for the land of Uz rather than a southern, i.e., an Edomite or Arabian one. W.H.; M.F.U.

SHU´LAMMITE, SHULAMITE (shū´la-mīt; “peaceful”). The title applied (Song of Sol. 6:13) to the young woman in the Song of Solomon. Since the LXX translates the term Sounamītis, i.e., Shunammite, it is evidently derived from the town of Shunam near Mt. Gilboa. The form Shulammite may have been adopted because of its assonance with Solomon (Heb. Sh□lōmōh) and, indeed, as a kind of title (not a proper name), it may actually be the feminine of Solomon.

SHU´MATHITES (shū´math-īts). One of the principal families of Kiriath-jearim (1 Chron. 2:53).

SHU´NAMMITE (shū´nam-īt). A native of Shunem (which see), as is evident from 2 Kings 4:12, 25, 36; cf. v. 8, where it is applied to the hostess of Elisha. It was also applied to Abishag, the nurse of David in his old age (1 Kings 1:3; 2:17, 21–22).

SHU´NEM (shū´nem). A place belonging to Issachar. Here the Philistines encamped before Saul’s last battle (Josh. 19:18; 1 Sam. 28:4). It was the home of Abishag (1 Kings 1:3), also the residence of the woman whose son Elisha restored to life (2 Kings 4:8). Identified with Solem (Sūlam) at the SW foot of Little Hermon, three miles N of Jezreel, and in the midst of a rich country.

LXX Septuagint

SHU'NI (shū'ni). Son of Gad, and founder of the family of the Shunites (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:15), c. 1910 B.C.

SHU'NITE (shū'nīt). The patronymic given to a descendant of Shuni (which see), the son of Gad (Num. 26:15).

SHU'PHAM. See Shuphamite.

SHU'PHAMITE (shū'fam-īt). The designation of a descendant of Shephupham (Num. 26:39), or Shephuphan (1 Chron. 8:5). The KJV renders Shupham.

SHUP'PIM (shūp'im).

1. In the genealogy of Benjamin, Shuppim and Huppim, the “sons of Ir,” are reckoned (1 Chron. 7:12). Ir is the same as Iri, the son of Bela, the son of Benjamin, so that Shuppim was the great-grandson of Benjamin.

2. A Levite who, together with Hosah, had charge of the Temple gate Shallecheth (1 Chron. 26:16), about 960 B.C. Keil (Com., ad loc.) thinks that the word has come into the text by a repetition of the last two syllables of the preceding word.

SHUP'PITES. See Shuppim.

SHUR (shūr; “wall fortification”). Referred to as “east of Egypt, as one goes toward Assyria” (Gen. 25:18); and as “even as far as the land of Egypt” (1 Sam. 27:8); and as “you go to Egypt” (15:7). From its meaning “a wall,” as well as from various references to it in the text, it would seem that Shur was a barrier of some kind across the great northeastern highways out of Egypt, near the eastern boundary line of Egypt. This barrier was the great defensive wall built across the eastern frontier—a wall hardly less prominent in the history of ancient Egypt than the Great Wall of China. This fortified barrier is mentioned in records from the Twelfth Dynasty, c. 2000–1775 B.C.

“With the Great Wall standing there across the entrance of Lower Egypt as a barrier and a landmark between the delta and the desert, it follows almost as a matter of course that the region on either side of the wall should bear the name of the wall: on the western side was the Land of Mavor, the Land Walled in; on the eastern side was the Wilderness of Shur, the Wilderness Walled out. Hence it comes to pass that the desert country eastward of Lower Egypt is known in the Bible as the Wilderness of Shur” (Trumbull, Kadesh-Barnea, pp. 44ff.).

Shur is first mentioned in the narrative of Hagar’s flight from Sarah (Gen. 16:7). Abraham afterward “settled between Kadesh and Shur; then he sojourned in Gerar” (20:1). The first clear indication of its position occurs in the account of Ishmael’s posterity. “And they settled from Havilah to Shur which is east of Egypt as one goes toward Assyria” (25:18; cf. 1 Sam. 15:7; 27:8). The wilderness of Shur was entered by the Israelites after they had crossed the Red Sea (Ex. 15:22–23). It was called the wilderness of Etham (Num. 33:8).

SHUSHAN. See Susa.

SHUSHAN EDUTH (shū-shan e'dūth; Shushan-eduth, KJV; lit., “lily of testimony”). Ps. 60, title. The NIV reads, “To the tune of ‘The Lily of the Covenant.’”

SHU'THALHITE. See Shuthelahite.

SHU'THELAH (shū'the-la).

1. First named of the three sons of Ephraim (Num. 26:35–36), perhaps about 1850 B.C. His descendants to a second Shuthelah are given in 1 Chron. 7:20–21.

2. The sixth in descent from no. 1, being the son of Zabad and father of Ezer and Elead (1 Chron. 7:21).

SHU'THELAHITE (shū'thel-a-hit). A designation of a descendant of Shuthelah (which see), the son of Ephraim (Num. 26:35).

SHUTTLE (Heb. šereg, a “weaving”). Used in Job 7:6 as a figure of the swiftness of life. His days pass by as swiftly as the little shuttle moves backward and forward in the warp.

SI'A (si-a; “assembly, congregation”). One of the leaders of the Temple servants, whose “sons” returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:47), before 536 B.C. In Ezra 2:44 the name is given as Siahā.

SI'AHA (sia-ha; “congregation”). A leader of the Temple servants (Ezra 2:44). In Neh. 7:47 he is called Sia (which see).

SIB'BECAI (sib'e-kī). “The Hushathite,” probably so called from his birthplace (1 Chron. 11:29). He belonged to the prominent family of Judah the Zarhites and was captain of the 24,000 men of David's army serving in the eighth month. Sibbecai's great exploit, which gave him a place among the mighty men of David's army, was his combat with Saph, or Sippai, the Philistine giant, in the battle of Gezer, or Gob (2 Sam. 21:18; 1 Chron. 20:4), about 970 B.C.

SIB'BOLETH (sib'o-leth). Another form (Judg. 12:6) of Shibboleth (which see).

SIB'MAH (sib'ma; “coolness,” cf. Arab. shabima, “to be cold”). A town E of Jordan, which was taken possession of and rebuilt by the tribe of Reuben (Josh. 13:19; Num. 32:38). It was probably the same as Sebam (v. 3), and belonged originally to that portion of Moab that was captured by the Amorites under Sihon (21:26). It is mentioned by Isaiah (16:8–9) and Jeremiah (48:32), both making reference to its vintage. The wine of Sibmah was so good that it was placed upon the table of monarchs, and so strong that it struck down, i.e., intoxicated, even those who were accustomed to good wine. Not positively identified. Some place it at modern Qurn el-Kibsh, about five miles SW of Heshbon.

SIBRA'IM (sib-ra'im; “double hope”). A landmark on the northern boundary of Palestine, between Berothah and Hazer-hatticon (Ezek. 47:16), perhaps the same as Ziphron (Num. 34:9).

SIC'CUTH. See Gods, False: Sikkuth.

SI'CHEM. See Shechem.

SICK, SICKNESS. See Diseases, Treatment of.

SICKLE. The rendering of two Heb. words and one Gk. word:

1. Heb. hermēsh, a “reaping hook” (Deut. 16:9; 23:25).

2. Heb. maggāl, with the same meaning (Jer. 50:16; Joel 3:13).

3. The instrument generally used for cutting grain (Gk. drepanon). (See Agriculture). The Israelites might pluck and eat the standing grain of a neighbor but were forbidden to “wield a sickle,” i.e., reap it (Deut. 23:25).

Figurative. “Puts in the sickle” is a figurative expression for gathering a harvest (Mark 4:29; Rev. 14:14–19).

SID'DIM, VALLEY OF (sid'im; “the valley of the fields”; perhaps so called from the high cultivation in which it was kept before the destruction of Sodom and the other cities). The scene of the battle between Chedorlaomer and his allies, and the five confederate kings (Gen.

14:3). However, it is possible that Siddim may designate “salt flats” from Hittite siyanta, “salt.” In any case the term denotes the territory S of the peninsula of “The Tongue,” which projects into the Dead Sea from the E shore. This region underwent a violent cataclysm about the middle of the twentieth century B.C. when its cities were destroyed and its area became submerged under the waters of the Dead Sea (Gen. 19).

Some writers unwarrantedly contend for the location of Siddim at the N end of the Dead Sea. But archaeological evidence now disfavors this view. The region was full of “tar pits” (14:10), and here the Egyptians got the bitumen with which they embalmed their dead; even to this day “pits” exist.

SIDON (sī'don). Sometimes Zidon, as in the KJV. This ancient Phoenician city was built on a promontory and small island, which was connected with the mainland by a bridge. The town was some twenty miles N of Tyre, is called Saida at present, and is now located in the republic of Lebanon. It is situated between mountains to its back and the sea to its front. Its people very early took to seafaring commerce. As the oldest capital of the Phoenicians, its antiquity is attested by Gen. 10:15. The city is referred to around 1400 B.C. in the Amarna Letters. It figures prominently in the division of the land after the Hebrew conquest (Josh. 19:28). The Phoenicians were called Sidonians from the eleventh to the eighth centuries B.C. The city's early preeminence is attested by Homer, who often mentions Sidon but never Tyre, and who employs the name as synonymous with Phoenicia and Phoenicians. Later, however, it was outclassed by Tyre, but Phoenicians generally continued to be known as Sidonians (1 Kings 5:6; 16:31), as if in recollection of Sidon's ancient preeminence. Solomon was influenced by Sidonian cults (11:5–7) and hired expert Sidonian timber cutters. Sidonians worshiped Baal and Ashtoreth. Jezebel of infamy was a daughter of Ethbaal, “king of the Sidonians.” Her introduction of the licentious worship of Canaanite cults into Israel brought internal misery (16:31–33; etc.). The Sidonians were skillful in philosophy, art, and astronomy, as is indicated by Strabo, the Greek historian of the first century, B.C. Biblical references include Isa. 23:12; Jer. 27:3; Ezek. 28:21–23; Joel 3:4–7. Shalmaneser of Assyria captured the city in 725 B.C. It was invaded by Sennacherib, dominated by Esarhaddon, overrun by the Babylonians after the fall of Assyria, and made a province by the Persians. It was conquered by Alexander the Great (330 B.C.). It enjoyed importance under the Romans, and Herod embellished it. Our Lord visited the general territory (Mark 7:24, 31) and made reference to the iniquity of its inhabitants (Matt. 11:21–24). Paul visited the place on his way to Rome (Acts 27:3). It figures in early church history, at the time of the Crusades and finally under Muslim rule. M.F.U.

SIDONIANS (sī-dō'ni-anz), the inhabitants of Sidon. In Gen. 10:19 Sidon and Gaza are two of the extreme points of Canaan. In 49:13 Jacob makes Sidon the limit of Zebulun. This, perhaps, means that the territory of Sidon, though afterward limited by that of Tyre, originally “extended southward to the tribe of Zebulun and Mount Carmel.” In Josh. 19:28, 29, Great Sidon and Tyre are on the border of Asher.

The Sidonians were not dispossessed (Judg. 3:3), and were among the early oppressors of Israel (10:12). In Josh. 13:6 the ASV reads “even all the Sidonians.” This would make the inhabitants of the hill country Sidonians, indicating that the Sidonian population had “spread up into the hill country”; and this idea is favored still more by their skill in cutting timber (1 Kings 5:6). So in Judg. 18:7 we find them described as living “quiet and secure,” devoted, no doubt, to the cultivation of their lands, and not engaged in trade, having “no dealings with anyone.” The language of the text indicates this “careless,” “quiet and secure” life was the usual “manner of the Sidonians.” The Sidonians adored, as tutelary god and goddess, Baal (whence the name of the king Ethbaal, 1 Kings 16:31) and Ashtoreth (1 Kings 11:5, 33; 2 Kings 23:13).

Jezebel, the wife of Ahab, was the daughter of the king of the Sidonians (1 Kings 16:31), but the example of taking Sidonian women had been set by Solomon (11:1).

In Homer, also, the Sidonians are praised for their skillful workmanship, but never as traders, except as they may have passed under the general name Phoenician (Iliad 6.289–95; Odyssey 4.614–18; 15.425); and the two are distinguished in the Iliad 23.743–44 where Phoenicians convey Sidonian work. The Homeric poems do not mention Tyre, but they mention both Sidon (Odyssey 15.425) and the Sidonians (Iliad 6.289–90; see also Odyssey 4.84 and 618; 15.118; Iliad 23.743; and their country Sidonia, Iliad 6.291; Odyssey 13.285). Strabo the Greek historian (63 B.C.) observes that although the poets glorified Sidon, the Phoenician colonists in Africa gave “more honor” to Tyre. W.H.; M.F.U.

SIEGE. See Warfare.

SIEVE (Heb. kābārâ, “netted,” Amos 9:9; nāpâ, Isa. 30:28). The ancient Egyptians often made sieves of string, and those for coarser work were constructed of small rushes or reeds.

Figurative. “To shake the nations ... in a sieve” (Isa. 30:28) refers to a sieve in which everything that does not remain in it as good grain is given up to annihilation. To sift a nation “as grain is shaken in a sieve” (Amos 9:9), or person (Luke 22:31), means to prove, test them.

SIGN. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words, which usually denote a miraculous or, at least, divine or extraordinary token of some generally future event. Thus the rainbow was given to Noah as a sign of his covenant (Gen. 9:12–13), and for the same purpose circumcision was appointed to Abraham (17:11; cf. Ex. 3:12; Judg. 6:17). Signs and wonders sometimes denoted those proofs or demonstrations of power and authority furnished by miracles and other tokens of the divine presence (Matt. 12:38; John 4:48; Acts 2:22). The word is used for a miraculous appearance, which would attest the divine authority of a prophet or teacher (see Matt. 16:1; 24:30).

SIGNET. See Seal.

SI'HON (sī'hon). A king of the Amorites, with capital at Heshbon, near Medeba, in the E Jordanic country not far from Mt. Nebo, who refused to the Israelites permission to pass through his territory when nearing the Promised Land. Shortly before the time of Israel's arrival he had dispossessed the Moabites of a splendid territory, driving them S of the natural bulwark of the Arnon (Num. 21:26–29). When the Israelite host appeared, he did not hesitate or temporize as Balak, but at once gathered his people together and attacked them (vv. 21–23). But the battle was his last. He and all his host were destroyed, and their district from Arnon to Jabbok became at once the possession of the conqueror, c. 1401 B.C. The kingdom of Sihon is mentioned in Josh. 13:21, 27.

SI'HOR. See Shihor.

SIK'KUTH. See Gods, False.

SILAS (sī'las; apparently Gk. from Aram. Shīlā [Saul]). This name is evidently a contracted form of Silvanus (sylvan), a prominent member of the church in Jerusalem (Acts 15:22). Of his immediate family no account is given, but his name, derived from the Lat. silva, “wood,” betokens him a Hellenistic Jew, and he appears to have been a Roman citizen (16:37). He is probably the same as Silvanus, mentioned in Paul's epistles.

Mission to Antioch. Upon the return of Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem from their missionary tour, a discussion arose respecting circumcision, and the council decided against the extreme Judaizing party. Silas was appointed a delegate to accompany Paul and Barnabas on their return to Antioch with the decree of the Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15:22, 32), A.D. about 50. After accomplishing this mission he remained in Antioch, although granted permission to return (vv. 33–34). The qualification of Silas for speaking to a congregation is stated (v. 32).

Paul's Companion. Upon the separation of Paul and Barnabas, Silas was selected by Paul as the companion of his second missionary journey (Acts 15:40). "The choice of Silas was, of course, due to his special fitness for the work, which had been recognized during his ministrations in Antioch. Doubtless he had shown tact and sympathy in managing the questions arising from the relations of the Gentile Christians to the Jews" (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 176). His double character, Hebrew and Roman, was also a qualification for a coadjutor of Paul. In further notices of him we learn that he was scourged and imprisoned with Paul at Philippi (Acts 16). At Berea he was left behind with Timothy, while Paul proceeded to Athens (17:10, 14), and we hear nothing more of his movements until he rejoined the apostle at Corinth (18:5). If the same as Silvanus, his presence at Corinth is several times noticed (2 Cor. 1:19; 1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Thess. 1:1) and he is mentioned (1 Pet. 5:12) as the one who conveyed Peter's first epistle to Asia Minor. The probabilities are in favor of the identity. He probably returned to Jerusalem with Paul, where he remained, ceasing any longer to be his companion. A tradition of very slight authority represents Silas to have become bishop of Corinth.

SILENCE.

1. "Stillness, quietness" (Heb. dāmāmâ) is used poetically by hendiadys (Job 4:16), I hear silence and a voice, i.e., a still voice, a light whisper. The verb is used (29:21), "and kept silent for my counsel," to indicate respectful attention.

2. The state of being dumb (Heb. hārēsh), which often depends upon deafness and is joined with it. Spoken of God as not listening to and answering the prayers of men (Pss. 28:1; 35:22; 50:3, 21); of men as listening to God without interrupting Him (Isa. 41:1).

3. The act of not speaking (Gk. sigāō), of one wishing to speak in a tongue ("unknown"), in which case he is not to speak unless an interpreter is present (1 Cor. 14:28); of women in the churches (v. 34), "an appendix to the regulative section regarding the gifts of the Spirit, vers. 26, 33" (Meyer, Alford, Westcott). Others think that Paul makes an appeal in support of his instruction to the authority or experience of the church.

SILK. This luxurious material doubtless was introduced into Bible lands from its home in China via India. Phoenician cities imported raw silk, as did Persia and S Europe. Tyre and Berytus were renowned for weaving it. It was a prize material among Medes and Persians, and Greeks knew it by the name "Median garments." In early Christian times silk robes of gorgeous patterns were common in Dura-Europas. Ezekiel refers to silk (16:10, 13) and was so understood by the rabbis (Heb. meshî, "drawn"), referring to the fine texture. The NIV translates "costly garments" and "costly fabric" respectively.

The only undoubted notice of silk in the Bible occurs in Rev. 18:12, where it is mentioned among the treasures of the typical Babylon (Gk. sērikos, from Sēr, an Indian tribe from whom silk was procured). It is, however, in the highest degree probable that the texture was known to the Hebrews from the time that their commercial relations were extended by Solomon. The value set upon silk by the Romans, as implied in Rev. 18:12, is noticed by Josephus, as well as by classical writers.

SIL'LA (sil'a). It is named in 2 Kings 12:20, "the house of Millo as he was going down to Silla." Silla is regarded by many as an abbreviation of m^osillâ, "which goes down by the road," and Thenius supposes that the reference is to the road that ran diagonally from the Joppa gate to the Haramarea, corresponding to the present David's road. Some believe it to be a place in the valley below.

SILOAM, POOL OF (sī'lō-am). The expression "pool of Siloam (which is translated, Sent)" (John 9:7) is found three times in Scripture—Neh. 3:15, "Pool of Shelah"; Isa. 8:6, "waters of Shiloah"; John 9:7, "pool of Siloam." If we compare Neh. 3:15 with 12:37, we find that the Pool of Shelah, the stairs that go down from the city of David (southern portion of the Temple mount), and the king's garden were in close proximity. Josephus frequently mentions Siloam, placing it at the termination of the Valley of the Cheesemongers or the Tyropoeon Valley (Wars 5.4.1)—but outside the city wall (Wars 5.9.4)—where the old wall bent eastward (Wars 5.6.1), and facing the hill upon which was the rock Peristereon, to the E (Wars 5.12.2). From these descriptions it is quite evident that Josephus speaks of the same place as the present Birket Silwân, on the other side of the Kidron.

Further, the evangelist's account (John 9:7) of the blind man sent by Jesus to wash at the pool of Siloam seems to indicate that it was near the Temple. It was from Siloam that water was brought in a golden vessel to the Temple during the feast of Tabernacles; our Lord probably pointed to it when He stood in the Temple and cried, "If any man is thirsty, let him come to Me and drink" (7:37).

The pool of Siloam is fed by a conduit that is cut for a distance of 1,780 feet through solid rock, and which starts at the so-called Virgin's Spring (see En-rogel). The reason for which it was cut is unmistakable. The Virgin's Spring is the only spring of fresh water in the immediate neighborhood of Jerusalem, and in time of siege it was important that, while the enemy should be deprived of access to it, its waters should be made available for those who were within the city. But the spring rose outside the walls, on the sloping cliff that overlooks the valley of Kidron. Accordingly, a long passage was excavated in the rock, by means of which the overflow of the spring was brought into Jerusalem; the spring itself was covered with masonry, so that it could be "sealed" in case of war. That it was so sealed we know from 2 Chron. 32:3–4. The following account of the channel and its inscription is from Major C. R. Conder (Palestine, pp. 27ff.). "The course of the channel is serpentine, and the farther end near the pool of Siloam enlarges into a passage of considerable height. Down this channel the waters of the spring rush to the pool whenever the sudden flow takes place. In autumn there is an interval of several days; in winter the sudden flow takes place sometimes twice a day. A natural siphon from an underground basin accounts for this flow, as also for that of the 'Sabbatic river' in North Syria. When it occurs the narrow parts of the passage are filled to the roof with water.

"This passage was explored by Dr. Robinson, Sir Charles Wilson, Sir Charles Warren, and others; but the inscription on the rock close to the mouth of the tunnel was not seen, being then under water. When it was found in 1880 by a boy who entered from the Siloam end of the passage, it was almost obliterated by the deposit of lime crystals on the letters. Professor Sayce, then in Palestine, made a copy, and was able to find out the general meaning of the letters. In 1881 Dr. Guthe cleaned the text with a weak acid solution, and I was then able, with the aid of Lieutenant Mentell, R.E., to take a proper 'squeeze.' It was a work of labor and requiring patience, for on two occasions we sat for three or four hours cramped up in the water in order to obtain a perfect copy of every letter, and afterward to verify the copies by examining each letter with the candle so placed as to throw the light from right, left, top, bottom. We were rewarded by sending home the first accurate copy published in Europe, and were able to settle many disputed points raised by the imperfect copy of the text before it was cleaned.”

The inscription records only the making of the tunnel; that it began at both ends; that the workmen heard the sound of the picks of the other party and were thus guided as they advanced, and that when they broke through they were only a few feet apart. The character of the letters seems to indicate that the scribes of Judah had been accustomed for a long time to write upon papyrus or parchment.

The pool itself is an oblong tank, partly hewn out of the rock and partly built with masonry, about fifty-three feet long, eighteen feet wide, and nineteen feet deep. The water has a peculiar taste—somewhat brackish—but not disagreeable, though becoming more so with the advance of the hot season.

“SILO’AM, TOWER IN.” Reference is made by our Lord (Luke 13:4) to this tower as having recently fallen upon and killed eighteen persons. The circumstance itself, and the locality in which it took place, were doubtless quite familiar to His hearers and did not need to be more particularly mentioned. But we are without the means that might enable us more exactly to define either. Some think it to be the village now called Silwân, E of the valley of Kidron and to the NE of the pool. It stands on the W slope of the Mount of Olives. Edersheim (Life of Jesus, p. 222) locates the tower at the Siloam Pool, which “had fallen on eighteen persons and killed them,” perhaps in connection with that construction of an aqueduct into Jerusalem by Pilate, which called forth, on the part of the Jews, the violent opposition which the Romans so terribly avenged.

SILVA’NUS (sil-vā’nus; “sylvan”). A companion of the apostle Paul, and the one who conveyed Peter’s first epistle (1 Pet. 5:12), perhaps the same as Silas (which see).

SILVER. See Mineral Kingdom.

SILVERLING. A piece of silver. See Metrology: Measures of Value, or Money.

SILVERSMITH (Acts 19:24). See Handicrafts: Metalworker; Metals.

SIM’EON (sim’ē-un; “hearing”). The second son of Jacob (see article immediately below) and the name of others in the Bible.

1. A just and devout Israelite, endowed with the gift of prophecy, and who, having received divine intimation that his death would not take place till he had seen the Messiah, entered the Temple and, there recognizing the Holy Child, took Him in his arms and gave thanks for the privilege of seeing Jesus (Luke 2:25–35), 4 B.C. All attempts to identify him with other Simeons have failed.

2. The son of Judah and father of Levi in the genealogy of our Lord (Luke 3:30). He is perhaps the same as Maaseiah the son of Adaiah (2 Chron. 23:1).

3. The proper name of Niger, one of the teachers and prophets in the church at Antioch (Acts 13:1), the only passage in which he is mentioned. This name shows that he was a Jew by birth, taking that of Niger as more convenient in his dealings with foreigners.

4. A form (Acts 15:14) of the name of Simon Peter.

SIM’EON (sim’ē-un; “hearing”). The name of several NT and OT personages (see article immediately above), including the second son of Jacob by Leah (Gen. 29:33), probably c. 1949 B.C. Together with Levi, Simeon undertook to avenge the seduction of their sister Dinah (which see) but performed such acts of wanton cruelty and injustice upon the Shechemites that Jacob was fearful of the surrounding people. In obedience, therefore, to his father’s command, Simeon moved southward to Bethel (chap. 34; 35:1–4). Joseph selected him as hostage to guarantee the appearance of Benjamin in Egypt (42:24, 36) but he was subsequently released (43:23). Judging from Jacob's dying words (49:5–7) and from Jewish traditions, he was artful, fierce, and cruel.

The Tribe of Simeon. At the migration into Egypt Simeon had six sons. At the Exodus the tribe numbered 59,300 warriors (Num. 1:23), ranking third. When the second census was taken the numbers had decreased to 22,200, and Simeon ranked lowest of the tribes (26:14). The assignment of Simeon in the Promised Land was within the inheritance of the sons of Judah (Josh. 19:1–9; 1 Chron. 4:24–33). This territory, which contained eighteen or nineteen cities with their villages spread around the venerable well of Beersheba, was possessed by the help of Judah (Judg. 1:3, 17).

SIMEONITE (sim'ē-on-it). A patronymic designation of a descendant of Simeon (which see) the second son of Jacob by Leah (Num. 25:14; 26:14; 1 Chron. 27:16).

SIMILITUDE. This KJV word is replaced in the NASB and NIV by various terms, among them form, likeness, and image. The thought is sometimes that of resemblance, as in Dan. 10:16, where KJV "one like the similitude of the sons of men" is replaced in the NASB by "one who resembled a human being." The NIV reads, "one who looked like a man." See the article Form, Likeness.

SIMON (sī'mon; Gk. Simōn). Perhaps a contraction of the Heb. Shimeon—Simeon.

1. One of the apostles, usually called Simon Peter (see Peter).
2. "Simon the Zealot," one of the twelve apostles (Matt. 10:4; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13). The latter term (Gk. Zēlōtēs), which is peculiar to Luke, is the Gk. equivalent for the Aram. term Qannān, preserved by Matthew and Mark. Each of these equally points out Simon as belonging to the faction of the Zealots, who were conspicuous for their fierce advocacy of the Mosaic ritual. He is not to be identified with Simon the brother of Jesus.
3. A brother of James and Jude, and of Jesus (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3). He is believed by many to be the same as Simon the Zealot, but there is no evidence for this. The prevailing opinion is that he is identical with the Simeon who became bishop of Jerusalem after the death of James, but Eusebius said they were two different persons.
4. "Simon the Leper." A resident at Bethany, distinguished as "the leper." It is not improbable that he had been miraculously cured by Jesus. In his house Mary anointed Jesus preparatory to His death and burial (Matt. 26:6–13; Mark 14:3–9; John 12:1–8; etc.).
5. "Simon of Cyrene." A Hellenistic Jew, born at Cyrene, on the N coast of Africa, who was present at Jerusalem at the time of the crucifixion of Jesus, either as an attendant at the feast (cf. Acts 2:10) or as one of the numerous settlers at Jerusalem from that place (6:9). Meeting the procession that conducted Jesus to Golgotha as he was returning from the country, he was pressed into service to bear the cross (Matt. 27:32; Mark 15:21; Luke 23:26) when Jesus Himself was unable to bear it any longer. Mark describes him as the father of Alexander and Rufus, perhaps because this was the Rufus known to the Roman Christians (Rom. 16:13), for whom he more specifically wrote. The Basilidian Gnostics believed that Simon suffered in the place of Jesus.
6. The Pharisee in whose house a penitent woman washed the feet of Jesus with her tears and anointed them with ointment (Luke 7:40, 43–44).
7. The father of Judas Iscariot (John 6:71; 13:2, 26).
8. The Samaritan magician living in the age of the apostles and usually designated in later history as Simon Magus. According to Justin Martyr (Apol. 1.26) he was born at Gitton, a village of Samaria, identified with the modern Kuryet Jit, near Nablus. He probably was educated at Alexandria and there became acquainted with the various tenets of the Gnostic school. Either then or subsequently he was a pupil of Dositheus, who preceded him as a teacher of Gnosticism in Samaria and whom he supplanted with the aid of Cleobius. He is first introduced in the Bible as practicing magical arts in a city of Samaria (perhaps Sychar; Acts 8:5; cf. John 4:5), with such success that he was pronounced to be “the Great Power of God” (Acts 8:10). The preaching and miracles of Philip excited him, and he became one of his disciples and was baptized. Subsequently he witnessed the effect produced by the laying on of hands, practiced by the apostles Peter and John, and, desiring to acquire a similar power, he offered money for it. His object evidently was to apply the power to pursuing magical arts. The motive and the means were equally to be condemned, and his proposition met with a severe denunciation from Peter. It was followed by a petition on the part of Simon, the tenor of which revealed terror but not penitence (v. 24). The word simony is derived from his endeavor to obtain spiritual functions by bribe. There are many stories concerning his subsequent career that are, without doubt, fictitious.

9. The Tanner, a Christian convert with whom Peter lodged while at Joppa. His house was by the seaside, as the trade of a tanner was considered unclean by the Jews and not allowed to be carried on inside their towns (Acts 9:43; 10:6, 17, 32).

SIMPLICITY (Heb. tōm). Predicted of the 200 followers of Absalom in his conspiracy (2 Sam. 15:11; “innocently,” NASB and NIV), who “knew not any thing” (KJV), i.e., of their leader’s intention. In Prov. 1:22 simplicity (Heb. petū) refers to the naive. Gk. hoplotēs stands for an openness of heart that manifests itself in liberality (so NASB, Rom. 12:8; cf. KJV) and for single-hearted faith in Christ, the “simplicity that is in Christ” (2 Cor. 11:3, KJV), as opposed to false wisdom in matters pertaining to Christianity. The term also appears in the KJV of 2 Cor. 1:12, referring to the apostle’s sincerity (thus NIV).

SIMRI (sim’rī). See Shimri, no. 3.

SIN (שׁן) (seēn). A second “s” in the Heb. alphabet (the letter Samekh is the first) and pronounced exactly like it. The Heb. character Sin looks like the character Shin (which see), except that the dot is placed over the left corner, rather than the right. In transliteration, sin is given as «ś») to distinguish it from Samekh (“s”). The character Sin does not appear in the NASB as one of the headings for the respective sections of Ps. 119, but it is given, with Shin, in the NIV of the psalm.

SIN (Heb. ḥaṭṭāʾ; Gk. hamartia, a falling away from or missing the right path). Also numerous other Heb. words.

General. The underlying idea of sin is that of law and of a lawgiver. The lawgiver is God. Hence sin is everything in the disposition and purpose and conduct of God’s moral creatures that is contrary to the expressed will of God (Rom. 3:20; 4:15; 7:7; James 4:12, 17).

The sinfulness of sin lies in the fact that it is against God, even when the wrong we do is to others or ourselves (Gen. 39:9; Ps. 51:4).

The being and law of God are perfectly harmonious, for “God is love.” The sum of all the commandments likewise is love; sin in its nature is egotism and selfishness. Self is put in the place of God (Rom. 15:3; 1 Cor. 13:5; 2 Tim. 3:2, 4; 2 Thess. 2:3–4). Selfishness (not pure self-love, or the exaggeration of it, but in opposition to it) is at the bottom of all disobedience, and it becomes hostility to God when it collides with His law.

All sin therefore has a positive character, and the distinction between sins of commission and those of omission is only on the surface. In both cases sin is actual disobedience (see Matt. 23:23).

Original. A term used to denote the effect of Adam’s sin upon the moral life of his descendants. It is formally defined as “that whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil” (see Fall). The fact of sin in this sense is plainly declared in the Scriptures (Rom. 5:12, 19; cf. Gen. 3:5; Eph. 2:1–3; 2 Tim. 2:26; 1 John 3:4). In accord with this is the fact of the universality of sin, also proclaimed in Scripture (Matt. 7:11; 15:19; Rom. 3:9, 23; 1 John 1:8; James 3:2; cf. 1 Kings 8:46; Job 14:4; Prov. 20:9) and borne witness to by history and human self-consciousness.

The nature of the connection between the sin of Adam and the moral condition of his descendants is, however, a matter upon which opinions greatly differ.

The chief forms of doctrine have been as follows:

Calvinists. Calvinists have held that the sin of Adam was immediately imputed to the whole human family, so that not only is the entire race depraved but also guilty on account of the first transgression. To sustain this opinion it is argued that Adam was not only the natural but also the representative, or federal, head of the human race. His fall involved the whole race in guilt (see Imputation).

Arminian. The view more generally held is that the effect of Adam’s sin upon the moral state of mankind is in accordance with and by virtue of the natural law of heredity. The race inherited proneness to sin. But this proneness to sin does not imply guilt, inasmuch as punishment can justly be inflicted only on account of actual sin, which consists in voluntary transgression. This view is held by many Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Episcopalians, and universally by Methodists.

Pelagianism. The doctrine known as Pelagianism denies any necessary connection between the sin of Adam and the character and actions of his descendants. Every human being is by nature as pure as Adam was before his sin. The prevalence of sin is to be accounted for upon the ground of evil example and surroundings. Accordingly it is possible for men to lead lives of such complete freedom from sin that they may stand in no need of redemption or of regenerating grace. This doctrine is repudiated by all evangelical churches.

The recognition of the reality of sin, not only in the sense of actual disobedience, but also in the sense of innate sinfulness, is essential. For only thus can be seen the necessity for a special revelation, and only thus are men prepared to accept the gospel of salvation in Christ.

Forgiveness of Sin. See Justification; Repentance.

The Unpardonable Sin (Matt. 12:31–32; Luke 12:10; Heb. 10:26; 1 John 5:16). The passages referred to undoubtedly point to one particular sin, and that is unpardonable. What this sin is has been a matter of much discussion. The view held by Wesley and others is that it is “the ascribing those miracles to the power of the devil which Christ wrought by the power of the Holy Spirit.” This view is by some held to be inadequate. Lange expresses the convictions of some when he says: “We have here to understand fully conscious and stubborn hatred against God and that which is divine as it exists in its highest development.” Proponents of this second view hold that this sin is unpardonable not because the grace of God is not sufficient for its forgiveness but because it springs from a state of the soul in which there is left no disposition for repentance and faith in Jesus Christ. Thus they who are in anxiety lest they have committed this sin show in this very fact that such anxiety is groundless. Nevertheless, they who persist in sinning against religious light have great reason to fear lest they become fearfully guilty. But in the above-mentioned Scriptures, it is questionable that Heb. 10:26 and 1 John 5:16 refer to the unpardonable sin. The “sin leading to death” is not spiritual but physical death, resulting from sin in a believer’s life and consequent chastisement. It has nothing to do with what Jesus called the “unpardonable sin.” This is apparently what Wesley described it to be, and, as above-mentioned, it was possible only during the earthly public ministry of the Lord. See Holy Spirit, Sin Against. SIN (sin; Heb. sîn).

1. A city of Egypt, called by the Greeks Pelusium (and thus rendered in Ezek. 30:15–16 in the NIV; see marg.). It lay on the eastern arm of the Nile, about three miles from the sea. This strategic fort had to be captured before any army could penetrate Egypt. Sennacherib failed to take it, but Esarhaddon did in 671 B.C. and overran Egypt. Ezekiel (Ezek. 30:15–16) calls it “the stronghold of Egypt.”

2. Wilderness of Sin, a tract or plain lying along the eastern shore of the Red Sea. It is believed to be the present plain of El-Kaa, which commences at the mouth of Wadi Taiyibeh and extends along the whole southwestern side of the peninsula. It was the scene of the murmurings and the miracle of the quail and manna (Ex. 16:1; 17:1; Num. 33:11–12). It is connected also with the Plain El-Markhah on the coast.

SI'NAI (sī'nī). The mountain district reached by the Israelites in the third month after leaving Egypt.

Name. The name is ancient and its meaning not definitely fixed. If Semitic it perhaps means “thorny” (i.e., cleft with ravines, from Heb. sāneh, “thornbush”). It may, however, take its name from the moon god Sin, whose cult had made its way into Arabia.

Bible Notices. When the Israelites left Elim they came to the wilderness of Sin and then to Rephidim, where they encamped (Ex. 16:1; 17:1) and in the third month after the Exodus arrived at the “wilderness of Sinai” (19:1). Moses went up into the mountain and received a preliminary message from Jehovah, declaring His past assistance and promise of future guidance and protection on the condition of obedience (vv. 3–6). The people were commanded to prepare themselves for a direct message from Him, and a boundary line was set around the mountain to prevent any of the people from approaching rashly or inadvertently touching the mountain (v. 12). The top of the mountain was in full view from the camp, so that when the Lord “descended upon it” (v. 18) the thick cloud in which His glory was shrouded was “in the sight of all the people” (vv. 11, 16). The people were brought out of their camp “to meet God, and they stood at the foot of the mountain” (v. 17). “And all the people perceived the thunder and the lightning flashes and the sound of the trumpet and the mountain smoking; and when the people saw it, they trembled and stood at a distance” (20:18).

Moses received the tablets of the law twice (see Moses) and was made acquainted with the details of the rites and ceremonies recorded in the Pentateuch (31:18; chap. 34; Lev. 7:37–38; etc.). On the first day of the second month after leaving Egypt the census was taken (Num. 1:1–46); the position was assigned to the various tribes when in camp and on the march (1:47–2:34); the firstborn were redeemed (3:40–51); the office and duties of the Levites were enumerated (4:1–49); the Tabernacle was reared and covered with the cloud (9:15–22); and, finally, on the twentieth day of the second month, in the second year, “the sons of Israel set out on their journeys from the wilderness of Sinai” (10:11–12; cf. 33:15–16).

Horeb and Sinai. Concerning these names there has been much difference of opinion. Ewald (Geschichte, 2:57) pronounces Sinai the older name and Horeb the name used by the author of Deuteronomy (except 33:2), which book he assigns to a later writer. Hengstenberg (Pent., 2:325–27) agrees with Gesenius that the one name is more general than the other, but he differs in that he makes Horeb the mountain ridge and Sinai the individual summit from which the Ten Commandments were given. The following are his reasons: (1) The name Sinai is used at the time that the Israelites were upon the exact spot of the legislation (see from Ex. 19:11 to Num. 3:1), whereas Horeb is always used in the recapitulation in Deuteronomy (except 33:2). (2) The name Horeb occurs in the earlier books thrice, all in Exodus, but in circumstances that best suit the general or comprehensive meaning that we attach to it (see Ex. 3:1; 17:6; 19:2; cf. 33:6).

“Understanding Horeb to be the more general name, there might still be differences of opinion how wide a circuit should be included under it, though the common opinion seems to be that there is no necessity for taking it wider than that range (some three miles long from north to south) which is called by the modern Arabs Jebel Tûr or Jebel et-Tûr, sometimes with the addition of Sina, though Robinson says extremely rarely” (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia, s.v.).

Identification of Sinai. Tradition offers the following sites:

1. Mt. Serbal, on Wadi Feiran. This goes back to the time of Eusebius. The main objection to this identification, however, is that there is no plain or wadi of sufficient size in the neighborhood to offer camping ground for so large a host.

2. Jebel Musa (Mountain of Moses) is the Sinai of later ecclesiastical tradition. Jebel Musa is part of a short ridge extending about two miles. The ridge has two peaks, Ras es-Safsaf, with an altitude of 6,540 feet, and Jebel Musa, 7,363 feet. St. Catherine’s Monastery, a monastery of Greek monks, is located at the foot of Jebel Musa.

3. Some scholars reject Jebel Musa because it is near the Serabit copper and turquoise mines, where there were Egyptian soldiers. They select Jebel Hellal, a two-thousand-foot elevation thirty miles S of El-’Arish.

4. Many Jewish scholars identify Mt. Sinai with volcanic Mt. Seir in southern Palestine, a region near enough to Midian for Moses to have led his flocks (Ex. 3:1). George Ernest Wright says (The 20th Century Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge [1955], p. 1023): “A number of scholars today hold that Mount Sinai is to be located in Midian SE of Edom. The chief evidence for this view is a belief that Exodus 19 reflects volcanic activity and that the sacred mountain must be located in a volcanic region.” But Wright shows that in a theophany volcanic phenomena are not necessary. Wright thus summarizes the latest evidence: “Consequently, we are left with the traditional location of Mount Sinai as still the most probable.” M.F.U.

SINCERE, SINCERITY (Heb. tāmîm, “without blemish”). The acting or speaking without hypocrisy (Josh. 24:14). The Gk. adolos means “unadulterated.” Paul desires the Philippians (1:10) to be pure, their behavior innocent, etc., that thus they may “be sincere [Gk. hagnōs; “pure,” NIV] and blameless until the day of Christ.” (See also Eph. 6:24; Titus 2:7 for similar usage in the KJV.) “The sincerity of your love” (2 Cor. 8:8) may properly be rendered that “your love is legitimate” (Gk. gnēsios), whereas eilikrineia means found pure when tested by the sunlight, and so pure, unsullied (Phil. 1:10; 1 Cor. 5:8; 2 Cor. 1:12; 2:17).

SINEW. The rendering of the Heb. term gîd hannāsheh, denoting “the sinew of the hip” (Gen. 32:32; “tendon,” NIV), i.e., the nervus ischiadicus, the principal nerve in the area of the hip, which is easily injured by any violent strain in wrestling. Because of the dislocation of the thigh of Jacob the Israelites avoid eating this nerve.

SINGING. See Music.

SINGLE EYE. Used in the KJV in Matt. 6:22 and Luke 11:34. See Simplicity.

SI'NIM (si'nim; Isa. 49:12). The name of a remote people, from whose land men should come to the light of Israel and of the Gentiles. It is, of course, not quite impossible that it may refer to the Lebanon Sinites (which see), or with the tribe Sina in the Hindu-Kush (Lacouperie in Babylonian and Oriental Record). The LXX gives Persai, but the early interpreters looked to the S as to Sin (Pelusium) or Syene.

SI'NITE (sī'nit; Gen. 10:17; 1 Chron. 1:15). A tribe mentioned only in the phrase “and the Sinite” and in connection with “And Canaan became the father of Sidon, his first-born, and Heth and the Jebusite and the Amorite and the Girgashite and the Hivite and the Arkite and the Sinite and the Arvadite and the Zemarite and the Hamathite” (Gen. 10:15–18). From its position in the list it is inferred that it lay toward the N, perhaps in the northern part of the Lebanon district. In that region were “Sinna, a mountain fortress mentioned by Strabo ... Sinum, or Sini, the ruins of which existed in the time of Jerome,” and others with similar names. The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan give Orthosia, a maritime town NE of Tripolis. It was a place of importance, as commanding the only road “betwixt Phoenice and the maritime parts of Syria.” Delitzsch mentions the cuneiform Sianu, which is mentioned with Semar and Arka. W.H.

SINLESSNESS OF CHRIST. The perfect freedom of Christ, not only from all outward acts of sin but also from all inward inclination to sin.

Scripture Statement. The OT prophecies relating to Christ, whether symbolically expressed or uttered in words, point to His perfect purity (see Isa. 9:6–7; chap. 53). The NT bears most emphatic testimony to the same fact (see Matt. 11:29–30; John 4:34; 6:38; 8:29, 46; 15:10; 17:4; Acts 3:14; Rom. 8:3; 2 Cor. 5:21; Heb. 4:15; 7:26–27; 1 Pet. 1:19; 2:22; 1 John 2:2; 3:5). It is distinctly stated that Christ was tempted, and if so we must admit the abstract possibility of His sinning. Yet His temptations were in no case such as spring from a sinful nature, and the fact remains that He was absolutely without sin (see Temptation of Christ).

Theological Suggestions. The sinlessness of Christ is to be looked at with reference to His human nature and is to be distinguished from the holiness that He possessed as an attribute of His divine nature.

The fact of His sinlessness is morally demonstrated, aside from the testimony of the Scriptures, as follows: (1) Christ certainly made upon those around Him the impression that He was a person of at least unusual moral excellence. (2) It is a fact that has the force of a law that the higher imperfect beings rise in moral attainments the more keenly conscious they become of remaining moral defects. (3) Christ manifested no consciousness of moral defect but the opposite. He taught men to confess their sins, but He made no such confession; He taught men to pray for forgiveness but uttered no such prayer for Himself; He declared the necessity of the new birth by the work of the Holy Spirit, but it was for others; He recognized in Himself no such necessity. And thus it follows that in Christ we find a reversal of the law that prevails with respect to all limited measure of human excellence, or He was supremely excellent, absolutely without sin.

The objections of unbelievers are too trivial or too difficult to understand to be discussed here in detail. However, it may be said that the blighting of the barren fig tree cannot be shown to be an interference with the rights of private property. And, moreover, Christ had the right to use this inanimate object for the purpose of symbolically impressing His solemn lesson. The destruction of the swine at Gadara is to be viewed with reference to the deliverance of a human soul as of infinitely higher importance than the loss of the lives of many animals. And, besides, it cannot be shown that Christ willed or directly caused the destruction. We may dismiss this part of the subject in recalling the fact that the unbelieving world has in reality little to say against the moral perfection of Jesus.

The sinlessness of Christ is a fact of many-sided importance. (1) Christ, because He was sinless, is one of the highest (may we not say the highest?) of the credentials of Christianity. He is a moral miracle and is Himself greater than all His miracles. (2) The fact has important relation to the authority of His teaching (see Matt. 17:5; John 8:46). (3) Christ in His sinlessness exhibits to us the highest good. He was not free from poverty and persecution and hatred and loneliness and death, but He was free from sin. (4) His sinlessness is related to the value of His atoning sacrifice. His offering of Himself was of unspeakable value because He was spotless (see 1 Pet. 1:19; cf. John 1:29). (5) Likewise, the efficacy of His intercession is based upon the same fact (1 John 2:1; Heb. 4:14–16). (6) This fact also throws light upon His offer of new life to men. He is at the same time our perfect example and the One through whom we receive power to follow in His steps (John 10:10; 1 Pet. 2:21).

The doctrine of Christ's spotless purity is therefore one that has been steadfastly held as of greatest moment by the church in all ages. E.MCC.

SI'ON, MOUNT (sī'un).

1. Heb. har ṣṭyyon, “elevated, lofty.” One of the various names of Mt. Hermon, which are fortunately preserved, all not improbably more ancient than “Hermon” itself (Deut. 4:48 only; Siyon, NIV).

2. The Gk. (Siōn) of the Heb. name Zion, the famous mount of the Temple (1 Macc. 4:37, 60; 5:54; 6:48, 62; 7:33; 10:11; 14:27). See Zion.

SIPH'MOTH (sif'moth). One of the places in the S of Judah that David frequented during his wanderings (1 Sam. 30:28). No one yet appears to have suggested an identification of it, but it may be referred to in 1 Chron. 27:27, where Zabdi is called the Shiphmite.

SIP'PAI (sip'ī). One of the descendants of “the giants” slain by Sibbecai at Gezer (1 Chron. 20:4), called in the parallel passage (2 Sam. 21:18) by the equivalent name Saph (which see).

SI'RAH (sī'ra). A well about a mile N of Hebron. Abner was recalled here by Joab (2 Sam. 3:26) and treacherously slain. The well is probably the 'Ain Sārah of today.

SIR'ION (sir'i-on; cuirass, “coat of mail”). One of the various names of Mt. Hermon, that by which it was known to the Sidonians (Deut. 3:9). The name in Ps. 29:6 is slightly altered in the original (Heb. shiryōn).

SISAMAI. See Sismai.

SIS'ERA (sis'er-a; uncertain derivation).

1. The “commander” of the army of Jabin king of Canaan. He dwelt in Harosheth-hagoyim, i.e., Harosheth of the Gentiles (present-day Tell 'Amar on the N bank of the Kishon where the stream enters the plain of Acre, about sixteen miles NNW of Megiddo), and for twenty years oppressed the Israelites with a force of 900 chariots of iron (Judg. 4:2–3). When Sisera received tidings of the march of Barak to Mt. Tabor, he mustered his army at the Kishon, where it was thrown into confusion and utterly routed (vv. 10–16). Sisera, to save himself, sprang from his chariot and fled on foot. He took refuge in the tent of Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite. She received the fugitive in the usual form of oriental hospitality, but when he had fallen asleep Jael took a tent peg and drove it into his temples, so that he died (vv. 17–22), about 1120 B.C. See Jael.

2. The name reappears in the lists of the Temple servants, who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:53; Neh. 7:55). It doubtless tells of Canaanite captives devoted to the lowest offices of the Temple.

SIS´MAI (sis´māi; KJV, “Sisamai”). Son of Eleasah and father of Shallum, descendants of Sheshan, in the line of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. 2:40).

SISTER (Heb. āhôt; Gk. adelphē). A term used by the Hebrews with equal latitude as brother (which see). It may denote a relation by the same father and mother, by the same father only, by the same mother only, or merely a near relative (Matt. 13:56; Mark 6:3). Sarah was called the sister of Abraham (Gen. 12:13; 20:12), although only his niece according to some, or, according to others, sister by the father’s side. Respecting marrying such relatives, see Marriage.

SIS´TRUM (sis´trum). See Music.

SIT, SITTING (Heb. yāshab; Gk. kathezomai). The favorite position of the orientals, who, in the absence of chairs, sit upon the floor with their feet crossed under them. “In Palestine people sit at all kinds of work; the carpenter saws, planes, and hews with his hand-adze sitting upon the ground or upon the plank he is planing. The washerwoman sits by the tub; and, in a word, no one stands where it is possible to sit” (Thomson, Land and Book, 1:191).

Figurative. Of a judge who “sits in judgment” (Isa. 28:6; Joel 3:12; Mal. 3:3, “sit as a smelter and purifier of silver”); hence the “seat of violence,” i.e., of unjust judgment (Amos 6:3); mourners, who sit upon the ground (Isa. 3:26; 47:1; Job 2:13) or sit alone (Lam. 1:1; 3:28); of those who sit still, who remain quiet, as opposed to those who go to war (Jer. 8:14).

SITH´RI (sith´ri; “protective”). The son of Uzziel, and grandson of Kohath, of the tribe of Levi (Ex. 6:22). This is the only mention made of him in Scripture.

SIT´NAH (sit´na; strife, “contention, opposition,” same root as in Satan). The second of the two wells dug by Isaac, where a contest was had with the Philistines (Gen. 26:21). The modern Shutneh.

SIVAN´ (sē-van; Heb. sīwān from Akkad. sīmānu). The third month of the Hebrew sacred year, and ninth of the civil year (Esther 8:9). See Calendar; Time.

SI´YON. See Sion.

SKIN. The term skin is used in several ways in Scripture.

1. The rendering generally of the Heb. ōr (“naked”), and meaning the skin of a man, the skin or hide of animals (Lev. 7:8; etc.); also as prepared, i.e., leather (11:32; cf. 13:48; Num. 31:20).

2. The human skin as smooth and naked (Job 16:15), Heb. geled, “smooth, polished,” where Job says, “I have sewed sackcloth over my skin.” This is to be attributed doubtless to the hideous distortion of his body by elephantiasis, which will not allow the use of ordinary clothes.

Figurative. “Skin for skin” (Job 2:4) seems to mean “one gives up one’s skin to preserve one’s skin; one endures pain on a sickly part of the skin, for the sake of saving the whole skin; one holds up the arm to avert the fatal blow from the head.” “The skin of my teeth” (19:20) is supposed to be that which surrounds the teeth in the jaw, namely, the periosteum. The disease has destroyed the gums and wasted them away from the teeth, leaving only the periosteum. “Can the Ethiopian change his skin?” (Jer. 13:23) is symbolical of the inability of one to get rid of an evil character that has become second nature.

3. Flesh (Heb. bāsār, so generally rendered) is translated “skin” in Ps. 102:5, KJV and NIV.

4. Leather (Gk. dermatimos), that which is made of skin, as in a belt or girdle (Mark 1:6).
SKINK. See Animal Kingdom: Snail.

SKIRT (Heb. shûl). The flowing train of a robe or female dress (Jer. 13:22, 26; Lam. 1:9; Nah. 3:5); more vaguely (kānāp, lit., a “wing”) the flap of a robe (Deut. 22:30; 27:20).

Figurative. To raise the skirts of a woman’s garment is a symbol of insult and disgrace (Jer. 13:22, 26; Nah. 3:5), whereas to cover her with one’s skirt was a token of matrimony (cf. Ruth 3:9).

SKULL. See Golgotha.

SKY (Heb. shaḥaq, “vapor,” Deut. 33:26; 2 Sam. 22:12; Job 37:18; etc.). May mean the clouds or the firmament. “And through the skies in His majesty” (Deut. 33:26) is a figurative expression to denote omnipotence.

SLANDER.

1. The rendering of the Heb. diblār, “a defaming, evil report” (Num. 14:36, KJV; Ps. 31:13; Prov. 10:18). In 1 Tim. 3:11 the KJV translators render the Gk. diabolous “slanderer” in reference to deacons’ wives.

2. The rendering (Ps. 15:3) of Heb. rāgal, to “run about” tattling. The NIV translates, “has no slander on his tongue.” In the NT the Gk. katalaleō is to speak evil of, to malign (Rom. 1:30; 2 Cor. 12:20). This sin is warned against as being destructive and utterly unworthy of a believer. KJV renders “backbite.”

SLAVE, SLAVERY. See Service.

SLEEP. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words, used in the general sense of sleep or rest for the body (Pss. 4:8; 121:4; Jonah 1:5–6). The manner of sleeping in warm Eastern climates is different than that in colder countries. Their beds are generally hard; feather beds are unknown. The poor often sleep on mats or wrapped in their outer garment, for which reason the latter was not allowed to be retained in pledge overnight (Gen. 9:21, 23; Ex. 22:26–27; Deut. 24:12–23). The wealthy sleep on mattresses stuffed with wool or cotton, being often only a thick quilt, used singly or piled upon each other. In winter a similar quilt of finer material forms the cover, whereas a thin blanket suffices in summer; unless, indeed, the convenient outer garment is used (1 Sam. 19:13). See Bed.

Figurative. Sleep is employed as a symbol of death (Dan. 12:2; John 11:11; etc.; KJV only; Deut. 31:16; 2 Sam. 7:12; Job 7:21); of the moral slackness, indolence, or stupid inactivity of the wicked (Rom. 13:11–12; Eph. 5:14; 1 Cor. 11:30).

SLIME. See Mineral Kingdom: Pitch; Tar; Bitumen.

SLIME PITS. See Siddim.

SLING. See Armor, Arms.

Figurative. The proverb “Like one who binds a stone in a sling,” etc. (Prov. 26:8), is probably better rendered by Gesenius, “As a bag of gems in a heap of stones,” the Heb. (margēmâ, “sling”) meaning a “heap of stones” (cf. “throw,” Matt. 7:6).

SLIP (Heb. z□mōrâ, “pruned”). The layer of a vine. To “set them with vine slips of a strange god” (Isa. 17:10) is believed to be figurative for making foreign alliances, e.g., with the king of Damascus.

SLOTHFUL. In Prov. 12:27 the expression “a slothful man does not roast his prey” means that such a man does not improve his opportunities. The Heb. āšal has the usual meaning of to “be slack, indolent” and is most generally used in the OT (cf. Prov. 12:24, NASB, “slack hand”; “laziness,” NIV).

SLOW.

1. Heavy (Heb. kabēd), as when Moses said, “For I am slow of speech and slow of tongue” (Ex. 4:10); a difficulty in speaking, though not exactly stammering.

2. Extended (Heb. ārak, to “make long”) is used in the frequent expression “slow to anger” (Ps. 103:8; Prov. 16:32; etc.) and expresses the same state of mind as the term long-suffering.

SLUG. See Animal Kingdom: Snail.

SMALL COPPER COIN. See Metrology.

SMITH. See Handicraft; Metals.

SMYRNA (smur’na; “myrrh”). A rich and prosperous city of Ionia, forty miles N of Ephesus, at the mouth of the small river Meles. Anciently it was one of the finest cities of Asia and was called “the lovely—the crown of Ionia—the ornament of Asia.” It is now the chief city of SW Turkey, with a population of more than 1½ million. It is referred to in Rev. 2:8–11 as the seat of one of the seven churches. To its credit the church at Smyrna was still faithful, and against her no word of reproach was uttered. It was Polycarp’s field of Christian usefulness, and here he suffered martyrdom, around A.D. 169.

The modern city of Izmir covers NT Smyrna and little archaeological work can be done there. A good part of the Roman marketplace has been excavated, however. Remains unearthed date to the second century A.D. restoration after a great earthquake. Near the modern city a fairly well preserved Roman aqueduct may be seen. Ancient Smyrna, a few miles away, had its beginnings in the first half of the third millennium B.C. and may have been the residence of Homer. Excavations there under the direction of Ekrem Akurgal are proving to be fruitful. H.F.V.

SNAIL. See Animal Kingdom.

SNARE.

1. Usually the rendering of some form of Heb. yāqash, to “ensnare”; frequently of paḥ, a “spring net”; Gk. brochos, “noose”; pagis, “trap.”

A net or trap, especially of the fowler (Isa. 8:14; cf. Amos 3:5); also such as seizes man and beast (Job 18:9; Jer. 18:22). Snares were set in the path or hidden in the ground (Ps. 140:5; Prov. 7:23; 22:5; Jer. 18:22). The snare (Heb. paḥ) was formed of two parts that, when set, were spread out upon the ground and slightly fastened with a trapstick, so that as soon as a bird or beast touched the stick the parts flew up and enclosed the bird in the net or caught the foot of the animal (Job 18:9).

2. The rendering of two other Heb. words related to the English trap: (a) Heb. mōqesh, a noose or trap (Pss. 140:5; 141:9; Amos 3:5); and (b) Heb. paḥ, a plate of metal, hence a trap (Job 18:9; Isa. 8:14). These terms are rendered “gin” in KJV.

Figurative. Snare is used for anything that may be the cause of injury or destruction, e.g., the nations about Israel (Josh. 23:13); false gods (Judg. 2:3; Ps. 106:36); false prophets (Hos. 9:8); love of riches (1 Tim. 6:9); death, as a hunter (2 Sam. 22:6; Ps. 18:5; cf. 91:3).

SNIFF (Heb. nāpah, to “blow at”). To express contempt, as of God’s altar (Mal. 1:13).

SNOOT (Heb. ṣap, “nostril,” hence, “face”). Mentioned in Prov. 11:22: “As a ring of gold in a swine’s snout, so is a beautiful woman who lacks discretion.” Clark (Com.) thus comments: “Beauty in a woman destitute of good breeding and modest carriage is as becoming as a gold ring on the snout of a swine.”

SNOW (Heb. sheleg, “white”; Gk. chiōn). In the historical books of Scripture snow is twice mentioned as actually falling (2 Sam. 23:20; 1 Chron. 11:22; cf. 1 Macc. 13:22). In the poetical books the allusions are so frequent as to make it probable that snow was an ordinary occurrence in Palestine. “During most winters both hail and snow fall on the hills. On the Central Range snow has been known to reach a depth of nearly two feet, and to lie for five days, or even more.... This explains the feat of Benaiah, who went down and slew a lion in the midst of a cistern in the day of the snow (2 Sam. 23:20)” (Smith, Hist. Geog., pp. 64ff.). The snow lies deep in the ravines of the highest ridge of Lebanon until the summer is far advanced, and, indeed, never wholly disappears; the summit of Hermon also perpetually glistens with frozen snow. From these sources, probably, the Jews obtained their supplies of ice for the purpose of cooling their beverages in summer (Prov. 25:13).

Figurative. The color of snow is given as an image of brilliancy (Dan. 7:9; Matt. 28:3; Rev. 1:14); of purity (Isa. 1:18; Lam. 4:7, referring to the white robes of the princes); of the blanching effects of leprosy (Ex. 4:6; Num. 12:10; 2 Kings 5:27); of cleansing power (Job 9:30); “snow waters,” i.e., melted snow, easily dried up in the burning sand (24:19), is used to express the swift and utter destruction of the godless; snow, fertilizing the earth before it again returns as vapor to the sky, pictures the effective power of God’s word (Isa. 55:10). “Does the snow of Lebanon forsake the rock of the open country?” (Jer. 18:14) is thus rendered by Orelli (Com.), “Does the snow of Lebanon disappoint on the rock of the fields?” i.e., the Lebanon snow feeds without ceasing, the water flowing therefrom. Phenomena of nature, stable and trustworthy, are contrasted with the fickleness of Israel.

SNUFFERS (KJV, “snuffdishes”). Dishes used to receive the snuff when taken from the lamps of the Holy Place (Ex. 25:38). The NIV translates, “wicktrimmers.”

SO (Heb. Sō). A king of Egypt. Hoshea, the last king of Israel, evidently intending to become the vassal of Egypt, sent messengers to So but gave no present, as had been the yearly custom, to the king of Assyria (2 Kings 17:4), 725 B.C. The consequence of this step was the imprisonment of Hoshea, the taking of Samaria, and the carrying captive of the ten tribes (18:10–11).

Identification. As the Hebrew consonants may be rendered Sewe, he is frequently, though incorrectly, identified with Sib’e, commander of Egypt, who, in alliance with king Hanun of Gaza, collided in battle with Sargon of Assyria at Raphia on the Mediterranean about twenty miles S of Gaza (720 B.C.). The allies were defeated, and Hanun was captured.

Sib'e fled and was later put under tribute to Assyria. A better identification of So is Osorkon IV. R.K.H.

SO'CO (sō'kō; "thorn hedge"; 1 Chron. 4:18; 2 Chron. 11:7; 28:18). KJV sometimes uses Socho. Also called Socoh (1 Sam. 17:1; 1 Kings 4:10; etc.). It was in the low country of Judah (Josh. 15:35) and was settled by the sons of Ezra, of the tribe of Judah. It was one of the cities fortified by Rehoboam after the revolt of the northern tribes (2 Chron. 11:7). Here Goliath was slain, and it was also one of Solomon's food-supply districts. It is probably to be identified with Khirbet Abbad, about two miles S of Azekah.

SO'COH (sō'kō).

2. Another city of Judah, in the mountain district (Josh. 15:48), one of a group of eleven towns. Robinson located it in the Wadi el-Khalîl, about ten miles SW of Hebron; bearing, like the other Soco, the name of Shuweikeh.

SOD, SODDEN. The archaic English terms are replaced in the NASB and NIV by cooked (Gen. 25:29; from Heb. zûd) or boiled (2 Chron. 35:13; Ex. 12:9; Lev. 6:28; and elsewhere; from Heb. bāshal).

SO'DI (sō'dî; "my secret council," i.e., Jehovah). Father of Gaddiel, the spy appointed to represent the tribe of Zebulun (Num. 13:10), c. 1440 B.C.

SODOM. A town of the patriarchal age located in the plain or "valley of the Jordan" (Gen. 13:11–12), together with its sister cities Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim, and Zoar. The Bible notes that the district of the Jordan, where these cities were located, was exceedingly fertile and well populated (c. 2065 B.C.) but that not long afterward was abandoned, which is in full accord with archaeological evidence (cf. W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine and the Bible, pp. 133f.). Scholars used to place these cities N of the Dead Sea, but it is now generally agreed that they were situated in "the valley of Siddim" (14:3) and that this was the area at the southern end of the Dead Sea now covered with water. Sometime around the middle of the twenty-first century B.C. this region with its cities was overwhelmed by a great fire (19:23–28). The area is said to have been "full of tar pits" (14:10). Bitumen deposits are still to be found in this locality. The entire valley is on the long fault line that forms the Jordan Valley, the Dead Sea, and the Arabah. An earthquake-ridden region throughout its history, geological activity was doubtless an accompanying factor in the destruction of the cities, although the Bible account records only the miraculous elements. The salt and free sulphur of this area, now a burned-out region of oil and asphalt, were apparently mingled by an earthquake, causing a violent explosion. Carried up into the air red-hot, the exploding salt and sulphur literally caused a rain of fire and brimstone over the whole plain (19:24, 28). The account of Lot's wife being turned into a pillar of salt is frequently connected with the great salt mass in the valley called by the Arabs Jebel Usdum, that is, "Mountain of Sodom." This is a hill some five miles long stretching N and S at the SW end of the Dead Sea. Somewhere under the slowly rising waters of the southern part of the lake in this general locality the “cities of the valley” are probably to be found. In classical and NT times their ruins were still visible, not yet being covered with water (Tacitus History 5.7; Josephus Wars 4.4). Jesus refers to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Matt. 10:15). Sodom’s wickedness and moral depravity became proverbial (Rom. 9:29; Rev. 11:8). Fresh water irrigation at the southern end of the Dead Sea was sufficient to maintain the five Jordan cities and furnish another evidence of the location of Sodom in this region. See Gomorrah. SOD’OMITE (Heb. qādēsh, “consecrated, devoted”). The sodomites were not inhabitants of Sodom, or their descendants, but men consecrated to the unnatural vice of Sodom (cf. Gen. 19:4–5; Rom. 1:27) as a religious rite. This dreadful “consecration,” or rather desecration, was spread in different forms over Phoenicia, Syria, Phrygia, Assyria, and Babylonia. Ashtaroth, the Greek Astarte, was its chief object. The term was especially applied to the priests of Cybele, called Galli, perhaps from the river Gallus in Bithynia, which was said to make those who drank it mad. In Deut. 23:17 the toleration of a sodomite (“cult prostitute,” NASB; “shrine prostitute,” NIV) was expressly forbidden, and the pay received by a sodomite was not to be put into the Temple treasury (v. 18). “The wages of a dog” is a figurative expression used to denote the gains of a qādēsh (sodomite), who was called kinaidos by the Greeks, because of the doglike manner in which he debased himself (see Rev. 22:15, where the unclean are called “dogs”).

SOL’OMON. Solomon’s name (Heb. Shēlōmōh) means “peaceable.” He was also called Jedidiah, meaning “beloved of Jehovah.” He was a son of King David by Bathsheba (2 Sam. 12:24; 1 Chron. 3:5). He succeeded King David to the throne and ruled c. 965–926 B.C.

Empire. The tendency of scholars in the past has been to give scant credence to the biblical notices of Solomon’s power and glory as related in 1 Kings 3–11 (cf. Matt. 6:29; 12:42; Luke 11:31). German scholars Hugo Winckler and Hermann Guthe narrowly restricted the Davidic empire, which Solomon inherited, to Palestine, excluding even Damascus. Zobah, Hadadezer’s kingdom conquered by David, was customarily located S of Damascus in Hauran, biblical Bashan. However, analysis of the Assyrian provincial organization, which was constructed on older foundations, shows that Zobah, Assyrian Subatu, lay N of Damascus and not S of it (Emil Forrer, Die Provinzeinteilung des Assyrischen Reiches [1921], pp. 62, 69). Egyptian lists and the Amarna Letters also prove that Hadadezer’s chief cities, Tibhath and Cun, which David conquered (1 Chron. 18:8), were S of Hums. Thus archaeology has vindicated the wide extent of the Davidic-Solomonic empire as delineated in Kings. The general historical background of the Davidic-Solomonic period has also been authenticated. Solomon’s glory used to be commonly dismissed as “Semitic exaggeration” or a romantic tale. It was contended that such a sprawling realm could not have existed between great empires like Egypt, the Hittites, Assyria, and Babylonia. The monuments, however, have shown that during the period from 1100 to 900 B.C. the great empires surrounding Israel were either in decline or temporarily inactive, so that Solomon could rule with the splendor attributed to him in the Bible. After 1150 B.C., the Twentieth Egyptian Dynasty was weak, with a succession of feeble Ramessides. Not until Shishak (Egyptian Sheshonq I, c. 940–920 B.C.) did Egyptian power revive. The Hittite Empire had collapsed c. 1200 B.C., and only small Hittite city-states such as Senjirli, Carchemish, and Hamath existed. Solomon conquered Hamath and made it a store city (2 Chron. 8:3–4). Assyria had no strong rulers from Tiglath-pileser I (c. 1110 B.C.) to the rise of Ashurnasirpal II (c. 880 B.C.). Archaeology has thus authenticated the historical background of the Davidic-Solomonic era.

Remarkable Prosperity. Solomon is known as “the first great commercial king of Israel” (Theodore H. Robinson, The History of Israel, 1:256). He took full advantage of peculiarly favorable conditions both by land and by sea for trade expansion. The widespread domestication of the Arabian camel from the twelfth century B.C. onward, as Albright has noted (From the Stone Age to Christianity [1940], pp. 120f.), effected a remarkable increase in nomadic mobility. It was now possible for desert caravans to venture two or three days’ journey from a water supply. Ample archaeological evidence shows that there was extensive caravan trade between the Fertile Crescent and S Arabia in the Solomonic era. Solomon monopolized the entire caravan trade between Arabia and Mesopotamia and from the Red Sea to Palmyra (“Tadmor,” 2 Chron. 8:4), an oasis 140 miles NE of Damascus, which he built (1 Kings 9:18). Exercising control over the trade routes both to the E and W of the Jordan, the Israelite monarch was enabled to collect enormous revenue from merchants seeking passage through his territories (1 Kings 10:15). Solomon also exploited the incipient iron industry, as a result of David’s breaking the Philistine monopoly on iron (1 Sam. 13:19–20).

Trade in Horses and Chariots. This lucrative business involved Solomon as a middleman in the trading of horses from Egypt and Asia Minor. “Also Solomon’s import of horses was from Egypt and Kue, and the king’s merchants procured them from Kue for a price” (1 Kings 10:28). Assyrian records prove that Kue is Cilicia, the country between the Taurus Mountains and the Mediterranean Sea in Asia Minor. According to Herodotus, this region was famous in the Persian period for fine horses (3.90). “A chariot was imported from Egypt for 600 shekels of silver, and a horse for 150” (1 Kings 10:29). Thus, at the rate of four horses to one chariot, Solomon conducted this lucrative business.

Army. Solomon used the horse and chariot trade not only for commercial reasons but to build up a powerful chariot corps (1 Kings 4:26). This army was stationed in a number of chariot cities such as Gezer, Megiddo, Hazor, and Jerusalem (9:15–19). The Israelite monarch is said to have had 1,400 chariots and 1,200 horsemen, which “he stationed ... in the chariot cities and with the king in Jerusalem” (10:26). Excavations at Megiddo, Hazor, and Gezer have confirmed Solomon’s building operations there. Stables capable of housing 450 horses and about 150 chariots have been found at Megiddo, but these have been assigned to the time of Ahab.

Domestic Economy . Solomon divided his realm into twelve districts that ignored old tribal boundaries and were a nucleus of a highly efficient organization (1 Kings 4:7–20). Solomon resorted to heavy direct taxation and free donations of labor (9:20–21) as well as special levies (5:13–18).

Foreign Policy. As a skillful diplomat, Solomon made friendly ties with the important maritime kingdom of Tyre, which was ruled by Hiram I (969–936 B.C.). Hiram, a common Phoenician royal name attested by a royal sarcophagus discovered at Byblos (Geba), 1924–25, was called “king of the Sidonians.” Besides, Solomon cultivated royal marriages. He married a princess of Egypt (1 Kings 3:1–2) and royal women of surrounding smaller kingdoms. The ancient practice of such regal marriages is well illustrated by the Amarna Letters, in which Egyptian pharaohs marry Hittite women and Mitannian princesses.

Voyages to Ophir. Phoenician seamen not only built Solomon's port at Ezion-geber but his navy as well (1 Kings 9:26–28). "Once every three years the ships of Tarshish came bringing gold and silver, ivory and apes and peacocks" (10:22). The word peacocks is better rendered as "a kind of monkey" ("baboons," NIV). Ophir was the region of SW Arabia, modern Yemen, on the Red Sea adjacent to Sheba and Havilah (Gen. 10:29). Since the voyage took three years, portions of the African coast must also be meant. The time denoted by "three years" simply means a full year with portions of two others. The navy, accordingly, set sail in November or September of the first year, returning in early spring of the third. Babylonians more than a millennium earlier allowed three years for a voyage to Melukka, approximately in the same general region.

Visit of the Queen of Sheba. Solomon's far-reaching commerce by land and sea must have brought him in competition with the famous queen of Sheba. The account of the visit of this monarch to Jerusalem (1 Kings 10), traversing over 1,200 miles, used to be dismissed as a "romantic tale." Archaeology has shown the plausibility of the account in which the queen must have come seeking delimitations of spheres of commercial interest. Although the queen of Sheba has not been attested epigraphically, researchers in southern Arabia by the American Foundation for the Study of Man (1950–51) have shown the historical reasonableness of the account. This expedition, conducted by Wendell Philips and under the archaeological supervision of F. P. Albright, examined the ruins of four once-flourishing southern Arabian monarchies: Ma'in, Saba (Sheba), Qataban, and Hadhramaut. The famous spice route skirted this region, and the taxes from this trade supported three kingdoms. Large numbers of inscriptions, pottery, and other archaeological finds have been studied, and the historical background of the queen of Sheba has been enriched accordingly.

Solomon's Temple. Solomon's magnificent Temple and the royal buildings at Jerusalem were in striking contrast to Saul's rusticity, exhibited by the excavations of Albright at Gibeah (Tell el Ful). Solomon was greatly indebted to Phoenician architectural ability. The plan of Solomon's Temple was typically Phoenician, as is shown by the discovery of a similar temple at Tell Tainat in northern Syria in 1936 by the University of Chicago. Similar ground plans of sanctuaries from the general period of 1200–900 B.C. show that the specifications of the Solomonic structure are pre-Greek and authentic and are not anachronistically Hellenic. Like Solomon's Temple, the shrine at Tell Tainat was rectangular with three rooms, a portico with two columns, and a shrine with a raised platform. The decorations of the Temple, such as palmettos, cherubim, and lilies, were characteristically Syro-Phoenician. The cherubim (winged lions with human heads) were inherited from the Tabernacle. Three hybrid animals appear in iconography hundreds of times between 1800 and 600 B.C. Many representations are found with a deity or king seated on a cherub-supported throne (cf. 1 Sam. 4:4).

Like the shrine at Tell Tainat, in the northern part of Syria, Solomon's Temple had two columns that stood at the portico. These had dynastically significant names, as is now known (Jachin, Heb. "He will establish," that is, "Yahweh will establish thy throne forever"; Boaz, Heb. "In Him is strength," that is, "In Yahweh is the king's strength," or something similar). These pillars have been thought of as stylized trees or sacred obelisks. W. Robertson Smith explained them as gigantic cressets or fire altars, which identification is followed by Albright (Archaeology and the Religion of Israel, pp. 144–48) and is suggested by the painted tombs of Marisa in southern Palestine, where such incense burners appear, and by the fact that the two pillars are clearly said to be crowned with a gullah or oil basin or a lamp-stand (1 Kings 7:41). Thus Solomon was highly indebted to Syro-Phoenician art.

Apostasy and Death. By intermarriage with many foreign women, Solomon courted spiritual declension and gross idolatry. Of the numerous deities to which his foreign wives turned his heart, perhaps the best known in the ancient world was Ashtoreth, called “the goddess of the Sidonians” (1 Kings 11:5, 33), since her cult was early established among the Phoenicians. This fertility goddess, known as Astarte among the Greeks and as Ishtar in Babylonia, was the protagonist of sexual love and war in Babylonia and Assyria. Her degraded moral character is revealed by the Ugaritic literature from Ras Shamra. She is pictured on a seal found at Bethel where her name is given in hieroglyphic characters. Solomon thus courted disaster. He died disillusioned and spiritually insensible. The breakup of the monarchy was soon to follow as a result of the folly of his son Rehoboam. M.F.U.

SOL’OMON’S SERVANTS (Ezra 2:58; Neh. 7:57, 60). Following as they do in the lists, the priests, Levites, and the Temple servants, they would seem to have some connection with the Temple service. Smith (Bib. Dict., s.v.) suggests: (1) The name as well as the order implies inferiority even to the Temple servants. They are descendants of the slaves of Solomon. The servitude of the Temple servants, “given to the Lord,” was softened by the idea of dedication. (2) The starting point of their history is probably found in 1 Kings 5:13–14; 9:20–21; 2 Chron. 8:7–8. Canaanites, who had been living till then with a certain measure of freedom, were reduced by Solomon to the Helot state and compelled to labor in the king’s stone quarries and in building his palaces and cities. To some extent, indeed, the change had been effected under David, but it appears to have been then connected especially with the Temple, and the servitude under his successor was at once harder and more extended (1 Chron. 22:2). (3) The last passage throws some light on their special office. The Temple servants, as in the case of the Gibeonites, were appointed to be cutters of wood (Josh. 9:23), and this was enough for the services of the Tabernacle. For the construction and repairs of the Temple another kind of labor was required, and the new slaves were set to the work of shaping and squaring stones (1 Kings 5:17–18). Their descendants appear to have formed a distinct order, inheriting, probably, the same functions and the same skill.

SON (Heb. bēn; Gk. huios; the child, bar, “son,” occurs in the OT and appears in the NT in such words as Barnabas). “Son” is used in a great variety of meanings in both the OT and the NT: (1) the immediate offspring; (2) grandson, as Laban is called “son of Nahor” (Gen. 29:5), though he was his grandson (cf. 24:24, 29); so Mephibosheth is called the “son of Saul,” though he was the son of Jonathan, Saul’s son (2 Sam. 19:24); (3) remote descendants (Num. 2:14, 18); (4) son by adoption such as Ephraim and Manasseh to Jacob (Gen. 48); (5) son by nation, as “sons of the east” (1 Kings 4:30); (6) son by education, i.e., a disciple, as Eli called Samuel his son (1 Sam. 3:6). Solomon often calls his disciple his son in the Proverbs, and we read of the “sons of the prophets” (1 Kings 20:35; etc.), i.e., those under training for service; similarly a Christian convert (1 Pet. 5:13; cf. 1 Tim. 1:2; Titus 1:4; Philem. 10; 1 Cor. 4:15, 17); (7) son by disposition and conduct, as “sons of Belial” (Judg. 19:22 and 1 Sam. 2:12, marg.), “sons of the mighty,” i.e., heroes (Ps. 29:1); “sons of a sorceress,” i.e., those who practice sorcery (Isa. 57:3); (8) a production or offspring of any parent, as an arrow is “son of the bow” (Job 41:28, marg.), because the arrow flies from the bow; also “son of His quiver” (Lam. 3:13, marg.); “son of the threshing floor,” i.e., threshed grain (Isa. 21:10, marg.); “sons of fresh oil,” i.e., branches of the olive (Zech. 4:14, marg.); expressive of deserving, as “a son of beating,” i.e., deserving a beating (Deut. 25:2, marg.), so “son of perdition” (John 17:12); (9) “Son of God,” by excellence above all, namely, Jesus (Mark 1:1; Luke 1:35; John 1:34; Rom. 1:4; Heb. 4:14); (10) “sons of God,” i.e., angels (Job 1:6; 38:7), perhaps so called as possessing power delegated from God, His deputies, vicegerents; (11) “sons of this age” (Luke 16:8), i.e., worldly minded persons, in contrast to the “sons of light”; “sons of disobedience” (Eph. 2:2), those who are unrestrained in evil; “son of hell” (Matt. 23:15); “son of the devil,” i.e., under his power (Acts 13:10); “sons of the bridal-chamber” (Matt. 9:15 and Mark 2:19, marg.), the youthful companions of the bridegroom, as in the instance of Samson. Offspring, especially sons, were highly valued among all Eastern nations, and barrenness was regarded as one of the severest afflictions (see Gen. 16:2; 29:31; 30:1, 14; etc.). See Children; Family.

SONG (Heb. shîr; Gk. ōdē). Songs were used on occasions of thanksgiving and triumph, such as the song of Moses at the deliverance from Pharaoh (Ex. 15:1); the song of Israel at the well of Beer (Num. 21:17); the song of Moses in Deuteronomy (chap. 32); of Deborah (Judg. 5:12); of David on bringing the Ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 13:8); of Hannah (1 Sam. 2); of the virgin Mary (Luke 1:46); the songs in heaven (Rev. 5:9; 14:3; 15:3).

Figurative. Songs (see Singing) were indicative of joy, and their absence of sorrow. “You will have songs as in the night” (Isa. 30:29) is a figurative allusion to the joyful singing of the Israelites on the festal night before the Passover. “And behold, you are to them like a sensual song,” etc. (Ezek. 33:32), is more correctly rendered, “You are to them like a pleasant singer,” etc., i.e., the prophet was like the singer of pleasant songs, to which they listened for pleasure, but without obedience. See Music.

SONG OF SOLOMON. This delightful poem, also called Canticles, stands first in the list of the five Hebrew rolls, or megilloth, which were short enough to be publicly read on important anniversaries. Song of Solomon comes first because it was read at the initial and greatest feast of the year, the Passover.

Name. The term Song of Songs (1:1) is a Heb. idiom denoting the superlative degree, that is, the best or most exquisite song. The Gk. asma asmatōn and the Lat. Canticum Canticorum, like the English “Song of Songs,” slavishly transliterates the Heb. idiom. The rendering “The Song of Solomon” is likewise deduced from the data of 1:1 (“the Song of Songs, which is Solomon’s”) but is not a translation.

Form. Interpretation of the song depends to a large extent on the view taken of its form. Three distinct views are commonly held. The conservative (and we believe the correct view)

construes it as a unified lyrical poem with a dramatic form of dialogue. The second view is that it is a drama or melodrama (Origen, Ewald, Koenig, Godet, etc.). Those subscribing to the third view hold it to be an anthology of loosely connected separate love lyrics (Lods, Haupt, Oesterly and Robinson, Pfeiffer, etc.) recited during wedding festivals (Budde, Cheyne, Goodspeed, and Kassuto). That the song is a homogeneous lyric, not an anthology of disconnected love poems without plan, is apparent from the following reasons: (1) Identical imagery and local color predominate in all parts of the song, for example, the bridegroom (beloved) is compared to a young stag in 2:9, 17; 8:14. The bridegroom feeds his flock “among the lilies” in 2:16; 4:5; 6:2–3. The bride is called the “most beautiful among women” in 1:8; 5:9; 6:1. (2) The same persons appear in all parts of the poem: the bride (1:5; 2:16; 3:4; 6:10; 7:10–11; 8:2, 8), the bridegroom (1:7; 2:13; 4:8–5:1; 6:1; 7:11–13) and the daughters of Jerusalem (1:5; 2:7; 3:5, 10; 5:8, 16; 8:4). The view that the poem is a drama is scarcely tenable since it does not have sufficient action, plot, or dramatic sequence. The position that it is a collation of detached erotic lyrics is also unsatisfactory in the light of the unity of the poem. It is scarcely credible that the faithful of antiquity would have persisted in viewing as divinely inspired a poem of mere human love, especially when it was on such a plane often considered unedifying and not allowed to be read by persons under thirty years of age among the Jews.

Interpretation. Literal, allegorical, and typical interpretations are commonly made.

Literal Interpretation. This interpretation construes the poem as a mere representation of human love without any higher or spiritual meaning. Edward J. Young sets forth a species of literal interpretation that is vaguely typical, viewing the poem as didactic and moral and holding that it celebrates the dignity and purity of human love (Introduction to the O. T. [1949], p. 327). Most modern interpreters resort to a shepherd hypothesis in which a third main character is introduced as the shepherd lover of the bride whom Solomon, villainlike, tries to seduce from her lover. The poem is thus made the triumph of pure love over lust, but under an obviously objectionable representation of Solomon. More serious, the shepherd has no tangible existence.

Allegorical Interpretation. This interpretation was common among ancient Jews and popularized among Christians by Origen. The Jewish interpretation represented the poem as setting forth Jehovah’s love for Israel. To the Christian, it represented Christ’s love for His church. Details were subject to extravagant interpretations. The view has much to be said in its favor. It accords the book a higher spiritual meaning and gives purpose to its canonical recognition. Furthermore, both the OT and the NT set forth the Lord’s relation to His people by the figure of marriage. In the OT, however, Israel is presented as the wife of Jehovah (Hos. 2:19–23), in her sin and unbelief now divorced and yet to be restored (Isa. 54:5; Jer. 3:1; Hos. 1–3). On the other hand, in the NT the church is portrayed as a virgin espoused to Christ (2 Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:23–32; Rom. 7:1–4; Rev. 19:6–8). The allegorical view fails in unnecessarily ruling out the actual historicity of the events and is subject to extravagant, farfetched interpretation.

Typical Interpretation. This interpretation has a mediating view between the two extremes, the literal and the allegorical. It neither denies the historical background nor encourages fantastic interpretations of details, since the typical foreshadows the antitypical in only a few salient points. It avoids the secularity of the literal interpretation and finds an adequate purpose in the book in the typical relation between Solomon, elsewhere a type of Christ, and the Shulamite, a type of the church as the bride of Christ.

Author. The natural indication of 1:1, “the Song of Songs, which is Solomon’s,” is that Solomon is the author, although the preposition may conceivably be translated “The Song of Songs which is about or concerning Solomon” (cf. 1:4; 3:7–11; 8:11). Numerous internal arguments also lend support to Solomonic authorship: the place names, evidences of royal luxury, the author's wide acquaintance with plants and animals (cf. 1 Kings 4:33). The presence of one or two Persian and Gk. words need not dispose of the Solomonic authorship. It may simply indicate that the poem in the precise form in which we have it cannot be earlier than the third century B.C. (Eissfeldt). But one may at least inquire if even these features might be original in the light of the incredibly widespread extent of Solomonic commerce and an inevitable influx of foreign words. Likewise the Aramaisms may be the result of the inclusion of Aramaic-speaking countries in Solomon's realm. M.F.U.

SON OF GOD. See Sonship of Christ.

SON OF MAN (Gk. huios tou anthrōpou). This is a term, like "the Son of God," which is now theologically chiefly associated with Christ and is used in both the OT and the NT. Christ employed this expression to designate Himself some eighty times. It portrays Him as the Representative Man. It designates Him as the "last Adam" in distinction to the "first man, Adam" (1 Cor. 15:45). It sets Him forth as "the second man ... from heaven" as over against "the first man ... from the earth" (15:47). "The Son of Man" is thus our Lord's racial name, as the "Son of David" is distinctly His Jewish name and "the Son of God" His divine name. This term is uniformly used of Christ in connection with His mission (cf. Luke 19:10), His death and resurrection (cf. Matt. 12:40; 20:18; 26:2), and His second advent (cf. 24:37-44; Luke 12:40). It transcends purely Jewish limitations and has application to the salvation of the entire race. Thus, when Nathanael owns Christ as "King of Israel" our Lord's reply is, "You shall see greater things than these ... the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of Man" (John 1:49-51). It is, for example, in this name that universal judgment is committed to our Lord (5:22,27). The term also implies that in Him the OT prophetic blessings centering in the coming Man are to find their fulfillment (Gen. 3:15; Ps. 8:4; Isa. 7:14; 9:6-7; Zech. 13:7). The term "Son of Man" occurs conspicuously in the book of Ezekiel, being used ninety-two times in addressing the prophet. The thought of going beyond the confines of Judaism is also involved in the phrase when applied to Ezekiel. When Israel was in her captivity, oblivious of her special mission (Jer. 11:10; Ezek. 5:5-8), the Lord reminded her by this term of address to Ezekiel that He would not forsake her but that nevertheless she was only a small portion of the race for whom He was concerned. As used of Ezekiel, the expression "the son of man" suggests what the prophet is to God, not what he is to himself. As "the son of man" the prophet is chosen, spiritually endowed, and delegated by God. These factors are also true of the Messiah as the Representative Man, the new Head of regenerated humanity. SONSHIP OF BELIEVERS. See Adoption.

SONSHIP OF CHRIST. A matter of doctrine with reference to the divine nature of Christ. It is inwrought with the doctrine of the Trinity (which see) and in the very nature of the case points to a relationship that in its deepest essence cannot be comprehended by the human understanding (see Matt. 11:27). And yet the Scriptures throw some rays of light on the subject.

Scriptural. The term Son of God is used in the Scriptures in various senses. In the OT it is sometimes applied to Israel (e.g., Ex. 4:22), also figuratively to heavenly beings (Job 1:6; 38:7). In the NT it is also employed in different applications (Luke 3:38; Matt. 5:9, 45). It is in one instance (Luke 1:35) applied to Christ on account of His miraculous conception. And yet it is plain beyond all question that the Scriptures apply this title to Christ in a sense far deeper than all these. Both Christ Himself and His apostles speak of His sonship in a way that cannot be employed with reference to any, even the highest, of God's creatures (see John 3:13, 16; 5:17–31; 6:62; 8:58; 10:30; 14:1, 11; Rom. 1:3–4; 9:5; Col. 2:9; Titus 2:13). See Kenosis.

Theological. The doctrine of the Scriptures, universally held by the Christian church, includes the following features:

1. The sonship of Christ involves an antemundane and eternal distinction of personality between the Son and the Father. He is the eternal Son even as the Father is the eternal Father. Thus both Christ and the apostles speak of His preexistent state (John 8:58; 17:5; Rom. 8:3; 2 Cor. 8:9; Phil. 2:5–8). And thus while He teaches men to pray, saying "Our Father," for Himself He simply says "Father," or "My Father" (see John 15:8, and many other places).

2. The sonship of Christ implies also that He as the Son "has the ground of his existence in the Father, and as the Father has not in the Son" (see Van Oosterzee, 1:276). Christ is the "only begotten God, who is in the bosom of the Father" (John 1:18; cf. v. 15), the "only begotten Son" (3:16), "His own Son" (Rom. 8:3). Upon these and similar Scripture expressions is based the doctrine of the eternal generation. This theological term, however, it is rightly held, is one that is liable to abuse, should never have associated with it anthropomorphic conceptions, and should exclude all idea of time. The idea to be reverently held is that the Son of God has the ground of His existence eternally in the Father.

3. The Son is in the most complete sense partaker in the same nature with the Father. He possesses the same attributes (John 5:21), performs the same works (Matt. 9:2–6; John 5:24–29), and claims equal honor with the Father (5:23; 14:1). As the Son, having the ground of His existence in the Father, He is in this sense subordinate. Also in His incarnate state He became subordinate in a still deeper sense (see Kenosis). And yet before His incarnation He "did not regard equality with God a thing to be grasped"; and in His glorified state "in Him all the fulness of the Deity dwells in bodily form."

The doctrine of the eternal sonship of Christ has been the ground of many hard-fought battles (see particularly Arianism and Sabellianism in works on theology), but the Christian church steadfastly holds to the teachings of the Scriptures. And the truth at this point is most important; for only in the light of this truth can we recognize in Christ the perfect revelation of God and realize the efficacy of His saving ministry. E.MCC.

SO'PATER (sō'pa-ter; "savior of his father"). A disciple of Berea, who accompanied Paul from Greece into Asia on his return from his third missionary journey (Acts 20:4). In the Codex Sinaiticus, and several other manuscripts, his father's name is given as Pyrrhus. It is a question whether or not he is the same as Sosipater (which see).

SOPHE'RETH (so-fe'reth; "secretariat," probably denoting an official position). "The sons of Sophereth" were a family who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, among the descendants of Solomon's servants (Neh. 7:57), about 536 B.C. He is called Hassophereth in Ezra 2:55. See also Hassophereth.

SORCERER, SORCERY. The term sorcerer (Ex. 7:11; Jer. 27:9; etc.), from the Lat. sors, "a lot," "one who throws or declares a lot," would assign it initially the more circumscribed sphere of augural prognostication. But the term, as commonly employed, includes one who practices in the whole field of divinatory occultism. As such, it comprehends a necromancer, who may be classified as a certain type of sorcerer. Sorcery is the practice of the occult arts under the power of evil spirits, or demons, and has been common in all ages of the world's history. See Magic; Divination. M.F.U.

SO'REK (so'rek; "a choice or excellent vine"). A valley in which was the home of Delilah (Judg. 16:4). Smith (Hist. Geog., p. 218) identifies it with the present Wadi es Surar, through which runs the railroad from Joppa to Jerusalem. It is the way the Philistines used to come up in the days of the Judges and of David; there is no shorter road into Judea from Ekron, Jamnia, and, perhaps, Ashdod. Just before the Wadi es Surar approaches the Judean range its width is increased by the entrance of the Wadi en Najil from the S. It was by the level road up the Sorek Valley that the Ark was taken to Beth-shemesh (1 Sam. 6:10–12). The territory that the book of Joshua assigns to Dan lies down the two parallel valleys that lead through the Shephelah to the sea, Aijalon and Sorek.

SORES. See Diseases.

SORROW. The rendering of a number of Heb. and Gk. words, representing mental pain or grief arising from the privation of some good we actually possessed. It is the opposite of joy; contracts the heart, sinks the spirit, and injures the health. Scripture cautions against it (2 Sam. 12:12–23; 1 Thess. 4:13; etc.; cf. Eccus. 30:24–25). Paul distinguishes two sorts of sorrow: "The sorrow that is according to the will of God produces a repentance without regret, leading to salvation; but the sorrow of the world produces death" (2 Cor. 7:10). The one is that sorrow for sin wrought by God that leads to repentance, whereas the other is a sorrow about worldly objects that, when separated from the fear of God, tends to death, temporal and eternal.

SOSIP'ATER (sō-sip'a-ter; "saver of his father"). A kinsman of Paul mentioned in the salutations of the epistle to the Romans (16:21) as being with the apostle. He is perhaps the same as Sopater.

SOS'THENES (sos'the-nēz; "of safe strength").

1. The leader of the synagogue at Corinth, who was beaten by the Greeks in the presence of Gallio when the latter refused to entertain the charge made to him against Paul (Acts 18:17). Some have thought that he was a Christian and was maltreated thus by his own countrymen, because he was known as a special friend of Paul. A better view is that Sosthenes was one of the bigoted Jews; and that the crowd were Greeks who, taking advantage of the indifference of Gallio and ever ready to show their contempt of the Jews, turned their indignation against Sosthenes. In this case he must have been the successor of Crispus (v. 8).

2. Paul wrote the first epistle to the Corinthians in his own name and that of a certain Sosthenes, whom he terms "our brother" (1 Cor. 1:1). Some have held that he was identical with the Sosthenes mentioned in the Acts. If this be so, he must have been converted at a later period and have been at Ephesus, not at Corinth, when Paul wrote to the Corinthians. The name was a common one, and little stress can be laid on that coincidence. Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 259) says: "Probably two persons at Corinth named Sosthenes were brought into relations with Paul, one a Jew, the other a prominent Christian; or, perhaps, the Jew was converted at a later date."

SO'TAI (sō'ti). The "sons" of Sotai were a family of the descendants of Solomon's servants who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:55; Neh. 7:57), before 536 B.C.

SOUL (generally the rendering of Heb. nepesh, a "breathing" creature; Gk. psuchē, "breath," etc., the equivalent of nepesh). The Heb. term may indicate not only the entire inner nature of man, but also his entire personality, i.e., all that pertains to the person of man; in the sense of person; somebody, everybody (Deut. 26:16; cf. Josh. 11:11, 14). It would thence be wrongly concluded that the soul is what constitutes the person of man; for the brute is also called nepesh. In nepesh itself is not involved the conception of the personal living, but only of the self-living (the individual). In such cases nepesh indicates the person of the man, but not the man as a person. The beast is nepesh, as a self-living nature by the power of the spirit that proceeds from God and pervades the entire nature, the individual constitution of which spirit is the soul of the brute; but man is nepesh “as a self-living nature by the power of the spirit that proceeds from God, and is in the form of God, and is therefore personal, the operation of which spirit is his endowment with soul” (Delitzsch, Bib. Psych., pp. 181–82).

The Gk. term psuchē has the simple meaning of life (Matt. 6:25; Luke 12:22); that in which there is life, a living being (1 Cor. 15:45); every soul, i.e., every one (Acts 3:23). It also has the meaning of the seat of the feelings, desires, affections, aversions (our soul, heart, etc.; RV almost uniformly soul); the human soul, insofar as it is so constituted that, by the right use of aids offered it by God, it can attain its highest end and secure eternal blessedness; the soul regarded as a moral being designed for everlasting life (3 John 2; Heb. 13:17; James 1:21; 5:20; 1 Pet. 1:9). Another meaning of psuchē is the soul as an essence that differs from the body and is not dissolved by death (Matt. 10:28); the soul freed from the body, a disembodied soul (Acts 2:27; Rev. 20:4). See Spirit.

SOUR (Heb. bēser, “immature”). The proverb quoted in Jer. 31:29–30 and Ezek. 18:2, “The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children’s teeth are set on edge,” is easily understood. The sour grapes that the fathers eat are the sins they commit; the setting of the children’s teeth on edge is the consequence thereof, i.e., the suffering that the children have to endure. The teaching of the proverb is that children must atone for their fathers’ sin, without any culpability of their own. This fatal error is condemned by both Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Jehovah declares with an oath that this proverb shall not be used anymore, for their iniquity shall be made manifest; and announces that all souls are His, and He will mete out to each his deserts. SOUTH. The country or quarter of the heavens that the Shemite, standing with his face to the E, supposes to be on his right hand.

1. Negev (Heb. negeb) means literally the “dry” or “parched” land; and probably took its name from the hot, drying winds that annually blow into Syria from Africa and Arabia. Thus our Lord said (Luke 12:55), “And when you see a south wind blowing, you say, ‘It will be a hot day,’ and it turns out that way.” The word is occasionally applied to a dry tract of land. Caleb’s daughter said to her father, “You have given me the land of the Negev, give me also springs of water” (Judg. 1:15). It is also used in the geographical sense in Num. 34:3; Josh. 15:2; 1 Chron. 9:24; 2 Chron. 4:4; Ezek. 40:2; 46:9; etc.

An important use of the word Negev (which see) is as the designation of the regions lying S of Judea, consisting of the deserts of Shur, Zin, and Paran, the mountainous country of Edom or Idumea, and part of Arabia Petraea. The Negev at present is a part of the Israeli state. It consists of an area about sixty miles square S of Hebron, extending from N of Beersheba to S of Kadesh-barnea. It drops from the Judean highlands to the Arabian Desert, its ridges criss-crossing in an E and W direction, making it throughout the centuries a barrier against trade routes and marching armies. It formed a natural bulwark against southern Judea. Thus, Israel could not enter the Promised Land from the S because of this formidable obstacle (Deut. 1:42–46). In this rugged terrain David roved as an outlaw (1 Sam. 27:5–10). The Amalekites and the Kenites are especially associated with this part of the country (Num. 13:29; 1 Sam. 27:10). This section later comprised Idumaea or “New Edom.” The Negev was suitable for grazing in patriarchal times (Gen. 20:14). Efforts to occupy and cultivate the Negev were successful between the fourth and seventh centuries A.D. Under aggressive control by the Israeli state, the region promises to be developed. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

2. A bright, sunny region, hence the south, the southern quarter (Ezek. 40:24, 27–28; 42:12–13, 18; Eccles. 1:6); poetically for the south wind (Job 37:17), Heb. dērôn.

3. Teman (Heb. tēmān, what is on the “right” hand), the south, the southern quarter (Josh. 12:3; 13:4; Job 9:9; Isa. 43:6); and, perhaps meaning Egypt (Zech. 6:6). It is used poetically for the south wind (Ps. 78:26; Song of Sol. 4:16).

4. Right (Heb. yāmîn, the “right” side), the south, as “The north and the south, Thou hast created them” (Ps. 89:12). The word is evidently used here in its widest sense, comprehending not only all the countries lying S, but also the Indian Ocean, etc., the whole hemisphere. In passages where some translations render the word right, the meaning would have been clearer had it been rendered (as in the NIV) south (2 Sam. 24:5; Job 23:9; cf. 1 Sam. 23:19, 24).

5. Desert (Heb. midbār, Ps. 75:6), lit., “wilderness,” as this lay in the south.

6. The Gk. words are: (1) lips (bringing “moisture”), the quarter of the heavens from which the SW wind blows (Acts 27:12); (2) mesēmbria (“noon”), but, with respect to locality, the south (8:26); (3) notos, the southern quarter or wind (Matt. 12:42; Luke 11:31; 13:29; Rev. 21:13).

SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD. A term by which is expressed the supreme rulership of God. This is rightly held to be not an attribute of God but a prerogative based upon the perfections of the divine Being.

The possession of the most complete sovereignty is a necessary part of the proper conception of God and is abundantly declared in the Scriptures (e.g., Pss. 50:1; 66:7; 93:1; Isa. 40:15, 17; 1 Tim. 6:15; Rev. 11:17). The method of the divine rulership is, however, to be judged in the light of special revelation. The term absolute sovereignty as used in Calvinism means the sovereign election of a certain number to salvation and the sovereign reprobation of others. There is a sense, indeed, in which the sovereignty of God is absolute. He is under no external restraint whatsoever. He is the Supreme Dispenser of all events. All forms of existence are within the scope of His dominion. And yet this is not to be viewed in any such way as to abridge the reality of the moral freedom of God’s responsible creatures or to make men anything else than the arbiters of their own eternal destinies. God has seen fit to create beings with the power of choice between good and evil. He rules over them in justice and wisdom and grace.

This is the whole tenor of the Scriptures and the plain declaration of many passages (e.g., Deut. 10:17; Job 36:5; Acts 10:34–35; Rom. 2:6; Col. 3:25; 1 Pet. 1:17).

Thus understood the sovereignty of God is the great ground of confidence for His people, and the proper basis upon which to urge sinners to repentance. See Election. E.MCC.

SPADE (Heb. yātēd, “peg,” a tent pin, Judg. 4:21). Outside the camp of Israel, in their journeying, was a space for the necessities of nature, and among their implements was a spade used for digging a hole before they sat down, and afterward for filling it up. It was a tool for sticking in, i.e., for digging (Deut. 23:13). See also Paddle.

SPAIN (Gk. Spania). The name anciently applied to the peninsula that now comprises Spain and Portugal, the usual Gk. name being Iberia, and the natives being called Iberians. The Carthaginians, during the flourishing times of their republic, established many settlements upon the Spanish coast, such as Carthage (now Cartagena) and Malacca, the royal city (now Malaga). Through the efforts of Hamilcar Barca and Hannibal a considerable part of Spain became a Carthaginian colony and subsequently passed under Roman control. The Hebrews were probably acquainted with the position and mineral wealth of Spain from the time of Solomon.

Paul, in his epistle to the Romans (15:24), tells them of his purpose of visiting Rome whenever he should take his journey into Spain. “Such an intention implies in the plainest way an idea already existent in Paul’s mind of Christianity as the religion of the Roman empire.” “From” Rome, “the center of the Roman world, Paul would go on to the chief seat of Roman civilization in the west, and would thus complete a first survey” (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 255). Whether the journey was ever made is an open question. See Paul.

SPAN. See Metrology: Linear Measures.

SPARK. In Job 5:7 Eliphaz declares, “For man is born for trouble, as sparks fly upward,” meaning that “misfortune does not grow out of the ground like weeds; it is rather established in the divine order of the world, as it is established in the order of nature that sparks of fire should ascend.”

In describing the leviathan, it is said (Job 41:19), “Out of his mouth go burning torches; sparks of fire leap forth.” Bartram has observed that as the alligator comes on the land a thick smoke issues from his distended nostrils. This would seem to give the impression of a fire existing beneath and bursting forth.

SPARROW. See Animal Kingdom.

Figurative. Our Lord’s allusion to God’s care for the comparatively worthless sparrow (Matt. 10:29, 31; Luke 12:6–7) is an incentive for man to trust divine Providence.

SPEAR. See Armor, Arms.

SPECK (Gk. karphes, “dry” twig or straw). Any small, dry particle, such as of chaff, wood, etc. (Matt. 7:3–5; Luke 6:41–42), and figurative of some slight moral defect seen in another. The KJV term is “mote.” The self-righteous man is likely to see these, while being unconscious of greater evils in himself. The proverb was a familiar one with the Hebrews.

SPECKLED.

1. (Heb. nāqōd, “marked”), spotted, as black goats or sheep, with white spots or vice versa (Gen. 30:32–33, 35, 39; 31:8, 10, 12). Jacob, in order to increase his wages, resorted to the following plan: “In the first place (30:37–39) he took fresh rods of storax, maple, and walnut trees, all of which have a dazzling white wood under their dark outside, and peeled white strips upon them. These partially peeled and, therefore, mottled rods he placed in the drinking troughs; ... in order that if copulation took place at the drinking time, it might occur near the mottled sticks, and the young be speckled and mottled in consequence" (K. & D., Com.). Jacob was actually indulging in selective breeding.

2. (Heb. šābūa, "dyed"), colored, mottled (Jer. 12:9), elsewhere in modern Heb., the hyena, but in the above passage a many-colored bird of prey.

SPECKLED BIRD. See Animal Kingdom: Hyena.

SPECTACLE (Gk. theatron). One to be gazed at and made sport of (1 Cor. 4:9).

SPELT. An inferior kind of wheat (Ex. 9:32). See Vegetable Kingdom.

SPICE. The spices mentioned as being used by Nicodemus for the preparation of our Lord's body (John 19:39–40) are "myrrh and aloes." Aloes here must be understood not to be the aloes of medicine (Aloe), but the highly scented wood of the Aquilaria agallochum. The evangelist John computes the amount at one hundred pounds, referring doubtless to the Roman pound of about twelve ounces. This would make seventy-five pounds. The amount mentioned may seem large, but Josephus (Ant. 17.8.3) tells us that there were five hundred spice-bearers at Herod's funeral; and in the Talmud it is said that eighty pounds of opobalsamum were employed at the funeral of a certain rabbi. It must also be remembered that Nicodemus was a rich man. The ancient Bible world enjoyed an extensive trade in spices. Caravan routes by which aromatic vegetable substances were transported from one country to another, particularly across Arabia, became highways for the spread of culture. Spice trade rivaled the modern perfume and cosmetic industry. See Vegetable Kingdom.

SPIDER. See Animal Kingdom.

Figurative. Bildad compares the trust of the ungodly and secretly wicked (Heb. ḥānēp) to a spider's web (Job 8:14); as easily as a spider's web is cut through by the lightest touch or a breath of wind, so that on which the evil man depends and trusts is cut asunder. In the declaration of Isaiah (Isa. 59:5), they "weave the spider's web," we have a figure to represent the worthlessness and deceptive character of the works of the wicked.

SPIKENARD. See Vegetable Kingdom: Nard.

SPIN (Heb. tāwâ; Gk. nēthō, Ex. 35:25–26; Matt. 6:28; cf. Prov. 31:19). The latter passage implies the use of the same instruments that have been in vogue for hand spinning down to the present day, namely, the distaff and spindle. The distaff, however, appears to have been dispensed with, and the term so rendered means the spindle itself, whereas that rendered "spindle" represents the whirl of the spindle, a button of circular rim that was affixed to it and gave steadiness to its circular motion. The "whirl" of the Syrian women was made of amber in the time of Pliny. The spindle was held perpendicularly in the one hand, while the other was employed in drawing out the thread.

SPINDLE (Heb. kīshōr, "director"). The twirl or lower part of the instrument used in giving motion to the whole (Prov. 31:19). In the East it is held in the hand, often perpendicularly, and is twirled with one hand, while the other draws out the thread. The spindle and distaff are the most ancient of all the instruments used for spinning, or making thread.

SPIRIT (Heb. rûaḥ, "breath, wind"; Gk. pneuma, "wind, breath," the "vital principle," etc.). A term used in the Scriptures generally to denote purely spiritual beings; also the spiritual, immortal part in man. Other terms (nepesh; psuchē) refer to the animal soul or life of man, though it seems evident that these words are also used frequently in a broader and deeper sense with reference to man's spiritual nature (e.g., Gen. 2:7; Ps. 42:2; Matt. 10:28; 11:29). See Soul. There are, however, passages (such as 1 Thess. 5:23; Heb. 4:12) that emphasize a distinction between soul and spirit.

The term soul specifies that in the immaterial part of man that concerns life, action, and emotion. Spirit is that part related to worship and divine communion. The two terms are often used interchangeably, the same functions being ascribed to each (cf. John 12:27; 1 Cor. 16:18; 2 Cor. 7:13 with Matt. 11:29; 2 Cor. 7:1 with 1 Pet. 2:11; James 5:20 with 1 Cor. 5:5; 1 Pet. 1:9). The deceased are mentioned both as soul and sometimes as spirit (Gen. 35:18; 1 Kings 17:21; Acts 2:27; with Matt. 27:50; John 19:30; Heb. 12:23). However, soul and spirit are not always employed interchangeably. The soul is said to be lost, for example, but not the spirit. When no technical distinctions are set forth, the Bible is dichotomous, but otherwise it is trichotomous (cf. Matt. 10:28; Acts 2:31; Rom. 8:10; Eph. 4:4; James 2:26; 1 Pet. 2:11). Theologians have pored over these distinctions ceaselessly. The origin of man's immaterial nature is subject to three theories: (1) The creational, maintaining that soul and spirit are created at birth. (2) Traducian. Soul and spirit are generated the same as the body. (3) The soul is preexistent, embracing the idea of transmigration of souls. M.F.U.

SPIRIT, THE HOLY. See The Holy Spirit.

SPIRITIST. The spiritist (Heb. yiddōnî) is properly the "knowing or wise one" as the English word connotes, as well as the LXX "gnostes." Like the "medium" (Heb. ōb), it means in the first instance the alleged "spirit of a deceased person" (actually the divining demon). Then it came to mean him or her who divines by such a spirit or demon. Thus both terms mean (1) the divining spirit, (2) the medium through whom the demon divines. The two concepts, "the medium" and "the spiritist," are frequently so closely identified as to be thought of as one, as in Lev. 19:31; 20:6. The same is true of the term "wizard." Implicit in the meaning "spiritist" is the thought of the wise and knowing demon and the clever and cunning medium, who is skillful in oracular science because the intelligent spirit is in him. It is a superhuman knowledge of the spirit inhabiting the human body that makes a spiritistic medium. See Magic; Sorcery; Necromancer. M.F.U.

SPIRITS, DISCERNING OF. See Discerning of Spirits.

SPIRITUAL GIFTS (Gk. ta pneumatika, the spiritual supply; charismata, "gifts"). A phrase used to denote the endowments bestowed by the Holy Spirit in the primitive church (1 Cor. 12:1), and the same as "gifts" (v. 4). A spiritual gift "means any extraordinary faculty, which operated for the furtherance of the welfare of the Christian community, and which was itself wrought by the grace of God, through the power of the Holy Spirit, in special individuals, in accordance, respectively, with the measure of their individual capacities, whether it were that the Spirit infused entirely new powers, or stimulated those already existing to higher power and activity (Rom. 12:6ff.)" (Meyer, Com., on 1 Cor. 12:1). These gifts included word of wisdom; knowledge; faith; healing; effecting of miracles; prophecy; distinguishing of spirits; tongues; and their interpretation (vv. 8–10). See under various heads.

SPIRITUALITY. The quality of being spiritual, as opposed to material. Thus theology predicates the spirituality of God (see Spirit). The spirituality of man refers to the immaterial part of his nature. The term is also used with reference to the disposition or internal condition of men when in such a state as prepares them to recognize and properly appreciate spiritual realities. True spirituality in the last sense is the result of the inworking of the Holy Spirit (see 1 Cor. 2:14–15; 3:1, 16, etc.). In an ecclesiastical sense the term is used in the Church of England to denote the whole body of the clergy, with reference to the nature of their office.

SPIT, SPITTLE (Heb. from rāqqaq; yāraq, Num. 12:14; Deut. 25:9; Gk. ptusma). A source of legal defilement, e.g., the spittle of a person having an issue defiled the one upon whom it fell (Lev. 15:8). To spit in one's face was regarded as the grossest insult (Num. 12:14; Deut. 25:9; Isa. 50:6; Matt. 26:67; 27:30); indeed, it was a great indignity to spit toward anyone, so that an oriental never allows himself to spit in the presence of one whom he respects. Spittle was employed by our Lord in the cure of the blind man (John 9:6), and the rabbis cite it as a remedy in like cases, especially the spittle of persons who were fasting.

SPLANCHNOMANCY. See Magic.

SPLENDID (Heb. kābūddâ, “magnificent”). In speaking of the ungodly alliance between Judah and Chaldea, Judah is said to have sent ambassadors to Chaldea and, for the purpose of receiving the Chaldeans, adorned herself as a woman would do for the reception of her paramours. She seated herself upon a “splendid couch” (Ezek. 23:41), in front of which was a table on which stood the incense and the oil that she ought to have given to Jehovah. KJV renders this word “stately.”

SPOIL. The rendering of a number of Heb. and Gk. words. Spoil consisted of captives of both sexes, cattle, and whatever a captured city might contain, especially metallic treasures. Within the limits of Canaan no captives were to be made (Deut. 20:14, 16); beyond those limits, in case of warlike resistance, all the women and children were to be made captives and the men put to death. The law of booty was that it should be divided equally between the army who won it and the people of Israel. But of the former, one head in every 500 was reserved to God and appropriated to the priests; of the latter, one in every 50 was similarly reserved and appropriated to the Levites (Num. 31:26–47; cf. 2 Sam. 8:10–11; 1 Chron. 26:27–28). A portion of the spoil was assigned to the oppressed, the aged, widows, and orphans (2 Macc. 8:28, 30). As regarded the army, David added a regulation that the baggage guard should share equally with the troops engaged (1 Sam. 30:24–25). The division of the spoil was a joyous feast for the people (Isa. 9:3).

SPOKE (Heb. hishshūq, “conjoined”). In Heb., a rare term referring to the bars in the hub of a wheel supporting the rim (1 Kings 7:33; NASB, NIV). In the KJV, hishshūq is translated “felloes,” the plural of felly, an old term referring to the exterior rim of a wheel. Cf. Rims; Hub; Nave.

SPONGE. See Animal Kingdom.

SPOONS (Heb. kap; KJV, NASB). In the KJV and sometimes the NASB, containers for incense. The NASB sometimes uses the term pans to refer to these utensils. See Tabernacle of Israel: Furniture.

SPORT. See Jest; Games.

SPOT.

1. A defect or blemish; used in Job 31:7 (KJV, “blot”) to indicate a moral weakness (Heb. mūm). Compare Lev. 21:17–23; 22:20; 24:19–20; Deut. 32:5; 2 Sam. 14:25; Job 11:15; Prov. 9:7; Song of Sol. 4:7.

2. A whitish spot on the skin, the “bright spot” of incipient leprosy (Lev. 13:2–39; 14:56). Heb. baheret.

3. Heb. bōhaq, to be “pale,” “eczema,” not to be confused with leprosy (Lev. 13:39).

4. The mark upon the leopard (Heb. ḥābarbūrâ, “a streak”), or, according to Gesenius, the stripes of the tiger (Jer. 13:23), used as an illustration of the inability of men to rid themselves of evil character.

5. Heb. ṭālā, to cover with “pieces,” spotted, variegated; as “sheep” or “goats” (Gen. 30:32–39; Ezek. 16:16, “various colors”).

6. The Gk. (spilos, “spot”) has also a moral sense of fault (Eph. 5:27); compare Jude 12, KJV. Its negative form (aspilos) means spotless, free from censure (1 Tim. 6:14, “stain”), from vice, and so unsullied (2 Pet. 3:14).

SPOUSE. See Marriage.

SPREADING (Heb. miprās, an “expansion”). “Can anyone understand the spreading of the clouds?” (Job 36:29). Here spreading does not mean bursting, but an expanding. “It is the growth of the storm clouds, which collect often from a beginning ‘small as a man’s hand’ (1 Kings 18:44), that is intended.”

SPRING. A source of water issuing forth from the ground, the same word as “eye” in Heb., ayin (Gen. 16:7; 1 Sam. 29:1; Prov. 8:28), sometimes translated “fountain.” Often the Heb. word used denotes a place of a spring or running water (Lev. 11:36; Josh. 15:9; Ps. 74:15; Prov. 25:26), a well-watered place (Heb. bārākâ, “benediction,” and so “prosperity”; “pools,” KJV; “blessings,” NASB; “springs,” NIV; Ps. 84:6). In Isa. 35:7; 49:10 the original word mabbûa has the idea of a gushing source of water. The Gk. pēgē occurs in Rev. 7:17; 8:10; 14:7; 21:6. In Gen. 16:7; Lev. 11:36; 1 Sam. 29:1; Rev. 7:17; 8:10; 14:7; 21:6, the NASB and NIV use “spring” to replace KJV fountain (which see).

Figurative. The term spring is used in the NASB of the source of grace (Ps. 87:7); of the manifestations of divine grace (Isa. 41:8; Joel 3:18); of the church (Song of Sol. 4:12; Isa. 58:11); the KJV and NIV in all these passages except Isa. 41:8 and Isa. 58:11 is fountain (which see).

SPRINKLING. Instances of sprinkling are given in the Scriptures, namely, with blood (Ex. 29:16, 20–21; Lev. 1:5, 11; etc.); see Sacrifice; with water (Lev. 14:51; Num. 8:7; 19:13, 20; etc.); with oil (Lev. 14:16). See Anointing.

Figurative. “Thus He will sprinkle many nations” (Isa. 52:15) would seem to be a figure setting forth the expiation and purifying of many nations; and then the antithesis would be: Many were astonished; so many (not merely men, but) nations shall be sprinkled. They were amazed that such an abject person claimed to be the Messiah; yet it is He that shall justify and cleanse. Many commentators understand the phrase as meaning “He shall cause many nations to leap with astonishment.” “The figurative expression, ‘to sprinkle with clean water’ (Ezek. 36:25), is taken from the illustrations prescribed by the law, more particularly the purifying from defilement by the dead by sprinkling with the water prepared from the ashes of a red heifer” (Num. 19:17–19; cf. Ps. 51:9). “Having our hearts sprinkled clean from an evil conscience” (Heb. 10:22) is in contrast to mere physical cleansing (9:13, 19; cf. Ex. 24:8; Lev. 8:11). As the OT covenant people were sprinkled with the (cleansing) blood of the sacrifice, so are Christians sprinkled by the blood of Christ and their consciences delivered from the sense of guilt.

SQUAD. In Acts 12:4 it is stated that “four squads of soldiers” guarded Peter (Gk. tetradion; the KJV reads “four quaternions”). It was usual to entrust the custody of captives and prisoners to a guard consisting of four soldiers, two soldiers being confined with the prisoner and two keeping guard outside. In the account in Acts 12:4, one squad at a time stood guard during each of the four successive watches.

STABILITY (Gk. stereōma). That upon which a thing can rest; in Col. 2:5 “stability of your faith” (“firm,” NIV) refers figuratively, in a military sense, to a solid front. See also Steadfastness, which is the KJV rendering.

STA´CHYS (sta´kis; an “ear,” i.e., of grain). A Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent salutations, calling him “my beloved” (Rom. 16:9). According to an old tradition recorded by Niceporus Callistus, he was bishop of Byzantium. He is said by Hippolytus and Dorotheus to have been one of the seventy disciples.

STACTE. See Vegetable Kingdom.

STADIA. See Metrology: Furlong.

STAFF (Heb. matteh, “branch”; Ex. 4:2; 7:9; 1 Sam. 14:27, 43). In the case of Moses and Aaron, the staff, although belonging to Moses, was employed by Aaron in performing miracles. It was also called “the staff of God” (Ex. 4:20; 17:9), probably because through it Jehovah wrought such wonders. See Rod.

STAFF (Heb. matteh, maqḡel, shēbet; Gk. hrabdos; all meaning a “stick”). Rods and staffs were employed for various purposes by the ancients, as is common with us. They were used by old and infirm persons for support or defense (Ex. 21:19; Zech. 8:4), also by travelers (Gen. 32:10; Ex. 12:11; 2 Kings 4:29; Matt. 10:10). A staff, like a seal, was a sign of rank (Gen. 38:18, 25), sometimes inscribed with the owner’s name; also a badge of office (Ex. 4:2–4; Num. 20:8–11; etc.). The staff of the shepherd was used to aid in climbing hills, beating bushes and low brush in which the flock strayed, and where snakes and reptiles abounded.

STAG. The NIV translation of Heb. ayyal, usually rendered “fallow deer.” See Animal Kingdom: Hart; Fallow Deer.

STAIR (Heb. usually ma-āleh, or ma-ālā, an “ascent”; lūl, a winding stair, 1 Kings 6:8). See related KJV usages in Song of Sol. 2:14; Ezek. 38:20. The stairs probably ran around the inside of the quadrangle of the house, as they do still, e.g., in the ruin called “the house of Zaccheus” at Jericho. Regarding the meaning of 2 Kings 9:13, see Jehu.

STAKE (Heb. yātēd, a “peg”). A peg or nail, and often so rendered; especially a tent pin (Isa. 33:20). The idea of continuance and permanency is figured by a tent that is not moved or its pegs drawn. The enlargement and strengthening of Zion is illustrated by a tent, the inside space of which is widened, and the tent pins driven deeper into the ground.

STALL. The rendering of Heb. and Gk. words signifying a stable or cattle (Amos 6:4; Mal. 4:2). “Stalls” is used in the sense of pairs, as of horses (1 Kings 4:26; 2 Chron. 9:25). The expression “And there be no cattle in the stalls” (Hab. 3:17) is used to denote calamity, disaster. Stables containing stalls for horses have been excavated at Megiddo.

STAMMERER (Heb. āllēg, a “stutterer,” Isa. 32:4; lā-ag, properly, to “speak unintelligibly,” 28:11; 33:19). To mock or deride.

STANDARD. The rendering of two Heb. words. The standards in use among the Hebrews probably resembled those of the Egyptians and Assyrians—a figure or device of some kind elevated on a pole. (1) The Heb. nēs consisted of some well-understood signal that was exhibited on the top of a pole from a bare mountaintop (Isa. 13:2; 18:3; “banner,” NIV). What the nature of the signal was, we have no means of knowing. The important point is that the nēs was an occasional signal and not a military standard. In Num. 21:8–9 this word is used of the standard (“pole,” KJV, NIV) upon which the bronze serpent was placed. (2) The Heb. term degel is used to describe the standards that were given to each of the four divisions of the Israelite army at the time of the Exodus (Num. 1:52; 2:2–3, 10, 17–18, 25, 31, 34; 10:14, 18, 22, 25). The character of the Hebrew military standards is a matter of conjecture; they probably resembled the Egyptian, which consisted of a sacred emblem such as an animal, a boat, or the king's name.

Figurative. It was customary to give a defeated party a standard as a token of protection, and that was regarded as the surest pledge of fidelity. God's lifting or setting up a standard (Isa. 11:12) is a most expressive figure and implies a peculiar presence, protection, and aid in leading and directing His people in the execution of His righteous will and giving them comfort and peace in His service.

STAR (Heb. kôkâb, "round" or "shining"; Gk. astēr).

1. Under the term stars the Hebrews included constellations, planets, indeed all the heavenly bodies except the sun and moon. In fact, the ancient Hebrews knew very little of the starry heavens, and no indications are given in Scripture of scientific astronomy (which see). We find there only the ordinary observations of landsmen (Job 38:31–33; Amos 5:8), especially shepherds (Ps. 8:3).

Figurative. The patriarchs observed the stars (Gen. 37:9); and metaphors drawn from the starry world, either with reference to the countless number of the stars (22:17; Ex. 32:13; Nah. 3:16; etc.) or to their brightness (Num. 24:17; Isa. 14:12; Rev. 22:16) came into frequent and early use. The psalmist, to exalt the power and omniscience of Jehovah, represents Him as taking a survey of the stars, as a king reviewing his army (Ps. 147:4). Stars were frequently employed as symbols of persons in exalted stations; e.g., "a star shall come forth from Jacob" designates King David (Num. 24:17), applied by some to the Messiah. The patriarchs were called "stars" (Gen. 37:9), and "stars" denote the princes, rulers, and nobles of the earth (Dan. 8:10; Rev. 6:13; 8:10–12; 9:1; 12:4). Christ is called the "morning star," as He introduced the light of gospel day, revealing more fully the truths of God than the ancient prophets (Rev. 22:16). The study of the stars led to their worship (see Idolatry) and to calculations of human affairs (see Astrology).

2. A star in the east (Matt. 2:2) was seen by the wise men (magi) before their journey to Jerusalem and as they approached Bethlehem. After ascertaining at what time they first observed the star, Herod sent them to Bethlehem, with the request to inform him when they found the child. As they left Jerusalem, the star that had attracted their attention at its "rising" (Gk. anatolē), and that, apparently, they had not recently seen, once more appeared. In ancient times such guidance by a star was a matter of belief and expectancy; and "they rejoiced exceedingly with great joy."

This phenomenon has been generally understood to be some supernatural light resembling a star, that appeared in a country far to the E of Jerusalem, to men who were versed in the study of celestial phenomena; and that it conveyed to their minds an impulse to travel to Jerusalem to find a newborn king. However, by some scholars the star has been removed from the category of supernatural events and has been thought to be a conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn. See Astronomy.

STARGAZER. See Magic.

STATER. See Metrology: Measures of Value, or Money.

STATURE (Gk. hēlikos, lit., "how much?"). "Stature" in Eph. 4:13 is the age suitable for anything; figuratively of an attained state of mind fit for a thing, and so the age in which we are fitted to receive the fullness of Christ.

"Stature" in Matt. 6:27, KJV is more correctly rendered by the NASB "life's span." See also Height.

STEADFASTNESS. Stērigmos (2 Pet. 3:17), in the usual sense of stability (which see).

STEEL. See Metals; Mineral Kingdom: Iron.

STENCH. See Abomination.

STEPH´ANAS (stef´a-nas; “crown”). A Corinthian disciple whose household Paul baptized (1 Cor. 1:16), being the first converted to Christianity in Achaia, and one of those who “devoted themselves for ministry to the saints” (16:15). About the form that this ministry took, we have no precise information. He appears to have been with Paul when he wrote his first letter to the Corinthians (16:17).

STE´PHEN (stē´ven; Gk. Stephanos, a “crown”). Stephen, as his Greek name indicates, was probably of Hellenistic origin. Where or when he was born, however, we have no means of ascertaining.

Deacon. The first authentic account we have of Stephen is in Acts 6:5. In the distribution of the common fund that was entrusted to the apostles for the support of the poorer brethren, the Hellenists complained that partiality was shown to the natives of Palestine and that their own widows were neglected. The apostles took measures immediately to remove the cause of the complaint. Unwilling themselves to be taken from the work of the ministry, they advised the church to select seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Spirit and wisdom, for this business (v. 3). The brethren proceeded immediately to select the prescribed number, among whom Stephen is first mentioned. The newly elected deacons were brought to the apostles, who ordained them to their work (v. 6). From the first Stephen occupied a prominent position. He is described as “a man full of faith and of the Holy Spirit” (v. 5), “full of grace and power” (v. 8), and of irresistible “wisdom and the Spirit” (v. 10). He attracted attention by the great wonders and miracles that he did among the people.

Teaching. From his foreign descent and education, he was naturally led to address himself to the Hellenistic Jews. In these disputations he probably took more advanced grounds than the apostles had respecting the discontinuance and abrogation of the Mosaic system, contending that already it had, as a ritual system, lost all force and binding obligation by its complete fulfillment in Christ. Certain adherents of several synagogues were leaders in the disputation with Stephen.

Arrest. Unable to withstand his reasoning, they caused his arrest and appeared against him before the Sanhedrin with false witnesses. The charge against him was blasphemy, in speaking “against this holy place, and the Law” (v. 13). Stephen doubtless saw that he was to be the victim of a blind and malignant spirit. Yet he stood serene, collected, and undismayed. “All who were sitting in the Council saw his face like the face of an angel” (v. 15), from which we may not unreasonably conclude that it pleased God to manifest His approval of His servant by giving his countenance a supernatural brightness, such as that with which the face of Moses shone when he had been speaking with the Lord.

Defense. The high priest who presided asked the judicial question, “Are these things so?” To this Stephen replied in a speech that has every appearance of being faithfully reported. He began with the call of Abraham and traveled historically in his argument through all the stages of their national existence, evidently designing to prove that the presence and favor of God had not been confined to the Holy Land or the Temple of Jerusalem. He also showed that there was a tendency from the earliest times toward the same ungrateful and narrow spirit that had appeared in this last stage of their political existence. He then suddenly broke away from his narrative and denounced them as “stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears” and as “always resisting the Holy Spirit” (7:51). The effect upon his hearers was terrible; “they were cut to the quick, and they began gnashing their teeth at him.” On the other hand Stephen, filled with the Holy Spirit, was granted a vision of the glory of God, and Jesus at His right hand, risen to welcome his spirit as it should escape his mangled body and to introduce him into the presence of God the Father.

Martyrdom. Enraptured, he exclaimed, “Behold, I see the heavens opened up and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God.” The fate of Stephen was settled, for his judges broke into a loud yell, stopped their ears, ran upon him with one accord, and dragged him out of the city to the place of execution. Saul was present and consented to his death. In striking contrast to the fearful rage of his enemies was the spirit shown by Stephen. First offering a petition for himself, he then prayed, “Lord, do not hold this sin against them,” and, in the beautiful language of Scripture, “fell asleep” (7:60). “Devout men buried Stephen, and made loud lamentation over him” (8:2), A.D. 34.

Irregularities in the Trial. The trial of Stephen appears to have been irregular, and the judicial act was not completed. There are, indeed, the witnesses and part of the prisoner’s defense; and here the legal action stops. The high priest does not, as in our Lord’s trial, ask the opinion of the council and then deliver sentence in accordance with their views. The whole proceedings broke up with a tumult at what they deemed blasphemy by Stephen.

Saul Consenting. The witnesses against Stephen acted as his executioners (Deut. 17:7; John 8:7) and laid their outer garments for safety at the feet of Saul. One of the prominent leaders in the transaction was deputed by custom to signify his assent to the act by taking the clothes into his custody.

STEWARD (usually Heb. śar, “head” person; Gk. epitropos, “manager”; oikonomos, “overseer”). A manager or superintendent of another’s household, as Eliezer was over the house of Abraham (cf. Gen. 15:2). We read of Joseph’s steward (43:19; 44:1, 4) and of Herod’s steward (Luke 8:3; “manager,” NIV). As great confidence was reposed in these officials, Paul describes Christian ministers as the stewards of God over His church (1 Cor. 4:1–2; “those given a trust,” NIV). Believers are also said to be stewards of God, of God’s gifts and graces (1 Pet. 4:10).

STICK (Heb. qešep, a “splinter”). The original word is rendered “stick” in Hos. 10:7: “Samaria will be cut off with her king, like a stick on the surface of the water.” It means a broken branch, a fagot, or splinter. The NIV renders “twig.”

STINKWEED. See Vegetable Kingdom.

STOCK. The KJV rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words, meaning: the stump (Job 14:8); the trunk of a tree (Isa. 44:19; “block,” NIV); a tree or piece of wood (Jer. 2:27; 10:8); a family or nation (Acts 13:26; Phil. 3:5).

STOCKS. The term stocks is used frequently in the Bible to refer to confinement of prisoners and once in the KJV to refer to idol worship.

1. Heb. mahpeket, “wrench”; Jer. 20:2–3; cf. 2 Chron. 16:10, marg., “the house of the stocks,” a wooden frame in which the feet, hands, and neck of a person were so fastened that his body was held in a bent position.

2. The block or log of wood in which the feet of a criminal are fastened and which he must drag about with him when he moves (Job 13:27; 33:11; “shackle,” NIV), Heb. sad. (Cf. Prov. 7:22, KJV, which NASB renders “fettters,” and NIV, “noose” [Heb. ekes].)

3. A prison; or, better, stocks proper, or some other confinement for the feet (Jer. 29:26), Heb. šinōq. Orelli (Com., ad loc.) thinks that the šinōq was a kind of neck iron (cf. Arab. zinak, neck chain).

4. Gk. xulon, “wood,” a log with holes in which the feet, hands, and neck of prisoners were inserted and fastened with thongs (Acts 16:24).

5. In Hos. 4:12, the KJV term stocks refers to an object of worship, as the NASB and NIV rendering “wooden idol” shows.

STOICS (stō'iks). The Stoics and Epicureans, who are mentioned together in Acts 17:18, represent the two opposite schools of practical philosophy that survived the fall of higher speculation in Greece. The Stoic school was founded by Zeno of Citium (about 280 B.C.) and derived its name from the painted “portico” (stoa) in which he taught. Zeno was followed by Cleanthes (about 260 B.C.), Cleanthes by Chrysippus (about 240 B.C.), who was regarded as the intellectual founder of the Stoic system. Stoicism soon found an entrance at Rome, and under the empire Stoicism was not unnaturally connected with republican virtue. The ethical system of the Stoics has been commonly supposed to have a close connection with Christian morality. But the morality of Stoicism is essentially based on pride, that of Christianity on humility; the one upholds individual independence, the other absolute faith in another; the one looks for consolation in the issue of fate, the other in Providence; the one is limited by periods of cosmical ruin, the other is consummated in a personal resurrection (Smith, Dict.).

STONE (usually Heb. ḥeben; Gk. lithos).

Kinds. The ordinary stones mentioned as found in Palestine (which see) are chiefly chalk stone (Isa. 27:9), marble, and sandstone; basalt (Josephus Ant. 8.7.4); flint and firestone (2 Macc. 10:3).

Uses. Stones were applied in ancient Palestine to many uses:

1. They were used for the ordinary purposes of building, and in this respect the most noticeable point is the very large size to which they occasionally run (Mark 13:1). Robinson gives the dimensions of one as twenty-four feet long by six feet broad and three feet high. For most public edifices hewn stone was used; an exception was made in regard to altars (Ex. 20:25; Deut. 27:5; Josh. 8:31). The Phoenicians were particularly famous for their skill in hewing stone (2 Sam. 5:11; 1 Kings 5:18). Stones were selected of certain colors in order to form ornamental stringcourses (1 Chron. 29:2). They were also used for pavements (2 Kings 16:17; cf. Esther 1:6).

2. Large stones were used for closing the entrances of caves (Josh. 10:18; Dan. 6:17), sepulchers (Matt. 27:60; John 11:38; 20:1), and springs (Gen. 29:2).

3. Flint stones (Heb. ḥûr, or ḥôr), occasionally were used instead of a knife, particularly for circumcision and similar purposes (Ex. 4:25; Josh. 5:2, 3).

4. Stones were further used as ammunition for slings (1 Sam. 17:40, 49), catapults (2 Chron. 26:14), and bows (Wisd. 5:22; cf. 1 Macc. 6:51); and as boundary marks (cf. Deut. 19:14; 27:17; Job 24:2; Prov. 22:28; 23:10); such were probably the stone of Bohan (Josh. 15:6; 18:17), of Abel (1 Sam. 6:15, 18), the stone Ezel (20:19), the great stone by Gibeon (2 Sam. 20:8), and the stone of Zoheleth (1 Kings 1:9); also as weights for scales (Deut. 25:13; Prov. 16:11, see marg.), and for mills (2 Sam. 11:21).

5. Large stones were set up to commemorate any remarkable event (Gen. 28:18; 31:45; 35:14; Josh. 4:9; 1 Sam. 7:12). Such stones were occasionally consecrated by anointing (Gen. 28:18). A similar practice existed in heathen countries, and by a singular coincidence these stones were described in Phoenicia by a name very similar to Bethel, namely, baetylia. The only point of resemblance between the two consists in the custom of anointing.

6. That the worship of stones prevailed among the heathen nations surrounding Palestine, and was from them borrowed by apostate Israelites, appears from Isa. 57:6 (cf. Lev. 26:1). “The smooth stones of the ravine” are those that the stream has washed smooth with time and rounded into a pleasing shape. “In Carthage such stones were called abbadires; and among the ancient Arabs the asnâm, or idols, consisted for the most part of rude blocks of stone of this description.... Stone worship of this kind had been practiced by the Israelites before the captivity, and their heathenish practices had been transmitted to the exiles in Babylon” (Delitzsch, Com., ad loc.).

7. Heaps of stones were piled up on various occasions; the making of a treaty (Gen. 31:46); over the grave of a notorious offender (Josh. 7:26; 8:29; 2 Sam. 18:17); such heaps often attained great size from the custom of each passerby’s adding a stone.

8. Stones were used for tablets (Ex. 24:12; Josh. 8:32) and guide stones to the cities of refuge (which see).

9. “A time to throw stones, and a time to gather stones” (Eccles. 3:5) seems to refer to the custom of spoiling an enemy’s field by throwing stones upon it (2 Kings 3:19, 25); and the clearing of a field of stones preparatory to its cultivation (Isa. 5:2).

Figurative. Stones are used figuratively to denote hardness or insensibility (1 Sam. 25:37; Ezek. 11:19; 36:26), or firmness, strength (Gen. 49:24), where “the Stone of Israel” is equivalent to “the Rock of Israel” (2 Sam. 23:3; Isa. 30:29). Christians are called “living stones,” i.e., not like the inanimate things of the material Temple, but living men built up on Christ, the living and chief cornerstone. “I will make Jerusalem a heavy stone for all the peoples” (Zech. 12:3) may be a figure founded upon the labor connected with building, the heavy stones of which hurt those who attempt to carry them away. The “white stone” (Rev. 2:17) has been understood as referring to the pebble of acquittal used in the Greek courts; to the lot cast in elections in Greece; to the white stone given to victors at the Grecian games; and to the stones of hospitality usual in ancient times, a “sort of carte blanche, entitling the person who showed it to ask for and receive what he might want.” Precious stones (which see) are used in Scripture in a figurative sense to signify value, beauty, durability, etc., in those objects with which they are compared (see Song of Sol. 5:14; Isa. 54:11–12; Lam. 4:7; Rev. 4:3; 21:11, 21). See Stone.

STORAGE CITY (Ex. 1:11; 1 Kings 9:19; 2 Chron. 8:4, 6; “store cities,” 16:4; 17:12; “storehouse,” 32:28), a place of deposit for merchandise and provisions. See also City, Storage.

STORAX. See Vegetable Kingdom: Myrrh; Poplar; Stacte.

STORE. In Deut. 28:5, 17, the KJV uses this term in place of NASB and NIV “kneading bowl.”

STOREHOUSE. The rendering of several original terms, meaning a treasury (1 Chron. 27:25; Ps. 33:7; Mal. 3:10, as elsewhere rendered); a receptacle for provisions (cf. Deut. 28:8; Prov. 3:10; “barns”), usually underground in the East; a granary (Jer. 50:26; cf. Ex. 1:11; Luke 12:24). The Egyptians had storehouses for stuffs and jewels, gold, preserved fruits, grain, liquors, armor, provisions, etc. Their grain storehouses had only two openings, one at the top for pouring in the grain, another on the ground level for drawing it out. For the security and management of these, troops of porters, storekeepers, and accountants were employed to superintend the works, record keepers, and directors. Great nobles coveted the administration of the storehouses, and even the sons of kings did not think it beneath their dignity to be entitled “directors of the granaries” or “directors of the armory.”

STORK. See Animal Kingdom.

STRAIGHT STREET. One of the ancient thoroughfares of Damascus, on which was located the house of Judas, where Paul was visited by Ananias (Acts 9:11). It still retains the same name in an Arabic form (Derb el-Mustakim), running westward from the Bab es-Shurky, or East Gate. Its length was about one English mile, and its breadth about one hundred feet. It is not quite straight now, nor is its architecture imposing.

STRAIN. See Gnat, in Animal Kingdom.

STRANGER. See Foreigner.

STRANGE WOMAN. See Harlot, Whore.

STRANGLE (Heb. hānaq, to “choke”; Gk. pnigō). It was forbidden by Moses, and also by the early Christians, to eat animals put to death by strangulation, i.e., not having the blood properly removed (Gen. 9:4; Acts 15:20).

STRAW (Heb. teben; Jer. 23:28; Job 21:18). Both wheat and barley straw were used by the ancient Hebrews, chiefly as fodder for their horses, cattle, and camels (Gen. 24:25; 1 Kings 4:28; Isa. 11:7; 65:25, 1 Cor. 3:12). There is no intimation that straw was used for litter. It was employed by the Egyptians for making bricks (Ex. 5:7, 16), being chopped up and mixed with the clay to make them more compact and to prevent their cracking. This is abundantly illustrated by archaeology. The ancient Egyptians reaped their grain close to the ear, and afterward cut the straw close to the ground and stored it. Pharaoh refused to give this straw to the Israelites. See Vegetable Kingdom.

STREAM OF EGYPT. This term occurs once in the KJV (Isa. 27:12) instead of “the river of Egypt” Num. 34:5; Josh. 15:4, 47; etc.; KJV; “brook of Egypt,” NASB; “Wadi of Egypt,” NIV. See Brook; River of Egypt.

STREET (Gk. hrumē, Luke 14:21). Often a narrow lane or passage in a town, shut in by buildings on both sides (Matt. 6:2; Acts 9:11; 12:10).

STRIKER. KJV term used in 1 Tim. 3:3; Titus 1:7 of a contentious, quarrelsome person. NASB renders this “pugnacious,” and NIV, “violent.”

STRINGED INSTRUMENTS. See Music.

STRIPES. See Punishment.

STROKE (Gk. keraiōn, a “little horn, extremity, point”; KJV, “tittle”), used by Greek grammarians of the accents and diacritical points. In Matt. 5:18; Luke 16:17 it means the little lines or projections by which the Heb. letters, in other respects similar, differ from each other, as ך and ך, ך and ך, ך and ך. The meaning is that not even the minutest part of the law shall perish.

STRONG DRINK. See Drink, Strong.

STRONGHOLD (“fortress,” as often rendered). A term especially applied to David’s hiding places (1 Sam. 22:4–5; 24:22; etc.).

STUBBLE.

1. The dry portion of grain left standing in the fields (Ex. 5:12) and then burned over (Isa. 5:24; Joel 2:5; etc.); or broken up by threshing and separated from the grain (Isa. 40:24; etc.). Heb. qash.

2. A KJV rendering (Job 21:18; 1 Cor. 3:12) that is more properly “straw.” See Vegetable Kingdom: Straw.

STUMBLING, STUMBLING BLOCK or Stone.

1. Heb. mikshōl, “obstacle,” is used as any object over which a person may trip, and hence the cause of ruin or disgust (Jer. 6:21; Ezek. 7:19; etc.), or an idol (Zeph. 1:3, see marg.), i.e., an incitement to apostasy.

2. Heb. negep, “tripping,” a cause of stumbling (Isa. 8:14). Notice the heaping together of synonyms, especially in v. 15.

3. Gk. proskomma, an obstacle against which, if one strikes his foot, he necessarily falls; figuratively, that over which the soul stumbles into sin (1 Cor. 8:9). To put a stumbling block in another’s way is, figuratively, to furnish an occasion for sinning (Rom. 14:13). “Stumbling stone” is used figuratively of Jesus Christ. It especially annoyed and offended the Jews that His words and deeds, and particularly His ignominious death, failed to correspond to their preconceptions respecting the Messiah (Rom. 9:32–33; 1 Pet. 2:8).

STUMP (Heb. iqqar). The stump of a tree cut down but able to sprout again (Dan. 4:15, 23, 26). Stump is used in KJV text of 1 Sam. 5:4. See Trunk.

SU’AH (sū’a; “sweepings”). The first mentioned of eleven sons or descendants of Zophah, one of the “heads” of the house of Asher (1 Chron. 7:36).

SUBURBS. See Pasturelands; Levitical Cities.

SU’CATHITE (sū’kath-it). A descendant probably of an unknown Israelite by the name of Sucah, and the last named of the families of scribes living at Jabez (1 Chron. 2:55).

SUC’COTH (suk’oth; “booths”).

1. An ancient town in Palestine, and the place where Jacob built booths for his cattle and a house for himself after separating from Esau (Gen. 33:17; Josh. 13:27). The bronze foundries for making the fine work for the Temple were built here (1 Kings 7:46; 2 Chron. 4:17). Here Gideon met with opposition when pursuing the Midianites (Judg. 8:5, 8, 14–16). The place is referred to in Pss. 60:6; 108:7. The site is now located by some at Tell Ahşaş, a mile or more N of the Jabbok (Nahr ez-Zerqa), about nine miles NE of Damiyeh.

2. The first encampment of Israel after leaving Rameses (Ex. 12:37). It was the name of a district or region, and not a city. “It is not necessary to suppose that all the Israelites reached Succoth on the day of their hurried start from their homes in Rameses-Goshen.... Brugsch argues strongly for the correspondence of the Egyptian Thuku with the Hebrew Succoth. As to the location of the Egyptian Thuku, it is shown by the monuments that Pi-tum (the House of [the god] Tum), the Pithom of the Bible text, was the chief city of the district of Thuku. However, more recently Succoth has been identified with Tell el-Maskhutih.”

SUC’COTH-BE’NOTH. See Gods, False.

SUK’KIIM (suk’i-im). A race mentioned only in 2 Chron. 12:3 as associated with the Lubim (which see) and the Ethiopians in the army with which Shishak invaded Judah in the days of Rehoboam.

Gesenius, connecting the name with sūkkâ (a booth or tent), thought them “dwellers in tents,” in which case they might be an Arab tribe, like the Scenitae.

According to the LXX they were Troglodytes. This name, from trōglē, a hole, and duō, to enter, corresponds fairly well with our “cave dwellers.” It was given to various races, especially to a race inhabiting both shores of the Red Sea; their territory on the eastern side was SE of Syene and NE of Meroe. Their dwellings have been compared with the catacombs of Naples. Some of these Troglodytes were serpent eaters, but most were herdsmen. Their language seemed to the Greeks a “shriek or whistle” rather than an articulate speech. Their food was principally animal; their drink was a mixture of blood and milk. They were so fleet of foot as to be able to run down the animals that they hunted. They served as light-armed soldiers in the army of Xerxes, 480 B.C. Aristotle “describes the Troglodytae as pygmies who, mounted on their horses, waged incessant war with the cranes in the Ethiopian marshes.” The Ababdeh of the Troglodytic region and the Barnagas on the Abyssinian frontier are said to resemble the Troglodytes in manners and customs.

It is said that no hieroglyphic name has been found resembling the name Sukkiim. This would favor the Arabian theory. W.H.; M.F.U.

SUMER. See Shinar.

SUMMER (Heb. qayis, “harvest” of fruits, 2 Sam. 16:1, 2; etc.). See Agriculture; Palestine.

SUN (Heb. shemesh). Called in the history of the creation the “greater light” in contradistinction to the moon or “lesser light,” in conjunction with which it was to serve “for signs, and for seasons, and for days and years”; its special office was “to govern the day” (Gen. 1:14–16). The “signs” referred to were probably such extraordinary phenomena as eclipses, which were regarded as conveying premonitions of coming events (cf. Jer. 10:2; Matt. 24:29, with Luke 21:25).

Sunrise and sunset are the only defined points of time in the absence of artificial contrivances for telling the hour of the day. Between these two points the Jews recognized three periods: when the sun became hot, about 9 A.M. (1 Sam. 11:9; Neh. 7:3); the double light or noon (Gen. 43:16; 2 Sam. 4:5); and “the cool of the day,” shortly before sunset (Gen. 3:8). The sun also served to fix the quarters of the hemisphere, E, W, N, and S, which were represented respectively by the rising sun, the setting sun (Isa. 45:6; Ps. 50:1), the dark quarter (Gen. 13:14; Joel 2:20), and the brilliant quarter (Deut. 33:23; Job 37:17; Ezek. 40:24); or otherwise by their position relative to a person facing the rising sun—before, behind, on the left hand, and on the right hand (Job 23:8–9).

The apparent motion of the sun is frequently referred to in terms that would imply its reality (Josh. 10:13; 2 Kings 20:11; Ps. 19:6; Eccles. 1:5; Hab. 3:11).

Figurative. Of God’s favor (Ps. 84:11); of the work of God (19:1–6); Christ’s coming (Mal. 4:2); of the glory of Christ (Matt. 17:2; Rev. 1:16; 10:1); of supreme rulers (Gen. 37:9; Isa. 13:10); (its clearness) of the purity of the church (Song of Sol. 6:10); (its brightness) of the future glory of saints (cf. Dan. 12:3, with Matt. 13:43); (its power) of the triumph of saints (Judg. 5:31); (darkened) of severe calamities (Ezek. 32:7; Joel 2:10, 31; Matt. 24:29; Rev. 9:2); (going down at noon) of premature destruction (Jer. 15:9; Amos 8:9); (no more going down) of perpetual blessedness (Isa. 60:20); (before or in sight of) of public ignominy (2 Sam. 12:11–12; Jer. 8:2); of the Person of the Savior (John 1:9; Mal. 4:2); and of the glory and purity of heavenly beings (Rev. 1:16; 10:1; 12:1).

SUN, WORSHIP OF. The worship of the sun as the most prominent and powerful agent in the kingdom of nature was widely diffused throughout the countries adjacent to Palestine. The Arabs appear to have paid direct worship to it, without the intervention of any statue or symbol (Job 31:26–27), and this simple style of worship was probably familiar to the ancestors of the Jews in Chaldea and Mesopotamia. The Hebrews must have been well acquainted with the idolatrous worship of the sun during their captivity in Egypt, both from the nearness of On, the chief seat of the worship of the sun, as implied by another name for the city, Heliopolis (Gk. for “sun city,” and the equivalent of Heb. bêt shemesh, “sun temple,” or “house of the sun”; see Jer. 43:13, where bêt shemesh is given as “Beth-shemesh” in the KJV, as “Heliopolis” in the NASB, and as “temple of the sun” in the NIV), and also from the connection between Joseph and Potiphera ('he who belongs to Re'), the priest of On (Gen. 41:45). After their removal to Canaan the Hebrews came in contact with various forms of idolatry that originated in the worship of the sun, such as the Baal of the Phoenicians, the Molech or Milcom of the Ammonites, and the Hadad of the Syrians. It does not follow that the object symbolized by them was known to the Jews themselves. Hebrews at times became contaminated with the worship of sun images (Lev. 26:30; Isa. 17:8, see marg.). The great sun-god of the ancient Middle East was Shamash. Pharaoh Ikhnaton (c. 1380 B.C.) of the Eighteenth Dynasty abolished all images and pictured Aton, the world-creator and universal ruler, as the sun disc whose rays converged in small hands, dispensing blessings. Ezekiel mentions among many abominations "still greater abomination" (Ezek. 8:15-16). This was the worship of the sun in the portico of the Temple that faced eastward. Says Albright, "It may have been precisely Ezekiel's zeal for pure monotheism which led him to consider this practice as relatively worse than the others." M.F.U.

SUNDAY, or Lord's Day.

Name and Change of the Day. Sunday is the first day of the week, adopted by the first Christians from the Roman calendar (Lat. Dies Solis, Day of the Sun), because it was dedicated to the worship of the sun. The Christians reinterpreted the heathen name as implying the "Sun of Righteousness," with reference to this rising (Mal. 4:2). It was also called Dies Panis (Day of Bread), because it was an early custom to break bread on that day. In The Teaching of the Twelve it is called the "Lord's Day of the Lord" (Kuriakēn de Kuriou).

Jewish Christians at first continued to frequent the Temple and synagogue services, but at a very early date "the first day of the week" took the place of the Jewish Sabbath as the chief time of public worship (Acts 20:7; 1 Cor. 16:2) in many of the churches of Jewish Christians. It was the day of the resurrection of Christ, of most of His appearances to the disciples after the resurrection, and on this day the Holy Spirit was poured out at Pentecost. For these reasons, and especially after the destruction of Jerusalem had rendered the sacrificial service of the Temple impossible, Sunday became the recognized day of assembly for fellowship and for the celebration of the Lord's Supper. The Jewish Christians at first observed both the seventh and the first day of the week, but the Gentile Christians kept the "Lord's Day" from the beginning. The relation of the seventh to the first, as understood by the Jewish Christians, may not be easy to determine; yet there seem to be indications that the seventh was regarded as a day of preparation for the first. The idea of Christian worship would attach mainly to the one; the obligation of rest would continue attached to the other; although a certain interchange of characteristics would grow up, as worship necessitated rest, and rest naturally suggested worship.

In his letter to the Magnesians, Ignatius evidently addressed a church of mixed character, since he spoke of some "who were brought up in the ancient order of things," who "have come to the possession of a new hope, no longer observing the Sabbath, but living in the observance of the Lord's Day," etc.

"There is neither in this writer nor in the Barnabas epistle an intimation that Sunday was regarded as in any way a substitute for the Jewish Sabbath, nor yet a continuation of it; rather it was a new institution. It is, however, impossible to determine the time of its beginning; no impressive enactment, like that in the case of the Decalogue, was needed.... Not until the 4th century do we find a statement intimating that the Jewish Sabbath, with its sanctions and duties, was transferred to the first, or the Lord's Day.... The observance of the Jewish Sabbath in the churches of the Jewish Christians continued for the first five centuries. In the East both days were celebrated with rejoicing; in the West the Jewish Sabbath was observed as a fast.

"The reign of Constantine marks a change in the relations of the people to the Lord's Day. The [decree] of the emperor, commanding the observance of Sunday, seems to have had little regard for its sanctity as a Christian institution; but the day of the sun is to be generally regarded with veneration.... Later enactments made plain the duties of civil and ecclesiastical officers respecting the observance of Sunday, until it takes its place as an institution to be guarded and regulated by the government."

Sanctity and Ground of Observance. "The resurrection of Christ was the one all-sufficient fact which accounts for the rise and growth of the Christian Church. 'Jesus and the resurrection' was the burden of the apostolic preaching. Hence the recollection of the day of the resurrection was so indelibly impressed upon the hearts of the first disciples that on its return they came together to pray and to recall the memory of the Lord by breaking of bread and the celebration of the eucharist. It was the dictate of the glowing love for Christ, whose followers they delighted to be reckoned.... We fail to find the slightest trace of a law or apostolic edict instituting the observance of the 'day of the Lord'; nor is there in the Scriptures an intimation of a substitution of this for the Jewish Sabbath. The primal idea of the Jewish Sabbath was cessation of labor, rest; the transference of this idea to the first day of the week does not appear in the teachings of Christ nor of his apostles. Nor in the Council of Jerusalem, when the most important decisions are reached relative to the ground of union of Jewish and Gentile Christians, is one word found respecting the observance of the Sabbath. Contrariwise, Paul distinctly warns against the imposition of burdens upon the Church respecting days, but declares for a conscientious freedom in these observances. 'Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind' (Rom. 14:5-6). Still more strongly does he upbraid the Galatian church for putting itself again in bondage to the weak and beggarly elements, as days, months, times, and years; while in his letter to the Colossians (2:16, 17) he speaks of the entire abolition of the Jewish Sabbath."

Justin Martyr, in his dialogue with the Jew Trypho, who taunts the Christians with having no festivals nor Sabbaths, clearly claims that Sunday is to them a new Sabbath and that the entire Mosaic law has been abrogated (Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, chaps. 10-11). The new law binding upon Christians regards every day as a Sabbath, instead of passing one day in rest or absolute idleness.

"With respect to the strictness with which the first day of the week was observed during the first three centuries, the following facts are important to notice: Between the death of the apostles and the edict of Milan, the Lord's Day was sanctified by a Church unrecognized by the State and exposed to opposition and sometimes to bitter persecution. The motive for its observance was, therefore, purely moral and religious. The social position of the early Church, drawing its members for the most part from the poorer artisans, traders, and slaves, forbade the strict and general keeping of the Lord's Day, much more of both the Sabbath and Sunday. Thus the universal hallowing of the day of the resurrection was impossible" (Bennett, Christian Archaeology, pp. 444ff.).

Legal Observance. In the midst of the corrupt influence of heathenism and the growing indifference of the church, it was thought necessary to bring some stress of authority upon the Christian conscience to hold it to the faithful observance of the first day, as the Jews had known the power of a positive enactment in keeping them steadfast in the hallowing of their Sabbath. “The constant temptation of the Christians to attend upon the heathen spectacles and festivities could, in the case of such whose piety was low, no longer, as at first, be broken by considerations of the high privileges of Christian worship and of the commemoration of the resurrection of Christ, but the restraints coming from a quasi legal enactment were found to be more and more necessary” (ibid., p. 450).

“The obligation to observe the day does not come from the fourth commandment, but from the apostolic institution of the Lord’s Day. Nevertheless, from the time of the attempts of the emperors to adjust the civil conditions to the recognition of Sunday as the chief religious holiday, the sense of obligation to keep sacred the first day of the week, coming from legal enactment, more and more supplanted the consideration of the high and holy privilege which had animated the Christian Church during the first years of its activity. From the last part of the 6th century the strict legalistic view becomes more and more prominent, and the rulers in State and Church incline to strengthen the civil and conciliatory enactments respecting the Lord’s Day by divine authority, as contained in the fourth commandment” (ibid., p. 451).

SUPERFLUOUS. See Blemish.

SUPERScription. See Inscription.

SUPERSTITION (Gk. deisidaimonia, “reverence for the gods”), a word that Festus, in the presence of Agrippa, the Jewish king, employed ambiguously and cautiously (Acts 25:19, “religion,” (see marg.), so as to leave his own judgment concerning its truth in suspense.

SUPERSTITIOUS. Inaccurate rendering by the KJV in Acts 17:22 of Gk. deisidaimōn, “reverencing the gods.” NASB and NIV here more appropriately use “religious” (with negative connotation).

SUPH (soōf; “reeds”), a word (Deut. 1:1) referred to as meaning the Red Sea; most probably an abbreviation of Yamsuph, or the Red (Reed) Sea.

SU’PHAH (soō’fa; Num. 21:14), also used instead of the Red Sea.

SUPPER. See Banquet; Food; Lord’s Supper.

SUPPLICATION.

1. Heb. tḥinnâ has the meaning of a cry for mercy, prayer (1 Kings 8:28; etc.; 2 Chron. 6:19, 24, 29, 35; Ps. 6:9; 55:1; Dan. 9:20; cf. Josh. 11:20; Ezra 9:8).

2. Heb. hānan, to “incline,” to “be favorably disposed”; and then to implore favor, to entreat (1 Kings 8:33; Ps. 30:8; etc.).

3. Petition (Gk. deēsis, “asking”), in the NT, requests addressed by men to God (James 5:16; 1 Pet. 3:12, “prayer”); joined with proseuchē, “prayer,” i.e., any pious address to God (Phil. 4:6; cf. 1 Tim. 2:1; 5:5). Deēsis is the asking of favor in some special necessity; proseuchē is exercised in all presentation of desires and wishes to God. Trench (Synonyms of the N. T., 2d ser., p. 3) makes this important point of distinction, namely, “that proseuchē is res sacra, a word restricted to sacred uses; it is always prayer to God; deēsis has no such restriction.”

SUR. One of the gates of the palace area of Jerusalem. It is mentioned only once (2 Kings 11:6).

SURETY (from Heb. ḥārab, to “braid, intermix”). A deposit or pledge, either in money, goods, or in part payment, which served as security for a bargain (Gk. egguos). The earliest form of surety mentioned in Scripture is the pledging of person for person, as when Judah undertook with his father to be surety for Benjamin (Gen. 43:9). And when circumstances seemed to call for a fulfillment of the obligation, he actually offered himself in the place of Benjamin. In this sense the psalmist asks God to be surety for him (Ps. 119:122).

The more common kind of surety spoken of is financial. The Mosaic regulations respecting debts were such that, except in rare cases, the creditor was not likely to suffer any considerable loss; and it may be that this was the reason that the Mosaic law contains no statute on suretyship. In later times they were very common, as we learn from Proverbs, where foresight is taught (6:1; 11:15; 17:18) by pointing to the fact that the surety has to stand for the debtor and could not expect any milder treatment than he (20:16; 22:26; cf. Sirach 8:16; 29:20, 24). See also Guarantee.

SURFEITING (Gk. kraipalē). The Gk. word is translated this way only by the KJV, and only in Luke 21:34. See also Carouse; Dissipation.

SU'SA (sū'sa). The Heb. word shûshan means “lily,” the Gk. form being susa. The Persian city of Susa (Shushan, KJV) took its name from the great abundance of lilies that grew in its neighborhood. The famous mound has been excavated, and its early occupational levels go back to c. 4000 B.C, its latest levels to A.D. 1200. It was explored by a French expedition in 1884–86, and the Code of Hammurabi was uncovered there by Jacques de Morgan, 1901. The ancient site lies on the Karkheh about 150 miles N of the Persian Gulf. It is famous in the Bible as one of the capitals of the Persian Empire maintained by Darius the Great (cf. Neh. 1:1; Esther 2:8; 3:15; etc.). The city was a winter residence of the great Persian kings. It was also the place of Daniel's vision (Dan. 8:2) under Belshazzar and the location of Nehemiah's appearances before Artaxerxes (Neh. 1:1; 2:1). Susa colonists were transported to Samaria by Ashurbanipal, that is, “Osnappar,” referred to in Ezra 4:9–10. Its present-day name is Shush. Susa became a part of the Achaemenid Empire when Cyrus took Babylon and its provinces. The most splendid monument of Persian Susa is the royal palace, begun by Darius I and enlarged and adorned by later kings (cf. R. de Mecquenem, “A Survey of Persian Art,” Art. 1, pp. 321–26). The outline of Darius's splendid palace, which he built of cedar wood from Lebanon, silver from Egypt, gold from Bactria, and ivory from India, can still be traced by some rows of bricks and remains of the pavements. Panels of artistically colored glazed bricks constituted the most remarkable feature in the palace decorations. Many of the designs were executed in relief and show winged bulls and griffins and include the famous “spearmen of the guard.” M.F.U.

SU-SANCHITES (Heb., Shûshanî). A name found only in the KJV rendering of Ezra 4:9, which the NASB calls “men of Susa” (which see.)

SUSAN'NA (sū-zan'na; Gk. from Heb. “a lily”), one of the women who followed our Lord and His disciples and “were contributing to their support out of their private means” (Luke 8:3), A.D. 28. No particulars of her life are known. The name, apparently of common occurrence, is of the same origin and meaning as Sheshan (1 Chron. 2:31, 34–35). The Susanna who figures prominently in the symbolism of the ancient church is the heroine of the apocryphal story of the judgment of Daniel.

SU'SI (sū'si; a "horseman"), the father of Gaddi, who was the representative of the tribe of Manasseh in the first commission sent by Moses to "spy out the land" of Canaan (Num. 13:1, 11), before 1440 B.C.

SWADDLE (Heb. tāpah, "to bear upon the palm"). An imprecise KJV rendering (Lam. 2:22), which is made clearer by NASB "bore." Elsewhere it is the rendering of hātāl, "to wrap in bandages" (cf. Luke 2:12, "cloths," NASB). See Swaddling Band.

SWADDLING BAND. A cloth in which newborn babes were wrapped (cf. Ezek. 16:4; Luke 2:7, 12, KJV), used figuratively in Job 38:9 (KJV, NASB) of a thick darkness or mist. The infant was placed diagonally on a square piece of cloth. Two corners were turned across its body, one across the feet, the other under its head. The whole cloth was fastened by bands wound around the exterior.

SWALLOW. See Animal Kingdom.

SWARMING LOCUST. See Animal Kingdom: Locust.

SWEAR. See Oath.

SWEAT (Heb. yeza, "perspiration"). In setting forth the requisites, obligations, and privileges of the priest's office, Ezekiel (Ezek. 44:18) designates linen as the material for their clothing, assigning as the reason that the priest is not to cause himself to sweat by wearing woolen clothing. Sweat produces uncleanness; and the priest, by keeping his body clean, is to show even outwardly that he is clean and blameless.

SWEET CANE. See Vegetable Kingdom: Reeds, Rushes.

SWELLING.

1. The KJV phrase "swelling of Jordan" should be rendered "thicket" or "pride" of Jordan. Compare the NASB and NIV of Jer. 12:5; 49:19; 50:44; Zech. 11:3.

2. Gk. huperogkos, "a swelling," KJV, is better translated "arrogant words" or "arrogantly," as in the NASB, or "boastful" as in the NIV (2 Pet. 2:18; Jude 16).

SWIFT. See Animal Kingdom: Swallow.

SWINE.

Figurative. "As a ring of gold in a swine's snout, so is a beautiful woman who lacks discretion" (Prov. 11:22), and "Like one who offers swine's blood" (Isa. 66:3) is used of those who, without reflection, and merely as an external act, offer sacrifices to God. Even though they offer sacrifices that are prescribed, their state of mind is no more acceptable than if they offered that which was unclean. See Animal Kingdom.

SY'CHAR (sī'kar). Sychar has been identified with Shechem. It is now commonly located at the site of the village of 'Askar, on the eastern slope of Ebal, almost two miles ENE from Nablus, about a half mile N of Jacob's well, and a short distance SE of Shechem.

For this the first evidence we get is at the beginning of the fourth century, when two visitors to the land, Eusebius and the Bordeaux Pilgrim (the latter about A.D. 333), both mention a Sychar distinct from Shechem, lying, says the former, before Neapolis, the present Nablus, and the latter adds that it was a Roman mile from Shechem. In medieval times the abbot Daniel (1106–07) spoke of "the hamlet of Jacob called Sichar. Jacob's well is there. Near this place, at half a verst away, is the town of Samaria ... at present called Neapolis." Fetellus (1130) says: "A mile from Sichem is the town of Sychar; in it is the fountain of Jacob, which, however, is a well." Other travelers mention both Sichem and Sychar. In spite of ecclesiastical tradition, that the name Sychar should have continued to exist all this time in the neighborhood, and solely among the natives, is a strong proof of its having been from the first a native and not an artificial name. See Shechem.

SY-CHEM. KJV spelling in Acts 7:16 of Shechem (which see.)

SYE'NE (sī-ē'ne; Heb. Seveneh). A town of Egypt on the frontier of Cush, or Ethiopia.

Ezekiel speaks (Ezek. 29:10) of the desolation of Egypt “from Migdol to Syene and even to the border of Ethiopia,” and of its people being slain “from Migdol to Syene” (30:6). Its ancient Egyptian name is Sun, preserved in the Coptic Souan, Senon, and the Arab. Aswan (as in the NIV). It was separated by an arm of the Nile, ninety yards wide, from Elephantine, forming a suburb of that important city. It was a stronghold opposite the island of Elephantine where the famous Elephantine Papyri written in Aramaic were found in 1903. At this place Jews during the Persian Empire had a temple to Jehovah, where they celebrated the religious rites of Judaism. M.F.U.

SYNAGOGUE (Hellenistic Gk. sunagōgē, “gathering of people,” “a congregation,” “a place of prayer,” Acts 16:13).

Object. As only a small proportion of the people could become proficient in the study of the law under the scribes, and as it was desirable that all should have at least an elementary acquaintance therewith, the custom grew up in postexilic times of reading the Scriptures in the synagogue on the Sabbath day. It must be understood that the main object of these Sabbath day assemblages in the synagogues was not public worship in its stricter sense but religious instruction, which to an Israelite was, above all, instruction in the law. Thus Josephus says (Apion 2.7), “Not once or twice or more frequently did our lawgiver command us to hear the law, but to come together weekly, with the cessation of other work, to hear the law and to learn it accurately.” Philo called the synagogues “houses of instruction,” in which “the native philosophy” was studied and every kind of virtue taught. In the NT, too, the teaching (Gk. didaskhein) always figures as the chief function of the synagogue.

Origin. The origin of these Sabbath day meetings in buildings erected for the purpose must be sought for in the postexilic period. The first traces of them are “the meeting places of God” (Ps. 74:8), but their beginning may well be as far back as the time of Ezra. R. H. Pfeiffer and other scholars are of the opinion that the synagogue may have originated in Ezekiel’s addresses to the Babylonian exiles (History of N. T. Times, p. 50). Such gatherings in the prophet’s house (Ezek. 8:1; 20:1) may well have been the forerunners of the synagogue gatherings. In the time of Christ “teaching in the synagogue on the Sabbath day” was already an established custom (Mark 1:21; 6:2; Luke 4:16, 31; 6:6; 13:10; Acts 13:14, 27, 42, 44; 15:21; 16:13; 17:2; 18:4). According to Acts 15:21, “Moses from ancient generations has in every city those who preach him, since he is read in the synagogues every Sabbath.” Josephus, Philo, and, later, Judaism generally, traced back the whole system to Moses, but there is no evidence of a preexilian origin.

Religious Community. The system presupposes a religious community. This was an independent organization in towns in which Jews might be excluded from civic rights, or Jews and others had equal rights. In such cases the Jews would be thrown back upon self-organization as a religious community; for whether they cooperated or not in civil affairs, the necessity of independent organization for religious matters was the same. Where only Jews had civic rights, and the local authorities were Jewish, matters relating to the synagogue were probably under their jurisdiction and direction. In the Mishna, for example, it is presumed as quite self-evident that the synagogue, the sacred ark, and the sacred books were quite as much the property of the town as the roads and baths.

Conduct of Synagogues. The general direction of affairs was committed to elders, whereas special officers were appointed for special purposes. But the peculiarity here is that just for the acts proper to public worship—the reading of the Scriptures, preaching, and prayer—no special officials were appointed. These acts were, on the contrary, in the time of Christ still freely performed in turn by members of the congregation.

Officials. Several officials had charge of the regular activity of the synagogue.

The Ruler of the Synagogue (Gk. archisunagōgos) had the care of external order in public worship and the supervision of the concerns of the synagogue in general. This officer was found in the entire sphere of Judaism, not only in Palestine, but also in Egypt, Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, and the Roman Empire in general. The Heb. title rōsh hakkāneset (“the minister of the synagogue”) was undoubtedly synonymous with the Gk. term. This office differed from that of an elder of the congregation, although the same person could fill the offices of both. The ruler of the synagogue was so called not as head of the community but as conductor of their assembly for public worship. Among his functions was that of appointing who should read the Scriptures and the prayer, of summoning fit persons to preach, of seeing that nothing improper took place in the synagogue (Luke 13:14); and of taking charge of the synagogue building. Although it was customary to have but one ruler for each synagogue, sometimes more are mentioned (Acts 13:15).

Receiver of Alms (Heb. gabbā'ê šdāqā). This official had nothing to do with public worship as such and is to be regarded, therefore, where the civil and religious communities were not separated, rather as a civil official. According to the Mishna, the collection was to be made by two, the distribution by three persons. Not only was money collected, but also natural products.

The Minister (Heb. hazzān hakkāneset; Gk. huperetēs; Luke 4:20, “attendant”). His office was to bring forth the Holy Scriptures at public worship and to put them away again. He was in every respect the servant of the congregation, having, for example, to execute the punishment of scourging and also to instruct the children in reading.

The person (Heb. shlīah šibbūr) who pronounced the prayer in the name of the congregation was also generally regarded as one of the officers of the synagogue. There were also “ten unemployed men,” whose business it was, especially in the post-Talmudic period, to be always present for a fee in the synagogue at public worship, for the purpose of making up the number of ten members required for a religious assembly; but they are hardly to be regarded as officials.

Building (Heb. bēt hakkāneset, “house of assembly”; Gk. sunagōgē). Sometimes synagogues were built by preference outside the towns and near rivers or on the seashore for the sake of giving everyone a convenient opportunity for performing such Levitical purification as might be necessary before attending public worship. At other times they were built in the middle of town. The size and architecture varied, of course. Archaeological research has shown that in many towns the synagogue was an important building. This is attested by the gorgeous white limestone structure (dating to the third or fourth century A.D.) uncovered at Capernaum, apparently built on the site of the one where Jesus ministered. Decorational motifs include garland-carrying boys, lions, eagles, stars, vines, and palms. This synagogue measured about seventy by fifty feet and had a balcony for women. At nearby Chorazin was a black basalt synagogue of almost identical size. A marvelous third-century synagogue was excavated at Sardis in Asia Minor. Three times larger than any synagogue preserved in Palestine, it is 400 feet long and 60 feet wide. Among the earliest synagogues known in Palestine are those at Masada and the Herodium (both dating to the second century A.D.). Numerous other synagogues have been found in Palestine. Synagogues also have been uncovered at Chorazin near Capernaum, at Beth Alpha in the Valley of Jezreel, at Bethsaida Julius, and at Kephher Bir'im. At Caesarea, Beth-shan, Lydda, and elsewhere, inscriptional allusions to synagogues have been found. At Corinth an inscription has been recovered reading: "Synagogue of the Jews." This was found on a stone apparently separated from its place in a structure that has disappeared. The synagogue in which Paul preached (Acts 18:4) may have contained this very stone and may have stood on the famous Lechaeum Road. Almost all these synagogues stand N and S, so that the entrance is at the S. As a rule they appear to have had one chief entrance and two smaller side doors.

The fittings of synagogues in NT times were simple. The chief was the closet (Heb. tēbâ) in which were kept the rolls of the law and the other sacred books. These were wrapped in linen cloths and lay in a case. A representation of an old silver case for the Pentateuch, as well as other types of cases, exists among the modern Samaritans. An elevated place (Gk. bēma, "tribune"), upon which stood the reading desk, was erected at least in post-Talmudic times, for the person who read the Scriptures or preached. Lamps were also used; and trombones and trumpets were indispensable instruments in public worship. The former were blown especially on the first day of the year, the latter on the feast days.

Where Located. The value attached to these Sabbath day assemblies leads us to assume that there was in every town of Palestine, and even in smaller places, at least one synagogue. In the post-Talmudic period it was required that a synagogue should be built wherever ten Israelites were dwelling together. In the larger towns there was a considerable number of synagogues, e.g., in Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Rome. The different synagogues in the same town seem to have been distinguished from each other by special emblems, as a "synagogue of the vine" in Sepphoris and "of the olive tree" in Rome.

Worship. The order of worship in NT times was moderately well developed. The congregation sat in an appointed order, the most distinguished in the front seats, the younger behind; men and women probably apart (see Matt. 23:6; Mark 12:39; Luke 11:43; 20:46). In the great synagogue in Alexandria the men are said to have been set apart according to their respective trades. A special division was prepared for lepers. The chief parts of the service were, according to the Mishna, the recitation of the Shema, prayer, the reading of the Torah, the reading of the prophets, the blessing of the priest, followed by the translation of the Scripture that had been read, and the discourse. The Shema, so called from its commencing words, shōma: Yisrā'ēl, "Hear, O Israel," consists of Deut. 6:4–9; 11:13–21; and Num. 15:37–41, together with benedictions before and after. It is a confession of faith rather than a prayer. The custom of praying the first three and last three benedictions of the Shemoneh Esreh at Sabbath and festival worship goes back to the age of the Mishna. The Shemoneh Esreh was the chief prayer that every Israelite, even women, slaves, and children, had to repeat three times a day—morning, afternoon, and evening. It was the custom to pray standing and with the face turned toward the Holy of Holies, i.e., toward Jerusalem. The prayer was offered by someone named by the ruler of the synagogue, the congregation making only certain responses, especially the amen. He who uttered the prayer stood in front of the chest in which lay the rolls of the law. Every adult member of the congregation was competent to do this; and might also recite the Shema, read the lesson from the prophets, and, if a priest, pronounce the blessing.

The Scripture lessons, from both the law and the prophets, could be read by any member of the congregation, even by minors, the latter being only excluded from reading the book of Esther at the feast of Purim. If priests and Levites were present, they took precedence in reading the lesson. The reader usually stood (Luke 4:16), but both sitting and standing were allowed at the reading of the book of Esther, and the king was allowed to sit when he read his portion of Scripture at the feast of Tabernacles in the Sabbatic year. The lesson from the Torah was so arranged that the whole Pentateuch was completed in a cycle of three years, for which purpose it was divided into 154 sections.

On Sabbaths several members of the congregation, at the least seven, who were summoned for the purpose by some official (originally, indeed, by the ruler of the synagogue), took part in the reading; each (at the reading of the Torah) to read at least three verses, but not to repeat them by heart. The reading of the law was already followed in NT times by a paragraph from the prophets (see Luke 4:17; Acts 13:15). The prophets not being read in order, a choice of them was open, and they were always read by one person, and that during the chief services of the Sabbath. The Heb. of the Scripture text was no longer the first language of the people, for they spoke Aramaic in daily life; consequently the reading of Scripture was followed by translation into the Aramaic dialect. The reading of the Scripture was followed by a lecture or sermon, explaining and applying the portion read (Matt. 4:23; Mark 1:21; Luke 4:15; 6:6; 13:10; John 6:59; 18:20); the preacher sat (Luke 4:20) on an elevated place. The position of preacher was open to any competent member of the congregation.

The service closed with the blessing pronounced by a priestly member of the congregation, to which the whole congregation responded, "Amen." If no priest or Levite was present the blessing was not pronounced but was made into a prayer. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

SYN'TYCHE (sin'ti-che; "fortunate"). A Christian woman of Philippi, who seems to have been at variance with another female member named Euodias, or Euodia (Phil. 4:2–3), A.D. 57. Paul entreats them to live in mutual harmony and mentions their names with a respect bordering on fondness, as fellow laborers in the gospel, whose names were written in the book of life. It has been surmised that they were deaconesses, in which case their good fellowship would be of almost vital importance to the infant church.

SYR'ACUSE (sir'a-kūs). A town on the eastern coast of the island of Sicily, once connected with the mainland by a causeway, a fact curiously recorded upon the coinage, which represents dolphins swimming round the head of Arethusa while the island remained, but meeting at the nose of the figure when it was no longer an island. The city was founded about 735 B.C. and was very prosperous. It defeated an Athenian fleet of 200 vessels in 413 B.C. In 212 B.C. it was conquered by the Romans. It was a place of great splendor, the birthplace of Archimedes, and here the apostle Paul remained three days when on his way to Rome (Acts 28:12). It is now called Siracusa and has a population of more than 100,000.

SYR'IA (sir'i-a; Heb. ʾārām; Gk. suria). In Gen. 10:22 Aram, the youngest son of Shem, is mentioned as the founder of the Aramaean nation, and thus the country is rightly called "Aram" (Num. 23:7); but the same Heb. word is rendered "Mesopotamia" (Judg. 3:10). The designation Syria is an abbreviated form of Assyria and came into common use after the conquests of Alexander the Great.

Territory. Ancient geographers are not agreed as to the extent of Syria, confounding, as did Herodotus, Syria and Assyria. The Heb. Aram seems to commence on the northern frontier of Palestine and to extend thence northward to the skirts of the Taurus Mts., westward to the Mediterranean and eastward probably to the Habur River. It was subdivided into five principalities: (1) Aram-Dammesek, or Aram of Damascus (cf. 2 Sam. 8:5–6). This was the rich country about Damascus, lying between the Anti-Lebanon Mts. and the desert, and the last with the district about Harran and Orfah, the flat country stretching out from the western extremity of Mons Masius toward the true source of the Khabur (Habor), at Ras-el-Ain. Aram-naharaim seems to be a term including this last tract and extending beyond it, though how far beyond is doubtful. See Roger O'Callaghan, Aram-naharaim, Pontifical Biblical Institute. (2) Aram-Zobah, or Aram of Zobah (10:6), seems to be the tract between the Euphrates and Coele-Syria. The other divisions were (3) Aram-Maacah (10:6, 8); (4) Aram-Beth-rehob (10:6, 8); and (5) Aram-naharaim (Gen. 24:10), or "Mesopotamia." The exact locations of the last three are difficult to determine. Probably they were portions of the tract intervening between Antilibanus and the desert.

The Greek writers used the term Syria still more vaguely than the Hebrews did Aram. On the one hand they extended it to the Euxine; on the other they carried it to the borders of Egypt. Still they seem always to have had a feeling that Syria proper was a narrower region. The LXX and NT writers distinguish Syria from Phoenicia on the one hand, and from Samaria, Judea, Idumea, etc., on the other. It seems best to take the word in this narrow sense and to regard Syria as bounded by Amanus and Taurus on the N, by the Euphrates and the Arabian Desert on the E, by Palestine on the S, by the Mediterranean near the mouth of the Orontes, and then by Phoenicia upon the W. This tract is about 300 miles long from N to S, and from 50 to 150 miles broad. It contains an area of about 30,000 square miles.

Physical Features. The physical features of Syria are varied.

Mountains. The general character of the tract is mountainous, as the Heb. name Aram (apparently from a root signifying "height") implies. On the W two longitudinal chains, running parallel with the coast at no great distance from one another, extend along two-thirds of the length of Syria, from the latitude of Tyre to that of Antioch. In the latitude of Antioch the longitudinal chains are met by the chain of Amanus, an outlying barrier of the Taurus Mts., having the direction of that range, which in this part is from SW to NE. The most fertile and valuable tract of Syria is the long valley intervening between the Lebanon Mts. and the Anti-Lebanon Mts. The northern mountain region is also fairly productive; but the soil of the plains about Aleppo is poor, and the eastern flank of the Anti-Lebanon, except in one place, is peculiarly sterile. There are four mountain ranges: (1) Lebanon. Extending from the mouth of the Litani to Arka, a distance of nearly one hundred miles, it is composed chiefly of Jura limestone, but varied with sandstone and basalt. (See Lebanon.) (2) Anti-Lebanon. This range, as the name implies, stands over against Lebanon, running in the same direction, i.e., nearly N and S, and extending the same length. (3) Bargylus. Mt. Bargylus, now called Jebel Nosairi toward the S and Jebel Kraad toward the N, extends from the mouth of the Nahr-el-Kebir (Eleutherus), nearly opposite Homs, to the vicinity of Antioch, a distance of rather more than one hundred miles. One of the western spurs terminates in a remarkable headland, known to the ancients as Mt. Casius and now called Jebel-el-Akra, or the "Bald Mountain." (4) Amanus, or Nur. North of the mouth of the Orontes River, between its course and the eastern shore of the Gulf of Issus (İskenderun), lies the range of Amanus, which divides Syria from Cilicia. Its average elevation is 5,000 feet, and it terminates abruptly at Ras-el-Khanzir in a high cliff overhanging the sea.

Rivers. The Orontes is the largest river in Syria and has its source about fifteen miles from that of the Litani. Its modern name is the Nahr-el-'Asi, or "Rebel Stream," an appellation given to it on account of its violence in many parts of its course. It is also called el-Maklûb ("The Inverted"), from the fact of its running, as is thought, in a wrong direction.

It runs NW across the plain to the foot of Lebanon, where its volume is more than trebled by the great fountain of Ain el-'Asy. From there it winds along the plain of Hamath, passing Riblah, Homs, Hamath, and Armea. At Antioch it sweeps round to the W and falls into the Mediterranean at Seleucia.

The Litani is the next largest river, having its source in a small lake situated in the middle of the Coele-Syrian valley, about six miles to the SW of Baalbek. It enters the sea about five miles N of Tyre.

Other Syrian streams of some consequence are the Barada, or river of Damascus; the Koweik, or river of Aleppo; and the Sajur, a tributary of the Euphrates.

Lakes. The principal lakes of Syria are the Agh-Dengiz, or Lake of Antioch; the Sabakhah, or Salt Lake, between Aleppo and Balis; the Bahr-el-Kades, on the upper Orontes; and the Bahr-el-Merj, or Lake of Damascus.

The Great Valley. By far the most important part of Syria, and on the whole its most striking feature, is the great valley that reaches from the plain of Umk, near Antioch, to the narrow gorge on which the Litani enters about latitude 33° 30'. This valley, which runs nearly parallel with the Syrian coast, extends 230 miles and has a width varying from 6 to 20 miles. The more southern portion of it was known to the ancients as Coele-Syria, or "the Hollow Syria."

The Eastern Desert. East of the inner mountain chain, and S of the cultivable ground about Aleppo, is the great Syrian Desert, an elevated, dry upland, for the most part of gypsum and marls, producing nothing but a few spare bushes of wormwood and the usual aromatic plants of the wilderness. The region is traversed with difficulty and has never been accurately surveyed. The most remarkable oasis is at Palmyra, where there are several small streams and abundant palm trees.

Principal Towns. These may be arranged, as nearly as possible, in the order of their importance: (1) Antioch; (2) Damascus; (3) Apamea; (4) Seleucia; (5) Tadmor, or Palmyra; (6) Laodicea; (7) Ephiphania (Hamath); (8) Samosata; (9) Hierapolis (Mabug); (10) Chalybon; (11) Emesa; (12) Heliopolis; (13) Laodicea ad Libanum; (14) Cyrrhus; (15) Chalcis; (16) Poseideium; (17) Heraclea; (18) Gindarus; (19) Zeugma; (20) Thapsacus. Of these, Samosata, Zeugma, and Thapsacus are on the Euphrates; Seleucia, Laodicea, Poseideium, and Heraclea on the seashore; Antioch, Apamea, Epiphania, and Emesa (Homs), on the Orontes; Heliopolis and Laodicea ad Libanum, in Coele-Syria; Hierapolis, Chalybon, Cyrrhus, Chalcis, and Gindarus, in the northern highlands; Damascus on the skirt and Palmyra in the center of the eastern desert.

History. Syria has been peopled from of old, and all of the nations of the ancient Near East, as well as Rome in later times, had dealings with the Syrians.

First Occupants. The first occupants appear to have been of Hamitic descent. The Canaanite races, the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, etc., are connected in Scripture with Egypt and Ethiopia, Cush and Mizraim (Gen. 10:6, 15–18). These tribes occupied not only Palestine but also lower Syria in very early times, as we may gather from the fact that Hamath is assigned to them in Genesis (10:18). Afterward they seem to have come into possession of upper Syria also. After a while the firstcomers, who were still to a great extent nomads, received a Semitic infusion, which most probably came to them from the SE. The only Syrian town whose existence we find distinctly marked at this time is Damascus (14:15; 15:2), which appears to have been already a place of some importance. Next to Damascus must be placed Hamath (Num. 13:21; 34:8, "Lebo-hamath"). Syria at this time, and for many centuries afterward, seems to have been broken up among a number of petty kingdoms.

Testimony of the Monuments. Egyptian records show that under the powerful Eighteenth and Nineteenth Egyptian Dynasties, when Egypt ruled the East, from the sixteenth to the thirteenth century B.C., Syria as well as Palestine was made a dependency of Egypt. She was forced to relax her hold in consequence of local uprisings, until finally she fully retrieved her position under the Nineteenth Dynasty. Egypt then was met by the Hittites and compelled to call a halt upon the Syrian border (cf. the Amarna Letters, and the Hittite monuments from Boghaz-keui).

Syria and Israel. The Jews came into hostile contact with the Syrians in the time of David. Claiming the frontier of the Euphrates, which God had promised to Abraham (Gen. 15:18), David made war on Hadadezer king of Zobah (2 Sam. 8:3–13). The Damascus Syrians were likewise defeated with great loss (v. 5). Zobah, however, was far from being subdued as yet. When, a few years later, the Ammonites determined on engaging in a war with David and asked the Syrians for aid, Zobah, together with Beth-rehob, sent them 20,000 footmen, and two other Syrian kingdoms furnished 13,000 (10:6). When this army was defeated by Joab, Hadadezer obtained aid from Mesopotamia (v. 16) and tried the chance of a third battle, which likewise went against him and produced the general submission of Syria to the Jewish monarch. The submission thus begun continued under the reign of Solomon (1 Kings 4:21). The only part of Syria that Solomon lost seems to have been Damascus, where an independent kingdom was set up by Rezon, a native of Zobah (11:23–25). On the separation of the ten tribes from Rehoboam, Syria was ripe for revolt. Rezon disappeared from the scene, and Ben-hadad, in the reign of Asa king of Judah, was king of Aram, with Damascus as its capital. (See Damascus; Ben-hadad.) He formed an alliance with Asa and subdued the northern part of the kingdom of the ten tribes (15:18–20). Later Ben-hadad laid siege to Samaria, Ahab's capital, but was defeated, meeting with a still greater disaster the following year. In an endeavor to recover Ramoth-gilead, Ahab was defeated and slain. Samaria was again besieged in the days of Jehoram, son of Ahab; but as the result of a panic it was delivered. (See Ahab.) War continued to be waged between the Syrian kings (Hazael, Ben-hadad II, Rezin) and kings of Israel (Jehoram, Jehu, Jehoahaz, Joash, Jeroboam II).

In the latter days of Jotham king of Judah, were Rezin king of Aram and Pekah king of Israel confederates against Judah. They invaded the country, threatened the capital, and recovered Elath for Aram, in the reign of Ahaz, who, to protect himself, became a vassal of Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria. The latter accordingly "went up against Damascus and captured it, and carried the people of it away into exile to Kir, and put Rezin to death" (2 Kings 16:9). For a study of the period of Israel's relations with the Aramaeans from Solomon's reign till the fall of Damascus in 732 B.C., see Merrill F. Unger, Israel and the Aramaeans of Damascus (1957), pp. 47–109.

Relations with Assyria, Babylonia. Syria became attached to the great Assyrian empire, from which it passed to the Babylonians and from them to the Persians. In 333 B.C. it submitted to Alexander without a struggle. Upon the death of Alexander, Syria became for the first time the head of a great kingdom. On the division of the provinces among his generals, 321 B.C., Seleucus Nicator received Mesopotamia and Syria. Antioch was begun in 300 B.C. and, being finished in a few years, was made the capital of Seleucus's kingdom. The country grew rich with the wealth that now flowed into it on all sides. The most flourishing period was the reign of the founder, Nicator. The empire was then almost as large as that of the Achaemenian Persians, for it at one time included Asia Minor and thus reached from the Aegean to India. Beginning with the reign of Nicator's son, Antiochus I, called Soter, Syria progressively declined. It passed under the power of Tigranes king of Armenia, in 83 B.C. and was not made a province of the Roman Empire till after Pompey's complete defeat of Mithridates and his ally Tigranes, 64 B.C.

Under the Romans. As Syria holds an important place in the NT as well as in the OT, some account of its condition under the Romans is in order. That condition was somewhat peculiar. Although the country generally was formed into a Roman province, under governors who were at first propraetors or quaestors, then proconsuls, and finally legates, a number of “free cities” were exempted from the direct rule of the governor. These retained the administration of their own affairs, subject to a tribute levied according to the Roman principles of taxation. Also a number of tracts, assigned to petty princes, commonly natives, were ruled at their pleasure, subject to the same obligations as the free cities as to taxation. The free cities were Antioch, Seleucia, Apamea, Epiphania, Tripolis, Sidon, and Tyre; the principalities, Comagêné, Chalcis ad Belum (near Baalbek), Arethusa, Abila or Abilêné, Palmyra, and Damascus. The principalities were sometimes called kingdoms, sometimes tetrarchies. They were established where it was thought that the natives were so inveterately wedded to their own customs, and so well disposed for revolt, that it was necessary to consult their feelings, to flatter the national vanity, and to give them the semblance without the substance of freedom.

Although previously overrun by the Romans, Syria was not made tributary and governors appointed until 64 B.C. Down to the battle of Pharsalia the country was fairly tranquil; the only trouble was with the Arabs, who occasionally attacked the eastern frontier. The Roman governors, particularly Gabinius, took great pains to restore the ruined cities. After Pharsalia (46 B.C.) the troubles of Syria were renewed. Julius Caesar gave the province to his relative Sextus (47 B.C.), but Pompey’s party was still so strong in the East that the next year one of his adherents, Caecilius Bassus, put Sextus to death and established himself in the government so firmly that he was able to resist for three years three proconsuls appointed by the Senate to dispossess him. He only finally yielded upon terms that he himself offered to his antagonists. Bassus had just made his submission when, upon the assassination of Caesar, Syria was disputed between Cassius and Dolabella (43 B.C.). The next year Cassius left his province and went to Philippi, where he committed suicide. Syria then fell to Antony, who appointed as his legate L. Decidius Saxa (41 B.C.). Pacorus, the crown prince of Parthia, overran Syria and Asia Minor, defeating Antony’s generals and threatening Rome with the loss of all her Asiatic possessions (40–39 B.C.). Ventidius, however, in 38 B.C., defeated the Parthians, slew Pacorus, and recovered for Rome her former boundary. A quiet time followed. In 27 B.C. a special procurator was therefore appointed to rule it. He was subordinate to the governor of Syria but within his own province had the power of a legatus. Syria continued without serious disturbance from the expulsion of the Parthians (38 B.C.) to the breaking out of the Jewish war (A.D. 66). In 19 B.C. it was visited by Augustus and in A.D. 18–19 by Germanicus, who died at Antioch in the last named year. In A.D. 44–47 it was the scene of a severe famine.

Syria and Christianity. A little earlier than A.D. 47 Christianity had begun to spread into Syria, partly by means of those scattered at the time of Stephen’s persecution (Acts 11:19) and partly by the exertions of Paul (Gal. 1:21). As early probably as A.D. 44, Antioch, the capital, became the see of a bishop and was soon recognized as a patriarchate.

SYR’IAC (siri-ak). The KJV rendering in Dan. 2:4; compare “Syrian tongue” (Ezra 4:7, KJV) or “Syrian language” (2 Kings 18:26; Isa. 36:11; both in KJV). A more correct rendering of this Heb. term (סְרָאמִיט) is Aramaic (which see.)

SYROPHOENI’CIAN (si-rō-pe-ni’shan). A general name (Mark 7:26) of a female inhabitant of the northern portion of Phoenicia, popularly called Syrophenicia, by reason of its proximity to Syria and its absorption by conquest into that kingdom. The woman of Syrophenicia appealed to Jesus to heal her daughter, who was possessed with a demon. When she came near to Him and worshiped, saying, “Have mercy on me, O Lord,” He replied, “It is not good to take the children’s bread and throw it to the dogs” (Math. 15:22).

Whether this was to try her faith, or to show that at that time His work and mission were among Israel, is hard to determine. Her faith, however, was great and met its merited reward in the cure of her daughter. Matthew calls her a “Canaanite woman,” referring to her nationality, in common with the Phoenicians, a descendant of Canaan.

SYR'TIS (Gk. surtis, “shoal”). A great sandbank in the Mediterranean Sea, especially on the N coast of Africa. Of these the “Syrtis major” was near Cyrenaica, now called the Gulf of Sidra; and the “Syrtis minor,” near Byzacene, now the Gulf of Cabes. The ship in which the apostle Paul was sailing was nearer to the former. The ship was caught in a northeasterly gale on the S coast of Crete and was “run aground on the shallows of Syrtis,” on the island of Clauda (Acts 27:17). If this line of drift was followed, it would reach the greater Syrtis, hence the natural fear of the sailors.

T

TA'ANACH (ta'a-nak). A royal city of the Canaanites, whose king was among the thirty-one conquered by Joshua (Josh. 12:21). It was apportioned to the western half tribe of Manasseh (17:11; 21:25; 1 Chron. 7:29) and became a city of the Kohathite Levites (Josh. 21:25). In the great struggle of the Canaanites under Sisera against Deborah and Barak it appears to have been the headquarters of their army (Judg. 5:19). They seem to have still occupied the town but to have been compelled to pay tribute (Josh. 17:13; Judg. 1:27–28). Taanach is generally named with Megiddo, and they were evidently the chief cities of that fine, rich district in the western portion of the plain of Esdraelon. Taanach is located some five miles SE of Megiddo, being generally named with Megiddo as an important city of the rich plain of Esdraelon. It is at present a large mound marking the site of an ancient fortress in the militarily strategic Plain of Armageddon. Ernst Sellin conducted three archaeological campaigns there (1902–04) on behalf of the University of Vienna, and Paul Lapp led seasons of excavation at the fourteen-acre site in 1963, 1966, and 1968 for the American Schools of Oriental Research and a number of Lutheran schools. The earliest city flourished during the twenty-seventh to the twenty-fifth centuries and thereafter was abandoned for eight centuries. The Hyksos restored it to power during the seventeenth and sixteenth centuries. After 1500 it came under Egyptian control. Hebrews under the leadership of Deborah and Barak destroyed it (c. 1125 according to evidence from the excavations), and it lay in ruins for about one hundred years. The city revived under the united monarchy but was later conquered and destroyed by Shishak of Egypt in about 926 B.C. Though rebuilt, it had little significance thereafter. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

TA'ANATH-SHI'LOH (ta'a-nath-shi'lō; “approach to Shiloh”). A place mentioned as on the northern boundary of Ephraim (Josh. 16:6), at its eastern end between the Jordan and Janoah. It is Khirbet Ta'na, a heap of ruins SE of Nablus, where there are large cisterns.

TABALI'AH (ta-ba-li'yah). The third son of Hosah the Merarite who was responsible, with his father and brothers, for keeping the Shalleketh Gate on the W side of the Temple (1 Chron. 26:11, 16). See Hosah; Shallecheth; Tebaliah.

TAB'BAOTH (tab'a-oth; “rings, or spots”). One of the Temple servants whose descendants returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46), before 536 B.C.

TAB'BATH (tab'ath). A place mentioned in connection with the flight of the Midianite host (Judg. 7:22). It is identified with Rās Abū Ṭabat.

TA'BEEL (ta'be-el; Aram. “God is good”). Probably the original pronunciation of Tabeal (ta-be-al; “good-not”), evidently a scornful alteration of Tabeel.

1. The father of the man whom Rezin king of Syria and Pekah king of Israel proposed to seat on the throne of Judah instead of Ahaz (Isa. 7:6), c. 735 B.C. In the KJV the name is spelled Tabeal. It has been conjectured that “the son of Tabeel” was identical with Zichri, the “mighty man of Ephraim,” whose sanguinary deeds are recorded in 2 Chron. 28:7 and who may have thus promoted the war in hope of receiving the crown. Because of the Aram. form of the name, however, others have supposed him to have been a Syrian warrior, who, in the event of success, might hold the Judaic kingdom in fealty to Rezin, as suzerain. The Targum of Jonathan turns the name into a mere appellative and makes the passage read: “We will make king in the midst of it whoso seems good to us.”

2. A Persian official in Samaria, who, together with Bishlam, Mithredath, and others, wrote to King Artaxerxes a letter of bitter hostility regarding the rebuilders of Jerusalem (Ezra 4:7), 522 B.C. The letter was written in Aram., and it has been argued thence, as well as from the form of his name, that he and his companions were Arameans.

TAB´ERAH (tab´e-ra; “burning”). A place in the wilderness of Paran, so called from the fact that the fire of the Lord consumed the discontented of the children of Israel (Num. 11:3; Deut. 9:22).

TABERING (Heb. tāpap, to drum). The KJV term used in Nah. 2:7 for beating upon the breast, as an expression of deep mourning; “beating on their breasts,” NASB and NIV (cf. Luke 18:13; 23:27).

TABERNACLE. The rendering of several Gk. and Heb. words.

1. Heb. ohel, “tent” and mishkān, “residence” are both used of the Jewish Tabernacle, but the terms are found to be carefully discriminated. Ohel denotes the cloth roof, whereas mishkān is used for the wooden walls of the structure.

2. Heb. sūkkâ, from sākak, to “entwine,” is used to denote a hut, booth (Lev. 23:34; Amos 9:11; Zech. 14:16), rendered “tabernacle” in Ps. 76:2 (“tent,” NIV).

3. Heb. sikkūt is used to denote an “idolatrous” booth that the worshipers of idols constructed in their honor, like the Tabernacle of the covenant in honor of Jehovah (“shrine,” Amos 5:26, see marg.).

4. The Gk. words rendered “tabernacle” are: (1) Skēnē, used for any habitation made of green boughs, skin, cloth, etc. (Matt. 17:4; Mark 9:5; Luke 9:33; John 7:2; cf. Heb. 11:9; etc.). The “tabernacle of Moloch” (Acts 7:43; cf. Amos 5:26) was a portable shrine, in which the image of the god was carried. (2) Skēnōma, used of the Tabernacle, etc.

Figurative. “For in the day of trouble He will conceal me in His tabernacle” (Ps. 27:5; cf. 15:1) indicates being on terms of peaceful communion with God, i.e., in the church.

The term Tabernacle is transferred to heaven, as the true dwelling place of God (Heb. 9:11; Rev. 13:6). To spread one’s tabernacle over others (Rev. 7:15, skēnōsei ep’ autous,) is to afford shelter and protection. The “tabernacle” (hut) of David seems to be employed in contempt of his house, i.e., family, reduced to decay and obscurity (Acts 15:16).

TABERNACLE OF IS'RAEL. The fullest, most definite, as well as most reliable source of information respecting the Tabernacle is the Bible, especially the passages in Exodus. Chapters 25–28 minutely prescribe the construction of the edifice and its furniture, while the parallel passage (chaps. 35–40) describes the execution of the task. We are also aided by the specifications of the Temple of Solomon (1 Kings 6; 2 Chron. 3–4), including that seen in vision by Ezekiel (Ezek. 40–43), both of which Temples were modeled, in all essential features, after the plan of the Tabernacle. Outside the Scriptures the principal authority is Josephus, who, in his description of the earliest sacred buildings of the Jews (Ant. 3.6.2–8), repeats substantially the statements of Scripture. For a good discussion see “The Tabernacle,” by Frank M. Cross, Jr., The Biblical Archaeologist 10, no. 3, pp. 45–68.

Names and Synonyms. The Tabernacle of Israel was known by several names.

Dwelling. The name dwelling from Heb. mishkān, from shākan, to “lie down,” a “dwelling,” connected itself with the Jewish, though not scriptural, word Shekinah, as describing the dwelling place of the divine glory. It was not applied in prose to the common dwellings of men but seems to have belonged rather to the speech of poetry (Ps. 76:2; cf. Song of Sol. 1:8). In its application to the Tabernacle it denoted (1) the ten tricolored curtains; (2) the forty-eight boards supporting them; (3) the whole building, including the roof.

Tent. The term tent (Heb. ōhel) was connected more with the common life of men, as the tent of the patriarchs (Gen. 9:21; etc.). For the most part, as needing something to raise it, it was used, when applied to the sacred tent, with some distinguishing epithet. In one passage only (1 Kings 1:39) does it appear with this meaning by itself. In its application to the Tabernacle the term ōhel meant (1) the tent roof of goat’s hair; (2) the whole building.

House. The term house (Heb. bayit) was applied to the Tabernacle or “house of the Lord” (Ex. 23:19; 34:26; Josh. 6:24; 9:23; Judg. 18:31) as it had been, apparently, to the tents of the patriarchs (Gen. 33:17). So far as it differs from the two preceding words it conveyed the idea of a fixed settled habitation and was, therefore, more fitted to the Tabernacle after the people were settled in Canaan than during their wanderings. Its chief interest to us lies in its having descended from the first word ever applied in the OT to a local sanctuary, Bethel, “the house of God” (Gen. 28:17), keeping its place side by side with other words—tent, Tabernacle, palace, Temple, synagogue—and at last outliving them all; rising in the Christian Ecclesia to yet higher uses (1 Tim. 3:15, “house of God,” KJV; “household of God,” NASB; “God’s household,” NIV).

Place of Sanctity. The Tabernacle was also referred to as a place of sanctity (Heb. miqdāsh; Gk. hagiasma, etc.), the holy, consecrated place (Ex. 25:8; Lev. 12:4, “sanctuary”). The terms were applied, according to the consecrated scale of holiness of which the Tabernacle bore witness, sometimes to the whole structure (4:6; Num. 4:12, “sanctuary”; 3:38, “tabernacle”), sometimes to the innermost sanctuary, the Holy of Holies (Lev. 16:2).

Temple. The term temple (Heb. hēkāl), as meaning the stately building or palace of Jehovah (1 Chron. 29:1, 19), was applied more commonly to the Temple (2 Kings 24:13; etc.); but was also used of the Tabernacle at Shiloh (1 Sam. 1:9; 3:3) and Jerusalem (Ps. 5:7).

Tent, or Tabernacle, of Meeting. Two compound phrases were used in Scripture: Heb. ōhel mōēd, “the tent of meeting” (Ex. 29:42, 44), lit., the Tabernacle of meeting, “where I will meet with you” (v. 42; cf. 30:6, 36; Num. 17:4); and Heb. ōhel hāēdūt, “the tent of the testimony” (Num. 9:15; 17:7; 18:2). In the latter case the tent derived its name from that which was the center of its holiness, i.e., the two tables of stone within the Ark, which were emphatically the testimony (Ex. 25:16, 21; 31:18).

History. The OT mentions three Tabernacles. The provisional Tabernacle was established after the sin of the golden calf. There followed a transitional period, the whole future depending upon the penitence of the people. In this period a tent was pitched, probably that of Moses himself, outside the camp and was called “the tent of meeting.” Of this provisional Tabernacle there was no ritual and no priesthood. The people went out to it as to an oracle (Ex. 33:7). The Sinaitic Tabernacle was erected in accordance with directions given to Moses by Jehovah (see below). The Davidic Tabernacle was erected by David in Jerusalem for the reception of the Ark (2 Sam. 6:12, 17), although the old Tabernacle remained until the days of Solomon at Gibeon, together with the bronze altar, as the place where sacrifices were offered (1 Chron. 16:39; 2 Chron. 1:3).

Upon the intercession of Moses, Jehovah renewed His covenant with Israel, gave them another copy of the law, and invited them to make their offerings of material for the construction of the Tabernacle. This they did in excess of what was needed (Ex. 36:5–6), and the work proceeded under the direction of Bezalel and Oholiab (35:30; 36:2). The Tabernacle was completed on the first day of the first month (Nisan) of the second year after the Exodus and the ritual appointed for it begun (40:2). Instead of being placed outside the camp, like the provisional Tabernacle, it stood in its very center. The priests on the E, the other three families of the Levites on the other sides, were closest in attendance, the “bodyguard” of Israel’s theocratic King. In the wider square Judah, Zebulum, Issachar were on the E; Ephraim, Manasseh, Benjamin on the W; the less conspicuous tribes, Dan, Asher, Naphtali on the N; Reuben, Simeon, Gad on the S side. When the army put itself in order of march, the position of the Tabernacle, carried by the Levites, was still central, the tribes of the E and S in front, those of the N and W in the rear (Num. 2).

In all special facts connected with the Tabernacle the original thought reappears. It is the place where man meets with God.

As long as Canaan remained unconquered and the people were still therefore an army, the Tabernacle was moved from place to place, wherever the host of Israel was for the time being encamped; it was finally placed at Shiloh (Josh. 18:1; 19:51). The reasons for the choice are not given. Partly, perhaps, its central position, partly its belonging to the powerful tribe of Ephraim may have determined the preference.

It remained in Shiloh during the whole period of the Judges; the Ark was taken from the building in the time of Eli (1 Sam. 4:4) and never returned. Excavations by the Danish Expedition at Shiloh indicate that Israel’s central sanctuary was destroyed about 1050 B.C., evidently at the hands of the Philistines at the battle of Ebenezer.

Under Samuel’s administration worship was transferred to Mizpah (7:6) and elsewhere (9:12; 10:3; 20:6). In David’s day the bread of the Presence was kept at Nob (21:1–6), implying the existence there of at least part of the sacred furniture of the Tabernacle; and at the close of his reign “the high place which was at Gibeon” possessed some fragments of the original Tabernacle, with its altar of burnt offering (1 Chron. 16:39; 21:29; cf. 1 Kings 3:4; 2 Chron. 1:3–6). This is the last mention of the edifice itself. Meanwhile David had set up a tent on Mt. Zion, to which he finally transported the Ark (1 Chron. 15:1; 16:1; 2 Sam. 6:17), which in turn was superseded by the Temple (which see).

A striking Hebrew tradition exists as to the Ark of the Covenant: that it was taken by Jeremiah and secreted in a cavern (2 Macc. 2:4–8) at the time of the Babylonian capture of the city; and that its hiding place has never been found, and never will be, until the Messiah shall set up His kingdom and restore the glory of Israel. There are other rabbinical tales of similar character.

Structure. In Ex. 25:10–27:19 is given the prescribed order for the building of the Tabernacle, beginning with the Ark and proceeding outward, whereas in 36:8–38:31 there is a description of its construction, pursuing the reverse order, which is followed here. The cubit used here is the Egyptian royal cubit equal to approximately 20.625 inches. The common estimate for the cubit is eighteen inches. Figure 5 gives the plan of the Tabernacle.

The Court. The court was an enclosed space around the Tabernacle 100 cubits long by 50 cubits wide, or, in round numbers, 172 by 86 feet. Enclosing this space was a peculiarly constructed fence. Its framework consisted of pillars of acacia wood, 5 cubits, i.e., a little more than 8½ feet high (Ex. 27:18). They were, doubtless, round and of the same thickness throughout, probably about 5 inches. The bottom was held in place by a “socket,” or plate of bronze, evidently laid flat upon the ground. The socket had a mortise, or hole, to receive the tenon that was in the bottom end of the pillar.

The pillars were kept upright by cords (35:18) fastened to pegs of bronze (27:19) driven into the ground, both on the inside and the outside. The “bands” were curtain rods hung upon hooks near the upper end of the pillars and served as the top rail of a fence, to keep the pillars at a proper distance apart. They were of shittim wood, covered with silver; the hooks and the caps that protected the tops of the pillars were of the same metal (38:17, 19). Hooks were also placed at the bottom of the pillars, by which the lower edge of the curtain was fastened. The pillars, when set up and braced by the bands and stay ropes, formed the complete framework of a fence. Upon this was hung sheets of “fine twisted linen,” probably like our duck, sewed endwise together so as to form a continuous screen from the doorway all around the corners to the doorway again. This was 5 cubits wide, the same as the height of the pillars. But as the pillars rested upon sockets, the curtain would be kept off the ground.

The “screen” for the gate of the court was in the middle of the eastern end and was “the work of the weaver, of blue and purple and scarlet material, and fine twisted linen” (38:18), i.e., the warp was of bleached linen threads and the woof of alternate bars of wool dyed blue, purple, and scarlet. Its size was five cubits high by twenty cubits long. Entrance into the court was only effected by lifting this curtain at the bottom. In this court was the altar of burnt offering, which probably stood in the center of the front half of the space, about halfway between the entrance and the Tabernacle. Midway between the altar and the Tabernacle (30:18) stood the laver (which see). The Tabernacle itself was situated at the front edge of the rear half of the enclosure. Being thirty cubits long and ten cubits wide, it would leave equal spaces (namely, ten cubits) behind it and on either side.

The Tabernacle. The Tabernacle was composed of two parts, the Tabernacle proper (Heb. mishkān) and the “tent over the tabernacle” (ōhel, Ex. 26:7). The Tabernacle proper consisted of boards of acacia wood, each ten cubits long by one and a half broad (26:16); their entire surface was plated with sheets of gold. Twenty of these formed each side wall (vv. 18, 20), each board having two tenons at its foot to enter the socket. There were eight rear boards (v. 25), six of which were of the same dimensions as those on the side, thus making nine cubits. As the width of the Tabernacle was probably the same as its height, ten cubits, thus making the Holy of Holies a perfect cube, this would leave one cubit of space to be filled by the two corner boards. There is nothing in the Heb. to indicate the breadth of these two boards, and we assume that they were only one-half cubit wide. If, now, the rear boards were placed within the side boards, so as to be flush with the end, each corner board would rest on two sockets, and we have the sixteen sockets demanded. This will oblige us to count the rear socket of the sides, as is done with the posts of the courts. The meaning seems to be that as you look at each side, forty sockets are seen; whereas if you look at the rear, sixteen are in view.

In order to keep the boards in line, three series of bars were provided, made of acacia wood overlaid with gold, to pass through rings of gold on the outside of the boards (26:26– 29; 36:31–34). Of these, five were on each side and five on the rear, the middle bar reaching from end to end; the upper and lower ones were divided, their ends being fastened (as Josephus suggests) with dowels. They were probably of different lengths, to prevent the break being in the center.

The whole structure was, doubtless, kept in place with cords, one end fastened to the knobs to which the tent cloth was attached, and the other end to pins driven into the ground. The boards were covered on the outside with a double blanket of skins, probably suspended from the knobs mentioned above, thus keeping the wind and dust from entering between the boards and also protecting the gold sheeting. The inner blanket was of “porpoise skins” (26:14; 36:19) but may have been of the Angora goat. This was probably hung with the hair turned inward toward the boards, while the other blanket (of ram skins dyed red) was hung with the hair on the outside, to shed the rain.

The Roof. The roof (Heb. ōhel, “tent”) of the Tabernacle was made of goats-hair canvas, i.e., camlet, such as is still used by the Arabs, generally looking like a fox skin of black or brownish color (Song of Sol. 1:5). It consisted of an inner covering and a fly. The material was woven in eleven pieces, each thirty cubits long by four wide (Ex. 26:7–9; 36:14); five of these pieces were joined so as to make the inner tent, and six formed the fly. This sixth breadth, being thirty cubits long, would allow itself to be double across the front and single across the rear of the Tabernacle (26:9, 13). The lower edge of each sheet was buttoned over curtain knobs on the boards by means of fifty loops attached to their selvedge. The tent extended one cubit over the sides (vv. 10–13). The roof was sustained by posts, one of them being an extension of the central front doorpost, their heads probably rounded so as not to tear the roof canvas.

The Door of the Tent. The entrance to the Tabernacle was closed with a screen like that of the court, supported by five pillars, covered with gold; their hooks were of gold, and their “bands” (curtain rods) were covered with gold; their sockets were of bronze (Ex. 26:36–37; 36:37–38). If these pillars were arranged so as to leave six spaces, each space would have been a little more than thirty-four inches wide. Evidently the curtain rods had rings in their ends, which slipped down over hooks in the tops of the posts and on the boards.

The Wall Drapery. Each wall drapery consisted of five pieces of cloth woven of the same material as the door screen, four cubits wide and twenty cubits long. These pieces were sewed together at the ends and hung by loops of blue cord to the gold knobs on the inside of the boards (Ex. 26:1–6; 36:8–13). Special dignity was given to these side curtains, compared to that of the door screen, by their embroidery of “cherubim, the work of a skillful workman” (26:1; 36:8), instead of the simple tracery on the latter. As will be seen, the hangings were each twice as wide as the entire circuit of the walls, therefore they must have been gathered into some manner of festoons.

The Veil. The veil (Heb. pārōket, a “separation”), particularly described in Ex. 26:31–33; 36:35–36, was the screen between the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies. It was of the same material as the door screens but was embroidered with cherubim. It is thought that there were two, their extended wings touching each other. The veil, like the other hangings, was suspended upon pillars and, probably, “bands” (curtain rods), though the latter are not mentioned. These pillars (and bands) were covered with gold, the hooks were of gold, and the sockets of silver. For the veil four pillars were used, and as no one of them ran up to the peak, it did not, therefore, need to be in the center. The upper corners of the veil were fastened to the gold hooks in the boards. If we follow the proportions of the Holy Place and the Most Holy Place in the Temple, we must suppose the latter in the Tabernacle to have been square and the former to have been twice as long as broad. This will fix the dividing line between the two rooms at two-thirds of the width of the seventh board from the rear; the presumption is that the pillars were wholly within the Most Holy Place.

Furniture. There was distinctive furniture in the courtyard and within the sacred structure itself, the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies. Two items were placed in the courtyard, three items were placed in the Holy Place, and one item was placed in the Holy of Holies.

In the Courtyard. An altar and a laver, or basin, were placed in the courtyard.

The Altar of Burnt Offering. The altar of burnt offering (Heb. mizbah hā·ōlā, Ex. 30:28; “bronze altar,” mizbah hannā·hōshet, 39:39; “table of the Lord,” Mal. 1:7, 12) was placed between the entrance and the Tabernacle. It was made strong and light for convenient transportation; a hollow box of acacia wood, five cubits square and three cubits high (Ex. 27:1–8), overlaid with sheets of bronze. At each corner was a “horn,” apparently a triangular extension of the sides at their junction. The altar had a grate, or “net” (Heb. mikbār, a “netting”), placed halfway between the top and bottom (v. 5). At each corner of the net was a ring, through which were passed the bronze-covered poles by which the altar was carried, like a handbarrow. Of course it was lined both inside and outside with bronze to protect it from the heat. At the end of twenty years 250 censers were flattened out and nailed on its sides, telling their awful story (Num. 16:17, 36–40) to the coming generations. The common censer in Egypt was a small, shallow, platelike vessel, about half a cubit in diameter. As the priests were not allowed to go up the altar by steps (Ex. 20:26) and as it would be too high to reach from the ground, the earth was, probably, raised about the altar so as to approach it by an incline.

The utensils for the altar (27:3) made of bronze were: ash pails; shovels for cleaning the altar; basins for receiving the blood to be sprinkled on the altar; flesh hooks, i.e., large forks, to handle the pieces of flesh; firepans (38:3; Num. 16:17); snuffers (Ex. 25:38). According to Lev. 6:13, the fire on this altar was never allowed to go out.

The Laver. The laver (Heb. kîyyôr, “rounded,” a “basin”) stood about midway between the altar and the Tabernacle. It was the basin used by the officiating priests and was made from the bronze mirrors of the women (Ex. 30:18; 38:8). It was probably round, of considerable size, with another and shallower basin beneath it, into which the water ran after being used, and in which the priests washed their feet. We have no Scripture information as to its size or shape. As no mention is made of a vessel in which were washed the parts of the animals offered in sacrifice, the laver was likely used for this purpose also. As washing in the East was always in running water, the laver was probably supplied with faucets from which the water would flow upon the object to be cleansed, whether the hands or feet of the priests or the parts of the sacrifice (see article Laver).

Within the Holy Place. The table of the bread of the Presence (or showbread), the golden lampstand, and the altar of incense were located within the Holy Place.

Table of the Bread of the Presence. The table of the bread of the Presence, or showbread (Heb. shūlhān lehem pānîm, “table of the face,” i.e., of Jehovah) was placed on the N, or right, side, facing the lampstand (Ex. 40:22). It was made of acacia wood, two cubits long, one broad, and one and one-half high. This proportion between the length and the height is accurately maintained in the sculptural form on the Arch of Titus. The surface, or top of the table, rested on a frame a handbreadth deep; around it ran a rim with a border of gold projecting above the top to keep articles from slipping off the table. The legs were apparently mortised into the sides (as is usual today), with rings near each corner for the carrying staves (25:23–30; 37:10–16).

The bread placed upon the table (Heb. “bread of the Presence”) was made of fine wheat flour (unleavened), baked in twelve loaves (cakes), each containing one-fifth of an ephah of flour. These, according to Jewish tradition, as well as the dimensions of the table, would seem to have been placed upon plates in two piles of six each. They were renewed every Sabbath, were to be eaten by the priests exclusively (and that in the sanctuary only), and were then replaced by fresh loaves (1 Sam. 21:6), which had been prepared overnight by the Levites (1 Chron. 9:32). To each pile of loaves incense was added, probably placed in bowls beside the bread, for “a memorial portion for the bread, even an offering made by fire to the Lord” (Lev. 24:5–9).

The utensils belonging to the table were these: the dishes for the showbread; pans or spoons (so KJV and sometimes NASB) for the incense; jugs or jars (KJV, “covers”), which, as they were used for making libations, were doubtless for wine, with a spout for pouring; and cups, all of pure gold.

The Golden Lampstand. The golden lampstand (Heb. mānōrâ) stood on the S, or left, side of the Holy Place, directly opposite the table of showbread (Ex. 40:24). Its construction, except as to size, is minutely described (25:31–40; 37:17–24). The material of which it was made was pure gold, of which an entire talent was used for the lampstand and its vessels. The different parts were of “hammered work,” miqshâ, hammered out of sheets. It consisted of a pedestal (yārēk), elsewhere meaning the leg or, rather, the part of the body from which the legs and feet spring; and the shaft (qāneh, “reed or stalk”), from which, probably, at equal distances from one another, there projected three branches on each side, rising as high as the central shaft. The central shaft and the six branches terminated in sockets into which the seven lamps were placed. The ornamentation of the lampstand, a beautiful design, consisted of a “cup” (Heb. gābîa), which was almond-shaped (i.e., the nut), tapering from a head.

Above this was the “bulb” (Heb. kaptôr), like the capital of a column, under the intersection of the branches (25:35). Surmounting all was the “flower” (Heb. perah, lit., “blossom”), like a bud just ready to burst into bloom. There were four of these ornamental groupings on the main stem, one being placed at intervals at each of the three points where the branches diverged, the fourth being probably at the upper end, just under the lamp that was placed upon it. There were three of these groups on each branch, one under the lamp, and the two others probably placed equidistant from each other. This was evidently the form of the lampstand, which is known to us chiefly by the passages in Ex. 25:31–40; 37:17–24, the light thrown thereon by the Jewish writers and by the representation on the Arch of Titus at Rome.

The size of the lampstand is not given in the Bible description of it, and we are therefore left to conjecture. Jewish tradition assigns it a height of about five feet and a breadth of about three and one-half feet. On the Arch of Titus it measures two feet nine inches high by two feet broad; but the figures there delineated are not life-size, and the proportion with the table of showbread on the same sculpture, as well as with the men there exhibited, yields a size about the same as the above tradition. We may therefore fix the entire height, including the base, at about three cubits, and the entire breadth at about two cubits. Taking the estimate of a cubit at about eighteen inches, the dimensions would be about fifty-four by thirty-six inches.

Finally came the lamps themselves (Heb. sing. nēr), which were of the kind generally used in the East, but here of gold. These were placed, of course, upon the top of the main shaft and the branches in sockets. Opinion generally places them on a horizontal line, although the instructions given in Exodus afford no information. The lamps were supplied with olive oil, pure or “clear” (i.e., “prepared from olives which had been cleansed from leaves, twigs, dust, etc., before they were crushed”), beaten (i.e., “obtained not by crushing in oil presses, but by beating, when the oil which flows out by itself is of the finest quality and a white color”) (K. & D., Com., on Ex. 27:20). It is likely that the plane of the lamps ran from E to W—thus the better lighting of the Holy Place. The lamps were trimmed and lighted at the time of the evening sacrifice (30:8) and trimmed and filled at the time of the morning sacrifice (30:7; 1 Sam. 3:3). They are traditionally believed to have held a “log,” i.e., a little more than a half pint.

The utensils belonging to the lampstand were the “snuffers” (“wick trimmers,” NIV) and the “trays” (Ex. 25:38), made of the same gold as the lampstand itself. The snuffers were used to pull up the wick and to hold the coal while blowing it to light the lamp. The trays were coal pans (27:3; Lev. 16:12), used for bringing the live coals from the great altar.

The Altar of Incense. The altar of incense (Heb. mizbēah miqṭar qāṭōret) occupied the middle space near to and in front of the inner veil (Ex. 30:1–6; 37:25–28; 40:5; Lev. 16:18). It was, however, reckoned as belonging to the Most Holy Place (1 Kings 6:22; Heb. 9:4), apparently on account of its great sanctity. In construction it was a simple box of acacia wood, two cubits high, one cubit wide, and one cubit broad, with a top, and horns like the large altar; the whole was covered with gold. It had no grate, because the fire did not come directly in contact with it. It had a molding around the edge, rings to carry it, and staves. No utensils belonged especially to it. Upon this altar neither burnt offerings nor grain offerings were allowed to be offered, nor drink offerings to be poured, but it was used exclusively to burn incense upon morning and evening.

Within the Holy of Holies. The Ark of the Covenant was the only piece of furniture within the Holy of Holies. It was called the “Ark of the Covenant” (Heb. āṛōn bṛît, Num. 10:33), or “Ark of the Testimony” (Heb. āṛōn hāēdūt, Ex. 25:22; etc.), from the law that was kept therein.

Construction. The Ark was made of acacia wood two and one-half cubits long, one and one-half cubits broad, and one and one-half cubits high (external dimensions) and was plated inside and out with pure gold. Running around each side was a gold border extending above the top of the Ark, so as to keep the lid from moving.

This lid was called the “mercy seat” (Ex. 25:20, 22; Heb. kappōret, a “covering”), was the same size as the Ark itself, and was made of acacia wood covered with gold. The Ark was transported by means of two gold-covered poles run through two gold rings on each side, from which they were not to be removed (25:15) unless it might be necessary to remove them in order to cover the Ark when the Tabernacle was moved (Num. 4:6).

Upon the lid, or Mercy Seat, or at the ends of the Ark, as in the Temple (which see), were placed the cherubim (which see), probably figures beaten out of gold as was the lampstand. In shape they were probably human, with the exception of their wings, though some authorities think they were of the same complex form as the cherubim mentioned by Ezekiel (Ezek. 1:5–14). They were no doubt the normal or full height of a man and are always spoken of as maintaining an upright position (2 Chron. 3:13). They stood facing each other, looking down upon the Mercy Seat, with their wings forward in a brooding attitude (Ex. 25:20; cf.

K. & Johann Karl Friedrich Keil and Franz Julius Delitzsch, Old Testament Commentaries (1875)

Deut. 32:11). The golden censer, with which the high priest once a year entered the Most Holy Place, was doubtless set upon this lid.

Between the cherubim was the Shekinah (Heb. shkîná, “residence”), the cloud in which Jehovah appeared above the Mercy Seat (Ex. 25:22; cf. Lev. 16:2). It was not the cloud of incense (16:13), but the manifest appearance of the divine glory. Because Jehovah manifested His essential presence in this cloud, not only could no unclean and sinful man go before the Mercy Seat, i.e., approach the holiness of the all-holy God, but even the anointed high priest, if he went before it at his own pleasure, or without the expiatory blood of sacrifice, would expose himself to certain death.

Contents. The Ark contained the two tables of stone on which Jehovah wrote the Ten Commandments, or rather those prepared by Moses from the original, broken by him when he heard of Israel’s idolatry (Ex. 31:18–34:29; Deut. 9:10–10:4); and the copy of the law, written by Moses (31:26), presumed by some to be the Pentateuch in full, and thought to be the same as was afterward discovered in the time of Josiah (2 Kings 22:8). The law must, in the meanwhile, have been removed, together with all the contents, because in the days of Solomon the Ark contained the two tablets only (1 Kings 8:9). The Ark also contained a golden jar of miraculously preserved manna (Ex. 16:33–34) and “Aaron’s rod which budded” (Heb. 9:4; cf. Num. 17:10).

Care of the Tabernacle. The following are the directions for the care of the Tabernacle and its furniture (Num. 4:4–33; 7:3–9; 10:17, 21). “The work” (4:4) signifies military service and is used here with special reference to the service of the Levites as the sacred militia of Jehovah. The following were the duties of the Kohathite Levites: When the Tabernacle was to be taken down for removal the priests took down the veil and covered the Ark of Testimony with it; over this they put a covering of “porpoise skin” (so NASB, but more likely the hide of some other creature, the porpoise being ceremonially unclean [see Animal Kingdom: Porpoise]; the KJV and NKJV read “badger skins,” and the NIV reads “sea cow”) and finally a “cloth of pure blue.” Removing the dishes from the table of showbread, they spread over it a cloth of blue, then replaced the dishes and spread upon them a cloth of scarlet and finally a covering of “porpoise skins.” The lampstand, with its lamps, snuffers, and trays, was then covered with a cloth of blue, over which was placed a covering of “porpoise skins.” The altar of incense was covered with a cloth of blue and “porpoise skins,” and then all other “utensils of service” in the sanctuary were wrapped in blue and “porpoise skins” and placed upon “bars,” i.e., a bier made of two poles with crosspieces. After this the great altar was cleansed from the ashes, covered with a purple cloth, the altar utensils packed in it, and then covered with “porpoise skins.” When all this preparation was completed the Kohathites came forward to bear the furniture away. The only thing not mentioned as prepared by the priests was the laver, probably because it was carried without any covering.

To the care and carrying by the Gershonites were assigned the tapestry of the Tabernacle, namely, the inner covering, the tent of goats’ hair, the two outside coverings of the boards, the entrance curtain, the veil, the hangings of the court and its entrance curtain, with all the cords and the various implements used in the said work. Thus their office was to perform whatever was usually done with these portions of the sanctuary, especially in setting up or taking down the Tabernacle (Num. 3:25–4:33).

The charge of the Merarites was: the boards of the Tabernacle with the bars, the pillars, and their sockets (both of the sacred building and its court), and their pegs and cords. That is, they were to take them down, carry them on the march, and to fix them when the Tabernacle was set up again (3:36–37; 4:31–32). See Levites.

Typology of the Tabernacle and Furniture. The design of the Tabernacle is thus stated: “Let them construct a sanctuary for Me, that I may dwell among them” (Ex. 25:8). This sanctuary was styled “the tent of meeting” (Heb. ōhel mōēd) between Jehovah and His people. The Lord said, “I will meet with you, to speak to you there” (29:42); “and I will dwell among the Sons of Israel and will be their God” (v. 45). Thus the Tabernacle and all that pertained to it were typical of the presence of God with His people. In accordance with this promise, the glory of Jehovah filled the Tabernacle, but His presence was manifested to the people in the pillar of cloud and fire above the sacred structure (40:34–38; Num. 9:15–23). The fiery cloud by day moved at God’s direction and thus prefigured His guidance. The entire divine institution portrayed the approach of God’s redeemed people to His presence. Following is a discussion of the Tabernacle typology as presented by many Bible teachers.

General Typology. The Tabernacle in comprehensive terms is set forth in the NT as typical in three ways: (1) of the church, as “a dwelling of God in the Spirit” (Ex. 25:8; Eph. 2:19–22), (2) of the believer who is “a temple of the Holy Spirit” (1 Cor. 6:19; cf. 2 Cor. 6:16), (3) as a portrayal of heavenly reality (Heb. 9:23–24). In its minute details the Tabernacle speaks of Christ. This is true of the high priest, the furniture, the ritual, and the worship.

As a Type of Christ. The furniture of the Tabernacle typified Christ and His ministry.

The Bronze Altar. The bronze altar (Ex. 27:1–8) was a type of Christ’s cross, on which our Lord as a whole burnt offering offered Himself without spot unto God.

Laver. The laver, in which the priests washed before entering the Holy Place or approaching the altar to minister, was a type of Christ cleansing the believer from the defilement of sin (John 13:2–10) and from every “spot or wrinkle or any such thing” (Eph. 5:25–27).

The Golden Lampstand. The lampstand typified Christ as the light of the world, bringing to us the full radiance of divine life. It is noteworthy that natural light was shut out from the Tabernacle. Only the Spirit of God can show us the things of Christ (1 Cor. 2:14–15). The divine Spirit takes the things of Christ and reveals them to us, as Jesus announced in His Upper Room discourse (John 16:14–15).

The Table of the Bread of the Presence. The table of the bread of the Presence, or showbread, was a type of Christ as the Bread of Life, the Sustainer of each individual believer-priest (1 Pet. 2:9; Rev. 1:6). The manna portrayed the life-giving Christ; the showbread of the Presence the life-sustaining Christ. Christ is the Bread that came down from heaven (John 6:33–58). The bread prefigured the “grain of wheat” (12:24) pulverized in the mill of suffering (cf. v. 27) and subjected to the fire of divine judgment for sin (vv. 31–33).

The Altar of Incense. The altar of incense (Ex. 30:1–10) portrayed Christ our Intercessor (John 17:1–26; Heb. 7:25) through whom our prayers and petitions ascend to God (13:15; Rev. 8:3–4). It also spoke of the Christian as a believer-priest offering the sacrifice of praise and worship (Heb. 13:15).

The Veil. The veil (Ex. 26:31–35) was a type of Christ’s human body (Matt. 26:26; 27:50; Heb. 10:20). Accordingly, the veil was supernaturally torn in two when Christ died (Matt. 27:51), granting instant access to God to everyone who approaches on the ground of faith in Him. The death of Christ portrayed by the veil also marked the termination of all legality. The unobstructed way to God was now open. The officiating priesthood at the death of Christ must have repaired the veil that had been rent. Antitypically these pictures attempt to put the believer or sinner back under the law.

The Ark of the Covenant. The materials, contents, and employment of the Ark of the Covenant (Ex. 25:10–22) were significant. In its materials, acacia wood and gold, the Ark was a type of the humanity and deity of Christ. Acacia wood grew in the desert and fittingly portrayed Christ’s humanity in His lowliness as a “root out of parched ground” (Isa. 53:2).

The fact that the Ark was overlaid with pure gold (Ex. 25:11) suggested deity in manifestation. In its contents the Ark typified Christ as having God's law in His heart (25:16, 21) and portrayed Christ in resurrection inasmuch as it contained Aaron's rod that budded (Num. 17:10). The employment of the Ark, particularly the Mercy Seat, typified the divine throne. It was transformed from a throne of judgment to a throne of grace as far as the erring Israelite was concerned by the blood of atonement that was sprinkled upon it. The cherubim with outstretched wings guarded the holiness of the Mercy Seat. The Ark was the commencement of everything in the Tabernacle symbolism. It was placed in the Holy of Holies, showing that God begins from Himself in His outreach toward man in revelation. On the other hand, in the human approach the worship begins from without, moving toward God in the very center of the holiest place. Man begins at the bronze altar, that is, at the cross, where atonement is made in the light of the fire of God's judgment. M.F.U.

TABERNACLES, FEAST OF. Often called the feast of Booths (so NASB). It is one of the yearly festivals. See the articles Festivals; Sacrifices.

TAB'ITHA (tab'i-tha; Gk. from Aram. t̄bîṭā, "gazelle"). A benevolent Christian widow of Joppa whom Peter restored to life (Acts 9:36–42). She was probably a Hellenistic Jewess, known to the Greeks by the name Dorcas (which see) and to the Hebrews by the Aram. equivalent. It is not certain, however, that Tabitha bore both names; Luke may have translated the name for the benefit of his Gentile readers and used its definition thereafter for their convenience. The Greeks used Dorcas, i.e., "female gazelle," as a term of endearment for their women. Soon after Peter had miraculously cured the palsied Aeneas in Lydda, the church at Joppa was bereaved by the death of Tabitha. They at once sent for the apostle, whether merely to receive his Christian consolation or in the hope that he could restore their friend to life, is not evident. A touching picture is given of the widows who stood "weeping, and showing all the tunics and garments that Dorcas used to make." Peter "sent them all out and knelt down and prayed," then commanded the lifeless woman to arise. She opened her eyes, arose, and by the apostle was presented to her friends. The facts, which became widely known, produced a profound impression in Joppa and occasioned many conversions (9:42).

TABLE. See also Tablet.

1. A divan, i.e., a company of persons seated round about a room (Song of Sol. 1:12), Heb. mēsab.

2. A table as spread with food, viands (Judg. 1:7; 1 Sam. 20:29, 34; 1 Kings 2:7; etc.), Heb. shūlḥān, "spread out, extended." As to the form of tables among the Hebrews, little is known; but, as among other orientals, they were probably not high. They were doubtless similar to those of modern Arabs, a piece of skin or leather, a mat, or a linen cloth spread upon the ground. Hence the fitness of the name something spread, and the figurative expression "May their table before them become a snare" (Ps. 69:22), i.e., let their feet become entangled in it, as it is spread on the ground.

3. Gk. anakeimai, to lie or recline at table (John 13:28) on the divan. The Romans often arranged reclining divans on three sides of a low table, the fourth side being open for serving the food. This arrangement was called triclinium.

4. Gk. trapeza, a table on which food is placed (Matt. 15:27; Mark 7:28; Luke 16:21; 22:21, 30); the table of the bread of the Presence (Heb. 9:2); the table or stand of a money changer, where he sits, exchanging different kinds of money for a fee and paying back with interest loans or deposits (Matt. 21:12; Mark 11:15; John 2:15).

Figurative. “The table of the Lord is to be despised” (Mal. 1:7; cf. v. 12) is what the prophets charge the priests with representing. The table of Jehovah is the altar, and they made it contemptible by offering upon it bad, blemished animals, which were unfit for sacrifices. “They will speak lies to each other at the same table” (Dan. 11:27) is a figure of feigned friendship. Eating, especially in the presence of enemies (Ps. 23:5; cf. Isa. 21:5), denotes a sense of security. In 1 Cor. 10:21, “You cannot partake of the table of the Lord and the table of demons” brings into sharp contrast the Holy Communion and the sacrifices offered to heathen deities. Paul makes the real existences answering to the heathen conception of these gods to be demons.

TABLE OF SHOWBREAD. See Tabernacle.

TABLE OF THE LORD. A phrase used to designate the Table of the Christian church, and evidently taken from 1 Cor. 10:21. In the OT the words table (which see) and altar appear to have been applied to the same thing (Ezek. 41:22).

TABLET.

1. Heb. lûah (“glistening”), a board of polished stone or wood used for writing on (Prov. 3:3; Isa. 30:8; Hab. 2:2).

2. Gk. pinakidion (Luke 1:63) and Gk. plax, “flat,” the former being a small writing tablet, the latter meaning the same as no. 1 (2 Cor. 3:3).

3. The inaccurate KJV rendering of (a) Heb. kûmāz, “jewel,” probably gold drops, or beads, worn around the neck or arm by the Israelites in the desert (Ex. 35:22; Num. 31:50; “ornaments” and “necklaces,” NIV), or (b) Heb. bāttê hannepesh (“houses of the breath,” i.e., perfume boxes, Isa. 3:20).

TABLETS OF THE LAW (Heb. lûhōt hā'eben, “stone tablets,” Ex. 24:12), also called “tablets of the covenant” (Deut. 9:9, 15), or “of the testimony” (Ex. 31:18). These were given to Moses on Mt. Sinai, having the Ten Commandments written on them “by the finger of God.”

TA'BOR (ta'bor).

The Mount. Now called Jebel et Tur, this is a conical and quite symmetrical mound of limestone on the northeastern part of the plain of Esdraelon. It is about six miles E of Nazareth. The northern slope is covered with oak trees and syringa. It rises to the height of 1,350 feet above the plain, which itself is 400 feet above the Mediterranean Sea. The ascent is usually made on the W side, near the little village of Debûrieh, probably the ancient Daberath (Josh. 19:12). Tabor is named (19:22) as a boundary between Issachar and Zebulun. Barak, at the command of Deborah, gathered his forces on Tabor and descended thence with “ten thousand men” into the plain, conquering Sisera on the banks of the Kishon (Judg. 4:6–15). Here the brothers of Gideon were slain by Zebah and Zalmunna (8:18–19); and some think Tabor is intended when it is said (Deut. 33:19) of Issachar and Zebulun that “they shall call peoples to the mountain; there they shall offer righteous sacrifices.” In the time of Christ the summit is said to have been crowned by a fortified town, the ruins of which are there now (1 Chron. 6:77). It is difficult to see how such a scene as that of Christ's transfiguration could have taken place there, and the NT clearly points to some part of Hermon as the place.

The City. Tabor is mentioned in the lists of 1 Chron. 6 as a city of the Merarite Levites, in the tribe of Zebulun (v. 77). The list of the towns of Zebulun (Josh. 19) contains the name of Chisloth-tabor (v. 12). It is therefore possible either that Chisloth-tabor was abbreviated to Tabor by the chronicler, or that by the time these later lists were compiled the Merarites had established themselves on the sacred mountain and that Tabor is Mt. Tabor.

The Oak or Terebinth. Mentioned (1 Sam. 10:3) as one of the points in the homeward journey of Saul after his anointing by Samuel. The place is nowhere else mentioned, and nothing further can be determined concerning it than that it stood by the road leading from Rachel's tomb to Gibeah.

TAB'RIMMON (tab'rim-on; Aram. "Rimmon is good"). Rimmon was the god of thunder, a weather god, of Damascus, Akkad. "thunderer"), the father of Ben-hadad I, king of Syria in the reign of Asa (1 Kings 15:18), before 900 B.C.

TACH'MONITE, THE. See Jashobeam; Tahchemonite, The.

TACKLE (Heb. hebel, Isa. 33:23; Gk. skeue, Acts 27:19) represents the spars, ropes, chains, etc., of a ship (which see).

TAD'MOR (tad'mōr; cf. Heb. tamar, "a palm tree"). A city built by Solomon in the wilderness (2 Chron. 8:4); the parallel passage (1 Kings 9:18, "Tamar") adds "in the land of Judah," indicating the land on the southern border of Palestine (Ezek. 47:19; 48:28). The Greeks and Romans called the city Palmyra. It was 145 miles from Damascus and the center of vast commercial traffic as well as a military station. Its grandeur is attested by its magnificent ruins. Presuming that Tadmor is the same as Palmyra, the following facts may be mentioned. The first author of antiquity who mentions Palmyra is Pliny the Elder. Later, Appian writes of it in connection with Mark Antony's design to allow his cavalry to plunder it. In the second century A.D. it seems to have been beautified by the emperor Hadrian. It became a Roman colony under Caracalla (A.D. 211–17). In the reign of Gallienus the Roman Senate invested Odenathus, a senator of Palmyra, with the regal dignity on account of his services in defeating Sapor king of Persia. Upon his assassination his widow, Zenobia, wished to make of Palmyra an independent monarchy and for a while successfully resisted the Roman arms; but she was defeated and taken prisoner by the emperor Aurelian (A.D. 273), who left a Roman garrison in Palmyra. This garrison was massacred in a revolt, for which Aurelian punished the city so severely that it never recovered from the blow. Today a living town of more than five thousand named Palmyra or Tadmor is an important station on the Iraq-Tripoli oil pipeline about one-half mile from the ruins of ancient Palmyra.

Systematic archaeological work at Palmyra began in 1900 with efforts of the Russian Archaeological Institute of Constantinople. A German team under the leadership of Theodor Wiegand excavated there from 1902 to 1917. French expeditions attacked the site between the wars. A Swiss archaeological mission worked there from 1954 to 1956, and a Polish team under the leadership of K. Michalowski began excavating in 1957. Excavators found that the main street extended across the S central part of the western half of the city a distance of about 1,100 meters. Lined with Corinthian columns and shops, it was eleven meters wide and had six-meter-wide lanes on both sides running under covered porticoes. From this thoroughfare side streets opened at right angles. South of the street stood most of the city's chief structures, including the temple of Nebo, a well-preserved theater, and the debating hall of the senate. The Sanctuary of Bel stood in the eastern part of the city. At the W end sprawled the great camp of Diocletian. H.F.V.

TA'HAN (ta'han).

1. The head of one of the families of the tribe of Ephraim at the end of the Exodus (Num. 26:35), c. 1440 B.C.

2. Apparently the son of Telah and the father of Ladan, in the genealogy of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7:25), after 1440 B.C.

TA'HANITES (ta'ha-nīts), the descendants (Num. 26:35) of Tahan, no. 1.

TAHAP'ANES (ta-hap'a-nēz). See Tahpanhes.

TA'HASH (ta'hash; “dugong”; Thahash, KJV). A son of Nahor (Gen. 22:24).

TA'HATH (ta'hath; “that which is beneath”).

1. A Kohathite Levite, son of Assir and father of Uriel, or Zephaniah, in the ancestry of Samuel and Heman (1 Chron. 6:24, 37).

2. An Ephraimite, son of Bered and father of Eleadah (1 Chron. 7:20). Perhaps identical with Tahan, no. 1.

3. Apparently the grandson of the foregoing, being registered as a son of Eleadah and the father of Zabad (1 Chron. 7:20).

4. The name of a desert station between Makheloth and Terah (Num. 33:26); not identified.

TAHCH'EMONITE, THE (tak'e-mo-nīt; Tachmonite, KJV; Tahkemonite, NIV). “A Tahchemonite, chief of the captains,” among David’s men (2 Sam. 23:8), is in 1 Chron. 11:11 called “Jashobeam, the son of a Hachmonite.” Kennicott has concluded that “the Tahchemonite” is a corruption of the “son of Hachmoni,” which was the family or local name of Jashobeam; thus, he concludes “Jashobeam the Hachmonite” to have been the true reading.

TAH'PANHES (ta'pan-hēz; Jer. 2:16; 43:7–9; 44:1; 46:14), Tahap'anes, ta-hap'a-nēz;

Jer. 2:16, KJV, or Tehaph'nehes (te-haf'ne-hēz; Ezek. 30:18). An important city in the time of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Jeremiah (Jer. 39) and Josephus (Ant. 10.9.1) say that Nebuchadnezzar (Nebuzaradan) had taken Jerusalem, made Zedekiah captive, burned the city, and carried away most of the inhabitants to Babylon. A feeble remnant of Judah gathered under Johanan and fled to Tahpanhes, in Egypt. In this party were the king’s daughters, Jeremiah the prophet, and Baruch, his scribe (compare other passages above). Here stood a house of Pharaoh, respecting which the command came to Jeremiah, “Take some large stones in your hands and hide them in the mortar in the brick terrace which is at the entrance of Pharaoh’s palace in Tahpanhes, in the sight of some of the Jews; and say to them, ‘Thus says the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, “Behold, I am going to send and get Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, My servant, and I am going to set his throne right over these stones that I have hidden; and he will spread his canopy over them,” ’” (Jer. 43:8–10). That this prediction became history, and that the Babylonian king did twice invade Egypt and conquered it, is no longer doubted.

The site of Tahpanhes was found by Sir Flinders Petrie and identified with modern Tell Defenneh, an Egyptian frontier town at the easternmost mouth of the Nile River in the Delta. Petrie excavated at the site in 1883 and 1884 and found a pavement thought to be the one referred to in Jer. 43. It was a platform that served as part of the complex of fortifications. Petrie also discovered a small fort dating back to Rameses I and II (thirteenth century B.C.), although the city itself was built during the reign of Psamtik (663–609). H.F.V.

TAH'PENES (ta'pen-ēz). An Egyptian wife of the pharaoh who received Hadad, the Edomite prince, when he fled from his father's desolated capital (1 Kings 11:18–20), about 940 B.C. The sister of Tahpenes was given to Hadad in marriage, and their son, Genubath, was “weaned” by the queen herself and brought up “in Pharaoh's house among the sons of Pharaoh.” At that time Egypt was divided into perhaps three monarchies. Psusennes, of the Tanitic line, has been conjectured to have been the husband of this Tahpenes, and the brother-in-law of Hadad, and the father-in-law of Solomon; but there has been no name found among those of that period bearing any resemblance to Tahpenes.

TA'HREA (ta'rē-a). A great-grandson of Jonathan, and one of the four sons of Micah (1 Chron. 9:41), after 1037 B.C. In the parallel passage (8:35) he is called Tarea (which see).

TAH'TIM-HOD'SHI (ta-tim-hod'shi). One of the places visited by Joab during his census of the land of Israel. It occurs between Gilead and Dan-jaan (2 Sam. 24:6). The name has puzzled all the interpreters but is thought by some to mean “the Hittites of Kadesh.” See Kadesh.

TAIL. See Fat Tail.

TAILOR. See Dress.

TAKEN UP (Gk. metatethē, “placed over into another sphere”). The term is used in Heb. 11:5 of Enoch who was “taken up [KJV, ‘translated’] so that he should not see death ... for he obtained the witness that before his being taken up he was pleasing to God.” Genesis 5:24 records that he was changed without seeing death from an unglorified earthly state to one of glory and heavenly immortality.

TALENT. A weight and a unit of money. See Metrology.

TAL'THA KUM (tal'i-tha koom). Two Aram. words (Mark 5:41), signifying “Little girl, arise.”

TAL'MAI (tal'mī; “pertaining to furrows, plowman,” but cf. Hurrian talma, “big”).

1. One of the gigantic sons of Anak who dwelt in Hebron (Num. 13:22). They were expelled from their stronghold by Caleb (Josh. 15:14) and killed by the men of Judah (Judg. 1:10), about 1380 B.C. There is a tall race, of light complexion, figured on the Egyptian monuments and called in the hieroglyphic inscriptions Tanmahu, who have been supposed to represent the descendants of this man. The interchange of the sound l for n, so constant in all languages, makes plausible the conjecture that this is the Egyptian rendering of Talmi.

2. The son of Ammihud, and king of Geshur, a small Aramaean kingdom in the NE of Bashan (2 Sam. 3:3; 13:37; 1 Chron. 3:2). His daughter Maacah was one of David's wives and mother of Absalom, before 1000 B.C.

TAL'MON (tal'mon). The head of a family of gatekeepers in the Temple, “the gatekeepers for the camp of the sons of Levi” (1 Chron. 9:17–18; Neh. 11:19). Some of his descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45) and were employed in their hereditary office in the days of Nehemiah and Ezra (12:25).

TA'MAH (ta'ma). See Temah.

TA'MAR (ta'mer; “a palm tree”).

1. The wife of Er, the son of Judah and, after his death, of his brother Onan. The sudden death of his two sons so soon after their marriage with Tamar made Judah hesitate to give her the third also, thinking, very likely, according to a superstition (Tobit 2:7ff.), that either she herself or marriage with her had been the cause of their deaths. He therefore sent her to her father, with the promise that he would give her his youngest son as soon as he was grown up, though he never intended to do so. Desirous of retaining the family inheritance and name through children, Tamar waited until satisfied that Shelah was not to be given to her as a husband and then determined to procure children from Judah himself, who had become a widower. She ensnared him by pretending to be a prostitute consecrated to the impure rites of Canaanite worship. He gave her pledges, which she produced some three months later, when she was accused of unchastity and sentenced to death by Judah. He acknowledged his own guilt and the provocation he had furnished her to do wrong. Tamar's life was spared, and she became the mother of the twins Perez and Zerah (Gen. 38:6–30; Matt. 1:3), about 1925 B.C.

2. A daughter of David by Maacah, as is evident from her being the full sister of Absalom (2 Sam. 13:1; cf. 3:3). Amnon, the eldest son of David by Ahinoam (3:2), desired Tamar because of her beauty, and, being unable to gratify that desire, he "made himself ill." Jonadab noticed his condition and, learning its cause, suggested to him the means of accomplishing his purpose. Amnon feigned illness and begged his father, who visited him, to allow his sister to come to his house and prepare food for which he had a fancy. She came and prepared some cakes, probably in an outer room; but Amnon refused to eat, and, ordering all his attendants to retire, he called her into his chamber and there raped her. Amnon's love gave way to brutal hatred, and he ordered her to leave his apartments. Tamar remonstrated, telling him that this wrong would be greater than that already done her. The meaning of this seems to be that by being thus sent away it would inevitably be supposed that she had been guilty of some shameful conduct herself. Her brother would not listen to her but ordered one of the attendants to put her out and bolt the door. Despite the fact that she wore the dress of a princess, a "long-sleeved garment," Amnon's servant treated her as a common woman and turned her out of the house. Then Tamar put ashes upon her head, rent her royal dress, laid her hand upon her head, and ran crying through the streets. She shortly encountered Absalom, who took her to his house, where she remained in a state of widowhood. David failed to punish the crime of his firstborn, but Tamar was avenged two years afterward by Absalom (13:1–32; 1 Chron. 3:9), about 980 B.C.

3. Daughter of Absalom (2 Sam. 14:27). She ultimately, by her marriage with Uriel of Gibeah, became the mother of Maacah, the future queen of Judah, or wife of Abijah (1 Kings 15:2).

4. A place on the southern border of Palestine, supposed to be Thamara, on the road from Hebron to Elath (Ezek. 47:19; 48:28).

TAMARISK TREE (Gen. 21:33; 1 Sam. 22:6; 31:13). A tree planted by Abraham at Beersheba when he "called on the name of the Lord, the Everlasting God." With its long life, hard wood, and evergreen leaves, this tree was a type of the ever-enduring grace of the faithful, covenant-keeping God. See also Vegetable Kingdom.

TA'NACH (ta'nak; Josh. 21:25, KJV). See Taanach.

TANHU'METH (tan-hu'meth; "consolation"). The father of Seraiah (which see), in the time of Gedaliah (2 Kings 25:23), 588 B.C. In this passage he appears as a Netophathite by the clerical omission of another name, as is evident from the parallel passage (Jer. 40:8).

TANIS. See Zoan-Tanis.

TANNER. A dresser of hides (Acts 9:43). See Handicrafts: Leatherworker.

TA'PHATH (ta'fath). The daughter of Solomon, who married Ben-abinadab, who was deputy for the region of Dor (1 Kings 4:11), after 960 B.C.

TAPPU'AH (tap-pū'a; an "apple").

1. The second named of the four sons of Hebron, of the lineage of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:43), before 1370 B.C.

2. A city of Judah in the Shephelah, or lowland (Josh. 15:34), probably Beit-Nettif (Beth-letepha, a corruption of Beth-el-Taphua).

3. A town in the tribe of Ephraim (Josh. 16:8), near Manasseh, in which latter territory probably lay the "land of Tappuah" (17:8). It probably contained a fine spring, hence Entappuah, and is commonly identified with Sheik Abu Zarad, near present-day Jāsūf, about eight miles S of Shechem.

TAR. See Mineral Kingdom.

TA'RAH (ta'ra). See Terah.

TAR'ALAH (tar'a-la). A town in the western section of the territory of Benjamin (Josh. 18:27), perhaps identical with the modern village of Beit-Tirza in Wadi Ahmed, N of Beit-Jala.

TA'REA (ta're-a). Son of Micah, in the lineage of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:35; "Tahrea" in 9:41).

TARES. See Vegetable Kingdom.

TARGET (Heb. kîdôn), a javelin (1 Sam. 17:6, KJV); or šinnâ, a large shield (1 Kings 10:16; 2 Chron. 9:15; 14:8, KJV). The NIV renders Heb. maṭṭār (1 Sam. 20:20; Job 16:12), maṭṭārā (Lam. 3:12), and mīpā (Job 7:20) as "target."

TAR'PELITES (tar'pel-its; only Ezra 4:9, KJV). Some conjecture that the word has no ethnic connotation but is a special title of Persian officials at Samaria. See Tripolis.

TAR'SHISH (tar'shish).

1. This is a Phoenician word from the Akkad. meaning smelting plant or refinery. The term tarshish is employed in the OT in connection with ships, merchants, and trade (1 Kings 10:22; 22:48; "trading ships," NIV). The "navy," or "fleet of Tarshish" (Heb. ōnî tarshîsh) that Solomon's ally Hiram I of Tyre built for the Hebrew monarch at Ezion-geber on the Persian Gulf has been illuminated from ancient oriental sources. A better rendering of Solomon's merchant marine in the light of increased knowledge of early Phoenician trading activities in the Mediterranean would be "smeltery" or "refining fleet," which brought smelted metal home from the colonial mines. Phoenician boats used to ply the sea regularly, transporting smelted ores from the mining towns in Sardinia and Spain. A Phoenician inscription from Nora in Sardinia from the ninth century B.C. refers to a tarshish, or smelting site, on this island. Smeltery fleets or tarshish ships hauled material from this and other mining stations in the western Mediterranean. Ships of tarshish were built by Jehoshaphat in imitation of Solomon. His venture, however, came to grief (22:49; 2 Chron. 20:36–37). Tarshish ships developed from the original idea of material-carrying boats to all ships of first-rate magnitude to whatever place the voyage may have taken them (Ps. 48:7; Isa. 23:1; 60:9; Ezek. 27:25).

2. Second son of Javan, the grandson of Japheth (Gen. 10:4; 1 Chron. 1:7).

3. A man, the son of Bilhan, the Benjaminite (1 Chron. 7:10).

4. A high Persian official at Susa (Shushan, KJV; Esther 1:14). M.F.U.

TAR'SUS (tar'sus). The capital of Cilicia, and the birthplace and early residence of the apostle Paul (Acts 9:11; 21:39; 22:3). The passages 9:30 and 11:25 give the limits of his residence in his native town, which succeeded the first visit to Jerusalem and preceded his active ministry at Antioch and elsewhere (cf. 22:21; Gal. 1:21). It was during this period, probably, that he planted the gospel there, and it has never since entirely died out. It would seem that Paul was there also at the beginning of his second and third missionary journeys (Acts 15:41; 18:23).

Tarsus was situated in a wide and fertile plain on the banks of the Cydnus, which flowed through it; hence it is sometimes called Tarsoi in the plural. The founding of Tarsus is legendary. The Assyrians entered Cilicia c. 850 B.C., and Shalmaneser III's Black Obelisk mentions the taking of the city. It appears in history in Xenophon's time, when it was a city of considerable importance. It was occupied by Cyrus and his troops for twenty days and plundered.

After Alexander's conquests had swept this way and the Seleucid kingdom was established at Antioch, Tarsus usually belonged to that kingdom, though for a time it was under the Ptolemies. In the civil wars of Rome it took Caesar's side, and on the occasion of a visit from him had its name changed to Juliopolis. Augustus made it a "free city." It was renowned as a place of education under the early Roman emperors. Strabo compares it in this respect to Athens and Alexandria. Tarsus also was a place of much commerce.

"It is probable, but not certain, that Paul's family had been planted in Tarsus with full rights as part of a colony settled there by one of the Seleucid kings in order to strengthen their hold on the city.... The Seleucid kings seem to have had a preference for Jewish colonists in their foundations in Asia Minor" (Ramsay, Paul the Traveller, p. 32). Both land and sea highways made Tarsus a famed ancient emporium. The famous Cilician Gates, one of antiquity's most famous mountain passes, is not far distant, and access by water to the Mediterranean made Tarsus a famous trading center.

TAR'TAK. See Gods, False.

TAR'TAN (tar'tan; Assyr. tartanu and turtanu). The title or official designation of the commander in chief of the Assyrian army (2 Kings 18:17; the NIV translates the term as "supreme commander"). Archaeology has shown conclusively that the expression "tartan" is not a proper name. M.F.U.

TASKMASTERS (Heb. šārê missîm, "masters of burdens," Ex. 1:11; nāgaś, to "drive," 3:7; 5:6–14). Persons appointed by order of Pharaoh to see that the Hebrews were assigned hard, wearing toil. It was his hope, by such oppression, to break down the physical strength of Israel and thus lessen their offspring; and also to crush their spirit so as to banish the very wish for liberty. So Israel was compelled to build provision cities, i.e., cities for storing the harvests.

TASSEL (Heb. gdîl, "twisted" thread, Deut. 22:12; šîšîl, "flowery, bloomlike," as in Num. 15:38–39). In both references, the KJV renders the word "fringe." Tassels were to be sewn upon the hem of the outside garment to remind the Israelites of the commandments of God, that they might have them constantly before their eyes and follow them. These tassels were made of twisted blue thread and fastened upon each corner of the garment. The color blue was used to remind the Jews of the heavenly origin of the law. Fringed garments, elaborately wrought, were common among the ancient Egyptians and Babylonians.

TAT'TENAI (tat'en-ī). A Persian governor of Samaria when Zerubbabel began to rebuild Jerusalem. He seems to have been appealed to by the Samaritans to oppose that undertaking and, accompanied by another high official, Shethar-bozenai, went to Jerusalem. They sent a fair and temperate report of what they saw and heard to the supreme government, suggesting that search be instituted to learn whether the building was going on in accordance with a royal decree (Ezra 5:3, 6). The statement of the work of the Jews was verified by the discovery of the original decree of Cyrus, and Tattenai and his colleagues applied themselves with vigor to the execution of the royal commands (6:6, 13), 536–519 B.C.

TATTLER (Gr. phluaros, from phluō, “to throw up bubbles,” 1 Tim. 5:13, KJV). A gossip.

TAXES.

In Early Times. From the very beginning of the Mosaic polity provision was made for a national income. Taxes, like all other things in that polity, had a religious origin and import. While Israel was in the migratory state, only such incidental taxes were levied, or, rather, such voluntary contributions were received as need required. Only when the nation became settled in Palestine did taxation assume a regular and organized form.

Under the Judges. Under the theocratic government, provided for by the law, the only payments obligatory upon the people as being of permanent obligation were: the tithes (which see), the firstfruits (which see), the redemption money of the firstborn (which see), and such other offerings as belonged to special occasions.

Under the Monarchy. The kingdom, with its centralized government and greater magnificence, involved, of course, a larger expenditure and, therefore, a heavier taxation. The chief burdens appear to have been: (1) A tithe of the produce both of the soil and of livestock (1 Sam. 8:15, 17); (2) forced military service for a month every year (1 Sam. 8:12; 1 Kings 9:22; 1 Chron. 27:1); (3) gifts to the king (1 Sam. 10:27; 16:20; 17:18); (4) import duties (1 Kings 10:15); (5) the monopoly of certain branches of commerce (1 Kings 9:28; 10:28–29); (6) the appropriation to the king's use of the early crop of hay (Amos 7:1). At times, too, in the history of both kingdoms there were special burdens. A tribute of fifty shekels a head had to be paid by Menahem to the Assyrian king (2 Kings 15:20), and under his successor, Hoshea, this assumed the form of an annual tribute (17:4).

Under the Persians. The financial system of Darius Hystaspes provided for the payment by each satrap of a fixed sum as the tribute due from his province. In Judea, as in other provinces, the inhabitants had to provide in kind for the maintenance of the governor's household, besides a money payment of forty shekels a day (Neh. 5:14–15). A formal enumeration is given in Ezra 4:13 and 7:24 of the three great branches of the revenue: (1) the fixed, measured payments (Heb. middâ), probably direct taxation; (2) the excise or octroi, on articles of consumption (Heb. b□lō); (3) probably toll payable at bridges, forts, or certain stations on the highway, Heb. hēlek. The influence of Ezra secured for the whole ecclesiastical order, from the priests down to the Temple servants, an immunity from all three (Ezra 7:24); but the burden pressed heavily upon the people in general.

Under Egypt and Syria. The taxes imposed upon the Jews became still heavier, the “farming” system of finance being adopted in the worst form. The taxes were put up at auction; and the contract sum for those of Phoenicia, Judea, and Samaria has been estimated at about 8,000 talents. A man would bid double that sum and would then force from the province a handsome profit for himself.

Roman Taxation. “The Roman taxation, which bore upon Israel with such crushing weight, was systematic, cruel, relentless, and utterly regardless. In general, the provinces of the Roman empire, and what of Palestine belonged to them, were subject to two great taxes—poll tax (or, rather, income tax) and ground tax. All property and income that fell not under the ground tax was subject to poll tax, which amounted for Syria and Cilicia to one per cent. The poll tax was really twofold, consisting of income tax and head money, the latter, of course, the same in all cases, and levied on all persons (bond or free) up to the age of sixty-five—women being liable from the age of twelve, and men from that of fourteen. Landed property was subject to a tax of one tenth of all grain and one fifth of the wine and fruit grown, partly in product and partly commuted into money. Besides these, there was tax and duty on all imports and exports, levied on the great public highways and in the seaports. Then there was bridge money and road money, and duty on all that was bought and sold in the towns.... The Romans had a peculiar way of levying these taxes—not directly, but indirectly—which kept the treasury quite safe, whatever harm it might inflict upon the taxpayer, while at the same time it threw upon him the whole cost of the collection. Senators and magistrates were prohibited from engaging in business or trade; but the highest order, the equestrian, was largely composed of great capitalists. These Roman knights formed joint stock companies which bought at public auction the revenues of a province at a fixed price, generally for five years. The board had its chairman, or magister, and its offices at Rome. These were the real publicans, who underlet certain of the taxes” (Edersheim, Sketches of Jewish Social Life, pp. 53ff.). TAX-GATHERER (Gk. telōnēs; KJV “publican”). A collector of the Roman revenue. The Roman Senate had found it convenient, at a period as early as—if not earlier than—the second Punic war, to farm the vectigalia (direct taxes) and the portoria (customs) to capitalists, who undertook to pay a given sum into the treasury (in publicum) and so received the name of publicani. Contracts of this kind fell naturally into the hands of the equites, who were the commercial and financial class of Romans. Not infrequently they went beyond the means of any individual capitalist, and a joint-stock company (societas) was formed, with one of the partners, or an agent appointed by them, acting as managing director (magister). Under this officer, who resided commonly at Rome, transacting the business of the company, paying profits to the partners and the like, were the submagistri, living in the provinces. Under them, in like manner, were the portitores, the actual customhouse officers, who examined each bale of goods exported or imported, assessed its value more or less arbitrarily, wrote out the ticket, and enforced payment. The latter were commonly natives of the province in which they were stationed, being brought daily into contact with all classes of the population. It is this class (portitores) to which the term tax-gatherer refers exclusively in the NT. These tax-gatherers were encouraged by their superior in vexatious and even fraudulent exactions, and remedy was almost impossible. They overcharged (Luke 3:13) and brought false charges of smuggling in the hope of extorting hush money (19:8). The strong feeling of many Jews as to the unlawfulness of paying tribute made matters worse. The scribes (Matt. 22:16–21) for the most part were not against it and thus were considered traitors. The publicans were also regarded as traitors and apostates, defiled by their frequent contacts with the heathen and being willing tools of the oppressor. Practically excommunicated, this class furnished some of the earliest disciples of John the Baptist and Jesus. The position of Zaccheus as a “chief tax-gatherer” (Luke 19:2, Gk. architelōnēs) implies a gradation of some kind among the publicans; perhaps he was one of the submagistri. In Augustus’s day (27 B.C.-A.D. 14) the practice of selling tax-collection contracts to joint-stock companies ceased, and tax collectors were put on the public payroll. Thus a kind of Internal Revenue Service was established and continued through the rest of the NT period.

“The Talmud distinguishes two classes of publicans—the tax-gatherer in general (Gabbai) and the Mokhes or Mokhsa, who was specially the douanier, or customhouse official. Although both classes fell under the rabbinic ban, the douanier—such as Matthew was—was the object of chief execration. And this because his exactions were more vexatious and gave more scope to rapacity. The Gabbai, or tax-gatherer, collected the regular dues, which consisted of ground, income, and poll tax.... If this offered many opportunities for vexatious exactions and rapacious injustice, the Mokhes might inflict much greater hardship upon the poor people. There was a tax and duty upon all imports and exports; on all that was bought and sold; bridge money, road money, harbor dues, town dues, etc. The classical reader knows the ingenuity which could invent a tax and find a name for every kind of exaction, such as on axles, wheels, pack animals, pedestrians, roads, highways; on admission to markets; on carriers, bridges, ships, and quays; on crossing rivers, on dams, on licenses—in short, on such a variety of objects that even the research of modern scholars has not been able to identify all the names. But even this was as nothing compared to the vexation of being constantly stopped on the journey, having to unload all one’s pack animals, when every bale and package was opened, and the contents tumbled about, private letters opened, and the Mokhes ruled supreme in his insolence and rapacity” (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, 1:515ff.). TEACH (Heb. properly lāmad, but many other words also; Gk. didaskō, and other terms). Inasmuch as men are delivered from the bondage of sin and built up in righteousness through the agency of the truth, teaching becomes essential. Moses and Aaron were teachers of Israel in the statutes of Jehovah (Ex. 18:20; Lev. 10:11; 14:57), having been first taught of God (Ex. 4:12). Moses commanded fathers to teach their children the commandments of God with persistency and care (Deut. 4:9–10, 14; 11:19). The priests were to instruct the people, especially by reading the law to them at the feast of Tabernacles, in the seventh year (24:8; 31:9–13). It is frequently recorded of Jesus that He taught the people (Matt. 5:2; Mark 1:21; 4:2; Luke 4:15, 31; etc.).

Teaching is an important branch of the commission that Christ gave to His apostles before His ascension. “Go,” said He, “and make disciples of all the nations, ... teaching them” (Matt. 28:19–20); as recorded by Mark, another evangelist, “Preach the gospel to all creation” (Mark 16:15). In this way they were to make disciples, as the Gk. mathēteusate states. It is one of the precious promises of the new covenant that all its subjects shall be “taught of the Lord” (Isa. 54:13; quoted by Jesus, John 6:45).

“Teachers” are mentioned as among those receiving divine gifts (Eph. 4:11), i.e., those who taught in the religious assemblies of Christians, with the special assistance of the Holy Spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 12:28–30; Acts 13:1; James 3:1). If anyone was accepted as a teacher in this sense, he was the more dangerous, as he would seem to be inspired in his utterances (2:1).

TEACHER (Gk. didaskalos, Luke 2:46; 5:17; Acts 5:34). Jewish teachers, at least some of them, had private lecture rooms but also taught in public. Their method was the same as prevailed among the Greeks, that is, any disciple was allowed to ask questions to which the teacher replied. They did not have any official position and received no salary other than voluntary gifts from their disciples. They were chiefly of the sect of the Pharisees. See Lawyer; Rabbi.

TEARS. See Mourn.

TE'BAH (te'ba; “slaughter”). The first named of the four sons of Nahor by his concubine Reumah (Gen. 22:24). See Betah.

TEBALI'AH (teb-a-lī'a; “Jehovah has immersed,” i.e., “dipped or immersed”). The third named of the sons of Hosah, “of the sons of Merari” (1 Chron. 26:10, 11). See Tabaliah.

TE'BETH (te'beth; Akkad. tebetu, “the month of sinking in,” i.e., wet, muddy month). The tenth month of the second year of the Hebrews (Esther 2:16), corresponding in the main to January.

TEHAPH'NEHES (te-haf'ne-hēz; Ezek. 30:18). See Tahpanhes.

TEHIN'NAH (te-hin'na; “graciousness”). A name occurring in the genealogy of the men of Recah, of the tribe of Judah. He is mentioned as a son of Eshton and founder of the city of Ir-nahash (1 Chron. 4:12).

TEIL TREE. See Vegetable Kingdom.

TE'KEL (te'kel; Aram. tīkal, “weighed”). The second word in the sentence of the Babylonian king (Dan. 5:25, 27). The interpretation presents the double meaning “You have been weighed on the scales and found deficient,” i.e., in moral worth.

TEKO'A (te-kō'a; perhaps “trumpet clang”). A town in Judah, about six miles S of Bethlehem and on the range of hills that rise near Hebron and stretch toward the Dead Sea. By the “wilderness of Tekoa” (2 Chron. 20:20) must be understood the adjacent region E of the town. Tekoa is now called Tequa and is a ruined site, showing many Hebrew traces. Tekoa is first mentioned in the account (2 Sam. 14:2, 4, 9) of Joab's employing a “wise woman” residing there to effect a reconciliation between David and Absalom. Here also Ira the son of Ikkes, one of David's thirty “mighty men,” was born, and therefore was called “the Tekoite” (23:26). Tekoa was one of the places fortified by Rehoboam at the beginning of his reign to prevent an invasion from the S (2 Chron. 11:6). People from Tekoa took part in building the walls of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 3:5, 27). Jeremiah exclaims (Jer. 6:1), “Now blow a trumpet in Tekoa, and raise a signal over Beth-haccerem,” both signals warning of an enemy's approach. Tekoa was also the birthplace of Amos (Amos 1:1), and here he was called to be a prophet of God.

TEKO'ITE (te-kō'it). An inhabitant of Tekoah (which see).

TEL-A´BIB (tel-a´bib; “mound or hill of ears of grain”). The residence of Ezekiel on the river Chebar (Ezek. 3:15). The Chebar was a great canal (called a river, Nāru in Babylonia) SE of Babylon. Tel-abib doubtless derives its name from the fertility of the valley, rich in grain, by which it was surrounded. The NIV renders it Tel Aviv.

TE´LAH (te´la; “fracture, breach, break”). The son of Rephah (or Resheph), and father of Tahan, in the lineage between Ephraim and Joshua (1 Chron. 7:25), before 1440 B.C.

TELA´IM (te-la´im; “young lambs”). Probably the same as Telem (which see), the place where Saul gathered his army to fight Amalek (1 Sam. 15:4).

TELAS´SAR (te-las´er; “the hill of Asshur”). A city that lay in the hill country of the upper Mesopotamian plain identified by some as Tel Afer. It is mentioned in 2 Kings 19:12 and in Isa. 37:12 as a city inhabited by “the sons of Eden,” which had been conquered and was held in the time of Sennacherib by the Assyrians. It was apparently a city of Bit Adini, a small kingdom on the upper Euphrates.

TEL A´VIV. See Tel Abib.

TE´LEM (te´lem).

1. One of the Temple gatekeepers who put away his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:24), 456 b.c.
2. A town on the southern border of Judah (Josh. 15:24), between Ziph and Bealoth. It is very probably the same as Telaim (which see).

TEL-HAR´ESHA (tel-har´e-sha; Neh. 7:61, KJV). See Tel-harsha.

TEL-HAR´SHA (tel-har´sha; “mound of workmanship”), Tel Harsha (NIV), Tel-harsa (KJV). One of the Babylonian towns from which some Jews, who “could not show their fathers’ houses, or their descendants, whether they were of Israel,” returned to Judea with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:61; cf. Ezra 2:59). It was probably in the low country near the sea, in the neighborhood of Tel-melah and Cherub.

TELL. An Arab. word denoting a truncated artificial mound built up by successive layers of ancient civilization. The word occurs in Heb. in Josh. 11:13: “Israel did not burn any cities that stood on their mounds [Heb. al tillam], except Hazor alone, which Joshua burned.” The word tell is now widely used in place names in Arab countries in the Near Middle East and in Egypt and, as correctly translated in the biblical passage, denotes a mound. Examples of place names incorporating tell are numerous in Palestine: Tell en Nasbeh, Tell el Ful (Gibeah), Tell Jezer (Gezer), Tell ed-Duweir (Lachish), etc. In Egypt the well-known Tell Amarna is found. In Mesopotamia examples are Tell Abib, Tell Melah, and many others. When a site had been occupied for many centuries, the occupational levels formed one upon another “in such a way as to suggest a giant layer cake” (Millar Burrows, What Mean These Stones? [1941], p. 12). Digging in such a way as to keep the superimposed occupational levels distinct is the modern scientific means of excavation. The remains found in each layer, particularly pottery, may be carefully studied and clearly dated as the result of the now-developed science of stratigraphy. When a city was destroyed by a catastrophe such as war, fire, or earthquake, new settlers simply leveled the ruins and built upon them. Thus the ground level of the new city was raised several feet higher than the old one and the remnants of the old lay under the new. This process kept repeating as time went on until the occupational site rose higher and higher. When the site was finally abandoned, the winds and rains of many years leveled off the top and eroded the sides, except where the process was arrested by a city wall. This is the explanation of the flat tops of the mounds. The fact that ancient oriental cities followed this pattern has been one of the greatest boons to modern scientific archaeology and the precise dating of ancient cultures. Tell Beisan (see figure 6), the ancient fortress city of Beth-shan (1 Sam. 31:10), which guarded the eastern approaches of the valley of Esdraelon, has been excavated and shows eighteen levels from the top, running from A.D. 600 (Level 1) to c. 3500 B.C. (Level 18). When the archaeologist strikes virgin soil, he knows he has reached the time when the site was first occupied. M.F.U.

TELL EL-AMARNA (tel el-a-mar'na; "mound of the city of the horizon"). The frequent name for the Amarna site, though there has never been a mound there. It is the ancient Akhetaton, the capital city of Amenhotep IV (Akhnaton) who reigned c. 1387–1366 B.C. See Amarna, el-.

TEL-ME'LAH (tel-me'la; "hill of salt," called in 1 Esd. 5:36 "Thermeleth"). A place probably near the Persian Gulf, from which the Jews returned (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61).

TE'MA (tē'ma). The ninth son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chron. 1:30); from whom came the tribe called after him, mentioned in Job 6:19; Jer. 25:23; also the land occupied by this tribe (Isa. 21:14). It denotes Taima in Arabia midway between Damascus and Mecca.

TE'MAH (tē'ma). The sons of Temah were among the Temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:53; Neh. 7:55), before 536 B.C.

TE'MAN (tē'man; the "south," or "right").

1. The eldest son of Eliphaz, the son of Esau (Gen. 36:11; 1 Chron. 1:36). He was a chief of the Edomites (Gen. 36:15, 42; 1 Chron. 1:36, 53) and gave his name to the region in which the tribe he founded settled (Gen. 36:34), after 1900 B.C.

2. The country of the Temanites, the southern portion of Edom. In after ages it was the chief stronghold of Edom; hence when the Lord, by the prophet Ezekiel, pronounced the doom of Edom, He said, "I will lay it waste; from Teman even to Dedan they will fall by the sword" (Ezek. 25:13). The Temanites were celebrated for their courage and wisdom (Jer. 49:7); hence the force and point of Obadiah's judgment "Your mighty men will be dismayed, O Teman" (Obad. 9). In Hab. 3:3 Teman is used for Edom in general.

TEMPERANCE. See Self-control; Temperate.

TEMPERATE (Gk. sōphrōn). Has the meaning of a sound mind (Titus 2:2).

TEMPLE. A building set apart for the worship of a deity. Here attention is especially called to the three buildings at Jerusalem that successively bore the name of Temple. As these were all built upon the same site and after the same general pattern, they were in nature and design the same, namely, that of the one built by Solomon. This latter was, in its essential features, a reproduction of the Tabernacle, in more lasting material and having the necessary adjuncts of a permanent building.

Name. The usual and appropriate Heb. term for temple is hēkāl, an old Akkad. word signifying "palace, a large building," frequently joined with Jehovah, and denoting "the palace of deity." Occasionally it is also qualified by qōdesh ("sanctuary"), to designate its sacredness. Sometimes the simpler phrase "house of Jehovah" (Heb. beth yhw̄h) is used.

The Gk. terms employed are naos ("shrine"), and hieron (a "sacred" place).

The Temple of Solomon. The idea that the Tabernacle, a temporary building, should be supplanted by a permanent one of stone, seems to have been suggested to David by the Spirit (1 Chron. 28:12, 19), especially after he had secured peace by conquest of his enemies (2 Sam. 7:1–13; 1 Chron. 17:1–14; 28:1–19); but he was forbidden to build for the reason that he stated to Solomon, “But the word of the Lord came to me, saying, ‘You have shed much blood, and have waged great wars; you shall not build a house to My name, because you have shed so much blood on the earth before Me’” (1 Chron. 22:8). He, however, collected much material for the building and made arrangements to have the task completed by his son Solomon. The latter was a man of peace, and his reign a period of peace and prosperity (2 Sam. 7:9–13; 1 Kings 5:3–4; 1 Chron. 22:7–10).

Preparation. Solomon, as soon as he was securely seated upon the throne, made arrangements for beginning to build the Temple (1 Chron. 22, 28–29). He entered into a treaty with Hiram king of Tyre, stipulating that this monarch should permit him to get cedar and cypress wood and blocks of stone from Lebanon, and that he would allow workmen sent by Solomon to fell the wood and quarry and hew the stones, under the direction of skilled workmen, subjects of Hiram. In return Solomon was to send supplies of wheat, oil, and wine. It was also arranged that Solomon was to have the services of a skillful artist by the name of Hiram-abi to take charge of the castings and of the manufacture of the more valuable furnishings of the Temple (1 Kings 5; 2 Chron. 2). So, in the fourth year of his reign, c. 960 B.C., Solomon began the erection of the sacred edifice, which was built on Mt. Moriah to the E of Zion, an eminence that David himself had selected for the purpose when he built an altar upon it after the plague had ceased (1 Chron. 21:18, 26; 22:1). To secure an adequate site for the Temple and its courts, an area of at least 600 by 300 feet was required. The summit of the hill had to be leveled and slightly enlarged by means of fill and retaining walls built on the sides. The edifice was completed in the eleventh year of Solomon’s reign, i.e., in seven and a half years (c. 953 B.C.).

The Structure. The Temple proper was a building formed of hewn stones, 60 cubits long, 20 wide, and 30 in height (measuring from the inside), and covered with a flat roof composed of rafters and boards of cedar, overlaid with marble (see figure 7 for a plan of the Temple). Josephus (Ant. 8.3.2) says, “[The height of the temple] was sixty cubits, and the length was the same, and its breadth twenty. There was another [story of equal dimensions]; so that the entire [height] of the temple was a hundred and twenty cubits.” Josephus probably gave the external dimensions, whereas in the book of Kings the internal measurements are given. Inside, the building was divided by means of a partition of cedar wood into the Holy Place and the Most Holy Place, so that the former was 40 cubits long, 20 wide, and 30 high, and the latter was a cube measuring 20 cubits in each direction. The other 10 cubits formed “upper rooms” (2 Chron. 3:9). On the inside the walls were lined with wood, so as to cover the stones; the walls and roof were covered with cedar and the floor with planks of cypress wood. The side walls were covered over with carved work, representing cherubim, palms, garlands, and opening flowers (1 Kings 6:18; 2 Chron. 3:5), so that all was overlaid with thin plates of gold. The floor as well as the walls and ceilings were covered with gold (1 Kings 6:30).

The entrance to the Holy of Holies consisted of a folding door in the partition wall, four cubits wide, made of olive wood and ornamented with overlaid carvings of cherubim, palms, and opening flowers. These doors, as well as those at the entrance of the Holy Place, were hung on hinges of gold (7:50). These doors stood open, but a veil, similar in material and ornamentation to the veil in the Tabernacle, hung over them. The entrance to the Holy Place consisted of a folding door of cypress wood with doorposts of olive wood, each one being divided into an upper and lower section (like Dutch doors), and ornamented in the same manner as the door of the Holy of Holies.

In the front of the building was a porch 20 cubits wide and 10 cubits deep (6:3; 2 Chron. 3:4). There would seem to be an error in the text (cf. 2 Chron. 3:4) as to the height of the “porch”; because a front 120 cubits high to a house only 30 cubits high could not properly be called ulām (a “porch”); it could only have been a migdāl (a “tower”). Two bronze pillars, Jachin and Boaz (see below), stood at the entrance of the Temple. On the sides and rear of the building, wings were added, each three stories high, containing rooms for storing furniture and provisions required for the Temple service. These wings were so constructed that the rafters of the different stories rested upon projections on the outside of the walls of the main building, so as to avoid inserting them in the walls themselves (1 Kings 6:5–6). Each story was 5 cubits high, and 5, 6, and 7 cubits wide, respectively; they were connected by passages and stairs (6:8).

The Courts. There was an inner court (1 Kings 6:36) running around the Temple and reserved exclusively for the priests. It was formed by an outer or boundary wall, composed of three layers of hewn stone and a “row of cedar beams,” probably laid upon the stones to protect the masonry. Outside of this was the “great court” (2 Chron. 4:9), intended for the use of the people and probably enclosed with masonry. Access to it was by doors of bronze. From the fact that the (inner) court of the priests is called “the upper court” (Jer. 36:10), it is likely that it was on a higher level than the outer court; and it is not unlikely that the Temple itself was higher than the inner court, so that the whole would have a terracelike aspect. So far as can be gathered from subsequent statements of an incidental nature (2 Kings 23:11; Jer. 35:4; 36:10; Ezek. 8; etc.), it would appear that there were vestibules and porticoes at the gates of the outer court, and that, if we may judge from the pattern of the Temple, at all four sides, probably in the corners and on both sides of the gate, as the Temple of Ezekiel’s vision would seem to show. The measurement of the courts is not given, but following the analogy of the Tabernacle (cf. Ezek. 40:27), we may venture to assume that the court of the priests was 100 cubits, and the same in breadth, measuring it on the E, or front, side of the Temple. This would make the entire measurement 100 cubits wide by 200 in length. We will then have for the outer court an area of at least 400 cubits long and 200 cubits wide.

The Furniture. In the Holy of Holies was placed the Ark, with its Mercy Seat, which was taken from the Tabernacle. It stood between two cherubim, which were 10 cubits high, made of olive wood and overlaid with gold. Their wings were outstretched and were about 5 cubits long, touching each other over the Ark, while the outer wings touched the side walls of the room (1 Kings 6:23–28; 2 Chron. 3:10–13). They stood upon their feet and faced “the main room,” i.e., toward the Holy Place (3:13).

In the Holy Place were the altar of incense, or “golden altar” (1 Kings 7:48; cf. 6:22; 2 Chron. 4:19), made of cedar wood and overlaid with gold; ten golden lampstands with seven lamps to each (these were placed in front of the Holy of Holies, five of them being on the right side and five on the left; 1 Kings 7:49; 2 Chron. 4:7); and ten tables for the bread of the Presence, five being on each side (4:8). The form and construction of these objects have not been minutely described, as they were clearly modeled after those in the Tabernacle, only made on a larger scale to correspond with the greater dimensions of the Temple rooms. Of course the several articles of furniture were accompanied by their utensils—cups and snuffers for the lampstand and bowls, spoons, firepans, etc. for the tables (1 Kings 7:50; 2 Chron. 4:22; etc.).

In the inner court was the altar of burnt offering (1 Kings 8:64), which according to 2 Chron. 4:1 was 20 cubits square and 10 cubits high, and patterned after the one in the Tabernacle. The following utensils for this altar are mentioned: basins, shovels, bowls, pails, and forks (1 Kings 7:40, 45; 2 Chron. 4:11, 16). (See Altar.) A little to the S, but between the altar and the porch, stood the bronze sea, a huge round basin. There were also on each side of the altar, at the right and left wings of the Temple, ten bronze lesser lavers on wheels (1 Kings 7:27–39; 2 Chron. 4:6). See the article Laver.

Archaeology. Archaeology has shown that the plan of Solomon’s Temple was characteristically Phoenician, as would be expected, since it was constructed by a Tyrian architect (1 Kings 7:13–15). Similar plans of sanctuaries of the general period, 1200–900 B.C., have been excavated in northern Syria. The temple at Tell Tainat, excavated in 1936 by the University of Chicago, is smaller but similar to Solomon's structure. At Tell Tainat the shrine gives evidence that Solomon's Temple was pre-Greek and authentic as 1 Kings 6–7 would indicate. Archaeology has also shown that the proto-Aeolian pilaster capital, extensively used in Solomon's Temple, also was used at Megiddo, Samaria, and Shechem from the period 1000 to 700 B.C. The Temple decorations such as lilies, palmettes, and cherubim were likewise characteristically Syro-Phoenician. The cherubim or winged sphinxes appear hundreds of times in the iconography of western Asia between 1800 and 600 B.C. The two columns, Jachin and Boaz, are also illustrated at Tell Tainat and elsewhere in the ancient Near East. Such pillars flanked the main entrance of the Temple and were common in the first millennium B.C. in Syria, Phoenicia, and Cyprus. They spread to Assyria, where they are found in Sargon's temple at Khorsabad and to the Phoenician colonies in the Mediterranean. For archaeological light see the article Jachin and Boaz.

History. After the completion of the building, Solomon had the Ark placed in the Holy of Holies, and dedicated the Temple with solemn thanksgiving and prayer, accompanied with liberal thank offerings. This service, participated in by the heads of the tribes as well as by men from all parts of Israel, lasted seven days. So large was the number of animals offered that it was necessary for a time to convert the inner court in front of the porch into a place of sacrifice, as the altar of burnt offering was not capable of holding the multitude of sacrifices (1 Kings 8:1–6; 2 Chron. 5–6; 7:7). Immediately after the consecration prayer, which Solomon offered while kneeling upon the bronze platform that was erected in the inner court in front of the altar (2 Chron. 6:13), fire fell from heaven and consumed the burnt offering (7:1).

At the disruption of the kingdom, the Temple ceased to be the sanctuary of all the Israelite people; Jeroboam erected special places of worship at Bethel and Dan for the use of the revolting ten tribes; but the Temple continued to be the authorized center of worship for the kingdom of Judah. As early as the days of Rehoboam, the Temple treasures were plundered by Shishak king of Egypt (1 Kings 14:26), and gold and silver from there were subsequently sent to Ben-hadad, king of Syria, to purchase an alliance against Baasha, king of Israel (15:18–21).

Under Jehoshaphat the outer court was renewed (2 Chron. 20:5), and under Jehoash considerable repairs were made upon the Temple itself (2 Kings 12:5–12), necessitated by the havoc wrought by the wicked Athaliah (2 Chron. 24:7). During the reign of Amaziah all the gold and silver (as well as the utensils that had gold or silver about them) that were in the Temple were plundered by Jehoash king of Israel (2 Kings 14:14). After this Jotham "built the upper gate" of the Temple (15:35; 2 Chron. 27:3), probably at the entrance to the inner court. Ahaz, on the other hand, had the altar of burnt offering taken away and another put in its place, designed after one he had seen in Damascus; he also had the decorations removed from the laver stands, the basins themselves taken out, the oxen removed from under the bronze sea, and the latter placed upon a "pavement of stone" (2 Kings 16:10–17). This was done to secure for the king of Assyria those artistic objects, as he had already given him silver and gold from the Temple and palace (v. 8). King Hezekiah was also compelled to pay tribute to Sennacherib. He took silver from the Temple and stripped the gold from the Temple doors and posts (18:15–16). Worst of all was the desecration of the Temple by Manasseh. He caused altars for "all the host of heaven" to be erected in both courts, set up an image of Asherah in the sanctuary (21:4–5, 7), and erected in the Temple court "houses of the male cult prostitutes" (23:7), probably tents or huts, for the paramours to dwell in, and in which there were also women who wove tent-temples for Asherah. He kept horses consecrated to the sun in a place set apart for them in the inner court toward the back of the Temple (v. 11). Josiah purged the sacred place of these abominations (vv. 4–8); but soon afterward Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem and gathered together all the treasures of the Temple, including the golden utensils, and carried them off (24:13). Eleven years later Jerusalem was destroyed by the Chaldeans, who burned the Temple to the ground after pillaging it of its remaining valuables, which they took to Babylon (25:9, 13–17; Jer. 52:13, 17–23).

The Temple of Zerubbabel. “We have very few particulars regarding the temple which the Jews erected after their return from the captivity (about 520 B.C.), and no description that would enable us to realize its appearance. But there are some dimensions given in the Bible and elsewhere which are extremely interesting as affording points of comparison between it and the temples which preceded it, or were erected after it. The first and most authentic are those given in the Book of Ezra (6:3), when quoting the decree of Cyrus, wherein it is said, ‘Let the house be builded, the place where they offered sacrifices, and let the foundations thereof be strongly laid; the height thereof threescore cubits; and the breadth thereof threescore cubits; with three rows of great stones, and a row of new timber.’ Josephus quotes this passage almost literally, but in doing so enables us with certainty to translate the word here called row as ‘story’—as indeed the sense would lead us to infer. The other dimension of sixty cubits in breadth is twenty cubits in excess of that of Solomon’s temple, but there is no reason to doubt its correctness, for we find both from Josephus and the Talmud that it was the dimension adopted for the temple when rebuilt, or rather repaired, by Herod. We are left, therefore, with the alternative of assuming that the porch and the chambers all around were twenty cubits in width, including the thickness of the walls, instead of ten cubits, as in the earlier building. This alteration in the width of the pteromata made the temple one hundred cubits in length by sixty in breadth, with a height, it is said, of sixty cubits, including the upper room, or Talar, though we cannot help suspecting that this last dimension is somewhat in excess of the truth. The only other description of this temple is found in Hecataeus the Abderite, who wrote shortly after the death of Alexander the Great. As quoted by Josephus (Against Apion 1.22), he says that ‘There is [in Jerusalem] about the middle of the city, a wall of stone, the length of which is five hundred feet, and the breadth a hundred cubits, with double [gates],’ in which he describes the temple as being situated. Hecataeus also mentions that the altar was twenty cubits square and ten high. And although he mentions the temple itself, he unfortunately does not supply us with any dimensions. From these dimensions we gather that if ‘the priests and Levites and elders of families were disconsolate at seeing how much more sumptuous the old temple was than the one which on account of their poverty they had just been able to erect’ (Ezra 3:12), it certainly was not because it was smaller, as almost every dimension had been increased one third” (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

According to the Talmud this Temple lacked five things that were in Solomon’s Temple, namely, the Ark, the sacred fire, the Shekinah, the Holy Spirit, and the Urim and Thummim. The Holy of Holies was empty, and on the spot where the Ark should have stood, a stone was set upon which the high priest placed the censer on the great Day of Atonement. In the Holy Place there was only one golden lampstand, one table of the bread of the Presence, and the altar of incense (1 Macc. 1:21; 4:49); in the court was an altar of burnt offering built of stone (4:45–47).

History. This Temple was plundered by Antiochus Epiphanes, who also defiled it with idolatrous worship (1 Macc. 1:21–25, 37–39; 46–51; 4:38; 2 Macc. 6:2–5), but was restored by Judas Maccabeus (1 Macc. 4:36–51). He also fortified the outside against future attacks (6:7). It was taken by Pompey on the Day of Atonement after a three months’ siege, and later by Herod the Great (Josephus Ant. 14.4.2–4; 16.2.4).

Ezekiel’s Temple. The vision of a temple that the prophet Ezekiel saw while residing on the banks of the Chebar in Babylonia in the twenty-fifth year of the captivity does not add much to our knowledge of the subject. It is not a description of a temple that ever was built but of one that is to be built in Jerusalem during the ideal spiritual and political conditions to prevail during the Kingdom age (cf. Isa. 11; 35; 60; Zech. 14:8–20). The temple itself is quite similar to that built by Solomon. There can be little doubt that the arrangements of Herod's Temple were in a great measure influenced by the description here given (see Ezek. 41:1–43:17).

Herod's Temple. The Temple as it existed after the captivity was not such as would satisfy a man as vain and fond of display as Herod the Great; and he accordingly undertook the task of rebuilding it on a grander scale. Although the reconstruction was practically equivalent to an entire rebuilding, still this Temple cannot be spoken of as a third one, for Herod himself said, in so many words, that it was only intended to be regarded as an enlarging and further beautifying of that of Zerubbabel. After the necessary preparation the work of building was begun in the eighteenth year of Herod's reign (20 or 21 B.C.). The Temple proper, in which priests and Levites were employed, was finished in a year and a half, and the courts in the course of eight years. Subsidiary buildings were gradually erected, added to through the reigns of his successors, so that the entire undertaking was not completed till the time of Agrippa II and the procurator Albinus (A.D. 64).

For our knowledge of the last and greatest of the Jewish Temples we are indebted almost wholly to the works of Josephus, with an occasional hint from the Talmud. The Bible unfortunately contains nothing to assist in this respect.

The Temple and its courts occupied an area of 1 stadium (Josephus), or 500 cubits (Talmud). They were arranged in terrace form, one court being higher than another, and the Temple highest of all, so as to be easily seen from any part of the city or vicinity, thus presenting an imposing appearance (Mark 13:2–3).

The Outer Court. The outer court was surrounded with a high wall having several gates on its W side. It had porticoes running all around it, those on three of the sides having double and that on the S side having triple piazzas. These porticoes were covered with roofs of cedar supported on marble pillars, 25 cubits high, and were paved with mosaic work. This outer court, which could be frequented by Gentiles and unclean persons, had on its inner side and extending all around a rampart surrounded with a stone parapet, i.e., a mound 10 cubits broad, the top of which was reached by a flight of fourteen steps. This constituted the outer boundary of the inner Temple area (to deuteron hieron, Josephus Wars 5.5.2). Some distance back from the rampart was the wall by which the Temple and its inner courts were surrounded. On the outside this was 40 cubits high, while on the inside it was only 25, the level of the inner space being so much higher.

Women's Court. Entering by the E gate one came to the court of the women, a square of 135 cubits, separated from the court of the Israelites by a wall on the W side and having gates on the N and S sides for the women to enter by. These gates, as well as those on the E and W sides of this court, had rooms built over them to a height of 40 cubits, each room being ornamented with two pillars 12 cubits in circumference, and provided with double doors 30 cubits high and 40 wide, overlaid with gold and silver. According to Middoth 2.3, the gates, with the exception of the eastern one, were only 20 cubits high and 10 wide.

The eastern gate, called in the Talmud Nicanor's, or the great gate, was made of Corinthian brass and was regarded as the principal gate on account of its greater height (being 50 cubits) and width (40 cubits) and from its being more richly decorated with precious metals. It is undoubtedly the "gate of the temple which is called Beautiful" (Acts 3:2). Around the walls of the court, except the W side, ran porticoes (porches), the roof of which rested on lofty and highly finished pillars. In each corner was a room, used, respectively, for storing the wood deemed unfit to be burned on the altar; for those affected with leprosy to wash themselves; for storing sacrificial wine and oil; and that one in which the Nazirites shaved their hair and cooked the flesh of the consecration sacrifices. According to Josephus it was in some of the pillars of this court that the thirteen alms boxes were placed.

The Inner Court. The entrance to the court of the Israelites was the western gate of the outer court and was reached by a stair of fifteen steps. This inner court measured 187 cubits long (from E to W) and 135 wide (from S to N), and surrounded the Temple. Against its walls were chambers for storing the utensils required for the services. It had three gates on both the S and N sides, making seven entrances in all. Eleven cubits of the eastern end were partitioned off by a stone balustrade 1 cubit high, for the men (the court of the Israelites), separating it from the rest of the space that went to form the court of the priests. In this latter court stood the altar of burnt offering, made of unwrought stone, 30 cubits in length and breadth, and 15 high. West of this was the Temple, and between it and the altar stood the laver.

The Temple Proper. The Temple stood so much higher than the court of the priests that it was approached by a flight of twelve steps. It stood in the western end of the inner court on the NW part of the Temple mount and was built, according to Josephus (Ant. 15.11.3), upon new foundations of massive blocks of white marble, richly ornamented with gold both inside and out. Some of these stones were 45 cubits long, 6 broad, and 5 high. Its length and height, including the porch, were 100 cubits; on each side of the vestibule there was a wing 20 cubits wide, making the total width of this part of the building 100 cubits. The porch was 10 cubits deep, measuring from E to W, 50 wide, 90 in height, and had an open gateway 70 cubits high and 25 in width.

The interior of the Temple was divided into the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies. “The temple had doors also at the entrance, and lintels over them, of the same height with the temple itself. They were adorned with embroidered veils, with their flowers of purple, and pillars interwoven: and over these, but under the crown-work, was spread out a golden vine, with its branches hanging down from a great height” (Josephus Ant. 15.11.3). The holy place was 40 cubits long, 20 wide, and 60 in height. It contained one golden lampstand, a single table of the bread of the Presence, and one altar of incense. Separated from it by a wooden partition was the Holy of Holies, 20 cubits long and 60 high, which was empty. The rabbinical writers maintain that there were two veils over its entrance. It was this veil that was rent on the occasion of our Lord’s crucifixion. As in the case of Solomon’s Temple, side rooms three stories high were built on the sides of the main structure. For a discussion of recent excavation on the Temple mount, see Jerusalem.

TEMPLE SERVANTS (Heb. ntînm, those “given,” i.e., to the Temple; “Nethinim,” KJV). The name applied to those who were set apart to do the menial work of the sanctuary.

Origin and Duties. As early as the time of Joshua, the Gibeonites had been appointed to act as “hewers of wood and drawers of water” for the sanctuary (Josh. 9:21) and thus became the original Temple servants. As these Gibeonites were greatly decreased in numbers by the persecutions of Saul and in the massacre at Nob (1 Sam. 22:1–19), and as the service as arranged by David required an increase of menial servants, “David and the princes” gave the Temple servants for “the service of the Levites” (Ezra 8:20). These were probably prisoners of war who had become proselytes and were called Temple servants in postexilic times (1 Chron. 9:2; Ezra 2:43; 7:7; Neh. 7:46). Being given to the Levites, their duty was to relieve the latter of every menial and laborious work connected with the Temple, such as drawing water, carrying wood, etc. No prescribed list of duties is given in the Scriptures, as these servants were entirely at the disposal of the Levites.

Number, Revenue, Position, etc. The first Temple servants, it must be remembered, were the Levites, who were given to Aaron and his sons (Num. 3:9; 8:19). These were, as already mentioned, relieved by the Gibeonites. For convenience they most probably lived near the Temple, and were supported by contributions of the people. Only 612 Temple servants returned from Babylon—392 with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:58; Neh. 7:60), and 220 with Ezra (Ezra 8:20), under the leadership of Zihva and Gishpa (Neh. 11:21), who, as their foreign names indicate, were a separate people. Some of the Temple servants lived in Ophel, which they helped to rebuild (3:26; 11:21), because of its proximity to the Temple; others, as before the Exile, dwelt in the Levitical cities (Ezra 2:70). They were governed by a leader of their own people (2:43; Neh. 7:46). Like other sacred ministers, they were exempted from taxation by the Persian satrap (Ezra 7:24) and were supported from the Temple treasury and the second tithes. Though they conformed to the Jewish religion (Ex. 12:48; Deut. 29:11; Josh. 9:21; Neh. 10:28), they occupied a very low position, being reckoned below the Mamzer, or illegal offspring (Mishna Kiddushin 3.12; 4.1; Jebamoth 2.4). According to Jewish authorities, they were restricted to intermarriage among themselves, and if a Jew or Jewess married one of them, the offspring shared in all the disqualifications of the Temple servants; and they were not exempted from military service when newly married. If a woman had an illegitimate child, it was ascribed to a Nethin, and the offspring took the degraded position of the Nethin, unless the mother could supply proof of other fatherhood. The decision of a court of justice was invalid if one of the members was a Nethin, as he was not considered a member of the congregation specified in Lev. 4:13; Num. 35:24. Eventually they apparently merged with the Jewish population, as no allusion to them occurs either in the Apocrypha or the NT.

TEMPT, TEST (Heb. nāsâ; Gk. peirazō, both meaning to “test or try”). The word is used in different senses; it does not always involve an evil purpose, as an inducement to sin.

1. “God tested Abraham” (Gen. 22:1) in commanding him to offer up his son Isaac, intending to prove his obedience and faith, to confirm and strengthen him by this trial, and to furnish in him an example of perfect obedience for all succeeding ages. When it is recorded that God tested His people, whether they would walk in His way or not (Ex. 16:4), and that He permitted false prophets to arise among them, who prophesied vain things to try them whether they would seek the Lord with their whole hearts, we should interpret these expressions by that of James 1:13–14, “Let no one say when he is tempted, ‘I am being tempted by God’; for God cannot be tempted by evil, and He Himself does not tempt anyone.”

2. Satan tempts us to every kind of evil and lays snares for us, even in our best actions. He lays inducements before our minds to solicit us to sin (1 Cor. 7:5; 1 Thess. 3:5; James 1:13, 14). Hence Satan is called “the serpent of old,” “the devil,” and “the tempter” (Rev. 12:9; Matt. 4:3). He tempted our first parents (see Temptation); our Savior (see Temptation of Christ); he tempted Ananias and Sapphira to lie to the Holy Spirit (Acts 5:3).

3. Men are said to tempt God when they unreasonably require proofs of the divine presence, power, or goodness. It is proper for us to seek divine assistance and to pray to Him to give us what we need, but we are not to tempt Him or expose ourselves to dangers from which we cannot escape without miraculous interposition. God is not obliged to work miracles in our favor; He requires of us only such actions as are within the ordinary measure of our strength. The Israelites frequently tempted God in the desert, as if they had reason to doubt His presence, His goodness, or His power, after all His appearances in their behalf (Ex. 16:2, 7, 12; Num. 20:12; Ps. 78:18, 41; etc.).

4. Men tempt or try one another when they would know whether things or men are really what they seem or are desired; also when they wish them to depart from the right. The queen of Sheba came to prove the wisdom of Solomon by giving him riddles to explain (1 Kings 10:1; 2 Chron. 9:1). The scribes and Pharisees often tested our Lord and endeavored to catch Him in their snares (Matt. 16:1; 19:3; 22:18).

TEMPTATION (Heb. massâ; Gk. peirasmos, a “testing”). Generally understood as the enticement of a person to commit sin by offering some seeming advantage. The sources of temptation are Satan, the world, and the flesh. We are exposed to them in every state, in every place, and in every time. The nearest approach to a definition of the process of temptation from within is given us by James, “But each one is tempted when he is carried away and enticed by his own lust” (James 1:14). “Temptation proper in the case of a fallen creature is, strictly speaking, within. It craves the gratification that is offered from without: ‘then when it hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin’ (1:15). The contest in the regenerate man is this lust of the flesh opposing the Spirit of the new nature; and the Spirit continually moving the renewed spirit to oppose its desires. In this sense our first parents were not tempted, though in their case the temptation from without assailed a will capable of falling, and was the means of engendering the concupiscence that then engendered all sin. In this sense the glorified in heaven, after a probation ended, will be incapable of temptation. In this sense our sinless Redeemer was absolutely untemptable and impeccable. ‘He was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin’ (Heb. 4:15)... He had no mother lust which could conceive and bring forth sin.... But there is another aspect of temptation which brings him still nearer to us, and that is, the trial of the spirit from without. This he underwent to the utmost; indeed, as much beyond the possibility of his servants’ temptation as their internal temptation was impossible to him” (Pope, Christ. Theol., 3:205). See Tempt; Temptation of Christ.

TEMPTATION OF CHRIST. An experience in the life of our Lord recorded in Matt. 4:1–11; Mark 1:12–13; Luke 4:1–13. That Christ was tempted on other occasions in other ways than here indicated would seem evident from Luke 22:28 and Heb. 4:15. This temptation, however, through which He passed immediately after His baptism and before beginning His ministry, was an event of so much importance as to be regarded as preeminently His temptation. And to this temptation, exclusive reference is commonly made.

Character of the Narration. Much labor and ingenuity are often expended in seeking to determine to what extent the narrative of the gospels is to be taken literally. How much of it is to be understood as descriptive of actual outward occurrences, and how much was internal, subjective? Did Satan actually bear Christ away to a “pinnacle of the temple” at Jerusalem? Did he also take our Lord to “a very high mountain” from the summit of which he showed Him “all the kingdoms of the world”? Did such changes in the scene of the temptation actually take place in an outward, material sense, or did they simply take place in the mind of Jesus? Is the gospel narrative in these respects marked by the figurative manner common among orientals? Upon these questions the opinions of commentators are greatly divided. There has been no end of discussion, and with little profit. The popular interpretation has been literal. And not a few scholars have attempted to defend this interpretation. But, on the other hand, even as orthodox a scholar as Calvin has held the account to be that of a vision or allegory. But it should be observed that whichever view is taken, the reality of the temptation is in no measure lessened, nor is the fact disguised that the real agent of the temptation was Satan.

The Temptation as Related to the Character of Christ. How could He, the sinless One, be tempted? Did the temptation imply in any sense the possibility of His falling into sin? As to the first question, it should be remembered that temptation does not necessarily imply a sinful nature on the part of the one tempted. The first man, Adam, though created in the image and after the likeness of God, was tempted and fell into sin. And does not the passage Heb. 4:15 teach that not only did Jesus successfully resist temptation, but also that His temptation was not such as springs up within a sinful nature? Christ was “without sin” in both these senses. His temptation was wholly from without, from the evil one, though appealing to desires within Him that were wholly innocent. As to the possibility of His yielding to temptation, these views have been held: (1) The Calvinistic view, that Christ had no volitional power to yield to temptation. Edwards strongly advocated this view in his work on the will. (2) The Arminian view, that the man Jesus had such volitional power. (3) The view that “the eternal Logos had the volitional power to sin, having concentrated and reduced himself to finite and human conditions.” Van Oosterzee appropriately says, “The sinlessness of the Lord is to be regarded as an attribute of his true humanity, and thus to be clearly distinguished from the absolute holiness of him who cannot even be tempted of evil. The moral purity of the Lord did not in itself exclude even the least possibility of sinning. Had such possibility been absolutely wanting, the former would, even in the Son of man, have lost all moral worth.” The great thing here is precisely this, that He who was exposed to the severest temptation ever so maintained the dominion over Himself that it could be said of Him, He was able not to sin, “potuit non peccare.” As the result of a sustained conflict, He so perfectly vanquished the power of evil that sinning became for Him morally an absolute impossibility; in other words, the “potuit non peccare” was evermore raised to a “non potuit peccare.” He could not sin. And yet discussion upon this theme, as Edersheim says, “sounds, after all, like the stammering of divine words by a babe.” It is a subject for reverent faith rather than exact dogmatizing.

The Nature of the Threefold Temptation. According to Mark, the temptation was protracted throughout the “forty days.” The temptations described by Matthew and Luke are therefore regarded as the culminating features of the long struggle. The order of the temptations varies in the two gospels named, a matter of little or no consequence. The long fast, once a favorite matter for infidel objections, no longer presents any difficulty whatever. The significance of the separate assaults of evil has been variously interpreted, a fact due in considerable measure to the comprehensiveness of the whole great event. Says Smith: “The three temptations are addressed to the three forms in which the disease of sin makes its appearance in the soul—to the solace of sense, and the love of praise and the desire of gain (1 John 2:16). But there is one element common to them all, they are attempts to call up a willful and wayward spirit in contrast to a patient and self-denying one.” The subject, however, can hardly be summed up thus briefly.

1. The temptation to change the stones into bread by a miracle was an appeal to Christ to step out of His divinely appointed path for the sake of satisfying His hunger. He had accepted the conditions of a human life, and it was for Him to do His duty and trust in God for sustenance. His power to work miracles was not for Himself but for others (see Kenosis). Had He obeyed the temptation He would have become unlike men who must put their trust in divine Providence. “He would have become his own providence.”

2. The second temptation was to prove His sonship, to exhibit His faith in His sonship, by casting Himself down from a pinnacle of the Temple. This temptation was at the opposite extreme from the preceding. The first was a temptation to distrust, the second that of extravagant, unwarranted confidence, or presumption. Again was the call to step out of the path divinely appointed, but by presumptuously plunging Himself into needless peril. The Scripture quoted by the adversary was quoted in a mutilated form. “He will give His angels charge concerning you.” “To guard you in all your ways” was left out. As in the former instance all temptation to give unlawful prominence to temporal, material good is illustrated, so in the present instance all attempts to build up Christ’s kingdom by means of display, rather than by the patient, divinely appointed processes, find their rebuke; likewise all forms of fanatical presumption.

3. The temptation to win power by an act of homage to the devil.

Inconceivable as this may seem at first, nevertheless this was the bold form in which was embodied the idea of winning power for good and holy ends by a compromise with evil at the outset. It was an appeal to holy ambition, but upon the ground of doing evil that good might come. The kingdom was to be won, but in the way suggested it would have been at the expense of ruining the King. At this point also the great temptation of Christ has its most practical lessons.

The manner and complete success of Christ’s resistance appear upon the surface of the narrative and call here for no comment. E.MCC.

TEN. See Number.

TEN COMMANDMENTS (Gk. deka, “ten,” logos, “word”).

Name. Decalogue is the name by which the Greek Fathers designated “the Ten Commandments,” which were written by God on tablets of stone and given to Moses on Mt. Sinai. In Heb. the name is “ten commandments” (‘āseret haddbārīm, Ex. 34:28; Deut. 4:13; 10:4). It is also called “the moral law,” “the two tablets of the testimony” (Ex. 34:29), “the tablets of the covenant” (Deut. 9:9), and “His covenant” (Deut. 4:13). In the NT it is called “the commandments” (-entolai, Matt. 19:17; Rom. 13:9) and “the Law” (1 Tim. 1:7–10).

Versions. There are two versions of the Ten Commandments given in the Pentateuch. The first is contained in Ex. 20, the second in Deut. 5. These are substantially and almost verbally identical, except that the reasons given for the observance of the fourth commandment are not the same. In Exodus the reason is based on one’s obligations to God as the Creator (Gen. 2:3). In Deuteronomy the reason is one’s duty to others and the memory of the bondage in Egypt. This variation has led many to the belief that the original law was simply “Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy.” It may, however, be the fact that the form as it stands in Exodus is the divine original, but that Moses in reviewing the law just before his farewell to his people added a fresh and fuller significance that the history of Israel suggested.

Nature. The Ten Commandments are a statement of the terms of the covenant God made with His chosen people; and in this respect they are to be distinguished from the elaborate system of law known as the Mosaic. The vast legal system of Israel, civil, criminal, judicial, and ecclesiastical, was framed after the covenant law, not with a view of expanding it, but to enforce it. As Fairbairn suggests, its chief object was to secure through the instrumentality of the magistrate, that if the proper love should fail to influence the hearts and lives of the people, still right should be maintained. The elaborate system was designed as an educator, to lead the people into the great principles of life embodied in the Ten Commandments and afterward exhibited in Christ. The Mosaic system was only a temporary expedient to achieve a given end, whereas the Ten Commandments are a statement of principles to continue for all time.

This unique place of the Ten Commandments is seen in the circumstance of their delivery. The rest of the law was given by God through the lips of Moses, but these were spoken by God Himself and with an awful display of splendor and solemnity never before witnessed (Ex. 19). It appears also that angels were active in the promulgation of the law (“holy ones,” Deut. 33:2–3; “angels,” Acts 7:53; Gal. 3:19; Heb. 2:2). In addition, these laws were written by God’s own finger and on durable tablets of stone (Deut. 9:11). In the symbolism of the East, the stone signified the perpetuity of the law written upon it. Written on both sides, it meant the completeness of the code.

Still another fact marks the unique place of the Ten Commandments. The tablets of stone were put in the most sacred place in the world—in the Tabernacle, in the “holy of holies,” in the Ark of the Covenant. Thus they were plainly recognized as containing in themselves the sum and substance of what was held to be strictly required by the covenant.

Contents. That the Ten Commandments contain the essential principles of the moral law, and are therefore of permanent obligation, is affirmed in the NT. Jesus held the Ten Commandments up as the perfect code. When the young man asked Him the way of attaining eternal life, Jesus quoted from the Ten Commandments and told him to obey them and live (Mark 10:19; Luke 18:18–20). And again, after assenting to the two features of the Ten Commandments as the very essence of the law, He said, “Do this, and you will live” (Luke 10:28; cf. Matt. 19:17).

In His dispute with the Pharisees the chief point at issue was this: They exalted the minor law, the ceremonial observance, and threw the duties inculcated in the Ten Commandments in the background; He brought the Ten Commandments forward and gave them their true place. So did the apostles (Rom 13:9). In the protracted discussion concerning the law, all Paul’s examples are taken from these tablets or from what they clearly forbade or required.

Source. The foundation and source of the moral law is God’s character. “I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slavery” is the way the Ten Commandments are introduced. The Heb. name here used (Everlasting Eternal Almighty) intimates that the principles of law have their standing in the character of God. “I am ... you shall.” That is the connection. And that is what makes the moral law so awful in its unchangeable majesty. It is law because God is. It cannot be changed without changing the character of Jehovah Himself. Right is what it is, because God is what He is, and therefore it is as unchangeable as God.

The fact that God has placed the law of His own character on man is proof that man is capable of the divine. Expressing as it does man’s true nature, to vary from its requirements is to fall below the dignity of true manhood. In this sense the Ten Commandments are, as the Reformers taught, identical with the “eternal law of nature.”

Prohibitory. The Ten Commandments are a series of prohibitions. The negative form is due to the shocking depravity of those to whom it was addressed. A prohibition means a disposition to do the thing prohibited. If men were not inclined to worship something other than God the first commandment would not be needed. If there were no murder in men’s hearts the sixth commandment would not be required. And this is true of all the laws. Paul says, “[The law] was added because of transgressions” (Gal. 3:19). The law is put in the negative form for another reason: the law can only restrain the act. It cannot implant the positive virtue. Statutory law may restrain and regulate actions. It cannot transform the sinful heart. It is of necessity negative.

Divisions. The Ten Commandments are not numbered in the sacred text, and the church has been divided as to how the division should be made. There are three general modes of division attempted: (1) That which the Reformed churches have adopted, and which is called the Philonic division. It makes Ex. 20:2–3 the first commandment, vv. 4–6 the second, and v. 7 the third. This division is supported by the following reasons: (a) It is made on the principle that polytheism and idolatry are identical. (b) There are three ways of dishonoring God—in denying His unity, His spirituality, and His deity. (c) It divides the two tablets into three and seven laws, three having a mystical reference to God, and seven to the church. (d) It obviates the need of making the unnatural division of the commandment against covetousness into two. (2) The second division is called the Augustinian and unites vv. 3–6 into one commandment. It divides the commandment concerning covetousness into two. By this method the Roman church supported the legitimacy of sacred images that were not worshiped. (3) The third, or Talmudic division, makes v. 2 the first commandment, and vv. 3–6 the second.

Order. The order in which these laws were written on the two tablets of stone is not a matter of grave consideration. If the division were equal, as many think, then the law concerning honor to parents is exalted to a high rank, associated as it is with our duty to honor God. But even without a numerical equality of the two tables the division is philosophical. Our duties to God come first—His being, His worship, His name, and His day. Then come our duties to our fellowmen. They have their beginning in the home. Then they reach out beyond the home circle to all mankind, having regard, first, for our neighbor’s life; second, to his wife; third, to his property; fourth, to his position. Finally, the tenth commandment touches the spring of all moral completeness, the desire of the heart. It is really the intent of the heart that determines the moral character of the act. It cannot be reached by human legislation. It exposes to the conscience the utter failure of an act that might otherwise be blameless. It was this law that brought Paul with all his righteousness under sentence of condemnation (Rom. 7:7).

The two tablets are summarized in the two great laws “You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind; and your neighbor as yourself.” A.H.T.

TENDERHEARTED.

1. Gk. eusplagchos, “having strong bowels,” in biblical and ecclesiastical language, compassionate, kindhearted (Eph. 4:32; cf. 1 Pet. 3:8).

2. Heb. rak lēbāb, “timid” (2 Chron. 13:7, KJV).

TENONS (Ex. 26:17, 19; 36:22, 24; “projections,” NIV). Probably dowel pins at the end of the planks of the Tabernacle (which see).

TENT (Heb. usually ōhel; Gk. skēnē). A movable habitation made of curtains extended upon poles. The patriarchs of the Israelites, whose fathers and kindred already possessed fixed houses in Mesopotamia, dwelled in tents because they lived in Canaan only as pilgrims. The Israelites did not dwell in houses until their return from Egypt. Their tents, in material, form, and furniture, no doubt resembled the tents of the present Bedouin, consisting sometimes of plaited mats, but generally of cloth coverings, either coarser, of goat hair (black, Song of Sol. 1:5), or finer, woven from yarn. The goat-hair cloth is sufficient to resist the heaviest rain. The tent poles, called amud, or columns, are usually nine in number, placed in three groups, but many tents have only one pole, others two or three. The ropes that hold the tent in its place are fastened not to the tent cover itself but to loops consisting of a leather thong tied to the ends of a stick, around which is twisted a piece of old cloth, which is itself sewed to the tent cover. The ends of the tent ropes are fastened to short sticks, or pins, called wed or aoutad, which are driven into the ground with a mallet (cf. Judg. 4:21). Around the back and sides of the tent runs a piece of stuff removable at pleasure to admit air. The tent is divided into two rooms, separated by a carpet partition drawn across the middle of the tent and fastened to the three middle posts. The furniture deemed necessary is a carpet, cushions, a low table (sometimes replaced by a round skin), eating and cooking utensils, and a lamp. When the pasture near an encampment is exhausted, the tents are taken down, packed on camels, and moved (Isa. 38:12; Gen. 26:17, 22, 25). The larger tents of the well-to-do are divided into three rooms; the first, at the entrance, in the case of common people, is reserved for the young and tender of the flock or herd, the second for the men, and the innermost for the women. The manufacture of tents formed a regular trade, at which Paul occasionally labored, especially in connection with Aquila (Acts 18:3).

Figurative. So prominent a feature of oriental life could hardly fail to suggest many striking metaphors. “The light in his tent is darkened” (Job 18:6) is a symbol of misfortune. When Job said, “The friendship of God was over my tent” (29:4), he admitted that the blessed fellowship of God’s confiding, unreserved communion ruled over his tent. The heavens are compared to a tent (Isa. 40:22). The prosperity of Israel restored is referred to as an enlargement of a tent (54:2; see also 33:20). The setting up of a tent, especially a large one, was a work needing the help of others, and one bereft of friends is referred to as having no helpers in erecting his tent (Jer. 10:20). The tent being rapidly taken down and removed became a symbol of the frailty of life (Isa. 38:12; 2 Cor. 5:1) and in 5:4 tent is used figuratively for the human body in which the soul dwells and which is taken down to death. TENTH DEAL. KJV term replaced in the NASB and NIV by “one-tenth of an ephah.” See Metrology: Dry Measures of Capacity: Ephah.

TE’RAH (tē’ra; cf. Akkad. turahu, “ibex”).

1. The son of Nahor born in Ur of the Chaldees; the father of Abram, Nahor, and Haran, and through them the ancestor of the great families of the Israelites, Ishmaelites, Midianites, Moabites, and Ammonites (Gen. 11:24–32). Scripture reveals that Terah was an idolater (Josh. 24:2), that he took part in the family migration toward Canaan, and that he died in Haran at the age of 205 years, c. 2100 B.C.

2. A camping place of Israel in the desert, located between Tahath and Mithkah (Num. 33:27–28).

TERAPHIM. The teraphim were figurines or images in human form also called “household idols.” Rachel’s theft of Laban’s teraphim (Gen. 31:34, see marg.) is much better understood in the light of the documents from Nuzi, not far from modern Kirkuk, excavated 1925–34. The possession of these household gods may have implied leadership of the family and, in the case of a married daughter, assured her husband the right to the property of her father (Cyrus H. Gordon, Revue Biblique 44 [1945]: 35ff). Since Laban evidently had sons of his own when Jacob left for Canaan, they alone had the right to their father’s gods, and the theft of these household idols by Rachel was a serious offense (Gen. 31:19, 30, 35) aimed at preserving for her husband the first title to her father’s estate. Albright construes the teraphim as meaning “vile things,” but the images were not necessarily cultic or lewd, as frequently the depictions of Astarte were. Micah’s teraphim (Judg. 17:5) were used for purposes of securing an oracle (cf. 1 Sam. 15:23; Hos. 3:4; Zech. 10:2). Babylonian kings oracularly consulted the teraphim (Ezek. 21:21). Josiah abolished the teraphim (2 Kings 23:24), but these images had a strange hold on the Hebrew people even until after the exilic period. The NIV usually translates “teraphim” as “gods” or “idols.” M.F.U.

TEREBINTH. See Vegetable Kingdom: Oak.

TE’RESH (te’resh; cf. Avestan tarshav, “firm, solid”). One of the two eunuchs whose plot to assassinate Ahasuerus was discovered by Mordecai (Esther 2:21; 6:2). He was hanged about 478 B.C.

TERRACE. (Heb. m□sillâ, “thoroughfare,” 2 Chron. 9:11, KJV) staircase, steps.

TERROR. The rendering of several Heb. words and one Gk. word denoting great fear, that which agitates both body and mind. Some of these words have as their primary meaning the cause of fear, others the result. Thus êmâ (Josh. 2:9; Job 20:25; Pss. 55:4; 88:15) is that which inspires dread, as a king (Job 33:7); idols (Jer. 50:38), from the “fear” with which they fill their worshipers; m□hittâ (Isa. 54:14) is a breaking in pieces, and so consternation, from hâtat, to “be broken, confounded” (Gen. 35:5; Ezek. 26:17; 32:23–32); bâlâ denotes the falling away of a person in sickness, a garment through age, etc., and so the mind consumed with anxiety and care. Other words simply express fear, as the Gk. word phobos. Death is called the “king of terrors” (Job 18:14; cf. 24:17), in distinction to the terrible disease that is called its “first-born” (18:13). Death is also personified elsewhere (Ps. 49:15; Isa. 28:15).

TER’TIUS (tur’shi-us, from Lat. tertius, “third”). Probably a Roman, he was the scribe for Paul in writing the epistle to the Romans (Rom. 16:22). Some have proposed without reason to identify him with Silas. Nothing certain is known of him.

TERTUL’LUS (ter-tul’us, diminutive form of Tertius). “A certain attorney” retained by the high priest and Sanhedrin to accuse the apostle Paul at Caesarea before the procurator Felix (Acts 24:1, 2). He evidently belonged to the class of professional attorneys who were to be found not only in Rome but in other parts of the empire, where they went with the expectation of finding occupation at the tribunals of the provincial magistrates. We may infer that Tertullus was of Roman, or, at all events, of Italian, origin; the Sanhedrin would naturally desire his services on account of their own ignorance of the Latin language and of the ordinary procedure of a Roman law court. The historian probably gave only an abstract of the speech, giving in full, however, the most salient points and those which had the most forcibly impressed themselves upon him, such as the introduction and the character ascribed to Paul (v. 5).

TESTAMENT. See Covenant.

TETH (ט) (tāth). The ninth letter of the Heb. alphabet. It stands at the beginning of the ninth section of Ps. 119, in which section each verse begins with that letter.

TETRARCH (Gk. tetrarchēs). Properly the sovereign or governor of the fourth part of a country.

1. Herod Antipas (Matt. 14:1; Luke 3:1, 19; 9:7; Acts 13:1), who is commonly distinguished as “Herod the tetrarch,” although the title of “king” is also assigned to him both by Matthew (14:9) and by Mark (6:14, 22–28).

2. Herod Philip, who is said by Luke (Luke 3:1) to have been “tetrarch of the region of Ituraea and Trachonitis.”

3. Lysanias, who is said (Luke 3:1) to have been “tetrarch of Abilene.” The title of tetrarch was at this time probably applied to petty tributary princes without any such determinate meaning. But it appears from Josephus that the tetrarchies of Antipas and Philip were regarded as each constituting a fourth part of their father’s kingdom (Ant. 17.11.4). We conclude that in these two cases, at least, the title was used in its strict and literal sense.

THADDAE´US (tha-di´us). A name in Mark’s catalog of the twelve apostles (Mark 3:18) in the great majority of manuscripts. From a comparison with the catalog of Luke (Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13) it seems scarcely possible to doubt that the names of Judas and Thaddaeus were borne by one and the same person. Edersheim (Life of Jesus, 1:522) derives the term Thaddaeus from thodah, praise. KJV (Matt. 10:3) lists him as “Lebbaeus, whose surname was Thaddaeus.”

THA´HASH (tha´hash). See Tahash.

THA´MAH (tha´ma). See Temah.

THA´MAR (tha´mar). See Tamar.

THANK OFFERING. See Sacrificial Offerings.

THANKSGIVING (Heb. tôdâ; Gk. eucharistia). A duty of which gratitude is the grace. This obligation of godliness is acknowledged by the universal sentiment of mankind; but as a Christian grace it has some blessed peculiarities. It is gratitude for all the benefits of divine Providence, especially for the general and personal gifts of redemption. The very term most in use shows this; it is charis, which is the grace of God in Christ, operating in the soul of the believer as a principle and going back to Him in gratitude: “Thanks be to God for His indescribable gift!” (2 Cor. 9:15). The ethical gratitude of Christianity connects every good gift and every perfect gift with the gift of Christ. Moreover, it is a thanksgiving that in the Christian economy, and in it alone, redounds to God for all things: in everything give thanks. This characteristic flows from the former. The rejoicing that we have in the Lord, and the everlasting consolation we possess in Him, makes every possible variety of divine dispensation a token for good. The Christian privilege is to find reason for gratitude in all things: “for this is God’s will for you in Christ Jesus” (1 Thess. 5:18).

THANKWORTHY. KJV rendering of the Gk. charis (grace) in 1 Pet. 2:19, “suffering unjustly” wins God’s favor.

THA´RA (tha´ra). See Terah.

THAR'SHISH (thar'shish). See Tarshish.

THEATER (Gk. theatron, "place for seeing"). (1) A place in which dramatic spectacles were exhibited and public assemblies held (Acts 19:29, 31). (2) A public show and, figuratively, a man who is exhibited to be gazed at and made sport of (1 Cor. 4:9, "a spectacle"). The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews speaks (12:1) of "so great a cloud of witnesses," having in mind, no doubt, the scene in which Christians are viewed as running a race, and not the theater or stage, where the eyes of the spectators are fixed on them.

The Greek Theater. Theater in Greece was originally intended for the performance of dithyrambic choruses at the feast of Dionysus. The hymn celebrated the sufferings and actions of the god in a style corresponding to the passionate character of his worship; and it was sung to the accompaniment of a flute and a dance around the altar. From the first it consisted of two principal parts: (1) the circular dancing place (orchestra), with the altar of the god in the center, and (2) the place for the spectators, or the theater (theatron) proper. The theatron was in the form of a semicircle, with the seats rising one above another in concentric tiers. The seats were almost always cut in the slope of a hill. When the dithyrambic choruses had developed into the drama, a structure called the skēnē (Lat. scena) was added, with a stage for dramatic representations. It was erected on the side of the orchestra away from the spectators and at such a height and distance as to allow the stage to be in full view from every part of the theater. The first stone theater was that built at Athens, the home of Greek drama; and the theaters in every part of the Hellenic world were constructed on the same general principles. It is estimated that the theater in Athens had room for 14,000 persons. The tickets of admission discovered in Attica are of two kinds: (1) ordinary lead tokens or (2) counters of bone or ivory.

The Roman Theater. "In Rome, where dramatic representations, in the strict sense of the term, were not given until 240 B.C., a wooden stage was erected in the circus for each performance, and taken down again.... Those who wanted seats had to bring their own chairs; sometimes, by order of the senate, sitting was forbidden. In 154 B.C. an attempt was made to build a permanent theater with fixed seats, but it had to be pulled down by order of the senate. In 145 B.C., on the conquest of Greece, theaters were provided with seats after the Greek models were erected; these, however, were only of wood, and served for one representation alone. The first stone theater was built by Pompey in 55 B.C., a second one by Cornelius Balbus (13 B.C.), and in the same year the one dedicated by Augustus to his nephew Marcellus, and called by his name, the ruins of which still exist. Besides these there were no other stone theaters in Rome. The Roman theater differed from the Greek. In the first place the auditorium formed a semicircle only, with the front wall of the stage building as its diameter, while in the Greek it was larger than a semicircle. Again a covered colonnade ran round the highest story of the Roman theater, the roof of which was of the same height as the highest part of the stage. The orchestra, moreover, which was inclosed by the cavea, contained places for spectators; these were, at the first, reserved exclusively for senators; foreign ambassadors whom it was wished to honor were afterward admitted to them.... Places of dignity were also assigned to magistrates and priests, probably on the podium, or the space in front of the lowest row of seats, where there was room for a few rows of chairs. The first fourteen rows of the ordinary seats were (68 B.C.) appropriated to the equites; after them came the general body of citizens, who were probably arranged in the order of their tribes; in the upper part of the cavea were the women, who sat apart, in accordance with a decree of Augustus; the lowest class were relegated to the highest tier. Even children were admitted, only slaves being excluded. Admission was free, as was the case with all entertainments intended for the people. The tickets of admission did not indicate any particular seat, but only the block of seats and the row in which it would be found” (Seyffert, Dict. of Class Antiq., s.v.). At Athens, Corinth, Antioch, Amman, Jerash, Pompeii, and Italian Ostia can be seen the ruins of theaters that were in use during the biblical period. Amphitheaters for gladiatorial and athletic contests were as popular as theaters (cf. 1 Cor. 9:24–27; 2 Tim. 4:7).

THEBES (thēbz). The Greek name of a city of Egypt, and its capital during the brilliant Eighteenth Dynasty (Jer. 46:25; Ezek. 30:14–15). It was also called No or No-Amon (the home of Amon, portion of Amon) as in the KJV of the preceding texts. Amon was the Egyptian god whose residence in the area accounts for this alternate name of Thebes. Thebes is referred to by classical writers as being ancient and large. The city spread itself on both banks of the Nile, just as London and Paris extend over both banks of the Thames and Seine. On the right, or E, bank are the temples of Karnak and of Luxor. On the left, or W, bank, going from N to S, was a series of mortuary temples: of Qurna, of Deir-el-Bahri, the Rameseum, the Colossi of Memnon (Amenhotep III), the temple of Deir-el-Medineh, and of Medinet-Habu. In the vicinity of the west bank temples are the Valley of the Kings, the Valley of the Queens, and the Valley of the Nobles. Karnak is an especially great marvel, its architecture a wonder of construction skill. Its great hall contains 134 columns, the loftiest 70 feet in height and 12 feet in diameter; the hall itself is 340 feet wide by 277 feet long, every stone a book and every column a library in itself. The temple of Luxor is also notable. It is a compound 858 feet long, built primarily by Amenhotep III, with additions by Rameses II and Alexander the Great.

Of all these the most wonderful was Karnak, with its great hall, its impressive obelisks (the tallest 97 feet high), and Shishak’s inscription recording his invasion of Judah in Rehoboam’s reign.

Thebes was the metropolis of Upper Egypt. When Strabo visited the place in 24 B.C., he said the extent of its ruins was about nine miles. Population estimates of the city at its height range as high as 1 million. It became famous in the Eleventh Dynasty, and suffered in the Thirteenth because of the invasion of the Hyksos. In the sixteenth century B.C. Amosis liberated the country and it reached its height of magnificence. The splendor of the city departed with the removal of the residence of the pharaohs to the Delta. Thebes declined after Assyrian attacks under Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal in the seventh century B.C. It was crushed by Rome 30–29 B.C.

Frederick L. Norden, sponsored by King Christian IV of Denmark, made the first survey of Thebes in the winter of 1737 and 1738. The first large collection of copies of inscriptional material was made by Champollion and his colleague Rosellini in 1828 and 1829. Georges Legrain worked at the temple of Karnak for the Service des Antiquités from 1895 until his death in 1917. He was followed by Henri Chevrier, who was in charge of work at Thebes from 1926 to 1956. The story of Howard Carter’s work in the Valley of the Kings and his discovery of the tomb of Tutankhamen in 1922 has often been told. The Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago has been working on a massive architectural and epigraphic survey of the site since 1919.

THE BEZ (thē’bez). The scene of the death of the usurper Abimelech (Judg. 9:50). He had suffocated a thousand Shechemites in the stronghold of Baal-berith by the smoke of green wood and then besieged and took Thebez. This town possessed a strong tower, to which the men, women, and children fled. When Abimelech advanced toward the tower and drew near to set the door on fire, a woman threw a millstone down upon him from the roof of the tower, smashing his skull. Whereupon he called to his armor-bearer to give him a deathblow with his sword, that men might not say of him, “A woman slew him.” Thebez is preserved in the large village of Tubâs, NE of Shechem, a still important town. It is situated on the slope and summit of a hill whose sides are pierced with numerous cisterns, some in use. Hundreds of people even now live underground in caves cut in the rock.

THEFT. See Law.

THEOCRACY (Gk. theokratia, “rule of God”). The form of government among the early Israelites in which Jehovah was recognized as their supreme civil ruler, and His laws were taken as the statute book of the kingdom. Moses, Joshua, and the Judges were the appointees and agents of Jehovah. The kings were each specifically anointed in His name, and the prophets were commissioned to inform them of His will. They did not hesitate to rebuke and even veto the kings’ actions if contrary to the divine will. The later history of Israel is a rehearsal of the conflict and intercourse between the great Head of the kingdom and the refractory functionaries.

According to the amillennial view, the theocratic idea passed over, in its spiritual import, to the Messiah as the heir of David’s perpetual dynasty, Christ becoming the Ruler of His church in the hearts of its members. According to premillennial eschatology, Christ was rejected as king by the Jews. His death, burial, and resurrection brought in an entirely new entity, the church, begun at Pentecost (Acts 2) and to be completed at the coming of Christ for His own (1 Thess. 4:13–18; 1 Cor. 15:53–54). According to pretribulation rapturists, the church will be removed preceding Daniel’s seventieth week when the Lord will again deal with Israel (Dan. 9:27). After the apocalyptic judgments of this seven-year period and the destruction of godless Gentiles and wicked Jews, the remnant of Israel will be the nucleus of the theocratic kingdom established over Israel at the second coming of Christ (cf. Acts 1:6). This mediatorial Davidic kingdom, in which Jews will be reinstated to full divine favor as head over the nations, will last at least 1,000 years (Rev. 20), after which there will be a Satanic revolt and judgment. After this the eternal state will be brought in (Rev. 21–22). Thus, amillennialists and premillennialists differ as to the state of Israel and the nation’s theocratic future. M.F.U.

THEOPHILUS (the-of’i-lus; “friend of God”). The person to whom Luke inscribes his gospel and the Acts of the apostles (Luke 1:3; Acts 1:1). There is a considerable number and variety of theories concerning him. The traditional connection of Luke with Antioch has disposed some to look upon Antioch as the residence of Theophilus and possibly as the seat of his government. We may safely reject the patristic notion that Theophilus was either a fictitious person or a mere personification of Christian love. The epithet kratiste (“most excellent”) is sufficient evidence of his historical existence. It does not, indeed, prove that he was a governor, but it makes most probable that he was a person of high rank. All that can be conjectured with any degree of safety concerning him comes to this, that he was a Gentile of rank and consideration who came under the influence of Luke, or under that of Paul at Rome, and was converted to the Christian faith.

“The only traditional information we possess about this person is that found in the ‘Clementine Recognitions’ (10.71), about the middle of the 2nd century: ‘So that Theophilus, who was at the head of all the men in power at the city [of Antioch], consecrated, under the name of a church, the great basilica [the palace] in which he resided.’ According to this, Theophilus was a great lord residing in the capital of Syria” (Godet, Com., on Luke).

THESSALO'NIAN (thes-a-lō'ni-an). The designation (Acts 20:4; 1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Thess. 1:1) "of Thessalonica" (Acts 27:2) of an inhabitant of Thessalonica (which see).

THESSALONIANS, FIRST EPISTLE TO. This, perhaps the earliest Pauline epistle, was written by the apostle in conjunction with Silvanus (Silas) and Timothy.

Occasion. Paul had established the Thessalonian church on his second missionary journey and was expelled from Thessalonica. From this city he went to Berea and to Athens. The epistle alludes to Paul's life at Thessalonica (chap. 2). At Athens he had sent Timothy back to Thessalonica to help the Christians amid their persecutions (3:1–3). Acts 18:5 records that Silas and Timothy rejoined the apostle at Corinth. It is clear, therefore, that the epistle was written from that city in A.D. 52 or 53. Three special needs existed among the Thessalonians, calling for apostolic instruction: (1) They were careless about their daily work, evidently under the impression that the second advent would very shortly take place. (2) There was concern among them lest their Christian friends who had died would suffer loss at the coming of Christ for His own. (3) Friction existed between church officers and those who possessed miraculous spiritual endowments.

Purpose. The letter was written to urge the Thessalonians to worthwhile conduct and work in the light of the return of Christ; to comfort them concerning those who had died in the Lord; and to instruct them in the elementary truths of the Christian gospel.

 - B. Duties of church and private life (5:12–22)
 - C. Prayer for sanctification (5:23–24)
- VII. Conclusion (5:25–28)

Attestation and Authorship. The epistle claims to be written by Paul (1:1; 2:18). Paul's character shines out from this epistle. Note his anxiety for the believers' welfare (3:1–2), his earnest desire for their spiritual edification (3:8–11), his compassion toward them (2:7), and his sympathy with those in distress (4:13, 18). External evidence is found in Marcion, who accepted it into his canon. It is found also in the Old Syriac and the Old Latin versions. The Muratorian Canon catalogs it sixth in the list of Pauline epistles. Irenaeus first refers to it by name in Against Heresies 5.6.1. Tertullian also quotes it as "written by the Apostle." Clement of Alexandria seems to be the first to ascribe it to Paul in Instructor 1.5. Thenceforth references to it are numerous. M.F.U.

THESSALONIANS, SECOND EPISTLE TO. The second epistle of Paul to the Thessalonians was written to correct the erroneous notion among the Christians at Thessalonica that the persecutions from which they were suffering were those of “the great and awesome day of the Lord” (Joel 2:31) from which they had been taught to expect deliverance by “the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our gathering together to Him” (2 Thess. 2:1). The theme of this epistle, obscured by the mistranslation of the KJV in 2:2, “the day of Christ is at hand,” is correctly rendered in NASB “The day of the Lord has come.”

Purpose. Second Thessalonians was written to instruct the Thessalonians concerning the day of Christ “and our gathering together to Him” (2 Thess. 2:1) and to settle them in their conviction that in the day of Christ the Lord would appear to translate the living saints and to raise the deceased ones, so that actually the apostle Paul in 2 Thess. 2:1 is arguing for a pretribulation out-taking of the church as the Body of Christ. In 2:1–12 he outlines the events of the Day of the Lord that will occur after the out-taking of the church.

Plan. (1) The apostle comforts the Thessalonians in their sufferings (1:4–10). He argues for the imminency of the coming of Christ for His own (2:1). (2) He stresses the fact that the Day of the Lord, so voluminously prophesied in the OT, will not arrive until the apostasy has set in and the “man of lawlessness” has been made manifest (2:2–10). (3) He urges the Thessalonians to faithfulness in view of the coming of Christ for His own (2:13–3:5). (4) He warns the idle and the disorderly to be properly adjusted to the doctrine taught (3:6–15). (5) He shows them how to distinguish his epistles from those of forgers (3:17).

Outline.

- I. Salutation (1:1–4)
- II. Comfort in their sufferings (1:5–12)
- III. The Day of the Lord and the man of sin (2:1–12)
 - A. Argument for pretribulation rapture (2:1–2)
 - B. Signs of the Day of the Lord (2:3–12)
- IV. Exhortations and instructions (2:13–3:15)
 - A. Exhortations to steadfastness and faithfulness (2:13–3:5)
 - B. Admonition against disorderliness and idleness (3:6–15)
- V. Benediction (3:16–18)

Attestation and Authorship. The essential evidence for this epistle is earlier and more extensive than that of the first epistle. Justin Martyr refers to 2:3–4 in his Dialogue with Trypho, chap. 110. Irenaeus mentions it by name, ascribing it to Paul. Tertullian quotes it as by the “apostle,” manifestly Paul, as seen by the context. Clement of Alexandria makes reference to 3:1–2 in Stromata (5.3). The Muratorian Canon, Old Syriac, Old Latin, and Marcion's Canon include it. The epistle is of immense importance eschatologically. M.F.U. BIBLIOGRAPHY: See Thessalonians, First Epistle.

THESSALONICA (thes-a-lo-ni'ka). Called anciently Therma. It was named after the wife of Cassander, who rebuilt the city. Under the Romans it was one of four divisions of Macedonia. Paul and Silas organized a church there (Acts 17:1–4; 1 Thess. 1:9). In Acts 20:1–3, Paul's visit is named; see also Phil. 4:16; 2 Tim. 4:10. In Acts 17:6, 8, the rulers of the city are called, in the original, politarchai. This title of a political magistrate is otherwise unknown in extant Gk. literature. At the western entrance to the city there remained standing until 1876 a Roman arch. This contained an inscription on its gate mentioning certain city officials called “politarchs.” Other inscriptions also contained the same word. The politarchs were elected by “the people,” which refers to the assembly of the demōs. Thus one of the assertions of historical inaccuracy in Scripture has been answered. The modern city Salonika is a strategic Balkan metropolis having a population of more than 400,000. Because of its position it played a vital role in the First and Second World Wars. Located on the great road (Via Egnatia) that connected Rome with the whole region N of the Aegean Sea, Thessalonica was an invaluable center for the spread of the gospel. In fact it was nearly, if not quite, on a level with Corinth and Ephesus in its share of the commerce of the Levant. The circumstance noted in 17:1, that here was the synagogue of the Jews in this part of Macedonia, evidently had much to do with the apostle’s plans and also doubtless with his success. The first scene of the apostle’s work at Thessalonica was the synagogue (17:2–3). As a result of German occupation during World War II, the city lost about all its Jewish population. Because the modern city covers the site of the ancient city, little can be seen of NT Thessalonica. Remains of the ancient agora are visible in the center of modern Thessalonica, however. The apostle Paul’s ministry in Thessalonica fit his urban strategy—his effort to reach the empire through its cities.

THEU'DAS (thū'das). An insurgent mentioned by Gamaliel in his speech before the Sanhedrin, at the time of the arraignment of the apostles (Acts 5:35–39). He seems to have been a religious impostor and to have had about 400 adherents, who were all slain or scattered. Josephus (Ant. 20.5.1) informs us “that a certain magician, whose name was Theudas, persuaded a great part of the people to take their effects with them, and follow him to the river Jordan; for he told them he was a prophet, and that he would, by his own command, divide the river, and afford them an easy passage over it; and many were deluded by his words. Fadus ... sent a troop of horsemen out against them; who falling upon them unexpectedly, slew many of them, and took many of them alive. They also took Theudas alive, and cut off his head, and carried it to Jerusalem.”

THICKET (Heb. gā'ôn, “pride”). “The thicket of the Jordan” (Jer. 12:5; 49:19; 50:44; “swelling,” KJV) is a phrase that could also be rendered “pride of the Jordan,” as in Zech. 11:3. Orelli renders it “jungles of Jordan,” where lions lurk. See also Vegetable Kingdom: Forest.

THIEF. See Law.

THIEVES. The prophet Isaiah (Isa. 1:23) says of the Israelite rulers that they were “companions of thieves,” meaning that they allowed themselves to be bribed by presents of stolen goods so they would overlook acts of injustice. The men who under this name appear in the crucifixion account were robbers rather than thieves, belonging to the lawless bands by which Palestine was at that time and afterward infested. Against these brigands every Roman procurator had to wage continual war. It was necessary to use armed police to counter them (cf. Luke 22:52). Of the previous history of the two who suffered on Golgotha we know nothing. They had been tried and condemned and were waiting their execution before our Lord was accused. It is probable enough, as the death of Barabbas was clearly expected at the same time, that they had taken part in his insurrection. At first the thieves reviled our Lord, but afterward one of them in penitence prayed to be remembered when Jesus should come to His kingdom (Matt. 27:38, 44; Mark 15:27).

THIGH (Heb. yārēk; Gk. mēros). The part of the body from the legs to the trunk.

1. In taking an oath it was an ancient custom to put the hand under the thigh. Abraham required it of his servant when he made him swear that he would not take a wife for Isaac of the daughters of the Canaanites (Gen. 24:2–9). Jacob required it of Joseph when he bound him by oath to bury him in Canaan (47:29–31). This custom, the so-called bodily oath, was, no doubt, connected with the significance of the hip as the part from which the posterity issued (46:26, marg.) and the seat of vital power. The early Jewish commentators supposed it to be especially connected with the rite of circumcision.

2. It is stated (Gen. 32:25–32) that the angel touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh and put it out of joint. By the dislocation of his hip the carnal nature of his previous wrestling was declared to be powerless and wrong. By his wrestling with God, Jacob entered upon a new stage in his life. Because of the dislocation of Jacob's thigh the custom began among his descendants of refraining from eating the nervus ischiadicus, the principal nerve in the area of the hip, which is easily injured by any violent strain in wrestling.

3. If the wife accused by her husband of infidelity was guilty, a part of the curse pronounced upon her was that her thigh should waste away (Num. 5:21). It is impossible to determine precisely the nature of this disease. Michaelis supposes it to have been dropsy of the ovary.

Figurative. "Hip and thigh" involved cruel, unsparing slaughter. To uncover the leg (Isa. 47:2) was to lay aside all feminine modesty. Striking the thigh signified deepest shame (Jer. 31:19) or sorrow (Ezek. 21:12).

THIM'NATHAH (thim'na-tha). See Timnah.

THINGS SACRIFICED TO IDOLS (1 Cor. 8:1, 4, 7, 10; cf. Acts 15:20; "Meats offered to idols," 15:29, KJV). This consisted of those parts of the animals offered in heathen sacrifices that remained after the priests had received their share, and that were either eaten in the temple or at home in connection with sacrificial feasts, or else purchased by poor or miserly persons in the meat markets. This was a very practical matter, as the Christian might easily come to eat such meat, either through being invited to a feast by heathen acquaintances (10:27) or by buying it in the market (10:25), and thereby offense would be given to scrupulous consciences. On the other hand, those of freer spirit, and with more of Paul's own mode of thinking, might be apt to make light of the matter and forget how a Christian ought to spare the weak. See Expediency.

THIRD OF A SHEKEL. A unit of money. See Metrology.

THIRST (Heb. ṣāmē; Gk. dipsos). A painful sensation occasioned by the absence of liquids from the stomach. This sensation is sometimes accompanied by vehement desire, and the term is therefore used figuratively in the Scripture in the moral sense of a longing after God (Pss. 42:2; 63:1; cf. 143:6; etc.). A longing after criminal indulgence is also called thirst (Jer. 2:25). A state of continued satisfaction is expressed by the phrase "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst anymore" (Rev. 7:16).

THISTLES, THORNS. See articles Thorn; Vegetable Kingdom.

THOM'AS (tom'as; from Aram. תאומא, tōmā, "twin"). One of the twelve apostles, he was also called Didymus, its Gk. equivalent. Because of the meaning of Thomas's name, twin, several in the early Christian era attempted to identify his twin brother or sister. But, it is likely that the twin is not even mentioned in the NT, making such identification impossible. He is said to have been born in Antioch, but is also considered by some a native of Galilee, like most of the other apostles (John 21:2).

In the first three gospels there is an account of his call to the apostleship (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15). The rest that we know of him is derived from the gospel of John. When Jesus declared His intention of going to Bethany after Lazarus's death, Thomas, apprehensive of danger, said to the other disciples, "Let us also go, that we may die with Him" (John 11:16). At the Last Supper, when Jesus was speaking of His departure, Thomas said to Him, "Lord, we do not know where You are going, how do we know the way?"

(14:5). When Jesus appeared to the first assembly after His resurrection, Thomas, for some reason, was absent. The others told him, "We have seen the Lord!" Thomas broke forth into an exclamation that conveys to us at once the vehemence of his doubt and the vivid picture that his mind retained of his Master's form as he had seen Him lifeless on the cross (20:25). "And after eight days again His disciples were inside, and Thomas with them. Jesus came, the doors having been shut, and stood in their midst, and said, 'Peace be with you.'" Turning to Thomas, He uttered the words that convey as strongly the sense of condemnation and tender reproof as those of Thomas had shown hesitation and doubt. "Then He said to Thomas, 'Reach here your finger, and see My hands; and reach here your hand, and put it into My side; and be not unbelieving, but believing.'" The effect upon Thomas was immediate. Doubt was removed, and faith asserted itself strongly. The words in which he expressed his belief contain a high assertion of his Master's divine nature: "Thomas answered and said to Him, 'My Lord and my God!'" The answer of our Lord sums up the moral of the whole narrative: "Because you have seen Me, have you believed? Blessed are they who did not see, and yet believed" (20:26–29). From this incident came the title of "Doubting Thomas," and he has been characterized as "slow to believe, subject to despondency, seeing all the difficulties of a case, viewing things on the darker side." It may be that he was of a critical tendency of mind, in which he did not recognize the statement of eyewitnesses as a sufficient ground of faith. After the above-mentioned incident, we hear of Thomas only twice again, once on the Sea of Galilee, with six other disciples (21:2), and again in the assembly of the apostles after the ascension (Acts 1:13). Early traditions, as believed in the fourth century, represent him as preaching in Parthia, or Persia, and as finally being buried in Edessa. Later traditions carry him farther E. His martyrdom is said to have been occasioned by a lance.

THORN. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words. See also Vegetable Kingdom.

Figurative. "A painful thorn" (Ezek. 28:24) should be rendered a smarting sting, figurative of the hurts of paganism. "The most upright like a thorn hedge" (Mic. 7:4) refers to the corruption of the nation, which was so great that even the most upright injured all who came in contact with him. In Job 5:5, "and take it to a place of thorns" means that even a thorny hedge does not prevent them from taking the food of the orphan. From want of energy "the way of the sluggard is as a hedge of thorns" (Prov. 15:19), i.e., full of almost insurmountable obstacles (cf. 22:5). To be overgrown with thorns is a figure of desolation (cf. 24:31). "The crackling of thorn bushes under a pot" (Eccles. 7:6) is that to which the laughter of fools is compared. The wicked are often compared to thorns (2 Sam. 23:6; Nah. 1:10). Dried cow dung was the common fuel in Palestine; its slowness in burning makes the quickness of a fire of thorns most graphic as an image of the sudden end of fools (cf. Ps. 118:12). Thorns and thistles are symbolic of the false prophets (Matt. 7:16).

THORN IN THE FLESH. See Paul.

THREE TAVERNS. See Appii Forum.

THRESHING. See Agriculture.

Figurative. Threshing is used in Scripture as a figure of providential chastisement (Isa. 21:10); crushing oppression (41:15; Mic. 4:12–13); judicial visitation (Jer. 51:33); the labors of ministers (1 Cor. 9:9–10). Dust made by threshing is a figure of complete destruction (2 Kings 13:7).

THRESHING FLOOR (Heb. gōren, "even"). A level and hard-beaten plot in the open air (Judg. 6:37; 2 Sam. 6:6), on which sheaves of grain were threshed (Isa. 21:10; Jer. 51:33; Mic. 4:12; Matt. 3:12). The top of a rock was a favorite spot for this purpose; on this the sheaves were spread out and sometimes beaten with flails—a method practiced especially with the lighter grains, such as fitches or cummin (Isa. 28:27)—but more commonly by oxen. The oxen were either yoked side by side and driven around over the grain, or were yoked to a drag (Lat. tribulum or trahea), consisting of a board or a block of wood, with stones or pieces of iron fastened to the lower surface to make it rough. This was dragged over the grain, beating out the kernels.

The threshing floors were watched all night to guard against theft of the grain (Ruth 3:3–6, 14); they were often of considerable value, and frequently named in connection with a winepress (Deut. 16:13; 2 Kings 6:27; Hos. 9:2; Joel 2:24), since grain, wine, and oil were the more important products of the soil. They were sometimes given specific names, such as that of Nacon (2 Sam. 6:6) or Chidon (1 Chron. 13:9), Atad (Gen. 50:10), Ornan or Araunah (2 Sam. 24:18, 20; 1 Chron. 21:15).

THRESHOLD. The rendering of:

1. Heb. sāph, a sill or bottom of a doorway (Judg. 19:27; 1 Kings 14:17; Ezek. 40:6–7; Zeph. 2:14).

2. Heb. mīptān, a “stretcher,” probably the bottom beam or sill of a door (1 Sam. 5:4–5; Ezek. 9:3; 10:4, 18; 46:2; 47:1).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H. C. Trumbull, The Threshold Covenant (1896).

THRONE (Heb. kissē; Gk. thronos; bēma). The Heb. term kissē applies to any elevated seat occupied by a person in authority, whether a judge (Ps. 122:5) or a military chief (Jer. 1:15). The use of a chair in a country where the usual postures were squatting and reclining was at all times regarded as a symbol of dignity (2 Kings 4:10; Prov. 9:14). In order to specify a throne in our sense of the term it was necessary to add to kissē the notion of royalty; hence the frequent occurrence of such expressions as “the throne of his kingdom” (Deut. 17:18; 1 Kings 1:46; cf. 2 Chron. 7:18). The characteristic feature of the royal throne was its elevation: Solomon’s throne was approached by six steps (1 Kings 10:19; 2 Chron. 9:18); and Jehovah’s throne is described as “lofty and exalted” (Isa. 6:1). The materials and workmanship were costly. It was furnished with arms or “stays.” The steps were also lined with pairs of lions. As to the form of the chair, we are only informed in 1 Kings 10:19 that there was “a round top to the throne at its rear.” The king sat on his throne on state occasions. At such times he appeared in his royal robes.

Figurative. The throne was the symbol of supreme power and dignity (Gen. 41:40). To “sit on the throne” implied the exercise of regal power (Deut. 17:18; 1 Kings 16:11); to sit on the throne of another (1 Kings 1:13) meant to succeed him as king. “Thrones” also designate earthly potentates and celestial beings, archangels (Col. 1:16).

THUM’MIM (thum’im). See Urim and Thummim.

THUNDER (Heb. qôl, a “voice,” i.e., of Jehovah; rā’am, a “peal”; Gk. brontē). From a physical point of view the most noticeable feature in connection with thunder is the extreme rarity of its occurrence during the summer months in Palestine and adjacent countries. From the middle of April to the middle of September it is hardly ever heard. Hence it was selected by Samuel as a striking expression of the divine displeasure toward the Israelites (1 Sam. 12:17). Rain in harvest was deemed as extraordinary as snow in summer (Prov. 26:1), and Jerome asserts that he had never witnessed it in the latter part of June or in July (Com., on Amos 4:7). The plague of hail in Egypt is naturally represented as accompanied with thunder (Ex. 9:22–29, 33–34). It accompanied the lightning at the giving of the law (19:16; 20:18). It is referred to as a natural phenomenon subject to laws of the Creator (“thunderbolt,” Job 28:26; 38:25).

In John 12:28 it is related that there came “a voice out of heaven” in response to the prayer of Jesus. “It is a voice which came miraculously from God; yet, as regards its intelligibility conditioned by the subjective disposition and receptivity of the hearers, which sounded with a tone as of thunder, so that the definite words which resounded in this form of sound remained unintelligible to the unsusceptible, who simply heard that majestic kind of sound, but not its contents, and said, brontēn gegonenai (‘It is thunder’)” (Meyer, Com., ad loc.). Mark (Mark 3:17) says that our Lord surnamed James and John “Boanerges, which means, ‘Sons of Thunder.’” Some have thought that this applied to them because of their eloquence; others to their courage and energy. It seems more likely that it referred to their impetuous, ardent temperament.

Figurative. In the imaginative philosophy of the Hebrews thunder was regarded as the voice of Jehovah (Job 37:2, 4–5; 40:9; Pss. 18:13; 29:3), who dwelt behind the thunder (Ps. 81:7). Thunder was, to the mind of the Jew, the symbol of divine power (29:3; etc.) and vengeance (1 Sam. 2:10; 2 Sam. 22:14).

THUNDERBOLT. In the KJV of Ps. 78:48, the translation of Heb. reshep, “flame,” “fire,” “spark” (“bolts of lightning,” NASB, NIV); another Heb. expression, ḥāzîz qōlōth, is translated “thunderbolt” in the NASB of Job 28:26; 38:25 (“thunderstorm,” NIV).

THYATI´RA (thī-a-tī´ra). A city in Asia Minor, the seat of one of the seven apocalyptic churches (Rev. 1:11; 2:18). It was situated in the confines of Mysia and Ionia, a little S of the river Lycus and at the northern extremity of the valley between Mt. Tmolus and the southern ridge of Temnus. It was one of the many Macedonian colonies established in Asia Minor in the sequel of the destruction of the Persian Empire by Alexander. The waters of Thyatira are said to be so well adapted for dyeing that in no place can the scarlet cloth out of which fezes are made be so brilliantly or so permanently dyed as here. So in the Acts (16:14) Lydia, the first convert of Paul at Philippi, is mentioned as “a seller of purple fabrics” from Thyatira. The principal deity of the city was Apollo, worshiped as the sun-god under the surname Tyrimnas. He was no doubt introduced by the Macedonian colonists, for the name is Macedonian. A priestess of Artemis is also mentioned in the inscriptions. The modern city of Akhisar, about 50,000 in population, marks the site of the ancient city in the territory that is now Anatolian Turkey. Nothing of the ancient city can be seen. Remains of a Byzantine church remind one that the gospel once came to this place.

THYINE WOOD. See Vegetable Kingdom: Citron Wood.

TIBE´RIAS (tī-bē´ri-as). A city in the time of Christ, on the Sea of Galilee; first mentioned in the NT (John 6:1, 23; 21:1, “Sea of Tiberias”), and then by Josephus, who states that it was built by Herod Antipas and was named by him in honor of the emperor Tiberius, A.D. 14–37. It was one of nine towns around the sea, each one having not less than 15,000 inhabitants. Because Tiberias was situated on the edge of the ancient walled town Rakkath (Josh. 19:35), or Hammath, whose cemetery lies beneath it, in Jesus’ time it was avoided by strict Jews. Our Lord apparently did not visit the city, noted for its laxness as a hot-water bath resort. Tiberias was the capital of Galilee from the time of its origin until the reign of Herod Agrippa II, who changed the seat of power back again to Sepphoris, where it had been before the founding of the new city. Many of the inhabitants were Greeks and Romans, and foreign custom prevailed there to such an extent as to give offense to stricter Jews. After the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, Tiberias became a Jewish metropolis and center of rabbinic learning. After A.D. 150, it was well known as the seat of the Sanhedrin and the rabbinical schools from which came the Talmud and the Masorah. The city lies about twelve miles S of the entrance of the Jordan into the Lake of Galilee and six miles N of the river's exit from the sea. The vicinity is rich in archaeological possibilities, especially the area between the city and the famous hot springs. Masonry of various dates survives, including a synagogue.

TIBE'RIAS, THE SEA OF. Another name (John 21:1 only) for the Sea of Galilee (cf. 6:1). It is thought that the evangelist used this name because it was more familiar to nonresidents in Palestine than the indigenous names of the "Sea of Galilee" or "Sea of Gennesaret."

TIBE'RIUS (ti-bē'ri-us; "pertaining to the Tiber"; in full, Tiberius Claudius Nero Caesar). The second Roman emperor, successor of Augustus, who began to reign A.D. 14 and reigned until A.D. 37. He was the son of Tiberius Claudius Nero and Livia, and hence a stepson of Augustus. He was born at Rome on November 16, 42 B.C. He became emperor in his fifty-fifth year, after having distinguished himself as a commander in various wars and having displayed notable talents as an orator and an administrator of civil affairs. He even gained the reputation of possessing the sterner virtues of the Roman character and was regarded as entirely worthy of the imperial honors to which his birth and supposed personal merits opened the way. Yet, on being raised to supreme power, he suddenly became, or showed himself to be, a very different man. The historian Tacitus's vilification of his character is now known to be overdrawn, and Tiberius has been rehabilitated in recent years. Tiberius died at the age of seventy-eight, after a reign of twenty-three years. He is mentioned in Scripture only in Luke 3:1, where he is termed Tiberius Caesar. John the Baptist, it is said in vv. 2–3, began his ministry in the fifteenth year of his reign, an important chronological statement, helping to determine the year of Christ's birth and entrance on His public life.

TIB'HATH (tib'hath; "slaughter"). A city of Hadadezer, king of Zobah (1 Chron. 18:8), called Betah (which see) in 2 Sam. 8:8, probably an accidental transposition of the first two letters. See Tebah.

TIB'NI (tib'ni; "straw"). The sixth king of Israel, and son of Ginath. After the tragic death of Zimri there was a division among the people. "Half of the people followed Tibni ... the other half followed Omri." After a struggle lasting four years Omri's party prevailed, and, according to the brief account of the historian, "Tibni died and Omri became king" (1 Kings 16:21–22), about 880 B.C.

TI'DAL (tī'dal). The name of a king (Gen. 14:1) who accompanied Chedorlaomer in his raid into Palestine about 1960 B.C. Of the personality of this king nothing is known. The country ruled by Tidal was Gōiim, often translated "nations" or "Gentiles." It is not yet certainly located. Hommel believed it to be Goi, in northeastern Babylonia. See articles on Chedorlaomer; Arioch; and Amraphel.

TIG'LATH-PILE'SER (tig'lath-pī-lē'zer). The name of an Assyrian king (see also Pul). The name of Tiglath-pileser fills a large place in the history of the Hebrew people before the fall of Samaria. It was in the reign of Tiglath-pileser III, known also as Pul, that they first felt the menace of complete overthrow by the Assyrians.

Name and Origin. The name Tiglath-pileser appears in Assyr. under the form of Tukulti-apil-esharra, meaning "my trust is the son of Esharra," i.e., the god Ninib, but this was abbreviated even by the Assyrians themselves. It was a famous name in the annals of Assyria, for one of the greatest Assyrian conquerors, Tiglath-pileser I (about 1120 B.C.), had borne it. Tiglath-pileser III was, however, a far greater man than his earlier namesake. He was not of royal origin. Of his origin, indeed, nothing is known. It is probable that he was an Assyrian general. He may have been also an administrator or governor of one of the vast provinces of the Assyrian empire. He appears suddenly upon the scene of historical action. He says nothing in his inscriptions of his father or mother. His inscriptions were mutilated long after his death by Esarhaddon, an indignity offered to no other king, and these facts lead irresistibly to the conclusion that he was not a member of the royal family. The king who preceded him upon the throne was Asshur-nirari III, who reigned weakly from 754 to 745 B.C. In the year 746 there was a rebellion against his rule. Whether Tiglath-pileser, then perhaps a general, started this rebellion, participated in it, or merely reaped its results, we have no means of knowing; but immediately upon the death of Asshur-nirari III he was acknowledged king of Assyria.

Reign. The first years of his reign showed him a masterful man. In other instances in Assyrian history such an usurpation would have been followed by petty wars and insurrections all over the kingdom, but no audible murmur was heard at the beginning of his reign. He was evidently known everywhere as a man with whom it would be dangerous to trifle. His reign was not long (745–727 B.C.), and he may have come to the throne comparatively late in life. Whatever his name was, he assumed at once the royal style of Tiglath-pileser, adopting the royal name as his own. Were it not for the abuse of his inscriptions at the hands of Esarhaddon, we should know all the events of his reign in great detail. He had restored the palace of Shalmaneser in Calah. Upon the walls of its great rooms he placed stone slabs with beautifully engraved inscriptions recounting the campaigns of his reign. Besides these he left inscriptions written upon clay, giving accounts of his campaigns grouped in geographical order and supplemented these by other inscriptions on clay containing lists of the countries conquered, but without any details of the campaigns. The first matter that claimed the attention of the new king was an invasion of Babylonia, rendered necessary to drive out nomadic Aramaeans who had invaded and settled in the country and threatened to destroy its civilization. The march of the new Assyrian king southward was a triumphal progress. He was heralded as a deliverer and soon reestablished an orderly government in the kingdom of Babylonia. After this he turned NW and E, where he collected heavy tribute from peoples who had refused to pay it during the weak reign of his predecessor. At the very beginning he introduced an entirely new method of dealing with conquered peoples. Before his reign the Assyrian kings had for the most part contented themselves with predatory raids by which they enormously increased the wealth of Assyria, but contributed little to the upbuilding of stable government in the conquered lands. Peoples thus conquered paid tribute while the conqueror was at hand and refused when they thought he was far enough away to place them out of danger. Some of the previous kings had tried colonization and deportation in a very slight fashion but without conspicuous success. Tiglath-pileser III made these his chief methods. He first conquered a people and then deported the best of them to another part of his dominion, bringing from that place enough people to colonize the land thus vacated. For many peoples this was punishment worse than death. From his point of view it contributed to stability by making successful rebellion almost an impossibility. Further, he set Assyrian governors over conquered provinces and endeavored not only to collect tribute annually but also to administer all the affairs of the land as a part of the Assyrian empire that he was building. Campaign followed campaign, N, E, and S, with lesser invasions also in the west. All these things little affected the Hebrew people. They were, however, a threat of what might occur when once he was free to attend to the conquest of Palestine.

Relation with Israel. Nominally some of the states of Syria and Palestine were already Assyrian tributaries, but Assyrian influence had been little felt for a long time. If it had been possible to unite all the petty kingdoms of Syria, Palestine, and their neighboring countries into one great confederation for mutual defense, it would probably have been possible to prevent the reconquest of the west by the Assyrians, even under so great a master as Tiglath-pileser III. But the weakness of the west lay in its utter inability to put aside selfish and petty concerns to work for united interests. Some of these states determined again, about 739 B.C., to throw off the Assyrian yoke. At the head of the coalition thus formed was Azariah, or Uzziah, king of Judah. To support him, Hamath, Damascus, Tyre, Que, Melid, Samaria, and others to the number of nineteen had banded together. It was indeed a promising confederation. If all these states had put their full quota of men into the field under competent military direction, they would, no doubt, have been able to resist the Assyrians and to prevent or at least postpone the engulfing of Syria into the now rapidly growing Assyrian empire. But before any combination of their forces could be brought about, Tiglath-pileser came W and entered Palestine, apparently determined to attack the ringleader, Uzziah, in his own territory, before his allies could come to his aid. As soon as he entered the Northern Kingdom, Menahem threw down his arms and paid the Assyrians 1,000 talents of silver as a token of subjection. Here was practically an end of the entire confederation. Tiglath-pileser was apparently satisfied with this collapse; and as the others were willing to pay tribute, he did not pursue the advantage that he had gained but went back to Assyria laden with heavy booty, to which Rezin of Damascus and Hiram of Tyre had also contributed. In 734 B.C. he was again on the Mediterranean coast. In this year he seems to have crossed the plain of Syria, near Damascus, and to have gone straight to the coast, which he followed toward the S. He had no fear of Tyre or of Sidon, for they were busy with commerce, and he needed to strike but a few light blows before Gaza was reached. Here, if ever, Egypt and Syria and all the west ought to have made a stand against the Assyrians; but no stand was made, and Gaza was overwhelmed. In the reign of Ahaz, king of Judah, there was another opportunity for him to form a coalition with Pekah of Samaria and Rezin of Damascus against Assyria. But Pekah and Rezin thought they saw in the youth of Ahaz a chance for the enrichment of their own kingdoms. They united forces and invaded Judah. So began the Syro-Ephraimitic war. Ahaz was likely to be overwhelmed. To whom should he turn for help? No help was to be had in Egypt, and in the madness of the hour he sent an embassy to meet Tiglath-pileser and ask for help against Damascus and Samaria. Tiglath-pileser accepted a bribe from Ahaz, for it suited his own purposes to do so, and at once threatened Damascus. This drew off from Judah the armies of Damascus and Samaria. Tiglath-pileser then passed by Damascus, came down the seacoast past his tributary states of Tyre and Sidon, and turned into the plain of Esdraelon above Carmel. His own accounts fail us at this point, but the biblical narrative fills the gap by stating that he took a number of cities and overran the land (2 Kings 15:29). He might then have attacked Samaria itself, but a party of assassins made that unnecessary, for they slew Samaria's king, and in his place Tiglath-pileser set up Hoshea as the nominal king of Samaria, but as his personal representative (15:30). Damascus was next besieged and captured (732 B.C.) and the entire country about it given over to desolation. Tiglath-pileser boasts that he destroyed at this time 591 cities, whose inhabitants were carried away with all their possessions to Assyria. Ahaz of Judah came to pay honor in Damascus to this foreign conqueror, who was now practically master over the whole country. He it was who had prepared the way for the destruction of Samaria by Shalmaneser V and Sargon II (722-721 B.C.). His later career has but little bearing upon the OT story. In 728 B.C., on New Year's Day, he was solemnly anointed king of Babylon, and in 727 he died. Upon any basis of estimate whatever he ranks as one of the greatest conquerors and one of the greatest executives among all the great rulers who made Assyria a dreaded name in Asia. He made the Assyrian empire out of a kingdom and a few dependencies. He made it a world power, binding province to province, and transforming local centers into general centers by deportation and colonization. R.W.R.; M.F.U.

TI'GRIS (tī'gris). Used in the LXX as the equivalent of the Heb. Hiddeqel (“Hiddekel,” Gen. 2:14, marg.), one of the rivers of Eden. The name of Hiddekel, or Tigris, was also Akkad. In the old language of Babylonia it was termed Idiglat, Digla, “the encircling.” From Idiglat the Persians formed their Tigris with a play upon a word in their own language that signified an “arrow.” The Tigris, we are told, flowed to the “east of Ashur.” But the Ashur meant is not the land of Assyria but the city of Ashur, the primitive capital of the country, now represented by the mound of Kalah Sherghat. The land of Assyria lay to the E as well as to the W of the Tigris. Daniel (Dan. 10:4) calls it “the great river, that is, the Tigris.” It rises in the mountains of Armenia, about thirty miles NW of Diarbekir, at no great distance from the sources of the Euphrates, and pursues a meandering course of upward of eleven hundred miles, when at last the Tigris and Euphrates unite and flow as one stream into the Persian Gulf. See Hiddekel.

TIK'VAH (tik'va; “hope, expectation”).

1. The son of Harhas, and father of Shallum, the husband of Huldah the prophetess (2 Kings 22:14), before 624 B.C. He is called Tokhath in 2 Chron. 34:22; Tikvath, KJV.

2. The father of Jahzeiah, which latter was one of the rulers appointed by Ezra to superintend the divorcement of the Gentile wives after the captivity (Ezra 10:15), before 437 B.C.

TIK'VATH (tik'vath). See Tikvah.

TILE (Heb. lābēnâ from lāban, “to be white,” so called from whitish clay), a brick (Ezek. 4:1, KJV; “tablet,” NIV, NKJV) used to write upon.

TILES (Gk. keramos, “pottery ware”). The rendering of Luke 5:19, “through the tiles” (dia tōn keramōn), has been the cause of considerable difficulty. Some have understood the tiles to be the layer of sticks, brush, and hard-rolled clay that constitutes the ordinary flat roof of an oriental house. Of course, the breaking up of this might be readily repaired, but would cause intolerable dust at the time. Edersheim (Life of Jesus, 1:503) says: “The roof itself, which had hard-beaten earth or rubble underneath it, was paved with brick, stone, or any other hard substance, and surrounded by a balustrade which, according to Jewish law, was at least three feet high. It is scarcely possible to imagine that the bearers of the paralytic would have attempted to dig through this into a room below, not to speak of the interruption and inconvenience caused to those below by such an operation. But no such objection attaches if we regard it not as the main roof of the house, but as that of the covered gallery under which we are supposing the Lord to have stood.... In such case it would have been comparatively easy to ‘unroof’ the covering of ‘tiles,’ and then ‘having dug out’ an opening through the lighter framework which supported the tiles, to let down their burden ‘into the midst before Jesus.’”

TIL’GATH-PILNE’SER (til’gath-pil-ne’zer). A variation (1 Chron. 5:6, 26; 2 Chron. 28:20) of Tiglath-pileser (which see).

TILLAGE. A KJV term that appears as the translation of two different Heb. words.

1. Heb. nîr is translated “tillage” in the KJV of Prov. 13:23 (“fallow ground,” NASB, NKJV; “field,” NIV). The Heb. term appears elsewhere; see Jer. 4:3; Hos. 10:12, where nîr appears as both a noun (“fallow ground”) and a verb (“break up”).

2. Heb. ʿăbôdâ is not always translated “tillage.” It refers to labor or service, either as servile labor (Lev. 25:39); work, or business (1 Chron. 9:19); or work of the field, agriculture (Neh. 10:37; 1 Chron. 27:26; both “tillage,” KJV; the NKJV reads “farming communities” and “work of the field,” respectively; NIV, “towns where we work” and “who farmed the land,” respectively).

TILON (ti’lon). The last named of the four “sons” of Shimon, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20).

TIMAE’US (ti-mē’us), father of the blind beggar cured by Christ (Mark 10:46), the son being thence called Bartimaeus (which see).

TIMBREL. See Music.

TIME. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. terms, of which the following are most important:

1. Day (Heb. yôm), used both in the particular sense of a natural day (see below), and in the general sense of a set time or period of time.

2. An appointed time (Heb. zîman); thus “there is an appointed time for everything” (Eccles. 3:1), i.e., everything remains but for a time; all things are frail and fleeting. In Dan. 2:16 (see marg.) it is an appointed season.

3. Set or appointed time (Heb. môʿēd, an “appointment”), a space of time, appointed and definite (Ex. 34:18; 1 Sam. 13:8; cf. Jer. 8:7; etc.).

4. Time to come (Heb. māhār, “tomorrow”; Ex. 13:14; Josh. 4:6, 21; cf. 1 Sam. 20:12).

5. A set time (Aram. iddān) is used in the book of Daniel in a sense that has been much disputed. In Dan. 4:16, cf. vv. 23, 25, 32, the prophet writes of Nebuchadnezzar, “Let his mind be changed from that of a man, and let a beast’s mind be given to him, and let seven periods of time pass over him.” Gesenius (Lexicon) gives its meaning as prophetic language for a year. “Following the example of the LXX and of Josephus, many ancient and recent interpreters understood by the word iddānîm, years, because the times in 7:25; 12:7 are also years, and because in 4:29 mention is made of twelve months, and thereby the time is defined as one year. But from 4:29 the duration of the iddānîm cannot at all be concluded, and in 7:25 and 12:7 the times are not years. Iddān designates generally a definite period of time, whose length or duration may be very different” (Keil, Com., on Dan. 4:16).

6. Heb. ʿēt is a general term for time; e.g., the time of evening (Josh. 8:29); time of bearing (Job 39:1–2); at or about a time (Dan. 9:21); time or season of love (Ezek. 16:8), i.e., of young women at marriageable age, etc.

7. Heb. pa'am, a “stroke,” a tread of the foot, step (Ps. 119:126); one time (Gen. 18:32, “this once”; Ex. 9:27; Prov. 7:12, “now”).

8. Hidden time, i.e., obscure and long, of which the beginning or end is indefinite, duration, everlasting, eternity (Josh. 24:2; Deut. 32:7, “days of old”; Prov. 8:23, “everlasting”; Heb. ōlām, “concealed”).

9. An occasion, set time (Gk. kairos). A space of time, opportunity, etc. (Gk. chronos).

TIME, DIVISIONS OF. The following are mentioned in Scripture:

Year (Heb. shānâ, as a “revolution” of time). So called from the change of the seasons. The years of the Hebrews in the preexilic period were lunar, of 354 days 8 hours 38 seconds, and consisted of 12 unequal lunar months. As this falls short of the true year (an astronomical month having 29 days 12 hours 44 minutes 2.84 seconds), they were compelled, in order to preserve the regularity of harvest and vintage (Ex. 23:16), to add a month occasionally, thus making it on the average to coincide with the solar year (containing 365 days 5 hours 48 minutes 45 seconds). The method of doing this among the very ancient Hebrews is unknown. Among the later Jews an intercalary month was inserted after Adar and was called Ve-dar, or second Adar. The intercalation was regularly decreed by the Sanhedrin, which observed the rule never to add a month to the sabbatical year.

The Hebrew year began, as the usual enumeration of the months shows (Lev. 23:34; 25:9; Num. 9:11; 2 Kings 25:8; Jer. 39:2; cf. 1 Macc. 4:52; 10:21), with Abib or Nisan (Esther 3:7), subsequent to and in accordance with the Mosaic arrangement. As we constantly find this arrangement spoken of as a festal calendar, most rabbinical and many Christian scholars understand that the civil year began, as with modern Jews, with Tisri (October), but the ecclesiastical year with Nisan.

A well-defined and universal era was unknown among the ancient Hebrews. National events were sometimes dated from the Exodus from Egypt (Ex. 19:1; Num. 33:38; 1 Kings 6:1), usually from the accession of the kings (as in Kings, Chronicles, and Jeremiah) or the erection of Solomon’s Temple (1 Kings 8:1–2; 9:10). Later events were dated from the beginning of the Exile (Ezek. 33:21; 40:1), but this system was not used in Ezek. 1:1. For special purposes, such as the tithing of cattle and the planting of trees, the Jewish year began at distinct times. The regnal year began with Nisan. The first year of each king’s reign began on the first day of Nisan after his accession, the preceding days being counted to his predecessor. This accounts for the precise specification of the time of three months as exceptional in the case of the reigns of Jehoahaz and Jeconiah. The postexilic books date according to the reigning years of the Persian masters of Palestine (Ezra 4:24; 6:15; 7:7–9; Neh. 2:1; 13:6; Hag. 1:1–2; etc.).

As Syrian vassals the Jews adopted the Greek (1 Macc. 1:10) or Seleucid era, which dated from the overthrow of Babylon by Seleucus Nicator I. Still another national reckoning is given (1 Macc. 13:41–42), namely, from the year of the deliverance of the Jews from the Syrian yoke, i.e., the seventeenth year of the Seleucid era, or from the autumn of 143 B.C.

Month (Heb. hōdesh, the “new” moon). The Hebrew months were lunar and began from when the new moon was seen; at least this is the case from the postexilic period. In this period the length of the lunar month depended upon the day when the appearance of the new moon was announced by the Sanhedrin, which thus made the month either twenty-nine days or thirty days, according to how the day was included in the following or the preceding month. The general rule was that in one year not less than four nor more than eight full months should occur. The final adjustment of the lunar to the solar year was by intercalation; so that whenever in the last month, Adar, it became evident that the Passover, which must be held in the following month, Nisan, would occur before harvest, an entire month was interjected between Adar and Nisan, constituting an intercalary year. This, however, according to the Gemara, did not take place in a sabbatic year but always in that which preceded it; nor in two successive years, nor yet more than three years apart.

Before the Exile the individual months were usually designated by numbers (the twelfth month occurs in 2 Kings 25:27; Jer. 52:31); yet we find also the following names: “Ear month” (Heb. ḥōdesh hā-ābīb; Ex. 13:4; 23:15; Deut. 16:1), corresponding to the later Nisan; “Bloom month” (ḥōdesh ziw; 1 Kings 6:1, 37), the second month; “Rain month” (yeraḥ būl; 6:38), the eighth month; “Freshet month” (yeraḥ hā-ētānīm; 8:2), the seventh month; all of which seem to be mere appellatives. Occasionally the months were newly numbered after the postexilic period.

After the Exile the months received the following names: (1) Nisan (Neh. 2:1; Esther 3:7), the first month, in which the Passover was held and in which the vernal equinox fell; (2) Iyâr (Targum on 2 Chron. 30:2); (3) Sivân (Esther 8:9); (4) Tammûz; (5) Ab; (6) Elûl (Neh. 6:15), the last month of the civil year in the postexilic age; (7) Tishrî, in which the festivals of the Day of Atonement and Tabernacles fell; (8) Marchesvân (Josephus Ant. 1.3.3); (9) Chislêu (Neh. 1:1; Zech. 7:1); (10) Tebêth (Esther 2:16); (11) Shebât (Zech. 1:7); (12) Adâr (Esther 3:7; 8:12).

Week (Heb. shābûa, “sevens”; Gk. sabbaton, “rest,” by extension “sennight,” i.e., the interval between two sabbaths). The division of time into weeks occurs as early as Gen. 2:2–3; and in the narrative of the Deluge more than one allusion occurs to this mode of computing time (7:4, 10; 8:10, 12). Later, weeks appear to have been known among the Syrians of Mesopotamia (29:27–28), and still later they attached a certain sacredness to the number seven, if we may judge from the procedure of Balaam (Num. 23:1, 4, 14, 29). Weeks appear to have been known in Egypt in the time of Joseph (Gen. 50:10–11). Weekly institutions constituted a prominent feature of the Mosaic law (Num. 19:11; 28:17; Ex. 13:6–7; 34:18; Lev. 14:38; 23:42; Deut. 16:8, 13). Ordinarily, however, days rather than weeks (as among the Greeks and Romans) constituted the conventional mode of computing time (see Lev. 12:5; Dan. 10:2–3).

In the postexilic period reckoning by weeks became more customary, and at length special names for particular weekdays came into use (Mark 16:2, 9; Luke 24:1; Acts 20:7; 1 Cor. 16:2). The astronomical derivation of the week naturally grows out of the obvious fact that the moon changes about every seven—properly, $7\frac{3}{8}$ —days, so that the lunar month divides itself into four quarters. The days of the week were named long before the Christian era on regular astronomical principles from the seven planet

TIM'NATH. See Timnah.

TIM'NATH-HE'RES (tim'nath-he'res; “portion of the sun”; Judg. 2:9). See Timnath-Serah.

TIM'NATH-SE'RAH (tim'nath-se'ra; “double portion,” Josh. 19:50; 24:30). The name of the city that was presented to Joshua after the partition of the country (19:50); and in “the territory of his inheritance,” where he was buried (24:30). It is specified as being “in the hill country of Ephraim, on the north of Mount Gaash.” In Judg. 2:9, the name is altered to Timnath-heres. The latter form is that adopted by the Jewish writers. Accordingly, they identify the place with Kefar Cheres, which is said by Rabbi Jacob, hap-Parchi, and other Jewish travelers, to be about five miles S (“nine miles,” G. A. Smith) of Shechem (Nablûs).

No place with that name appears on the maps. Another and more promising identification is Tibnah, 12 miles NE of Lydda and 8½ miles SW of Kefr Haris, where the Samaritans locate the sepulchers of Joshua and Caleb. “Heres” is probably “Serah” inadvertently written backward.

TIM'NITE (tim'nit). A designation of Samson's father-in-law, from his residence in Timnah (Judg. 15:6).

TIMON (ti'mon; Gk. “reckoning, worthy”). The fifth named of the seven “deacons” appointed to serve as distributors of food on the occasion of complaints of partiality being made by the Hellenistic Jews at Jerusalem (Acts 6:5). Nothing further is known of him.

TIMO'THEUS (ti-mo'the-us), the Gk. form of Timothy (which see).

TIM'OTHY (tim'o-thi; “venerating God”). The convert and friend of Paul. Timothy was the son of one of those mixed marriages that, though unlawful, were frequent in the later periods of Jewish history. His mother was a Jewess, whereas his father (name unknown) was a Greek (Acts 16:1–3).

Early Life. The picture of Timothy's early life, as described by the apostle Paul, portrays a mother and grandmother, full of tenderness and faith, piously instructing him in the Scriptures and training him to hope for the Messiah of Israel (2 Tim. 1:5; 3:15). Thus, though far removed from the larger colonies of Israelite families, he was brought up in a thoroughly Jewish atmosphere; however he could hardly be called a Jewish boy, having never been admitted by circumcision within the pale of God's ancient covenant.

Conversion. Timothy was probably living at Lystra when Paul made his first visit to that city (Acts 16:1), and he appears to have been converted at that time (14:6; cf. 2 Tim. 1:5). No mention is made of Timothy until the time of Paul's second visit, but it is safe to assume that his spiritual life and education were under the care of the elders of the church (Acts 14:23).

Circumcision. Those who had the deepest insight into character and spoke with a prophetic utterance pointed to Timothy (1 Tim. 1:18; 4:14) as specially fit for missionary work; and Paul desired to have him as a companion. The apostle circumcised him (Acts 16:3), and Timothy was set apart as an evangelist by the laying on of hands (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 4:5).

“He took him and circumcised him” (Acts 16:1, 3). Paul's conduct in circumcising Timothy has been considered inconsistent with his principle and conduct in refusing to circumcise Titus (Gal. 2:3–4). “The two cases are, however, entirely different. In the latter there was an attempt to enforce circumcision as necessary to salvation; in the former it was performed as a voluntary act, and simply on prudential grounds” (Haley, Alleged Discrepancies, p. 260).

Paul's Companion. Henceforth Timothy was one of Paul's most constant companions. They and Silvanus, and probably Luke also, journeyed to Philippi (Acts 16:12), and there the young evangelist was already conspicuous for his filial devotion and zeal (Phil. 2:19–22). He seems to have been left behind at Philippi to watch over the infant church. He appeared at Berea, where he remained with Silas after Paul's departure (Acts 17:14), joining Paul at Athens. From Athens he was sent back to Thessalonica (1 Thess. 3:2), since he had special gifts for comforting and teaching. He left Thessalonica, not for Athens, but for Corinth, and his name is united with Paul's in the opening words of both letters written from that city to the Thessalonians (1:1; 2 Thess. 1:1). Of the five following years of his life we have no record. He is next mentioned as being sent on in advance when the apostle was contemplating the long journey that was to include Macedonia, Achaia, Jerusalem, and Rome (Acts 19:22). It is probable that he returned by the same route and met Paul according to a previous arrangement (1 Cor. 16:10) and was thus with him when the second epistle was written to the church of Corinth (2 Cor. 1:1). He returned with the apostle to that city and joined in messages of greeting to the disciples whom he had known personally at Corinth and who had since gone to Rome (Rom. 16:21). He formed one of the company of friends who went with Paul to Philippi and then sailed by themselves, waiting for his arrival by a different ship (Acts 20:3–6). No further mention is made of him until he rejoined the apostle, probably soon after his arrival in Rome. He was with Paul when the epistles to the Philippians, the Colossians, and Philemon were written (Phil. 1:1; 2:19; Col. 1:1; Philem. 1). It follows from 1 Tim. 1:3 that he and Paul, after the release of the latter from his imprisonment, revisited proconsular Asia, that the apostle then continued his journey to Macedonia, while Timothy remained, half-reluctantly, even weeping at the separation (2 Tim. 1:4), at Ephesus to check if possible the outgrowth of heresy and licentiousness that had sprung up there. He had to exercise rule over presbyters, some older than himself (1 Tim. 4:12); to render judgments (5:1, 19–20); to regulate the almsgiving and sisterhood of the church (vv. 3–10); and to ordain overseers and deacons (3:1–13). These duties, together with the danger of being entangled in the disputes of rival sects, made Paul anxious for the steadfastness of his disciple. Among his last recorded words Paul expressed his desire to see him again (2 Tim. 4:9, 21). It is uncertain whether Timothy was able to fulfill these last requests of the apostle, or that he reached Rome before Paul's death, although some have seen in Heb. 13:23 an indication that he shared Paul's imprisonment.

Legends. According to an old tradition, Timothy continued to act as bishop of Ephesus and suffered martyrdom under Domitian or Nerva.

TIMOTHY, FIRST EPISTLE. The first of three pastoral letters written by Paul to two of his young converts (1 Tim. 1:2; cf. Titus 1:4) who had accompanied him on many of his missionary journeys. They had been established as pastors of churches, and these epistles were directed to them to give them instructions for the orderly management of the organized congregations. These letters thus have a special message to youthful ministers. Although the letters are directed to young pastors and not to churches, their messages are peculiarly applicable to the churches.

Date. Apparently Paul was released from prison at Rome between A.D. 63 and 67. If this is true, it was during this interval that he composed this epistle. He also sent Titus an epistle at this time. If Paul endured only one Roman imprisonment, 1 Timothy was written just before his last visit to Jerusalem.

Theme. The golden text of the epistle may be said to be 3:15, "That you may know how one ought to conduct himself in the household of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and support of the truth." The approaching end of the apostolic period witnessed the increase of the number of the local churches and the consequent need of definite revelation concerning questions of order, creed, and discipline. At first these problems had been solved by the apostles themselves. But now definite instructions applicable to all occasions and periods were necessary.

Purpose. The apostle had four main goals in penning this letter to Timothy: (1) to encourage him to oppose false teaching (1:3–7, 18–20; 6:3–5, 20–21), (2) to furnish Timothy with written credentials authorized by himself (1:3–4), (3) to instruct him in the management of ecclesiastical affairs (3:14–15), (4) to exhort him to diligence in the performance of his pastoral duties (4:6–6:2).

Outline.

- I. Salutation (1:1–2)
- II. Defense of the church's faith (1:3–20)
- III. Regulations for church conduct (2:1–3:16)
- A. Concerning prayer (2:1–8)

- B. Place of women (2:9–15)
- C. Qualifications of elders and deacons (3:1–16)
- IV. Warning against apostasy and false doctrine (4:1–5)
- V. Prescriptions for ministerial conduct, private and public (4:6–6:2)
- VI. False and true teachers contrasted (6:3–19)
- VII. Closing appeal to faithfulness (6:20–21)

Attestation and Authenticity. Three classifications of objections—(1) chronological, (2) linguistic, and (3) ecclesiastical—have been commonly urged against the pastoral epistles (1 and 2 Timothy and Titus). Some assume Paul was in prison in Rome only once and that the pastorals cannot be fitted into the events of his ministry. But the third group of Paul’s epistles distinctly favors the idea that Paul was released after two years (Acts 28:30–31). The linguistic peculiarities hinge on the numerous hapax legomena in the pastorals—ninety-six in 1 Timothy; sixty in 2 Timothy; forty-three in Titus, this being about twice as many as in the other Pauline epistles. This argument, however, has never been conclusive, since Paul was writing on a distinct subject that required a different vocabulary. Ecclesiastical objection maintains that the pastorals imply too finished a stage of church organization for so early a period as the Pauline age. This, however, is hardly a tenable objection since the apostle had already ordained elders in every city on his first missionary journey; and the churches that he addressed, as at Philippi (Phil. 1:1), were well organized with “overseers and deacons.” There is no evidence in these epistles of “a second-century sacerdotalism.” All the pastorals are to be taken as genuinely Pauline since their internal evidence manifestly reflects the character and temperament of the great apostle. TIMOTHY, SECOND EPISTLE. This pastoral letter has been called the “swan song” of Paul. It is the final message of the apostle. There is a deep solemnity in the epistle bordering on a note of sadness. But above it there is a tone of triumph. “I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith” (4:6–8).

Date. The following is a probable calendar of Paul’s life during the closing years of his career: A.D. 58 he was arrested in Jerusalem; A.D. 61 he arrived in Rome; A.D. 61–63 mark his first Roman imprisonment; A.D. 64–67 he was released, during which interval he wrote 1 Timothy and Titus from Macedonia; A.D. 67, 2 Timothy was penned from Rome; A.D. 67–68 Paul was arrested and put to death.

Purpose. Second Timothy, like 2 Peter, Jude, and 2 and 3 John, concerns the personal walk and testimony of a true servant-soldier of Christ in a day of apostasy. After the salutation, 1:1–3, Paul (1) appeals for loyalty to the gospel, 1:3–18, and for soldierly endurance in Timothy’s ministry, 2:1–13. (2) He gives important direction concerning Timothy’s ministerial conduct, 2:14–26. (3) He warns against perilous times that are to come, 3:1–9. (4) He urges Timothy to follow his example, 3:10–13. (5) He alludes to Timothy’s early training as a basis for his present faithfulness, 3:14–17. (6) He urges faithful proclamation of the word of truth in view of approaching apostasy and his own martyrdom, 4:1–8. (7) He expresses longing for fellowship, 4:9–18. (8) He dispatches greetings, 4:19–22.

Outline.

- I. Salutation (1:1–3)
- II. Appeal to faithfulness and endurance (1:4–18)
- III. Appeal to activity in service (2:1–26)
 - A. As a good soldier (2:1–14)
 - B. As a good student (2:15–26)
- IV. Warning of apostasy (3:1–4:5)
 - A. Prophetic foreview of the last days (3:1–9)
 - B. Authority of the Scriptures in the last days (3:10–17)
 - C. Instructions for the last day (4:1–5)
- V. Allegiance to the Lord (4:6–22)
 - A. Paul's final testimony (4:6–8)
 - B. His last words (4:9–22) M.F.U.

TIN. See Mineral Kingdom.

TINKLE, TINKLING ORNAMENTS (Heb. akās). Mentioned as a characteristic of the manner in which the Jewish women carried themselves (Isa. 3:16). They could take only short steps because of the chains by which the costly foot rings worn above their ankles were joined together. These chains were probably ornamented with bells, as is sometimes the case now in the East, which tinkled as they walked. See also Dress.

TIPH'SAH (tif'sa; "a ford, passage"). The limit of Solomon's dominion toward the Euphrates (1 Kings 4:24) and said to have been attacked by Menahem king of Israel (2 Kings 15:16). It is generally admitted that this town is the same as the one known to Greeks and Romans as Thapsacus, a strong fortress on the western bank of the Euphrates above the confluence of the Balikh. Situated at the termination of the great trade road from Egypt, Phoenicia, and Syria to Mesopotamia and the kingdoms of inner Asia, its possession was of great importance.

TI'RAS (ti'ras). The youngest son of Japheth, the son of Noah (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5). Several efforts have been made to identify his descendants; ancient authorities generally fixed on the Thracians. But the matter is still enveloped in obscurity. Probably best equated with the Tyrsenoi, an ancient Pelasgic people of the Aegean coastland.

TI'RATHITE (ti'ra-thīt). The designation of one of the three families of scribes residing at Jabez (1 Chron. 2:55); the others were the Shimeathites and Sucathites.

TIRE, TIRES. A KJV term. See articles Dress; Turban.

TIR'HAKAH (tir'ha-ka). An Ethiopian prince mentioned in 2 Kings 19:9 as coming against Sennacherib in the Assyrian invasion of Judah (701 B.C.). His name appears as Taharka in the Egyptian records. At the time an Ethiopian dynasty was ruling Egypt in the person of Shabaka, not Tirhakah, who did not ascend the throne until c. 691 B.C., some dozen years later. The explanation is that Tirhakah, mentioned as king (2 Kings 19:9; Isa. 37:9) actually opposed Sennacherib in 701 B.C. as a high military commander under his uncle, Shabaka, who was the ruling pharaoh. Whether the nephew had the status of a regent at the time, or whether the Judean analyst wrote proleptically, is not known. Tirhakah became the third king in the Twenty-fifth Egyptian Dynasty. Against Esarhaddon he was initially victorious, but three years later (670 B.C.) he was defeated, expelled from Memphis, and never returned. He maintained himself in Upper Egypt until his death in 663 B.C., when the Twenty-sixth Dynasty took over under Psamtik I. M.F.U.

TIR'HANAH (tir'ha-na; derivation uncertain). The second son of Caleb the Hezronite by his concubine Maacah (1 Chron. 2:48).

TIR'IA (tir'i-a; “fear”). The third named of the four sons of Jehallelel of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:16).

TIR'ZAH (tur'za; “delightfulness, pleasantness”).

1. The youngest of the five daughters of Zelophehad (Num. 26:33; 27:1; 36:11; Josh. 17:3), c. 1370 B.C. This was the case that gave rise to the Levirate provision that in the event of a man's dying without male children his property should pass to his daughters.

2. An ancient Canaanite city, whose king was among the thirty-one overcome by Joshua W of the Jordan (Josh. 12:24). It was the capital of the kings of Israel down to the time of Omri (1 Kings 14:17; 15:21, 33; 16:6; etc.), who besieged Zimri there. The latter perished in the flames of his palace (16:18). Once, and once only, does Tirzah reappear, as the seat of the conspiracy of Menahem (son of Gadi) against Shallum (2 Kings 15:14, 16). Its beauty was well known (Song of Sol. 6:4).

Tell el-Far'ah, “mound of the elevated ridge,” was identified by W. F. Albright in 1931 as Tirzah. This is a spacious mound located some six miles NE of Nablus. Roland de Vaux, on behalf of the French School of Archaeology in Jerusalem, excavated at Far'ah for nine seasons between 1946 and 1960. Building remains go back to about 3000 B.C. when the town was comparatively well planned and surrounded by a wall strengthened by towers. Abandoned about 2500 B.C., it was effectively occupied once more in the eighteenth century B.C. A Canaanite-type temple of the early ninth century gives an indication of the syncretistic character of Yahweh worship in the Northern Kingdom. In the ninth century the site was temporarily abandoned, tallying with Omri's action of moving the capital to Samaria. During the eighth century B.C. the town was reoccupied and again a reused Canaanite temple served as a worship center. This city was destroyed, apparently by the Assyrians when they laid siege to Samaria in 725 B.C. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

TISHBE. See Tishbite.

TISHBITE. A term applied in the OT to Elijah (1 Kings 17:1; 21:17; 2 Kings 1:3, 8; 9:36). The term Tishbite refers to a native of a certain town by the name of Tishbeh, Tishbe, or something similar. Since a site of this name is unknown (although a Thisbe is mentioned as being on the right of Kydios [Kadesh] of Naphtali in Galilee above Asher), scholars such as Nelson Glueck render 1 Kings 17:1 as “Elijah, the Jabeshite, from Jabesh-Gilead.” Jabesh-Gilead was a few miles W of Abel-Meholah. Under this view the brook Cherith, where Elijah sojourned, would be a small branch of the Jabesh, which empties into the Jordan. M.F.U.

TITHE (Heb. ma-āšēr; Gk. dekatē, a “tenth”). The use of tithes is frequently referred to in both secular and biblical history.

In Early Times. The two prominent instances in Genesis are: (1) Abram presenting the tenth of the spoils of his victory to Melchizedek (Gen. 14:20; Heb. 7:2, 6). (2) Jacob, after his vision at Luz, devoting a tenth of all his property to God provided that he should return home in safety (Gen. 28:22).

Mosaic Law. The tenth of all produce, flocks, and cattle was declared to be sacred to Jehovah by way, so to speak, of rent to Him who was, strictly speaking, the Owner of the land, and in return for the produce of the ground; though, if so disposed, a man was at liberty to redeem the tithes of the fruits of his field and his trees by paying the value of them with a fifth part added (Lev. 27:30–33). The law did not specify the various fruits of the field and of the trees that were to be tithed. The Mishna (Maaseroth 1.1) includes everything eatable, everything that was stored up or that grew out of the earth. The Pharisees, as early as the time of Jesus, made the law to include the minutest kitchen herbs, such as mint and cummin (Matt. 23:23; Luke 11:42). With regard to animal tithes, the law prescribed that every tenth beast that passed under the staff, i.e., under which the shepherd made them pass when he counted his flock, was to be sacred to the Lord, good and bad alike. It forbade any attempt to substitute one beast for another on pain of both animals—the tenth as well as the one exchanged for it—being required to be redeemed (Lev. 27:32–33). This tenth, called Terumoth, was ordered to be assigned to the Levites as the reward of their service, and it was ordered further that they were themselves to dedicate to the Lord a tenth of these receipts, which were to be devoted to the maintenance of the high priest (Num. 18:21–28).

This legislation is modified or extended in the book of Deuteronomy, i.e., from thirty-eight to forty years later. Commands are given to the people: (1) They were to bring their tithes, together with their votive and other offerings and firstfruits, to the chosen center of worship, there to be eaten in celebration in company with their children, their servants, and the Levites (Deut. 12:5–18). (2) All the produce of the soil was to be tithed every year, and these tithes with the firstlings of the flock and herd were to be eaten in the metropolis. (3) But in case of distance, permission was given to convert the produce into money, which was to be taken to the appointed place and there spent for food for a festal celebration, in which the Levite was to be included (14:22–27). (4) Then follows the direction that at the end of three years all the tithe of that year was to be gathered and laid up within the “gates” and that a festival was to be held in which the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, together with the Levite, were to partake (vv. 28–29, see marg.). (5) Last, it was ordered that after taking the tithe in each third year, “the year of tithing,” every Israelite had to declare that he had done his best to fulfill the divine command (26:12–14).

From all this we gather (1) that one-tenth of the whole produce of the soil was to be assigned for the maintenance of the Levites; (2) that out of this the Levites were to dedicate a tenth to God for the use of the high priest; (3) that a tithe, in all probability a second tithe, was to be applied to festival purposes; and (4) that in every third year either this festival tithe or a third tenth was to be eaten in company with the poor and the Levites. The question arises, Were there three tithes taken in this third year; or is the third tithe only the second under a different description? It must be allowed that the third tithe is not without support. Josephus distinctly says that one-tenth was to be given to the priests and Levites, one-tenth was to be applied to feasts in the metropolis, and that a tenth besides these was every third year to be given to the poor (cf. Tob. 1:7–8). On the other hand, Maimonides says the third and sixth years’ second tithe was shared between the poor and the Levites, i.e., that there was no third tithe. Of these opinions, that which maintains three separate and complete tithings seems improbable. It is plain that under the kings the tithe system partook of the general neglect into which the observance of the law declined, and that Hezekiah, among his other reforms, took effectual means to revive its use (2 Chron. 31:5, 12, 19). Similar measures were taken after the captivity by Nehemiah (Neh. 12:44), and in both these cases special officers were appointed to take charge of the stores and storehouses for the purpose. Yet, notwithstanding partial evasion or omission, the system itself was continued to a late period in Jewish history (Heb. 7:5–8; Matt. 23:23; Luke 18:12).

The firstborn, the firstlings, and of the tenth of the flocks and herds and produce of the soil were offered to Jehovah as being sacred to Him. Tithes and offerings, along with the firstborn, were intended, therefore, to represent the entire produce of the land and the whole of property generally. Being paid over as they were to Jehovah, they constituted a practical confession and acknowledgment that the whole land and all possessions in general belonged to Him and that it was He alone who conferred them upon those who enjoyed them.

TITIUS JUSTUS. See Justus, no. 2.

TITTLE. See Stroke.

TITUS (tí'tus; a common Lat. name, Grecized Titos). A fellow laborer of Paul. We find no mention of Titus in the Acts and must draw materials for a biography of him from 2 Corinthians, Galatians, and Titus, combined with 2 Timothy. If, as seems probable, the journey mentioned in Gal. 2:1, 3 is the same as that recorded in Acts 15, then Titus was closely associated with Paul at Antioch and accompanied him and Barnabas from there to Jerusalem. At Troas the apostle was disappointed in not meeting Titus (2 Cor. 2:13), who had been sent on a mission to Corinth; but in Macedonia Titus joined him (7:6–7, 13–15). He was sent back to Corinth in company with two other trustworthy Christians, bearing the second epistle to the Corinthians and with the earnest request that he would attend to the collection being taken for the poor Christians of Judea (8:6, 17). The “brethren” who took the first epistle to Corinth (1 Cor. 16:11–12) were doubtless Titus and his companion, whoever he may have been. In the interval between the first and second imprisonment of Paul at Rome, he and Titus visited Crete (Titus 1:5). Here Titus remained and received a letter written to him by the apostle. From this letter we learn that Titus was originally converted through Paul’s instrumentality (v. 4). Next we learn the various particulars of the responsible duties that he had to discharge in Crete. He was to complete what Paul had been obliged to leave unfinished (v. 5) and to organize the church throughout the island by appointing presbyters in every city. Next he was to control and silence (v. 11) the restless and mischievous Judaizers, and he was to be peremptory in so doing (v. 13). He was to urge the duties of a decorous and Christian life upon the women (2:3–5), some of whom, possibly, had something of an official character (vv. 3–4). The notices that remain are more strictly personal. Titus was to look for the arrival in Crete of Artemas and Tychicus (3:12), and then he was to hasten to join Paul at Nicopolis, where the apostle was proposing to pass the winter. Zenas and Apollos were in Crete, or expected there, for Titus was to send them on their journey and supply them with whatever they needed for it (v. 13). Whether Titus did join the apostle at Nicopolis we cannot tell. But we naturally connect the mention of this place with what Paul wrote shortly afterward (2 Tim. 4:10); for Dalmatia lay not far N of Nicopolis. From the form of the whole sentence it seems probable that this disciple had been with Paul in Rome during his final imprisonment.

Tradition. The traditional connection of Titus with Crete is much more specific and constant, though here again we cannot be certain of the facts. He is said to have been permanent bishop on the island and to have died there at an advanced age. The modern capital, Candia, appears to claim the honor of being his burial place. In the fragment by the lawyer Zenas, Titus is called bishop of Gortyna. Last, the name of Titus was the watchword of the Cretans when they were invaded by the Venetians (Smith, Dict., s.v.).

TITUS. An epistle of Paul written to his trusted companion Titus, who had been left as superintendent of the churches on the island of Crete. Like the first epistle to Timothy, this letter had as its purpose to give the young pastor instructions to aid him in his work.

Occasion and Date. Paul was led to pen this epistle because of the condition of Christian work on the island of Crete, the need of Titus for help, and the fact that Zenas and Apollos were going to the island. The apostle himself had begun to organize the work in this field but had to leave before the task was finished. The entrance of false teaching in the form of legalism necessitated a strong stand for the truth. In his task Titus needed clear instruction as well as encouragement. When Zenas and Apollos planned a journey through Crete, Paul sent Titus this letter to help and encourage him (Titus 3:13). The thought and style of this epistle resemble 1 Timothy more than 2 Timothy. The date of its composition was, therefore, around A.D. 65.

Purpose. (1) After an extended greeting, 1:1–4, Paul urges Titus to complete the organization of the work in Crete, 1:5. (2) Paul reviews the requirements of elders, 1:6–9. (3) He urges a strong position against false teachers, 1:10–16. (4) He gives instruction concerning the various classes in home relations, 2:1–10. (5) He elucidates how a holy and godly life is made possible, 2:11–15. (6) He enjoins good citizenship, 3:1–2. (7) He reviews the reasons for godly living, 3:3–8. (8) He issues a warning against false teaching, 3:9–11. (9) He outlines his future plans, 3:12–14. (10) He dispatches greetings, 3:15.

TI'ZITE (tī'zīt). The designation of Joha (which see), the brother of Jediael and son of Shimri, a hero in David's army (1 Chron. 11:45).

TO'AH (tō'a; cf. Akkad. tahu, “child”). Son of Zuph and father of Eliel, ancestor of Samuel and Heman (1 Chron. 6:34), called Tohu (1 Sam. 1:1) and Nahath (1 Chron. 6:26).

TOB (tōb; “good”). The land of Tob was, according to 2 Sam. 10:6, 8, a district in the NE of Perea, on the border of Syria, or between Syria and Ammonitis, called Tōbion (1 Macc. 5:13), or more correctly Toubin (2 Macc. 12:17). There Jephthah took refuge when expelled from home by his half-brothers (Judg. 11:3), and there he remained, at the head of a band of plunderers, till he was brought back by the “elders of Gilead” (v. 5). The “men of Tob” (“Ishtob,” KJV) are mentioned in 2 Sam. 10:6, 8, and after a long interval Tob appears again, in the Maccabean history (1 Macc. 5:13), in the names Tobie and Tubieni (2 Macc. 12:17). G. A. Smith (Hist. Geog., p. 587) says: “The name of the land of Tob, which was north of Mizpeh, may survive in that of the wady and village of Taiyibeh, east of Pella.”

TOBADONI’JAH (tob-ad-o-nī’ja; “good is the Lord Jehovah”). One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat through the cities of Judah to teach the law to the people (2 Chron. 17:8), after 875 B.C.

TOBI’AH (to-bī’a; “good is Jehovah”).

1. “The sons of Tobiah” were one of the families returning with Zerubbabel who were unable to prove their kinship with Israel (Ezra 2:60; Neh. 7:62), before 536 B.C.

2. One of the leading opponents to the rebuilding of Jerusalem under Nehemiah. Tobiah was formerly a slave at the Persian court and had probably, as a favorite, been appointed governor of the Ammonites (Neh. 2:10, 19). Tobiah, though a slave and an Ammonite, found means to ally himself with a priestly family, and his son Jehohanan married the daughter of Meshullam the son of Berechiah. He himself was the son-in-law of Shecaniah the son of Arah (6:18), and these family relations created for him a strong faction among the Jews. He and Sanballat (which see), on receiving news of the expected arrival of Nehemiah, were greatly exasperated and endeavored to terrify him by asking whether he intended to rebel against the king. Nehemiah replied that they had no authority of any kind in Jerusalem and did not allow himself to be intimidated (2:19–20). When he heard that the building of the walls had actually commenced, Tobiah, in unmingled scorn, declared, “Even what they are building—if a fox should jump on it, he would break their stone wall down!” (4:3). Then followed the league against the Jews entered into by Sanballat and Tobiah with the surrounding nations (vv. 7–8). After that an unsuccessful attempt was made to inveigle Nehemiah into a conference in the valley of Ono (6:1–3). Still later we find Tobiah carrying on a secret correspondence with the Jewish nobles hostile to Nehemiah (vv. 17–19). During Nehemiah’s absence from Jerusalem, Eliashib the high priest installed Tobiah in “a large room,” i.e., one of the very large buildings in the forecourts of the Temple, from which he was ejected by Nehemiah upon his return (13:4–9).

TOBI’JAH (to-bī’ja; Heb. same as Tobiah [which see]).

1. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the law in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8), after 875 B.C.

2. One of the Israelites living during the captivity in the time of Zechariah, in whose presence the prophet was commanded to take crowns of silver and gold and put them on the head of Joshua the high priest (Zech. 6:10, 14), 519 B.C.

TO’CHEN, or Token (tō’ken; “a weight, measure”). One of the towns of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:32); probably the same as Telem (Josh. 15:24) or Telaim (1 Sam. 15:4).

TOGAR’MAH (to-gar’ma). A son of Gomer, and brother of Ashkenaz and Riphath (Gen. 10:3; 1 Chron. 1:6). The descendants of Togarmah (Beth Togarmah, NIV) are mentioned among the merchants who trafficked with Tyre in “horses and war horses and mules” (Ezek. 27:14). They are also named with Persia, Ethiopia, and Put as followers of Gog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal (38:5, 6). The name may be preserved in the E. Cappadocian city of Til-garimmu, listed in the Assyrian records.

TO'HU (tō'hu; cf. Akkad. tahu, “child”; 1 Sam. 1:1), the same as Toah (1 Chron. 6:34), or Nahath (v. 26).

TO'I (tō'i), or Tou. The king of Hamath on the Orontes, in the time of David. When the latter defeated the Syrian king Hadadezer, Toi's powerful enemy, Toi sent his son Joram (Hadoram) to congratulate him upon his victory and to offer presents of silver, gold, and bronze (2 Sam. 8:9–10), about 984 B.C. The name is apparently Hittite.

TOKEN (Heb. ōt, a sign). KJV term replaced in the NASB with sign (which see). See, as a place name, Tochen.

TOK'HATH (tok'hath). The father of Shallum (2 Chron. 34:22. See Tikvah, no. 1.

TO'LA (tō'la; “a worm”).

1. The eldest son of Issachar (Gen. 46:13; 1 Chron. 7:1). His six sons (7:2) became progenitors of the Tolaites (Num. 26:23), which numbered in David's time 22,600 fighting men (1 Chron. 7:2).

2. A judge of Israel. He was the son of Puah, of the tribe of Issachar. He succeeded Abimelech in the judgeship and ruled Israel twenty-three years in Shamir, Mt. Ephraim, where he died and was buried (Judg. 10:1–2). The date is uncertain, as Tola doubtless ruled contemporaneously with some other judge.

TO'LAD (tō'lad; “posterity”). A town in Simeon in David's time (1 Chron. 4:29); given in the fuller form Eltolad (Josh. 15:30). Possibly Khirbet Erka Sakra, thirteen miles SE of Beersheba.

TO'LAITES (tō'la-īts). The general name of the descendants of Tola (which see), the son of Issachar (Num. 26:23).

TOLL. See Tax; Tribute; Publican.

TOMB (Heb. gādîsh, “heaped” up, a “tumulus”; Gk. mnēmeion, a “remembrance”). A natural cave enlarged and adapted by excavation, or an artificial imitation of one, was the standard type of sepulcher. This was what the structure of the Jewish soil supplied or suggested.

“The caves, or rock-hewn sepulchers, consisted of an antechamber in which the bier was deposited, and an inner or rather lower cave in which the bodies were deposited, in a recumbent position, in niches. According to the Talmud these abodes of the dead were usually six feet long, nine feet wide, and ten feet high. Here there were niches for eight bodies—three on each side of the entrance and two opposite. Larger sepulchers held thirteen bodies. The entrance to the sepulcher was guarded by a large stone or by a door (Matt. 27:65; Mark 15:46; John 11:38–39). This structure of the tombs will explain some of the particulars connected with the burial of our Lord, how the women coming early to the grave had been astonished in finding the ‘very great stone’ ‘rolled away from the door of the sepulcher,’ and then, when they entered the outer cave, were affrighted to see what seemed ‘a young man sitting on the right side, clothed in a long white garment’ (Mark 16:4, 5)” (Edersheim, Sketches of Jewish Social Life, p. 171).

Of the twenty-two kings of Judah who reigned at Jerusalem from c. 1000 to 590 B.C., eleven, or exactly one-half, were buried in one burial chamber in the “city of David.” Of all these it is merely said that they were buried in the tombs of their fathers or “of the kings” in the city of David, except of two—Asa and Hezekiah. Two more of these kings (Jehoram and Joash) were buried also in the city of David, “but not in the tombs of the kings.” The passages in Neh. 3:16 and in Ezek. 43:7, 9, together with the reiterated assertion of Kings and Chronicles, that these tombs were situated in the city of David, leave no doubt but that they were on Zion, or the Eastern Hill, and in immediate proximity to the Temple. They were in fact certainly within that enclosure now known as the “Haram Area”; but those royal tombs have evidently not survived to modern times. See Dead; Grave.

TONGS (Heb. melqāh, 1 Kings 7:49; 2 Chron. 4:21; Isa. 6:6). Pincers either for holding coals or for trimming a lamp, from Heb. lāqah, “to take,” or malqāh (Ex. 25:38; Num. 4:9, KJV), rendered “snuffers” in NASB and in Ex. 37:32, KJV. The NIV and NKJV translate “wick trimmers.”

TONGUE (Heb. lāshôn; Gk. glōssa) is variously used in Scripture.

1. Literally for the human tongue (Judg. 7:5; Job 27:4; Ps. 35:28; Prov. 15:2; Zech. 14:12; Mark 7:33, 35; etc.); the tongue of the dog (Ps. 68:23); of the viper (Job 20:16; “fangs,” NIV).

2. A particular language or dialect spoken by any particular people, e.g., they “began to speak with other tongues” (Acts 2:4, 11; 1 Cor. 12:10).

3. For the people speaking a language (Isa. 66:18; Dan. 3:4, 7, marg.; Rev. 5:9; 7:9; 10:11; etc.).

4. Personified. “Every tongue will swear allegiance” (Isa. 45:23; 54:17; Rom. 14:11; Phil. 2:11). Such expressions as the following are used: the tongue is said to devise (Ps. 52:2), to hate (Prov. 26:28), to rejoice (Acts 2:26), to be bridled (James 1:26), to be tamed (3:8).

5. Figuratively for speech generally. “Let us not love with word or with tongue” (1 John 3:18); “a soft tongue,” i.e., soothing language (Prov. 25:15). “Insolence of their tongue” (Hos. 7:16)—i.e., verbal abuse—“strife of tongues” (Ps. 31:20), and “scourge of the tongue” (Job 5:21) mean contention and execration. “They bend their tongue like their bow” (Jer. 9:3) is to tell determined and malicious falsehoods. To “sharpen their tongues” (Ps. 140:3) is to prepare cutting speeches (cf. 57:4); whereas to “strike” with the tongue (Jer. 18:18) is to traduce. To mock is figuratively expressed by to “stick out your tongue” (Isa. 57:4). To hide “under his tongue” (Job 20:12) is to enjoy wickedness; while “honey and milk are under your tongue” is figurative for delicious language (Song of Sol. 4:11). To divide the tongues of the wicked is to bring about dissension among them (Ps. 55:9). The sticking of the tongue to the palate may mean profound attention (Job 29:10), excessive thirst (Lam. 4:4; Ps. 22:15), or dumbness (Ezek. 3:26; Ps. 137:6). To gnaw one’s tongue is a sign of fury, despair, or torment (Rev. 16:10).

6. Vicious uses of the tongue are expressed by the following phrases: flattery (Ps. 5:9; Prov. 28:23), backbiting (Ps. 15:3; Prov. 25:23), deceit (Ps. 50:19), unrestrained speech (73:9), lying (109:2); etc. Virtuous uses are specified: keeping the tongue (34:13; 1 Pet. 3:10; Prov. 21:23), bridling the tongue (James 1:26); etc.

TONGUES, CONFUSION OF. See Languages, Confusion of.

TONGUES, GIFT OF. The promise and the fulfillment of the gift of tongues are referred to in NT passages.

Promise of. The promise of a new power coming from the divine Spirit, giving not only comfort and insight into truth but fresh powers of utterance of some kind, appears often in our Lord’s teaching. The disciples were to take no thought of what they should speak, for the Spirit of their Father would speak in them (Matt. 10:19–20; Mark 13:11). The lips of Galilean peasants were to speak freely and boldly before kings. In Mark 16:17 we have a more definite term employed: “They will speak with new tongues.” It can hardly be questioned that the obvious meaning of the promise is that the disciples should speak in new languages that they had not learned as other men learn them.

Fulfillment. After our Lord’s ascension, while the disciples were gathered together in one place, “suddenly there came from heaven a noise like a violent, rushing wind, and it filled the whole house where they were sitting. And there appeared to them tongues as of fire distributing themselves, and they rested on each one of them” (Acts 2:2–3). After this external phenomenon there ensued the internal filling with the Holy Spirit of all who were assembled. The immediate result was that they began to speak “with other tongues.” For the sure determination of what Luke meant by this, it is decisive that heterais glossais “other tongues,” on the part of the speakers was, in point of fact, the same thing that the congregated Parthians, Medes, Elamites, etc., designated as “our own tongue” or “language” cf. v. 8. The “other tongues,” therefore, are, according to the text, to be considered as absolutely nothing else than languages, which were different from the native language of the speakers. “They, the Galileans, spoke, one Parthian, another Median, etc., consequently languages of another sort, i.e., foreign (1 Cor. 14:21); and these indeed—the point wherein precisely appeared the miraculous operation of the Spirit—not acquired by study (Mark 16:17)” (Meyer, Com., ad loc.). When the event is admitted to be distinctly miraculous, and the power a special gift of God, it need not be considered either impossible or inconceivable; and incapacity of conceiving the modus operandi should not lead to a refusal of the credibility and certainty of the fact.

In the list of spiritual endowments mentioned in 1 Cor. 12:8–10 are “various kinds of tongues,” and “the interpretation of tongues” (cf. vv. 28–30; 14:4–5, 13–14). Speaking with tongues is understood by many to be a miraculous gift by which a person is able to speak a foreign tongue without learning it. On the other hand there are those who, with Meyer, understand by glossais lalein an outburst of prayer in petition, praise, and thanksgiving, that was “so ecstatic that in connection with it the speaker’s own conscious intellectual activity was suspended, while the tongue did not serve as the instrument of the utterance of self-active reflection, but, independently of it, was involuntarily set in motion by the Holy Spirit, by whom the man in his deepest nature was seized and borne away” (Com., ad loc.). The spiritual gifts are classified and compared, arranged, apparently, according to their worth, placed under regulation. The facts that may be gathered are briefly these: (1) The phenomena of the gift of tongues were not confined to one church or section of a church. (2) The comparison of gifts, in both the lists given by Paul (1 Cor. 12:8–10, 28–30), places that of tongues and the interpretation of tongues lowest in the scale. (3) The main characteristic of the “tongue” is that it is unintelligible. The man “speaks mysteries” (v. 2), prays, blesses, gives thanks, in the tongue (14:15–16), but no one understands him. He can hardly be said, indeed, to understand himself. (4) The peculiar nature of the gift leads the apostle into what appears at first a contradiction. “Tongues are for a sign” (v. 22), not to believers, but to those who do not believe; yet the effect on unbelievers is not that of attracting but repelling. They involve of necessity a disturbance of the equilibrium between the understanding and the feelings. Therefore, for those who believe already, prophecy is the greater gift.

TONGUES OF FIRE. In the account of the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the disciples at Pentecost it is said (Acts 2:3): “And there appeared to them tongues as of fire [Gk. glōssai hōsei puros] distributing themselves, and they rested on each one of them.” The words mean that there were seen by them tongues that looked like little flames of fire, luminous but not burning; not really consisting of fire, but only “as of fire.” As only similar to fire, they bore an analogy to electric phenomena; their tongue-shape referred as a sign to that miraculous speaking that ensued immediately after and the firelike form of the divine Presence (cf. Ex. 3:2), which was here operative in a manner so entirely peculiar. The whole phenomenon is to be understood as a miraculous operation of God manifesting Himself in the Spirit, by which, as by the preceding sound from heaven, the effusion of the Spirit was made known as divine, and His efficacy on the minds of those who were to receive Him was enhanced (Meyer, Com., ad loc.).

TOOLS. See Handicrafts.

TOOTH (Heb. shēn; lhî, in Ps. 58:6; Prov. 30:14; Joel 1:6; Gk. odous).

Literal Use. In this sense the term is used with reference to the loss of the member by violence, in illustration of the law of retaliation (Ex. 21:24; Lev. 24:20; Deut. 19:21). Such loss admitted of a pecuniary compensation, under private arrangement unless the injured party became exorbitant in his demand, when the case was referred to a judge. Our Lord’s comment upon the law (Matt. 5:38) prohibits private revenge. Lhî is used for the human jawbone (Ps. 3:7), for that of a donkey (Judg. 15:15–17), and for that of a leviathan (Job 41:14). Although shinnayîm is the general word for teeth, the Hebrews had a distinct term for molars or jaw teeth, especially of the larger animals; thus m□tall□.ôṭ (29:17; Ps. 57:4; Prov. 30:14; Joel 1:6) and, by transposition, Heb. mall□t□.ôṭ (Ps. 58:6).

Figurative. “His teeth white from milk” (Gen. 49:12) seems to denote an abundance of milk, as “his eyes are dull from wine” denotes plenty thereof. “The teeth of beasts I will send upon them” (Deut. 32:24) expresses devastation by wild animals. “The teeth of ... lions” (Job 4:10) is a symbol of the cruelty and rapacity of the wicked. To “take my flesh in my teeth” (13:14) is thought by some to mean to gnaw it with anguish (cf. Rev. 16:10), while others interpret it “to be intent upon the maintenance of life, as a wild beast upon the preservation of his prey, by holding it between its teeth and carrying it away” (Delitzsch, Com., ad loc.). Gnashing of teeth means grinding the teeth with rage or despair (Job 16:9; Pss. 35:16; 37:12; 112:10; Lam. 2:16; Matt. 8:12; etc.). By “the skin of my teeth” (Job 19:20) is generally understood the gums; Delitzsch, however, thinks it to be the periosteum, a skin in the jaw. Job’s disease was such that the gums especially were destroyed and wasted away about the teeth; only the periosteum around the teeth was still left to him, and single remnants of the covering of his loose and projecting teeth. To “smite on the cheek” and to shatter “the teeth” mean to disgrace and disable (Ps. 3:7; cf. Mic. 6:13; 1 Kings 20:35; Lam. 3:30). The teeth of calumniators, etc., are compared to “spears and arrows” (Ps. 57:4); and to shatter the teeth of such persons is to disable them (58:6). To escape from being “torn by their teeth” of one’s enemies is to avoid their malice (124:6; Zech. 9:7). Oppression is compared to “jaw teeth like knives” (Prov. 30:14). Beautiful teeth are compared to “a flock of newly shorn ewes ... and not one among them has lost her young” (Song of Sol. 4:2; 6:6). To break the “teeth with gravel” is a forcible figure (Lam. 3:16; cf. Prov. 20:17), referring to the grit that often mixes with bread baked in ashes, as is the custom in the East, and figurative of harsh disappointment. “Teeth of iron” (Dan. 7:19) is the symbol of destructive power. Hypocritical and greedy prophets are represented as those who “bite with their teeth, they cry, ‘Peace’” (Mic. 3:5). “I will ... remove their detestable things from between their teeth” (Zech. 9:7) refers to idolaters keeping a feast, which is interrupted by Jehovah and idolatry abolished. “Cleanness of teeth” (Amos 4:6) is the figure of hunger, famine. The action of acid setting teeth “on edge” is referred to in Jer. 31:30; Ezek. 18:2.

TOPAZ. See Mineral Kingdom.

TO’PHEL (tō’fel). Apparently a boundary of the great Sinaitic desert of Paran (Deut. 1:1). It is supposed by Hengstenberg and Robinson, and many of the more modern writers, to be the large village of Täflēh, the chief place in Jebel, W of the Edomite mountains. The suggestion of Schultz that Tophel may have been the place where the Israelites purchased food and drink of the Edomites (2:28–29) has much to be said in its favor; for the situation of Tophel warrants the supposition that it was here that they passed for the first time from the wilderness to an inhabited land. Its identification remains uncertain.

TO’PHETH (tō’feth; KJV, Tophet). Topheth is commonly supposed to be derived from tōp, or drum, from the drums used to drown the cries of children who were made to pass through the fire to Molech. Gesenius connects the root idea with tūt, “to spit,” and rendered the place-name to be “spit” upon, to “be abhorred” (Job 17:6). Others regard Topheth as from topteh (“contempt”), “the place of burning” dead bodies.

Topheth lay somewhere E or SE of Jerusalem, for Jeremiah went out by the potsherd gate, or E gate, to go to it (Jer. 19:2). It was in “the valley of the son of Hinnom” (7:31), which is “by the entrance of the potsherd gate” (19:2). Thus it was not identical with Hinnom. It was in Hinnom and was, perhaps, one of its chief groves or gardens, watered by Siloam, perhaps a little to the S of the present Birket el-Hamra. The name Topheth occurs only in the OT (2 Kings 23:10; Isa. 30:33; Jer. 7:31–32; 19:6, 11–14). The NT does not refer to it, nor the Apocrypha.

In Topheth the deity (Baal, Jer. 19:5; Molech, 32:35) was worshiped by sacrifices in pagan fashion, first by the ancient Canaanites and afterward by apostate Israelites (cf. Ps. 106:38; Jer. 7:31). This was done first by Ahaz (2 Kings 16:3), then especially by Manasseh (21:6). Thus it became the place of abomination, the very gate or pit of hell. The pious kings defiled it (23:10) and threw down its altars and high places, pouring into it all the filth of the city, till it became the abhorrence of Jerusalem. Every vestige of Topheth, name and grove, is gone, and we can only guess at the spot.

TORAH (Heb. instruction, “law”). The name of the first of the three divisions of the Hebrew canon—Torah (Law), Nebiim (Prophets), and Kethubim (Writings). The Torah, or Law, comprises the five books of Moses, which were the mainstay of Judaism. The Torah, however, came to have a wider meaning among Jews and embraced the whole body of religious literature of Judaism inherited from their prophets, priests, and wise men. In addition to the written Torah the Pharisees and rabbis recognized an oral Torah, composed of specific applications of the general principles of the written Torah. In the time of our Lord the oral traditions had become so minute and devoid of spiritual meaning as to set aside the Law of God and in some cases completely nullify it (cf. Matt. 15:2; Mark 7:9, 18; Col. 2:8). In the period of the rise of the synagogue (c. 400–168 B.C.), the Law was divided into sections for systematic public reading. The Pentateuch came to be divided into 290 “open” and 379 “closed” parashiyoth. The “open” marked by a pe (p) are paragraphs beginning a new line.

The “closed” are shorter and are marked by a samekh (s) and preceded by a blank space in the line. The Mishnah (c. A.D. 200) mentions these divisions, which existed earlier. The Talmud (c. A.D. 500) distinguishes between the open and closed parashiyoth. By the time of Christ, the Prophets had been added to the Torah lessons for weekly public reading (Luke 4:16–21). M.F.U.

TORCH. The Heb. lappîd (Zech. 12:6) and the Gk. lampas (John 18:3) usually signify a lamp or light.

Figurative. A flaming torch is used by the prophet (Zech. 12:6) as a symbol of great anger and destruction. In Nah. 2:3, KJV, “flaming torches” is an incorrect rendering of Heb. pîladah (“steel”), which NASB translates “flashing steel.”

TOR'MAH (tor'ma; “fraud, deceit”) occurs only in the margin of Judg. 9:31. A few commentators have conjectured that the word was originally the same as Arumah (v. 41). The LXX and Aram. take the word as an appellative—en kruphē, “secretly”; so also do Rashi and most of the earlier commentators (NIV, “secretly”), while R. Kimchi the elder has decided in favor of the second rendering as a proper name. As the word only occurs here it is impossible to determine in favor of either view.

TORTOISE. See Animal Kingdom: Great Lizard.

TORTURER (Gk. basanistēs, Matt. 18:34; KJV, “tormentor”). One who elicits the truth by means of the rack; an inquisitor; used in this passage of a jailor, probably because the business of torturing was assigned to him. Torture was usually employed to extort confession or evidence, as when Claudius Lysias, the chief captain, commanded Paul to be brought into the castle and “examined by scourging” (Acts 22:24).

TOU (too; 1 Chron. 18:9–10). See Toi.

TOW (tō). Better, flax (which see, Vegetable Kingdom). The coarse and broken part of flax hemp or jute, separated by the hatchel or swingle and ready for spinning. Heb. nîōret, Judg. 16:9. It is extremely inflammable.

TOWEL (Gk. lention). A linen cloth or apron, which servants put on when about to work (John 13:4–5). Girding one's self with a towel was the common mark of a slave, by whom the service of foot washing was ordinarily performed.

TOWER.

1. A siege tower (Isa. 23:13; Heb. bāhûn, “strong”).
2. Migdāl is from a root meaning “to become great.” See Migdol.
3. Pinnôt, the corners and battlements of the walls of the fortifications (Zeph. 1:16; 3:6; 2 Chron. 26:15).
4. Mispeh. See Mizpeh.
5. Gk. Purgos, a “tower,” a fortified structure rising to a considerable height to repel a hostile attack or to enable a watchman to see in every direction. The “tower in Siloam” seems to designate a tower in the walls of Jerusalem, near the fountain of Siloam (Luke 13:4). Watchtowers or fortified posts in frontier or exposed situations are mentioned in Scripture, such as the tower of Eder, etc. (Gen. 35:21; Mic. 4:8; Isa. 21:8; etc.), the tower of Lebanon (Song of Sol. 7:4). Remains of such fortifications may still be seen, which probably have followed more ancient structures built in the same places for like purposes. Besides these military structures, we read in Scripture of towers built in vineyards as an almost necessary appendage to them (Isa. 5:2; Matt. 21:33; Mark 12:1). Such towers are still in use in Palestine in vineyards, especially near Hebron, and are used as lodges for the keepers of the vineyards.

TOWN. Not always carefully distinguished from city and is sometimes the rendering of Heb. ḥîr, a place guarded by watchmen; generally rendered “city”; qîr or qîrâ, “wall.” In the Gk.

we have kômē, “hamlet.” Neither in the OT nor in the NT is the distinction between cities and towns carefully observed. “Palestine had at all times a far larger number of towns and villages than might have been expected from its size, or from the general agricultural pursuits of its inhabitants. Even at the time of its first occupation under Joshua we find ... about six hundred towns ... with probably an average population of from two to three thousand. But the number of towns and villages, as well as their populousness, greatly increased in later times.... Alike the New Testament, Josephus, and the rabbis give us three names, which may be rendered villages, township, or towns—the latter being surrounded by walls, and again distinguished into those fortified already at the time of Joshua, and those of later date. A township might be either ‘great,’ if it had its synagogue, or small if it wanted such; this being dependent on the residence of at least ten men [see Synagogue]. The villages had no synagogue; but their inhabitants were supposed to go to the nearest township for market on the Monday and Thursday of every week, when service was held for them, and the local Sanhedrin also sat (Megill., i, 1–3).... Approaching one of the ancient fortified towns, one would come to a low wall that protected a ditch. Crossing this moat, one would be at the city wall proper, and enter through a massive gate, often covered with iron, and secured by strong bars and bolts. Above the gate rose the watchtower. ‘Within the gate’ was the shady or sheltered retreat where ‘the elders’ sat.... The gates opened upon large squares, on which the various streets converged.... These streets are all named, mostly after the trades or guilds which have there their bazaars. In these bazaars many of the workmen sat outside their shops, and in the interval of labor exchanged greetings or banter with the passers-by.... The rule of these towns and villages was exceedingly strict. The representatives of Rome were chiefly either military men or else fiscal or political agents. Then every town had its Sanhedrin, consisting of twenty-three members if the place numbered at least one hundred and twenty men, or of three members if the population were smaller.... Of course all ecclesiastical and, so to speak, strictly Jewish causes, and all religious questions, were within their special cognizance. Lastly, there were also in every place what may be called municipal authorities, under the presidency of a mayor—the representative of the elders—an institution so frequently mentioned in Scripture, and deeply rooted in Jewish society. Perhaps these may be referred to (Luke 7:3) as sent by the centurion of Capernaum to intercede for him with the Lord.

“What may be called the police and sanitary regulations were of the strictest character. Of Caesarea, e.g., we know that there was a regular system of drainage into the sea.... (Josephus, Ant., xv, 9, 6). But in every town and village sanitary rules were strictly attended to.

Cemeteries, tanneries, and whatever also might be prejudicial to health had to be removed at least fifty cubits outside a town. Bakers’ and dyers’ shops, or stables, were not allowed under the dwelling of another person. Again, in building, the line of each street had to be strictly kept, nor was even a projection beyond it allowed. In general the streets were wider than those of modern Eastern cities. The nature of the soil, and the circumstance that so many towns were built on hills (at least in Judea), would, of course, be advantageous in a sanitary point of view. It would also render the paving of the streets less requisite. But we know that certain towns were paved—Jerusalem with white stones (Josephus, Ant., xx, 9, 7). To obviate occasions of dispute, neighbors were not allowed to have windows looking into the courts or rooms of others, nor might the principal entrance to a shop be through a court common to two or three dwellings” (Edersheim, Sketches of Jewish Social Life, pp. 87–93).

TOWN CLERK (Gk. grammateus). The city secretary, recorder, to whose office belonged the superintendence of the archives, the drawing up of official decrees, and the reading of them in public assemblies of the people. This official appeased the mob in Ephesus when Demetrius and his fellow craftsmen raised a tumult (Acts 19:35). The speech delivered by him may be analyzed thus: He argued that such excitement as the Ephesians evinced was undignified, inasmuch as they stood above all suspicion in religious matters (vv. 35–36); that it was unjustifiable, since they could establish nothing against the men whom they accused (v. 37); that it was unnecessary, since other means of redress were open to them (vv. 38–39); and, finally, if neither pride nor a sense of justice availed anything, fear of the Roman power should restrain them from such illegal proceedings (v. 40).

TRACHONI'TIS or Traconitis (trak-o-nī'tis; Gk. "rough or hilly region," only in Luke 3:1). "Trachonitis was the territory which contained the Trachon or Trachons. These are described by Strabo (xvi, 2, 20) as 'the two so-called Trachones' lying 'behind Damascus.' The name ... corresponds exactly to the two great stretches of lava, 'the tempests in stone,' which lie to the southeast of Damascus—the Lejá and the Safá. Each of these is called by the Arabs a wacar, a word meaning rough, stony tract, and thus equivalent to Trachon. The latter, beyond the reach of civilization, was little regarded, and the Lejá became known as the Trachon par excellence, as is proved by the two inscriptions at either end of it—in Musmireh, the ancient Phaenä, and the Bereke, each of which is called a chief town of the Trachon.... Now the Trachonitis was obviously the Trachon plus some territory round it. In the north it extended westward from the borders of the Lejá to the districts of Ulatha and Paneas in the northern Jaulan; and in the south it bordered with Batanea, but also touched Mons Alsadamus, the present Jebel Hauran. Philo uses the name Trachonitis for the whole territory of Philip" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 543).

The portion of Philip's tetrarchy most difficult to define is the Ituraean, and it is uncertain whether it covered or overlapped Trachonitis. Luke's reference is ambiguous, and we have no modern echo of the name to guide us.

TRADE. In the sense of traffic, commerce (nātan, to "give," i.e., to pay), something as an equivalent for the sale (Ezek. 27:12–14); (sāḥar, to "go about, travel"), to traverse the country as a merchant, to trade, traffic (Gen. 34:10); Gk. ergazomai, to "work," to make gains by trading, or "do business" (cf. Matt. 25:16).

Trade is the rendering of Heb. kāna'an (lit., Canaan). The expression "a city of traders" (Ezek. 17:4; thus NIV) should read "a city or land of Canaan" (cf. 16:29); the sentence will then read, "He plucked off the topmost of its young twigs, and carried it into a land of Canaan," an epithet applied to Babylonia as being a land whose trading spirit had turned it into a Canaan. In Gen. 42:34 "trade" is the rendering of sāḥar, and in 1 Kings 10:15, "trader," the Heb. is mishār, from the same root, signifying to travel about for the purpose of trade. Similar in meaning is the Heb. word in Ezek. 28:5, 18. "Traders" (Isa. 23:8) is from the Heb. signifying Canaanite.

TRADITION (Gk. paradosis, a "giving over"). A giving over either by word of mouth or in writing; objectively, what is delivered, as Paul's teaching (2 Thess. 2:15; 3:6; 1 Cor. 11:2). It is also used of the body of precepts, especially ritual, which, in the opinion of the later Jews, were orally delivered by Moses and orally transmitted in unbroken succession to subsequent generations. These precepts, both illustrating and expanding the written law, as they did, were to be obeyed with equal reverence (Matt. 15:2–3, 6; Mark 7:3, 5, 9, 13; Col. 2:8). "My ancestral traditions” (Gal. 1:14) are precepts received from the fathers, whether handed down in the OT books or orally. Meyer, in his Com. on Matt. 15:2, says: “The Jews, founding upon Deut. 4:14; 17:10, for the most part attached greater importance to this tradition than to the written law. They laid special stress upon the traditional precept, founded on Lev. 15:11, which required that the hands should be washed before every meal. Jesus and his disciples ignored this tradition as such, which had been handed down from the men of olden time.”

TRAIN.

1. “Train up a child,” etc. (Prov. 22:6), has the sense in Heb. ḥānak of “to imbue one with anything,” to initiate; and so to train up a child according to his way, according to his disposition and habits.

2. Isaiah 6:1 says that the Lord’s train (Heb. shûl) filled the Temple. “The heavenly temple is that superterrestrial place, which Jehovah transforms into heaven and a temple, by manifesting himself there to angels and saints. But while he manifests his glory there he is obliged also to veil it, because created beings are unable to bear it. But that which veils his glory is no less splendid than that portion of it which is revealed. And this was the truth embodied for Isaiah in the long robe and train. He saw the Lord, and what more he saw was the all-filling robe of the indescribable One” (Delitzsch, Com., ad loc.).

3. First Kings 10:2, KJV, uses train in reference to the queen of Sheba’s wealth. See Retinue.

TRANCE. In the NT the word occurs three times (Acts 10:10; 11:5; 22:17; Gk. ἔκστασις).

“The word may be defined as the “throwing of the mind out of its normal state, of the man who by some sudden emotion is transported out of himself, so that in this rapt condition, although he is awake, his mind is so drawn off from all surrounding objects and wholly fixed on things divine that he sees nothing but the forms and images lying within, and perceives with his bodily eyes and ears realities shown him by God.”

TRANSFER. In both its Heb. and Gk. originals, transfer has the sense of the removal of a person or thing from one state or condition to another. In 2 Sam. 3:10 it refers to transferring a kingdom from Saul to David. In like manner, the Christian is transferred from the domain of darkness into the kingdom of God’s beloved Son by regeneration (Col. 1:13).

TRANSFIGURATION (Gk. metamorphoō, to “change into another form”). It is recorded (Matt. 17:2; Mark 9:2) that our Lord “was transfigured” before His disciples Peter, James, and John; and this is explained (Luke 9:29): “And while He was praying, the appearance of His face became different, and His clothing became white and gleaming.” Each of the evangelists represents it as taking place about eight days after the first distinct intimation our Lord made to them of His approaching sufferings, death, and resurrection. The location is merely given as a high mountain, which is traditionally thought to have been Mt. Tabor; but as Jesus was at this time sojourning in the neighborhood of Caesarea Philippi, it seems likely that it was one of the ridges of Hermon. While our Lord was praying He was “transfigured,” i.e., His external aspect was changed, His face gleaming like the sun, and His clothing being so white that it shone like light. The cause of this appearance was that His divine glory shone out through His human form and was not, as in the case of Moses, caused by God’s having appeared to Him.

The disciples seem to have been asleep when this divine radiance began to shine forth; but when they woke up they were filled with wonder and fear, beholding also two men, Moses and Elijah, in glory, conversing with Him. Peter recovered himself and, in the rapture of the moment, suggested that three tents or “tabernacles” should be pitched to secure the continued presence and fellowship of such glorious company. He had scarcely given expression to his thought when a bright cloud overshadowed them, out of which came a voice saying, “This is My Son, My Chosen One; listen to Him!” (Luke 9:35). The theme of conversation is not given by Matthew or Mark, but Luke records that they spoke concerning His death.

Premillennialists see in the transfiguration scene all the essential features of the future millennial kingdom in manifestation: (1) The Lord appears, not in humiliation, but in glory (Matt. 17:2). (2) Moses is present in a glorified state, representative of the redeemed who have passed via death into the kingdom (Matt. 13:43; Luke 9:30–31). (3) Elijah is also seen glorified, representative of the redeemed who have come into the kingdom by translation (1 Thess. 4:13–18; 1 Cor. 15:50–53). (4) The unglorified disciples, Peter, James, and John, represent in the vision and for the time being Israel in the flesh in the future kingdom (Acts 1:6; Ezek. 37:21–27). (5) The crowd at the foot of the mountain (Matt. 17:14) represents the nations who are to enter the kingdom after it is established over Israel (Isa. 11:10–12). The scene as a whole represents the second coming of Christ in glory to establish His kingdom, or in the words interpreting the scene: “the Son of Man coming in His kingdom” (Matt. 16:28). Agreeable with this interpretation of the transfiguration episode is Peter’s comment in 2 Pet. 1:16–18. As the preaching of the kingdom was fast approaching its end in the rejection and imminent death of the King, it became necessary to encourage the disciples in the expectation of the messianic kingdom promised to Israel in the OT. The transfiguration bore out this assurance. M.F.U.

TRANSFORMED (Gk. metamorphōō). Used of the change of the moral character for the better (Rom. 12:2), through the renewal of the thinking power. “The apostle considers it as a peculiar operation of the Christian faith, that believers are seriously concerned to prove in everything what is the will of God (Eph. 5:10); whereas man, in his natural state, looks more to the point of how he may please men” (Tholuck, Com.). The apostle (2 Cor. 3:18) speaks of the Christian’s being “transformed into the same image from glory to glory,” etc. In this passage the gospel is spoken of as a mirror, in which the glory of Christ gives itself to be seen; the Christian, studying the gospel, becomes so transformed that the same image which he sees in the “mirror”—the image of the glory of Christ—presents itself on him, i.e., he is so transformed that he becomes like the glorified Christ. See Disguise.

TRANSGRESSION (Heb. mostly peshaʿ, “revolt”; Gk. parabasis, “violation”). Sometimes used synonymously with sin, but sometimes used in a distinctive sense as indicating a violation of the law through ignorance, e.g., Ex. 34:7; Rom. 4:25. All sin is transgression, but all transgression is not sin in the sense of incurring guilt. See Sin.

TRANSLATE. This term, used in the KJV of 2 Sam. 3:10; Col. 1:13; and Heb. 11:5, has the sense of removal of a person or thing from one state or condition to another, and in the NASB is rendered “transfer,” “take up,” or “go up.” This word is applied to Elijah’s ascension (2 Kings 2:11) and the change of saints at the coming of the Lord (John 14:3; 1 Cor. 15:50–53; 1 Thess. 4:13–18; 1 John 3:1–3). The NIV limits it to the sense of rendering one language into another (Ezra 4:18; John 1:42; Acts 9:36). See Taken Up; Transfer.

TRANSLATIONS, ENGLISH BIBLE.

Early Versions. There were portions of the Bible, and possibly the entire work, rendered into the English vernacular very early in the history of the language. Gildas states that “when the English martyrs gave up their lives in the 4th century all the copies of the Holy Scriptures which could be found were burned in the streets.” Cranmer, Thomas More, and Foxe, with many others, bore testimony to the existence of “divers copies of the Holy Bible in the English tongue.” The following are fragments of translations that are clearly traced: Caedmon’s versifications of an English translation (689); St. Cuthbert’s Evangelistarium, which is a Latin translation with an interlinear English (689); St. Aldhelm’s translation; Eadfurth’s translation (720); King Alfred’s (901); Aelfric’s (995). These, however, were all made from the Lat. and not from the original Heb. After the Norman Conquest the language underwent a great change; the old English Bibles fell into disuse, until they were practically unknown; only a few fragments remained.

Wycliffe’s Version. In the fourteenth century there was a growing demand for an English version. This need was met by two translations, made respectively by John Wycliffe and John Purvey. Each carried on his work without the knowledge of the other. Wycliffe’s was completed in 1384 and Purvey’s in 1388. The latter, however, was thought to be only a correction of the former and at one time was even published in the name of Wycliffe. The Wycliffe version is distinctive in several ways. (1) It is written in the everyday speech of the common people. In many instances the word children is rendered “brat”; father is “dad”; chariot is “cart.” (2) It gives the exact rendering of the English idiom for the ancient. Thus, raca is “Fy” or “Pugh”; mammon is “richesse.” (3) It is highly literal in its translation. The following is a specimen: “The disciplis scien to hym, Maister now the Jewis soughten for to stoone thee, and est goist thou thidir? Jheus answered whether ther ben not twelue ouris of the dai? If ony man wandre in the night he stomblish, for light is not in him. He seith these thingis and aftir these thingis he seith to hem Lazarus oure freend slepith but Y go to reise hym fro sleep. Therfor hise disciplis seiden: Lord if he slepith he schal be saaf.”

Tyndale’s Version. In 1526 William Tyndale made a translation of the NT from the original Gk. He afterward made a translation of the Pentateuch and other portions of the OT. The whole was printed in Germany and imported into England. Tyndale’s introduction and comments awakened intense opposition; and many copies of the work were publicly burned by the order of the Bishop of London. As in Wyclif’s version, the language was the common speech of the people. Many of his words have lost their old-time meaning, as is seen in the following rendering of Titus 1:1: “Paul, the rascal of God and the villein of Jesus Christ.” The aim of the translator was to render the simple sense of the original uninfluenced by theological thought. Thus, instead of “grace” he used the word “favor,” “love” instead of “charity,” “acknowledging” instead of “confessing,” “elders” instead of “priests,” “repentance” instead of “penance,” “congregation” instead of “church.”

Coverdale’s Version. In 1535 Miles Coverdale completed and printed an English translation of the entire Bible. It was probably done under the influence of Cromwell and with the aid of many assistants. It was not with Coverdale, as it was with Tyndale, a work of love. He undertook it as a task imposed upon him and did it perfunctorily and mechanically. Nor was it a translation from the original, but mainly from the German and Lat. It shows a strong royal and ecclesiastical influence. It uses a variety of English equivalents for the same original. It bears the marks of haste and carelessness.

Matthew’s Bible. This is the first “Authorized Version” of the Holy Bible in English. It is a fusion of the Tyndale and the Coverdale versions and was printed in London by the king’s license in 1537, by publishers Grafton and Whitchurch. It bears the name of Thomas Matthew, which is undoubtedly a pseudonym. The real editor was John Rogers. His notes and comments were far in advance of his time and soon evoked a strong ecclesiastical opposition to this version.

Taverner’s Version. This version appeared in 1539 and was made necessary by ecclesiastical opposition to the Matthew’s Bible. It, however, is but an expurgated edition of this version.

Cranmer’s Version. This version was printed in 1539 with the sanction of Cranmer’s name. The translation was made by a corps of scholars under the direction of the archbishop and his assistants. It was a large folio and illustrated with a picture supposed to be the work of Holbein. It had the license of the king and was called "The Great Bible."

The Geneva Bible. This was a popular revision of "The Great Bible" made by Heb. and Gk. scholars who were refugees in Geneva. The cost of the latter (about $30 made it inaccessible to the people. The purpose of the Geneva version was to give to England a household edition of the Word of God. It was a small book with marginal notes and was divided into chapters and verses. It at once became popular, and more than two hundred editions were published.

The Bishop's Bible. This work appeared in 1568 and was made on the suggestion of Archbishop Parker. He was assisted in his work by eight of his bishops and some of the scholars of the church. It was elegantly printed, profusely illustrated, and ornamented with elaborate initial letters. From one of these, introducing the epistle to the Hebrews, this version was popularly called "The Leda Bible." It never received the approval of the scholars, and its cost kept it from the possession of the people.

The Rheims and Douay Version. A translation was made by Martin, Allen, and Bristow, refugees in Rheims, where in 1582 they published the NT. The work was completed by the publication in 1609 of the OT. This was done in Douay, which fact gives the name to the version. Altogether aside from its Roman Catholic viewpoint, it is the poorest rendering into English of any of the versions. The following are given as fair specimens of its literary style: "Purge the old leaven that you may be a new paste, as you are asymes." "You are evacuated from Christ." In Gal. 5:21–22 this version substitutes "ebrieties" for "drunkenness" "comessations" for "carousing," and "longanimity" for "patience." In Heb. 9:23, for "the copies of the things in the heavens," the Douay has "the exemplars of the celestials." In Heb. 13:16, "and do not neglect doing good and sharing; for with such sacrifices God is pleased," the Douay reads, "Beneficence and communication do not forget, for with such hosts God is promerited."

The Authorized Version. It is also known as the King James Bible, from James I, by whose authority and support it was undertaken and completed. It was begun in 1604 and finished in seven years. Forty-seven of the ablest scholars were selected to do the work, each taking a portion and finally reviewing the whole. It was to correspond with the Bishop's Bible, except where the original Heb. and Gk. made this impossible. The excellence of the work done is attested by the simple fact that this version has held the heart of the English-speaking world for nearly three centuries and that no subsequent version has been able to supplant it.

The Revised Version. There have been a number of attempts at revision of the KJV, but nothing of importance was done until 1870 when the convocation of Canterbury formally originated an inquiry that resulted in a new version completed in 1885. This version was felt to be needed because of the change that two centuries had made in the meaning of many English words; because of the fuller knowledge then possessed of the Heb. and the Gk. text; because of the confessed inaccuracy of many of the renderings in the KJV; and because of the obscurities occasioned by the form of the English text where there is no distinction made between prose and poetry, and where the divisions into chapters and verses make unnatural and abrupt breaks in the inspired thought. The aim of the translators was to introduce as few alterations into the text of the KJV as faithfulness to the truth would allow and to make the language of such alterations conform to that of the rest of the book. The new version has not won the heart of the English-speaking world but is accepted as an able commentary on the text that since 1611 has been a sacred classic.

The American Standard Version. The RV with such alterations as were recommended by the American branch of revisers, and that was not published until 1901.

The Polychrome Version. An entirely new translation made from the original text, under the direction of Professor Haupt of Johns Hopkins University, and which aims to give the rendering on the basis of the most recent school of higher criticism. This translation has had only slight acceptance.

The Twentieth Century New Testament. This version, by a group of some twenty scholars representing various segments of the Christian church, used the Westcott and Hort Gk. text. It came out in London (1898–1901), with a revised edition appearing in 1904. One of its distinctive features, besides modern language and idiom, was its chronological placement of the various books, Mark's gospel appearing first instead of Matthew's in the traditional order.

Historical New Testament. This was translated by James Moffatt in polished modern idiom and appeared in Edinburgh in 1901. It reflects the higher-critical scholarship current at the beginning of the century. Moffatt's second translation appeared in Edinburgh in 1913. This contained several transpositions of chapters, paragraphs, and verses based upon Von Soden's edition of the Gk. NT. Moffatt published a translation of the OT in 1924, rendering the divine name Jehovah as "The Eternal." This translation, lucid in many places, followed higher-critical hypotheses and conclusions, which are seen throughout. In 1935 a revised and final edition of the Moffatt Bible was published. This too reflects higher-critical views, especially the documentary partition theories of the Pentateuch.

The Westminster Version of the Sacred Scriptures. This was a Roman Catholic translation. Heading the general editorship was Cuthbert Lattey of the Society of Jesus. The work dates from 1913, with a freely translated NT published in New York in 1937, containing footnotes indicating variation in Gk. and Vulg. readings. The OT books follow the Heb. original.

The Holy Scriptures According to the Masoretic Text, A New Translation. This was a Jewish rendering that appeared in 1917. It was prepared by a committee of Jewish scholars headed by Max L. Margolis as editor-in-chief. It closely follows the Masoretic Heb. text, reflecting a curious mixture of Jewish traditional readings and the results of modern biblical scholarship. Cf. Alexander Sperber, "A New Bible Translation," Alexander Marx Jubilee Volume, English Section (1950), pp. 547–80.

The New Testament in Modern Speech. This was produced in 1903 by Richard F. Weymouth, D. Litt. It was edited and partly revised by E. Hampden-Cook. It is a serviceable translation and effects careful rendering of the aorist and perfect tenses in Gk. The first American edition, revised by J. A. Robertson, appeared at Boston in 1943.

The New Testament, An American Translation. Based on the Westcott and Hort Gk. text, this version was prepared by Edgar J. Goodspeed (Chicago, 1923). In 1927 The Old Testament, An American Translation was prepared by Theophile J. Meek of the University of Toronto, Leroy Waterman of the University of Michigan, J. M. Powis Smith of the University of Chicago, and A. R. Gordon of the University of Montreal. Ninety-one pages of appendix in this edition list emendations of the Heb. preferred over the Masoretic text. In 1939 The Complete Bible, An American Translation appeared. This consisted of Theophile J. Meek's literary revision of the OT, Goodspeed's rendering of the Apocrypha, and Goodspeed's NT, which had appeared in 1931, as The Bible, An American Translation.

The Riverside New Testament. This translation leans heavily upon several previous translations and was executed by William G. Ballantine from the 1934 revised Nestle's Gk. text.

Books of the Old Testament in Colloquial Speech. The rendition of numerous scholars and published by the National Adult School Union (London, 1923 and later).

The Centenary Translation of the New Testament. This translation appeared in two volumes, Philadelphia, 1924. It was put out by Helen B. Montgomery of Rochester, N.Y. to mark the centenary of the American Baptist Publication Society. It strives after too modern and almost flippant (at times) renderings and popular headings that tend to cheapen the dignity of Scripture idiom.

The New Testament, A Translation in the Language of the People. Published in Boston in 1937 and reprinted in Chicago, 1950, this was founded on Westcott and Hort's Gk. text. Charles B. Williams, a professor of Gk. at Union University, Tennessee, was the author. Williams aimed at exact translation of the Gk. tenses.

The New Testament in Basic English (Cambridge, 1941). The Old Testament in Basic English appeared in 1950. This translation aimed to couch the Bible message in less than a thousand common English words supplemented of necessity by as few special biblical words as possible. Simplicity was the aim at the sacrifice of beauty and attractiveness of diction.

The Holy Bible. This was a Roman Catholic venture and aimed at revising the Challoner-Rheims version, and of course adhering closely to the Lat. Vulg. It was prepared by a group of twenty-seven Roman Catholic scholars and published by the Episcopal Committee of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (Paterson, N.J., 1941). The same committee is publishing the various books of the OT translated from the Heb. The book of Genesis appeared in 1948, the Psalms and Song of Solomon in 1950, and the books from Genesis to Ruth, 1952. The Sapiential books, Job to Serach (Ecclesiasticus), appeared in 1955. Beautifully printed with helpful critical notes, the translations are often fresh and challenging.

The Berkeley Version of the New Testament. This chiefly used Tischendorf's eighth edition of the Gk. text (1869–1872) and appeared in Berkeley, Calif., in 1945. It is the work of Gerrit Verkuyl, who for many years was associated with the board of Christian education of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. After considerable ministry of the NT alone, the OT (done by various scholars) was added to it in 1959, to form the Holy Bible, The Berkeley Version in Modern English (which see, below).

The New Testament Letters. This helpful translation with harder passages expanded by clear paraphrase was done by J. W. C. Wand, Bishop of London (Oxford, 1946).

The New World Translation of the Christian Greek Scriptures. This is a vernacular translation published by the Jehovah's Witnesses. It appeared in Brooklyn in 1950. It aims to render the Westcott and Hort Gk. text into vernacular English. Bruce M. Metzger has given a critique of its Unitarianism in Theology Today 10 (1952): 65–85. The first of three projected renderings of the Heb. OT by the Jehovah's Witnesses appeared in 1953. It displays ignorance of some basic Heb. grammatical forms, including the waw consecutive.

Revised Standard Version. The Revised Standard Version is an authorized revision of the American Standard Version of 1901. The OT section was copyrighted in 1952, the NT section in 1946. This translation of the entire Bible was launched with great fanfare and at great expense. Its reception, however, has been mixed. Hailed by liberals, it has been unfavorably received by many conservatives. Its translators were almost completely of the liberal school. Although possessing the results of the latest scholarship, the translators have departed from the KJV, RV, and ASV in their high veneration for the Heb. Masoretic text of the OT, and in many instances the translation contains renderings of pivotal passages that are doctrinally weak and unreliable. It appears it will not supplant the KJV, RV, or ASV, at least among conservative Christians.

Letters to the Young Churches. This was done by J. B. Phillips (New York, 1948) of the Anglican church and is characterized by appealing English idiom. Phillips also published The Gospels Translated into Modern English (New York, 1953). He completed the translation of the NT, published under the title The New Testament in Modern English (New York, 1958).

The New Testament, A New Translation in Plain English (London, 1952). This was done by Charles Kingsley Williams at the invitation, in 1937, of the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge. Its aim was to translate the Scriptures in about 2,000 common words listed by a group of educators in the Interim Report on Vocabulary Selection, 1936.

The Holy Bible, The Berkeley Version in Modern English. This appeared in Grand Rapids, Mich., 1959. The NT section is that of the Berkeley Version of the NT, by Gerrit Verkuyl, that appeared in 1945. The OT is the work of some twenty biblical scholars assisted by others under the editorship of Gerrit Verkuyl. This is translated from the original languages with numerous helpful nondoctrinal notes to aid the reader. It is designated as The Holy Bible, The Berkeley Version in Modern English and aims to avoid the archaisms and other expressions that are out-of-date in the KJV.

The Jerusalem Bible. After World War II, Roman Catholic scholars produced the Jerusalem Bible, which was published between 1956 and 1966. It was actually based on a French Bible translated by the Dominican School in Jerusalem but was revised and rendered into good idiomatic English, which in numerous places exhibits striking lyrical and dramatic qualities. The underlying scholarship is liberal in nature, but the translation has been done carefully in the Roman Catholic tradition and resists attempts at paraphrasing quite successfully. Although some liberties have been taken in the rearranging of the Heb. text, the Jerusalem Bible lends itself well to liturgical and devotional use.

The New American Standard Bible. This is basically a revision of the American Standard Version (1901) and was produced by the Lockman Foundation of La Habra, Calif. It is a highly respected literal translation by a committee of conservative scholars and was published in this sequence: the gospel of John (1960), the four gospels (1962), the New Testament (1963), the whole Bible (1967). The three stated objectives of the translators were clarity of English, accuracy of translation, and adequacy of notes. The NT translators followed the twenty-third edition of the Nestle Gk. text, even though they sometimes preferred the text underlying the ASV (e.g., the long ending of Mark 16:9–20 is adopted). Although the English style is not always smooth, many students and teachers choose the NASB because it avoids paraphrasing that often obscures or even misrepresents the statements and meaning of the original text.

The New English Bible. The New English Bible emerged from an ecumenical resolve to produce a fresh translation that would convey the sense of the original in contemporary English. Fourteen years after the initial resolution, the NT was published in 1961, and the OT and Apocrypha nine years later. The finished product was marked predominantly by liberal scholarship, and though it exhibited some creditable phraseology it encountered heavy criticism on literary grounds generally. The translators were accused of manipulating the OT text in some areas, allowing liberal theological presuppositions to influence their translation, using unnecessary paraphrasing, limiting the usefulness of the book by including British provincial idioms, and permitting sentences that were either vulgar in meaning or rough in syntax. The attempt to blend scholarship and the popular idiom failed to produce a version that could match the King James Version or the Revised Standard Version liturgically, making the translation more suitable for private use.

The New International Version. An interdenominational enterprise by evangelical scholars resulted in a widely acclaimed translation known as the New International Version. Underwritten by the New York Bible Society, the NT was issued in 1973 and the OT some five years later. Though the version was not marked by the textual dislocations of earlier liberal translations, it employed the concept of dynamic equivalence in a manner that resulted in a great deal of paraphrasing. On occasions this tendency not only obscured the meaning of the original, but actually misrepresented it. As with many modern translations, the New International Version supplied footnotes that furnished textual information or gave alternative translations. Despite attempts to accommodate the version to liturgical needs, the literary style does not always lend itself to public worship, although the version has been recognized by many evangelical churches because of its conservative theological approach.

The New King James Bible. A distinctive contribution to the work of Bible revision was initiated in 1975 by Sam Moore of Thomas Nelson Publishers, Nashville. Disturbed by the possibility that the King James tradition might disappear in the welter of new translations, he commissioned a revision of the King James Bible that would retain the best elements of the original. As with other versions, archaic literary and syntactical forms were replaced with modern equivalents, but an attempt was made to retain familiar passages in their traditional form as far as possible. Unlike the New International Version, which followed an eclectic text for the NT, the revisers of the King James Version used the Scrivener text that reconstructed as closely as possible the one underlying the King James Version. To prevent this procedure from ignoring more recent textual scholarship, the NT was supplied with footnotes that indicated where major manuscripts differed textually from the King James Version, thus enabling the reader to form an individual opinion about the passage in question. Those who revised the OT based their work on the 1977 Stuttgart edition of Biblia Hebraica. The international team of scholars employed the concept of total equivalence in a manner that precluded paraphrasing or similar “dynamic” interpretations, and instead produced a careful rendering of the original text. The NT of the New King James Version, as it was called, was issued in 1979 and the complete Bible in 1982. A concurrent British edition was published in 1983 for use in the United Kingdom and Commonwealth countries. The New King James Version has been praised widely for the way in which the revisers managed to capture the flavor and ethos of the King James Version, and the OT has been declared by some scholars to be the best and most accurate rendering of the Hebrew in the past century. TRAPPER (from Heb. yāqōsh, to “lay snares”; Pss. 91:3; 124:7 [“fowler,” NIV]; also rendered “fowler,” Prov. 6:5; Jer. 5:26; “bird catcher,” Hos. 9:8). One who took birds by means of nets, snares, decoys, etc. Among the Egyptians “fowling was one of the great amusements of all classes. Those who followed this sport for their livelihood used nets and traps, but the amateur sportsman pursued his game in the thickets, and felled them with the throw-stick.... The throw-stick was made of heavy wood, and flat, so as to offer little resistance to the air in its flight, and the distance to which an expert could throw it was considerable. It was about one foot and a quarter to two feet in length, and about one and a half inches in breadth, slightly curved at the upper end. They frequently took with them a decoy bird, and in order to keep it to its post, a female was selected, whose nest, containing eggs, was deposited in the boat” (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, 1: 234ff.). According to the Mosaic law anyone finding a bird’s nest was forbidden to take the mother with the eggs or young (Deut. 22:6–7), lest the species be extinguished; or, perhaps, to impress upon men the sacredness of the relation between parent and young.

TREE (Heb. עֵץ; Gk. dendron). Trees in Palestine, as elsewhere, were objects of beauty and utility (Ps. 1:3).

Mosaic Regulations. When the Israelites planted fruit trees in Palestine they were to treat the fruit of every tree as uncircumcised, i.e., not to eat it. “The reason for this command is not to be sought for in the fact that in the first three years fruit trees bear only a little fruit, and that somewhat insipid, and that if the blossom or fruit is broken off the first year the trees will bear all the more plentifully afterward, though this end would no doubt be thereby attained; but it rests rather upon ethical grounds. Israel was to treat the fruits of horticulture with the most careful regard as a gift of God, and sanctify the enjoyment of them by a thank offering. In the fourth year the whole of the fruit was to be a holiness of praise for Jehovah, i.e., to be offered to the Lord as a holy sacrificial gift, in praise and thanksgiving for the blessing which he had bestowed upon the fruit trees” (K & D., Com.). The Hebrews were forbidden to destroy the fruit trees of their enemies in time of war, for the tree of the field is man’s life (Deut. 20:19–20).

Noted Trees. There are in Scripture many memorable trees, e.g., Allon-bacuth (Gen. 35:8), the tamarisk in Gibeah (1 Sam. 22:6), the oak in Shechem (Josh. 24:26), under which the law was set up; the palm tree of Deborah (Judg. 4:5), the diviner’s oak (9:37), the oak in Zaananim (4:11), and others (1 Sam. 10:3; 14:2). Among the pagans this observation of particular trees was extended to a regular worship of them. See Vegetable Kingdom.

Worship of Trees. Among the Canaanites and other Eastern peoples, worship was carried on in holy groves (which see). In the absence of groves they chose green trees with thick foliage (Ezek. 6:13; 20:28), such as the vigorous oak, the evergreen terebinth (Isa. 1:29–30; 57:5, see marg.), and the poplar or osier, which remains green even in the heat of summer (Hos. 4:13). To explain how this worship came about, Stade (Geschichte, 1:451) says that at such places were graves of patriarchs or other heroes—as Hebron, the burying place of Abraham, etc.; but Robertson (Early Religion of Israel, p. 248) says: “I believe the prophet, who reproved the worship under green trees, came nearer to a true explanation of the origin of the worship in the hint, ‘because the shadow thereof is good’ (Hos. 4:13), than modern critics, with their learned disquisition as to the tree suggesting life and being the abode of ‘a spirit or a divinity.’”

TRIBULATION, THE GREAT. This is the period of unparalleled suffering that, according to premillennial eschatology, will precede the establishment of the future kingdom of Israel (Acts 1:6). The trouble will embrace the entire earth (Rev. 3:10). Yet in a distinctive sense it will center upon Jerusalem and Palestine, being called by Jeremiah specifically “the time of Jacob’s distress” (Jer. 30:7). It will involve the Jewish people who will have gone back to Palestine in unbelief. It will also be connected with catastrophic judgments upon the Gentile nations because of their wickedness and anti-Semitism. The colossal scenes of the Revelation, beginning with chap. 5 and the opening of the seven-sealed book, through chap. 10, form a prelude to worldwide commotion prior to the Great Tribulation itself described in chaps. 11–18. The Great Tribulation is identical with the last three and one-half years of Daniel’s seventieth week of years (Dan. 9:24–27; Rev. 11:2–3). The gigantic wars, cataclysms, pestilences, etc., that befall the earth are actually the manifestation of the risen, victorious Christ taking an open hand to claim His redeemed rights to the earth in preparation for the divine program involving His people on the earth. Psalm 2, in giving the order of the establishment of the kingdom in the ousting of Christ's enemies, closely interweaves the first advent and the Messiah's death in shame with His second advent in glory to receive the rewards of His conquest over sin and death. The Tribulation will see the nations raging (Ps. 2:1) and the derision of Jehovah (v. 4) that men should vainly imagine to set aside His covenant (2 Sam. 7:8–16) and His plan for the earth (Ps. 89:34–37). The Great Tribulation foreseen in Ps. 2 is described in Matt 24:15–51. It eventuates in the establishment of the rejected King in Zion (Ps. 2:6) and the subjugation of the earth to the King's millennial rule (vv. 7–9), with a present appeal to Gentile world powers to be warned by the certainty of the establishment of Christ's kingdom (vv. 10–12). According to Rev. 13–19, there will be the cruel reign of the "beast coming up out of the sea" (13:1) who, breaking his covenant with the Jews (2 Thess. 2:4), will demand divine worship. This earth ruler, the Beast, is empowered by Satan, and the entire terrific episode of fighting God is made possible by the unprecedented activity of demons (Rev. 9:1–11; 16:13–16). The terrific bowl judgments of chap. 16 are the "Lamb's" final demonstration of power. He destroys His enemies and frees His redeemed earth from the domination of wicked men at His visible, glorious return, and sets up the kingdom. Those who are not premillennialists hold that the Tribulation of Revelation was fulfilled in the Roman persecutions of the church or in great catastrophes occurring over the last nineteen centuries. TRIBUTE. Several Heb. and Gk. terms are translated "tribute" in the KJV, NIV, and NASB: Heb. missâ, number, is used for that which an Israelite gave to the Lord according to his ability (Deut. 16:10); and Aram. bīlō, something consumed, or excise, refers to a tax on things consumed (Ezra 4:13; 7:24). Several other terms, translated "tribute" in the KJV and NIV are rendered "taxes" in the NASB: Heb. mekes, is a portion paid to the Lord (Num. 31:28); Heb. middat, is a fine imposed (Ezra 6:8 ["revenues," NIV]; Neh. 5:4 ["tax," NIV]); Gk. didrachon, a double drachma is a Temple tax levied on all Jews (Matt. 17:24); and Gk. phoros, a burden, was the annual tax upon houses, lands, and persons (Luke 20:22; 23:2). "Tribute money," KJV, was the coin with which the tax was paid (Matt. 22:19). See Forced Labor; Fine; Poll Tax.

NASB New American Standard Bible

TRINITY. The term by which is expressed the unity of three Persons in the one God. The Christian doctrine is: (1) That there is only one God, one divine nature and being. (2) This one divine Being is tripersonal, involving the distinctions of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. (3) These three are joint partakers of the same nature and majesty of God. This doctrine is preeminently one of revelation. And although it brings before us one of the great mysteries of revelation and transcends finite comprehension, it is essential to the understanding of the Scriptures, and, as we shall see, has its great value and uses.

Scripture Doctrine. Although the doctrine of the Trinity is implicit rather than explicit in the OT, at the same time it is properly held that with the accompanying light of the NT this truth can be found in the OT (e.g., Num. 6:24–26; Isa. 6:3; 63:9–10, the sanctity of the symbolical number three—the plural form of Elohim, also places in which the Deity is spoken of as conversing with Himself). This is in accord with the gradual development of revealed truth in other particulars. The religion of the OT is emphatically monotheistic. The almost exclusive proclamation of the unity of God was essential as a safeguard against polytheism.

The NT teaching upon this subject is not given in the way of formal statement. The formal statement, however, is legitimately and necessarily deduced from the Scriptures of the NT, and these, as has been suggested, cast a light backward upon the intimations of the OT. Reliance, it is held by many competent critics, is not to be placed upon the passages in Acts 20:28 and 1 Tim. 3:16; and 1 John 5:7 is commonly regarded as spurious. Aside from these, however, it is plain that both Christ and the apostles ascribe distinct personality to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit (see articles, Father, God the; Sonship of Christ; Holy Spirit, the). And these utterances are such as to admit legitimately of no other conception than that of the unity of these three Persons in the ontological oneness of the whole divine nature (see, e.g., Matt. 28:19; John 14:16–17; 1 Cor. 12:4–6; 2 Cor. 13:14; Eph. 4:4–6; 1 Pet. 1:2; Rev. 1:4–6). The same worship is paid and the same works are ascribed to each of these three Persons, and in such a way as to indicate that these three are united in the fullness of the one living God. The monotheism of the OT is maintained, while glimpses are nevertheless afforded into the tripersonal mode of the divine existence.

Theological Suggestions. The Christian faith at this period does not ground itself upon philosophy, for it here extends to a matter far above the reach of philosophical reflection. Also, little stress, if any, is to be laid upon apparent resemblances between pagan religions and Christianity at this point—resemblances more apparent than real. The doctrine is to be accepted by faith in the divine revelation; and although it is above reason and cannot be comprehended in its depth and fullness, it does not follow that it is opposed to reason.

The question as to whether the Trinity is merely one of manifestation or that of essential nature has been raised again and again in the history of the church (see Sabellianism in the article Doctrine). Undoubtedly the history of revelation shows progress in the unfolding of truth concerning God. And in that sense the Trinity is dispensational. But it is also emphatically to be borne in mind that if God reveals Himself, He must reveal Himself as He is, and the Trinity of revelation must therefore rest upon a Trinity of nature. The attempt to remove difficulty by any sort of Sabellian interpretation only raises difficulty of a deeper character. Can God on the whole reveal Himself other than He actually is?

On the other hand Christianity has reason to guard itself, as it has generally sought to do, against tritheistic conceptions. Both the unity and the tripersonal nature of God are to be maintained. And thus the proper baptismal formula is not “In the name of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit,” but the words as our Lord gave them (Matt. 28:19).

It is admitted by all who thoughtfully deal with this subject that the Scripture revelation here leads us into the presence of a deep mystery and that all human attempts at expression are of necessity imperfect. The word person, it may be, is inadequate and is doubtless used often in a way that is misleading. “That God is alike one Person, and in the same sense three Persons, is what Christianity has never professed” (Van Oosterzee). Said Augustine, “Three persons, if they are to be so called, for the unspeakable exaltedness of the object cannot be set forth by this term.” And yet the long-standing and prevailing doctrine of the church expresses more nearly than any other the truth concerning God as it comes to us in the Holy Scriptures. And it is further to be borne in mind that this teaching of the church has been called forth for the purpose of combating various forms of error. It has not been held as a complete or perfect expression of the truth concerning the unfathomable being of God, but rather as a protest against the denials of the personality and supreme deity of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.

Accordingly, the doctrine has a large measure of importance. It has been called “a bulwark for Christian theism.” Unitarianism is very apt to degenerate into deism or pantheism. Also this doctrine affords us a glimpse into the wonderful being of God, while at the same time it constantly proclaims the impossibility of comprehending God. Thus while it is a stumbling block to rationalism, it is for those who accept it a safeguard against all tendency to rationalism or intellectual pride. And, further, in the Trinity we should behold not only a God who is exalted far above us, but also Christ with us and the Holy Spirit who will dwell in us. Thus in a proper way is harmonized the divine transcendence with the divine immanence.

The glory of the gospel depends upon this truth; for Christ is most clearly seen to be God’s unspeakable gift, the Bringer of the most perfect revelation and the Author of eternal salvation, when we recognize His essential oneness with the Father. Likewise the Holy Spirit is thus seen to be, in His relation to a sinful world and to the church, as well as to individual believers, the infinite source of hope and new and holy life.

Historical. Briefly, it may be said that the faith of the early Christians at this point, as at many others, was without attempt at scientific form. The elements of the doctrine, however, were embraced by their simple reliance upon the teaching of Christ and His apostles. It was only gradually, and after a considerable period in conflict with Judaism and paganism, that the thought of the church arrived at something of a formal statement. The word Trinity (Trinitas) was first employed by Tertullian (2d century), though his word was only the Lat. translation of the Gk. trias, employed by Theophilus of Antioch. The word Person was also first employed by Tertullian, though he used it in the inadmissible sense of individual.

The Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325) was an epoch in Christian history. The heresy of Sabellius and Paul of Samosata, that refused to recognize the Father as in any personal sense distinct from the Son and the Holy Spirit, had been previously condemned. But Arius, who began with the Sabellian idea that the Trinity is only one of manifestation, changed his position and declared that there were three Persons in God, but that these three were unequal in glory. In short, the Son and the Holy Spirit owed their existence to the divine will and, accordingly, were creatures of God (see Arianism in books on doctrine). The Council of Nicea, in opposition to Arianism and various other theories, adopted the formal statement of the consubstantiality of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, while maintaining the distinction of personality. The doctrine of the Nicene Council was reaffirmed at various succeeding councils and is the generally recognized doctrine of the Christian church. E.MCC.; M.F.U.

TRIUMPH (Heb. ālaz, to “exult”; ālāṣ, to “jump” for joy; Gk. thriambeuō, a “noisy song”). The nations of antiquity generally celebrated success in war by a triumph, which usually included a splendid procession, a display of captives and spoil, and a solemn thanksgiving to the gods.

The Egyptians. The return of a king in triumph from war was a grand solemnity celebrated with all the pomp that the wealth of the nation could command. The inhabitants flocked to meet him and with welcome acclamations greeted his arrival and the success of his arms. The priests and chief people of each place advanced with garlands and bouquets of flowers; the principal person present addressed him in an appropriate speech; and as the troops filed through the streets or passed outside the walls, the people followed with acclamations, uttering earnest thanksgiving to the gods, the protectors of Egypt, and praying them forever to continue the same marks of favor to their monarch and their nation. The Assyrian sculptures abound with similar representations.

The Romans. Among the Romans the highest honor that could be bestowed on a citizen or magistrate was the triumph or solemn procession in which a victorious general passed from the gate of the city to the capitol. He set out from the Campus Martius along the Via Triumphalis, and from thence through the most public places of the city. The streets were strewn with flowers, and the altars smoked with incense. The procession was formed as follows: First, a band of musicians, singing and playing triumphal songs; the oxen to be sacrificed, their horns gilded and heads adorned with headbands and garlands; the spoils, and captives in chains; the lictors (officers who attended chief magistrates appearing in public), carrying fasces (the officers’ insignia of office; it consisted of a bundle of rods bound with an ax with its blade projecting and was carried before magistrates as a badge of authority) adorned with laurel; a great company of musicians and dancers; a long train of persons carrying perfumes; the general dressed in purple embroidered with gold, wearing a crown of laurel and carrying in his right hand a laurel branch and a scepter in his left, his face painted with vermilion, and a golden ball suspended from his neck. He stood erect in his chariot; a public slave was by his side to remind him of the vicissitudes of fortune and of his mortality. Behind him came the consuls, senators, and other magistrates, on foot; the whole procession closed with the victorious army.

The Hebrews. They celebrated their victories by triumphal processions. The women and children danced to the accompaniment of musical instruments (Judg. 11:34), singing hymns of triumph to Jehovah. The hymns that were sung by Miriam (Ex. 15:1–21) and Deborah (Judg. 5:1–31) are notable examples. Triumphal songs were uttered for the living (1 Sam. 18:6–8; 2 Chron. 20:21–28), and elegies for the dead (2 Sam. 1:17–27; 2 Chron. 35:25). Great demonstrations of joy were made, and the shout of victory resounded from mountain to mountain (Isa. 42:11; 52:7–8; 63:1–4; Jer. 50:2; Ezek. 7:7; Nah. 1:15). Monuments in honor of victory were erected, and the arms of the enemy were hung up as trophies in the Temples (1 Sam. 21:9; 31:10; 2 Sam. 8:11, 12; 2 Kings 11:10).

Indignities to prisoners, such as maiming, blinding, and killing, formed a leading feature among ancient nations. Many representations appear upon the monuments of putting the foot upon the head or neck of a conquered foe (Josh. 10:24), and that forms the ground of many figurative representations in the Scriptures (Ps. 110:1; Isa. 60:14; 1 Cor. 15:26).

TROAS (trō’az; Gk. the Troad, region about Troy). A city on the coast of Mysia, opposite the SE extremity of the island of Tenedos, and near Troy. It was formerly called Antigonía Troas, having been built by Antigonus; but it was embellished by Lysimachus and named Alexandria Troas in honor of Alexander the Great. It flourished under the Romans and, with its environs, was raised by Augustus to be a colonia. It was while in Troas that Paul received the divine intimation that he was to carry the gospel into Europe (Acts 16:8–11); where he rested for a short time on the northward road from Ephesus (during the next missionary journey), in the expectation of meeting Titus (2 Cor. 2:12–13); where on his return southward he met those who had preceded him from Philippi (Acts 20:5–6), and remained a week; and where, years after, he left a cloak, some books, and parchments in the house of Carpus (2 Tim. 4:13).

TROGYL'LIUM (tro-jil'i-um). A town and promontory on the Ionian coast, directly opposite Samos; the channel here was about one mile in width. Paul sailed through this channel on his way to Jerusalem at the close of his third missionary journey; the marg. of Acts 20:15 states that he spent the night in Trogyllium. “St. Paul’s Port” is the name still given to the harbor here.

TROPH'IMUS (trof'i-mus; Gk. “nourishing”). A companion of the apostle Paul. He was a native of Ephesus in Asia Minor and, together with Tychicus, accompanied Paul on his third missionary journey when returning from Macedonia toward Syria (Acts 20:4). Trophimus went to Jerusalem, where he was the innocent cause of the tumult in which the apostle was apprehended. Certain Jews from the district of Asia saw the two missionaries together and supposed that Paul had taken Trophimus into the Temple (21:27–29). In 2 Tim. 4:20 Paul writes that he had left Trophimus in ill health in Miletus.

TRUNK (Heb. aiqqēr). In 1 Sam. 5:4 it is recorded that the image of Dagon was miraculously overthrown, his hands and head cut off, and only the trunk (“body” NIV) left. This was to prove to the Philistines the utter helplessness of their god.

TRYPHAE'NA (tri-fay'na), or Tryphe'na (KJV and NIV only; “delicate, luxurious, dainty”). A Christian woman of Rome to whom, in connection with Tryphosa, Paul sent a special salutation (Rom. 16:12). What other relation the two women had is not known, but it is more than likely that they were fellow deaconesses.

TRYPHO'SA (tri-fō'sa; Gk. “delicate, luxurious”). See Tryphaena.

TSADHE' (צ) (tsa-di'). The eighteenth letter of the Heb. alphabet, corresponding to no single letter in English. It is anglicized by ts or tz. It heads the eighteenth section of Ps. 119, in which section each verse of the Heb. commences with this letter. M.F.U.

TU'BAL (tū'bal; meaning uncertain). One of the seven sons of Japheth (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5). He is thought to have been the founder of the Tiberani, said by the scholiasts to have been a Scythian tribe. Tubal and Meshech, the Tabali and Mushki of the Assyrian monuments, were the representatives of eastern Asia Minor. Their territory originally extended far to the S. In the time of Sargon and Sennacherib, the territory of the Tabali adjoined Cilicia, while the Mushki inhabited the highlands to the E of them, where they were in contact with the Hittites. In later days, however, Meschech had retreated to the N, and the classical geographers place the Tibarêni and the Mushki not far from the Black Sea.

TU'BAL-CAIN (tū'bal-kān; Tubal, "the smith"). The son of Lamech by his wife Zillah. He is described (Gen. 4:22) as "the forger of all instruments of bronze and iron."

TURBAN. A piece of cloth wrapped several times around the head and the rendering in the NASB of four Heb. words. See also Dress; and the discussion of the high priest in the articles Priesthood, Hebrew; Priest, High.

1. Heb. miṣnepet (Ex. 28:4, 37, 39; 29:6; etc.), the headdress of the high priest. The KJV renders "miter" or "diadem" (Ezek. 21:26).

2. Heb. ṣānîp (Zech. 3:5; Job 29:14; Isa. 3:23 ["tiara," NIV]), a headdress composed of twisted clothes of various colors. In the KJV this term is translated "miter" (Zech. 3:5), "hood" (Isa. 3:23), and "diadem" (Isa. 62:3; Job 29:14). In the NASB and NIV of Isa. 62:3 the Heb. term is rendered "diadem."

3. Heb. ṭbûlîm (Ezek. 23:15 only), another term for turban; in the KJV the rendering is "dyed attire."

4 Heb. p̄ē, a turban (Ezek. 24:17; "tire," KJV) or headdress (Isa. 3:20; "bonnet," KJV).

TUTOR (Gk. paidagōgos). A guide and guardian for boys. Among the Greeks and Romans the name was applied to trustworthy slaves who were charged with the duty of supervising the life and morals of boys of the better class. The name carries with it the idea of severity (as of a stern censor and enforcer of morals) in 1 Cor. 4:15, where the father is distinguished from the tutor as one whose discipline is usually milder. The NIV, however, translates it as "guardian." In Gal. 3:24–25, the Mosaic law is likened to a tutor because it arouses the consciousness of sin, and is called paidagōgos ("our tutor to lead us to Christ"), i.e., as preparing the soul for Christ, because those who have learned by experience with the law that they are not sinless and cannot be commended to God by their works, welcome the more eagerly the hope of salvation offered them through the death and resurrection of Christ, the Son of God. The term is sometimes translated "schoolmaster," but that is misleading because the paidagōgos had the responsibility of taking a boy to the schoolmaster in the morning and leaving him there. Likewise the law as a paidagōgos leads a person to Christ as schoolmaster and leaves him there. H.F.V.

TWINKLING. The apostle Paul, in speaking of those who shall be alive when Christ comes in judgment, says (1 Cor. 15:51–52), "We shall all be changed, in a moment [Gk. en atomō, "that which cannot be divided"], in the twinkling of an eye [en hripē ophthalmou, the "jerk" of the eyelash]." Both these were common expressions to denote the shortest conceivable time.

TYCHICUS (tik'i-kus; "fortuitous"). One of Paul's fellow laborers. He is first mentioned as a companion of the apostle during a portion of Paul's return journey from the third missionary tour (Acts 20:4). He is there expressly called (with Trophimus) a native of Asia Minor; but while Trophimus went with Paul to Jerusalem (21:29), Tychicus was left behind in Asia, probably at Miletus (20:15, 38). In Paul's first imprisonment he was with the apostle again (Col. 4:7–8; Eph. 6:21–22). The next reference to him is in Titus 3:12. Here Paul (writing possibly from Ephesus) says that it is probable he may send Tychicus to Crete, about the time when he himself goes to Nicopolis. In 2 Tim. 4:12 (written at Rome during the second imprisonment), he says, "Tychicus I have sent to Ephesus." There is much probability in the conjecture that Tychicus was one of the two "brethren" (Trophimus being the other) who were associated with Titus (2 Cor. 8:16–24) in conducting the business of the collection for the poor Christians in Judea.

TYRAN'NUS (ti-ran'us; Lat. from Gk. "a tyrant, an absolute sovereign"). The man in whose school Paul taught for two years during his sojourn at Ephesus (Acts 19:9). The fact that Paul taught in his school after leaving the synagogue favors the opinion that Tyrannus was a Greek, but whether he was a convert is uncertain. Paul taught every day in the lecture room of Tyrannus. "Public life in the Ionian cities ended regularly at the fifth hour (11 A.M.); ... thus Paul himself would be free, and the lecture room would be disengaged after the fifth hour; and the time, which was devoted generally to home life and rest, was applied by him to mission work" (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 271).

TYRE (tîr; Heb. šûr, "a rock"; Gk. Turos). An ancient Phoenician city, located on the shore of the Mediterranean Sea, twenty miles from Sidon and twenty-three miles from Acre. It once consisted of two parts—a rocky coast defense of great strength on the mainland, and a city upon a small but well-protected island, about half a mile from the shore. Tyre was already a city on an island in the fourteenth century B.C., as we learn from an Egyptian papyrus of that date. At the time that Alexander the Great besieged Tyre for seven months, a road was built from the mainland to the island; thereafter the island was merely the tip of a peninsula, formed as sand drifted against the roadway. The configuration of the locality was changed, for with the causeway being built, the island no longer existed. The city was spoken of as "the bestower of crowns, whose merchants were princes, whose traders were the honored of the earth" (Isa. 23:8). The Tyrian merchants sailed to all ports and colonized almost everywhere. David early formed an alliance with them for trading purposes (2 Sam. 5:11; 1 Kings 5:1; 2 Chron. 2:3). See Hiram; Solomon; Tarshish; Ezion-geber.

These friendly relations survived for a time the disastrous secession of the ten tribes, and a century later Ahab married a daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Sidonians (1 Kings 16:31). According to Menander, she was the daughter of Ithobal, king of Tyre. When mercantile cupidity induced the Tyrians and the neighboring Phoenicians to buy Hebrew captives from their enemies and to sell them as slaves to the Greeks and Edomites, there commenced denunciations and, at first, threats of retaliation (Joel 3:4–8; Amos 1:9–10). But the likelihood of the denunciations being fulfilled first arose from the progressive conquests of the Assyrian monarchs.

Our knowledge of its condition from then until the siege by Nebuchadnezzar depends entirely on mention of it by the Hebrew prophets, who denounced the idolatry and wickedness of the city (Isa. 23:1; Jer. 25:22; Ezek. 26–28; Amos 1:9–10; Zech. 9:2–4). Some of these writings are quite extensive, and Ezek. 27 is especially detailed. One point that particularly arrests the attention is that Tyre, like its splendid daughter Carthage, employed mercenary soldiers (Ezek. 27:8–9). Independently, however, of this fact respecting Tyrian mercenary soldiers, Ezekiel gives interesting details respecting the trade of Tyre. It appears that its gold came from Arabia by the Persian Gulf (v. 22), just as in the time of Solomon it came from Arabia by the Red Sea.

Only thirty-four years before the destruction of Jerusalem the celebrated reformation of Josiah occurred (622 B.C.). This momentous religious revolution (2 Kings 22–23) fully explains the exultation and malevolence of the Tyrians. In that reformation Josiah had heaped insults on the gods who were the objects of Tyrian veneration and love. Indeed, he seemed to have endeavored to exterminate their religion (23:20). These acts must have been regarded by the Tyrians as a series of sacrilegious and abominable outrages; we can scarcely doubt that the death in battle of Josiah at Megiddo and the subsequent destruction of the city and Temple of Jerusalem were hailed by them as instances of divine retribution in human affairs. Their joy, however, must soon have given way to other feelings when Nebuchadnezzar invaded Phoenicia and laid siege to Tyre. That siege lasted thirteen years (585–572 B.C.), and it is still a disputed point whether Tyre was actually taken by Nebuchadnezzar on this occasion. Alexander the Great took the island city in 332 B.C., after a seven-month siege. Victory came only after he built a half-mile causeway out to the island. At the time our Lord visited Tyre (Matt. 15:21; Mark 7:24) it was perhaps more populous than Jerusalem. Paul spent seven days there (Acts 21:3–7). Tyre suffered violent destruction in the thirteenth century when the Muslims took it from the Crusaders. After the death of Stephen the Martyr, a church was formed here, and it was early the seat of a Christian bishopric.

The most celebrated product of Tyre, and a source of very great wealth, was the famous purple dye made from mollusks (murex) found on the nearby shores. Sidon was the older city (cf. Gen. 10:15; Isa. 23:12). In later centuries, however, Tyre far outstripped Sidon. Canaanite cults, which we now know from the Ras Shamra literature of the fourteenth century B.C. to be effete and morally debasing, helped to make Tyre a profligate, self-centered, opulent, and worldly wise city. The cult of Melcarth was firmly established for many centuries. Ezekiel denounced the wicked city (Ezek. 28:1–19).

Systematic excavations at Tyre began in 1947 under the leadership of Maurice Chehab, director-general of the Lebanese Department of Antiquities, and they continued until the outbreak of hostilities in 1975. Much of Roman and Byzantine Tyre has been laid bare. Chehab focused his attention primarily on three sections: (1) the area where the E-W Roman road intersected the N-S road; (2) a nearby Crusader church; and (3) the island city. Along the road the Lebanese excavated scores of marble sarcophagi, many beautifully executed; a monumental arch of the second century A.D.; and a marvelous hippodrome 500 meters long. Nearby, the Crusader cathedral of the twelfth century has been excavated. In the area of the island city, Chehab uncovered the main thoroughfare of the Byzantine period, a rectangular arena, a massive bath complex, and a marketplace or a palestra. Tyre was becoming one of the archaeological showplaces of the Mediterranean world when the Lebanese troubles began. H.F.V.

TY'RUS. The KJV uses this Gk. form of Tyre in a number of OT verses (Jer. 25:22; 27:3; 47:4; Ezek. 26:2–4, 7, 15; 27:2, 3, 8, 32; Hos. 9:13; Amos 1:9, 10; Zech. 9:2, 3).

U

U'CAL (ū'kal; "I am strong" or, possibly, "consumed"). A word that occurs as a proper name in Prov. 30:1: "The man declares to Ithiel, to Ithiel and Ucal." Most authorities endorse this translation and regard these two persons as disciples of "Agur the son of Jakeh," a Hebrew teacher, whose authorship of this unique chapter has rescued his name from obscurity; but the passage is very obscure. By slightly varying the punctuation it has been translated, "I have labored for God, and have obtained" (Cocceius); "I have wearied myself for God, and have given up the investigation" (J. D. Michaelis); "I have wearied myself for God, and have fainted" (Bertheau); "I have wearied myself for God, and I became dull" (Hitzig). If any of these views is correct, the repetition of the first clause of the sentence is merely for poetical effect. Bunsen, however, supposes the speaker to have given himself a symbolical name, somewhat in the manner of the English Puritans, and translates, "The saying of the man 'I-have-wearied-myself-for-God:' I have wearied myself for God, and have fainted away." Davidson, with greater accuracy, reads: "I am weary, O God, I am weary, O God, and am become weak." Ewald combines the two names into one, which he renders, "God-be-with-me-and-I-am-strong," and bestows it upon a character whom he supposes to engage in a dialogue with Agur. Keil follows Ewald's translation of the names but disjoins them and regards the first as typifying the reverential believers in God among Agur's disciples, and the second the self-righteous freethinkers "who thought themselves superior to the revealed law, and in practical atheism indulged the lusts of the flesh."

U'EL (ū'el; "will of God"). One of the sons of Bani. He is mentioned in Ezra 10:34 as one of those who put away their Gentile wives after the captivity, 456 B.C.

UNCIRCUMCISED (Heb. āreḷ, “exposed”; Gk. akrobustia). Used figuratively for a pagan (Gen. 34:14; Judg. 14:3; 15:18; 1 Sam. 14:6; Jer. 9:26; Rom. 4:9; 1 Cor. 7:18; etc.); “of uncircumcised lips” (Ex. 6:12, 30, see marg.) means one whose lips are, as it were, covered with a foreskin, so that he cannot easily bring out his words, “slow of tongue” (4:10); of “uncircumcised ... ears” (Acts 7:51; cf. Jer. 6:10, marg.) are those whose ears are closed with a foreskin, i.e., closed to the prophet’s testimony by their impure heart; “uncircumcised in heart” (Ezek. 44:9; Acts 7:51; cf. Lev. 26:41; James 1:21; Col. 2:13) are those who are in an impure, God-offending state of nature (Jer. 4:4, “remove the foreskins of your hearts”). The “uncircumcised” tree was the one under three years of age, whose fruit by the law was treated as unclean (Lev. 19:23, see marg.).

UNCLEAN, UNCLEANNESS. Although sin has its origin and its seat in the soul, it pervades the whole body as the soul’s organ, bringing about the body’s dissolution in death and decomposition. Its effects have spread from man to the whole of the earthly creation, because, having dominion over nature, he has brought nature with him into the service of sin. God has also made the irrational creature subject to “futility” and “corruption” on account of man’s sin (Rom. 8:20–21). “It is in this penetration of sin into the material creation that we may find the explanation of the fact that from the very earliest times men have neither used every kind of herb nor every kind of animal as food; but that, while they have, as it were, instinctively avoided certain plants as injurious to health or destructive to life, they have also had a horror naturalis (i.e., an inexplicable disgust) at many of the animals, and have avoided their flesh as unclean. A similar horror must have been produced upon man from the very first, before his heart was altogether hardened by death as the wages of sin, or rather by the effects of death, viz., the decomposition of the body; and different diseases and states of the body, that were connected with symptoms of corruption and decomposition, may also have been regarded as rendering unclean. Hence, in all nations and all the religion of antiquity, we find that contrast between clean and unclean, which was developed in a dualistic form, it is true, in many of the religious systems, but had its primary root in the corruption that had entered the world through sin” (K. & D., Com., on Lev. 11).

This contrast between clean and unclean was limited by Moses to three particulars: (1) food; (2) contact with dead bodies, human and animal; (3) bodily conditions and diseases. The law pointed out most minutely the unclean objects and various defilements within these spheres, and prescribed the means for avoiding or removing them. Here the subject will be treated as follows: (1) causes of uncleanness; (2) disabilities of uncleanness; (3) purification from uncleanness.

Causes of Uncleanness. Certain foods, contact with a dead body, and certain bodily conditions and diseases rendered a person ceremonially unclean.

Food. Certain articles of diet were prohibited as causing uncleanness. These were things strangled or dead of themselves or through beasts or birds of prey; whatever beast did not both divide the hoof and chew the cud; and certain other smaller animals rated as “swarming things”; certain classes of birds mentioned in Lev. 11, and Deut. 14, twenty or twenty-one in all; whatever in the waters had not both fins and scales; whatever winged insect had not also four legs, the two hind legs for leaping; in addition to things offered in sacrifice to idols; and all blood, or whatever contained it (except, perhaps, the blood of fish, as would appear from that only of beast and bird being forbidden, Lev. 7:26) and, therefore, flesh cut from a live animal; as also all fat, at any rate that about the intestines, and probably wherever discernible and separable among the flesh (3:13–17; 7:23). The eating of blood was prohibited even to “the aliens” (17:10). Besides these, there was the prohibition against boiling a kid in its mother’s milk (Ex. 23:19; 34:26; Deut. 14:21). Thus it will be seen that all animals are unclean that bear the image of sin, of death, and corruption, e.g., all larger land animals, all ravenous beasts that lie in wait for life or tear and devour the living; all winged creatures, not only birds of prey, but all marsh birds and others, which live on worms, carrion, and all sorts of impurities; all serpentlike fish and slimy shellfish, and small “swarming things,” except some kinds of locusts, “because, partly, they recall the old serpent, partly they seek their food in all sorts of impurities, partly they crawl in the dust and represent corruption in the slimy character of their bodies” (Keil, Bib. Arch., 2:117–18).

Defilement by Death. The dead body of a human being, no matter whether he had been killed (Num. 19:16, 18; 31:19) or had died a natural death, had the effect of rendering unclean for seven days the tent (or house) in which the man had died, and any open vessels that were in it, as well as the persons who lived in it or happened to enter it. It was equally defiling to touch the body of anyone who had died in the open air or even to touch a dead man’s bones or a grave. When one was thus defiled the uncleanness was not confined to himself but extended to everything he touched and everyone who touched him, and all were unclean till evening (19:22).

The carcass of any animal, clean or unclean, defiled until the evening everyone who touched, carried, or ate it, so that he was required to bathe himself in water and wash his clothes before he became clean again (Lev. 11:24–28, 31, 36, 39–40; 17:15). But it was just as defiling to touch clean animals slaughtered by men, and unclean animals that had been killed by them, as it was to touch unclean animals while still alive. Eight kinds of the smaller animals (Heb. shereş, a “swarm”) are mentioned that communicated their defiling influence to inanimate objects, such as earthen pots for cooking. Such defilement occurred if they or any part of their carcasses happened to fall on or in the pots. Also, food prepared with water that had been in the pots was contaminated. So was any seed that water was put on and then it was touched by a carcass (11:32–37).

Defilement by Bodily Conditions and Diseases. (1) Leprosy (which see), either in connection with persons, dwellings, or fabrics (Lev. 13–14). (2) The discharge of seminal fluid, whether of an involuntary character (as during sleep) or such as occurred during sexual intercourse. Both alike made the man, and in the latter case the woman also, unclean till evening (15:16–18). (3) A discharge, whether the menstrual discharge of the woman, the morbid issue of blood in a woman, or a discharge in men, i.e., the discharge of mucus from the urethra (Num. 5:2). (4) Childbirth. Contact with persons in the above states or even with clothing or furniture that had been used by them while in those states involved uncleanness in a minor degree (Lev. 15:5–11, 21–24).

Disabilities of Uncleanness. Defilement by contact with a dead human body rendered the person or object unclean for seven days. Defilement from the carcass of an animal made the person or object unclean until evening. The leper was required to rend his clothes, to bare his head, to put a covering upon his upper lip, and then to cry to everyone he met, “Unclean; unclean”; besides this, he had to isolate himself by living outside the camp (or city) (Lev. 13:45–46; Num. 5:2–3; 12:10, 14–15). Houses affected with leprosy were examined by the priest, who, before entering, had all of the contents of the house removed in order to prevent everything within from becoming unclean. If symptoms of leprosy were discovered, the house was closed for seven days. After seven days the house was again examined, and if indications of leprosy were evident, the affected stones were removed, with the scrapings of the walls, and carefully replastered. If the evil broke out anew, the house was pronounced unclean, pulled down, and moved to an unclean place outside the city. Leprosy in clothes or fabrics made of linen, wool, or leather required that the article should be shut up for seven days, and if still affected it was burned (Lev. 13:47–59). Persons or objects defiled by the discharge of seminal fluid were unclean until evening; persons defiled by a discharge were removed from the camp (Num. 5:2); the menstruous woman was considered unclean for seven days, as well as the man who might have intercourse with her at this time; everything on which she lay or sat was unclean until evening (Lev. 15:19–24). A man or woman with an issue was unclean as long as the disorder lasted. They also rendered unclean anything upon which they sat or lay, or the person whom they might touch, and in the case of the man anyone upon whom his spittle might come (15:25–29). The woman at childbirth became unclean for seven days at the birth of a boy, and fourteen if it was a girl, besides being obliged to remain at home in the blood of her purifying for thirty-three days more in the former case and sixty-six in the latter. She was debarred from touching anything holy and from coming to the sanctuary (12:2–8).

Purification from Uncleanness. The regulations with respect to defilements and their corresponding purifications were not prescriptions framed with a view to the cultivation of cleanliness, tidiness, and decency—not merely sanitary regulations—but they were of a religious nature, having as their object the cultivation of holiness and spiritual life. It was owing to the well-understood connection between defilements on the one hand and sin and its consequence death on the other that the Levitical purification rites ranked side by side with the sacrifices and that they formed, quite as much as the latter, an integral part of the Mosaic ritual. The term “purification,” in its legal and technical sense, is applied to the ritual observances whereby an Israelite was formally absolved from the taint of uncleanness, whether evidenced by any overt act or state or whether connected with man’s natural depravity.

The following regulations respecting purification are given in the law:

Of Those Defiled by Contact with the Dead. The medium appointed in such cases was a kind of sprinkling water, composed of running water and the ashes of a sin offering specially suited to the occasion (Num. 19). A heifer, without blemish, and that had never been yoked, was slaughtered outside the camp. Eleazar was to dip his finger in the blood and sprinkle it seven times toward the sanctuary. The entire heifer was then burned in the presence of the priest, who cast cedar wood, hyssop, and scarlet wool into the flames. The ashes were then carried by a man free from defilement to a clean place outside the camp, where they were stored for use as occasion might require. A man free from defilement took some of these ashes, put them into a vessel, and then poured some fresh running water over them. Dipping a bunch of hyssop into the mixture, he sprinkled it upon the person to be purified, both on the third and the seventh day. On the latter day, after atonement had been made, the person being purified was required to wash his clothes and bathe himself in water, after which he became clean on the evening of that day. The tent in which the corpse had lain, as well as the furniture that it contained, were all sprinkled with this same water and were thus purified (vv. 12, 17–19).

Of Those Recovered from Leprosy. The ceremonial for the purifications is based upon the idea that his malady is the bodily symbol not so much of sin as of death. “As being a decomposing of the juices of the body, as a putrefying and dropping off of its members, as being the presence of corruption in the living body, leprosy forms the counterpart of death.... Consequently the person affected with this disease was required to display the tokens of his intimate association with death in the kind of dress he wore, in his shaved head, and in his rent garments; and hence it was, too, that he was excluded not merely from the pale of the sanctuary, but was even debarred from all intercourse whatever with the covenant people, called as it was to a holy nation” (Keil, Bib. Arch., 1:393).

The rites are described in Lev. 14:4–32. The two stages of the proceedings indicated were these: the first, which took place outside the camp, the readmission of the leper to the community of men; the second, before the sanctuary, his readmission to communion with God. In the first stage the slaughter of the one bird and the dismissal of the other symbolized the punishment of death deserved and fully remitted. In the second, the use of oil and its application to the same parts of the body as in the consecration of priests (8:23–24) symbolized the rededication of the leper to the service of Jehovah. The ceremonies to be observed in the purification of a house or a garment infected with leprosy were identical with the first stage of the proceedings used for the leper (14:33–53).

Of Those Defiled by Sexual Discharges. Such purification was, in every instance, effected by bathing the body and washing the objects defiled in running water, the purifying medium of nature’s own providing. If, however, the state of defilement lasted longer than seven days, as in the case of those suffering from an issue of blood, a discharge of mucus from the urethra, or childbirth, then a sin offering and a burnt offering were added to the washing with water. These were offered at a certain period after the healing and the washing—those suffering from an issue of blood or a mucus discharge, and the leper after his first cleansing, at seven days; in the case of childbirth it was thirty-three or sixty-six days. In those cases where the defilement lasted more than a week, communion with the Lord could only be secured by the offering of a sin offering (of a pigeon) and a burnt offering (a lamb).

The necessity of purification was extended in the post-Babylonian period to a variety of unauthorized cases. Cups and pots, bronze vessels, and couches were washed as a matter of ritual observance (Mark 7:4). The washing of the hands before meals was conducted in a formal manner (v. 3), and minute regulations were laid down on this subject in a treatise of the Mishna entitled Yadaim. What may have been the specific causes of uncleanness in those who came up to purify themselves before the Passover (John 11:55), or in those who had taken upon themselves the Nazirite’s vow (Acts 21:24, 26), we are not informed; in either case it may have been contact with a corpse, though in the latter it would rather appear to have been a general purification preparatory to the accomplishment of the vow. In conclusion it may be observed that the distinctive feature in the Mosaic rites of purification is their expiatory character. The idea of uncleanness was not peculiar to the Jew. But with all other nations simple ablution sufficed—no sacrifices were demanded. The Jew alone was taught, by the use of expiatory offerings, to discern to its full extent the connection between the outward sign and the inward fount of impurity.

UNDEFILED. In the NT “undefiled” is the rendering of the Gk. amiantos, “not defiled,” i.e., free from that by which the nature of a thing is deformed or its force and vigor impaired. Thus Jesus was undefiled (Heb 7:26; “blameless,” NIV), i.e., pure from sin. The undefiled bed (13:4; “pure,” NIV) is one free from adultery. A religion that is sincere and undefiled (James 1:27) and the inheritance that is imperishable and undefiled (1 Pet. 1:4) are also mentioned. In the OT the KJV uses this term to speak of the morally sound man in Ps. 119:1 and of the pure bride in Song of Sol. 5:2 and 6:9 (NASB and NIV call the man “blameless,” and the bride “perfect one” and “flawless one” and “perfect one” respectively).

UNDERGIRDING. See Ship.

UNDERSETTERS (Heb. kātēp, a “shoulder,” usually so rendered). These were part of the laver in Solomon’s Temple as described in 1 Kings 7:30, 34, KJV. The NIV renders “supports” and “handles.”

UNEDUCATED (Gk. agrammatos, “unlettered”). Illiterate, without learning (Acts 4:13).

UNGIFTED (Gk. idiōtēs), a “private” person, i.e., an “unlearned, illiterate” man (1 Cor. 14:16, 23–24), as opposed to the educated.

UNICORN. See Animal Kingdom: Wild Ox.

UNITY (Heb. yaḥad, adverb “unitedly”). Used to signify a oneness of sentiment, affection, or behavior, such as should exist among the people of God (Ps. 133:1). The “unity of the faith” (Eph. 4:13; Gk. henotēs, “oneness”) is the unanimity of belief in the same great truths of God, and the possession of the grace of faith in a similar form and degree.

UNKNOWN GOD (Gk. agnōstos theos, “unknown god”). The inscription observed by Paul upon an altar in Athens (Acts 17:23), which he ingeniously noted in his speech before the people as an instance of their religiousness. This was not addressed to the philosophers; they did not dedicate altars to unknown gods but regarded all such proceedings as the mere superstition of the vulgar. Pausanius (1.1.4) and Philostratus (Vit. Appolon. 6.2) both mention “unknown gods,” and it is evident from both passages that at Athens there were several altars so inscribed. “It is related that Epimenides put an end to a plague in Athens by causing black and white sheep, which he had let loose on the Areopagus, to be sacrificed on the spots where they lay down, to the god concerned, yet not known by name, viz., who was the author of the plague; and that therefore one may find in Athens altars without the designation of a god by name. From this particular instance the general view may be derived, that on important occasions, when the reference to a god known by name was wanting, as in public calamities of which no definite god could be assigned as the author, in order to honor or propitiate the god concerned by sacrifice, without lighting upon a wrong one, altars were erected which were destined and designated agnōsto theō (unknown god)” (Meyer, Com.).

UNKNOWN TONGUE (1 Cor. 14:2, 4, 13, 14, 19, 27). This is a gloss by the KJV, because the Gk. has simply glōssa (“tongue”). It was obviously a different language from the speaker’s native one (Mark 16:17; Acts 2:4). See Tongues, gift of.

UNLEARNED. See Uneducated.

UNLEAVENED BREAD (Heb. maṣṣâ, “sweet”; Gk. azumos). Bread baked from unfermented dough, or (NIV) without yeast (Gen. 19:3; Judg. 6:19; 1 Sam. 28:24). This was formally presented for the Paschal (Passover) cakes (Ex. 12:8, 15, 20; 13:3, 6–7) and thus became a symbol of the festival popularly called “the feast of unleavened bread.” See Leaven; Festivals; Sacrifices.

UN’NI (ū’ni; “afflicted” or perhaps “answered”).

1. A relative of Heman the singer, who with other Levites was appointed, by order of King David, to perform in the Tabernacle service (1 Chron. 15:18, 20), about 986 B.C.

2. A Levite employed in the musical service of the Temple after the return from captivity (Neh. 12:9), 535 B.C. This name should be written Unno.

UNTEMPERED MORTAR. See Mineral Kingdom: Mortar.

UPHAR´SIN (ū-far´sin). See Mene.

U´PHAZ (ū´fāz). The name of a famous gold region (Jer. 10:9; Dan. 10:5), it is thought by many to be a corruption of Ophir (which see); but Orelli (Com., on Jer. 10:9) says: "It is inconceivable that the word arose by error from this well-known name. Assyria and Babylon might have other gold mines. Still the views respecting the site of this Uphaz remain mere conjectures."

UPPER CHAMBER or ROOM (Heb. ālīyâ, "lofty"; 1 Kings 17:19, 23; 2 Kings 1:2; 23:12; 1 Chron. 28:11; 2 Chron. 3:9; Judg. 3:23, "roof chamber"; 2 Sam. 18:33, "chamber over the gate"; Gk. anōgeon; Mark 14:15; Luke 22:12; huperoon, "upper," Acts 1:13; 9:37, 39; 20:8). A room in the upper part of the house, used to receive company, hold feasts, and retire for meditation and prayer (Mark 14:15; Luke 22:12). Among the Hebrews it seems to have been on or connected with the flat roofs of their dwellings; in Greek houses it occupied the upper story (1 Kings 17:19, 23; 2 Kings 4:10; Acts 1:13; 9:37, 39; 10:9; 20:8). Rich, luxury-loving men were charged with sinfully multiplying chambers of this sort (Jer. 22:13–14). They were used as a "cool roof chamber" (Judg. 3:20; cf. 2 Kings 1:2; 23:12). In Scripture the lower portion was the winter house, the upper room was the summer house; or, if on the same story, the outer apartment is the summer house, the inner is the winter house.

UR (ūr; "light"). Mentioned in 1 Chron. 11:35 as the father of Eliphaz, one of David's "mighty men," before 1000 B.C. There is evident confusion at this point in the genealogical list, both here and in the parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:34). Hephher must either be regarded as another name for Ur or else omitted as an error in copying. The phrase "the son of" should be erased from 2 Sam. 23:34, and Ahasbai and Ur might then be identified.

For the city, see Ur of the Chaldees.

UR´BANUS (ūr-ba´nus; Gk. Urbanon from Lat. Urbanus; "urbane, polite, of the city"; KJV, "Urbane"). A Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent salutations, as having been his associate in labor, "our fellow worker in Christ" (Rom. 16:9).

U´RI (ū´ri; an abbreviation of Urijah).

1. The father of Bezalel, one of the architects of the Tabernacle. He was of the tribe of Judah, and son of Hur (Ex. 31:2; 35:30; 38:22; 1 Chron. 2:20; 2 Chron. 1:5), before 1440 B.C.
2. The father of Geber, Solomon's deputy in Gilead (1 Kings 4:19), before 960 B.C.
3. One of the Temple gatekeepers who put away his Gentile wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:24), 456 B.C.

URI´AH (ū-rī´a; "Jehovah is light").

1. One of David's heroes (1 Chron. 11:41; 2 Sam. 23:39, and husband of Bathsheba. He was a Hittite. His name, however, and his manner of speech (2 Sam. 11:11) indicate that he had adopted the Jewish religion. He married Bathsheba, a woman of extraordinary beauty, the daughter of Eliam. During the time of the illicit relationship between David and his wife, Uriah was in camp with Joab. But when the king was informed by Bathsheba that she was with child by him, he ordered Uriah to come to Jerusalem on the pretext of asking news of the war—really in the hope that Uriah's return to his wife might cover his own crime. The king met with an unexpected obstacle in the austere, loyal spirit that guided Uriah's conduct and that gives a good picture of the high character and discipline of David's officers. On the morning of the third day David sent him back to the camp with a letter containing the command to Joab to cause his death in the battle. Joab was to observe the part of the wall of Rabbah-Ammon where the greatest force of the besieged was congregated and there to send Uriah. A sally took place. Uriah and the officers with him advanced as far as the gate of the city and were there shot down by the archers on the wall. Joab forewarned the messenger that if the king broke into a furious passion on hearing of the loss, the messenger should end the story with the words “Your servant Uriah the Hittite is also dead” (2 Sam. 11:24), about 980 B.C.

2. A priest in the reign of Ahaz, who is introduced in Scripture history as a witness to Isaiah’s prophecy concerning Maher-shalal-hash-baz (Isa. 8:2), about 735 B.C. He is perhaps the same as Urijah, the priest who built the idolatrous altar for King Ahaz (2 Kings 16:10–16). He was probably high priest at the time, succeeding Azariah, who was high priest in the reign of Uzziah and was succeeded by that Azariah who was high priest in the reign of Hezekiah. Hence it is likely that he was a son of the former and the father of the latter.

3. A priest of the family of Hakkoz (KJV, “Koz”) who supported Ezra while reading the law to the people (Neh. 8:4; KJV, “Urijah”), 457 B.C. He is probably the same as the father of Meremoth (Ezra 8:33; Neh. 3:4, 21).

4. The son of Shemaiah of Kiriath-jearim, who prophesied in the days of Jehoiakim. When the king sought his death he fled to Egypt, but his retreat was soon discovered. Elnathan brought him to Jehoiakim, who put him to death and cast his body among the graves of the common people (Jer. 26:20–23), about 609 B.C.

URIAS (ū-rī-as). The Gk. form of Uriah, used in Matt. 1:6, KJV. See Uriah, no. 1.

U’RIEL (ū’ri-el; “God is light”).

1. A Levite of the family of Kohath. His father’s name was Uzziah (1 Chron. 6:24).

2. Chief of the Kohathites, who assisted, with 120 of his brethren, in bringing the Ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chron. 15:5, 11), about 992 B.C.

3. Uriel of Gibeah was the father of Maacah, or Micaiah, wife of Rehoboam, and mother of Abijah (2 Chron. 13:2), before 930 B.C. In 11:20 she is called the daughter (granddaughter) of Absalom.

URI’JAH (ū-rī’ja; 2 Kings 16:10; etc.). See Uriah, no. 2.

U’RIM AND THUM’MIM (ū’rim, thum’im; “lights and perfections”). Into the breastplate of the high priest (which see) were placed “the Urim and the Thummim, and they shall be over Aaron’s heart when he goes in before the Lord” (Ex. 28:30). These formed the medium through which the high priest ascertained the will of Jehovah in regard to any important matter affecting the theocracy (Num. 27:21). Even such early writers as Josephus, Philo, and the rabbis do not furnish any precise information as to what the Urim and Thummim really were. On every side we meet confessions of ignorance.

Meaning of the Words. In Urim, Hebrew scholars, with hardly an exception, have seen the plural of ur (light or fire). The LXX translators, however, appear to have had reasons that led them to another rendering. The literal English equivalent would of course be “lights”; but the renderings in the LXX and Vulg. indicate, at least, a traditional belief among the Jews that the plural form did not involve numerical plurality.

In Thummim there also is almost a consensus as to the derivation from tōm (perfection, completeness). What has been said as to the plural of Urim applies here also. “Light and Perfection” would probably be the best English equivalent. The mere phrase, as such, leaves it therefore uncertain whether each word by itself denoted many things of a given kind, or whether the two taken together might have referred to two distinct objects or to one and the same object. In Deut. 33:8 they are named separately, “Thy Thummim and Thy Urim,” the first order being inverted. Urim is found alone in Num. 27:21; 1 Sam. 28:6; Thummim is never used by itself, unless it is in Ps. 16:5.

Scripture References. The first reference (Ex. 28:30) to these objects would seem to indicate that they needed no explanation. Inside the breastplate, as the tablets of the covenant were placed inside the Ark (25:16; 28:30), were to be placed “the Urim and the Thummim,” the Light and the Perfection; and they, too, were to be on Aaron’s heart when he went in before the Lord (28:15–30). Not a word describes them. They are mentioned as things already familiar both to Moses and the people, connected naturally with the functions of the high priest, as mediating between Jehovah and His people. The command was fulfilled (Lev. 8:8). They passed from Aaron to Eleazar with the sacred ephod and other pontificalia (Num. 20:28). They were mentioned again (27:21; Deut. 33:8–9). Once, and once only, were they mentioned by name in the history of the Judges and the monarchy (1 Sam. 28:6). There was no longer a priest with Urim and Thummim (Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65) to answer hard questions.

Theories. Some think the Urim and Thummim to have been identical with the twelve stones on the breastplate. Josephus (Ant. 3.8.9) identifies them with the sardonyses on the shoulders of the ephod and says that they were bright before a victory or when the sacrifice was acceptable, dark when any disaster was impending. “Another theory is that in the middle of the ephod, or within its folds, there was a stone or plate of gold, on which was engraved the sacred name of Jehovah; and that by virtue of this, fixing his gaze on it, or reading an invocation which was also engraved with the name, or standing in his ephod before the mercy seat, or at least before the veil of the sanctuary, he became capable of prophesying, hearing the divine voice within, or listening to it as it proceeded in articulate sounds from the glory of the Shekinah.”

Michaelis (Laws of Moses, 5:52) gives his opinion that the Urim and Thummim were three stones, on one of which was written Yes, on another No, whereas the third was left neutral or blank. These were used as lots, and the high priest decided according as the one or the other was drawn out. Kalisch (on Ex. 28:31) identifies the Urim and the Thummim with the twelve tribal gems. He looks on the name as one to be explained by an hendiadys (light and perfection—perfect illumination) and believes the high priest, by concentrating his thoughts on the attributes they represented, to have divested himself of all selfishness and prejudice and so to have passed into a true prophetic state. The process of consulting Jehovah by Urim and Thummim is not given in Scripture.

UR OF THE CHALDEES. Abraham’s native city customarily is located in southern Babylonia, not very far from the ancient city of Uruk to the NE and about 150 miles from the head of the Persian Gulf. Eridu is to the SW. Modern excavation of the site of Ur began in 1854 with J. E. Taylor. The city was then only a ruined site named the Mound of Bitumen (Arab. al muqayyar). In 1918 H. R. Hall resumed excavations. Sir Leonard Woolley conducted excavations from 1922 to 1934. The famous royal cemeteries, dating c. 2500 B.C., yielded jewelry and art treasures of unbelievable beauty, particularly gorgeous head attire, personal jewels, and a golden tumbler and cup of Queen Puabi (formerly rendered Shubad). Several musical instruments and other beautifully crafted objects demonstrate that this city had achieved a high level of civilization 500 years before Abraham. The Heb. Bible is quite clear in its statements that Abraham’s home was originally in Lower Mesopotamia in the city of Ur and that he emigrated to Haran and Upper Mesopotamia on his way to Canaan (Gen. 11:28–31; 12:1–4; 15:7; Neh. 9:7). Interestingly enough, Ur in connection with Abraham is referred to as “Ur of the Chaldeans.” The qualifying phrase “of the Chaldeans” is not an anachronism, as many critics contend (cf. Jack Finegan, Light from the Ancient East, p. 57, n. 28). It is rather an instance of numerous archaic place names being defined by a later scribal gloss to make clear to a subsequent age where and what these places were when their history and locality had been forgotten. The Chaldeans came into southern Babylonia after 1000 B.C. It was, of course, quite natural for the Hebrew scribe to define the then incomprehensible foreign name by a term intelligible to his own day. As a result of archaeological excavation, the city of Ur is now one of the best-known sites of southern Babylonia. Woolley in his Abraham: Recent Discoveries and Hebrew Origins (1936), pp. 72–117, gives a description of the worship of the city god of Ur, the moon god Nannar and his consort Ningal. Woolley describes in minute detail the sacred temenos of the city in which were the famous ziggurat and the various buildings erected to the moon god and his consort, with a description of the moon god ritual. It is now possible to have a far clearer idea of Abraham's surroundings when "the God of glory appeared to our father Abraham when he was in Mesopotamia, before he lived in Haran" (Acts 7:2). Archaeology has revealed that in Abraham's day Ur was a great and prosperous city, with perhaps 360,000 people living in the city and its suburbs. The biblical chronology as preserved in the MT would place the life of Abraham, at least in part, under the new Sumero-Akkadian Empire of Ur-Nammu, the founder of the strong Third Dynasty of Ur (c. 2070–1960 B.C.).

It should be noted, however, that other scholarship points to a northern location for the Ur from which Abraham came. Mesopotamian literature mentions this "northern Ur," as attested in the archival materials at Alalakh, Ugarit, Hattusha, and Ebla, although its precise location is unknown. (See Abraham.) Third Dynasty kings took the new title "king of Sumer and Akkad." The greatest work of Ur-Nammu was the erection of the great ziggurat at Ur, upon which Abraham gazed, as did Joseph upon the pyramids in Egypt. Happily, the ziggurat at Ur is the best-preserved type of this characteristic architectural feature of early Babylonia. The resurrection of Ur offers a fine example of archaeology's increasing ability to illustrate ancient biblical history.

USURY (Heb. neshek, a "biting," i.e., "extortion"; Gk. tokos, a "yield"). Used in the sense of interest for money and does not necessarily imply the demand for exorbitant increase. According to the Mosaic law, the Israelites were forbidden to take usury from their brethren upon the loan of money, food, or anything else, i.e., they were not upon the return of the loan to demand anything more (Lev. 25:36–37; Deut. 23:19–20; etc.), although interest might be taken from foreigners (v. 20). Because the Israelites were not a commercial people, money was not often loaned for the purpose of business, but rather to aid the struggling poor. This last is the only kind of usury forbidden in the law, and the avoiding of this is sometimes given among the characteristics of the godly man (Ps. 15:5; Jer. 15:10; cf. Prov. 28:8).

The practice of mortgaging lands, sometimes at exorbitant interest, grew up among the Jews during the captivity, in direct violation of the law (Lev. 25:36; Ezek. 18:8, 13, 17); and Nehemiah exacted an oath to insure its discontinuance (Neh. 5:3–13). Jesus denounced all extortion, and proclaimed a new law of love and forbearance (Luke 6:30, 35). The taking of usury in the sense of a reasonable rate of interest for the use of money employed in trade is different and is nowhere forbidden; it is referred to in the NT as a perfectly understood and allowable practice (Matt. 25:27; Luke 19:23).

U'THAI (ū'thī).

1. The son of Ammihud, of the sons of Perez, the son of Judah. He resided at Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (1 Chron. 9:4).

2. One of the sons of Bigvai, who returned with seventy males in the second caravan with Ezra (Ezra 8:14), about 457 B.C.

UZ (ūz).

1. A son of Aram (Gen. 10:23; 1 Chron. 1:17), and a grandson of Shem.
2. A son of Nahor, by Milcah (Gen. 22:21; KJV, “Huz”).
3. A son of Dishan, and grandson of Seir (Gen. 36:28).

4. The land of Uz was the country in which Job lived (Job 1:1). The LXX renders it en chōra tē Auitidi, and Ptolemy (5.19.2) says that the Aisitai, i.e., the Uzzites, dwelt in the Arabian Desert, W from Babylon, under the Caucabenes and adjacent to the Edomites of Mt. Seir, who at one period occupied Uz, probably as conquerors (Lam. 4:21). The position of the country may further be deduced from the native lands of Job’s friends—Eliphaz, the Temanite, being an Edomite; Elihu, the Buzite, probably a neighbor of the Chaldeans; and Bildad, the Shuhite, being one of the Bene-Kedem. “The land of Uz” is mentioned in only two other passages of Scripture; it is grouped by Jeremiah (Jer. 25:20) with Egypt, Philistia, Edom, and Moab, but in Lam. 4:21 he identifies it with a portion of Edom or affirms that some of the Edomites in his day inhabited Uz.

U’ZAI (ū’zī). The father of Palal, one of those who assisted in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:25), before 447 B.C.

U’ZAL (ū’zal; derivation uncertain). The sixth of the thirteen sons of Joktan, a descendant of Shem (Gen. 10:27; 1 Chron. 1:21). Authorities quite generally agree that Sanaa, the metropolis of Yemen, is the modern name of Uzal founded by this person.

UZ’ZA (ūz’a; “strength”).

1. Apparently the proprietor of (or the person after whom was named) the garden in which Manasseh and Amon were buried (2 Kings 21:18, 26), before 643 B.C.
2. The son of Shimei (1 Chron. 6:29, KJV; Uzzah, NASB, NIV). See Uzzah, no. 2.
3. The older of the two sons of Ehud the Benjamite, born to him after the removal of his former children (1 Chron. 8:7).
4. The “sons of Uzza” were a family of Temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:49; Neh. 7:51), before 536 B.C.

UZ’ZAH (ūz’a; “strength”).

1. One of the sons of Abinadab of Kiriath-jearim. He, with his brother Ahio, accompanied the Ark when David sought to move it to Jerusalem. When the procession had reached the threshing floor of Nacon, the oxen drawing the cart upon which the Ark was placed stumbled. Uzzah, who was walking beside it, put out his hand to prevent its falling. He died immediately, being struck by God on account of his offense. The event caused a profound reaction, and David, fearing to carry the Ark any farther, had it placed in the house of Obed-edom (2 Sam. 6:3–10; 1 Chron. 13:7, 9–11), about 988 B.C.

Why was Uzzah so severely punished? This is a question variously answered. We think the following answer correct: “According to Num., ch. 4, the ark was not only to be moved by none but Levites, but it was to be carried on the shoulders; and in v. 15 even the Levites were expressly forbidden to touch it on pain of death. But instead of taking these instructions as their rule, they had followed the example of the Philistines when they sent back the ark (1 Sam. 6:7, sq.), and had placed it upon a new cart and directed Uzzah to drive it, while, as his conduct on the occasion clearly shows, he had no idea of the unapproachable holiness of the ark of God, and had to expiate his offense with his life, as a warning to all the Israelites” (K. & D., Com., ad loc.).

2. A Levite of the sons of Merari, the son of Shimei, and father of Shimea (1 Chron. 6:29).

UZ'ZEN-SHEE'RAH (ūz'en-shē'ra; Uzzen-sheerah, KJV). A place near Beth-horon, founded or rebuilt by Sheerah, an Ephraimitess (1 Chron. 7:24) and probably an heiress who had received these places as her inheritance. The place Uzzen-sheerah is not elsewhere referred to.

UZ'ZI (ūz'i; "strong").

1. Son of Bukki, and father of Zerachiah, in the line of the high priests (1 Chron. 6:5, 51; Ezra 7:4). Josephus relates that after high priesthood was removed from the family of Eleazar and given to Eli, of the family of Ithamar, either after the service of Bukki's father, Abishua (Ant. 8.1.3), or after the service of Bukki's son, Ozi (5.11.5; "Uzzi," KJV, NASB, NIV; in this passage Josephus gives the name of Bukki's father as Abiezar).

2. Son of Tola, the son of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2–3).

3. Son of Bela, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:7).

4. The son of Michri and father of Elah, among the ancestors of a Benjamite house that settled at Jerusalem after the return from captivity (1 Chron. 9:8), before 536 B.C.

5. A Levite, son of Bani, and overseer of the Levites dwelling at Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:22), 536 B.C.

6. A priest, chief of the division of Jedaiiah, in the time of Joiakim the high priest (Neh. 12:19). He is probably the same as one of the priests who assisted Ezra in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (12:42), about 500 B.C.

UZZI'A (ū-zī'a; probably for "Uzziah"), the "Ashterathite" (i.e., from Ashtaroth, beyond Jordan), who was one of David's warriors (1 Chron. 11:44), after 1000 B.C.

UZZI'AH (ū-zī'a; "Jehovah is strength").

1. The tenth king of Judah. In some passages his name appears in the lengthened form Azariah, which Gesenius attributes to an error of the copyists. This is possible, but there are other instances of the princes of Judah changing their names on succeeding to the throne. His father was Amaziah, who was slain by conspirators.

After the murder of Amaziah, his son Uzziah, who had been coregent since the age of sixteen, occupied the throne alone (2 Kings 14:21; 2 Chron. 26:1), 767 B.C. He began his reign by a successful expedition against his father's enemies the Edomites who had revolted from Judah in Jehoram's time, eighty years before, and penetrated as far as the head of the Gulf of Aqaba, where he took the important place of Elath (2 Kings 14:22). Uzziah waged other victorious wars in the S, especially against the Mehunim, or people of Maân, and the Arabs of Gurbaal. Toward the W Uzziah fought with equal success against the Philistines, leveled to the ground the walls of Gath, Jabneh, and Ashdod, and founded new fortified cities in the Philistine territory.

Uzziah strengthened the walls of Jerusalem and was a great patron of agriculture. He never deserted the worship of the true God and was much influenced by Zechariah, a prophet who is only mentioned in connection with him (2 Chron. 26:5). So the Southern Kingdom was raised to a condition of prosperity that it had not known since the death of Solomon. During his reign an earthquake occurred that was apparently very serious in its consequences, for it is alluded to as a chronological epoch by Amos (Amos 1:1) and by Zechariah (Zech. 14:5) as a natural disaster from which the people "fled."

The end of Uzziah was less prosperous than his beginning. Elated with his splendid career, he determined to burn incense on the altar of God but was opposed by the high priest Azariah and eighty others (see Ex. 30:7–8; Num. 16:40; 18:7). The king was enraged at their resistance. As he pressed forward with his censer, he was suddenly struck with leprosy; "and king Uzziah was a leper to the day of his death.” Uzziah was buried “with his fathers,” but apparently not actually in the royal sepulchers (2 Chron. 26:21, 23), about 740 B.C.

The great Assyrian conqueror Tiglath-pileser’s westward advance in 743 B.C. called for a new Syrian-Palestinian coalition to resist the Assyrian danger. The natural leader of such an alliance was Judah under Uzziah (Azariah). This king headed by far the strongest and most influential state in Syria-Palestine at the time (2 Kings 14:21–22; 2 Chron. 26; Stanley Cook, The Cambridge Ancient History, 3:378). He was far more powerful than Menahem of Israel and Rezin of Damascus, both of whom evidently had to pay tribute to the Assyrians. It is not surprising, therefore, that Tiglath-pileser should make clear reference in his annals to Azriyau of Yaudu in connection with what is obviously a reference to an anti-Syrian coalition (D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, 1, sect. 7: 70; Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings [1951], p. 78). Azariah’s disappearance from the Assyrian records with no hint of his fate except that the far-reaching coalition he headed was broken up by the military power of Tiglath-pileser III would point to the conclusion that shortly thereafter he died, probably not later than 742 B.C., in any case before the Assyrians could take punitive action against him. M.F.U.

2. A Kohathite Levite, and ancestor of Samuel (1 Chron. 6:24), perhaps 1300 B.C.
3. Father of Jonathan, one of David’s overseers (1 Chron. 27:25), before 1000 B.C.
4. Father of Athaiah, or Uthai, a resident in Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh. 11:4), before 536 B.C.
5. A priest of the sons of Harim, who had taken a foreign wife in the days of Ezra (Ezra 10:21), 456 B.C. M.F.U.

UZZI’EL (ū-zī’el; “God is strength”).

1. Fourth son of Kohath, father of Mishael, Elzaphan, or Elizaphan, and Zithri, and uncle to Aaron (Ex. 6:18, 22; Lev. 10:4), before 1440 B.C.
2. A Simeonite leader, son of Ishi, in the days of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:42), about 712 B.C.
3. Head of a Benjamite house, of the sons of Bela (1 Chron. 7:7).
4. A musician of the sons of Heman, in David’s reign (1 Chron. 25:4).
5. A Levite of the sons of Jeduthun, who took an active part in purifying the Temple in the days of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:14–19), 719 B.C.
6. Son of Harhaiah, probably a priest in the days of Nehemiah, who took part in repairing the wall (Neh. 3:8). He is described as being “of the goldsmiths,” i.e., of those priests whose hereditary office was to repair or make the sacred vessels, about 445 B.C.

UZZI’ELITE (ū-zī’e-līt). A descendant of Uzziel the Levite. In David’s time the Uzzielites numbered 112 adult males (Num. 3:27; 1 Chron. 15:10; 26:23).

V

VAIN, VANITY.

1. Something vain, empty, fruitless, worthless (Job 9:29; 21:34; Jer. 10:3, 8, see marg.; Zech. 10:2), Heb. hebel, “a breath”; specifically of idols (2 Kings 17:15; Ps. 31:6; Jonah 2:8). The NIV usually translates this Heb. word as “worthless.” A nothingness, an empty thing (Prov. 22:8; Heb. awen, “a panting”; “trouble,” NIV).

2. Heb. shāw has the meaning of “desolation”; so “months of vanity” (Job 7:3; “futility,” NIV) are those of calamity.

3. Gk. mataiotēs corresponds to shāw and means that which is devoid of truth and appropriateness (2 Pet. 2:18; “empty,” NIV); elsewhere “futility,” or “frustration” (Rom. 8:20; Eph. 4:17).

VAIZA'THA (vī-za'tha; from Old Pers., “son of the atmosphere”). One of the ten sons of Haman, whom the Jews slew in Susa (Esther 9:9), after 480 B.C.

VALLEY. The rendering of the following Heb. and Gk. words:

1. Rather a plain than a valley, wider than the latter, but, like it, surrounded by mountains (Heb. biq'â, “a split”). It denotes a wide alluvial bottom, and its levelness is referred to in Isa. 40:4; usually rendered “valley” (Deut. 8:7; 11:11; 34:3; Josh. 11:8, 17; 12:7; Ps. 104:8; Amos 1:5; etc.), but also “plain” (Gen. 11:2; 2 Chron. 35:22; Neh. 6:2; Ezek. 3:22–23; 8:4). This Heb. term is applied to the following places: The plain of Shinar (Gen. 11:2); valley of Jericho (Deut. 34:3); valley of Lebanon (Josh. 11:17); plain of Megiddo (2 Chron. 35:22; Zech. 12:11); valley of Mizpeh (Josh. 11:8); plain of Ono (Neh. 6:2); valley of Aven (Amos 1:5).

2. A long, broad sweep between parallel ranges of hills of less extent than no. 1, corresponding quite closely to our idea in general of a valley in its usual sense (Heb. ēmeq, “a deep place”). It is applied to the following localities: valley of Achor (Josh. 7:24, 26; 15:7; Isa. 65:10; Hos. 2:15); valley of Aijalon (Josh. 10:12); valley of Hebron (Gen. 37:14); valley of Jehoshaphat (Joel 3:2, 12), called (v. 14) figuratively the valley of decision; valley of Jezreel (Josh. 17:16; Judg. 6:33; Hos. 1:5). This term is sometimes used as an appellative for certain well-known localities, e.g., the valley of weeping (Ps. 84:6, “valley of Baca,” see marg.); the valley of blessing (2 Chron. 20:26, “valley of Beracah,” see marg.); valley of the oak (1 Sam. 17:2, 19; 21:9, “valley of Elah”); valley of giants (Josh. 15:8; 18:16; 2 Sam. 5:18, 22; etc., “valley of Rephaim”); valley of Shaveh (Gen. 14:17), or the King's Valley (14:17; 2 Sam. 18:18); valley of the slime pits (Gen. 14:3, 8, 10, “valley of Siddim”); the valley of booths (Pss. 60:6; 108:7, “valley of Succoth”); etc.

NIV New International Version

Pers. Persian

3. A deep, narrow ravine with a stream in the bottom, either between hills or through an open plain (Heb. gê, or gê, “a gorge”): the valley of Hinnom (Josh. 15:8; 18:16; Neh. 11:30), or of the son of Hinnom (Josh. 15:8; 18:16; 2 Kings 23:10; etc., KJV; Ben-hinnom, NASB; Ben Hinnom, NIV), the ravine on the southwestern side of Jerusalem, whence the term Gehenna; the valley of Iphtahel, a ravine between Zebulun and Asher (Josh. 19:14, 27); the valley of Zephathah, a ravine in the tribe of Simeon (2 Chron. 14:10); the valley of Gedor, another ravine in Simeon (1 Chron. 4:39); the valley of Hamon-gog (Ezek. 39:11, 15), or of the passers-by (v. 11), a ravine on the E of the Sea of Galilee; the valley of the craftsmen (1 Chron. 4:14, marg.), a ravine in a ravine near Jerusalem; the valley of salt (2 Sam. 8:13; 2 Kings 14:7; 1 Chron. 18:12; 2 Chron. 25:11; Ps. 60, title), a ravine on the southwestern shore of the Dead Sea; the valley of Zeboim (1 Sam. 13:18), in the tribe of Benjamin. Others, such as the valley of vision (Isa. 22:1, 5), of the Slaughter (Jer. 7:32; 19:6), are fanciful names; and still more poetical is the valley of the shadow of death (Ps. 23:4).

4. Wadi (Heb. naḥal, “receiving”; sometimes “brook,” “river,” “stream”). Wadi expresses as no English word can the bed of a stream (often wide and shelving, and like a “valley” in character, which in the rainy season may be nearly filled by a foaming torrent, though for the greater part of the year dry) and the stream itself that after the subsidence of the rains has shrunk to insignificant dimensions. Many of the wadis of Syria, owing to the demolition of the trees that formerly shaded the country and prevented too rapid evaporation after rain, are now entirely and constantly dry. As Palestine is emphatically a land of wadis, so this Heb. term frequently occurs in the Bible. Stanley enumerated these water courses or torrent beds—those of Gerar, of Eshcol, of Zered, of Arnon, of Jabbok, of Kanah, of Kishon, of Besor, of Sorek, of Kidron, of Gaash, of Cherith, of Gad. This last could not be distinguished by a mere English reader from the “river of Egypt,” the Nile, although in the original an entirely different word is used.

VALLEY, THE KING’S. See Shaveh, Valley of.

VALLEY GATE (Heb. shaar haggay). An entrance at the northwestern end of Jerusalem (Neh. 2:13; 3:13; cf. 2 Chron. 26:9; 33:14), probably corresponding to the present Jaffa gate.

VANIAH (va-nī’a). One of the sons of Bani, and an Israelite who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:36), 456 B.C.

VASH’TI (vash’tē). The wife of Xerxes (or, KJV, Ahasuerus [which see]), king of Persia. She refused to humiliate herself before the king’s courtiers and was therefore deposed in favor of Esther (Esther 1:3–22). E.H.M.

VAULT (Heb. hûg). “It is He who sits above the vault of the earth” (Isa. 40:22; NIV, “circle”). The same word is applied in Job 22:14 to the heavens, which the ancients supposed to be a hollow sphere. The figure then is of Jehovah sitting or walking above the heavens, which were thought to arch over the earth. The KJV renders the Heb. word “circle” and “circuit.”

VAV (v) (vav). The Heb. letter waw, sixth in the alphabet. It stands at the beginning of each verse in the original of Ps. 119:41–48.

VEGETABLE KINGDOM. The flora of Syria and Palestine is very rich. The phaenogamous plants and higher cryptogams are distributed through 124 orders, 850 genera, and about 3,500 species, with many well-characterized varieties. Only one hundred names of plants are given in the Bible. Of these thirty-six cannot be determined with certainty. Of the sixty-four that are determinable, thirty-five are cultivated. Of the identity of most of these, as wheat, barley, flax, olives, vines, figs, etc., there can be no doubt. Of the wild plants mentioned, some, as algum, lign aloes, etc., are exotics, of which it is impossible to determine with certainty the species. Others, as chestnut, juniper, hemlock, mulberry, poplar, rose of Sharon, are mistranslations. Others, as reed, thistle, thorn, refer to plants agreeing in mode of growth rather than ordinal or generic relationships, and are the equivalent of a number of Heb. words, the generic or specific signification of which has been lost. Others still, as the lily, are ordinal for all plants of a given type. The effort, therefore, to construct a scriptural flora, accurate and precise in its details, must be abandoned, and each name of a plant treated on its own merits.

Acacia (Heb. shittâ; shittîm). A tree, of which two species, Acacia seyal, Del., and A. tortilis, Hayne, grow in the deserts of Sinai and et-Tih, and around the Dead Sea. The wood is hard, very heavy, indestructible by insects, of a fine and beautiful grain, and thus suitable in every way for the construction of the framework and furniture of the Tabernacle. It also yields the officinal gum arabic. Shittim, Abel-shittim, and the valley of Shittim were named from this tree. Acacia (seyal) is remarkably luxuriant in dry places, sometimes attaining a height of twenty feet. It is adorned with lovely yellow flowers. Its insect-resisting wood was used also for tanning leather, for fuel, and for parts of mummy cases. M.F.U.

Al'gum (al'gum), or Almug Trees. There is no reason to doubt the identity of the algum and the almug, as is proved by a comparison of 1 Kings 10:11 and 2 Chron. 9:10. As to the algum trees "from Lebanon" (2:8), they may have been the same as those that were imported from Ophir. In this case they may have then been indigenous, or cultivated, and have since become extinct; or they may have been another sort of tree called by the same name, as in the case with many other trees. There is no necessity for supposing an interpolation, nor even for inferring, as some have done, that "from Lebanon" refers to cedar trees and cypress trees only, and not to algums. We have no means of determining with certainty what tree was intended. The weight of authority is in favor of the red sandalwood, but not a particle of evidence exists. As now seen in commerce, it is not suitable either for steps (9:11) or for "supports" (1 Kings 10:12), more properly balustrades, or for lyres and harps. Since Josephus says algum wood resembles the wood of the fig tree, but is whiter and has a brighter sheen, it may be the Sabtalum album, a native of India and used in India and China as an odiferous substance to perfume temples and houses of Sanskrit valgu, valgum.

Al'mond (al'mond; Heb. shâqēd, "the awakening one," probably from its early blossoming). A tree very much resembling the peach in form and blossom; it is only another species of the same genus. Its flowers appear as early as February, or even January. The almond is diffused by culture from China to Spain, on both sides of the Mediterranean, in the S of England, and in southern portions of the United States. There is no region, however, where it thrives better than in Syria.

The almond tree blossoms toward the end of January or the beginning of February, before the coming of the leaves, so that the appearance of a tree in full bloom is striking. Although the blossoms are tinged with pink, the general effect is white. The fruit is eaten in two stages, the first the tender, acidulous, unripe, crisp pod, and the other the ripe almonds, so familiar everywhere. There are four species of wild almonds in the Bible lands. The Heb. name of the almond is the “waker,” in allusion to its being the first of the fruit trees to awake in the winter and put forth its luxuriant blossoms. This tree is referred to by Jacob when he tells his sons to take into Egypt “some of the best products of the land . . . and almonds” (Gen. 43:11). In Eccles. (12:5), “the almond tree blossoms,” doubtless refers to the profuse flowering and white appearance of the tree when in full bloom and before the leaves appear (Jer. 1:11–12). In Num. 17:8 the rod of Aaron is described as having “sprouted and put forth buds and produced blossoms, and it bore ripe almonds.” With its oblong oval shape sharpened at one end and rounded at the other, the almond nut is remarkably graceful. This naturally led to its selection for ornamental carved work; and it was the pattern selected for the bowls of the golden lampstand (Ex. 25:33–34; 37:19), “symbolizing the speedy and powerful result of light” (Keil, Arch., 1:146). See also Almond Blossoms in the general listing.

Figurative. In Jer. 1:11–12 there is an allusion to another of the meanings of the Heb. root, which is to hasten. In the first of the two verses the almond tree is mentioned by its name shāqēd, and in the second it is said “for I am watching My word,” watching being from the same root as almond. The almond was chosen to symbolize God’s haste in fulfilling His promises.

There can be no reasonable doubt that the allusion in Eccles. 12:5 is to the white hair of the aged.

Al’oes, Lign Aloes (alōs; Heb. āhālīm; Gk. aloē). This is doubtless the lignum aloes of the ancients, the product of Aquilaria agallocha, Roxb., and other trees of the same genus, growing in India and China. It was well known to the Greeks and also to the Arabians. The species grows in Sylhet, in the E of Bengal, being a large tree with lanceolate (shaped like a lance head) leaves, the wood containing a resin and an essential oil, constituting the perfume prized in antiquity. It is mentioned in four places in the OT and once in the NT (Num. 24:6; Ps. 45:8; Prov. 7:17; Song of Sol. 4:14; John 19:39). A question has been raised as to the identity of the tree mentioned in Num. 24:6 with the other trees of the same name. This question may safely be answered in the affirmative. Although the lign aloes is a native of India and China, it is easy to suppose that it was cultivated in the tropical valley of the Jordan, which is well known to have produced in ancient times certain trees of which all traces have now disappeared. But even if it were to be supposed that it was not cultivated in Palestine, it might have been alluded to as a well-known tree of foreign growth, of which the luxuriance was proverbial, in this respect resembling the cedar, in the same passage, which, if it indicated the cedar of Lebanon, was to the Israelites of that day also a foreign tree, mentioned as an emblem of prosperity.

Amo’mum (a-mō-mūm; Gk. amōmum). This word occurs only in Rev. 18:13 and is rendered “spice.” Amomum is a fragrant plant of India. It belongs to a genus of plants, natural order Scitamineae, belonging to tropical regions of the Old World and allied to the ginger plant. They are herbaceous, with creeping rootstocks and large sheathing leaves, and are remarkable for the pungency and aromatic properties of their seeds. Several specimens yield the spices cardamom and grains of paradise. The one mentioned in Revelation had seeds like grapes, from which an ointment was made.

An’ise. See Dill.

Apple. The Heb. word tappūah for apple is nearly the same as the Arab. tuffāh; and wherever the name of the tree has been preserved in the name of a place, as in Beth Tappuah, the Arab. has preserved it in the modified form, in this tuffâh, showing that the reference to the familiar fruit is recognized. The apple is a favorite fruit of the natives of this land; and although they do not now possess any very fine varieties, they are particularly fond of the smell of an apple (Song of Sol. 7:8). They habitually smell an apple to revive themselves when faint (2:5). Most of the apples cultivated here are sweet (v. 3). The allusions to the size of the apple tree (2:3; 8:5) are borne out by fact. There is no need, then, to seek for any other tree, as some have done, to meet the Scripture requirements.

Aspala'thus (as-pa-la'thus). The name of one or more aromatic substances mentioned only once in the Apocrypha (Ecclus. 24:15). The substance and plant producing it are indeterminable.

Balm (Heb. šōrî), an aromatic gum, or resin (Gen. 37:25). Probably produced in Gilead, or a prime article of commerce there (Jer. 8:22; 46:11; 51:8), well known to Jacob (Gen. 43:11) and dealt in by Judah and Israel in the latter days of their monarchies (Ezek. 27:17). No tree now growing in Gilead produces the traditional balm, now known as Mecca balsam. This substance is the gum of Balsamodendron gileadense and B. opobalsamum, which grow in southern Arabia. But there can be no doubt that in Roman times these trees were cultivated in the lower Jordan Valley. This would bring a part of its area of cultivation within the limits of Gilead. In any case it was to such an extent an article of commerce in that district that it went by the name of balm of Gilead. Dioscorides erroneously says that the tree grew "only in the country of the Jews, which is Palestine, in the Ghor." Balm of Gilead was once an important element in the materia medica, but it has now fallen into disuse. Some have supposed that mastich is the balm of Gilead. Avicenna, however, clearly distinguishes it from that well-known gum. The so-called balm of Gilead, prepared by the monks of Jericho from the fruits of the zaqqûm, Balanites aegyptiaca, Del., has no claim except their authority. It is said, however, to have healing properties.

Balsam Tree. The rendering in the NASB of two Heb. words. In 2 Sam. 5:23–24; 1 Chron. 14:14–15, Heb. bākā, "weeping, distilling," is given as "balsam trees" in the NASB and NIV; the KJV reads "mulberry trees." "Balsam" is also the marginal reading in the NASB of Ps. 84:6, as an alternate to "Baca." In Song of Sol. 5:1, 13; 6:2, Heb. bāsām is given as "balsam" in the NASB and as "spice" and "spices" in the KJV and NIV.

Barley (Heb. šōrâ; Gk. krithinos). A well-known grain, cultivated from the remotest antiquity, and frequently mentioned in the Bible. A wild species, found in Galilee and northeastward to the Syrian Desert, Hordeum ithaburense, Boiss. (H. spontaneum, Koch), may be the original stock from which the cultivated varieties were derived. It is conspicuous by its very long awns, which are sometimes a foot in length. Barley is the universal feed for horses, mules, and, to a certain extent, for donkeys (1 Kings 4:28), taking the place of oats with us. It is still used for bread among the very poor (2 Kings 4:42). It was sometimes mixed with other cheap grains for making bread (Ezek. 4:9). Because of its cheapness it was the jealousy offering (Num. 5:15); and part of the price of an adulteress (Hos. 3:2) and of lewd women (Ezek. 13:19). Barley bread showed the low rank and poverty of Gideon (Judg. 7:13).

The barley harvest is earlier than the wheat harvest (Ex. 9:31–32). It begins in April in the Jordan Valley and continues to be later as the altitude increases, until, at a height of six thousand feet above the sea, it takes place in July and August. Barley is sown in October and November, after the "early rain." It is never sown in the spring, for the simple reason that it would not have rain, and so could not mature any grain, even if there were moisture enough in the soil to cause it to germinate. That which is sown on the higher levels behaves like winter wheat in cold climates, dying down under the snow, and sprouting again in the spring.

Bay Tree. The bay tree is mentioned in the KJV of Ps. 37:35, but not elsewhere. The NASB renders “luxuriant tree,” lit., “native” tree, and the NIV, “green tree.”

Beans (Heb. pôl, “thick, plump”). Beans are mentioned twice, once as part of a mixture of cheap cereals, used for making a coarse kind of bread (Ezek. 4:9), and once as part of the provisions of David at Mahanaim (2 Sam. 17:28). The vegetable alluded to in each case is the “horse bean,” Faba vulgaris, L., which is extensively cultivated, both as human food and for fodder. As human food it is either cooked unripe in the green pod, like string beans, or the ripe seeds are boiled like our white beans.

Bitter Herbs (Heb. mrôrîm, “bitter”). The Hebrews were commanded to eat the Passover lamb with bitter herbs (Ex. 12:8; Num. 9:11). There are many such, wild and cultivated, which are habitually used by the natives of the East in salads; among them are lettuce, watercress, pepper grass, and endive. The object of the ordinance was both to remind the Israelites of their “bitter” bondage (Ex. 1:14) and of the haste with which they made their exit from Egypt. Unleavened bread, a roasted lamb, and a few bitter herbs constituted a meal the elements of which were always at hand and could be got together with the least possible delay. These herbs are not distasteful to the orientals, who are very fond of them.

Box Tree (Heb. tîdhâr, NASB, except for Ezek. 27:6, where “boxwood” is the rendering of Heb. āshûr; tîdashshûr, KJV). Reference to the box tree appears in the NASB and KJV of Isa. 41:19; 60:13, though a different Heb. word is behind the English of the NASB and KJV. (The NIV renders “cypress” in both places.) In the NASB “box tree” is rendered for tîdhâr, whereas “cypress” is rendered for tîdashshûr. In the KJV tîdashshûr is rendered “box tree,” and tîdhâr is rendered “pine.” The NIV translates tîdhâr as “fir.”

The box tree is mentioned in Isa. 41:19; 60:13 in connection with the cedar, acacia, myrtle, olive, juniper, and cypress (NASB; cedar, shittah, myrtle, oil tree, fir, and pine, KJV; cedar, acacia, myrtle, olive, fir, and cypress, NIV). It seems unlikely that a shrub, known only in far northern Syria, should be associated with these familiar trees. The Syrian box, Buxus longi folia, Boiss., is only two to three feet high, and must have been unfamiliar to the readers of the Bible in the time of Isaiah. The old Arab. version gives sherbîn, which is either the wild cypress or the lizzâb, Juniperus excelsa, M. B. Possibly the acacia is implied here.

Bramble. See Thistles, Thorns.

Briers. See Thistles, Thorns.

Broom Tree (Heb. rôtem; Job 30:4; Ps. 120:4; 1 Kings 19:4, marg., all NASB and NIV).

The plant intended is doubtless the retem of the Arabs, Retama roetam, L., a desert, almost leafless, shrub, furnishing a poor refuge from the sun’s rays. Its roots make good fuel and charcoal (Ps. 120:4).

Bulrush. See Reed.

Burning Bush (Heb. sîneh, “bramble”; Ex. 3:2–5; Deut. 33:16). One of the many thorny shrubs growing in Sinai. The monks of the Convent of St. Catherine point out a blackberry bush (Rubus tomentosus, Borck, var. collinus, Boiss.), growing behind the chapel of the convent, as the bush in question. This is improbable, as Rubus is not indigenous there. The burning bush might be one of the seyal trees, Acacia tortilis, Hayne, or A. seyal, Del., or the nebk, Zizyphus spina christi, L., or some other thornbush.

Calamus. See Reed.

Cane. See Reed.

Caperberry (Eccles. 12:5; Heb. ʾabîyônâ, “provocative of desire”). The immature fruit of Capparis spinosa, L., a plant growing everywhere in clefts of rocks and walls. It is a stimulant and is supposed to be an aphrodisiac. If caperberry is the correct rendering of ʾabîyônâ in Eccles. 12:5, “the caperberry is ineffective” (NASB), the meaning of the passage is that even the caperberry shall fail to excite desire; it will be “ineffective.” The KJV reads, “desire shall fade”; the NIV, “desire is no longer stirred.”

Cassia (kash ʾi-a; Heb. qiddâ; Ex. 30:24; Ezek. 27:19; qšî-â, “peeled”; Ps. 45:8). Probably Cassia lignea of commerce, which consists of strips of the bark of Cinnamomum Cassia, Blume, a plant growing in China and Malaysia. Cassia buds are the immature flowers of the same. Both have the flavor and aroma of cinnamon.

Castor Oil Plant. A swift-growing plant designated by the Heb. qîqāyôn (Jonah 4:6–10). The LXX renders the Heb. by the Gk. kolokynthē, meaning the pumpkin Cucurbita pepo, which is in reality a type of the gourd family (cf. KJV rendering of Jonah 4:6–10). The NIV translates “vine.” On the other hand, the Heb. qîqāyôn is similar to Greco-European kiki, designating the castor oil plant. This plant attains a height from eight to ten feet, sometimes growing rapidly. If this was the plant that shaded Jonah, its rapid growth was miraculous. M.F.U.

Cedar (Heb. ʾerez). By far the greater number of references to the cedar in the Scriptures are to be understood of the famous “cedar of Lebanon.” This is a tree of wide distribution and fulfills well the conditions demanded, with the following exceptions: (1) The cedar wood used in purification, in connection with scarlet and hyssop. This would seem to have been a tree found in the Sinaitic desert and in use long before the Israelites could have easily obtained the cedar of Lebanon. It might well have been Juniperus phoenicia, L., which is found in Mt. Hor and its neighborhood, and could also have grown on the mountains of Sinai. (2) The “cedars in God’s garden” (Ezek. 31:8). The comparison to Assyria, called “a cedar in Lebanon” (v. 3, KJV), with these trees would seem to indicate some other tree. We have no means of determining what it was. (3) The “cedars beside the waters” (Num. 24:6) can hardly be cedars of Lebanon, because this tree never grows in such a location. True, in poetry, even in the Scriptures, it is not to be expected that all the congruities of time and place shall be rigidly observed. But unless we suppose such poetic license, we must infer that the trees here referred to were some water-loving species then known as cedars, now no longer determinable.

It is likely that the subalpine regions of Lebanon and Antilebanon were clothed with these trees. At Beshreh in the Republic of Lebanon about one hundred miles N of Beirut there was a fine group of the ancient cedars of Lebanon. Cedars are abundant in the Taurus Mts. in southern Turkey, including the Nur Mts., anciently called the Amanus Mts. Their range is from the Himalayas to the Atlas, and from central Asia Minor to Lebanon. They also existed in Cyprus.

The ancient trees had reddish-brown bark and sturdy trunks as much as forty feet in girth. Their branch spread was wide, they bore cones some five inches long, and they had bright green needles about one-half inch long. They grew slowly, and their wood was a fine prize for architectural uses. The cedar was a tall tree (Isa. 2:13; etc.) “with beautiful branches and forest shade” (Ezek. 31:3); its wood was suitable for masts of ships (27:5); for beams, pillars, and boards (1 Kings 6:9; 7:2); and for carved work (Isa. 44:14). Of this noble tree much of the Temple was built, as well as Solomon's house and other important public edifices in Jerusalem. It was used for roofing the temple of Artemis (Diana) at Ephesus and that of Apollo at Utica, the palace of the Persian kings at Susa, and other famous buildings. Its claim to be the "king of trees" is not to be considered with reference to the whole forest world, but only in comparison with the trees found in Bible lands. This claim was never disputed in the period of the Hebrew nationality in this land, and the sacred grove at Besherreh, on Lebanon, still bears the ancient name of "the cedars of the Lord." See Cypress. M.F.U.

Chaff. The husks that surround the seeds of the cereals. Chaff is the correct rendering for the Heb. mōš ("winnowed"). Chaff, after the threshing is over, is mingled with the cut and split straw (teben). Winnowing separates the product of threshing into four heaps—grain, cut straw, chaff, and finally the dust, caused by the comminution of a part of the straw and chaff and its commingling with the dust of the earthen floor. This, which is ûr in Heb., is erroneously translated "chaff" (Dan. 2:35).

Chestnut Tree (Heb. armôn). As this tree is not found in the Holy Land, some other must be sought that will fill the conditions required. The plane tree (which see), as the Heb. is elsewhere rendered, is of a stature and imposing appearance sufficient to make it suitable for comparison in the group with which the cedar of Lebanon is compared (Ezek. 31:8). This tree often attains a height of a hundred feet and a diameter at its base of from six to ten feet. It is abundant along all water courses in Syria and Mesopotamia.

Cinnamon (Heb. qinnāmôn). No one can doubt the substance intended, as the Heb. name is the same as the English. It was used by that race as a perfume for the holy oil (Ex. 30:23) and for beds (Prov. 7:17). It seems to have been cultivated by Solomon (Song of Sol. 4:14). It is a part of the wares of Babylon the Great (Rev. 18:13).

Citron Wood. A prize ornamental wood obtained from a large tree of the cypress family (Collistris quadrivalius). This luxury commodity was marketed in the emporia of mystic Babylon (Rev. 18:12). The wood was reddish brown, extremely hard, and fragrant. The Romans prized it greatly, and it was expensive. M.F.U.

Corian' der (cor-i-an' der). The aromatic seed of Coriandrum sativum, L. It is somewhat larger than a hemp seed and only spoken of to illustrate the size and color of the grains of manna (Ex. 16:31; Num. 11:7).

Corn. The generic name in the KJV for the cereal grains. Those cultivated in Bible lands are wheat, barley, vetch, fitches (Nigella sativa, L.), millet, beans, pulse (edible seeds in general), lentils, and maize. See Harvest; Fan; Threshing Floor; Agriculture.

Cotton (Heb. karpas, from Sanskrit karpāsa, "cotton"). Indian cotton was cultivated in Persia. There is no evidence, however, that the ancient Hebrews knew cotton, although it has been cultivated from time immemorial in India and other parts of the East.

Crocus (Heb. ḥābašelet). Mentioned in Isa. 35:1, it is probably the narcissus that is referred to. See also Rose.

Crown of Thorns. See Thistles, Thorns.

Cucumber. There are two kinds of cucumbers cultivated in the East, both of which were probably known to the ancient Egyptians and the Hebrews. One is identical with our ordinary kind, but more delicate in flavor and more wholesome. The other is tougher, drier, and less delicate in flavor. The former kind grows only in irrigated ground, while the latter flourishes during the hot, rainless months of summer, without a drop of water, except what it can extract from the parched soil or absorb from the atmosphere during the night. It was doubtless the custom in Egypt to water both kinds, and hence the succulent character of the vegetable so keenly missed by the Israelites during their thirsty journey in the wilderness (Num. 11:5; Heb. qishshûb, “hard”).

The field of cucumbers (Isa. 1:8; Heb. miqshâ; “melons,” NIV) is still a feature of oriental landscapes, some of these found on rolling ground, exposed to the blazing sun of August, without water, and others being among the irrigated orchards of orange and other fruit trees, but all supplied with a hut, where the watchman keeps guard over the tempting vegetable, none of which would reach its lawful owner but for this precaution. This hut is a frail structure of poles and leaves, adapted only to protect the watchman from the sun by day and the dew by night, during the rainless summer of Syria and Palestine. As soon as the last of the cucumbers is gathered, the hut is “left,” a useless reminder of past plenty and prosperity.

Cum´min (kum´in; Heb. kammôn, “preserving”; Gk. kuminon). One of the aromatic seeds, subject to tithe by the Jewish law (Matt. 23:23). It is still known by its ancient name (kammûn) throughout the Arab world. It is an aromatic and carminative, used in cooking and in domestic medicine. It is still threshed with a rod (Isa. 28:25–27). It has been superseded in modern times by caraway seeds, which are more nutritious and tasty.

Cypress, Cypresses. The rendering of three Heb. words referring to a tree found in Bible lands.

1. The Heb. word bîrôsh is given as “cypress” in the NASB, “pine” in the NIV, and “fir” in the KJV (1 Kings 5:8, 10; 6:15, 34; 9:11; 2 Kings 19:23; 2 Chron. 2:8; 3:5; Song of Sol. 1:17; Isa. 14:8; 37:24; 55:13; Hos. 14:8; Nah. 2:3; Zech. 11:2; and Ezek. 31:8) with only the exceptions of Isa. 41:19 and 60:13, where it is rendered juniper in the NASB and fir in the KJV.

2. The Heb. word tîashshûr is rendered “cypress” in the NASB and NIV and “box tree” in the KJV of Isa. 41:19; 60:13.

3. The Heb. word tîrzâ is rendered “cypress” in the NASB, the NIV, and the KJV of Isa. 44:14. The marginal reading in the NASB is “holm oak.”

Dill (Heb. qeshah; Isa. 28:25; Gk. anêthon). The Gk. anêthon is the exact equivalent of the Lat. anethum, which is dill. The NIV translates “caraway.” It is the aromatic, carminative seed of Anethum graveolens, L., an umbelliferae, cultivated widely in the East and used both in cooking and domestic medicine. It was subject to a tithe among the Hebrews (Matt. 23:23).

Ebony (Heb. hobnî). The hard, close-grained, black heart wood of Diospyros ebenum, L., which grows in the East Indies. It has been an article of commerce from ancient times, having been brought to Palestine from Dedan, on the Persian Gulf (Ezek. 27:15). It is used for cabinet work, rulers, etc. Ebony was brought in ancient times from Ethiopia, but there is no certainty as to the tree that produced it. Virgil (Georgics 2.116) says that “India also produces the black ebony.”

Fig (Heb. tîbênâ; Gk. sukon). The fruit of the well-known tree. It is one of the favorite kinds of food in the East and, in the dried state, a considerable article of commerce. The failure of the fig trees was a national calamity. Their productiveness was a token of peace and the divine favor. They are associated with the vine, the palm, and the pomegranate. The fig tree differs from most other fruit trees in that its fruit is green and inconspicuous, concealed among leaves until near the time of ripening. If the promise given from a distance by the leaves is not fulfilled on approaching (Mark 11:13), the tree is a hypocrite. Such a one our Savior cursed.

Fir (Heb. bārôsh; Ps. 104:17; Ezek. 27:5; ōren; Isa. 44:14). The Heb. term bārôsh is more frequently translated “cypress” in the NASB (and is twice translated “juniper,” Isa. 41:19; 60:13; but “pine” in the NIV); it is also translated “fir.” In Isa. 44:14 ōren is rendered “fir” in the NASB, “pine” in the NIV, but “ash” in the KJV. The tall trunk of the fir is well adapted for masts.

Fitches. A KJV term, replaced in the NASB by cummin (Heb. qeshah; Isa. 28:25, 27) and spelt (Heb. küssemet; Ezek. 4:9). The NIV translates by “caraway” and “spelt” respectively. See Cummin; Spelt.

Flag. A KJV term replaced in the NASB and NIV by rushes (Heb. ahû; Job 8:11; Heb. sûp; Isa. 19:6) or reeds (Heb. sûp; Ex. 2:3, 5). See Reeds, Rushes.

Flax (Heb. pishtâ). A well-known plant, Linum sativum, L. The fibers of the bark, when separated, twisted, bleached, and woven, are linen. In the raw state they are “tow” (Judg. 16:9). Somewhat twisted, tow constitutes a “wick” (Isa. 42:3; 43:17).

Flowers. The flowers of the Holy Land are renowned for their beauty. The most showy and widely diffused are the scarlet and blue anemones, the scarlet ranunculi and poppies, the numerous silenes, the purple pea blossom, a number of showy roses, the scarlet pomegranate, a host of composites, the styrax, a number of crocuses, colchicums, irises, tulips, and ixiolirions, etc. In many places they are so abundant as to impart a rich and varied coloring to the landscape.

For the flower as part of the ornamentation of the Temple furniture, see Flower, Flowers in the general listing.

Forest (Heb. yācār, a “thicket”). Although the Holy Land was never a wooded country in historic times, it was doubtless more so at the time of the Hebrew conquest than it has been ever since. Numerous woods and forests are mentioned by name. According to Albright, in the Middle Bronze Age (2000–1500 B.C.) the mountains of Palestine were heavily forested on the watershed ridge and the western slope so that there was little arable land (cf. Albright, Archaeology of Palestine and the Bible, pp. 130–33). Since the cistern had not come into use, the general situation favors the biblical representation of the patriarchs being free to roam over wide areas of sparsely populated central highland range and to be free to feed flocks on the lower ranges. In the last decade or so millions of cedar, pine, and spruce seeds have been planted in the Lebanon regions from U.S. Army airplanes in cooperation with the Lebanese government. Also, the Israeli State is reforesting many areas in Palestine. M.F.U.

Frankincense (Heb. lābōnâ). See Galbanum.

Fruit. The Holy Land is not only a land of flowers but also of fruits. Owing to the great diversity of level, from the tropical valley of the Jordan, 1,300 feet below the sea, to subalpine Lebanon, the fruits of the country present a cosmopolitan variety. The most characteristic are the banana, orange, and other citrus fruits, dates, most of the rosaceous fruits, the persimmon, and the jujube, grapes, figs, olives, and pomegranates. The orange is in season for six months, the grape nearly as long. Figs ripen during four months. Almost all garden vegetables thrive, and many of them are in season for months.

Galbanum (gal'ba-num; Heb. lābōnâ, “whiteness”). A gum resin with a pungent balsamic odor (Ex. 30:34). It was one of the constituents of the sacred incense. Two ferulas, F. galbaniflua, Boiss, et Buhse, and F. rubricaulis, Boiss., both growing in Persia, are believed to be the sources of the gum. It is used in medicine as an antispasmodic. It is a greasy, sticky, granulated resin, presenting a whitish appearance at first, but afterward changing to yellow, having a pungent odor and taste, and which, when mixed with fragrant substances, has the effect of increasing the odor and fixing it longer.

Gall. Although some of the references in the KJV to gall clearly point to bile, or gall bladder (Job 16:13; 24:14, 25; Heb. m□rōrâ), others point to a plant (Deut. 29:18; Lam. 3:19; and others; Heb. rôsh). It is probable that the poppy is the plant intended. The gall that was offered to Christ on the cross was doubtless myrrh (Mark 15:23).

The NASB and NIV frequently render Heb. rôsh as “poison” (or “venom”), or one of its derivatives.

See also Gall in the general listing.

Garden. A term used in Scripture with a far wider significance than in ordinary literature. It includes park, orchard, vegetable and flower gardens. The garden of Eden was a vast farm, including all of the above. A peculiar feature of most oriental cities is that, whereas the houses are crowded together and few gardens are found among them, the environs are mostly composed of fruit and vegetable gardens and trees of various sorts, planted for utilitarian purposes. The effect of these gardens, surrounding the towns as in the case of Jaffa, Sidon, Beirut, Damascus, and Homs, is extremely beautiful.

Garlic (Heb. shūm). A well-known vegetable, more agreeable to the oriental than to most European palates. It is mentioned only once (Num. 11:5).

Gopher Wood (Heb. gōpher). An unknown wood, used in the construction of the Ark (Gen. 6:14). The NIV translates by “cypress” with hesitation.

Gourds, Wild (Heb. paqqûcâ, “splitting” open; 2 Kings 4:39). Probably colocynths, which grew abundantly in the locality alluded to and suit the requirements of the passage.

Grapes. See Vine.

Grass. A term used in Scripture in an indefinite sense, referring to green herbage in general. All the four Heb. words, yereq, hāšîr, deshe, and cēšeb, translated “grass,” have this wide meaning. The idea conveyed to us by the term grasses, as plants with hollow columns, strap-shaped leaves, and an inflorescence of glumes and pales, is a strictly modern creation of descriptive botany.

Green Herbs, Green Grass, Green Thing. See Grass.

Hedge. Hedges are more commonly used to separate gardens and orchards in the East than are walls. Many thorny plants are set out for this purpose. Also some of the giant grasses, as Arundo Donax, L., and Saccharum Aegyptiacum, L.

Henna (Heb. kōper, from Malay Kapur). This plant, Lawsonia alba, L., is cultivated everywhere in the Holy Land. Its clusters of cream-colored flowers are much admired by the orientals and form a part of almost every nosegay during the flowering season. The scriptural allusions (Song of Sol. 1:14; 4:13) show that it was equally esteemed in ancient times. Its leaves are also used for dyeing fingernails and toenails a reddish orange color. There is, however, no allusion to this use of the plant in Scripture.

Hyssop (Heb. ezôb; Gk. hussōpos); a labiate plant, probably Origanum Maru, L. It was used in sprinkling (Ex. 12:22; Lev. 14; Heb. 9:19), and in quenching the thirst of a victim on the cross (John 19:29). It grew out of walls (1 Kings 4:33), probably those of terraces. There is no reason to believe that the “reed” (Matt. 27:48; Mark 15:36) on which the sponge soaked in vinegar was raised to Christ’s mouth was the same as the “hyssop” upon which the sponge was put (John 19:29). Even were it so, the stem of the caper plant, which has been proposed as the hyssop, would not suit the requirements of the term reed, which suggests a straight, not a zigzag, stem. For further discussion of hyssop, see the article in the general listing.

Ivy (2 Macc. 6:7) grows everywhere over rocky walls in the Holy Land.

Juniper. The juniper appears in the KJV and the NASB but not always as the rendering of the same Heb. words. It never appears in the NIV. Heb. rōtem is rendered “juniper” in both translations of 1 Kings 19:4–5 (NIV has “broom tree”) but as “juniper” in the KJV and “broom” tree in the NASB and NIV of Job 30:4; Ps. 120:4. Heb. bārōsh, which is most frequently rendered “cypress” in the NASB, is given as “fir” in the KJV, “pine” in the NIV, and “juniper” in the NASB of Isa. 41:19; 60:13. Heb. āroēr is given as “juniper” in the NASB of Jer. 48:6 but as “heath” in the KJV and “bush” in the NIV of that verse. See Broom Tree; Cypress; Fir.

Leeks (Heb. ḥaṣṣîr), a kind of onion, Allium Porrum, L., cultivated extensively in the East. It is mentioned once with onions and garlic (Num. 11:5).

Lentils (Heb. ādāshâ; Gen. 25:34; 2 Sam. 17:28; 23:11; Ezek. 4:9). The seed of Ervum Lens, L., a cereal cultivated everywhere in the East. A soup or “stew” made of it is as much used now for food as it was in Jacob’s time.

Lign Aloes. See Aloes.

Lily (Heb. shûshan). In a special sense the word for iris is as broad in its application as its rendering in our versions, lily. The expression “lily of the valleys” (Song of Sol. 2:1) does not refer to the flower understood by this designation in ordinary speech, as it is not found in Palestine. The lily of other passages in the Song of Solomon was evidently a garden flower (2:16; 4:5; 6:3). The allusion (5:13) may be to its rosy color, or fragrance, or both. From earliest times the lily has been imitated in stone and bronze, as an architectural ornament (1 Kings 7:19; 2 Chron. 4:5). The expression “lilies of the field” (ta krina tou agrou, Matt. 6:28–30) is well translated. Fortunately we only have to go to the grain fields of Palestine to find precisely what fulfills the conditions of the allusion. They are as follows: A plant that would naturally be called a lily (not a ranunculus, or an anemone, or a poppy, plants having names of their own in both Gk. and English, and never confounded with lilies in either ancient or modern speech), growing among the wheat, adorned with regal colors, and having stems, which, when dried, were used as fuel for the oriental oven. There are three species of the sword lily, Gladiolus segetum, Gawl, G. Illyricus, Koch, and G. atroviolaceus, Boiss., with pink to purple and blackish violet flowers, which grow everywhere among standing corn, and have stems suitable for light fuel. As they are the only plants that fulfill all the conditions, we cannot but believe that they were the very plants to which our Savior pointed to illustrate the heavenly Father’s care of His children.

See also Lily Blossom in the general listing.

Mallows (Heb. mallûah, “salt plant”). A term used only once in the Bible (Job 30:4, marg., “plant of the salt marshes”; “salt herbs,” NIV). The Arab. equivalent of the Heb. mallûah refers to the sea orache, Atriplex Halimus, L., a plant growing in just such regions as the one referred to by Job. Dioscorides says that they were cooked as vegetables. The leaves are sour and furnish little nourishment.

Mandrake (Heb. dûday; Gen. 30:14; Song of Sol. 7:13). A narcotic plant of the order Solanaceae, Mandragora officinarum, L., esteemed by the ancients as a love medicine and evidently so referred to in both the above-cited passages. Taken in considerable quantities, it is an acrid narcotic poison. It is not used in modern medicine.

Manna (Heb. mān, “what?”). Many have sought to identify manna with some substance naturally produced in the desert, answering to the conditions of the food rained down on the Israelites in the wilderness, during a period of forty years. There is a substance called mann by the Arabs, and having some nutrient properties, that exudes from Tamarix mannifera, Ehr., and certain oaks, and Alhagi Maurorum, D.C., and A. Camelorum, Fisch. But this substance corresponds in no way with the properties of the scriptural manna. The latter was clearly a miraculous production and ceased as soon as the necessity for it passed away (Ex. 16:14, 31; Num. 11:7–9; Josh. 5:12). Among its most remarkable characteristics was the double supply on Friday and the total lack on the Sabbath.

Mas'tich (mas'tik). A fragrant, terebinthine gum, exuding from Pistacia Lentiscus, L., a small tree, growing abundantly in Palestine and Syria, mentioned only in the Apocrypha (Sus. 54). It is the common chewing gum of the East. A preserve is also made of it.

Melons (Heb. ʾābatṭāh; Num. 11:5). Doubtless generic for watermelons and cantaloupes, of which there are several luscious varieties in the Holy Land. Being inexpensive, and serving to quench the thirst engendered by the hot climate of Bible lands, melons would naturally be lamented by the Israelites in the desert. The NIV translates Heb. miqshā as “melons” in Isa. 1:8.

Mildew (Heb. yērāqôn, “paleness”). Various sorts of parasitic fungi on plants, the growth of which is promoted by moisture. It is the opposite of “blasting” (shiddāpôn, which is the drying up of plants by the hot sirocco, or khamsîn winds (see Deut. 28:22; 1 Kings 8:37; etc.).

Millet (Heb. dōhan; Ezek. 4:9). The seed of Panicum miliaceum, L., and of Setaria Italica, Kth. It is about as large as a mustard seed. In the single passage where it occurs, it formed part of the basis of a complex bread. Some have supposed that Sorghum vulgare, L., is the plant intended by the Heb. original dōhan.

Mint. A tithable herb. The most common species of mint is Mentha sativa, L., which is commonly cultivated and used as a flavoring in salads and in cooking. Hēduosmon (Matt. 23:23; Luke 11:42) was probably generic for other kinds of mint, as well as the above.

Mulberry (Gk. sukaminos). The Gk. term meant also the sycamore, but the English term has come to mean only the black mulberry, Morus nigra, L. The fruit of it resembles in shape and external appearance the larger sorts of blackberries, but it has a decidedly different, though pleasant, acid flavor. It is mentioned only once in the NT (Luke 17:6). Wherever sukaminos occurs in the LXX it refers to the sycamore.

In the KJV the mulberry appears as the rendering of Heb. bākā in 2 Sam. 5:23–34; 1 Chron. 14:14–15, but the NASB and NIV more correctly give “balsam.”

Mustard (Gk. sinapi). A well-known plant of which two species, Sinapsis arvensis, L., and S. alba, L., flourish in the Holy Land. Besides these S. nigra, L., the black mustard is cultivated as a condiment. All produce minute seeds (Matt. 17:20; Luke 17:6). All, in favorable soil in this warm climate, attain a size quite sufficient for the requirements of the passages (Matt. 13:31–32; Mark 4:31–32; Luke 13:19). The birds in the latter passage, it will be observed, nest in the branches. The term tree is to be taken only as an exaggerated contrast with the minute seed and to be explained by the parallel “but when it is full grown, it is larger than the garden plants, and becomes a tree” (Matt. 13:32). Palestinian mustard trees sometimes grow to a height of ten to fifteen feet or more. H.F.V.

Myrrh (Heb. mōr, “distilling”; Arab. murr; Gk. smyrna, “myrrha”). It is the well-known gum resin extracted from the Arabian Balsamodendron Myrrha, Nees. It was used as a perfume, for embalming, and as an ingredient of the holy anointing oil. It was one of the gifts of the magi. Another Heb. word, lōt, is translated myrrh (Gen. 37:25; 43:11). It should be translated ladanum (Gen. 37:25, marg.). This is a gummy exudation from Cistus villosus, L., a plant growing in great abundance in the Holy Land.

Myrtle. A well-known and beautiful evergreen shrub, Myrtus communis, L., with white flowers, and berries that are at first white, and then turn bluish black. They are edible, although rather too astringent for Western palates. The Heb. name of Esther, Hadasseh, is derived from the name of this plant (Heb. hādās). The translation “myrtle trees” (Zech. 1:8, 10–11) is an error, as the original has only hādassîm, “myrtles,” with no hint as to whether they were trees or shrubs.

Nard (nard; Heb. nērd; Gk. nardos). An aromatic oil extracted from an East Indian plant, Nardostachys jatamansi, D.C. (Song of Sol. 4:13; Mark 14:3; John 12:3).

Nettle. The Heb. hārûl, which occurs thrice (Job 30:7; Prov. 24:31; Zeph. 2:9) and is translated in some versions “nettle,” probably signifies thorn, scrub, or brush. The Holy Land is preeminently a land of such scrubs, and the sense of the above passages is well met by the term. The Heb. word qimmôsh (qimôsh), “nettles” (Isa. 34:13), from a root signifying to sting, doubtless refers to the true nettles, of the genera Urtica and Forskahlea, of the order Urticaceae, of which there are a number of species in this land. This rendering perfectly suits the passages cited.

Nuts. The nuts of Gen. 43:11 (Heb. boṭneh) are without doubt pistachios, as so rendered. They are, and always have been, luxuries in the East. The nut trees of the Song of Sol. 6:11 (ḥgōz), are walnuts. They are commonly cultivated and greatly esteemed in Bible lands.

Oak. Several kinds of oak are found in Palestine and adjoining countries. Quercus sessiliflora flourishes on lofty Lebanon slopes and in the Hauran. The prickly evergreen oak is found in four varieties. These varieties of oak are found in Carmel, Bashan, and Gilead and often attain considerable size. The deciduous Valonia oak is found in Galilee and Gilead. The Heb. word allôn is apparently the correct Heb. term, for it was a characteristic tree of Bashan (Gen. 35:8; Isa. 2:13; Ezek. 27:6; Zech. 11:2). Another Heb. term for oak is ēlâ. In two passages it is associated with allôn and is translated “terebinth,” a rendering frequently used in preference to “oak” (Isa. 6:13; Hos. 4:13). Heb. ayil; allâ; and ēlôn are also rendered “oak.” The marginal reading of Heb. tirzâ in the NASB of Isa. 44:14 is “holm oak,” although both the NASB and KJV render “cypress” in the text proper. The NIV translates simply “oak.”

Olive (Heb. zayit; Gk. from elaia). A tree, with leaves of the characteristic dull green at their upper surface and a silvery sheen at their lower, cultivated in all Bible countries. It is alluded to many times in the Bible, often as an emblem of peace, prosperity, and wealth. Much is said of its beauty, fruitfulness, and usefulness to mankind. Its berries and oil are now, as always, leading articles of commerce. Disasters to olive trees are national afflictions, and the failure of the crop is a cause of ruin and considered a sign of divine wrath. The olive berry (Isa. 17:6; James 3:12) is a small drupe, of an oblong ovoid shape, green when young, becoming dark purple, then black, and containing a large amount of oil and a bitter element. The bitter, appetizing taste and the nutritive properties of the berry cause it to be a prime food in all Eastern lands. It is eaten after pickling in brine or preserved in olive oil. Only the fully ripe berries are preserved in the latter way. But the chief value of the olive tree consists in the rich and abundant oil that is expressed from the berry. Large groves of olive trees grow in the neighborhoods of most of the cities of the coast of Syria and Palestine, throughout Lebanon and the hill country of Palestine, Asia Minor, Greece, and Italy. The oil produced from them was one of the chief articles of commerce in ancient eastern Mediterranean lands. Oil forms a large element in the diet of the people, being used for salads, which are an accompaniment to most of their meals, and for frying, in place of butter. It is also much used in the manufacture of soap. It is boiled with crude carbonate of soda, making an excellent grade of hard soap. Considerable quantities are exported to Europe, and the remainder is consumed in the country.

The Heb. expression עֵשׂ שֶׁמֶן shemen is of uncertain meaning. It occurs only in three connections (1 Kings 6:23, 31–33, “olive”; Neh. 8:15, “wild olive”; Isa. 41:19, marg., “oleaster”). From its name, it evidently denotes some tree rich in oleaginous or resinous matter, the presence of which is a sign of fertility. It is of a size and hardness sufficient to furnish material for a carved image ten cubits high. It grows in the mountains and has foliage suited for booths. But it is not the olive, which is mentioned by name in the same connection (Neh. 8:15); it is some fatwood tree, for example, any of the pinus. It is useless to seek to identify it.

Onions (Heb. bešel). Much as the onion is cultivated and used as an article of food and commerce, it is only mentioned once in the Bible, in connection with the longing of the Israelites in the desert for the good things of Egypt (Num. 11:5). Those familiar with the delicately flavored onions of the East prefer them to the ranker product of the West.

Palm Tree (Heb. tāmār; Gk. phoinix). The palm tree in Scripture commonly designates the date palm, Phoenix dactylifera. Israel encountered seventy palm trees at Elim (Ex. 15:27; Num. 33:9), and the palm was a welcome sight to weary travelers, for it signified rest, shade, and refreshment.

The palm often is eighty feet in height. Its stem ends in a picturesque bunch of leaves. The tree is highly ornamental as well as useful. Its sap yields sugar from which a strong drink called arrack is made; and wax, oil, tannin, and dye stuffs are also derived from the palm. Its fruit is highly edible and nourishing and is widely used as food. Even the seeds are ground as food for camels. The leaves are used to cover roofs and for fences, baskets, mats, and other household articles. In the Bible the palms are characterized as “beautiful trees” and were used to celebrate the feast of Booths, or Tabernacles (Lev. 23:40). In Hebrew-Phoenician art they formed a characteristic motif for the Solomonic Temple (1 Kings 6:29; 2 Chron. 3:5; cf. Ezekiel’s Temple, Ezek. 40:16; 41:18). The beauty and utility of the palm furnished a lovely figure for the psalmist of the prosperity of the godly (Ps. 92:12). By Christian times the palm came to denote victory (Rev. 7:9). The finest and best palm trees were found around Jericho (sometimes called the “city of palm trees”), Engedi, and along the banks of the Jordan. Normally they live a century and a half to two centuries. The palm tree has a long tap root that goes down to sources of water. The fact that it grows in perennial freshness in almost desertlike conditions makes it a fitting symbol of constancy, patience, uprightness, and prosperity.

Figurative. For the figurative use of palm, see the article in the general listing. M.F.U.

Pan´nag (Heb. pannag; Ezek. 27:17, marg.), a substance, perhaps the one known by the Arabs as halāwa. It is made of a decoction of soapwort root, to which is added syrup of dibs and sesame oil. The mixture is stirred over the fire until the elements are fully incorporated and set aside to crystallize. Pannag was, as halāwa is now, an article of internal commerce in Palestine and Syria, and exported to other lands. In Akkad. pannigu is a kind of cake. The NIV translates in Ezek. 27:17 “confections.”

Papyrus. The papyrus is a water plant that grew luxuriantly in ancient times in Egypt and certain sections of Palestine. In ancient times papyrus writing material was made by cutting the pith of the papyrus plant into thin strips, crisscrossing them, and pressing them into sheets. These pale yellow sheets were frequently combined to form rolls from ten to thirty feet long and about nine and one-half inches high. Egyptians sometimes had huge papyrus rolls, such as the 123-foot-long Papyrus Harris. Use of papyrus for writing materials goes back to the Old Kingdom in Egypt, probably before 2700 B.C. The dry Egyptian climate was favorable to the preservation of papyri and some extant copies go back to the third millennium. In antiquity Egypt was a source of supply for ancient paper. Gebal on the Mediterranean coast received papyrus from Egypt, and this center of the paper trade was later called Byblos, meaning “papyrus” or “book” by the Greeks. Our modern word Bible through Gk. and Lat. goes back to this source. Leather was used early, and parchment also came into use later. Papyrus reeds tied together to form boats were used in ancient Egypt. Isaiah refers to Ethiopians dispatching messengers by the sea “in papyrus vessels” (18:2). In Egyptian art the papyrus growing in the marshes of the Delta symbolized Lower Egypt. The lotus, on the other hand, stood for Upper Egypt. For further discussion, see also Papyrus in the general listing. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

Pine Tree. See Box Tree.

Plane Tree (Heb. armôn, “naked”; Gen. 30:37; Ezek. 31:8; the KJV incorrectly renders “chestnut tree”). The plane tree is frequently found in Palestine, on the coast and in the N. Shedding its outward bark, it came by its Heb. name, “smooth,” or “naked.” Similarly, a scratch in the bark of this tree would at once show a white streak (Gen. 30:37). The oriental plane tree (Plantus orientalis) grows to a height of some eighty-five feet and has palmately lobed leaves like the sycamore maple. The oriental plane is found in southern Europe and in western Asia. It grows well on hillsides beside streams and is planted artificially in many places.

Pods (Heb. hiryônûm, “seed pods,” 2 Kings 6:25; Gk. keration, “horned”; Luke 15:16). The pods of Ceratonia siliqua, L., the carob tree. This tree is an evergreen, cultivated everywhere in the Holy Land. The pods are eaten by the people, and a concoction known as dibs kharrûb, i.e., carob honey, is made from them.

Pome´granate (pom´gran´it), a well-known tree, Punica granatum, L., cultivated everywhere in the East. The fruit is spherical, often four inches or more in diameter, green when young, turning red in ripening, with a woody, astringent rind, enclosing a large number of luscious pulpy seeds of a pinkish color. The pomegranate is frequently mentioned in company with the vine, fig, and palm. The rind contains much tannin, and a decoction of it is a remedy against the tapeworm (see 1 Sam. 14:2; Song of Sol. 4:13; etc.).

Poplar. The translation of Heb. (libneh), Arab. lubna, “white tree” (Gen. 30:37; Hos. 4:13). There can be little doubt that storax is the correct rendering of the Heb. Storav officinale, L., although usually a shrub attains a height of twenty feet, which would answer the requirements of the passage in Hosea. The lower surface of its leaves is white, and it bears a wealth of large white blossoms, which well entitle it to the name of the white tree. Its effect on the landscape is similar to that of Cornus florida, L., the flowering dogwood of the northern woods in the United States.

Raisin. See Vine.

Reeds, Rushes. Six Heb. words are used for marsh plants. Two, ṣāḥû and sûp, are rendered “marsh grass” (Gen. 41:2, 18; both “reeds” in the NIV), “rushes” (Job 8:11; “reeds,” NIV), and “reeds” (Ex. 2:3, 5). (The KJV renders “flag” in Job 8:11 for ṣāḥû and “flags” in Ex. 2:3, 5; Isa. 19:6 for sûp.) Of the remaining four:

1. Heb. ṣagmôn is rendered “reed,” “rope,” “rush,” and “bulrush.” It doubtless refers in a general way to swamp plants of the orders Cyperaceae and Gramineae, and the like.

2. Heb. gōme probably includes the papyrus, bulrushes, club rushes, and twig rush, i.e., plants of the orders Juncaceae and Cyperaceae.

3. Heb. qāneh, which is cognate with cane, may be considered as the equivalent of the English reed, taken as that term is in a broad sense. It includes the tall grasses with woody stems, such as Arundo Donax, L., the Persian reed, Saccharum Aegyptiacum, Willd., and the Arab. ghazzâr (both of which may be considered as included under the expression “a reed shaken by the wind,” Matt. 11:7). Phragmites communis, L., the true reed. Qāneh is variously translated “reed,” “stalk,” “cane,” “calamus.”

4. Heb. ārôt, translated “bulrushes” (Isa. 19:7; “plants,” NIV).

Rose (Heb. hābaṣṣelet). The word occurs in Song of Sol. 2:1. In Isa. 35:1 it is rendered “crocus.” It is probable that narcissus is the correct rendering. Two species, Narcissus Tazetta, L., and N. serotinas, L., grow in the Holy Land. The rose is mentioned in the Apocrypha (Ecclus. 24:14; 39:13). There are seven species of rose that grow in the Holy Land. The most widely distributed of these is Rosa Phoenicia, Boiss., which grows on the coast and in the mountains. A pink rose with fragrant petals is cultivated in Damascus for the sake of its essential oil, the famous attar of roses. Rose water and syrup of rose leaves are also extensively manufactured throughout the country.

Rue (Gk. pēganon). A plant with a penetrating, and to most persons disagreeable, odor. It was tithable (Luke 11:42). The officinal species, Ruta graveolens, L., is cultivated. The allied wild species, R. Chalepensis, L., is widely diffused throughout the country.

Rush. See Reed.

Rye. See Spelt.

Saffron (Heb. karkôm; Song of Sol. 4:14). An aromatic, composed of the styles of several species of crocus, principally C. cancellatus, Herb. Bot. They are of an orange color and are principally used to impart an agreeable odor and flavor to boiled rice. The flowerets of Carthamus tinctorius, L., known as safflower, or bastard saffron, are used for a similar purpose.

Saltwort. See Mallows.

Shittah Tree, Shittim Wood. See Acacia.

Spelt. An inferior kind of wheat, the chaff clinging to the grain. The Egyptians used it for bread (Herodotus 2.36). In Egypt it came up after barley. It is the rendering (Ex. 9:32; Ezek. 4:9) of the Heb. kūssmet. In Isa. 28:25 the rendering is sometimes “rye.” The RV and NIV render it in all three passages “spelt.” We believe it to be the kirsenneh, which is the cognate Arab. for the leguminous plant Vicia ervilia, L., a cereal cultivated throughout the East. Rye is unknown in those lands. It would be better to translate kūssemēt by vetch, with a marginal note, “the kirsenneh of the Arabs.”

Spice, Spicery. Two generic Heb. words for aromatics occur in the OT, sam and bešem. Several of the individual aromatics included under these words are given, such as frankincense, stacte, onycha, galbanum, myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, and cassia (Ex. 30:23–24, 34). These and numerous other aromatics, among them nard and lign aloes, were used as perfumes, anointing oils, and incense, and for embalming bodies. Nīkōt (Gen. 37:25) has been supposed by some to be gum tragacanth. We are inclined, however, to regard it as a generic term, translated “spicery,” or better, aromatics.

Stac’te (stak’ti; Heb. nāṭāp; Ex. 30:34). An aromatic; RV marg. “opobalsamum” is not probable. The NIV renders it “gum resin.” Nor is it likely that it is storax, which we believe to be a product of the plant designated as libneh (see Poplar). Stacte is in fact myrrh, and its Heb. original in the above passage, nāṭāp, signifying drops, probably refers to myrrh in tears. The same word (Job 36:27) is used for drops of water.

Stinkweed (Heb. boṣhâ; cf. “to be bad” in Heb.; “to have a stench” in Aram.). Mentioned along with briars (Job 31:40; “weeds,” NIV), there are multitudes of these in the fields of Palestine and Syria, such as the goose weed, arum, henbane, and mandrake.

Storax. See Myrrh; Poplar; Stacte.

Straw. During the process of oriental threshing, the straw is cut into bits half an inch to two inches in length, and more or less crushed, shredded, pulverized, and mixed with the chaff. This product is known in Arab. as tībn, the cognate of the Heb. teben, which is usually translated “straw,” sometimes incorrectly “chaff” and “stubble.” As hay is unknown, this cut straw is its substitute.

Sweet Cane. See Reed.

Sycamore. A fig tree; the rendering in the OT of shāqām and shiqmâ in the Heb.; Gk. sukaminos in the LXX. It is a spreading tree, Ficus Sysmorus, L., of the order Urticaceae, often planted by roadsides where it provides a pleasant view for sightseers. It also grows wild and reaches a large size. Its wood is light but durable, and is much used for house carpentry and fuel. It was once abundant in the Holy Land (1 Kings 10:27; etc.) and in Egypt (Ps. 78:47). Its fruit is a small edible fig.

Tamarisk. The tamarisk is a bush tree, highly ornamental, which yields pink and white flowers in spring. A number of species occur in Palestine. It is the correct rendering of Heb. ēshel (Gen. 21:33; 1 Sam. 22:6; 31:13). M.F.U.

Tares (Gk. zizanion); RV darnel. Tares are numerous in the grainfields, along with a large number of other species of plants not suitable for human food. They are left until the stalks are well grown, and then, not long before the harvest (Matt. 13:30), women and children, and sometimes men, go carefully among the grain and pull up all but the wheat and barley. Today these weeds are not burned but fed to cattle. If any tares remain unnoticed until the grain is harvested and threshed out, the seeds are separated from the wheat and barley and set aside for poultry. There are four kinds of tares in the Holy Land, by far the most common of which in the grainfields is Lolium temulentum, L., or the bearded darnel. It is a poisonous grass, almost indistinguishable from wheat while the two are growing into blade. But when they come into ear, they can be separated without difficulty.

Teil Tree. The better rendering of this KJV term in Isa. 6:13 is “terebinth.” See Oak.

Terebinth. See Oak.

Thicket. See Forest.

Thistles, Thorns (including Bramble, Brier). Seventeen Heb. words are used for plants with prickles and thorns. Probably most of them once referred to definite species, which we have no means of determining now. It is clear that translators, both ancient and modern, have given up in despair all hope of unraveling the intricacies of the tangle. Thus they have translated these numerous terms to suit their conviction of the needs of the context of the various passages in which they occur. One of them, sirpād (Isa. 55:13), is probably not a thorn (but see NIV “thornbush”), but rather the elecampane, which is placed in the above passage in parallelism with the myrtle. The number of names for thorny plants, though so large, is small in comparison with the number of such plants. At least fifty genera, and more than two hundred species, in the Holy Land are armed with prickles or thorns, and many more with stinging hairs. If the weary traveler sits confidently on a grassy bank by the wayside, he is sure to rise more quickly than he sat down, happy if he is able to extract the thorns that are often broken off in his flesh. It is often difficult to force horses through fields overrun with Eryngiums, Cirsiums, Onopordons, and the like. They will swerve from side to side, and attempt to leap over their tormentors and sometimes become almost frantic from the pain. Many herbs have heads several inches in diameter, bristling with spines two to six inches long. They are sometimes dragged out on the threshing floors and broken into pieces, as food for donkeys and camels. With such, perhaps, Gideon “disciplined the men of Succoth” (Judg. 8:16). The number of intricate thornbushes suitable for hedges is large (Job 5:5).

The “crown of thorns” that was plaited for our Savior’s head (Mark 15:17; etc.); Gk. akanthinos, may have been composed of Calycotome villosa, L., or Poterium spinosum, L. Zizyphus spina-Christi, L., the traditional Christ thorn, would not have been easy to procure in Jerusalem.

Tow. See Flax.

Trees. Trees are valued in this land, mainly for yielding fruit or timber. Systematic planting of shade trees is almost unknown, except in cemeteries and around the tombs of saints. The forests have been greatly reduced in number and contain few large trees (see Forest). Some efforts have been made from time to time to acclimatize foreign trees. Solomon appears to have had botanical gardens, and they are mentioned by Josephus as existing in his day. Pliny mentions the palm groves of Jericho. Trees have important symbolical meanings in Scripture. Man fell because of eating the fruit of the “tree of the knowledge of good and evil” and was driven off in the attempt to attain the “tree of life.” This tree, in restored paradise, supplies food and medicine for all.

Turpentine. A tree mentioned only in the Apocrypha (Ecclus. 24:16), the turpentine is the terebinth (butm of the Arabs), Pistacia terebinthus, L., and its variety Palaestina (P. palaestina, Boiss.). It is generally diffused, the trees being usually solitary, seldom in groves or forests. Another species, Pistacia muticia, Fisch et Meyer, is more common E of the Jordan and in Jebel Bil’âs, of the Syrian Desert. Several of the words translated “oak” in the KJV may refer to this tree. See also Oak.

Vegetables (Dan. 1:12, 16). A word of far more restricted meaning than the Heb. zēr-onîm, or zērā-ôm, something “sown,” which signifies primarily vegetables in general and more particularly edible seeds that are cooked, such as lentils, horse beans, beans, chick- peas, and the like. Daniel and his companions were pleading for a simple vegetable diet in place of the rich, unwholesome dishes of the king's table.

Vine. A plant mentioned early and frequently in Scripture. It was and is one of the most important sources of livelihood and wealth to the people of the East. It is associated with the fig, palm, and pomegranate in the enumeration of the products of the land. Gepen is generic for vine, śōrēq (Jer. 2:21), a "choice vine," and nāzîr ("unpruned vine").

Vinegar. Vinegar of excellent quality is made from the light wines of the country. It is uncertain whether the vinegar presented to our Savior on the cross was acid wine or true vinegar.

Vine of Sodom (Deut. 32:32). It is impossible to identify any plant growing near the site of Sodom that corresponds with this poetical allusion. Various plants have been suggested, but none of them fulfills the necessary conditions. The colocynth is a vine, but it does not produce clusters or grapelike fruit. The 'ushr, Calotropis procera, Willd., also bears neither clusters or grapes. Solanum nigrum, L., and its allied species, called in Arab. inab-edh-dhîb, "wolf's grapes," have fruits too small to be called grapes, are not vines, and are not peculiar to this region. Solanum coagulans, Forsk., is not a vine, and bears fruits like small tomatoes, not grapes. Cucumis prophetarum, L., produces no clusters or grapes. In our view it is better to regard the vine of Sodom as a poetic creation, similar to the wine in the same passage. The poet, filled with the idea of bitterness suggested by the waters of the Dead Sea, pictures an ideal vine, nourished by this bitter sea, producing bitter clusters, grapes of gall, the wine of which is dragon's poison and the cruel venom of asps. Such imagery is in strict accord with Heb. poetical license.

Vineyards. Vineyards are often hedged about, but as often not. They are provided with towers or booths for watchmen. The vines must be regularly pruned. Grapes are of many kinds in the Holy Land and of superior excellence. The vintage takes place in September and October, a season of great rejoicing. The grapes are either eaten as such, or dried into raisins, or the juice expressed in the wine vat and fermented into wine, or boiled down in great caldrons into dibs, i.e., grape honey. Neither the unfermented juice (mistār) of the grapes nor the inspissated syrup is known as wine. The latter is never diluted as a beverage.

Weeds (Heb. sûp; Jonah 2:5). These are sea weeds (Gk. chortos; Ecclus. 40:16), worthless land plants.

Wheat. Wheat was cultivated in Palestine and adjacent lands at an early period. Palestinian wheat was sown in November or December after the early rains. The harvest was in April, May, or June. Wheat flour constituted the ordinary ingredient of the bread of the Hebrews (Ex. 29:2). The grains were also roasted and eaten. The fertile, well-watered Nile Valley was the granary of the ancient world, particularly in times of famine (Gen. 41:22). Grains of wheat have been found in Egyptian tombs and elsewhere.

Willow. Several species of willows are found in the Holy Land. There are two Heb. words for willow—şapşāpâ, the equivalent of the Arab. sifsâf, and ārāb. Tradition says that the willow on which the Israelites hung their harps was the weeping willow, called from that circumstance Salix Babylonica, L. Many places mentioned in Scripture are named from willows.

Wormwood (Heb. la-ānâ; Gk. apsinthos). Bitter plants growing in waste, usually desert, places. They are an emblem of calamity and injustice. They belong to the genus Artemisia, of which there are five species in the tablelands and deserts of Palestine and Syria. G.E.P

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. Zohary, Plants of the Bible (1982).

VEIL (Heb. pārōket). The screen separating the Holy Place and Most Holy Place in the Tabernacle (which see) and Temple (which see). It was this piece of tapestry that was rent by the earthquake at Christ's crucifixion (Matt. 27:51; etc.).

VENGEANCE. Punishment inflicted in return for an injury or offense suffered; retribution; often passionate or unrestrained revenge.

1. Heb. nāqam, to "grudge," is to punish. In a bad sense, as of an injured person, it is to take vengeance, to avenge oneself (1 Sam. 18:25; Ezek. 25:15), and is the manifestation of vindictiveness (Lam. 3:60). When vengeance is predicted of the Lord, it must be taken in the better sense of righteous punishment (Ps. 94:1; Jer. 11:20; 20:12; etc.)

2. Gk. ekdikesis, "punishment." This word expresses the idea of vindicating one from wrongs (Luke 21:22), avenging an injured person (Acts 7:24).

VENISON. See Game.

VENOM. See Poison; Gall.

VERSIONS OF THE SCRIPTURES. A general name for translations of the Scriptures into other languages than the original. After the Heb. tongue became a dead language in the second century before Christ, and still more after the spread of Christianity, translations of the Heb. Scriptures into the prevailing languages became a necessity. Accordingly, almost every language then current had at least one version, which received ecclesiastical authority, and was used instead of the original Heb. text.

In the case of the NT, there did not for a long time exist any occasion for a translation, since the Gk. language, in which it was written, was universally prevalent in the civilized world at the time of the promulgation of the gospel. In certain provinces of the Roman Empire, however, the Lat. soon came into common use, especially in North Africa, and hence the Old Lat. and afterward the Vulgate (Vulg.) arose. Still later the Syr. version was made for the use of the oriental Christians, to whom that language was vernacular.

This article will deal principally with the Gk. LXX, the Aram. Targums, the Syr. Peshitta and the Lat. Vulg. These ancient versions were made directly from the Heb. The Samaritan Pentateuch (although not strictly a version) will also be discussed, as will also other ancient as well as modern versions.

The Greek Septuagint (LXX). The Heb. OT enjoys the unique distinction of being the first book or rather library of books, for such it is, known to be translated into another language. This translation is called the Septuagint (LXX) and was made in the third and second centuries B.C. During this period the entire Heb. Bible was put into the Gk. language. It was in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus (285–246 B.C.) that the Pentateuch was put into the Gk. tongue. Originally the term LXX was applied to the Gk. Pentateuch. Uncertainty is attached to the origin of the LXX, and its beginning is enshrouded in legend. Its alleged seventy-two translators (six from each of the twelve tribes) is traditional, the number seventy apparently being an approximation for seventy-two; or the number seventy may have developed in the course of tradition. Note that Ex. 24:1, 9 refers to the seventy elders of Israel, and the membership of the Sanhedrin was composed of that number (cf. M. Hadas, Aristeas to Philocrates, 1951). Certainly by the middle of the second century B.C. the OT was completely rendered in Gk. The name Septuagint was eventually applied to the entire Gk. OT.

Representing a pre-Masoretic Heb. text, the LXX is accordingly of basic textual and exegetical value. However, in evaluating the LXX as a translation, many factors must be kept in mind, such as the general purpose and character of the work, the peculiar difficulties facing translators, and the general principles guiding them in the performance of their task. Surveying the translation in its entirety, it may be said that it varies in its standard of excellence. The Pentateuch is on the whole a close and serviceable translation. The Psalms, on the other hand, and the book of Isaiah show obvious signs of incompetence (cf. H. B. Swete, Introduction to the O. T. in Greek, pp. 315ff.). In the latter part of Jeremiah, the Gk., according to R. R. Ottley (A Handbook to the Septuagint, p. 110), is “unintelligibly literal.” The book of Daniel is mere Midrashic paraphrase.

Use of the Septuagint in Textual Criticism. Scholars readily admit that the LXX cannot be used in a merely mechanical manner to emend the Masoretic text. Although it is indispensable in the textual criticism of the Heb. OT, the varying quality of its translation necessitates great caution. Frequently extreme literalism and freedom of rendering occur in the same verse or in close contact. The translators also employ peculiar exegetical principles. Often expressions concerning God, which were looked upon as crude or offensive, were toned down, and anthropomorphisms were frequently deleted. The translators did not mean to change the original, but their exegetical principles display a theological tendency, which, however, was not consistently carried out. In the past the Septuagint has suffered by comparison with the MT in instances where the two differed. That is to say, readings in the MT were preferred. However, as a result of studies in the Dead Sea Scrolls, the LXX has gained greater favor. For further study of the LXX in textual criticism, see C. T. Fritsch, The Anti-Anthropomorphisms of the Greek Pentateuch (1943); D. H. Gard, “The Exegetical Method of the Greek Translator of the Book of Job,” Journal of Biblical Literature, Monograph Series, vol. 8 (1952); J. W. Linguistic Studies of the Septuagint. Important studies on the LXX are included in J. H. Moulton, Grammar of N. T. Greek, vol. 1, 3d ed. (1908); and J. H. Moulton and W. F. Howard, Grammar of N. T. Greek, vol. 2 (1929). The latter also contains an appendix on Semitisms in the NT. H. St. J. Thackeray, a Grammar of the O. T. in Greek According to the Septuagint (1909), is an important volume on Septuagintal studies. Henry Snyder Gehman has a valuable article, “The Hebraic Character of Septuagint Greek,” in Vetus Testamentum 1 (1951): 81–90; also Hebraisms of the Old Greek Version of Genesis, 3 (1953): 141–48; L. C. Allen, The Greek Chronicles (1974); J. Reider’s Prologemena to a Greek-Hebrew and Hebrew-Greek Index to Aquila (1916), is also an important linguistic study of the LXX.

Handbooks of the Septuagint. H. B. Swete, An Introduction to the O. T. in Greek, revised by R. R. Ottley (1914), is an important handbook. R. R. Ottley’s A Handbook to the Septuagint (1920), is a general work. F. G. Kenyon’s The Text of the Greek Bible (1937), his Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, 5th ed. (1958), and S. Jellicoe’s, The Septuagint and Modern Study (1968), offer significant studies of the LXX.

Editions of the Septuagint. A. Rahlfs’ Septuaginta, 2 vols. (1949), and H. B. Swete, The O. T. in Greek According to the Septuagint, vol. 1 (1925); vol. 2 (1922), vol. 3 (1912), are standard. Hatch and Redpath have compiled a concordance to the LXX, two volumes and supplement (1897). Very important is the large Cambridge Edition of The O. T. in Greek begun under the editorship of A. E. Brooke and N. McLean. Volume 1, The Octateuch, appeared in 1906–17. H. St. J. Thackeray edited vol. 2 in conjunction with Brooke and McLean. This was entitled The Later Historical Books (Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Esdras, and Ezra-Nehemiah) (1927–35). Volume 3 appeared in 1940 and contained Esther, Judith, and Tobit by the same three scholars.

Another scholarly edition of the LXX, with copious critical helps, is the Septuaginta, Vetus Testamentum Graecum (Auctoritate Societatis Litterarum Gottingensis editum). Volume 9, consisting of I Maccabees, edited by W. Kappler, appeared in 1936. Volume 10, The Psalms with the Odes, edited by A. Rahlfs, was published in 1931. Volume 13, The Twelve Minor Prophets, came out in 1943. There appeared also vol. 14, Isaiah (1939); vol. 16, Ezekiel (1952); and Susannah, Daniel, Bel and the Dragon (1954).

Early Recensions of the Septuagint. From the place of its origin in Egypt, the LXX spread to all parts of the Hellenistic-Jewish world. Centers such as Antioch, Alexandria, and Caesarea developed different textual traditions. Since the LXX became the OT of the Christians, who employed it in their arguments with the Jews, a need arose for a new rendering of the OT in Gk. that would be true to the Heb. This was accomplished in Aquila's rival Jewish version made around A.D. 130. The work is a slavishly literal Gk. translation of the early second-century Heb. text.

Possibly somewhat earlier than Aquila, Theodotion revised the LXX. His version won wide popularity among Christians. Theodotion's rendering of Daniel prevails in all extant Gk. manuscripts except one. Probably toward the end of the second century Symmachus revised Aquila. By the time of Origen, A.D. 185–254, the text of the LXX had become woefully corrupt. Origen's Hexapla was a colossal undertaking to revise the text. It contained five columns in Gk. The first column consisted of the text then current consonantal Heb. The second was composed of the Heb. text rendered in Gk. letters; the third, Aquila's version; the fourth, Symmachus's version; the fifth, the LXX revised by Origen; and the sixth, Theodotion's version.

According to Harry M. Orlinsky, the so-called Tetrapla was not a separate form of Origen's critical apparatus, with two columns of the six columns left out. Rather, the designation simply refers to the work as a whole, with the four Gk. columns emphasized instead of all six in the Hexapla. Cf. "Origen's Tetrapla—a Scholarly Fiction?" in World Congress of Jewish Studies (summer 1947, 1952), pp. 173–82.

Lucian, a scholar at Antioch (d. 311), made a revision of the LXX. The occurrence of Lucianic readings in Old Lat. texts preceding Lucian precipitated grave problems, and an old-Lucian or a pre-Lucianic recension from Antioch in Syria has been postulated by such scholars as James A. Montgomery and Paul Kahle. Kahle has done extensive work in the LXX and does not believe that there was one original old Gk. version and that consequently the manuscripts of the LXX cannot actually be traced back to one archetype. He takes the position that there were earlier renderings of the Pentateuch before the revision made in the time of Ptolemy and that this revision became the standard Gk. Torah. Thus when the church needed a canonical text of the Gk. OT, it took one form of the various texts with revisions and adapted it for Christian use. Cf. Theologische Studien und Kritiken (1915), 88:410–26; The Cairo Geniza (Schweich Lectures, 1947).

P. de Lagarde, however, saw the problems involved and undertook a correct procedure for recovering the pristine text of the LXX. He was followed by A. Rahlfs, whose Septuaginta Studien (3 Heft) appeared in 1911. M. L. Margolis labored to establish the text of the LXX on Lagarde's principles in his The Book of Joshua in Greek (1931), parts 1–4 (1–19:38). Cf. Harry M. Orlinsky, "On the Present State of Proto-Septuagint Studies," Journal of the American Oriental Society 61 (1941): 81–91. Cf. also "Current Progress in Septuagint Research” in H. R. Willoughby, ed., The Study of the Bible Today and Tomorrow (1947). P. Katz (“Das Problem des Urtextes der Septuginta,” in Theologische Zeitung [1949]: 1–24) espouses Lagarde’s principles and vindicates Rahlfs’s research.

Importance of the Septuagint. The importance of the LXX from every angle can scarcely be overestimated. This can be asserted despite its deficiencies and limitations. Religiously and spiritually the LXX gave the great revealed truths concerning creation, redemption, sin, and salvation to the world. It released these from the narrow isolation of the Heb. language and people and gave them to the Greco-Roman world through the divinely prepared instrument of the Gk. language, the lingua franca of the Greco-Roman age (300 B.C. to A.D. 300). The LXX was a definite factor in the preparation for the coming of Christianity and the NT revelation. In making the OT available in the same universal language in which the NT was destined to appear, it foreshadowed the giving of the Holy Scriptures in one international and universal language of the period.

The LXX was the Bible of early Christianity before the NT was written. After the NT Scriptures came on the scene, they were added to the LXX to form the completed Scriptures of Christianity.

Besides this momentous ministry, the LXX met the religious and liturgical requirements of Jews living in Alexandria, Egypt. This was the center of culture and learning of ancient Judaism. It also met the needs of Jewish proselytes in the Greco-Roman world in the pre-Christian era, and it was a vital force in both Alexandrian Judaism and philosophy and in the philosophy of the Jewish Diaspora.

Historically as well as religiously and spiritually, the LXX is of immense importance. As the first translation of the Heb. OT into a foreign language, the LXX gained great fame. The very fact that it was put into the language of culture and education of the day made its use wide. Philo of Alexandria used the LXX extensively. Josephus depended upon it. Jesus and the NT writers quoted from it as well as from the Heb. The Jews of the Diaspora used it. However, the schools and synagogues of Palestine venerated the sacred Heb. With the dawn of Christianity the LXX became the Scripture of Christians. It was venerated and quoted and used in controversy. The Old Lat., Egyptian, Ethiopic, Gothic, Slavonic, and other versions were made from it, and it was used in early missionary activity.

The Septuagint and Later Greek Versions. By the beginning of the second century A.D., reaction against the LXX took place in Jewish circles. By this time Christians had come to venerate the LXX as inspired and authoritative and used it in controversy with Jews to prove the messiahship of Jesus. By this time many mistakes had crept into the LXX, and the Jews were particularly annoyed by the use made of it by Christians. Resulting hostility by Jewish scholars toward the LXX led to Aquila’s rival Jewish version. This extremely literal Gk. translation of the second-century Heb. text, made about A.D. 130, became a substitute for the LXX for Jews who spoke Gk. (see above). Aquila was trained under Rabbi Akiba and perfected in Jewish tradition. He stuck closely to the literal Heb. text, and for that reason his version is of critical importance.

Theodotion’s revision of the LXX was another attempt to bring the LXX into harmony with the current Heb. text. Theodotion was not a disciple of the Jewish rabbis or a slavish literalist. He was enabled to make a version attaining wide acceptance among Christians. Particularly striking was his rendering of Daniel (see above). He executed his translation possibly before Aquila. (Cf. H. M. Orlinsky, Jewish Quarterly Review N. S. 27 [1936]: 143.)

Another revision of the LXX was made by Symmachus. It was executed toward the end of the second century and was a strong reaction against Aquila’s extremely literal rendering. It was revised with the aid of the LXX and Theodotion and aimed at the meaning rather than the mere letter.

Another important milestone in the revision of the LXX was Origen's Hexapla. It was an attempt to correct the woefully corrupt Septuagintal text. Origen's labors took place in the first half of the third century A.D. This great scholar went back to the Heb. text to recover the correct text of the Gk. Bible. Precisely, Origen's Hexapla consisted of six columns, hexapla meaning sixfold. The first column was in Heb., the consonantal text. The other five columns were in Gk. The second column consisted of the Heb. text given in Gk. letters, the third Aquila's version, the fourth Symmachus's version, the fifth the LXX revised by Origen, the important column, and the sixth, Theodotion's version.

The priceless fifth column was a major critical achievement. The library at Caesarea housed the Hexapla until the seventh century A.D. when the city was burned by the Muslims. The sixth column, which had many symbols, was copied and recopied many times. It became separated from the rest of the work. The critical symbols were more or less incomprehensible. Happily, a Syr. translation of part of the fifth column with critical symbols is in existence, containing the poetic and prophetic books. It is in the Ambrosian Library at Milan. The first volume, containing the Pentateuch and the historical books, was in existence in 1574. Subsequently, however, it has disappeared. Fragments of the so-called Syro-Hexaplaric version exist in the British Museum.

Other revisions of the LXX include that of Lucian, a scholar at Antioch in the fourth century. This recension was used at Antioch and Constantinople. In Egypt, Hesychius made another revision, but little is known of this.

Manuscripts of the Septuagint. The oldest and most important of the LXX manuscripts are the following:

Codex Vaticanus (B). This valuable vellum manuscript is the property of the Roman Catholic church. Dating from the second quarter of the fourth century A.D., it came to light in 1481 when it first appeared in the Vatican Library catalog. Vaticanus offers the best text of the LXX as a whole for the OT. It contains Theodotion's translation of Daniel. In 1828–38, Cardinal A. Mai edited this great codex, but it was not made accessible to the scholarly world at large until 1889–90, when the Vatican issued a photographic facsimile of the entire contents.

Codex Alexandrinus (A). Its fame derives from the fact that in 1078 it was presented to the Patriarch of Alexandria. The National Library of the British nation came into possession of the famous manuscript in the seventeenth century, and it is now in the British Museum. It dates from the middle of the fifth century A.D. and is Egyptian in origin. This uncial codex gives the OT and the NT. Notable lacunae are Genesis, 1 Samuel, and Psalms. Apparently it generally follows Origen's Hexaplaric edition of the LXX, but contains earlier readings.

Codex Sinaiticus (Aleph [א]). This dates from the fourth century. It was discovered by Constantine Tischendorf in the famous monastery of St. Catherine's on Mt. Sinai in the middle of the nineteenth century. Codex Sinaiticus is one of the prized possessions of the British Museum, having been purchased from the Soviet Union in 1933 for more than half a million dollars. The fragments were published at various periods by the discoverer. E. Nestle collected them in a supplement to the sixth and seventh editions of Tischendorf's Vetus Testamentum Graece (1880–87).

Codex Ephraemi Rescriptus (C). This codex is in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris and dates around the fifth century A.D. The biblical text on its sixty-four OT leaves has been erased to make room for a treatise for St. Ephraim of Syria in the twelfth century. It is thus a palimpsest, and the underlying biblical text can be deciphered only with great difficulty.

Codex Cottonianus (D) and the Bodleian Genesis (E). These contain large portions of Genesis and are to be listed with the more important uncials.

Scripts Used in Septuagint Manuscripts. Septuagint manuscripts are fortunately quite numerous in the world's libraries. The earliest are called uncials and the later, cursives. The former are written in separate capital letters and the latter in small flowing script. There are about 240 uncial manuscripts now in existence. Many cursives exist. Collations of large numbers of LXX manuscripts are given in the still indispensable edition of R. Holmes and J. Parson, Vetus Testamentum Graece cum Variis lectionibus, 5 vols. (1798–1827). The “Larger Cambridge Septuagint,” ed. A. E. Brooke and N. McLean, vol. 1 (1906, etc.), also contains fragmentary manuscripts. Rahlfs’s Septuaginta (1935), is based principally on the three great uncial codices, Aleph (א), A, and B, with selective variants of other sources collated in the small critical apparatus. It is of primary critical importance.

The Aramaic Targums. These are free paraphrastic renderings of the Heb. Scriptures into Aram. The word itself comes from an Aram. quadri-literal verb trgm meaning “to translate from one language to another” or “to interpret.” When Aram. supplanted Heb., an interpreter was needed after each verse of the Heb. Bible was read in order to render the passage freely in the language of the people. For a long time oral, the Targums were finally written down. The original Palestinian Targums of the Law and the Prophets (those of the Writings are later) date from the second century A.D. They were edited in Babylonia during the third century and are extant in the form of late recensions.

The Targum of Onkelos. The oldest and best Targum on the Pentateuch is the one designated Onkelos. Five good-sized pieces, placed by scholars about A.D. 700–900, of a Palestinian Pentateuchal Targum differing from Onkelos were discovered in a genizah (storeroom or repository) of an ancient synagogue in Old Cairo. Freely paraphrastic with Haggadic addition, it displays an underlying Heb. consonantal text differing from the Masoretic. Paul Kahle describes the Aram. as stemming from the first century, representing, he claims, a much earlier stage in the history of the Targums than that of the other Targums.

The Targum of Jonathan. The Targum of Jonathan on the Prophets is the oldest and the official Targum on the Prophets (Joshua, Kings, Isaiah, and the minor prophets). It is much more paraphrastic than Onkelos and often becomes a running commentary. It was revised in Palestine, rewritten in Babylon in the fourth and fifth centuries, and survives in a different recension in the Codex Reuchlinianus, edited by P. de Lagarde in 1872. The Targums on the Hagiographa are several in number; one on the Psalms, Job, and Proverbs is in existence and another on the Rolls (Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther). Another is extant on Chronicles. The Targum on Esther appeared in three recensions, attesting its wide popularity. The Targums on the Megilloth (rolls) and on Chronicles seemingly belong to an ancient Jerusalem Targum on the Kethubim.

Targum of Jonathan-ben-Uzziel and Jerushalmi-Targum on the Pentateuch. Onkelos and Jonathan on the Pentateuch and Prophets, whatever be their exact date, place, authorship, and editorship, are the oldest of existing Targums and belong, in their present shape, to Babylon and the Babylonian academies flourishing between the third and fourth centuries A.D. The one extending from the first verse of Genesis to the last of Deuteronomy is known by the name of Targum Jonathan (ben Uzziel), or Pseudo-Jonathan, on the Pentateuch. The other, interpreting single verses, often single words only, is extant in the following proportions: a third on Genesis, a fourth on Deuteronomy, a fifth on Numbers, three-twentieths on Exodus, and approximately one-fourteenth on Leviticus. The latter is generally called Targum Jerushalmi, or, down to the eleventh century (Hai Gaon, Chananel), Targum Erets Israel, Targum of Jerusalem, or of the Land of Israel. Not before the first half of this century did the fact become fully and incontestably established that both Targums were in reality one—that both were known down to the fourteenth century under no other name than Targum Jerushalmi—and that some forgetful scribe, about that time, must have taken the abbreviation “y,” “j” (T. J.) over one of the two documents, and instead of dissolving it into Targum-

Jerushalmi, dissolved it erroneously into what he must until then have been engaged in copying, namely, Targum-Jonathan, scribe ben Uzziel (on the Prophets).

Targums of Joseph the Blind on the Hagiographa. The Targums on the Hagiographa that we now possess have been attributed vaguely to different authors, it being assumed in the first instance that they were the work of one man. Popular belief fastened upon Joseph the Blind. Yet, if ever he did translate the Hagiographa, it is certain that those we possess are not by his or his disciples' hands, i.e., of the time of the fourth century. Between him and our hagiographical Targums, many centuries must have elapsed.

Targum on the Book of Chronicles. This Targum was unknown up to a recent period. In 1680 it was edited for the first time from an Erfurt manuscript by M. F. Beck, and in 1715 from a more complete as well as correct manuscript at Cambridge, by D. Wilkins. The name of Hungary occurring in it and its frequent use of the Jerusalem-Targum to the Pentateuch, amounting sometimes to simple copying, show sufficiently that its author is neither "Jonathan B. Uzziel" nor "Joseph the Blind," as has been suggested. But the language, style, and the Haggadah, with which it abounds, point to a late period and to Palestine as the place where it was written. Its use must be limited to philological, historical, and geographical studies.

The Targum to Daniel. Munk found it, not indeed in the original Aram., but in what appears to him to be an extract of it written in Persian.

Apocryphal Pieces of Esther. There is also an Aram. translation extant of the apocryphal pieces of Esther.

The Syriac Peshitta. The spread of Christianity into Syria necessitated the translation of the Bible into the Syr. language. Syriac belongs to the Aram. branch of the Semitic languages and might be termed "Christian Aramaic."

The Old Syriac. Although no manuscript of the Old Syr. version has survived, nevertheless such a translation existed and preceded the later Peshitta Syr. version. This is proved from quotations in St. Ephraem's Commentaries on the Acts and Pauline epistles preserved in the Armenian tongue. Cf. Conybeare in J. H. Ropes, The Text of Acts (1926), pp. 373–453. Old Syr. variants persist in church authors down to the twelfth century, as Vööbus's researches have demonstrated. This Old Syr. version probably stems from Edessa. C. C. Torrey, however, maintains that Palestine was the place of its origin (Documents of the Primitive Church [1941], pp. 345–70).

The Peshitta Syriac Version. The common Syr. Bible, corresponding to the Vulg. of the Lat., after the ninth century A.D. came to be known as the Peshitta. This expression denotes "simple," presumably to differentiate it from the symbols and complexities of the Syro-Hexaplaric version, based on the LXX as found in Origen's Hexapla. A number of scholars are of the opinion that the Peshitta of the OT, particularly of the Pentateuch, is of Jewish or Christian-Jewish origin. R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the O. T. (1941), p. 120; A. Baumstark, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur (1922), p. 18; J. Block, American Journal of Semitic Languages 35 (1919): 215–22. Books such as Genesis, 2 Samuel, and Psalms display influence from the Septuagint. Proverbs is a free translation but faithful to the original as a whole. Chronicles is quite paraphrastic, like the Targums. Esther is a good translation of the Heb. Ezra and Lamentations stick close to the MT.

The Palestinian Syriac. The Pentateuch of this version, scholars commonly maintain, was made from the LXX. However, some authorities are of the opinion that it refers back to a Jewish-Palestinian Pentateuch Targum. Cf. Baumstark, Oriens Christianus, 3d series, vol. 10, pp. 201–24.

The Philoxenian Syriac. The difficulty here is whether the Philoxenian Syr. version was reissued by Thomas of Heraclea (Harclean Syr.) or whether the second was an entirely new version. Be this as it may, in the Acts of the Apostles the textual variants of the Harclean Syr.

are of such weight that they are second only to Codex Bezae in significance for the Western text. Cf. Guenther Zuntz, The Ancestry of the Harklean N. T. (1945).

Vulgate. The term Vulgate is the popular name given to the common Lat. version of the Bible, usually attributed to Jerome. This version should be of a deep interest to all the Western churches. For many centuries it was the only Bible generally used; and, directly or indirectly, it is the real parent of all the vernacular versions of western Europe. The Gothic version of Ulphilas alone is independent of it. In the age of the Reformation the Vulg. was the guide rather than the source of the popular versions. That of Luther (NT, in 1523) was the most important, and in this the Vulg. had great weight. From Luther the influence of the Lat. passed to our own King James Version. But the claims of the Vulg. to the attention of the scholars rest on wider grounds. It is not only the source of our current theological terminology, but it is, in one shape or other, the most important early witness to the text and interpretation of the whole Bible.

Name. The name Vulgate, which is equivalent to Vulgata editio (the current text of Holy Scripture), has necessarily been used differently in various ages of the church. There can be no doubt that the phrase originally answered to the koinē ekdosis of the Gk. Scriptures. In this sense it is used constantly by Jerome in his commentaries.

The Old Latin Versions. The history of the earliest Lat. version of the Bible is lost in obscurity. All that can be affirmed with certainty is that it was made in Africa. During the first two centuries the church of Rome was essentially Greek-speaking. The same condition was true of Gaul; but the church of North Africa seems to have been Latin-speaking from the first. At what date this church was founded is uncertain. It is from Tertullian that we must seek the earliest testimony to the existence and character of the Old Latin (Vetus Latina). On the first point the evidence of Tertullian, if candidly examined, is decisive. He distinctly recognizes the general currency of a Lat. version of the NT, although not necessarily of every book at present included in the canon. This was characterized by a “rudeness” and “simplicity” that seem to point to the nature of its origin. The version of the NT appears to have arisen from individual and successive efforts; and the work of private hands would necessarily be subject to revision for ecclesiastical use. The separate books would be united in a volume, and thus a standard text of the whole collection would be established. With regard to the OT the case is less clear. It is probable that the Jews who were settled in North Africa were confined to the Greek towns; otherwise it might be supposed that the Lat. version of the OT is in part anterior to the Christian era, and that (as in the case of Gk.) a preparation for a Christian Lat. dialect was already made when the gospel was introduced into Africa. However this may have been, the substantial similarity of the different parts of the OT and the NT establishes a connection between them and justifies the belief that there was one popular Lat. version of the Bible current in Africa in the last quarter of the second century.

With regard to the African canon of the NT, the old version offers important evidence. From considerations of style and language, it seems certain that the epistle to the Hebrews, James, and 2 Peter did not form part of the original African version. In the OT, on the other hand, the Old Lat. erred by excess and not by defect.

The Labors of Jerome. At the close of the fourth century the Lat. texts of the Bible current in the Western church had fallen into the greatest corruption. The evil was yet greater in prospect than at the time, for the separation of the East and West was growing imminent. But in the crisis of danger the great scholar was raised up who probably alone, for 1,500 years, possessed the qualifications necessary for producing an original version of the Scriptures for the use of the Lat. churches. Jerome (Eusebius Hieronymus) was born in A.D. 329, at Stridon, in Dalmatia, and died at Bethlehem A.D. 420. After long and self-denying studies in the East and West, Jerome went to Rome in A.D. 382, probably at the request of Damasus, the pope, to assist in an important synod. His active biblical labors date from this epoch. In examining them it will be convenient to follow the order of time, noticing (1) the revision of the Old Lat. version of the NT; (2) the revision of the Old Lat. version (from the Gk.) of the OT; (3) the new version of the OT from the Heb.

Jerome had not been long in Rome (A.D. 383) when Damasus asked him to make a revision of the current Lat. version of the NT with the help of the Gk. original. "There were," he says, "almost as many forms of text as copies." The gospels had naturally suffered most. Jerome therefore applied himself to these first. But his aim was to revise the Old Lat. and not to make a new version. Yet, although he had this limited objective, the various forms of corruption that had been introduced were, as he describes them, so numerous that the difference of the old and revised (Hieronymian) text is clear and striking throughout. Some of the changes Jerome introduced were made purely on linguistic grounds, but it is impossible to ascertain on what principle he proceeded in this respect. Others involved questions of interpretation. But the greater number consisted in the removal of the interpolations by which especially the synoptic gospels were disfigured. This revision, however, was hasty.

Jerome next undertook the revision of the OT from the LXX. About the same time (about A.D. 383) at which he was engaged on the revision of the NT, Jerome undertook also a first revision of the Psalter. This he made with the help of the Gk., but the work was not complete or careful. This revision was called the Roman Psalter, probably because it was made for the use of the Roman church at the request of Damasus. In a short time "the old error prevailed over the new correction." Therefore, at the urgent request of Paula and Eustochium, Jerome commenced a new and more thorough revision (Gallican Psalter). The exact date at which this was made is not known. But it may be fixed with great probability very shortly after A.D. 387, when he retired to Bethlehem, and certainly before 391, when he had begun his new translations from the Heb. In the new revision Jerome attempted to represent as far as possible, by the help of the Gk. version, the real reading of the Heb. This new edition soon obtained wide popularity. Gregory of Tours is said to have introduced it from Rome into the public services in France, and from this it obtained the name of the Gallican Psalter. Numerous manuscripts remain containing the Lat. Psalter in two or more forms. From the second (Gallican) revision of the Psalms, Jerome appears to have proceeded to a revision of the other books of the OT, restoring all, with the help of the Gk., to generally conform with the Heb. The revised texts of the Psalter and Job have alone been preserved, but there is no reason to doubt that Jerome carried out his design of revising all the "canonical Scriptures." He speaks of this work as a whole in several places and distinctly represents it as a Lat. version of Origen's Hexaplar text (although the reference may be confined to the Psalter, which was the immediate subject of discussion). But though it seems certain that the revision was made, there is great difficulty in tracing its history.

The next work of Jerome was the translation of the OT from the Heb. This version was not undertaken with any ecclesiastical sanction, as the revision of the gospels was, but at the urgent request of private friends. Or it was from his own sense of the imperious necessity of the work. Its history is told in the main in the prefaces to the several installments that were successively published. The books of Samuel and Kings were issued first, and to these he prefixed the famous Prologus galeatus, addressed to Paula and Eustochium, in which he gave an account of the Heb. canon. At the time when this was published (about A.D. 391–92), other books seem to have been already translated. In 393 the sixteen prophets were in circulation, and Job had recently been put into the hands of Jerome's most intimate friends. Indeed, it would appear that already in 392 he had in some sense completed a version of the OT; but many books were not completed and published until some years afterward. The next books he put into circulation, but with the provision that they should be confined to friends, were Ezra and Nehemiah. He translated them at the request of Dominica and Rogatianus, who had urged him to carry out the task for three years. This was probably in the year 394, for in the preface he alludes to his intention of discussing a question he treats in Epistle 57, written in 395. In the preface to the Chronicles he alludes to the same epistle as “lately written,” and these books may therefore be set down for that year. The three books of Solomon followed (A.D. 398), having been “the work of three days,” when he had just recovered from the effects of a severe illness. The Octateuch (i.e., Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, and Esther) was probably issued after A.D. 400. The remaining books were completed at the request of Eustochius, shortly after the death of Paula (A.D. 404).

Thus the present Vulg. contains elements belonging to every period and form of the Lat. version: (1) Unrevised Old Latin: Wisdom, Eccclus., 1 and 2 Macc., Baruch; (2) Old Latin revised from the LXX: Psalter; (3) Jerome’s free translation from the original text: Judith, Tobit; (4) Jerome’s translation from the original: OT except Psalter; (5) Old Latin revised from manuscripts: Gospels; (6) Old Latin cursorily revised: the remainder of NT.

Revision of Alcuin. Meanwhile the text of the different parts of the Lat. Bible were rapidly deteriorating, the simultaneous use of the old and new versions necessarily leading to great corruptions of both texts. Mixed texts were formed according to the taste or judgment of scribes, and the confusion was further increased by changes introduced by those having some knowledge of the Gk. The growing corruption, which could not be checked by private labor, attracted the attention of Charlemagne, who entrusted to Alcuin (about A.D. 802) the task of revising the Lat. text for public use. This Alcuin appears to have done simply by the use of manuscripts of the Vulg. and not by reference to the original texts. Alcuin’s revision probably contributed much toward preserving a good Vulg. text. The best manuscripts of his recension do not differ widely from the pure Hieronymian text, and his authority must have done much to check the spread of the interpolations that reappear afterward and that were derived from the intermixture of the old and new versions. But the new revision was gradually deformed, though later attempts at correction were made by Lanfranc of Canterbury (A.D. 1089), Cardinal Nicolaus (A.D. 1150), and the Cistercian abbot Stephanus (about A.D. 1150).

History of the Printed Text. It was a noble omen for the future of printing that the first book issued from the press was the Bible; and the splendid pages of the Mazarin Vulgate (Mainz: Gutenberg and Fust) stand yet unsurpassed by the latest efforts of typography. This work is referred to about the year 1455 and presents the common text of the fifteenth century. Other editions followed in rapid succession. The first collection of various readings appears in a Paris edition of 1504, and others followed at Venice and Lyons in 1511, 1513; but Cardinal Ximenes (1502–17) was the first who seriously revised the Lat. text, to which he assigned the middle place of honor in his polyglot between the Heb. and Gk. texts. This was followed in 1528 (2d edition, 1532) by an edition of R. Stephens. About the same time various attempts were made to correct the Lat. from the original texts (Erasmus, 1516; Pagninus, 1518–28; Cardinal Cajetan; Steuchius, 1529; Clarius, 1542), or even to make a new Lat. version (Jo. Campensis, 1533). A more important edition of R. Stephens followed in 1540, in which he made use of twenty manuscripts and introduced considerable alterations into his former text. In 1541 another edition was published by Jo. Benedictus at Paris, which was based on the collation of manuscripts and editions, and was often reprinted afterward. Vercellone speaks much more highly of the Biblia Ordinaria, with glosses, etc., published at Lyons, 1545, as giving readings in accordance with the oldest manuscripts, though the sources from which they are derived are not given.

The Sixtine and Clementine Vulgates. The first session of the Council of Trent was held on December 13, 1545. After some preliminary arrangements the Nicene Creed was formally declared as the foundation of the Christian faith on February 4, 1546, and then the council proceeded to the question of the authority, text, and interpretation of Holy Scripture. A committee was appointed to report upon the subject; it held private meetings from February 20 to March 17. Considerable varieties of opinion existed as to the relative value of the original and Lat. texts, and the final decree was intended to serve as a compromise. In affirming the authority of the “old Vulgate” it contains no estimate of the value of the original texts. A papal board was engaged upon the work of revision, but it was currently reported that the difficulties of publishing an authoritative edition were insurmountable. Nothing further was done toward the revision of the Vulg. under Gregory XIII, but preparations were made for an edition of the LXX. This appeared in 1587, in the second year of the pontificate of Sixtus V, who had been one of the chief promoters of the work. After the publication of the LXX, Sixtus immediately devoted himself to the production of an edition of the Vulg. He himself revised the text, and when the work was printed he examined the sheets with the utmost care and corrected the errors with his own hand. The edition appeared in 1590, with the famous constitution Aeternus ille (dated March 1, 1589) prefixed, in which Sixtus affirmed with characteristic decision the plenary authority of the edition for all future time. He further expressly forbade the publication of various readings in copies of the Vulg. Upon the accession of Gregory XIV, a commission was appointed to revise the Sixtine text, under the presidency of the Cardinal Colonna (Columna). At first the commissioners made but slow progress, and it seemed likely that a year would elapse before the revision was completed. The mode of proceeding was therefore changed, and the commission moved to Zagorolo, the country seat of Colonna. If we may believe the inscription that still commemorates the event, and the current report of the time, the work was completed in nineteen days. The task was hardly finished when Gregory died (October 1591), and the publication of the revised text was again delayed. His successor, Innocent IX, died within the same year, and at the beginning of 1592 Clement VIII was raised to the papacy. Clement entrusted the final revision of the text to Toletus, and the whole was printed before the end of 1592.

Revision of the Vulgate. Revision of the Lat. Vulg. was undertaken by the Roman Catholic church in 1907. Pope Pius X delegated Abbot Gasquet, leader of the English Benedictines, as head of a commission to revise the Vulg. text. Nine volumes have appeared: Genesis (1926); Exodus, Leviticus (1929); Numbers, Deuteronomy (1936); Joshua, Judges, Ruth (1939); Samuel (1944); Kings (1945); Chronicles (1948); Ezra, Tobias, Judith (1950); Esther, Job (1951). However, the rule for evaluating variant readings for the revised Vulg. has been subject to serious challenge by many critics, namely, E. K. Rand, Stummer, and Chapman.

In 1941 the Roman church began a new translation of the Psalms directly from the Heb. This work appeared in 1944. In 1945 a second edition came from the press with the seventeen canticles in the OT and NT that are used in the Roman Breviary. See Augustinus Bea, Il Nuova salterio latino (2d ed., 1946), in French (1948) and in German (1949).

Augustinus Bea put out his Lat. rendering of the book of Ecclesiastes in 1950. Faithfulness to the original Heb. was aimed at, but the Lat. Vulg., as well as other versions, exerted strong influence.

The Samaritan Pentateuch. Actually, the Samaritan Pentateuch is not a version of a portion of the Heb. OT, but is a part of the text itself. It is an independent text of the Pentateuch that has had its own distinct transmission by scribes from the fifth century B.C. without any known contacts with the numerous Heb. texts.

Origin. After the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity in 530 B.C., the Samaritans offered their aid in rebuilding the Jewish Temple. They became persistent enemies of the Jews when their offer was refused and did all in their power to hinder the work of building (Ezra 4). At the time of Nehemiah they continued their opposition. They did their best to stop the building of the walls of Jerusalem. Under Nehemiah’s regime the grandson of the high priest Eliashib was discovered to have married the daughter of Sanballat, the governor of Samaria and a bitter foe of the Jews. Nehemiah expelled the offender along with others who would not commit themselves to the general reformation (Neh. 13:28–30). This incident, which took place around 432 B.C., has been widely regarded as furnishing the historical background of the Samaritan split.

Josephus, the historian of the first century A.D., misplaces the story a century later in the time of Alexander the Great. He actually names the expelled priest as Manasseh and declares that he took with him a copy of the law when he fled to Samaria and established the rival cult in the Mt. Gerizim temple. This, undoubtedly, is the traditional basis of the Jewish-Samaritan hostility, with a rival temple and priesthood on Mt. Gerizim at Shechem, and a rival torah as the sacred book of the new religious system.

Critical Value. The first appearance of the Samaritan Pentateuch to the modern scholarly world in 1616 aroused great hopes of its high textual value. It has, however, failed to fulfill these expectations. Gesenius, the celebrated Hebraist, in 1815 attributed little critical help to the Samaritan Pentateuch, holding that in scarcely a single instance was it superior to the Masoretic reading. The sweeping character of Gesenius's conclusions has not been accepted in recent years by all scholars. The tendency is to give more consideration to Samaritan readings. However, there are several considerations tending to decrease the critical importance of the Samaritan Pentateuch. First, it covers the best-preserved part of the OT. The law of Moses is not only the best-preserved portion of the Heb. Bible but the best-translated part. It is, accordingly, the section needing least correction and benefiting least from an independent textual tradition.

Second, the bulk of the variations from the Heb. text are unimportant. It varies from the traditional MT in some 6,000 cases, agreeing with the Septuagint in about 1,900 instances. A large proportion of those are quite insignificant as affecting the meaning of the passage. Only a few are actually important. Cf. Paul Kahle in Theologische Studien und Kritiken 88 (1915): 399–429.

A. Sperber is of the opinion that the grammatical variations are to some degree explainable on the thesis that the Samaritan text retains North Israelite dialectal peculiarities, whereas the MT preserves a southern or Judean dialectal tradition (Hebrew Union College Annual 12–13 [1937–38]: 151ff.). H. M. Wiener, The Expositor, 8th series, 2 (1911): 200–219, demonstrates that when the Gk. version diverges most from the MT, the Samaritans followed the latter with great closeness.

From about fifty quotations preserved on the notes in Origen's Hexapla, it is now known that there was a Gk. translation of the Samaritan Pentateuch known as the Samariticon. Discovery of fragments of the version (Gen. 37; Deut. 24–29; ed. P. Glaue and A. Rahlfs, Mitteilungen des Septuaginta-Unternehmens, vol. 2 [1911]) point to the conclusion that it was executed from the Samaritan Pentateuch by translators who knew the Septuagint.

Paul Kahle's research has shown that several Arab. versions of the Samaritan Pentateuch were made from the eleventh to the thirteenth century (cf. The Cairo Geniza, pp. 36–39).

In the third place, the manuscripts of the Samaritan Pentateuch are of a late date. The eighteenth-century textual critic Kennicott collected sixteen Samaritan manuscripts, none of those being as old as the oldest Heb. manuscripts. The one in the New York Library dates from A.D. 1232 and is the oldest. The first copy of the Samaritan Pentateuch to reach Europe, after a millennium of oblivion, was taken there by the Italian traveler Pietro della Valle from the Samaritan community in Damascus. It appeared in the Paris Polyglot (1645) and the London Polyglot (1657). The Samaritan Pentateuch was known to Origen, Eusebius of Caesarea, Ephiphanius, etc., a millennium before, but subsequently was lost to scholarship.

History. The Samaritan Pentateuch is found vaguely quoted by some of the early Fathers of the church, under the name of "the old Hebrew according to the Samaritans." Eusebius of Caesarea observes that the LXX and the Samaritan Pentateuch agree against the received text in the number of years from the Deluge to Abraham. Cyril of Alexandria speaks of certain words (Gen. 4:8) not present in the Heb., but found in the Samaritan. The Talmud, on the other hand, mentions the Samaritan Pentateuch distinctly and contemptuously as a clumsily forged record. Down to within the last 250 years, however, no copy of this divergent code of laws had reached Europe, and it began to be pronounced a fiction, and the plain words of the church Fathers—the better-known authorities—who quoted it, were subjected to subtle interpretations. Suddenly, in 1616, Pietro della Valle, one of the first discoverers also of the cuneiform inscriptions, acquired a complete codex from the Samaritans in Damascus. In 1623 it was presented by Achille Harley de Saucy to the Library of the Oratory in Paris, and in 1628 there appeared a brief description of it by J. Morinus in his preface to the Roman text of the LXX. It was published in the Paris Polyglot, whence it was copied, with few emendations from other codices, by Walton. The number of manuscripts in Europe gradually grew to sixteen. During the present century another fragmentary copy was acquired by the Gotha Library. A copy of the Pentateuch with Targum (? Samaritan version) in parallel columns, quarto, on parchment, was taken from Nâblus by Grove in 1861 for the Comte de Paris.

Perhaps the main contribution of the Samaritan Pentateuch to modern criticism is its striking attestation to the substantial accuracy of the MT. It is, as we have seen, in striking agreement with the text except in mostly unimportant variations.

Other Ancient Versions. As Christianity spread, new Scripture versions began to appear.

The Coptic Version. The conversion to Christianity of the native Egyptians unfamiliar with Gk., beginning in the third century, resulted in the formation of a Coptic, or Egyptian, church and created a need for a translation of the Bible into Coptic dialects. The earliest version, completed about 350, is the Sahidic, the dialect of Upper Egypt. Translations were also made into Akhmimic, also Upper Egypt; Fayumic, Middle Egypt; and Bohairic, around Alexandria. All of these versions were made from fourth-century LXX texts but contained occasional earlier readings (cf. Henry Snyder Gehman, Journal of Biblical Literature 46 [1927]:279–330; Coptic biblical manuscripts are available in the Bibliothecae Pierpont Morgan codices coptici photographice expressi ... [1922], 56 vols.). Winifred Kammerer, A Coptic Bibliography (1950), describes the contents of these volumes.

Gehman's textual researches on Daniel demonstrate that the Sahidic version reflects a blending of Origen's Hexaplaric text, Theodotion, and Hesychius. He found, moreover, that the Bohairic was made from the Hexaplaric text affected by Hesychius. Sahidic Acts shows close connection with Codex Vaticanus.

The Ethiopic Version. Christianity was introduced into Abyssinia by Christian missionaries in the fourth century. Between the fifth and eighth centuries the Bible was translated into Ethiopic. Scholars say that outside of Abyssinia there exist about twelve hundred manuscripts of various parts of the Ethiopic Bible, most of them dating late (from the sixteenth to the eighteenth century). Most of these, it is shown, were revised with the aid of Arab. translations. The Ethiopic Bible does not show signs of a single unified text influenced throughout by the same Gk. source. Gleave's studies uphold Charles's thesis that the Ethiopic reflects Symmachus's Gk. and shows signs of Origen's Hexapla. Montgomery believes translators followed the Gk. text in the NT slavishly at times and in other instances they paraphrased loosely where the passage was too difficult for them (cf. James A. Montgomery, "The Ethiopic Text of Acts of the Apostles," Harvard Theological Review 27 [1934]:169–205).

The Arabic Versions. The rapid expansion of Islam after the death of Mohammed (632) disseminated the Arab. language and created a need for an Arab. translation. The first recorded version is that of John, Bishop of Seville, made in 724, a dozen years after the Muslims overran Spain. Saadia Gaon's version made from the Heb. (tenth century) was the first and most important Arab. version among the Jews. Two Arab. versions were current in Egypt, one from the Bohairic dialect and the other from the Sahidic. Both were influenced by the Heb. and Samaritan texts.

Bucking traditional scholarly opinion, a number of investigators have favored a pre-Islamic date for the early Arab. versions (cf. Curt Peters, Acta orientalia 18 [1940]: 124–37; Anton Baumstark, Islamica 4 [1931]:562–75). The Arab. text of the prophetic books in the Paris Polyglot was translated at Alexandria, Egypt, from a Gk. text, according to Vaccari, which was close to Codex Alexandrinus (Biblica 2 [1921]: 401–23; 3 [1922]: 401–23; 4 [1923]: 312–14).

The Armenian and Georgian Versions. The Armenian Bible came into existence as a nationalistic and religious reaction against the use of Syr. in public worship, a language incomprehensible to the common people. According to Moses of Chorene, Mesrop, the inventor of the Armenian alphabet, at the beginning of the fifth century began a translation of the Bible from the Syr. According to Lazar of Pharphi, the translation was made not from the Syr. but from the Gk. Modern critics argue the point. J. A. Robinson, Conybeare, Merk, Blake, and Baumstark hold that it was translated from the Syr. Macler, Colwell, and Lyonnet hold that it was translated directly from the Gk. Recently Lyonnet has explored the possibility that there existed an Armenian Diatessaron and that this is reflected in the Armenian gospels (St. Lyonnet, Les origines de la version armenienne et le Diatessaron [1950]).

The Georgian church separated from the Armenian at the end of the sixth century. Thus the Georgian version of the Scriptures is closely akin to the Armenian. The original translation shows an Armenian-Syriac foundation that indicates some septuagintal influence. R. P. Blake holds that the manuscript tradition of the various parts of the Georgian OT is not uniform. According to him, Armenian and LXX Gk. were the languages of the original translation and later revision, which were made at different times and from different archetypes.

The edition printed in Moscow in 1743 is presumably a revision of a direct translation from the Armenian. Recent scholarship has shown that it is much closer to the Armenian text than had been previously imagined. The earliest known manuscripts for the gospels are the Adysh manuscript (A.D. 897), Opiza manuscript (A.D. 913), and Tbet (A.D. 995). These hand down two strata of the Old Georgian text, and both are connected with the Caesarean family.

Gothic and Slavonic Versions. Both of these translations are based on the Lucianic recension of the LXX. The Gothic Bible was prepared about 350 by Ulfilas, called “the apostle to the Goths,” a warlike Teutonic race living in Dacia N of the Danube River and W of the Black Sea. Wilhelm Streitberg edited existing fragments of both the OT and NT and reconstructed the Gk. Vorlage (Die gotische Bibel [1908]; 3d ed. [1950]). Cf. Hans Lietzmann, “Die Vorlage der gotischen Bible,” Zeitschrift fuer deutsches Altertum und deutsche Literatur 56 (1919); W. S. Friederichsen, The Gothic Version of the Gospels, A Study of Its Style and Textual History (1926); id., The Gothic Version of the Epistles, A Study of Style and Textual History (1939).

In the ninth century the Slavonic version was made by Cyril and Methodius, two missionaries who were converted Slavs, a people from Asia who had settled in central and eastern Europe. The oldest copy of the entire Slavonic Bible is dated 1499. Whether influence from the Lat. Vulg. can be detected in the Old Slavonic has been argued against by Meillet (Revue des études slaves 6 [1926]: 39–41).

The Anglo-Saxon Version. Researchers have shown that underlying the Anglo-Saxon version are various recensions of the Vulg., notably the Irish recension and that of Alcuin. Alongside of this are strains of Old Latin texts. Peters believes that a Tatianic element has been transmitted by means of the Old Latin. Cf. Allison Drake, The Authorship of the West Saxon Gospels (1894); L. M. Harris, Studies in the Anglo-Saxon Version of the Gospels (1901); James W. Bright, The Gospel of Saint John in West Saxon (1904–6); Curt Peters, in Biblica 23 (1942): 323–32, who discusses the Diatessaron text of Matt. 2:9 and the West Saxon version of the gospels. M.F.U.

VILLAGE. A collection of houses less regular and important than a town (which see) or city (which see). “Village” is the rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words.

1. Heb. kāpār, “protected” (1 Chron. 27:25; Song of Sol. 7:11) is the proper term for village. It appears also in the forms kpîr (“covered” as by walls; Neh. 6:2, see marg.), and kōpēr (1 Sam. 6:18); and is represented by the Arab. kefr, still so much used. In the Heb. the prefix kāpār implied a regular village, such as Capernaum, which had in later times, however, outgrown the limits implied by its original designation.

2. Heb. ḥāṣēr, “enclosed,” is properly an enclosure, as of farm buildings enclosing a court (Josh. 13:23, 28), the encampment of nomads (Gen. 25:16; Deut. 2:23), and of hamlets near towns (Josh. 15:32–62; 1 Chron. 4:33; Neh. 11:25), especially unwalled pastures of walled towns (Lev. 25:31; cf. v. 34).

3. Gk. komē is applied to Bethpage (Matt. 21:2), Bethany (Luke 10:38; John 11:1), Emmaus (Luke 24:13), and Bethlehem (John 7:42). A distinction between city or town (polis) and village (kōmē) is pointed out in Luke 8:1.

VINE.

Names. The following Heb. and Gk. names denote the vine:

1. Heb. gepen, “twining,” or more definitely, gepen hayyayin, “the vine of the wine” (Gen. 40:9 and fifty-two other places).

2. Heb. śôrēq is a term denoting some choice kind of wine (Jer. 2:21; Isa. 5:2; Gen. 49:11), thought to be the same as that now called in Morocco serki, and in Persia kishmish, with small, round, dark berries and soft stones.

3. Heb. nāzîr, “unpruned,” is an “untrimmed vine” (Lev. 25:5, 11), i.e., one that every seventh and every fiftieth year was not pruned.

4. Gk. ampelos, a generic word for vine.

Culture. The grapevine (Vitis vinifera) is supposed to be a native of the shores of the Caspian. Its culture extends from about the twenty-first to the fiftieth degree of N latitude and reaches from Portugal on the W to the confines of India on the E. It is, however, only along the center of this zone that the finest wines are made. Although Egypt is not now noted for its grapes, they are mentioned early in Scripture (Gen. 40:9–11; Num. 20:5; Ps. 78:47), and the monuments amply confirm the culture of grapes in ancient Egypt.

Palestine, even before Israel took possession of it, was a land of vineyards (Deut. 6:11; 28:30; cf. Num. 13:23). Moses enacted rules and regulations for the culture of the vines while their prospective owners still wandered in the desert (Ex. 22:5; 23:11; Lev. 25:5, 11; Num. 6:3; Deut. 22:9; 23:24; 24:21). For this culture the portion of Judah was especially adapted. When the tribe of Judah obtained for their inheritance the hilly slopes of the S, the prophecy of their ancestor was fulfilled, “He washes his garments in wine, and his robes in the blood of grapes” (Gen. 49:11). Here, more than elsewhere, are to be seen on the sides of the hills the vineyards, marked by their watchtowers (see Towers) and walls, placed on their ancient terraces—the earliest and latest symbol of Judah. The elevation of the hills and tablelands of Judah is the true climate of the vine, and at Hebron, according to the Jewish tradition, was its primeval seat. It was from the Judean valley of Eshcol—“the torrent of the cluster”—that the spies cut down the gigantic cluster of grapes. Although from many of its most famous haunts the vine has disappeared—e.g., from Engedi—both in southern Palestine and on the slopes of Lebanon there are specimens sufficient to vindicate the old renown of this “land of vineyards.” The grapes of Hebron are still considered the finest in the Holy Land. Bunches weighing from six to seven pounds are said to be by no means uncommon.

Vineyard (Heb. kerem, “garden”; Gk. ampelōn). The preparation of a vineyard is the most costly and troublesome of all the operations of that primitive husbandry in Eastern lands, the methods of which have remained unchanged and unimproved from the earliest records. It is, in fact, the only branch of agriculture practiced there that demands any considerable outlay. In the first place, the vineyard must be carefully enclosed by a permanent fence, which is required for no other crop. The pasturelands outside the villages are all unfenced, and the boundaries only marked by well-known stones or landmarks. The grainfields are equally open, or only protected by thorn branches strewn on the ground, whereas the olive yards nearer the town or village are equally unprotected. When the vineyard has been thus hedged, the next operation is to gather out the stones; not the small stones that strew all the hillsides and are indispensable for the retention of moisture in the soil but the larger boulders, which are heaped in long rows like a ruined stone wall. On these rows the vines are trailed to preserve the fruit from dampness. Next there must be a wine press (which see) hewn out of the native rock; for the grapes are always pressed on the spot, lest they should be bruised and injured by conveying them a distance. These wine presses, or vats, are the most imperishable records of the past in the deserted land. They are simply two parallel troughs, one above the other, with a perforated channel between them. The bunches of grapes are thrown into the upper vat, where they are trodden, and the juice flows into the lower one. These “wine vats,” found in abundance through the whole land and even far into the southern desert, are silent witnesses to its former fertility. Then, unless the vineyard adjoins the village, there must be a temporary lodge, or booth, erected on poles. But, more generally, a permanent tower, of which many traces may still be seen, was built for the watchman to use during the season, to guard the vintage from thieves or jackals (cf. Isa. 5:1–7).

Mosaic Regulations. It was forbidden by the law to eat the fruit of a vineyard during the first three years after its planting. The fourth year all the fruit was holy to the Lord, “to praise the Lord.” Only in the fifth year did the produce of the vines fall entirely to the owner’s disposal (Lev. 19:23–25; cf. Mark 12:2). In later times, however, although it was still considered wrong to eat the fruit during the first three years, the rule was greatly relaxed regarding the fourth year. Various markings were adopted whereby the passerby might distinguish the three-year from the four-year vineyard, and so escape the peril of eating from the former. The proper “season” for claiming produce would therefore not come until the fifth year.

The vine in the Mosaic ritual was subject to the usual restrictions of the “seventh year” (Ex. 23:11) and the Jubilee of the fiftieth year (Lev. 25:11). The gleanings were to be left for the poor and the stranger (Jer. 49:9; Deut. 24:21). The vineyard was not to be sown “with two kinds of seed” (Deut. 22:9), but fig trees were sometimes planted in vineyards (Luke 13:6; cf. 1 Kings 4:25: “Every man under his vine and his fig tree”). Persons passing through a vineyard were allowed to eat grapes therein but not to carry any away (Deut. 23:24).

Vintage (Heb. bāṣîr, “clipped”). The vintage began in September and was a time of general festivity. The towns were deserted, and the people lived in the vineyards—in lodges and tents (Judg. 9:27; Jer. 25:30; Isa. 16:10). The grapes were gathered with shouts of joy by the grape gatherers (6:9; 25:30), put into baskets, and then carried to the wine press.

In Palestine the finest grapes, even today, are dried as raisins, and the juice of the remainder, after having been trodden and pressed, is boiled down to a syrup, called dibs (Heb. dābash). It is used by all classes, wherever vineyards are found, as a condiment with their food. Even the leaves and the stocks of the vine are useful. The cuttings of the vine and the leaves are used as fertilizer for the vineyards. The leaves are also used as a vegetable. Chopped meat and rice are rolled up together in single leaves and then boiled for the table, making a delicious dish. The leaves are also used for fodder, whereas the wood serves as fuel (Ezek. 15:2–4; cf. John 15:5–6).

Figurative. The vine is a symbol of the nation Israel; thus Israel was a vine brought from Egypt (Ps. 80:8; cf. Isa. 5). To dwell under one’s vine and fig tree is an emblem of domestic happiness and peace (1 Kings 4:25; Ps. 128:3; Mic. 4:4) and a prophetic figure of future millennial blessing. The rebellious people of Israel are compared to “worthless” grapes, “vine,” “the degenerate shoots of a foreign vine” (Isa. 5:2, 4; Jer. 2:21; Hos. 10:1, marg.). By the vine our Lord symbolizes the spiritual union existing between Himself and believers (John 15:1–6), unfruitful branches being mere professors. The quick growth of the vine is a symbol of the growth of saints in grace (Hos. 14:7); its rich clusters, of the graces of the saints (Song of Sol. 7:8); the worthlessness of its wood, of the unprofitableness of the wicked (Ezek. 15:2–3, 6); a vine putting forth fruit but not bringing it to maturity is representative of Israel not answering the rightful expectations of Jehovah (Hos. 10:1, marg.). The vineyard is used as a figure of Israel’s chastisement for her sin (Isa. 5:7; 27:2; Jer. 12:10; cf. Matt. 21:33); whereas the failure of the vineyard is a symbol of severe calamities (Isa. 32:10); to plant vineyards and eat the fruit thereof is a figure of peaceful prosperity (Neh. 9:25; Isa. 65:21; Ezek. 28:26). See Vegetable Kingdom.

VIOLENCE. Vehement, forcible, or destructive action, often involving infringement, outrage, or assault. The rendering of two Heb. words and one Gk. word:

1. Heb. ḥāmās has the sense of using violence, especially with evil intent (Gen. 6:11, 13; 49:5; Ps. 18:48, “violent man,” KJV).

2. Heb. gāzal, to “strip off,” means to rob (cf. Lev. 6:2; Job 20:19; 24:2). In these passages the sense is that of seizing another’s property by fraud or injustice, especially by the rich and powerful who seize the possessions of the poor by fraud and force.

3. Gk. bia, vital, “activity,” strength in violent action, force (Acts 5:26; 24:7). In Matt. 11:12, “the kingdom of heaven suffers violence” (biāzetai), carried by storm, i.e., a share in the heavenly kingdom is sought for with the most ardent zeal and the most intense exertion. The NIV reads, “the kingdom of heaven has been forcefully advancing, and forceful men lay hold of it.”

VIPER. See Animal Kingdom.

VIRGIN. The KJV and NASB render two Heb. words and one Gk. word in this way.

1. Heb. bṯûlâ, a woman of marriageable age would usually, but not necessarily, be chaste. Rebekah was described explicitly as a virgin (Gen. 24:16), and the intended wife of a priest was also required to be unsullied. But the lamenting widow of Joel 1:8 was obviously not a virgin. It is unfortunate that the NASB and NIV have not normally rendered the term by something less specific than “virgin,” which in some contexts is inappropriate.

2. Heb. almâ, a girl or young woman, whether of marriageable age or not, who is a virgin (Ex. 2:8; Ps. 68:25, NASB; KJV, “damsel”; NIV, “girl”; Prov. 30:19; etc.). There is no technical Heb. term for virgo intacta, but almâ supplies an appropriate word. Thus there can be no doubt that almâ in Isa. 7:14 does mean specifically a virgin, which is emphasized further by Matt. 11:23. The Holy Spirit through Isaiah did not use bṯûlâ, which in any event would have been incorrect technically, because of the need to meet the immediate historical situation and also to proclaim to and from the house of David of the coming of a virgin-born Messiah.

3. Gk. parthenos, a “virgin” (Matt. 1:23; 25:1, 33), i.e., either a marriageable maiden or a young married woman, a pure virgin (2 Cor. 11:2). In Rev. 14:4 it is used in the sense of a man who has abstained from all uncleanness and whoredom attendant upon idolatry, and so has kept his chastity.

Respecting the virginity of Mary, the mother of our Lord, see Mary. R.K.H.

VISION (some derivative of Heb. ḥāzâ, to “perceive”; Gk. haraō; or of rāâ, to “see”; optomai). A supernatural presentation of certain scenery or circumstances to the mind of a person while awake (Num. 12:6–8). Balaam speaks of himself as having seen “the vision of the Almighty” (24:16). In the time of Eli it is said, “And word from the Lord was rare in those days, visions were infrequent” (1 Sam. 3:1), i.e., there was no public and recognized revelation of the divine will (cf. Prov. 29:18, “Where there is no vision, the people are unrestrained”). See Dream.

VOCATION (Gk. klēsis, an “invitation”). A theological term signifying calling (Rom. 11:29; 1 Cor. 1:26; Eph. 1:18; 4:4; Phil. 3:14; 2 Thess. 1:11; 2 Tim. 1:9; Heb. 3:1; 2 Pet. 1:10).

The dominant idea is that God in His grace calls men to forsake a sinful life and to enter into the kingdom and service of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The long-standing point of controversy between Calvinistic and Arminian theologians relates to the character of this call. The former hold that there is an “external call” addressed indiscriminately to all men, whereas the “effectual call” is given only to those who by the divine decree are predestined to everlasting life. The latter refuse to recognize any such distinction.

Methodists and Arminians generally regard the divine call, under whatever external conditions it is made, as always being a call of thoroughly gracious reality. It is so effective that if it is heeded, the person is certain of salvation. See Election; Atonement; Holy Spirit.

VOPH’SI (vof-si). The father of Nahbi, one of the explorers of Canaan (Num. 13:14).

VOW (Heb. from nādar, to “promise”; Gk. euchē, a “prayer”). Defined as a religious undertaking, either positive, to do something, or negative, to abstain from doing a certain thing. Under the Old Covenant the principle of vowing was recognized as in itself a suitable expression of the religious sentiment, and as such was placed under certain regulations. It was not, except in a few special cases, imposed as an obligation on the individual conscience. The Lord never said, “You shall vow so and so”; but, “If you should make a vow, or when you do so, then let such and such conditions be observed.” The conditions specified in the law related almost exclusively to the faithful performance of what had been freely undertaken by the worshiper—what he had pledged himself before God to render in active service or dedicated gifts. He was on no account to draw back from his plighted word but conscientiously to carry it out. Otherwise a slight would be put upon God and a stain left upon the conscience of the worshiper (Deut. 23:21–23; Eccles. 5:5; Ps. 50:14; Nah. 1:15).

Mosaic Regulations. These were several.

1. A man could not devote to sacred uses the firstborn of man or beast that was devoted already (Lev. 27:26); if he vowed land, he might redeem it or not (vv. 16, 20). See Redemption.

2. Animals fit for sacrifice, if devoted, were not to be redeemed or changed. If a man attempted to do so, he was required to bring both the devotee and the substitute (27:9–10, 33). They were to be free from blemish (Mal. 1:14). An animal unfit for sacrifice might be redeemed, with the addition of a fifth to the priest’s valuation, or it became the property of the priests (Lev. 27:12–13).

3. The case of persons was: A man might devote either himself, his child (not the firstborn), or his slave. If no redemption took place, the devoted person became a slave of the sanctuary (2 Sam. 15:8). (See Nazirite.) Otherwise he might be redeemed at a valuation according to age and sex (Lev. 27:1–7).

General Regulations. Vows were entirely voluntary but once made were regarded as compulsory, and evasion of performance of them was held to be contrary to true religion (Num. 30:2; Deut. 23:21; Eccles. 5:4). If persons in a dependent condition made vows—such as an unmarried daughter living in her father’s home, or a wife, even if she afterward became a widow—the vow, if in the first case her father, or in the second her husband, heard and disallowed it, was void. But if they heard without disallowance, it was to remain good (Num.

30:3–16). Votive offerings arising from the profit on any impure traffic were wholly forbidden (Deut. 23:18).

Vows in general and their binding force as a test of religion are mentioned (Job 22:27; Pss. 22:25; 50:14; 66:13; 116:14; Prov. 7:14; Isa. 19:21; Nah. 1:15). See also Oath.

WAGES.

1. Usually some form of Heb. śākār (Gen. 31:8; Ex. 2:9; Ezek. 29:18–19); elsewhere “hire,” “reward,” etc.
2. Heb. maskōret (Gen. 29:15; 31:41; Ruth 2:12).
3. Heb. p□.ūllâ (Lev. 19:13; Ps. 109:20, “reward”).
4. Two Gk. words are thus rendered: misthos, John 4:36; elsewhere “reward,” or “hire”; opsōnion, Luke 3:14; 2 Cor. 11:8; Luke 6:23, “reward.”

Wages, according to the earliest uses of mankind, are a return for something of value, specifically for work performed. Thus labor is recognized as property, and wages as the price paid or obtained in exchange for such property. The earliest mention of wages is of a recompense not in money, but in kind. This was given to Jacob by Laban (Gen. 29:15, 20; 31:7–8, 41). Such payment was natural among a pastoral and changing population like that of the tent-dwellers of Syria. In Egypt money payments by way of wages were in use, but the terms cannot now be ascertained.

Among the Hebrews wages in general, whether of soldiers or laborers, are mentioned (Hag. 1:6; Ezek. 29:18–19; John 4:36). The rate of wages is only mentioned in the parable of the householder and vineyard (Matt. 20:2), where the laborer's wages are given as one denarius per day (about sixteen cents), a rate that agrees with Tob. 5:14, where a drachma is mentioned as the rate per day, a sum that may be taken as fairly equivalent to the denarius and to the usual pay of a soldier in the latter days of the Roman republic. In earlier times it is probable that the rate was lower. But it is likely that laborers, and also soldiers, were supplied with provisions. The Mosaic law was strict in requiring daily payment of wages (Lev. 19:13; Deut. 15:14–15). The employer who refused to give his laborers sufficient provisions was censured (Job 24:9–11), and the iniquity of withholding wages was denounced (Jer. 22:13; Mal. 3:5; James 5:4). See Service.

WAGON (Heb. āgālâ, that which “rolls” or “turns” around; Gen. 45:19, 21, 27; 46:5; elsewhere “cart”; Ezek. 23:24, Heb. galgal, lit., a “wheel,” see marg.). The oriental wagon, or āgālâ, is a vehicle composed of two or three planks, fixed on two solid circular blocks of wood, from two to five feet in diameter, which serve as wheels. To the floor are sometimes attached wings, which splay outward like the sides of a wheelbarrow. For the conveyance of passengers, mattresses or clothes are laid in the bottom, and the vehicle is drawn by bulls or oxen. The covered wagons for conveying the materials for the Tabernacle were probably constructed on Egyptian models. Others of a lighter description, and more nearly approaching the modern cart, occur in the Assyrian monuments. Some of these have eight, others as many as twelve, spokes in their wheels.

WAIL. See Mourning.

WALK.

Figurative. Walk is often used in Scripture for conduct in life, general demeanor, and deportment. Thus it is said that Enoch and Noah “walked with God,” i.e., they maintained a course of action conformed to God’s will and acceptable in His sight. In the OT and NT we find God promising to walk with His people, and His people, on the other hand, desiring the influence of the Holy Spirit that they may walk in His statutes. To “walk in the darkness” (1 John 1:6) is to be involved in unbelief and misled by error; to “walk in the light” (v. 7) is to be well informed, holy, and happy; to “walk by faith” (2 Cor. 5:7) may be rendered “through faith we walk,” i.e., faith is the sphere through which we walk. To “walk according to the flesh” (Rom. 8:4; cf. 2 Pet. 2:10) is to gratify the carnal desires, to yield to fleshly appetites, and to be obedient to the lusts of the flesh; while to “walk by the Spirit” (Gal. 5:16) is to be guided and aided by the Holy Spirit, the active and animating principle of the Christian life.

WALL (Heb. properly qâr, as a “defense”; or hômâ, as a “barrier”; sometimes shûr, perhaps from its “rocky” character; Gk. teichos). In ancient times the walls of cities and houses were usually built of earth or of bricks (which see) of clay, mixed with reeds and hardened in the sun. When any breach took place in such a mass of earth, by heavy rains or a defect in the foundation, the consequences were serious (Ps. 62:3; Isa. 30:13); and we can easily understand how such walls could be readily destroyed by fire (Amos 1:7, 10, 14). The extensive mounds on the plains of Mesopotamia and Assyria, marking the sites of ancient cities, show that the walls were principally constructed of earth or clay. The wall surrounding the palace of Khorsabad is fixed by Botta at 48 feet 9 inches; probably about the same as that of Nineveh, upon which three chariots could be driven abreast. The wall of Babylon was 87 feet broad, and six chariots could be driven together upon it. Not infrequently stone walls, with towers and a moat, surrounded fortified cities (Isa. 2:15; 9:10; Neh. 4:3; Zeph. 1:16).

Figurative. In Scripture language a wall is a symbol of salvation (Isa. 26:1; 60:18); of protection—by God (Zech. 2:5); by those who provide protection (1 Sam. 25:16; Isa. 2:15; 5:5); by the wealth of the rich in his own conceit (Prov. 18:11). A “wall of bronze” is symbolical of prophets in their testimony against the wicked (Jer. 15:20); the “dividing wall” (Eph. 2:14), of the separation of Jews and Gentiles; “whitewashed walls” (Acts 23:3), of hypocrites.

WANDERING IN THE WILDERNESS. See Wilderness of Wandering.

WAR. Warfare and bloodshed are described realistically in the Bible from the time of the entrance of sin into the human race (Gen. 3). The first great messianic prophecy (3:15) announces hostility between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent. The great drama is consummated by the seed of the woman’s conquering the seed of the serpent, ousting his control of the earth (Rev. 6–19), and ruling as King of kings and Lord of lords at His second advent. Throughout the millennial earth, peace will be supreme; but the peace of eternity will only eventuate as the final revolt of Satan is put down and he and all his followers are placed in the eternal lake of fire (20:1–3, 7–10). In the light of this biblical description of the struggle of good against evil, Christ against Antichrist, it is not surprising that war should be prominent in Bible history, not only among the Israelites but among surrounding nations.

Sumerians. The Sumerians, the pre-Semitic inhabitants of the fertile plains of the Euphrates in southern Babylonia before 3000 B.C., excelled in the arts of war. They employed the four-wheeled war chariot and the battle bow and developed military equipment. A striking example is a solid gold helmet of incredible workmanship, fashioned before 2500 B.C. This superb piece of armor was unearthed by Sir Leonard Woolley. Extant from this early period also is a gold sheath dagger with a lapis lazuli handle, flint arrows, electrum double ax heads, and copper spear heads. The Standard of Ur portrays infantrymen with copper helmets and heavy cloaks. These soldiers carry short spears or axes, and charioteers are armed with spears and javelins. The Sumerian armies used chariots and phalanxes before 3000 B.C.

Egyptians. Egyptians were not especially militarily minded. They preferred to hire the warlike Nubians to man their foreign expeditions. In the Old Kingdom the common Egyptian soldier was equipped with a leather shield, a long bow with arrows of flint, a mace, a long spear, a curved dagger, and occasionally a battleax. He wore a simple uniform. The New Empire, from 1550 B.C. on, used horse, chariot, and composite bow. These formidable weapons enabled Egypt to conquer and rule the East. During this period fine javelins, spears, daggers, and arrows with points of ivory, glass, or wood were employed. The collection of Tutankhamen in the Cairo Museum illustrates the high development of New Kingdom weapons. Egyptians excelled in fort building. The forts were erected along the cataracts of Upper Egypt to restrain the invasion of the war-loving Nubians. A series of similar forts guarded the Delta area from Asiatic invaders, especially on the NE. The famous turquoise and copper mines of the Sinai Peninsula were also protected by well-manned fortresses. Only occasionally would Egypt build up any considerable navy, since she was protected by her isolated inland position. However, at certain periods the Egyptians conducted successful naval engagements. One striking example is Rameses III, who used his fleet against an invasion of sea peoples (including Philistines), a Lybian confederacy in the twelfth century B.C.

Assyrian. The Assyrians were the “giants of the Semites” at the beginning of the ninth century B.C. under Ashurnasirpal II, Shalmaneser III, and later under great militarists and conquerors like Tiglath-pileser III, Sargon II, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon. The cruel and relentless Assyrian armies made Israel and surrounding countries tremble. With powerful bows and arrows shot from chariots, their irresistible cavalry attacks, and their employment of all of the weapons of their Sumerian and Babylonian precursors, they were a terrifying scourge.

Chaldean. Even more fearful than the Assyrians were the superb Chaldean fighters and horsemen. They employed all the military art and weapons of the Assyrians. Habakkuk outlines the terror the Chaldeans caused the Hebrews (Hab. 1:6–9). Ezekiel enumerates the military equipment of the common Chaldean soldier. He speaks of warriors clothed in full armor and of horsemen riding on horses; of “weapons, chariots, and wagons, and with a company of peoples. They will set themselves against you on every side with buckler and shield and helmet” (Ezek. 23:24).

The Hebrews. Religious elements were a part of Hebrew warfare, and were evident in the preliminary steps, the conduct of the battle, and the treatment of the conquered people.

Preliminary Steps. Before beginning an aggressive warfare, the Hebrews sought for the divine sanction by consulting either the Urim and Thummim (Judg. 1:1; 20:2, 27–28; 1 Sam. 14:37; 23:2; 28:6; 30:8) or some acknowledged prophet (1 Kings 22:6; 2 Chron. 18:5). Divine aid was further sought in actual warfare by bringing into the field the Ark of the Covenant, which was the symbol of Jehovah Himself (1 Sam. 4:4, 18; 14:18). Formal proclamations of war were not interchanged between the belligerents. Before entering the enemy’s district, spies were sent to ascertain the character of the country and the preparations of its inhabitants for resistance (Num. 13:17; Josh. 2:1; Judg. 7:10–11; 1 Sam. 26:4).

Actual Warfare. When an engagement was imminent, a sacrifice was offered (1 Sam. 7:9; 13:9) and an encouraging address delivered either by the commander (2 Chron. 20:20) or by a priest (Deut. 20:2). Then followed the battle signal (1 Sam. 17:52; Isa. 42:13; Jer. 50:42; Ezek. 21:22; Amos 1:14). The combat assumed the form of a number of hand-to-hand contests. Hence the high value attached to the fleetness of foot and strength of arm (2 Sam. 1:23; 2:18; 1 Chron. 12:8). At the same time various strategic devices were practiced, such as the ambush (Josh. 8:2, 12; Judg. 20:36), surprise (Judg. 7:16), or circumvention (2 Sam. 5:23). Another mode of settling the dispute was by the selection of champions (1 Sam. 17; 2 Sam. 2:14), who were spurred on to exertion by the offer of high reward (1 Sam. 17:25; 18:25; 2 Sam. 18:11; 1 Chron. 11:6). The contest having been decided, the conquerors were recalled from the pursuit by the sound of a trumpet (2 Sam. 2:28; 18:16; 20:22).

Siege of a Town. The siege of a town or fortress was conducted in the following manner: a kind of embankment was thrown up around the place (Ezek. 4:2; Mic. 5:1), constructed out of the trees found in the neighborhood (Deut. 20:20) together with earth and any other materials at hand. This line not only cut off the besieged from the surrounding country, but also served as a base of operations for the besiegers. The next step was to throw out from this line one or more “mounds,” or “banks,” in the direction of the city (2 Sam. 20:15; 2 Kings 19:32; Isa. 37:33). These were gradually increased in height until they were about half as high as the city wall. On these mounds or “siege walls,” towers were erected (2 Kings 25:1; Jer. 52:4; Ezek. 4:2; 17:17; 21:22; 26:8), from where the slingers and archers might attack effectively. Battering rams (Ezek. 4:2; 21:22) were brought up to the walls by means of the siege wall, and scaling ladders might also be placed on it.

Treatment of Conquered. The treatment of the conquered was extremely severe in ancient times. The bodies of the soldiers killed in action were plundered (1 Sam. 31:8–9; 2 Macc. 8:27); survivors were either killed in some savage manner (Judg. 9:45; 2 Sam. 12:31; 2 Chron. 25:12), were mutilated (Judg. 1:6; 1 Sam. 11:2), or were carried into captivity (Num. 31:26; Deut. 20:14). Sometimes the bulk of the population of the conquered country was moved to a distant locality. The Mosaic law mitigated to a certain extent the severity of the ancient treatment of the conquered. The conquerors celebrated their success by the erection of monuments (1 Sam. 7:12; 2 Sam. 8:13), by hanging up trophies in their public buildings (1 Sam. 21:9; 31:10; 2 Kings 11:10), and by triumphal songs and dances in which the whole population took part (Ex. 15:1–21; Judg. 5; 1 Sam. 18:6–8; 2 Sam. 22; Judith 16:2–17; 1 Macc. 4:24).

Roman. Roman armor was unequalled in the ancient world. A superb example of this is shown in the Hadrian marble torso in the Athenian agora. Our Lord came into close contact with Roman legions and military might. The long Roman sword appears in the prophecy of Calvary uttered by Simeon to Mary, the mother of Jesus: “A sword will pierce even your own soul” (Luke 2:35). Jesus refers to the sword (Matt. 26:55), and His side was pierced by the long Roman spear, while the soldiers gambled at the foot of the cross. Widely traveled, the apostle Paul on numerous occasions came into close contact with Roman military power. In all the cities in which he preached, Roman soldiers or legions were present. When he was ordered by Claudius Lysias to go to Caesarea for government trial, 200 soldiers, 200 spearmen, and 70 horsemen formed his personal escort. Paul’s graphic description of the panoplied Roman warrior in Eph. 6:10–20 is thus perfectly natural. In this remarkable illustration of the Spirit-filled believer’s conflict in prayer are outlined the main items in the equipment of a Roman warrior.

Figurative. War is a figure of our contest with death (Eccles. 8:8). In the song of Moses, Jehovah is declared to be “a warrior” (Ex. 15:3), One who knows how to make war and possesses the power to destroy His foes. War illustrates the malignity of the wicked (Ps. 55:21), the contest of saints with the enemies of their salvation (Rom. 7:23; 2 Cor. 10:3; Eph. 6:12; 1 Tim. 1:18), and between Antichrist and the saints (Rev. 11:7; 13:4, 7). WARDROBE (Heb. meltâhâ, apparently from an old root meaning “to spread” out).

Mentioned in connection with the temple of Baal (2 Kings 10:22). The priests of Baal, like those of almost all religions, had their sacred garments that were worn at the time of worship and were kept in the wardrobe in the temple.

WARES (Ezek. 27:12–27). The essential meaning of the Heb. seems to be an exchange, or equivalent, alluding to the frequency of barter in ancient trade. KJV incorrectly renders it “fairs.”

WATCH.

1. The rendering of some form of the Heb. shāmar (to “protect”) and may mean a day or night watch; thus there was a guard of the king’s house (2 Kings 11:5–7) and in Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 4:9; 7:3). The Jews, like the Greeks and Romans, divided the night into military watches instead of hours, each watch representing the period for which sentinels or pickets remained on duty. Thus we read of “a watch in the night” (Ps. 90:4). The proper Jewish reckoning recognized only three such watches, entitled the first or “beginning of the night watches” (Lam. 2:19), the middle watch (Judg. 7:19), and the morning watch (Ex. 14:24; 1 Sam. 11:11). Those would last respectively from sunset to 10:00 P.M.; from 10:00 P.M. to 2:00 A.M.; and from 2:00 A.M. to sunrise. Subsequent to the establishment of the Roman supremacy, the number of watches was increased to four, which were described either according to their numerical order, as in the case of the “fourth watch” (Matt. 14:25), Gk. phulakē), or by the terms “evening,” “midnight,” “cockcrowing,” and “morning” (Mark 13:35). These terminated respectively at 9:00 P.M., midnight, 3:00 A.M., and 6:00 A.M.

2. Heb. shāqad (to “be alert”) is to be wakeful, and so watchful, either for good (Jer. 31:28; 51:12, see marg.) or evil (Isa. 29:20, see marg.).

3. Gk. grēgoreō means to “keep awake, to watch,” and so to take heed, lest through remissiveness and indolence one be led to forsake Christ (Matt. 26:41; Mark 14:38).

4. A Roman sentry, one of the soldiers who guarded the tomb of the Lord (Matt. 27:65–66). Gk. rkoustōdia; “Watch,” KJV.

5. Gk. nēphō (to “abstain from wine, be sober”) is used in the NT figuratively, to “be calm and collected in spirit; to be temperate, dispassionate, circumspect” (1 Thess. 5:6; 2 Tim. 4:5).

WATER (Heb. mayim; Gk. hudōr). Frequently mentioned in Scripture both as an element in fertility and as a drink.

Supply. The long rainy season in Palestine means a considerable rainfall, and while it lasts the land gets a thorough soaking. But the land is limestone and very porous. The heavy rains are quickly drained away, the wadis are left dry, the lakes become marshes or dwindle to dirty ponds. On the W of Jordan there remain only a few short perennial streams, of which but one or two, and these mere rills, are found in the hill country. Hence the water of running streams and fountains, as opposed to that of stagnant cisterns, pools, or marshes, is called living water (Gen. 26:19, marg.; Zech. 14:8; John 4:10–11; 7:38; Rev. 7:17). In the hot countries of the East the assuaging of thirst is one of the most delightful sensations that can be experienced (Ps. 143:6; Prov. 25:25), and every attention that humanity and hospitality can suggest is paid to furnish travelers with water. Public reservoirs or pools are opened in several parts of Egypt and Arabia. Sometimes water is so scarce that it must be paid for (Num. 20:17, 19; Lam. 5:4).

Peculiar Usages. Among the optical illusions that the deserts of the East have furnished is the mirage. This phenomenon of “waters that fail,” was called by the Hebrews shārāb, i.e., “heat,” and is rendered “the scorched land” (Isa. 35:7); properly, “And the mirage shall become a pool,” i.e., the desert that presents the appearance of a lake shall be changed into real water.

Figurative. Water occasionally is used for tears (Jer. 9:1); hence, figuratively, trouble (Ps. 66:12) and misfortune (Lam. 3:54; Pss. 69:1; 119:136; 124:4–5); persecution (88:17); hostile armies (Isa. 8:7; 17:13). Water is used for children or posterity (Num. 24:7; Isa. 48:1, see marg.); for clouds (Ps. 104:3); for the refreshing power of the Holy Spirit (Isa. 12:3; 35:6–7; 55:1; John 7:37–38); divine support (Isa. 8:6); the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit (41:17–18; 44:3; Ezek. 36:25); water poured out, the wrath of God (Hos. 5:10); and of faintness by terror (Ps. 22:14). Deep water is used of the counsel in the heart (Prov. 20:5) and of the words of the wise (18:4). Water “spilled on the ground” is a figure of death (2 Sam. 14:14), its instability figures a wavering disposition (Gen. 49:4). “Stolen water” (Prov. 9:17) denotes unlawful pleasures with strange women. The difficulty of stopping water (17:14) is a symbol of strife and contention, while its rapid flowing away represents the career of the wicked (Job 24:18, see marg.; Ps. 58:7). See Fountain; Well.

WATERFALL (Heb. ṣinnôr, “hollow”). This was a cataract, waterspout (Ps. 42:7), rendered in 2 Sam. 5:8, “water tunnel.”

WATER OF JEALOUSY. See Jealousy Offering.

WATERPOT (Gk. hudria). A large vessel of stone in which water was kept standing (John 2:6–7) for the sake of cleansing, which the Jews practiced before and after meals. The “firkin” (Gk. metrētēs) was a measure containing about 8 7/8 gallons. The “waterpot” mentioned in 4:28 was a jar of earthenware in which water was carried.

WATER TUNNEL (Heb. ṣinnôr). The term occurs in the proposal of David that someone should “strike the Jebusites ... through the water tunnel” (2 Sam. 5:8). KJV renders it “gutter,” and RSV and NIV render it “the water shaft,” but more recent evidence points to “a grappling hook” used by besiegers in scaling ramparts. The word is now known to be typically Canaanite, and the sense “hook” has been handed down through Aram. to modern Arab. See W. F. Albright in O.T. Commentary (1948), p. 149.

WAVE OFFERING. See Sacrificial Offerings.

WAW (ו). The sixth letter of the Heb. alphabet, often given as Vav (which see).

WEAKNESS (Heb. mōrek, NASB, Lev. 26:36 only; Gk. asthenia, asthēma, asthenēs).

Frequently this term is used in the NASB and NIV as the replacement for KJV “infirmity” or “infirmities,” but in some verses the expression appears in the KJV, NIV, and NASB (1 Cor.

RSV Revised Standard Version

NIV New International Version

NASB New American Standard Bible

1:25; 2:3; 15:43; 2 Cor. 12:9; 13:4; Heb. 7:18; 11:34). In the NASB of Lev. 26:36 the term replaces KJV “faintness.”

Romans 6:19, “weakness of your flesh” means the weakness of human nature in respect to understanding. Paul says in 1 Cor. 2:3, “I was with you in weakness,” meaning the inability to do great things, want of skill in speaking, or of human wisdom. In Heb. 5:2 and 7:28 the high priest is spoken of as “beset with weakness,” which means a tendency to sin, unlike our great High Priest. In Heb. 4:15, “we do not have a high priest who cannot sympathize with our weakness” denotes all human disabilities, as well as in Rom. 8:26 and 2 Cor. 12:5, 9.

WEIGHT. For measures of weight, see Metrology.

1. Heb. ṣeben, a “stone.” A weight of balance, even when not made of stone, since anciently, as at the present day, the orientals often made use of stones for weights (Lev. 19:36; Deut. 25:15; etc.).

2. Heb. mishqāl or mishqôl may mean either the weight numerically estimated (Gen. 24:22; Lev. 19:35; Num. 7:13; etc.) or the act of weighing (Ezra 8:34).

3. Heb. peles (Prov. 16:11; “balance,” Isa. 40:12).

4. In the NT “weight” is mentioned only once in its literal sense and is the rendering of Gk. talantiaios, “talentlike” in weight (Rev. 16:21, see marg.). The Israelites were commanded to have “just weights” (Lev. 19:36; Deut. 25:15; Prov. 20:10, 23), and the prophet Micah (Mic. 6:11) denounced the “bag of deceptive weights,” referring to the stone weights that were carried in a bag.

Figuratively. Job, in speaking of the fixed laws ordained by Jehovah for the duration of the world, particularizes by examples: “He imparted weight to the wind” (28:25), i.e., the measure of its force of feebleness. To “eat bread by weight” (Ezek. 4:16, cf. v. 10) denotes extreme poverty or scarcity of food. The NIV renders “rationed food.” The “weight of glory” (2 Cor. 4:17) is a figurative expression to denote the intensity of the celestial splendor, especially as contrasted with the transitoriness of present afflictions. The writer of Hebrews (12:1) urges his readers to “lay aside every weight,” KJV; “encumbrance,” NASB; “everything that hinders,” NIV (Gk. ogkos). This word means anything “prominent, an encumbrance,” thus anything that hinders a person in running his spiritual race.

WELL. The rendering of the following Heb. and Gk. words:

1. Heb. bā'ēr (a “pit”), something dug, and having the meaning of our word cistern (Gen. 16:14; 21:19; 26:19–22, 25; 2 Sam. 17:18; etc.).

2. Heb. bôr (from no. 1) is found in 1 Sam. 19:22; 2 Sam. 3:26; 23:15–16; 1 Chron. 11:17–18.

3. Heb. ma'yān (from no. 4), a spring, as in Ps. 84:6.

4. Heb. ayin (an “eye”), a fountain; whether so called from its resemblance to the eye, or, vice versa the eye, from its resemblance to a fountain, is doubtful (Neh. 2:13 “well,” NIV); a living spring.

5. Gk. pēgē (“gushing”), a fountain spread by a spring (John 4:6, 14).

6. Gk. phrear (“hole,” John 4:11–12), a pit dug, and thus distinguished from a living spring.

Importance. The heat and the large flocks and herds have made a supply of water a special necessity (Judg. 1:15) in a hot climate. Among Eastern nations it has always involved questions of property of the highest importance, sometimes giving rise to serious contention. Thus Abraham opened the well Beersheba, and its possession was attested with special formality (Gen. 21:30–31). The Koran notices abandoned wells as signs of desertion (Sur. 22). To acquire wells that they had not dug themselves was one of the marks of favor foretold to the Hebrews on their entrance into Canaan (Deut. 6:11). To possess a well was considered a mark of independence (Prov. 5:15); and to abstain from the use of wells belonging to others, a disclaimer of interference with their property (Num. 20:17, 19; 21:22). Similar rights of possession, actual and hereditary, exist among the Arabs of the present day.

Construction. Wells in Palestine are usually excavated from the solid limestone rock, sometimes with steps to descend into them (Gen. 24:16). The brims are furnished with a curb or low wall of stone, bearing ancient furrows worn by the ropes used in drawing water. It was on a curb of this sort that our Lord sat when He conversed with the woman of Samaria (John 4:6), and it was its usual stone cover that the woman placed on the mouth of the well at Bahurim (2 Sam. 17:19), which was dry at times.

Raising the Water. The usual methods for raising water are as follows: (1) The rope and bucket, or waterskin (Gen. 24:14–20; John 4:11). (2) The sakiyeh, or Persian wheel. This consists of a vertical wheel furnished with a set of buckets or earthen jars, attached to a cord passing over the wheel. These descend empty and return full as the wheel revolves. (3) A modification of the last method, by which a man, sitting opposite a wheel furnished with buckets, turns it by drawing with his hands one set of spokes prolonged beyond its circumference and pushing another set from him with his feet. (4) A method very common, both in ancient and modern Egypt, is the shaduf, a simple contrivance consisting of a lever moving on a pivot, which is loaded at one end with a lump of clay or some other weight and has at the other a bowl or bucket. Wells are usually furnished with troughs of wood or stone, into which the water is emptied for the use of persons or animals coming to the wells. Unless machinery is used, which is commonly worked by men, women are usually the water carriers.

Figurative. Wells are figurative of: God as the source of salvation (John 4:10; cf. Isa. 12:3; Jer. 2:13; Song of Sol. 4:15); “drinking from one’s own,” domestic happiness (cf. Prov. 5:15).

WEN. See Diseases.

WEST. The oriental, in speaking of the quarters of the heavens, supposes that his face is turned to the E. So the E is before him, the W behind, the S at his right hand, and the N at his left. The “going down of the sun” (bo hashshemesh) also denoted the W, as did the “sea” (yām), which was westward from Palestine.

WHALE. See Animal Kingdom.

WHEAT. See Vegetable Kingdom.

Figurative. On account of its excellence as a food, wheat is a figure of good men, as tares are of evil (Matt. 3:12; 13:25, 29–30; Luke 3:17).

WHEEL. Wheels were well known in the ancient biblical world. Water buckets were manipulated by ropes pulled over wheels set up at wells and cisterns (Eccles. 12:6). The potter's wheel referred to in Jer. 18:3 and other places was ancient. Solomon's Temple was equipped with wheeled basins (1 Kings 7:30–33). Nahum refers to the noise of the chariot wheels of the Assyrians (Nah. 3:2). Ezekiel saw wheels in his apocalyptic vision (Ezek. 1:15–21). Chariot wheels go back to about 3000 B.C. or earlier and were wooden discs manufactured of two half-circle pieces fastened with metal around a central core. Sumerian chariots were four- or two-wheeled. Common Egyptian chariots had wheels of six spokes that, however, were larger than the eight-spoked wheels of Etruscan chariots. M.F.U.

WHELP (Heb. bēn, “son or offspring,” Job 4:11 (“cub,” NIV); elsewhere gūr, or gôr, Gen. 49:9; Deut. 33:22; both “cub” in the NIV).

WHIRLWIND. This term is taken from Heb. sûpâ from the root meaning to “snatch away,” signifying a sweeping desolating blast (Hos. 8:7), and să:ăr, from a root, to toss, indicating the same thing, but more with reference to its vehement agitating motion (2 Kings 2:1, 11). Both words are elsewhere rendered “storm.”

Figurative. In a large proportion of the passages the terms are used in a figurative sense, as with reference to the resistless and sweeping destruction sure to overtake the wicked (Ps. 58:9; Prov. 1:27; 10:25; Isa. 41:16; etc.).

WHISTLE (Heb. shāraq). Used in the sense of “to allure or entice,” as a beekeeper who by whistling induces the bees to come out of their hives and settle on the ground (Isa. 5:26; 7:18). KJV renders the word “hiss” in these verses.

WIDOW (Heb. almānâ, “bereaved”; Gk. chēra, “deficient,” as of a husband).

Mosaic Regulations. In the Mosaic legislation special regard was paid to widows. It is true that no legal provision was made for their maintenance. But they were left dependent partly on the affection of relatives, especially the oldest son, whose birthright, or extra share of the property, imposed this duty upon him. They also were dependent on the privileges provided for other distressed classes, such as participation in the triennial third tithe (Deut. 14:29; 26:12), in gleaning (24:19–21), and in religious feasts (16:11, 14). God Himself claimed a special interest in the widows, even calling Himself their Husband (Pss. 68:5; 146:9), uttering the severest denunciations against those who defrauded and oppressed them (94:6; Ezek. 22:7; Mal. 3:5). With regard to the remarriage of widows, the only restriction imposed by the Mosaic law referred to the widow who was left childless, in which case the brother of the deceased husband had a right to marry her (Deut. 25:5–6; Matt. 22:23–30). See also the article Marriage, Levirate.

New Testament Usage. In the apostolic church the widows were sustained at the church's expense, relief being daily administered under the superintendence of officers appointed for this special purpose (Acts 6:1–6). Particular directions are given by Paul regarding those persons entitled to such maintenance (1 Tim. 5:3–16). From all the widows only a certain number were to be enrolled; the qualifications for enrollment were (1) that they were not under sixty years of age; (2) that they had been the wife of one man, probably meaning only once married, and (3) that they had led useful and charitable lives (vv. 9–10). Some have thought this implies a receiving of the more elderly and approved widows into a kind of ecclesiastical order (v. 9), either as deaconesses or as overseers for those of their own sex. But the language is indefinite.

WILDERNESS. A wild, uninhabited region suitable only for pasturage (Heb. midbār, Ps. 107:4) or sparse human occupation. A sterile tract of country not supporting human life (Heb. ʿārābā, Job 24:5), and hence a place of desolation (Heb. yshîmôn, Deut. 32:10). The Gk. term erēmia, “solitude,” is used in the NT. See Desert.

WILDERNESS OF WANDERING. The land in which the Israelites sojourned and wandered for forty years on their way from Egypt to Canaan. It lay within the peninsula of Sinai, or that peninsula extended, i.e., within the angle or fork formed by the two branches of the Red Sea—the Gulf of Suez and the Gulf of Aqaba—or the lines that those branches produced, having the Holy Land to the N of it. It is that portion of Arabia called Arabia Petraea (or rocky Arabia), from its rocky and rugged character. It consisted of several districts: (1) the wilderness of Shur, or Etham, i.e., the great wall of Egypt, extending from Suez to the Mediterranean; (2) the wilderness of Paran, occupying the center of the peninsula; (3) the wilderness of Sin, in the lower part of the peninsula; (4) the wilderness of Zin to the NE. It was in the plain or wilderness of Paran (Gen. 14:6; 21:21; Num. 13:26), still called the Wilderness of Wandering, and in the neighboring mountains, that the children of Israel chiefly wandered after their retreat from Kadesh. But their wandering was not altogether confined to this region, for it seems to have extended to the region of Sinai, or the district of the Tawarah Arabs, and then, toward the close of the thirty-eight years, to the plain of the Arabah and to the wilderness of Zin. All of this region was deficient in water. Hence the occasion for the miraculous stream of water that “followed” the Israelites for so many years. It was deficient also in food for man but apparently not in food for cattle. There is little doubt that the wilderness once afforded greater resources than at present, although there seems to have been no city or village (Ps. 107:4). The wandering of Israel, properly speaking, commenced on their retreat from Kadesh (Num. 14:33; 32:13), for up to that time their journey had been direct, first to Sinai and then to Kadesh.

The Direct Journey. The first part, namely, to Sinai, has been discussed in the article on Exodus (which see). Having rested there for about one year, the Israelites moved northward to the wilderness of Paran (Num. 10:12); Taberah (11:3; Deut. 9:22); Kibroth-hattaavah (Num. 11:34; 33:16); Hazeroth (11:35; 33:17); desert of Arabah by the way of Mt. Seir (Deut. 1:1–2, 19); Rithmah (Num. 33:18); Kadesh in the desert of Paran (Num. 12:16; 13:26; Deut. 1:1, 19).

Wanderings. In consequence of their unbelief and rebellion, the Lord swore that they should wander in the wilderness until all who were above twenty years of age should perish (Num. 14:29). Their wandering, therefore, began on their retreat from Kadesh. They camped in the following stations until their return to Kadesh: Rimmon-perez (33:19); Libnah (v. 20); Rissah (v. 21); Kehelathah (v. 22); Mt. Shepher (v. 23); Haradah (v. 24); Makheloth (v. 25); Tahath (v. 26); Terah (v. 27); Mithkah (v. 28); Hashmonah (v. 29); Moseroth (v. 30); Bene-jaakan (v. 31); Hor-haggidgad (v. 32); Jotbathah (v. 33); Abronah (v. 34); Ezion-geber (v. 35), by the way of the Red Sea (Deut. 2:1); Kadesh, in the wilderness of Zin (Num. 20:1), by the way of Mt. Seir (Deut. 2:1).

From Kadesh to Jordan. To Beeroth Bene-jaakan (Deut. 10:6); Mt. Hor (Num. 20:22; 33:37), or Moserah (Deut. 10:6), where Aaron died; Gudgodah (v. 7); Jotbathah (v. 7); by way of the Red Sea (Num. 21:4); by Ezion-geber (Deut. 2:8); Elath (v. 8); Zalmonah (Num.

33:41); Punon (v. 42); Oboth (21:10; 33:43); Iyeabarim (21:11; 33:44), or Iyim (33:45); Wadi Zered (21:12; Deut. 2:13–14); Arnon (Num. 21:13; Deut. 2:24); Dibon-gad (Num. 33:45); Almon-diblathaim (v. 46); Beer (well) in the desert (21:16, 18); Mattanah (21:18); Nahaliel (v. 19); Bamoth (v. 19); Pisgah (v. 20), or mountains of Abarim, near Nebo (33:47); by way of Bashan to the plains of Moab by Jordan (21:33; 22:1; 33:48).

WILLS. Under a system of close inheritance like that of the Jews, the scope for bequest in respect of land was limited by the right of redemption and general reentry in the Jubilee year. Keil says (Bib. Arch., pp. 309, 311, n. 5), “Of wills there is not a trace to be found in the Mosaic law or throughout the whole of the Old Testament.... Neither the expression ‘command his house’ (put his house in order), II Sam. 17:23; II Kings 20:1; Isa. 38:1, nor the writing mentioned in Tob. 7:14, indicates a testamentary disposition. Not till the time of the later Jews do testaments occur; comp. Gal. 3:15; Heb. 9:17, and among princely families (Josephus, Ant., xiii, 16, 1; xvii, 3, 2; War, ii, 2, 3), as well as in Talmudic law, after the Greek and Roman fashion.”

WINDS. That the Hebrews recognized the existence of four prevailing winds as issuing, broadly speaking, from the four cardinal points—N, S, E, and W—may be inferred from their custom of using the expression “four winds” as being equivalent to the “four quarters” of the hemisphere (Ezek. 37:9; Dan. 8:8; Zech. 2:6; Matt. 24:31).

1. The N wind or, as it was usually called, “the north,” was naturally the coldest of the four (Ecclus. 43:20), and its presence is hence invoked as favorable to vegetation in Song of Sol. 4:16. It blows chiefly in October and brings dry cold (Job 37:9). It is described in Prov. 25:23 as bringing rain; in this case we must understand the NW wind. The NW wind prevails from the autumn equinox to the beginning of November and the N wind from June to the equinox.

2. The E wind crosses the sandy wastes of the Arabian Desert before reaching Palestine and was hence termed the wind “from across the wilderness” (Job 1:19; Jer. 13:24). It blows with violence and is hence supposed to be used generally for any violent wind (Job 27:21; 38:24; Ps. 48:7; Isa. 27:8; Ezek. 27:26). It is probably in this sense that it is used in Ex. 14:21. In Palestine the E wind prevails from February to June.

3. The name shriqôt, our sirocco (lit., “the east”), is used of all winds blowing in from the desert, E, SE, S, and even S-SW. They are hot winds. “When you see a south wind blowing, you say, ‘It will be a hot day,’ and it turns out that way” (Luke 12:55; cf. Job 37:17; Jer. 4:11; Ezek. 17:10; 19:12; Hos. 13:15). They blow chiefly in the spring, and for a day at a time; and they readily pass over into rain by a slight change in the direction, from S-SW to full SW.

4. The W and SW winds reach Palestine loaded with moisture gathered from the Mediterranean and are hence expressively termed by the Arabs “the fathers of the rain.” Westerly winds prevail in Palestine from November to February and, damp from the sea, drop their moisture and cause the winter rains. “In summer the winds blow chiefly out of the drier northwest, and, meeting only warmth, do not cause showers, but greatly mitigate the daily heat. This latter function is fulfilled morning by morning with almost perfect punctuality.... He strikes the coast soon after sunrise; in Hauran, in June and July, he used to reach us between ten and twelve o'clock, and blew so well that the hours previous to that were generally the hottest of our day. The peasants do all their winnowing against this steady wind" (Smith, Hist. Geog., pp. 66–67).

In addition to the four regular winds, the Bible mentions local squalls (Mark 4:37; Luke 8:23), to which the Sea of Gennesaret was liable. In the narrative of Paul's voyage the Gk. term lips is used to describe the SW wind; the Lat. carus or caurus (chōros), the NW wind (Acts 27:12); and euroclydon, a wind of a very violent character coming from E-NE (v. 14). WINE. The product of the wine press was described in Heb. by a variety of terms, indicative either of the quality or of the use of the liquid.

1. Heb. yayin ("effervescing") is rendered invariably "wine," except in Judg. 13:14, "vine"; Song of Sol. 2:4, "banquet hall." This term corresponds to the Gk. oinos, and our wine. In most of the passages in the Bible where yayin is used (83 out of 138), it certainly means fermented grape juice; and in the remainder it may fairly be presumed to do so. The intoxicating character of yayin in general is plain from Scripture. To it are attributed the dull eyes (Gen. 49:12), the mocking and brawling (Prov. 20:1; Isa. 28:7), the excitement of the spirit (Prov. 31:7; Isa. 5:11; Zech. 9:15; 10:7), the enchained affections of its addicts (Hos. 4:11), the perverted judgment (Prov. 31:5; Isa. 28:7), the indecent exposure (Hab. 2:15–16), and the sickness resulting from the "heat [hēmâ] of wine" (Hos. 7:5).

In actual instances: Noah planted a vineyard and drank of the wine, yayin, and was drunk (Gen. 9:21); Nabal drank wine, yayin, and was very drunk (1 Sam. 25:36–37); the "drunkards of Ephraim" were "overcome with wine [yayin]" (Isa. 28:1). Jeremiah says, "I have become like a drunken man, even like a man overcome with wine [yayin]" (Jer. 23:9). The intoxicating quality of yayin is confirmed by rabbinical testimony. The Mishna, in the treatise on the Passover, says that four cups of wine were poured out and blessed and drunk by each of the company at the eating of the Paschal lamb, and that water was also mixed with wine, because it was considered too strong to be drunk alone. The Gemara adds, "The cup of blessing is not to be blessed, until it is mixed with water." To meet the objection, How can intoxication be hindered? the rabbis replied, "Because wine between eating does not intoxicate a man." But although usually intoxicating, it was not only permitted to be imbibed, but was also used for sacred purposes and was spoken of as a blessing (Gen. 49:11–12; Deut. 14:24–26; Ex. 29:40; Lev. 23:13; Num. 15:5). Some, indeed, have argued from these passages that yayin could not always have been alcoholic. But this is begging the question and that in defiance of the facts. Although invariably fermented, it was not always inebriating, and in most instances, doubtless, was but slightly alcoholic, like the vin ordinaire of France.

2. Heb. tîrôsh, properly signifies "must," the freshly pressed juice of the grape (the gleuchos of the Greeks, or sweet wine). It is rendered "wine" or "new wine" in Neh. 10:39; 13:5, 12; Prov. 3:10; Isa. 24:7; 65:8; Hos. 4:11; 9:2; Joel 1:10; Mic. 6:15; Hag. 1:11; Zech. 9:17. The question as to whether either of the above terms ordinarily signified a solid substance can be settled at once by a reference to the manner in which they were consumed. With regard to yayin, we are not aware of a single passage that couples it with the act of eating. In the only passage where the act of consuming tîrôsh alone is mentioned (Isa. 62:8–9), the verb is shâthâ, which constantly indicates the act of drinking. There are, moreover, passages that seem to imply the actual manufacture of tîrôsh by the same process by which wine was ordinarily made (Mic. 6:15; Prov. 3:10; Joel 2:24). As to the intoxicating character of this drink, the allusions to its effects are confined to a single passage, “Harlotry, wine [yayin], and new wine [tîrôsh] take away the understanding” (Hos. 4:11), where tîrôsh appears as the climax of engrossing influences, in immediate connection with yayin.

3. Heb. shêkâr (an “intoxicant”), an inebriating drink, whether the wine prepared or distilled is from barley, honey, or dates, yayin referring more particularly to wine made from grapes. Shêkâr is usually rendered “strong drink” (Num. 28:7; cf. Ps. 69:12). The liquors included under shêkâr might therefore be pomegranate wine, palm wine, apple wine, honey wine, or perhaps even beer, for some have identified it with the liquor obtained from barley by the Egyptians. The word is used in the following passages in such a manner as to show decisively that it denotes an intoxicating drink: Lev. 10:9, where the priests are forbidden to drink wine, or shêkâr, when they go into the Tabernacle; 1 Sam. 1:15, where Hannah, charged with drunkenness by Eli, replies it was not so—“I have drunk neither wine nor strong drink [shêkâr]”; Ps. 69:12, where the psalmist complains, “I am the song of the drunkard”; Prov. 31:4–5, “It is not for kings to drink wine, or for rulers to desire strong drink [shêkâr], lest they drink and forget what is decreed”; Isa. 5:22, “Woe to those who are heroes in drinking wine, and valiant men in mixing strong drink [shêkâr]” (cf. 28:7; 29:9).

4. Heb. ăśîs (Song of Sol. 8:2; Isa. 49:26; Joel 1:5; 3:18; Amos 9:13) is derived from a word signifying “to tread” and therefore refers to the method by which the juice was expressed from the fruit. It refers to new wine as being recently trodden out, but not necessarily to unfermented wine.

5. Heb. Sōbe, “potation,” occurs only three times (Isa. 1:22; Hos. 4:18; Nah. 1:10, “drunken”), but the verb and participle are used often—the latter to denote drunk, a drunkard.

6. Heb. mesek, a “mixture,” is wine mixed with water or aromatics (Ps. 75:8, “well mixed”). But the noun appears to have been restricted in usage to a bad sense, to denote wine mingled with stupefying or excitement-producing drugs, so that the wine might produce more powerful effects than were possible otherwise, at a time when distillation had not been discovered.

7. In the NT are the following Gk. words: oinos, including every sort of wine. Gleuchos (“must”), “sweet wine,” which seems to have been of an intoxicating nature. It is used in Acts 2:13, where the charge is made, “They are full of sweet wine,” to which Peter replies (v. 15), “These men are not drunk, as you suppose.” If the wine was not intoxicating, the accusation could only have been ironical. From the explanations of the ancient lexicographers we may infer that the luscious qualities of this wine were due not to its being recently made but to its being produced from the purest juice of the grape. Genēma tēs ampelou, “fruit of the vine” (Luke 22:18). Oinos akratos, “pure wine” (Rev. 14:10). Oxos, “sour wine or vinegar” (Matt. 27:48; Mark 15:36; etc.). Sikera (Luke 1:15, “liquor”), an intoxicating beverage made of a mixture of sweet ingredients, whether from grain or vegetables, the juice of fruits, or a decoction of honey. It corresponds to no. 3.

Biblical History of Wine. Wine is first mentioned in the case of Noah, who “planted a vineyard. And he drank of the wine [yayin] and became drunk” (Gen. 9:20–21). The next mentions are made in 19:32–35, where it is said that the daughters of Lot made their father drink wine (yayin) so that he became intoxicated. It is mentioned in the blessing pronounced by Isaac upon Jacob (27:28), in connection with Egypt (40:11), when the chief butler says, “I took the grapes and squeezed them into Pharaoh’s cup.” With regard to the uses of wine in private life, there is little to say. It was produced on occasions of ordinary hospitality (14:18) and at festivals, such as marriages (John 2:3–10). The monuments of ancient Egypt furnish abundant evidence that the people of that country, both male and female, indulged liberally in the use of wine. Under the Mosaic law wine formed the usual drink offering that accompanied the daily sacrifice (Ex. 29:40), the presentation of the firstfruits (Lev. 23:13), and other offerings (Num. 15:5). Tithes were to be paid of wine as of other products. The priest was also to receive firstfruits of wine, as of other articles (Deut. 18:4; cf. Ex. 22:29). The use of wine at the Paschal feast was not commanded by the law but had become an established custom at all events in the post-Babylonian period. The wine was mixed with warm water on these occasions, as implied in mention of the warming kettle. Hence in the early Christian church it was usual to mix the sacramental wine with water.

Figurative. Wine is figurative of the blood of Christ (Matt. 26:27–29); of the blessings of the gospel (Prov. 9:2, 5; Isa. 25:6; 55:1); of the exhilarating effect of the Holy Spirit’s fullness (Eph. 5:18); of the wrath and judgments of God (Pss. 60:3; 75:8; Jer. 13:12–14; 25:15–18); of the abominations of the apostasy (Rev. 17:2; 18:3); of violence (Prov. 4:17). See Drink, Strong.

WINE PRESS. Each vineyard had its wine press; it was the practice to extract the juice from the grape in the field. These presses were generally hewn out of the solid rock (Isa. 5:2; Matt. 21:33), and a large number of them remain today. From the scanty notices contained in the Bible we gather that the wine presses of the Jews consisted of two receptacles or vats placed at different elevations. In the upper one, the grapes were trodden, while the lower one received the juice. The two vats are mentioned together only in Joel 3:13: “The wine press [gat] is full; the vats [‘troughs,’ yekeb] overflow.” Gat is also strictly applied to the upper vat in Neh. 13:15; Lam. 1:15; and Isa. 63:2. Heb. pûrâ, “crushing,” is used in a parallel sense in Hag. 2:16, probably referring to the contents of a wine vat rather than to the press or vat itself (Isa. 5:2; Matt. 21:33).

Figurative. The forceful use of the wine press as a figure is found in Isa. 63:3–6, where Jehovah is pictured taking vengeance upon the ungodly nations. The nations are the grapes, which are cut off and put into the wine press (Joel 3:13); and the red upon His garments is the life blood of these nations. This work of wrath had been executed by Jehovah because He had in His heart a day of vengeance, which could not be delayed, and because the year of His promised redemption had arrived. The NT counterpart of this passage is the destruction of Antichrist and his army (Rev. 19:11–15). He who effects this destruction is the Faithful and True, the Logos of God. The vision of John is evidently based upon that of Isaiah. Merciless oppression is forcibly illustrated in Job 24:9–12, where men are said to “tread wine presses but thirst.”

WING (Heb. generally kānāp, “extremity”; Gk. pterux, “feather”). The Heb. word conveys the meaning not only of the wings of birds, but also the skirt, or flap, of a garment (Ruth 3:9; Jer. 2:34), or the extremity of a country (Job 38:13; Isa. 24:16).

Figurative. God said that He had borne His people on eagles' wings (Ex. 19:4; Deut. 32:11), i.e., He had brought them out of Egypt with strong and loving care. The eagle watches over its young in the most careful manner, flying under them when it leads them from the nest, lest they should fall upon the rocks. To "mount up with wings like eagles" (Isa. 40:31), i.e., their course of life, which has Jehovah for its object, is, as it were, possessed of wings. The wings of the sun (Mal. 4:2) are the rays by which it is surrounded. As the rays of the sun spread light and warmth over the earth for the benefit of plants and living creatures, so will the sun of righteousness bring healing for all the hurts inflicted by sin. "The wings of the wind" (2 Sam. 22:11; Ps. 18:10) and "of the dawn" (139:9) are expressive of the swiftness with which the winds and the morning move onward. The idea of protection and defense is given by such expressions as "Hide me in the shadow of Thy wings" (17:8; cf. 36:7; 57:1; 61:4; 63:7; 91:4; Matt. 23:37; Luke 13:34).

WINNOW (Heb. zârâ, to "toss" about). The process of separating the chaff from the grain by throwing it against the wind (Isa. 30:24). See Agriculture.

Figurative. To winnow is used in the sense of to scatter, as enemies (Isa. 41:16); to "winnow them with a winnowing fork at the gates" (Jer. 15:7) is to cause defeat and dispersion on the border of the land; also the winnowing of Babylon (51:2) speaks of her devastation. "And His winnowing fork is in His hand" (Matt. 3:12) refers to Christ as the judge, separating evil from good.

WINNOWING FORK (Heb. mizreh; Gk. ptuon). A sort of long-handled wooden shovel used in the process of winnowing (Jer. 15:7; Matt. 3:12; Luke 3:17; cf. Isa. 30:24). At the present day in Syria a large wooden fork is used.

WINTER (Heb. usually hōrep, strictly "autumn"; Gk. cheimōn, the "rainy" season). In Palestine winter includes part of autumn and the seasons of seedtime and cold, extending from the beginning of September to the beginning of March (Gen. 8:22; Ps. 74:17; Zech. 14:8; Matt. 24:20). The cold of winter is not usually very severe, though the N winds are very penetrating from the middle of December to the middle of February. Snow and hail during most winters fall on the hills. On the central range snow has been known to reach a depth of nearly two feet and to lie for five days or even more, and the pools at Jerusalem have sometimes been covered with ice. But this is rare. On the central range the ground seldom freezes, and the snow usually disappears in a day. On the plateaus E of Jordan snow lies regularly for some days every winter, and on the top of Hermon there are fields of it during the summer. See also Calendar.

WINTER HOUSE (Heb. hōrep). In Scripture the lower portion of the house was called the "winter house," as was also the inner apartment, while the outer and upper ones were called the summer house (Jer. 36:22).

WISDOM. The rendering of several Heb. terms.

1. Heb. hokmâ has the special meaning of "dexterity, skill" in an art (cf. Ex. 28:3; 31:6; 36:1–2). It also and more generally means intelligent, sensible, judicious, endued with reason and using it (Deut. 4:6; 34:9; Prov. 10:1; etc.); skillful to judge (1 Kings 2:9). Thus the wisdom of Solomon is manifested in his acute judgment (3:26–28; 10:1–8), in the verses and sentences he composed or retained in his memory (5:12; Prov. 1:2). Wisdom includes skill in civil matters (Isa. 19:11), the faculty of interpreting dreams and prophesying (Dan. 5:11), as well as the art of enchantment and magic (Ex. 7:11). A higher and more enlightened wisdom is ascribed to angels (2 Sam. 14:20) and to God (Job 9:4).

2. Heb. śākal (to "be prudent, circumspect," 1 Sam. 18:30; Job 22:2; cf. Pss. 2:10; 94:8; etc.).

3. Heb. tûshîyâ (properly “uprightness”), counsel, understanding (Job 11:6; 12:16; 26:3; Prov. 3:21; etc.).

4. Heb. bînâ (“understanding”), the faculty of insight, intelligence (Prov. 4:5, 7; 17:10, “understanding”).

Occasional Uses. Wisdom is used for (1) ingenuity, mechanical dexterity (Ex. 28:3; 31:3); (2) craftiness, subtlety, whether good or bad (Ex. 1:10; Prov. 14:8); (3) the skill or arts of magicians, etc. (Gen. 41:8; Ex. 7:11; Eccles. 9:17–18); (4) sagacity, learning, experience (Job 12:2, 12; 38:37; Ps. 105:22); (5) the current pagan philosophy of the apostolic age (1 Cor. 1:20; 2:5; 3:19; 2 Cor. 1:12).

Dominant Uses. An attribute of God, wisdom is intimately related to the divine knowledge, manifesting itself in the selection of proper ends with the proper means for their accomplishment. Thus not only the world of nature but especially the economy of redemption is a manifestation of divine wisdom (see Ps. 104:24; Rom. 11:33; 1 Cor. 1:24; Rev. 7:12). Thus the OT appeal of wisdom to men is the appeal of the only wise God (see Proverbs and Psalms).

In men wisdom is not only practical understanding of matters relating to this life (1 Kings 3:12), but in the highest sense it is the theoretical and practical acceptance of divine revelation. Wisdom is in the deepest sense a divine gift (see Acts 6:10; 1 Cor. 2:6; 12:8; Eph. 1:17; Col. 1:9; 3:16; James 1:5; 3:15–17).

WITNESS (Heb. ʿēd; Gk. martureō, to “testify”).

A Memorial. Among people with whom writing is not common, the evidence of a transaction is given by some tangible memorial or significant ceremony. Abraham gave seven ewe lambs to Abimelech as evidence of his ownership of the well of Beersheba. Jacob raised a heap of stones to be “a witness,” a boundary mark between himself and Laban (Gen. 21:30; 31:48, 52). The tribes of Reuben and Gad raised an “altar” as a witness to the covenant between themselves and the rest of the nation; Joshua set up a stone as evidence of the allegiance promised by Israel to God (Josh. 22:10, 26, 34; 24:26–27).

Legal Usages. Thus also symbolical usages, in ratification of contracts or completed arrangements, as the ceremony of shoe-loosing (cf. Deut. 25:9–10; Ruth 4:7–8), the ordeal prescribed in the case of a suspected wife (Num. 5:17–31), with which may be compared the ordeal of the Styx. But written evidence was by no means unknown to the Jews. Divorce was to be proved by a written document (Deut. 24:1, 3). In civil contracts, at least in later times, documentary evidence was required and carefully preserved (Isa. 8:16; Jer. 32:10–16).

Evidence in Law. On the whole the law was careful to provide and enforce evidence for all its infractions and all transactions bearing on them. Among special provisions with respect to evidence are the following: (1) Two witnesses at least were required to establish any charge (Num. 35:30; Deut. 17:6; John 8:17; 2 Cor. 13:1; cf. 1 Tim. 5:19). (2) In the case of the suspected wife, evidence besides the husband’s was required (Num. 5:13). (3) The witness who withheld the truth was censured (Lev. 5:1). (4) False witness was punished with the punishment due to the offense that it sought to establish. (5) Slandering reports and officious witness were discouraged (Ex. 20:16; 23:1; Lev. 19:16; etc.). (6) The witnesses were the first executioners (Deut. 13:9; Acts 7:58–59). (7) In case of an animal left in charge of someone else and torn by wild beasts, the keeper was to bring the carcass in proof of the fact and disproof of his own criminality (Ex. 22:13). (8) According to Josephus, women and slaves could not bear testimony (Ant. 4.8.15).

New Testament Use of Word. In the NT the original notion of a witness is exhibited in the special form of one who attests his belief in the gospel by personal suffering. Hence it is that the use of the ecclesiastical term “martyr” has arisen.

WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT. The direct testimony of the Holy Spirit to true believers as to their acceptance with God and their adoption into the divine household.

Scriptural. The two classic passages upon which this doctrine is especially based are Rom. 8:16; Gal. 4:6. It is, however, argued that just as Christ in His visible ministry not only forgave sins but also announced to penitent sinners their forgiveness, so it is one of the offices of the Holy Spirit still to proclaim directly to those who are pardoned the fact of their pardon. Also this view is confirmed by other representations than those named in the Scriptures of the presence and activity of the Holy Spirit (see Rom. 8:1–2; 2 Cor. 1:22; Eph. 1:13; 4:30). The Holy Spirit is “the spirit of adoption.” It is because He speaks within us that we are able to cry, “Abba! Father,” are consciously free from condemnation, and are “sealed” in Him with the Holy Spirit of promise (Rom. 8:15; Eph. 1:13).

Theological Suggestions. The fact to which the witness of the Spirit particularly relates is that of the gracious change in the relation of the pardoned sinner to God. He is no longer guilty and “an alien” but forgiven, and by adoption a child of God. The one point upon which the Scriptures lay emphasis is that the Spirit’s witness is to the fact of adoption, connected, of course, with justification and regeneration.

The witness of our own spirit is to be distinguished from the witness of the Holy Spirit. In Rom. 8:16 the word used is summartureō, which means two or more witnesses jointly, yet distinctly, giving testimony to the same fact. And two witnesses are mentioned here, the spirit of the man himself and the Spirit of God. The witness of our own spirit is indirect in the sense that it is based upon a comparison of the facts of our spiritual life and experiences with the representations and requirements of the Scriptures. We know whether or not we have truly repented and believed in Christ and whether we have peace and joy and love and the spirit of obedience (see 5:1; 8:1–14; 1 John 2:29; 3:14, 19, 21; 4:7). But the witness of the Spirit is beyond this, though associated with it. As Wesley says, “The testimony of the Spirit is an inward impression on the souls of believers, whereby the Spirit of God directly testifies to their spirit that they are ‘children of God,’” and further, “There is in every believer both the testimony of God’s Spirit and the testimony of his own that he is a child of God.” This direct and distinct witness of the Spirit is frequently merged into and confused with the witness of our own spirit, as notably by Chalmers (Lectures on Rom., p. 202), where he reduces the work of the Spirit to the engraving upon us the lineaments of a living epistle of Jesus Christ, and tells us in the epistle of a written revelation what these lineaments are. But this is in opposition to a fair exegesis of Rom. 8:16, where the idea of two joint yet distinct testimonies appear.

The witness of the Spirit is to be regarded as a sequence to or reward of saving faith and not the basis of such faith or a necessary element therein. Wesleyan writers, and Wesley himself, have not always been sufficiently clear upon this point. At times Wesley distinguishes most clearly between “justifying faith and a sense of pardon,” and adds, “How can a sense of pardon be the condition of our receiving it?” (Works, 12:109–10). But elsewhere (Sermons, 10:8–9) he argues that “we cannot love God till we know he loves us; and we cannot know his pardoning love to us till his Spirit witnesses to our spirit.” He is seeking to prove here that the witness of the Spirit must precede the witness of our own spirit. But in seeking this he goes too far, making the witness of the Spirit the basis of our faith and an essential element therein. It is of the greatest importance to understand that saving faith is simply complete reliance of the penitent soul upon the grace of God in Jesus Christ, as offered in His Word, and that the witness of the Spirit comes in God's own time and way to those who do thus truly repent and believe. The Spirit's witness is a great boon offered to all believers, and none should rest without it. But there are ways of directly seeking it that involve not faith but unbelief and disparagement of the sure promises of God as contained in His Holy Word.

WOLF. The following allusions are made to the wolf in the Scriptures: Its ferocity is mentioned in Gen. 49:27; Ezek. 22:27; Hab. 1:8; Matt. 7:15; its nocturnal habits in Jer. 5:6; Zeph. 3:3; Hab. 1:8; its attacking sheep in Ecclus. 13:17; John 10:12; Matt. 10:16; Luke 10:3.

Figurative. Of the wicked (Matt. 10:16; Luke 10:3); of wicked rulers (Ezek. 22:27; Zeph. 3:3); of false teachers (Matt. 7:15; Acts 20:29); of the devil (John 10:12); of the tribe of Benjamin (Gen. 49:27); of fierce enemies (Jer. 5:6; Hab. 1:8); of the peaceful reign of the Messiah, under the metaphor of a wolf dwelling with a lamb (Isa. 11:6; 65:25). See Animal Kingdom: Jackal; Wolf.

WONDERS (Heb. pālā, to “separate,” to “distinguish”). Something great, unaccountable, a miracle or marvel (Job 5:9; 10:16, “power”; Pss. 9:1; 17:7; etc.); “wonderful deeds” (1 Chron. 16:12, 24).

WORSHIP. The act of paying honor to a deity; religious reverence and homage. The rendering of the following Heb. and Gk. words:

1. Heb. shāḥâ (to “bow down”), to prostrate oneself before another in order to do him honor and reverence (Gen. 22:5; etc.). This mode of salutation consisted in falling upon the knees and then touching the forehead to the ground (19:1; 42:6; 48:12; 1 Sam. 25:41; etc., often rendered “bowed”). It is, however, used specifically to bow down before God; spoken of worship rendered to God, and also to false gods (Gen. 22:5; Ex. 24:1; 33:10; Judg. 7:15; Job 1:20; Pss. 22:27; 86:9).

2. Aram. sgîd (to “fall down”), spoken of in connection with idol worship; to fall down in adoration of idols (Dan. 3:5–6, 10–12, 14–15, 28); in honor of a man, as of Daniel (2:46).

3. Heb. āṣab (to “carve, labor”), to serve an idol, as in Jer. 44:19; or according to others, to fashion her, i.e., the image (see Orelli, Com., ad loc.).

4. The Gk. words thus rendered are: proskuneō, properly to “kiss the hand to (toward) one,” in token of reverence; also by kneeling or prostration to do homage—the word most frequently used in the NT; sebomai, to “revere” a deity (Matt. 15:9; Mark 7:7; Acts 18:13; 19:27). Proselytes of the gate are called worshipers of God (sebomenē tōn theon, 16:14; 18:7), or simply “devout persons” (tois sebomenois, 17:17, “God-fearing”). Latreuō (to “serve”) in the NT means to render religious service or honor and in the strict sense to perform sacred services, to offer gifts, to worship God in the observance of the rites instituted for His worship (Heb. 10:2; 9:9). Ethelothrēskeia (“voluntary worship”), i.e., worship that one devises and prescribes for himself, contrary to the contents and nature of the faith that ought to be directed to Christ; used for the misdirected zeal and practices of ascetics (Col. 2:23). Therapeuō to “do service,” as in Acts 17:25.

General Observations. It is as natural to worship as it is to live. The feeling and expression of high adoration, reverence, trust, love, loyalty, and dependence upon a higher power, human or divine, is a necessity to man. These sentiments, toward something or somebody, and whether real or imaginary, appeal to a greater or less degree to every man. And that something determines his worship. “Worship is as old as humanity. It has its root in a necessity of the human soul as native to it as the consciousness of God itself, which impels it to testify by word and act its love and gratitude to the Author of life and the Giver of all good” (Keil, Bib. Arch., p. 55).

Primitive Worship. We are not informed as to the nature of the worship rendered by our first parents. But we learn from earliest records that their sons were moved to present a portion of the product of their labor in sacrifice to God. Men as early as Enosh, the grandson of Adam (Gen. 4:26), called upon the name of the Lord. In other words, the regular and solemn worship of God as Jehovah (i.e., as the God of salvation) was celebrated in word and act—with prayer and sacrifice. Max Müller says: “That feeling of sonship which distinguishes man from every other creature, and not only exalts him above the brute, but completely secures him against sinking into a purely physical state of being, that original intuition of God, and that consciousness of his being dependent upon a higher power, can only be the result of a primitive revelation in the most literal sense of the word.” This view is held by Schelling. The other view is that worship cannot be traced to a divine source; that the original condition of the human family was of an extremely rude and imperfect character; and that fetishism, being the lowest form of religion, was also the earliest and that for this reason we ought to regard religion, even in its most advanced forms, as springing originally from a barbarous fetishism. But the grounds upon which this opinion is based are weak in the extreme. “It would be nearer the truth to say that they are as divine as they are human in their origin, seeing that they are based upon the relation of man to God involved in his creation, and are evoked by a sense of the divine training and guidance under which he finds himself after his creation” (Keil, Bib. Arch., p. 56).

In primitive times the form of worship that Enosh introduced was still maintained, for Enoch “walked with God” (Gen. 5:24). Noah was righteous before Him, expressing his gratitude by presenting burnt offerings (6:9; 8:20–21).

In a subsequent age God chose for Himself a faithful servant in the person of Abraham. He made him the depository of His revelation and the father and founder of His chosen people, who were destined to preserve the knowledge and worship of His name until the time when the Savior would come from their midst. While other nations multiplied their modes of worship according to the political constitution that they adopted and to suit the number and variety of their duties, they devised a corresponding variety of ritual, with a large priesthood and a multitude of sacred observances. But Abraham and the posterity born to him preserved a simple form of worship, as became shepherds and in keeping with the revelation imparted to them. Wherever they pitched their tents for any length of time they built altars in order that, in compliance with ancient usage, they might call upon the name of the Lord (12:7–8; 13:4, 18; etc.). Those altars were, doubtless, simple mounds (Heb. bāmôt) composed of earth and stone, and the animals sacrificed upon them consisted of those that were edible (i.e., clean), taken from the fold.

We have no information regarding the particular ceremonies observed in connection with these sacrifices. But it is probable that prayer was offered by the patriarchs in person, who were in the habit of discharging the priestly functions. The offerings were for the most part burnt offerings, i.e., offerings that were entirely consumed upon the altar, although instances are given of a portion of the sacrifice being reserved for use in the sacrificial feasts. In the selection of animals for sacrifices the patriarchs were probably guided by the directions given to Abraham (15:9); the way in which the sacrifice of Isaac terminated (22:12–13) must have shown that the animal sacrificed was to be regarded merely as a symbol of the heart's devotion to God. Whether these sacrifices were offered at regular intervals or on special occasions (see Job 1:5), we cannot say.

Besides altars, memorial stones (Heb. maššēbôt) were erected by the patriarchs on spots where God had favored them with special revelations. Drink offerings were poured upon them (Gen. 28:18, 22; 35:14). The narrative of Jacob's vow (2:20–22) tells of his promise that, if God would watch over him, supply his wants, and bring him back in safety, he would acknowledge Jehovah as his God, consecrate the pillar he had set up and make it a house of God, and render to Jehovah a tenth of all his income. He excluded strange gods from his house (35:1–4). After due preparation on the part of his household, he built an altar at Bethel.

To the above-mentioned forms of worship, the rite of circumcision was added. In obedience to a divine order, and as a token of the covenant that Jehovah made with him, Abraham performed this rite upon himself and the male members of his household, commanding his posterity that it was an inviolable obligation (17:1–14, 23–27). Nothing further is known regarding the forms of worship that prevailed among the patriarchs.

Mosaic. When Israel became a nation with an organized civil government, in order to fulfill its divine mission it was necessary that its religious affairs should also be remodeled and that the character and style of its worship should be fixed and regulated by positive divine enactments. This did not necessitate an entirely new system of worship, since they were to serve and honor the God of their fathers. Therefore the worship introduced by Moses was grafted on that of Israel's ancestors. It was improved and perfected only as the circumstances of the Israelites as a confederacy of tribes or a monarchy seemed to require, with such forms and ceremonies as would further Israel's divinely appointed mission. This object was further secured by the Mosaic ritual, inasmuch as it embraced all the essential elements of a complete system of worship. It gave precise directions as to the place of worship, with its structure and arrangements, instituting a distinct order of sacred functions, prescribing the religious ceremonies, fixing the sacred seasons and the manner in which they were to be observed.

This system bore the stamp of genuine worship. It was framed by Moses in accordance with revelation and recognized Jehovah as the true God. Nor is it a vital objection to its being true worship on the grounds that it had a material and sensuous character and that many of its forms and ceremonies were similar to the rituals of pagan religions. These facts have been variously misconstrued and have been taken advantage of for the purpose of disparaging the origin and character of the Mosaic worship. It is true that the Mosaic worship embodies itself, for the most part, in outward forms and ceremonies, for one can only give expression to his relation to his Creator through corporeal media. Religious thought and feeling can express themselves only in word and act, and therefore forms are necessary in every kind of worship. And being copies or impressions of religious ideas, they must have an allegorical or symbolical character.

Further, the religion of the OT is monotheism, in contradiction to the polytheism of heathen nations. Jehovah is represented not only as the only true God, not merely as the almighty Creator, Preserver, and Governor of the world and every creature; not simply as the eternal, absolute Spirit, the good and merciful One who has destined man to enjoy the felicity of life that springs from personal fellowship with Himself. But He is also pictured as the omnipresent and near One watching over all His creatures, to keep the weak and distressed. He seeks to conduct those who have wandered from Him back to the fountain of life. He selected for Himself, from degenerate humanity, a race to be in a special sense His people and to whom He, in a special sense, would be God, with the purpose of saving the world. This is accompanied with such directions for the regulations of their life, that, if accepted and complied with, Israel would become to Jehovah “My own possession among all the peoples” (Ex. 19:5–6), “a kingdom of priests and a holy nation.”

Christian. The church of Christ is not only His representative body on earth, it is also the temple of divine service continuing and perfecting the worship of the past. This service includes offerings presented to God and blessings received from Him. The former embraces the entire ordinance of worship, with its nature, reasons, and observances; the latter embraces the means of grace, common prayer, the Word, and the sacraments. These, however, are really one, and their relations to each other as one are of great importance. Both require for their realization the institution of the evangelical ministry. The worship of the Christian church may be regarded in its divine principles and in its human arrangements. As to the former, its object is the revealed Trinity; its form is mediatorial, through the incarnate Son, by the Holy Spirit; its attributes are spirituality, simplicity, purity, and reverent decorum; its seasons are preeminently the Lord’s Day and all times of holy assembly. As to the latter, it is left to the congregation itself to determine the minor details, according to the pattern shown in the Scripture.

As an institute of worship the church of Christ has its ordinary channels for the communication of the influences of the Holy Spirit to the souls of men, namely, the means of grace; the supreme means are the Word and prayer. Special attention is also called to the sacraments (which see) of baptism and the Lord’s Supper.

WORTHLESS MEN, WORTHLESS FELLOWS. NASB and NIV rendering of KJV “Belial,” in OT references. See Belial.

WOUNDS. See Diseases.

WRATH (Gk. orgē). A term found several times in the NT (Rom. 2:8; Eph. 4:31; Col. 3:8; Rev. 19:15). The NIV translates “anger” in Eph. 4:31; Col. 3:8. “The general opinion of scholars is that ... orgē, represents more of an abiding and settled habit of the mind (ira inveterata), with the purpose of revenge” (Trench, 1:178–79).

WRINKLE. Paul speaks (Eph. 5:27) of the church as a bride “having no spot or wrinkle” (Gk. hrutis), probably meaning the tokens of approaching age. If so, it reminds us of the continued youth and attractiveness of the church. Job complained (Job 16:8), “Thou hast filled me with wrinkles” KJV; “shriveled me up,” NASB; “bound me,” NIV (Heb. qamōt), a figurative expression meaning to be shriveled up.

WRITING. The art of reducing human thought to a permanent form in readable characters or signs upon an impressionable substance or material.

Antiquity. About 3400 B.C. writing entered the arena of history. The Sumerians used a pictograph script employing innumerable small pictures to stand for words. This was the oldest written language. At Uruk in southern Babylonia, where the first cylinder seals were discovered, writing emerged. In the Red temple at Uruk a number of flat clay tablets were written in a crude pictograph script. This gave way to Sumerian cuneiform (from the Lat. cuneus, meaning “wedge,” referring to the wedge-shaped form of the letters made with the imprint of a stylus upon wet clay). The Semitic Babylonians, who came into Lower Babylonia and inherited the culture of the Sumerians, adopted cuneiform writing. This type of script spread to Assyria, and the mounds of Mesopotamia have yielded innumerable clay tablets inscribed in this style of writing. The Amarna Letters (c. 1400–1350 B.C.), consisting of some three hundred clay tablets written in an Akkadianized language, illustrate the wide use of cuneiform writing even in the foreign office in Egypt. Of special importance in the history of writing was the discovery of the Ras Shamra epic religious literature at Ugarit in N Syria (1929–37). Although this was written in cuneiform, it turned out to be the simple alphabetic, easily read variety, closely allied to alphabetic Heb. It offers innumerable parallels to OT vocabulary, syntax, and poetic style. Since 1923, a number of important Canaanite inscriptions have been unearthed at the ancient city of Byblos, biblical Gebal, including that written on the sarcophagus of Ahiram, belonging probably to the eleventh century B.C. Phoenician inscriptions from Cyprus, Sardinia, Carthage, and other colonies in the western Mediterranean date from after 900 B.C. The Gezer Calendar, written in perfect classical Heb., dates about 925 B.C.; the Moabite Stone, c. 850 B.C. The Samaritan Ostraca date from the reign of Jeroboam II, c. 776 B.C.; the Siloam Inscription, 701 B.C.; and the Lachish Letters, 589 B.C. As far as the OT is concerned, the important thing is that a simple alphabetic language was divinely prepared to record the history of redemption instead of the unwieldy and cumbersome syllabic cuneiform scripts of Babylonia-Assyria or the complex hieroglyphic writing of Egypt. Hebrew takes its origin from the old Phoenician alphabet, from which all alphabets in current use, Semitic and non-Semitic, have been derived. The origin of the proto-Semitic alphabet is still obscure. Sir Flinders Petrie uncovered early samples of this script at Serabit el Khadem in the Sinaitic Peninsula (1904–5). This discovery pushed alphabetic writing back before the time of Moses. Albright has precisely dated these documents in the early fifteenth century B.C. (Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 110 [April 1958]: 22). It is of unusual significance that this early “Sinai-Hebrew script” was found in the very region where Moses was instructed to write (Ex. 17:8–14). Earlier samples of alphabetic script have been found in the Syro-Palestine area; these date 1800–1500 B.C. In Egypt writing on papyrus goes back at least to the Old Kingdom (c. 2800–2500 B.C.). At Boghaz-keui, the Hittite capital, large numbers of tablets written in cuneiform characters in the Hittite language and a half dozen other languages were found in 1906 and later.

Scripture Mention. Writing is first mentioned in Ex. 17:14, and the connection clearly implies that it was not then employed for the first time but was so familiar that it was used for historic records. Moses is commanded to preserve the memory of Amalek’s onslaught in the desert by committing it to writing. The tables of the testimony are said to be “written by the finger of God” (Ex. 31:18) on both sides, and the writing was the writing of God (32:16). The curses against the adulteress were written by the priest “on a scroll,” and blotted out with water (Num. 5:23). This proceeding, though principally distinguished by its symbolical character, involved the use of some kind of ink and of a material on which the curses were written that would not be destroyed by water. Hitherto, however, nothing had been said of the application of writing to the purposes of ordinary life or of the knowledge of the art among the common people. Up to this point such knowledge was attributed only to Moses and the priests. From Deut. 24:1, 3, however, it would appear that it was extended to others. It is not absolutely necessary to infer from this that the art of writing was an accomplishment possessed by every Hebrew citizen. It is more than probable that these certificates of divorce, though apparently informal, were the work of professional scribes. One of the duties of the king (17:18) was that he should transcribe the book of the law for his own private study. In Isa. 29:11–12 there is clearly a distinction drawn between the man who was able to read and the man who was not. It seems a natural inference that the accomplishments of reading and writing were not widely spread among the people, when we find that they are universally attributed to those of high rank or education—kings, priests, prophets, and professional scribes.

Materials. These were of several types.

Clay Tablets. Writing on soft, wet clay with a stylus and cuneiform script was the oldest medium of inscription in the Tigris-Euphrates Valley, the so-called “cradle of civilization.”

Skins of Animals. Skins were used at an early date in Egypt, at least by the time of the Fourth Dynasty (2550–2450 B.C.), and their use was widespread. Carefully prepared skins of sheep or goats were sewn together to make rolls that varied from a foot or 2 to perhaps 100 feet, according to the number of books written on one roll. The skin was either wound in a single roll with a stick or wound around two sticks, one at each end. Not until the second or third century A.D. did the roll give way to the codex, or book form with leaves sewn together.

Papyrus Rolls. These were prepared for writing in Egypt during the Old Kingdom (c. 2800 B.C.), perhaps earlier. Egyptian papyrus rolls are still in existence from the end of the third millennium B.C. The story of Wen-Amon tells of the exportation of papyrus rolls from Egypt to Gebal in Phoenicia. Ordinary papyrus rolls were about 30 feet long, but sometimes, as in the case of Papyrus Harris and the Book of the Dead, 123 to 133 feet in length. But among the Jews the common use of the standard-size papyrus rolls necessitated the splitting up of certain books like the law of Moses into five books. The reed, or calamus, made from the hollow stem of coarse grass or rush, was cut diagonally with a knife to form a flexible point. To keep the pen point in good writing order, the scribe carried a knife with him, hence the term “scribe’s knife” (Jer. 36:23). Ink was made of soot, lamp black, and gum diluted with water. See also Ink; Inkhorn; Pen; Roll. M.F.U.

XER´XES (zurk´sēz). The Gk. name of Ahasuerus (which see), husband of Esther. He ruled the Persian Empire from 485 to 465 B.C. According to Esther 1:3, the banquet that led to the deposition of Queen Vashti took place in Xerxes' third year (483) and the selection of Esther as a new queen in his seventh year (479; Esther 2:16). Between these two events occurred Xerxes' disastrous campaign in Greece, which resulted in the termination of Persian military actions against Greece. H.F.V.

XESTES. The sextarius, or xestes, was a foreign measure of capacity (see Metrology). See also Pitcher.

YAH. A contraction (Ps. 68:4, marg.) for Jehovah (see [The] LORD; Yahweh). Yah also enters into the composition of many Heb. names, such as Adonijah, Isaiah, etc. The KJV renders it Jah.

YAHWEH (ya'way). The Heb. tetragrammaton (YHWH) traditionally pronounced Jehovah (see discussion in the articles Lord; [The] LORD) is now known to be correctly vocalized yahwê. New inscriptional evidence from the second and first millennia B.C. point toward this fact. The old view of Le Clerc, later propounded by Paul Haupt and developed by W. F. Albright, has commended itself in the light of the phonetic development and grammatical evidence of increased knowledge of Northwest Semitic and kindred tongues. This thesis holds Yahweh to be originally a finite causative verb from the Northwest Semitic root hwy, "to be, to come into being," so that the divine name would mean "He causes to be, or exist," i.e., "He creates." Amorite personal names after 2,000 B.C. lend support to the Haupt-Albright view, demonstrating that the employment of the causative stem yahweh, "he creates," was in vogue in the linguistic background of early Heb. Another recent etymology is that of Sigmund Mowinckel and James Montgomery. This suggests that Yahu (an abbreviated form of Yahweh current in personal names) is a compound formation ya (O!) and hu or huwa (he), "O He!" The name Yahweh has been found to be unique to Israel and has not been verified as the name of any deity outside Israel. See Jehovah; Elohim.

KJV King James Version

YI'RON (yi'ron). One of the “fortified cities” of Naphtali (Josh. 19:38; “Iron,” KJV, NIV), probably the present village of Jarûn, SE of Bint-Jebeil.

YODH, YOD (y) (Heb. yōd). The tenth letter of the Heb. alphabet, standing at the head of the tenth section of Ps. 119, in which section each verse begins with this letter. M.F.U.

YOKE. A bar or frame of wood by which two draft animals, especially oxen, are joined at the necks or heads for working together, for drawing a load or pulling a plow. The rendering of a number of Heb. and Gk. words.

ZA'ANAN (za'a-nan). A place named by Micah (Mic. 1:11) in his address to the towns of the Shephelah. Keil objects to its identification with Zenan, “as Zenan was in the plain, and Zaanan was most probably to the north of Jerusalem.”

ZAANAN'NIM (za-a-na'nim). “The oak in Zaanannim.” Probably a sacred tree marking the spot near which Heber the Kenite was encamped when Sisera took refuge in his tent (Judg. 4:11). It is said to be near Kedesh, NW of Lake Huleh. Probably the same tree mentioned in Josh. 19:33, it is identified with Khan et-Tujjar, about three miles NE of Mt. Tabor and about five miles W of the Sea of Galilee.

ZA'AVAN (zā'a-van). The second son of Ezer, son of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:27; 1 Chron. 1:42). See Horite.

ZA'BAD (za'bad; Arab. “He, i.e., God, has given”).

1. Son of Nathan, who was the son of Attai. The mother of Attai was Ahlai, Sheshan's daughter (1 Chron. 2:31–37), and hence Zabad was called the son of Ahlai (11:41), about 992 B.C. He was one of David's mighty men, but none of his deeds has been recorded.

2. An Ephraimite, son of Tahath, and father of Shuthelah, no. 2 (1 Chron. 7:21).

3. Son of Shimeath, an Ammonitess; an assassin who, with Jehozabad, killed King Joash (2 Chron. 24:26), 797 B.C. The assassins were both put to death by Amaziah, but their children were spared (25:3–4) in obedience to the law of Moses (Deut. 24:16). In 2 Kings 12:21 his name is written, probably more correctly, Jozacar.

4, 5, 6. Three Israelites, “sons” respectively of Zattu (Ezra 10:27), Hashum (10:33), and Nebo (10:43), who divorced their Gentile wives after the captivity, 456 B.C.

ZAB'BAI (zab'ī).

1. One of the “sons” of Bebai, who divorced his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:28), 456 B.C.

2. Father of the Baruch who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh. 3:20), 445 B.C.

ZAB'BUD (zab'ud; “given”). A “son” of Bigvai, who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:14), 459 B.C. The NIV reads Zaccur; see NASB margin.

ZAB'DI (zab'di; “giving”).

1. The son of Zerah and grandfather of Achan, of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 7:1, 17–18), before 1395 B.C. The NIV reads Zimri (cf. 1 Chron. 2:6).

2. The third of the nine sons of Shimei the Benjamite (1 Chron. 8:19).

3. The Shiphmite (i.e., inhabitant of Shepham), and in charge of David's wine cellars (1 Chron. 27:27), about 960 B.C.

NIV New International Version

M.F.U. Merrill F. Unger

NASB New American Standard Bible

4. Son of Asaph the singer, and grandfather of Mattaniah, a prominent Levite in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:17), 445 B.C.

ZAB'DIEL (zab'di-el; cf. Arab. "El has given").

1. The father of Jashobeam the commander of the first division of David's army (1 Chron. 27:2), about 960 B.C.

2. The "son of Haggadolim" (i.e., "valiant warriors"; KJV, "mighty men of valour"), who was overseer of 128 of the captives returned from the captivity (Neh. 11:14, see marg.), 445 B.C.

ZA'BUD (za'bud; "given"). The son of Nathan (1 Kings 4:5). He is described as a priest, and as holding at the court of Solomon the confidential post of "king's friend," which had been occupied by Hushai the Archite during the reign of David (2 Sam. 15:37; 16:16; 1 Chron. 27:33).

ZABULON. See Zebulun.

ZAC'CAI (zak'i; probably shortened form of Zechariah). The sons of Zaccai to the number of 760 returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:9; Neh. 7:14), before 536 B.C.

ZACCHE'US (zak-ē'us); more properly Zacchaeus (Gk. for Heb. Zaccai). A chief tax-gatherer (architelōnēs), or publican, residing at Jericho, who, being a short man, climbed into a sycamore tree in order that he might see Jesus as He passed through that town. When Jesus came to the tree, He paused, looked up, and called Zaccheus by name. He told him to hasten and come down, because He intended to be a guest at his house. With undisguised joy Zaccheus hastened down and welcomed the Master. The people murmured, saying that He had "gone to be the guest of a man who is a sinner." Zaccheus was especially odious as being a Jew and occupying an official rank among the tax-gatherers, which would indicate unusual activity in the service of the Roman oppressors. He seems to have been deeply moved by the consideration shown him by Jesus and, before all the people, made the vow that attested his penitence: "Behold, Lord, half of my possessions I will give to the poor, and if I have defrauded anyone of anything, I will give back four times as much," greater restitution than the law required (Num. 5:7). Jesus thereupon made the declaration "Today salvation has come to this house, because he, too, is [in the true spiritual sense] a son of Abraham" (Luke 19:1–10). See also Tax-gatherer.

ZAC'CUR, ZACCHUR (zak'ur; "remembered").

1. The father of Shammua, the Reubenite spy (Num. 13:4), before 1440 B.C.

2. Son of Hammuel, and father of Shimei (1 Chron. 4:26; KJV, "Zacchur").

3. A Levite, and third named of the four sons of Merari by Jaaziah (1 Chron. 24:27).

4. Son of Asaph the singer, and leader of the third division of Levitical musicians (1 Chron. 25:2, 10; Neh. 12:35).

5. The son of Imri, and one who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the city wall (Neh. 3:2), 445 B.C.

6. A Levite, or family of Levites, who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:12), 445 B.C.

7. A Levite whose son or descendant Hanan was one of the treasurers appointed by Nehemiah over the storehouses (Neh. 13:13), 434 B.C.

ZACHARIAH (zak-a-rī'a). Another form of Zechariah, used in KJV, 2 Kings 14:29; 15:8–10. See Zechariah, no. 1.

ZACHARIAS (zak-a-rī'as).

1. The father of John the Baptist (Luke 1:5–23, 59–79).
2. Gk. form of Heb. Zechariah. See Zechariah, no. 13.

ZA'DOK (za'dok; “just, righteous”).

1. Son of Ahitub, and, with Abiathar, high priest in the time of David. He was of the house of Eleazar, the son of Aaron (1 Chron. 24:3), and eleventh in descent from Aaron.

First Chron. 12:28 says he joined David at Hebron, after Saul's death, with 22 captains of his father's house and, apparently, with 900 men (4,600 Levites came to David; Jehoiada was the leader of 3,700, and Zadok probably was in charge of the remaining men, vv. 26–27), 1000 B.C.

From this time Zadok was unwavering in his loyalty to David. When Absalom revolted and David fled from Jerusalem, Zadok and all the Levites bearing the Ark accompanied him. It was only at the king's express command that they returned to Jerusalem and became the medium of communication between the king and Hushai the Archite (2 Sam. 15; 17:15). After Absalom's death Zadok and Abiathar were the persons who persuaded the elders of Judah to invite David to return (19:11). When Adonijah, in David's old age, maneuvered to attain the throne and had persuaded Joab and Abiathar the priest to join his party, Zadok was unmoved. He was employed by David to anoint Solomon to be king in his place (1 Kings 1).

For this fidelity he was rewarded by Solomon who “dismissed Abiathar from being priest to the Lord” and appointed Zadok as priest in his place (2:27, 35). From this time, however, we hear little of him. It is said in general terms in the enumeration of Solomon's officers of state that Zadok was the priest (4:4; 1 Chron. 29:22), but no single act of his is mentioned.

Zadok and Abiathar were kōhānîm, i.e., officiating high priests (2 Sam. 15:35–36; 19:11). The duties of the office were divided. Zadok ministered before the Tabernacle at Gibeon (1 Chron. 16:39); Abiathar had the care of the Ark at Jerusalem, although not exclusively (15:11; 2 Sam. 15:24–25, 29).

2. In the genealogy of the high priests in 1 Chron. 6:12 there is a second Zadok, son of a second Ahitub, and father of Shallum. It is supposed by some that the name was inserted by error of a copyist, while others identify him with Odeas, mentioned by Josephus (Ant. 10.8.6). He is perhaps the same person as the one mentioned in 1 Chron. 9:11; Neh. 11:11.

3. Father of Jerusha, the wife of Uzziah, and mother of King Jotham (2 Kings 15:33; 2 Chron. 27:1), before 738 B.C.

4. Son of Baana, who repaired a portion of the wall in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 3:4). He is probably the same as the one in the list of those that signed the covenant in 10:21, for in both cases his name follows that of Meshezabel, 445 B.C.

5. Son of Immer, a priest who repaired a portion of the wall opposite his house (Neh. 3:29), 445 B.C.

6. The scribe whom Nehemiah appointed one of the three principal treasurers of the Temple (Neh. 13:13), 445 B.C.

ZA'HAM (za'ham; “loathsome fool”). The last of the three sons of Rehoboam by Abihail (2 Chron. 11:19), about 930 B.C. Keil (Com., ad loc.) holds that Mahalath was the wife of Rehoboam and that Abihail, the daughter of Eliab, was Mahalath's mother.

ZA'HAR (zā'har). A place mentioned only once in the NIV (Ezek. 27:18) and otherwise unknown. The KJV, NKJV, and NASB translate "white wool" where the NIV has "wool from Zabar." E.H.M.

ZA'IR (za'ir; "little"). A place E of the Dead Sea, in Edom, where Israel defeated the Edomites (2 Kings 8:21). Its identification is uncertain.

ZA'LAPH (za'laf; perhaps "caper plant"). The father of Hanun, who assisted in repairing the wall of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 3:30), 445 B.C.

ZAL'MON (zal'mon; "dark," cf. Arab. zalīma and Ethiopic ṣalma, "to be dark").

1. An Ahohite (i.e., sprung from the Benjamite family of Ahoah), and one of David's warriors (2 Sam. 23:28). In the parallel passage (1 Chron. 11:29), he is called Ilai (which see).

2. A wood near Shechem (Judg. 9:48), a kind of "black forest," as rendered by Luther. David (Ps. 68:14, "it was snowing in Zalmon") uses language symbolical of the presence of light in darkness, or brightness in calamity.

ZALMO'NAH (zal-mō'na; "dark, shades," cf. Arab. Zalmyn). A station of Israel in the wilderness (Num. 33:41–42). It lay SE of Edom, perhaps in the Wadi el-Amrân, which runs into the Wadi Ithm, close to where Elath anciently stood.

ZALMUN'NA (zal-mū'na; probably "shade denied," i.e., "deprived of protection"). One of the two kings of Midian who were captured and killed by Gideon (Judg. 8:5–21; Ps. 83:11), about 1100 B.C. See Zebah.

ZAMZUM'MIN (zam-zum'in; "noisemakers, murmurers," cf. Arab. zamzama, "to mumble, to hum"). Only in Deut. 2:20, the name given by the Ammonites to the people called by others Rephaim (which see). They were "a people as great, numerous and tall as the Anakim" (v. 21). From a slight similarity between the two names, and from the mention of both in connection with the Emim, it is usually assumed that the Zamzummin were identical with the Zuzim (which see). See also Giant: Rephaim.

ZAMZUM'MITES. See Zamzummin.

ZANO'AH (zà-nō'à).

1. A town in the low country of Judah (Josh. 15:34) inhabited by Judeans after the captivity (Neh. 11:30). The inhabitants of Zanoah assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (3:13). The site is marked now by Khirbet Zanūc or Zanuḥ in the Wadi Ismail, some ten miles W of Jerusalem.

2. A town in the hill country of Judah, ten miles SW of Hebron (Josh. 15:56), perhaps to be identified with Zenuta. In 1 Chron. 4:18 Jekuthiel is said to have been the father (i.e., founder or rebuilder) of Zanoah.

ZAPH'ENATH-PANE'AH (zaf'e-nath-pa-ne'a; Egyptian, "sustenance of the land is the living one"). The name given to Joseph by the reigning pharaoh (Gen. 41:45). Some modern Egyptologists maintain that the designation represents Egyptian "jed-pa-Neter-ef-'onekh," which would be construed: "says the god: He will live," "he" referring to the newborn child having the name. However, the name apparently refers to Joseph as sustainer of life with reference to his divine call as a savior during famine. M.F.U.

ZAPHON (za'fōn; "north"). A place mentioned, in connection with Beth-haram, Beth-nimrah, and Succoth, as part of the inheritance of Gad (Josh. 13:27). It was in "the valley" (i.e., of Jordan), probably not far from the southern extremity of the Sea of Galilee. Located by Nelson Glueck at Tell el Kos in modern Jordan.

ZARED. See Zered.

ZAREPHATH (zar'e-fath). A town that derives its claim to notice from having been the residence of the prophet Elijah during the latter part of the drought (1 Kings 17:9–10). Beyond stating that it was near to, or dependent on, Sidon, the Bible gives no clue to its position. Josephus (Ant. 8.13.2) says that it was "not far from Sidon and Tyre, for it lay between them." It is on the seashore, N of Tyre. To this Jerome adds (Onom., "Sarefta") that it "lay on the public road," i.e., the coast road. Both conditions are implied in the mention of the town in the itinerary of Paula by Jerome, and both are fulfilled in the situation of the modern village of Şarafend. Of the old town considerable indications remain. One group of foundations is on a headland called 'Ain el-Kantarahz; but the chief remains are S of this and extend for a mile or more, having many fragments of columns, slabs, and other architectural features. Zarephath is mentioned in the NT in Luke 4:26 ("Sarepta," KJV). James B. Pritchard of the University of Pennsylvania led an excavation at the site from 1969 to 1974. He was able to document the history of the town from its founding in about 1600 B.C. to Roman and Byzantine times. Evidence revealed production of purple dye, olive oil, metal goods, and pottery. A shrine dedicated to two goddesses of fertility, Tanit and Astart, helped to throw light on the religion of the seventh through the fifth centuries. See also James B. Pritchard, Recovering Sarepta, A Phoenician City (1978). H.F.V.

ZARETHAN (zar'e-than), Zaretan, Zartanah.

1. A place named in the account of the passage of the Jordan by the Israelites: "The waters which were flowing down from above stood and rose up in one heap, a great distance away at Adam, the city that is beside Zarethan" (Josh. 3:16; "Zaretan," KJV). "Near Beisan is an unusually large mound called Tell es Sârem. A good deal of clay is found here, and a mile to the south is a stream the Arabic of which means 'red river.' ... It has been suggested that the waters of the Jordan were suddenly dammed up by a landslide or similar convulsion. The appearance of the banks, and the curious bends of the river near this place, would seem to support the idea.... It is clear from the Bible statement that the waters were arrested a long way off, above Jericho" (Harper, Bib. and Mod. Disc., p. 148). Nelson Glueck, however, identified Zarethan as Tell es-Sa'idiyeh, about one mile W of the Jordan and overlooking the Wadi Kufringi on the N.

2. A place named (1 Kings 4:12; "Zartanah," KJV) to define the position of Beth-Shean.

3. A place in the plain of the Jordan, mentioned in connection with Succoth (1 Kings 7:46), near which the bronze vessels for the Temple were cast. It is given as Zeredah (Zeredthah, KJV) in 2 Chron. 4:17.

ZARHITES. See Zerahites.

ZATU (zat'u), Zatthu. An Israelite whose "sons" to the number of 945 (Ezra 2:8) or 845 (Neh. 7:13) returned with Zerubbabel (before 536 B.C.). Seven of his descendants renounced their Gentile wives (Ezra 10:27), and a person (or family) was among those who signed the covenant made by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:14; KJV, "Zatthu").

ZA'YIN (י) (za'yin). The seventh letter of the Heb. alphabet. It stands at the head of the seventh section of Ps. 119, in which each verse begins with this letter in the Heb.

ZA'ZA (za'za). The second son of Jonathan, a descendant of Jerahmeel, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:33).

ZEA'LOT (ze'lot; Gk. "a zealous one"). KJV uses "Zelotes" (zē-lō'tez). Gk. for Aram.

Cananaean; a member of a Jewish patriotic party, the surname of the apostle Simon (Matt. 10:4; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13), to distinguish him from Simon Peter. In the first two verses the KJV uses the name "Simon the Canaanite," perhaps a transliteration of the Heb.

Aram. qānānā, "zealot." Meyer (Com., on Matt. 10:4) says: "Zealots were a class of men who, like Phinehas (Num. 25:7), were fanatical defenders of the theocracy; and who, while taking vengeance on those who wronged it, were themselves guilty of great excesses. But the ho Kananaios is not to be explained in this way, inasmuch as this form of the epithet is derived from the name of some place or other."

ZEBADI'AH (zeb-a-dī'a; "Jehovah has given").

1. A Benjamite of the sons of Beriah (1 Chron. 8:15).
2. A Benjamite of the sons of Elpaal (1 Chron. 8:17).
3. One of the two sons of Jeroham of Gedor, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:7), before 1000 B.C.
4. Third son of Meshelemiah the Korahite (1 Chron. 26:2).
5. Son of Asahel the brother of Joab, of the fourth division of David's army (1 Chron. 27:7), before 960 B.C.
6. A Levite in the reign of Jehoshaphat, sent to teach the law in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8), 872 B.C.
7. The son of Ishmael, and ruler of the house of Judah in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 19:11), about 853 B.C.
8. Son of Michael, of the "sons" of Shephatiah, who returned with Ezra from captivity with eighty males (Ezra 8:8), about 457 B.C.
9. A priest of the sons of Immer, who had married a foreign wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:20), 456 B.C.

ZE'BAH (zē'ba; "sacrifice"). One of the two Midianite kings overthrown by Gideon. He is mentioned in Judg. 8:5–21; Ps. 83:11, and always in connection with Zalmunna. They seem to have commanded the invasion of Palestine, leading their hordes with the cry "Let us possess for ourselves the pastures of God" (v. 12). Although Oreb and Zeeb, two of the minor leaders of the incursion, had been slain, with a vast number of their people, by the Ephraimites at the central fords of the Jordan, the two kings had succeeded in making their escape by a passage farther to the N (probably the ford near Beth-shean), and thence by the Wadi Yabīs, through Gilead to Karkor, a place that is not fixed, but that doubtlessly lay high up on the Hauran. Here they were resting with 15,000 men, a mere remnant of their huge horde, when Gideon overtook them. The name of Gideon still caused terror, and the Bedouin were entirely unprepared for his attack. They fled in dismay, and the two kings were taken. They were taken to Ophrah, the native village of their captor, and then Gideon asked them, "What kind of men were they whom you killed at Tabor?" Up to this time the sheikhs may have believed that they were reserved for ransom. But once these words were spoken, there could not have been any doubt what their fate was to be. They met it like noble children of the desert, simply requesting that the blow should be struck by their captor himself; and Gideon arose and killed them.

ZEBAIM. See Pochereth-hazzebaim.

ZEB'EDEE (zeb'e-dē; the Gk. form, probably, of Zabdi or Zebediah). The father of James and John (Matt. 4:21), and the husband of Salome (27:56; Mark 15:40). He was a Galilean fisherman, living probably either at or near Bethsaida. From the mention of his “hired servants” (Mark 1:20) and the acquaintance between John and Annas the high priest, it has been inferred that the family was in good circumstances. He appears only once in the gospel narrative, namely, in Matt. 4:21–22; Mark 1:19–20, where he is in his boat with his two sons, mending their nets.

ZEBI'DAH (ze-bi'da; “given”). A daughter of Pedaiah, of Rumah, wife of Josiah and mother of King Jehoiakim (2 Kings 23:36), before 608 B.C.

ZEBI'NA (ze-bi'na; Aram. “bought, purchased”). One of the “sons” of Nebo, who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:43), 456 B.C.

ZEBOI'IM (ze-boy'im; Gen. 14:2, 8). The rendering of $\text{š}b\bar{o}y\bar{i}m$ (“gazelles”), one of the five cities in the valley of Siddim destroyed by Jehovah (Gen. 10:19; Deut. 29:23; Hos. 11:8). It was ruled over by a separate king, Semeber (Gen. 14:2, 8). See Sodom.

ZEBO'IM (ze-bō'im; Heb. $\text{š}b\bar{o}'\hat{i}m$, “hyenas”). The name of a valley, i.e., the ravine or gorge, apparently E of Michmash (1 Sam. 13:18), near to which one of the columns of the Philistines came. “The wilderness” is no doubt the district of uncultivated mountain tops and sides lying between the central portion of Benjamin and the Jordan Valley. In that very district there is a wild gorge known as Shuk ed-Duba, “ravine of the hyena.”

ZEBUL (ze'bul; “habitation, dwelling”). Ruler of the city of Shechem under Abimelech. He advised Abimelech of the defection of the Shechemites, counseling him to advance upon the city. When Gaal and his men went out to fight against Abimelech, Zebul closed the gates of the city against them and thus assisted in their overthrow (Judg. 9:28–41), about 1100 B.C.

ZEB'ULUN (zeb'ū-lun; “dwelling, habitation”; Gk. form “Zabulon” appears in KJV in Matt. 4:13, 15; Rev. 7:8).

1. The tenth son of Jacob, and the sixth and last of Leah (Gen. 30:19–20). We have nothing recorded concerning Zebulun personally. In the genealogical list (chap. 46) he is mentioned as having, at the time of the migration into Egypt, three sons, founders of the chief families of the tribe (cf. Num. 26:26).

Tribe. During the desert journey Zebulun, with Judah and Issachar, formed the first camp. The tribe then numbered 57,400 (Num. 1:31). At Sinai the head of the tribe was Eliab, son of Helon (7:24); and at Shiloh, it was Elizaphan, son of Parnach (34:25). Its representative among the spies was Gaddiel, son of Sodi (13:10). The territory of Zebulun in Canaan lay between the Sea of Galilee and the Mediterranean. Nazareth and Cana were in it; and it embraced a section of the shore of the former sea, where Christ performed so many of His miracles, thus fulfilling the prophecy of Isaiah (Isa. 9:1–2; cf. Matt. 4:12–16). In the visions of Ezekiel (Ezek. 48:26–33) and of John (Rev. 7:8) this tribe finds due mention.

2. A place on the eastern border of the tribe of Asher, between Beth-dagon and the valley of Iphtahel (Josh. 19:27).

ZEB'ULUNITE (zeb'ū-lun-īt). A member of the tribe of Zebulun (Num. 26:27; Judg. 12:11–12).

ZECHARI'AH (zek-a-rī'a; "Jehovah remembers").

1. The son of Jeroboam II, the last of the house of Jehu, and fourteenth king of Israel. He ascended the throne upon the death of his father (2 Kings 14:29), about 753 B.C. He reigned only six months, being put to death by Shallum (15:8–10).

2. A chief of the Reubenites at the time of the captivity by Tiglath-pileser (1 Chron. 5:7), about 740 B.C.

3. Son of Meshelemiah, or Shelemiah, a Korahite and keeper of the N gate of the Tabernacle of the congregation (1 Chron. 9:21). In 26:2, 14, he is described as "a counselor with insight."

4. One of the sons of Jeiel (1 Chron. 9:37).

5. A Levite of the second order in the Temple band as arranged by David, appointed to play "with harps tuned to alamoah" (1 Chron. 15:18, 20; 16:5), about 975 B.C.

6. One of the priests who, with trumpets, accompanied the Ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chron. 15:24), about 988 B.C.

7. Son of Isshiah, or Jesiah, a Kohathite Levite, descended from Uzziel (1 Chron. 24:25).

8. Fourth son of Hosah, of the sons of Merari (1 Chron. 26:11).

9. The father of Iddo, who was chief of his tribe, Manasseh in Gilead, in the reign of David (1 Chron. 27:21), about 1000 B.C.

10. One of the officials of Judah sent to teach the people the law in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 17:7), c. 885 B.C.

11. The son of Benaiah and father of Jahaziel; the latter was the Gershonite Levite who encouraged the army of Jehoshaphat against the Moabites (2 Chron. 20:14), before 875 B.C.

12. One of the sons of King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 21:2), c. 880 B.C.

13. Son of the high priest Jehoiada in the reign of Joash, king of Judah (2 Chron. 24:20), and therefore the king's cousin. After the death of Jehoiada, Zechariah probably succeeded to his office. In attempting to check the reaction in favor of idolatry that immediately followed, he fell a victim to a conspiracy formed against him by the king and was stoned in the court of the Temple, 836 B.C. It is probable that "Zechariah, the son of Berechiah," who was slain between the Temple and the altar (Matt. 23:35; Luke 11:51), is the same as Zechariah the son of Jehoiada. The name of Berechiah as his father may have crept into the text from a marginal gloss, the writer confusing this Zechariah either with Zechariah the prophet, who was the son of Berechiah, or with another Zechariah, the son of Jeberechiah (Isa. 8:2).

14. A prophet in the reign of Uzziah, who appears to have acted as the king's counselor, but of whom nothing is known (2 Chron. 26:5), after 780 B.C.

15. The father of Abijah, or Abi, Hezekiah's mother (2 Chron. 29:1), before 719 B.C.

16. A Levite who, in the reign of Hezekiah, assisted in the purification of the Temple (2 Chron. 29:13), 719 B.C.

17. A Kohathite Levite and an overseer of the Temple restoration in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. 34:12), 621 B.C.

18. One of the rulers of the Temple in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. 35:8), about 621 B.C.

19. The leader of the "sons" of Parosh, who, with 150 others, returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:3), about 457 B.C.

20. The leader of the twenty-eight "sons" of Bebai, who returned from captivity with Ezra (Ezra 8:11), 457 B.C.

21. One of the leaders of the people whom Ezra summoned in council at the river Ahava (Ezra 8:16). He stood at Ezra's left hand when he expounded the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), 457 B.C.

22. One of the family of Elam who divorced a foreign wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:26), 456 B.C.

23. One of the ancestors of Athaiah, of the tribe of Judah (Neh. 11:4), before 536 B.C.

24. The son of “the Shilonite” and father of Joiarib, of the family of Perez (Neh. 11:5).

25. A priest and ancestor of Adaiah; the latter was prominent in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:12), before 445 B.C.

26. The representative of the priestly family of Iddo in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua (Neh. 12:16). Probably the same as Zechariah the prophet, the son of Iddo, about 536 B.C.

27. One of the priests, son of Jonathan, who blew trumpets at the dedication of the city wall by Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. 12:35, 41), 445 B.C.

28. The son of Jeberechiah, who was taken by the prophet Isaiah as one of the “faithful witnesses for testimony,” when he wrote concerning Maher-shalal-hash-baz (Isa. 8:2), about 742 B.C.

29. The eleventh of the twelve minor prophets. Zechariah was of priestly descent, a son of Berechiah and grandson of Iddo (Zech. 1:1, 7), the chief of one of the priestly families that returned from exile along with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:4). His mention in Ezra 5:1; 6:14 as the son of Iddo is explained by the hypothesis that owing to some unexplained cause—perhaps the death of his father—Zechariah followed his grandfather in the priestly office, and so the historian dropped the father’s name. Zechariah commenced his prophetic labors in the eighth month of the second year of Darius, 520 B.C. In the fourth year of Darius a deputation of Jews came to the Temple to inquire whether the day on which Jerusalem and the Temple were reduced to ashes by the Chaldeans was still to be kept as a day of mourning and fasting. Zechariah replied that, in the sight of Jehovah, obedience is better than fasting. Two other oracles delivered by Zechariah are recorded in his book of prophecies (Zech. 9–11 and 12–14).

ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF. One of the postexilic books of the minor prophets. The prophet’s name means in Heb. “Yahweh remembers.” He was a “son of Berechiah, the son of Iddo ...” (Zech. 1:1; Ezra 5:1; 6:14; Neh. 12:16). The prophet began his ministry two months after his contemporary Haggai, in October-November 520 B.C. The combined prophecies or preaching of the two eventuated in the finished Temple in the latter part of 516 B.C. The total prophetic ministry of Zechariah (at this period) lasted about two years, in contrast to Haggai, whose total recorded ministry occupied only four months. Zechariah’s last dated prophecy was marked November-December 518 B.C. Chapters 9–14, constituting the last part of Zechariah’s prophecy, are undated and must be put much later, probably after 480 B.C., in the light of the allusion to Javan, or Greece. No serious impediment exists for denying a half-century ministry to the prophet. Doubtless he outlived Darius I the Great (522–486 B.C.), whose exploits in saving the Persian Empire are recorded on the famous Rock of Behistun, which proved the key to unlocking Babylonian-Assyrian cuneiform toward the end of the first half of the nineteenth century. Zechariah prophesied during the high priesthood of Joshua and the governorship of Zerubbabel.

Character of the Book. George L. Robinson aptly terms the book “the most Messianic, the most truly apocalyptic and eschatological of all the writings of the OT” (Int’l. Stand. Bible Ency., p. 3136). Zechariah contains more allusions to the coming Messiah, both in His first and second advents and future millennial glory, than all the other minor prophets combined. His series of eight night visions extending from 1:7 to 6:8 gives a remarkably detailed depiction of the future messianic kingdom over Israel. Even more striking is the symbolical crowning of the high priest (6:9–15). This portrays the union of the kingly and priestly office in the Messiah during the Kingdom age. Chapter 8 gives one of the clearest descriptions of the future restoration of Jerusalem (vv. 1–5) and the return of Israel to the land (vv. 6–8), with a remarkable setting forth of the future prosperity of the land and people Israel during the reign of Christ subsequent to His second advent (vv. 9–23). In the last section of the prophecies (chaps. 9–14) two prophetic burdens, or oracles, are given, outlining the great messianic future of Israel. The first prophetic burden presents Christ in His first advent when rejected (9:1–11:17). This constitutes one of the most amazing and detailed prophecies of Christ’s rejection and crucifixion. The second prophetic burden delineates the second advent in glory and the acceptance of the Messiah-King by a delivered remnant that will form the nucleus of the nation in the Kingdom age (12:1–14:21). Chapters 12 and 13 describe the future deliverance and national conversion of Israel (cf. Rom. 11:25–26). Chapter 14 portrays the second coming of Christ in glory to set up His earthly kingdom (14:1–21; cf. Rev. 19:11–16).

Messianic Designations. Important messianic predictions in Zechariah include the Branch (chaps. 3 and 6; cf. Isa. 4:2; Jer. 23:5); Christ as King-Priest (Zech. 6:13); Christ’s triumphal entry into Jerusalem and coming glory (9:9–10); Christ portrayed as Shepherd (11:12–13); Christ crucified (12:10); the sufferings of Christ (13:7); the second coming of Christ (chap. 14).

Outline.

- I. Call to repentance (1:1–6)
- II. Foregleams of the future messianic kingdom (1:7–8:23)
 - A. A series of eight night visions (1:7–6:8)
 - The man among the myrtle trees (1:7–17)
 - The four horns and craftsmen (1:18–21)
 - The man with the measuring line (2:1–13)
 - The cleansing of the high priest (3:1–10)
 - The lampstand and the two olive branches (4:1–14)
 - The flying scroll (5:1–4)
 - The woman and the ephah (5:5–11)
 - The four chariots (6:1–8)
 - B. The symbolical crowning of the high priest (6:9–15)
 - C. The answer to the question of the feasts (7:1–8:23)
 - The question and divine reply (7:1–14)
 - Future restoration of Jerusalem (8:1–5)
 - Future return to Palestine (8:6–8)
 - Kingdom prosperity of land and people (8:9–23)
- III. Two prophetic burdens: Israel’s great messianic future (9:1–14:21)
 - A. The first burden: The first advent and rejection of the Messiah-King (9:1–11:17)
 - The advent (9:1–10:12)
 - The rejection (11:1–17)
 - B. The second burden: Second advent and acceptance of the Messiah-King (12:1–14:21)
 - Future deliverance and national conversion of Israel (12:1–13:9)
 - The Messiah-King’s return in glory (14:1–21)

Authorship. The Zecharian authenticity of chaps. 1–8 is practically uncontested. Chapters 9–14, however, are commonly denied Zecharian authorship, but great confusion exists among scholars who hold that another than Zechariah was the writer. Some scholars make all of chaps. 9–14 preexilic; others assert a postexilic authorship; others confidently assign chaps. 9–11 to one or more preexilic authors, and chaps. 12–14 to one or more postexilic authors. Zecharian authorship is favored by the voice of tradition that was practically uncontested until Joseph Mede in 1653 denied that chaps. 9–11 were the work of Zechariah. The external point of view of chaps. 9–14 is postexilic. No reigning king of Judah or Israel is mentioned. The kingship of the Messiah alone is recognized. The reference to the sons of Greece (9:13) is postexilic but not necessarily post-Zecharian. Similar rare expressions are found in both sections of the book (cf. 7:14, marg., “from passing and returning,” with 9:8, “passes by and returns”). The expression “declares the Lord” appears prominently in both parts, some fourteen times in chaps. 1–8 and in 10:12; 12:1, 4; 13:2, 7–8 in the later section. “Lord of hosts” appears characteristically in both sections. The poetic style of chaps. 9–14 in contrast to the prosaic form of chaps. 1–8 does not necessitate a different author. Undoubtedly Zechariah penned chaps. 9–14 considerably later than chaps. 1–8, probably when he was an aged man.

ZE’CHER or Zeker (ze’ker; “memorial”). One of the sons of Jeiel and his wife Maacah; Jeiel was the father or founder of Gibeon (1 Chron. 8:29, 31; 9:37, “Zechariah”).

ZE’DAD (zē’dad). A city on the northern boundary of Palestine, mentioned by Moses (Num. 34:8) and Ezekiel (Ezek. 47:15). It is identified with Sadad, SE of Homs on the road from Riblah to Palmyra.

ZEDEKI’AH (zed-e-kī’a; “Jehovah is just or righteous”).

1. Son of Chenaanah, and the person who acted as spokesman of the prophets when consulted by Ahab as to the result of his proposed expedition to Ramoth-gilead (875 B.C.). Preparing himself with a pair of iron horns (the horns of the ṛēṁ, or wild buffalo, the recognized emblem of the tribe of Ephraim), Zedekiah illustrated the manner in which Ahab would drive the Syrians before him. When Micaiah delivered his prophecy, Zedekiah came near and struck him upon the cheek. For this he was threatened by Micaiah in terms that evidently alluded to some personal danger. The probability that Zedekiah and his followers were false prophets is strengthened by the question of the king, “Is there not yet a prophet of the Lord here that we may inquire of him?” (1 Kings 22:11; 2 Chron. 18:10).

2. The last king of Judah. Zedekiah was the son of Josiah by his wife Hamutal, and therefore a brother of Jehoahaz (2 Kings 24:18; cf. 23:31; 1 Chron. 3:15). His original name of Mattaniah was changed to Zedekiah by Nebuchadnezzar when he carried off his nephew Jehoiachin to Babylon and left him on the throne at Jerusalem.

Zedekiah was twenty-one years of age when he was made king (2 Kings 24:17–18; 2 Chron. 36:11), 597 B.C. The earlier portion of his reign was marked by agitation throughout the whole of Syria against the Babylonian yoke. In this movement Jerusalem seems to have taken the lead, since in the fourth year of Zedekiah’s reign ambassadors from all the neighboring kingdoms—Tyre, Sidon, Edom, and Moab—were at his court to consult regarding steps to be taken. This happened either during the king’s absence or immediately after his return from Babylon, where he went, perhaps, to deceive Nebuchadnezzar about his contemplated revolt (Jer. 51:59). The first act of overt rebellion of which any record survives was the formation of an alliance with Egypt, of itself equivalent to a declaration of enmity with Babylon. As a natural consequence it brought on Jerusalem an immediate invasion of the Chaldeans. The mention of this event in the Bible is slight, occurring only in Jer. 37:5–11; 34:21; and Ezek. 17:15–20. But Josephus (Ant. 10.7.3) relates it more fully and gives the date of its occurrence, namely, the eighth year of Zedekiah. Nebuchadnezzar, aware of Zedekiah’s defection, sent an army and reduced the whole country of Judea, except for Jerusalem, Lachish, and Azekah (Jer. 34:7). Pharaoh marched to the assistance of Zedekiah, and the Chaldeans at once raised the siege and advanced to meet him. The nobles seized this opportunity to reenslave those whom they had so recently freed (chap. 34). Shortly after this, Jeremiah was put in prison and would probably have lost his life but for the interference of Zedekiah (37:15–21). On the tenth day of the tenth month of Zedekiah’s ninth year the Chaldeans were again before the walls (52:4). From this time forward the siege progressed slowly but surely to its consummation, accompanied by both famine and pestilence. Zedekiah again interfered to preserve the life of Jeremiah from the vengeance of the officials (38:7–13). While the king was hesitating, the end was rapidly coming nearer. The city was indeed reduced to the last extremity. The fire of the besiegers had been destructive throughout the siege, but it was now aided by severe famine. The bread had long since been consumed (38:9), and all the terrible expedients had been tried to which the wretched inhabitants of a besieged town are forced to resort in such cases. At last, after sixteen dreadful months, the catastrophe occurred. It was on the ninth day of the fourth month, about the middle of July, at midnight, as Josephus writes with careful minuteness, (Ant. 10.8.2) that the breach was made in those stout and venerable walls. Entering through the breach, the Chaldeans made their way, as their custom was, to the center of the city, and for the first time the Temple was entered by a hostile force. Zedekiah fled but was betrayed by some Jews who had deserted to the enemy. After his capture he and his sons were sent to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, while his daughters were kept at Jerusalem. Nebuchadnezzar reproached Zedekiah for breaking his oath of allegiance. He ordered his sons to be slain before him and then his own eyes to be put out. He was loaded with chains and taken to Babylon, where he died.

At first sight there seems a discrepancy between Jer. 34:3; 2 Kings 25:7; and Ezek. 12:13. The first passage, however, does not assert that he should see the king and go there. The above facts verify the predictions. Zedekiah saw the king of Babylon but not the city itself, having lost his sight before being taken there.

3. A son of Jeconiah and grandson of Jehoiakim, king of Judah (1 Chron. 3:16), 598 B.C. or later. Some identify him with the person mentioned in v. 15, but Keil (Com., ad loc.) conjectures that he was a literal son, not simply a successor of Jeconiah, and that he died before the Exile.

4. The son of Maaseiah, and a false prophet among the captives in Babylon. He was denounced by Jeremiah (Jer. 29:21) for having, with Ahab, uttered false prophecies, and for immoral conduct. Their names were to become a byword and their terrible fate—death by burning—a warning, about 586 B.C.

5. The son of Hananiah, and one of the officials of Judah who received the announcement that Baruch had delivered the words of Jeremiah to the people (Jer. 36:12), 607 B.C.

ZE'EB (zē'eb; “a wolf”). One of the leaders of Midian who were defeated by Gideon, probably near the Jordan. Zeeb was slain in a wine press, which in later times bore his name (Judg. 7:24–25; 8:3; Ps. 83:11).

ZE'KER. See Zecher.

ZE'LA. See Zelah.

ZE'LAH (zē'la; “slope, side”). A town in Benjamin that was the family burying place of Kish, the father of Saul (2 Sam. 21:14; cf. Josh. 18:28), probably the native place of Saul, the first king of Israel. It has not been identified. Probably Khirbet Ṣalah, NW of Jerusalem.

ZE'LEK (zē'lek; “cleft, fissure”). An Ammonite and one of David's valiant men (2 Sam. 23:37; 1 Chron. 11:39).

ZELO'PHEHAD (ze-lo'fe-had; “shadow of the fear,” i.e., “protection against fear”). The son of Hopher and descendant of Manasseh through Gilead (Josh. 17:3), before 1170 B.C. He died without male heirs, and his five daughters claimed his inheritance. The claim was admitted by divine direction, and a law was issued, to be of general application, that if a man died without sons, his inheritance should pass to his daughters (Num. 26:33; 27:1–11). A still further enactment (chap. 36) provided that such heiresses should not marry out of their own tribes—a regulation that the five daughters of Zelophehad complied with; all married Manassites.

ZEL'ZAH (zel'za). A place in the border of Benjamin, mentioned by Samuel when leaving Saul at Ramah (1 Sam. 10:2). Among the signs that the prophet said would confirm his anointing of Saul was the latter's meeting with two men at Rachel's tomb. This was on the way from Bethel to Bethlehem, and to the W in full view is the village of Beit Jala, which may be identical with Zelzah.

ZEMARA'IM (zem-a-ra'im; "double fleece").

1. One of the ancient towns assigned to Benjamin (Josh. 18:22), in the eastern section of its territory and grouped with Beth-arabah and Bethel. It is probably to be identified with the ruins of Khirbet es-Samrah, on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho.

2. The mountain from which Abijah, king of Judah, addressed Jeroboam and the army of Israel (2 Chron. 13:4). It is described as being "in the hill country of Ephraim," i.e., within the general highland district of that tribe.

ZEM'ARITES (zem'a-rīts; only found in Gen. 10:18 and 1 Chron. 1:16). The name of a people reckoned among the sons of Canaan, "the Arvadites, the Zemarites, and the Hamathites," thus it is naturally assumed that the Zemarites lived between Arvad and Hamath. The old interpreters, such as the Jerusalem Targum, the Arab. version, etc., locate them at Emessa, the modern Hums. Michaelis placed them at Sumra, the classical Simyra. It is possible that the names Zemaraim (Josh. 18:22) and Mt. Zemaraim (2 Chron. 13:4) represent southern migrations of Zemarites; or, as the list in Gen. 10:15–18 is not altogether in strict geographical order, the Zemarites as a whole may have lived in the vicinity of Zemaraim and Mt. Zemaraim.

ZEMI'RAH (ze-mī'ra; "music"). One of the nine sons of Becher, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8).

ZE'NAN (ze'nān; "point," or perhaps, "place of flocks"). A town in the lowland district of Judah (Josh. 15:37), supposed to be the same as Zaanān (Mic. 1:11).

ZE'NAS (zē'nās; shortened from Zenadorus, "gift of Zeus"). A Christian lawyer of Crete mentioned in Titus 3:13 in connection with Apollos. It is impossible to determine whether Zenas was a Roman juriconsult or a Jewish doctor. Grotius thinks that he was a Greek who had studied Roman law. The NT usage of nomikos, "lawyer," leads rather to the other inference.

ZEPHANI'AH (zef-a-nī'a; "Jehovah conceals or treasures").

1. A Kohathite Levite, ancestor of Samuel and Heman (1 Chron. 6:36).

2. The son of Maaseiah (Jer. 21:1); he was sāgān, or second priest, in the reign of Zedekiah. He succeeded Jehoiada (29:25–26) and was probably a ruler of the Temple, whose office it was, among others, to punish pretenders to the gift of prophecy. In this capacity he was appealed to by Shemaiah the Nehelamite to punish Jeremiah (29:27). Twice he was sent from Zedekiah to inquire of Jeremiah about the city's siege by the Chaldeans (21:1) and to implore him to intercede for the people (37:3). On the capture of Jerusalem he was taken to Riblah and slain (52:24, 27; 2 Kings 25:18, 21), about 587 B.C.

3. The prophet, son of Cushi, who prophesied against Judah and Jerusalem in the days of King Josiah (Zeph. 1:1), about 630 B.C.

4. Father of Josiah (Zech. 6:10) and of Hen, according to the Textus Receptus, Zech. 6:14, 520 B.C.

ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF. One of the minor prophets, whose name in Heb. means “Jehovah hides, or protects.” He was likely a great-grandson of Hezekiah (Zeph. 1:1). The allusion to “king” has caused some critics such as Aage Bentzen (Introduction [1949], 2:154) to deny this. If he was not related to Hezekiah, however, there is no adequate explanation of the prophet’s abandonment of the usual custom of referring only to the father in the superscription.

Date. The prophet exercised his ministry in the early reign of Josiah (640–608 B.C.), doubtless prior to the great reformation of 621 B.C. This is confirmed by the allusion to the presence of foreign cults (1:4) and to Assyria (2:13). It is certainly possible that Zephaniah had access to the court and perhaps, like his contemporaries Nahum and Jeremiah exerted much influence in bringing about the revival under Hezekiah. Zephaniah deals with the coming invasion of Nebuchadnezzar as a figure of the Day of the Lord (1:1–2:3). He utters stern predictions of judgment on certain peoples (2:4–15). He outlines the moral state of Israel for which the captivity was to come as a punishment (3:1–7). He prophesies that the judgment of the nations is to be followed by kingdom blessing under the Messiah (3:8–20).

Outline.

- I. The Day of the Lord prefigured (1:1–3:7)
 - A. In judgment upon Judah and Jerusalem (1:1–2:3)
 - B. In judgment upon surrounding nations (2:4–15)
 - C. In Jehovah’s manifestation to sinful Jerusalem (3:1–7)
- II. The kingdom prophesied (3:8–20)
 - A. The judgment of the nations (3:8–13)
 - B. The Messiah revealed as King (3:14–20)

Composition. On subjective and insufficient grounds the authenticity of various parts of chaps. 2 and 3 have been contested by such critics as Stade, Kuenen, Wellhausen, Budde, and Eissfeldt. Oesterley and Robinson acknowledge that the general authenticity of the book has not been seriously doubted, although they note that different editors have discovered reason to support considerable interpolations (Intr. [1934]). However, from a strictly objective view, there is no valid reason to deny any of the prophecies to Zephaniah.

ZE’PHATH (ze’fath; “beacon, watchtower”). The earlier name (Judg. 1:17) of a Canaanite town destroyed by Judah and Simeon and renamed Hormah. Two identifications have been proposed for Zephath: that of Robinson with the well-known pass es-Sufâ; and that of other scholars with a site three miles E of Beersheba called Tell es-Saba’.

ZEPH’ATHAH (zef’a-tha; “watchtower”). A valley near Mareshah (2 Chron. 14:10) where Asa and his troops fought against Zerah the Ethiopian’s army. A deep valley is found near the site of Mareshah, running down to Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis) and thence into the plain of Philistia. This may be the valley of Zephathah.

ZE’PHI (ze’fi; 1 Chron. 1:36). See Zepho.

ZE’PHO (ze’fo), or Ze’phi (ze’fi; “watch”). A son of Eliphaz son of Esau (Gen. 36:11); one of the “chiefs” of the Edomites (v. 15). In 1 Chron. 1:36 he is called Zephi.

ZE'PHON (ze'fon; "watching, expectation"). The first of the seven sons of Gad (Num. 26:15); progenitor of the Zephonites.

ZEPH'ONITES (ze'fon-īts; Num. 26:15). See Zephon.

ZER (zur). A fortified town in the territory assigned to Naphtali (Josh. 19:35). It has not been identified.

ZE'RAH (ze'ra; "dawning, rising, shining").

1. Son of Reuel the son of Esau (Gen. 36:13; 1 Chron. 1:37), and one of the "chiefs" of the Edomites (Gen. 36:17). Jobab, an early king of Edom, perhaps belonged to his family (36:33; 1 Chron. 1:44).

2. Twin son with his brother Perez of Judah and Tamar (Gen. 38:30 ["Zarah" in KJV]; 1 Chron. 2:6; Matt. 1:3 [KJV uses Gk. form Zara here]). His descendants were called Zerahites, Ezrahites, and Izrahites (Num. 26:20; 1 Kings 4:31; 1 Chron. 27:8).

3. A son of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:24; "Zohar," Gen. 46:10).

4. A Gershonite Levite, son of Iddo, or Adaiah (1 Chron. 6:21, 41).

5. The Ethiopian (or Cushite) king defeated by Asa. After a period of ten years' peace, Asa's reign was disturbed by war. Zerah, with a million men and three hundred chariots, invaded the kingdom and pressed forward to Mareshah. There Asa marched to meet him and drew up his army for battle in the valley of Zephathah. After commending his cause to Jehovah, Asa made the attack, which was eminently successful. Asa pursued the fleeing Ethiopians as far as Gerar, crippling them so that they could not recover and again make a stand (2 Chron. 14:9–13). Some scholars identify Zerah with one of the Osorkons of the Twenty-second or Bubastite Dynasty, particularly with Osorkon I (924–895 B.C.), successor of Shishak. However, the reference may simply be to an Arab invasion, since the name Zerah occurs in Arab. inscriptions.

ZERAHI'AH (zer-a-hī'a; "Jehovah has risen").

1. A priest, son of Uzzi and ancestor of Ezra the scribe (1 Chron. 6:6, 51; Ezra 7:4), about 457 B.C.

2. Father of Eliehoenai, of the sons of Pahath-Moab (Ezra 8:4), about 457 B.C.

ZER'AHITES (zer'a-hīts). "Zarhites" in KJV. A branch of the tribe of Judah, descended from Zerah, the son of Judah (Num. 26:13, 20; Josh. 7:17; 1 Chron. 27:11, 13).

ZE'RED (ze'red). A brook separating Moab from Edom (Deut. 2:13–14), where the Israelites encamped before crossing the Arnon (Num. 21:12; "Zared," KJV). It seems to be the same as the Wâdi el-Hesâ, a watercourse entering the Dead Sea at the SE corner, forming one of the last obstacles overcome by Israel on their way from Egypt to the Promised Land.

ZEREDAH (zer'e-da).

1. A town in Mt. Ephraim given as the birthplace of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat the Ephrathite, and servant (i.e., officer) of Solomon (1 Kings 11:26). By some it is identified with Zarethan (which see); others, because of its connection with Mt. Ephraim, think that it cannot be the same. Conder identified it with Surdah, a village a little more than a mile S of Jufua. 'Ain Şeredah, the fountain of Khirbet Balâtah in Mt. Ephraim fifteen miles SW of Shechem at the bend of the Wadi Deir Ballut, offers an exact equivalent of name (Albright).

2. Another name (2 Chron. 4:17; here KJV has "Zaredathah") for Zarethan (which see), the place of Solomon's brass foundry.

ZEREDATH. See Zarethan, no. 2; Zeredah, no. 2.

ZER'ERAH (zer'e-ra). A place mentioned (Judg. 7:22) in describing the route of the Midianites before Gideon. Keil and Delitzsch (Com.) identify it with Zarethan (which see).

ZE'RESH (ze'resh; evidently from the Avestan root zarsh, "the joyful one"). The wife of Haman the Agagite, who advised the hanging of Mordecai (Esther 5:10, 14; 6:13), about 478 B.C.

ZE'RETH (ze'reth; perhaps, "splendor"). Son of Ashhur, the founder of Tekoa, by his wife Helah (1 Chron. 4:7), perhaps 1370 B.C.

ZE'RETH-SHA'HAR (ze'reth-sha'har; "the splendor of dawn"). "Zareth-shahar" in KJV. A city in Reuben "on the hill of the valley" (Josh. 13:19), and near the eastern shore of the Dead Sea. Identified with the ruins of Zara in Wadi Zurka Main.

ZE'RI (ze'ri). One of the sons of Jeduthun, and a Levitical harpist in the reign of David (1 Chron. 25:3). He is probably the Izri mentioned in v. 11.

ZE'ROR (ze'ror; a "particle"). A Benjamite ancestor of Kish, the father of Saul (1 Sam. 9:1), before 1095 B.C.

ZERU'AH (ze-rū'a; "smitten, leprous"). The mother of Jeroboam the son of Nebat (1 Kings 11:26), before 934 B.C.

ZERUB'ABEL (ze-rub'a-bel; Heb. from Akkad. zēru Bābili, "seed [progeny] of Babylon"). In the NT, the KJV uses the Gk. form Zorobabel The head of the tribe of Judah at the time of the return from the Babylonian captivity.

Family. Zerubbabel is called the son of Shealtiel (Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; Neh. 12:1; Hag. 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2), and in the genealogies (Matt. 1:12; Luke 3:27). In 1 Chron. 3:19 he is called the son of Pedaiah, the brother of Shealtiel (see note below). Josephus (Ant. 11.3.10) speaks of him as "the son of Salathiel, of the posterity of David, and of the tribe of Judah."

History. In the first year of Cyrus, Zerubbabel was living in Babylon and was recognized as a prince of Judah in the captivity. He was probably in the king's service, as he had received an Aram. name (Sheshbazzar) and had been entrusted by Cyrus with the office of governor of Judea.

Goes to Jerusalem. Zerubbabel led the first colony of captives to Jerusalem, accompanied by Jeshua the high priest, a considerable number of priests, Levites, and heads of houses of Judah and Benjamin. Arriving at Jerusalem, their first task was to build the altar on its old site and to restore the daily sacrifice (Ezra 2; 3:1–3), about 536 B.C.

Rebuilding the Temple. The great work of Zerubbabel was the rebuilding of the Temple. Aided by a grant of material and money, Zerubbabel was enabled to lay the foundation in the second month of the second year of their return. This was done with the utmost solemnity, amid the trumpet blasts of the priests, the music of the Levites, and the loud songs of thanksgiving of the people (vv. 8–13).

Hindrances. The work had not advanced far before the mixed settlers in Samaria put in a claim to take part in it. When Zerubbabel and his companions declined the offer, they endeavored to hinder its completion. They "frightened them from building" and hired counselors to misrepresent them at the court. The result was that no further progress was made during the remaining years of the reign of Cyrus and the eight years of Cambyses and Smerdis (4:1–24). Zerubbabel does not appear completely blameless for this long delay. The difficulties in the way of building the Temple were not such as needed to have stopped the work. And during this long suspension of sixteen years Zerubbabel and the rest of the people had been busy in building costly houses for themselves (Hag. 1:2–4).

Building Resumed. Moved by the exhortations of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, Zerubbabel threw himself heartily into the work. He was zealously seconded by Jeshua and all the people. This was in the second year of the reign of Darius Hystaspes (520 B.C.), who commanded Tattenai and Shetharbozenai to assist the Jews at the king's expense with whatever they needed. The work advanced so rapidly that on the third day of the month Adar, in the sixth year of Darius, the Temple was finished. It was then dedicated with much pomp and rejoicing (Ezra 5:1–6:22), 516 B.C. The only other works of Zerubbabel mentioned in Scripture are the restoration of the divisions of priests and Levites, and of the provision for their maintenance, according to the method instituted by David (6:18; Neh. 12:47); the registration of the returned captives according to their genealogies (Neh. 7:5); and the keeping of the Passover in the seventh year of Darius. In the genealogies of Jesus (Matt. 1:12; Luke 3:27), Matthew follows his line from Jechoniah and Solomon, whereas Luke follows it through Neri and Nathan. Zerubbabel was legal successor and heir of Jeconiah's royal estate, the grandson of Neri, and the lineal descendant of Nathan, the son of David.

The discrepancy between 1 Chron. 3:19 and other passages as to the parentage of Zerubbabel is explained by Keil (Com., ad loc.) by the supposition that "Shealtiel died without any male descendants, leaving his wife a widow.... After Shealtiel's death his second brother, Pedaiah, fulfilled the Levirate duty, and begat, in his marriage with his sister-in-law, Zerubbabel, who was now regarded, in all that related to laws of heritage, as Shealtiel's son." Ackroyd, Exile and Restoration (1968).

ZERUI'AH (zer-ū-ī'a). The mother of David's three great generals, Abishai, Joab, and Asahel. She and Abigail are specified (1 Chron. 2:16) as sisters of the son of Jesse (David), but it is stated in 2 Sam. 17:25, that Abigail was the daughter of Nahash. Some early commentators have concluded that Abigail and Zeruiah were only stepsisters of David, i.e., daughters of his mother by Nahash, and not by Jesse. Of Zeruiah's husband there is no mention in the Bible.

ZE'THAM (zē'tham; "olive tree"). The son of Ladan, a Gershonite Levite (1 Chron. 23:8); he was, with his brother, a keeper of the Temple treasury (26:22), about 960 B.C.

ZE'THAN (zē'than; "olive tree"). A Benjamite, of the sons of Bilhan (1 Chron. 7:10), probably about 960 B.C.

ZE'THAR (zē'thar; Old Persian, Avestan [jantar] "smiter, slayer"). One of the seven eunuchs of Ahasuerus (Esther 1:10), about 480 B.C.

ZEUS. The supreme god of the Greeks. The Rom. and KJV rendering is Jupiter. See Gods, False: Zeus.

ZI'A (zī'a; "trembling motion"). One of the Gadites who lived in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:13).

ZI'BA (zī'ba; probably from Aram. "branch, twig"). A former servant of Saul who was called after David asked, "Is there yet anyone left of the house of Saul, that I may show him kindness for Jonathan's sake?" Consequently, Mephibosheth was found, and Ziba was commanded to cultivate the land that was restored to King Saul's grandson (2 Sam. 9:2–12). At this first mention of Ziba he had fifteen sons and twenty servants (v. 10). When David, in his flight from Jerusalem, had gone a little over the summit (Mt. of Olives), Ziba met him with a present of donkeys, food, and wine. To the king's inquiry, "Where is your master's son?" Ziba replied, "Behold, he is staying in Jerusalem, for he said, 'Today the house of Israel will restore the kingdom of my father to me.'" This improbable tale was believed by David in the excited state in which he then was, and he gave to Ziba all the property of Mephibosheth (16:1–4). On David’s return Mephibosheth accused Ziba of having slandered him, and David commanded that the land should be divided between them (19:29).

ZIB'EON (zib'e-un). Father of Anah, whose daughter Oholibamah was Esau’s wife (Gen. 36:2). Although called a Hivite, he is probably the same as Zibeon, the son of Seir, the Horite (36:20, 24, 29; 1 Chron. 1:38, 40).

ZIB'IA (zib'i-a; “gazelle”). A Benjamite, the son of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (1 Chron. 8:9).

ZIB'IAH (zib'i-a; “gazelle”). A native of Beersheba and mother of King Jehoash (2 Kings 12:1; 2 Chron. 24:1).

ZICH'RI (zik'ri; “mindful”), Zicri (NIV).

1. Son of Izhar, the son of Kohath (Ex. 6:21).
2. A Benjamite, of the sons of Shimei (1 Chron. 8:19).
3. A Benjamite, of the sons of Shashak (1 Chron. 8:23).
4. A Benjamite, of the sons of Jeroham (1 Chron. 8:27).
5. Son of Asaph (1 Chron. 9:15); elsewhere called Zabdi (Neh. 11:17) and Zaccur (12:35).
6. A descendant of Eliezer, the son of Joram and father of the treasurer Shelomoth (1 Chron. 26:25), before 960 B.C.
7. The father of Eliezer the chief officer of the Reubenites in the reign of David (1 Chron. 27:16).
8. Of the tribe of Judah. His son Amasiah volunteered at the head of 200,000 men in Jehoshaphat’s army (2 Chron. 17:16), after 875 B.C.
9. Father of Elishaphat, one of the conspirators with Jehoiada to make Joash king (2 Chron. 23:1), about 799 B.C.
10. A mighty man of Ephraim who slew Maaseiah the son of King Ahaz, the governor of the palace, and the prime minister (2 Chron. 28:7), about 735 B.C.
11. The father of Joel. The son was overseer of the Benjamites after their return to Jerusalem from captivity (Neh. 11:9), before 536 B.C.
12. A priest of the family of Abijah in the days of Joiakim (Neh. 12:17), about 445 B.C.

ZID'DIM (zid'im; “sides”). A place in Naphtali (Josh. 19:35). Evidently Kefar Hattya, mentioned in the Talmud, less than a mile N of the well-known Horns of Hattin.

ZIDON. See Sidon.

ZIDONIANS. See Sidonians.

ZIF (zif). The early name of the second Hebrew month. See table 1, “the Jewish Calendar,” in article Calendar.

ZI'HA (zi'ha).

1. One of the Temple servants whose descendants returned from the captivity (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46), before 536 B.C.

2. A leader of the Temple servants after the return from Babylon (Neh. 11:21), 536 B.C.

ZIK'LAG (zik'lag). A town in the Negev, or S country of Judah (Josh. 15:31). The next mention is of its assignment, with other places in Judah, to Simeon (19:5). Ziklag was David’s residence for a year and four months by the appointment of Achish king of Gath (1 Sam. 27:6). It was destroyed once by the Amalekites, who in turn were routed utterly by David (chap. 30). It was at Ziklag that David received the news of Saul’s death (2 Sam. 1:1; 4:10). It was inhabited in the postcaptivity period (Neh. 11:28).

It is now believed that Ziklag is to be identified with Tell esh-Sharia, about twenty miles SE of Gaza and about halfway between Gaza and Beersheba. Eliezer Oren excavated there for six seasons between 1972 and 1978. The area on the summit of the tell is approximately four acres. The site was found to be inhabited from the seventeenth century B.C. to the sixth century A.D. The earliest cities were Canaanite. Stratum 9 was thought to have been destroyed by the Philistines early in the twelfth century B.C. Thereafter they occupied the place in the twelfth and eleventh centuries B.C. (Stratum 8). Stratum 7 dated to the tenth-ninth century B.C. At that time there were well-planned public and private structures that may date from the building activities of Solomon or Rehoboam. And the destruction at the end of the period may have been perpetrated by Shishak in 926 B.C. (1 Kings 14:25–28). H.F.V.

ZIL'LAH (zil'a; "shadow," i.e., protection). One of the two wives of Lamech the Cainite, to whom he addressed his song (Gen. 4:19, 22–23). She was the mother of Tubal-cain and Naamah.

ZILL'E'THAI (zil'e-thī; "shadow, protection").

1. A Benjaminite, of the sons of Shimei (1 Chron. 8:20), after 1170 B.C.

2. One of the captains of thousands of Manasseh who deserted to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:20), about 1000 B.C.

ZIL'PAH (zil'pa; cf. Arab. zulfah, "dignity"). The female servant given by Laban to his daughter Leah as an attendant (Gen. 29:24), and by Leah to Jacob as a concubine. She was the mother of Gad and Asher (30:9–13; 35:26; 37:2; 46:18), about 1925 B.C.

ZIM'MAH (zim'a; "purpose").

1. A Gershonite Levite, son of Jahath, the grandson of Gershom (1 Chron. 6:20), after 1210 B.C. He is probably the same as the son of Shimei in v. 42.

2. Father or ancestor of Joah, a Gershonite in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:12), before 726 B.C. At a much earlier period we find Zimmah and Joah as father and son (1 Chron. 6:20–21), for in the various families the same name often repeats itself.

ZIM'RAM (zim'ran; probably "antelope"). The eldest son of Keturah and Abraham (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chron. 1:32). His descendants have not been positively identified.

ZIM'RI (zim'ri; "pertaining to an antelope").

1. The son of Salu, a Simeonite leader slain by Phinehas with the Midianite woman Cozbi (Num. 25:14), c. 1400 B.C. When the Israelites at Shittim were suffering for their impure worship of Baal-peor, Zimri brought this woman into his tent to commit adultery with her. This shameless wickedness so inflamed Phinehas, the high priest, that he seized a spear and pierced both of them through.

2. The fifth king of Israel, who reigned only seven days. He is first mentioned as commander of half the chariots of the royal army and as chief conspirator against King Elah, who was murdered while indulging in a drunken revel in the house of his steward in Tirzah. His first act as king was the slaying of all the house of Baasha. The army at that time was besieging the Philistine town of Gibbethon. When they heard of Elah's murder, they proclaimed their general, Omri, king. He immediately marched against Tirzah and took the city. Zimri retreated into the innermost part of the late king's palace, set it on fire, and perished in the flames (1 Kings 16:9–20), about 885 B.C.

3. The oldest of the five sons of Zerah, the son of Judah (1 Chron. 2:6).

4. Son of Jehoaddah and descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:36; 9:42).

ZIN (zin). A wilderness or open, uncultivated region lying S of Palestine (Num. 13:21; 20:1; 27:14; 33:36; 34:3–4; Deut. 32:51; Josh. 15:1). By some it is supposed to be a portion of the desert tract between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Aqaba. But it must have been W of this tract (called Arabah), as is clearly indicated in Num. 34:4. Directly W of the Arabah is a wild mountain region, rising in successive slopes or terraces from the Arabah in one direction and from the Desert et-Tih in another. It now bears the name of the Arabs who inhabit it, and is commonly known as the Azâzimeh mountains, or the Azâzimât. This is a distinct and well-defined local wilderness, fully meeting the conditions of the various references to the wilderness of Zin in the Bible. It may fairly be identified as that wilderness and also as a portion of the wilderness of Paran in its larger sense. Yet its northeastern portion was probably in Edom. It is possible that only the remainder was known as Zin. The wilderness of Zin is not to be confused with the wilderness of Sin (which see), the original words being quite different.

ZI'NA (zi'na; 1 Chron. 23:10). See Zizah.

ZION. Originally the rock escarpment on the ridge between the Kidron and the Tyropeoan valleys of Jerusalem. Subsequently the term was widened to include the entire western ridge of early Jerusalem. Centuries later the term was applied to the entire city (Ps. 126:1; Isa. 1:26–27). By the fourth century the name of Zion was adapted to the southern portion of the western hill.

Archaeological Location. Zion constituted a formidable natural fortress that the Jebusites inhabited before Jerusalem was taken by David (2 Sam. 5:7). The Gihon Spring (the Virgin Fountain), below the eastern rock escarpment, and En-rogel (Job's Well), at the junction of the Kidron and Hinnom valleys, were factors in the early choice of the site. Jerusalem's water system has been explored, showing that the inhabitants of Jerusalem (c. 2000 B.C.) had made a rock-cut passage similar to the one at Gezer and Megiddo (Chester C. McCown, The Ladder of Progress in Palestine [1943], p. 230). Evidence brought to light as the result of excavations of Sir Charles Warren, Clermont-Ganneau, Hermann Guthe, Frederick Bliss, Captain Raymond Weill, John Garstang, and J. W. Crowfoot show that the city that David captured was like a huge human footprint about 1,250 feet long by 400 feet wide. This became the City of David, or Zion. In Zion David constructed his palace (5:11). David acquired the threshing floor of Araunah farther up the ridge. There he erected an altar (24:18–25), and there Solomon built his palatial Temple. See also Jerusalem.

Theological Use. Zion has a threefold significance in the Bible apart from its original historical significance.

David's City. In the OT Zion refers to Jerusalem, the city that David conquered and made a capital of the united kingdom of Israel (1 Chron. 11:5; Ps. 2:6; Isa. 2:3).

The Millennial City. In a prophetic sense, Zion has reference to Jerusalem as the future capital city of the nation Israel in the Kingdom age (Isa. 1:27; 2:3; 4:1–6; Joel 3:16; Zech. 1:16–17; 8:3–8; Rom. 11:26). Amillennial theologians spiritualize, rather “mysticalize,” the term to mean the Christian church of this age.

The Heavenly City. The NT also refers to Zion as the New Jerusalem (Heb. 12:22–24), the eternal city into which the church will be received (cf. Rev. 21–22). M.F.U.

ZI'OR (zi'or; “smallness”). A town in the mountain district of Judah (Josh. 15:54), mentioned in the group of towns around Hebron to the S. It has been identified with Şa'ir (Şi'ir), five miles NNE of Hebron.

ZIPH (zif).

1. The oldest of the four sons of Jehallelel (1 Chron. 4:16).

2. A town apparently in the S, or Simeonite, part of Judah (Josh. 15:24), mentioned with Ithnan and Telem. Identified with ez-Zeifeh, SW of Kurnūb.

3. A town in the desert (“wilderness”) of Ziph, to which David fled from Saul (1 Sam. 23:14–15; 26:2–3); it was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:8), having been originally built by Mesha the son of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:42). It has been preserved in the ruins of Tell Zif, four miles SE of Hebron. The “wilderness of Ziph” was that portion of the desert of Judah that was near to and surrounded the town of Ziph.

ZI'PHAH (zi'fa; fem. of “Ziph”). The second son of Jehallelel; brother of Ziph (1 Chron. 4:16).

ZIPH'ION (zif'i-on; Gen. 46:16). See Zephon.

ZIPH'TES (zif'ts; 1 Sam. 23:19; 26:1; Ps. 54 title). The inhabitants of Ziph, who twice revealed to Saul the hiding place of David in their vicinity. The interesting events that happened at the place, including the farewell interview between David and Jonathan, the sparing of Saul's life by David, and the temporary relenting of Saul, belong to the geography or to the biographies of Saul and David. This Ziph was in the highland district in Judah, located between Carmel and Juttah (Josh. 15:55). The Ziph of v. 24 is a different place.

ZIPH'RON (zif'ron). A place on the northern boundary of the Promised Land, and, consequently of Naphtali (Num. 34:9), where it is mentioned between Zedad and Hazar-enan. It is thought by Knobel and Wetstein to be preserved in the ruins of Zifran, NE of Damascus, near the road from Palmyra. In the parallel passage (Ezek. 47:16) Hazer-hatticon occurs in a similar connection.

ZIP'POR (zip'or; “bird, sparrow”). Father of Balak, king of Moab. His name occurs only in the expression “son of Zippor” (Num. 22:2, 4, 10, 16; 23:18; Josh. 24:9; Judg. 11:25), c. 1400 B.C. No mention is made as to whether he was the “former king of Moab” alluded to in Num. 21:26, or if he himself ever reigned.

ZIPPO'RAH (zi-pō'ra; fem. of Zippor, “sparrow”). Daughter of Reuel, or Jethro, the priest of Midian; wife of Moses and mother of his two sons, Gershom and Eliezer (Ex. 2:21; 4:25; 18:2; cf. v. 6), c. 1440 B.C. The only incident recorded of her actions is the circumcision of Gershom (4:24–26). See also Moses.

ZITHER. A musical instrument (Dan. 3:5, 7, 10, 15) identified by the KJV as a harp and by the NASB as a lyre (marg. “zither”). See Music.

ZITH'RI. See Sithri.

ZIV (ziv). The second Jewish month, approximating our May (1 Kings 6:1, 34).

ZIZ (ziz; “a flower, a bright, shining thing”). An ascent or cleft leading up from the Dead Sea toward Tekoa (2 Chron. 20:16; cf. v. 20), by which the band of Moabites, Ammonites, and Meunites who attacked Jehoshaphat made their way. There can be very little doubt that the pass was that of 'Ain Jidy, “the very same route which is taken by the Arabs in their marauding expeditions at the present day; along the shore as far as to Ain Jidy, and then up the pass, and so northward below Tekûa” (Robinson, Bib. Res., 1: 508, 530). The name “ascent, or height of Hazziz” has perhaps remained attached to the Wadi el Haşaşah, which leads from the W shore of the Dead Sea N of Engedi to the tableland of Judea.

ZI'ZA (zi'za).

1. Son of Shiphi, a leader of the Simeonites in the reign of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:37), about 719 B.C.

2. Son of Rehoboam by Maacah, the granddaughter of Absalom (2 Chron. 11:20), after 934 B.C.

ZI'ZAH (zi'za), a Gershonite Levite, second son of Shimei (2 Chron. 23:11; called Zina in v. 10). It is spelled Ziza in the NIV.

ZO´AN-TANIS (zō´an). A Delta city located on the E bank of the Tanitic branch of the Nile (Ps. 78:12, 43). This important royal store city was built seven years after Hebron in Palestine (Num. 13:22). Rameses II later rebuilt the location probably at Qantir and called it Rameses. The oppressed Israelites built the earlier site before it was named Rameses, according to the date of the Exodus as preserved in the Masoretic Text. (See Rameses.) It is, therefore, clear that Zoan and Tanis are names referring to the same site, or one contiguous. Zoan continued in importance until the time of Alexander the Great, whose brilliant city Alexandria stripped Tanis of its commercial importance. The modern village of San marks the ancient site. Excavations by Pierre Montet since 1930 have uncovered extensive buildings evidently erected by Hebrew slave labor. (See Exodus.)

The Bible reveals that Zoan was one of the oldest cities in Egypt, having been built seven years after Hebron, which already existed in the time of Abraham (Num. 13:22), about 2000 B.C.; that it was one of the principal capitals of the pharaohs (Isa. 19:11, 13); and that “the field of Zoan” was the scene of the marvelous works that God wrought at the hand of Moses (Ps. 78:12, 43). To Tanis came ambassadors either of Hoshea or Ahaz, or else possibly of Hezekiah: “For their princes are at Zoan, and their ambassadors arrive at Hanes” (Isa. 30:4). Tanis was not necessarily the capital. But the same prophet, perhaps, points distinctly to a Tanite line (19:13, see marg.). The doom of Zoan is foretold by Ezekiel, “I will ... set a fire in Zoan” (Ezek. 30:14), where it occurs among the cities to be taken by Nebuchadnezzar. BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. H. Gardiner, Ancient Egyptian Onomastica (1942), 2:199–201; H. Kees, Tanis (1964); J. van Seters, The Hyksos (1966), pp. 128ff., 140ff.

ZO´AR (zō´er; ‘littleness, smallness’). One of the five cities that lay on the floor of the Jordan Valley. They were called Cities of the Kikkar, or Circle. It was one of the most ancient cities of the land of Canaan. Its original name was Bela (Gen. 14:2, 8). In the general destruction of the cities of the plain, Zoar was spared to afford shelter to Lot (19:22–23, 30). It is mentioned in the account of the death of Moses as one of the landmarks that bounded his view from Pisgah (Deut. 34:3), and it appears to have been known in the time both of Isaiah (Isa. 15:5) and Jeremiah (Jer. 48:34). These are all the mentions of Zoar contained in the Bible. The narrative of Gen. 19 implies that it was very near to Sodom (vv. 15, 22–23). The position of Sodom is now believed to be at the S extremity of the Dead Sea, and the five cities of the plain are thought to be under the waters of the shallow S part of that sea. See Sodom; Gomorrah.

ZOBA. The archaeological location of Zoba to the N of Damascus instead of S of it has been an element in authenticating the historicity of 1 Kings 3–11, which delineates Solomon’s great power and glory. German scholars such as Hugo Winckler and Hermann Guthe showed a tendency to restrict the Davidic-Solomonic empire to Palestine proper, locating Hadadezer’s conquered kingdom in Hauran, biblical Bashan. Analysis of the Assyrian provincial organization, however, which was constructed on older foundations, shows that Zoba (Assyr. Subatu) lay N, not S, of Damascus (E. Forrer, Die Provinzeinteilung des Assyrischen Reiches [1921], pp. 62, 69). Egyptian lists and the Amarna Letters prove also that Hadadezer’s chief cities, Tibhath and Cun, which David took in this region (1 Chron. 18:8), were in this territory S of Hums. Scientific research has thus substantiated the sprawling extent of Davidic-Solomonic territorial control and illustrated the reasonableness of the biblical representations of Solomon’s prosperity and splendor. M.F.U.

ZO´BAH (zō´ba). A portion of northern Syria lying between Hamath and the Euphrates, so closely connected with Hamath that the great city was sometimes called Hamath-zobah. Saul, David, and Solomon all had trouble with the people of Zobah (1 Sam. 14:47; 1 Kings 11:23–25; 2 Sam. 8:3, 5, 12; 23:36; 1 Chron. 18:3, 5, 9; 19:6; 2 Chron. 8:3; Ps. 60).

ZOBE'BAH (zō-bē'ba). The second child (probably daughter, as the word is feminine) of Koz (Hakkoz) of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:8). The NIV renders Hazzobebah (which see).
ZO'HAR (zō'har; "whiteness").

1. A Hittite, and father of Ephron. From Ephron Abraham bought the grave of Machpelah (Gen. 23:8; 25:9).

2. Fifth named of the six sons of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Ex. 6:15); elsewhere (1 Chron. 4:24) called Zerah.

ZO'HELETH (zō'he-leth; "serpent, slippery"). A rocky and dangerous ledge or plateau "beside En-rogel" upon which Adonijah slew oxen and sheep (1 Kings 1:9). It overhangs the Kidron Valley. This has been most satisfactorily identified by M. Clermont Ganneau with the present Arab name Zahweilah, a cliff on which the village of Silwân, or Silvam, stands. To this the women of the village resort to draw water at the "Virgin's Fount."

ZO'HETH (zō'heth). Son of Ishi, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20).

ZO'PHAH (zō'fa; "bellied jug," cf. Arab. şuffaha, "to make wide"). Son of Helem, or Hotham, the son of Heber, an Asherite (1 Chron. 7:35–36).

ZO'PHAI (zō'fî). A Kohathite Levite, son of Elkanah and ancestor of Samuel (1 Chron. 6:26), before 1050 B.C. In v. 35 he is called Zuph.

ZO'PHAR (zō'fer; perhaps "chirper," cf. Arab. şafara, "to whistle"). One of the three friends of Job (Job 2:11; 11:1; 20:1; 42:9). He is called a Naamathite, or inhabitant of Naamah, whose location is probably in N Arabia. In the LXX, Zophar, the friend of Job, is called "king of the Minaeans."

ZO'PHIM (zō'fim; "watchers, field of watchers"). The "field of Zophim" was on the top of Pisgah (Num. 23:14), one of the high places to which Balak brought Balaam, that he might see Israel. It is the modern Tail'at eş Şufa.

ZO'RAH (zō'ra; "stroke, scourge, hornet"). A town of Dan, really within the limits of Judah (Josh. 19:41; Judg. 18:2). It was both the birthplace and burial place of Samson (13:2, 24–25; 16:31) and was afterward fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:10). It was on the hillside overlooking Sorek.

ZO'RATHITES (zō'ra-thīts). People of Zorah, from a town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:33) but assigned to Dan (19:41). In 1 Chron. 4:1–2 the "families of the Zorathites" are descended from Ahumai and Lahad, sons of Jahath the son of Reaiah, the son of Shobal, the son of Judah. Their home şorâ, Zorah, is mentioned in Josh. 15:33; 19:41; Judg. 13:2, 25; 18:2, 8, 11; 2 Chron. 11:10; Neh. 11:29 ("Zareah," KJV). The Zorathites of 1 Chron. 4:2 and Zareathites of 2:53 (KJV) are alike. They refer to one people. It is better to read 2:50, "These were the sons of Caleb. The sons of Hur, the first-born of Ephrathah, were Shobal the father of Kiriath-jearim" (NASB). The list of Judah's "sons" (4:1) will then be successive descendants. The "Zorites" of 2:54 will belong to a separate branch. W.H.; M.F.U.

ZO'RITES, THE (zō'rīts). These are named in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. 2:54), apparently among the descendants of Salma and near connections of Joab. They are hence classed with the "Zorathites and the Eshtaolites" (v. 53).

ZOROBABEL. See Zerubbabel.

ZU'AR (zū'er; "small, little"). The father of Nethanel, of the tribe of Issachar. Nethanel was head of his tribe at the time of the Exodus (Num. 1:8; 2:5; 7:18, 23; 10:15), before 1440 B.C.

ZUPH (zuf; "honeycomb").

1. A Levite of the family of Kohath, and father of Tohu, in the ancestry of Samuel (1 Sam. 1:1; 1 Chron. 6:35; "Zophai," v. 26).

2. A district at which Saul and his servant arrived after passing through those of Shalishah, of Shaalim; a Benjaminite district (1 Sam. 9:5 only). It evidently contained the city in which they encountered Samuel (v. 6), and that again was certainly not far from the tomb of Rachel. The district apparently lay S of Benjamin. It has not been identified with certainty.

ZUR (zur; "a rock").

1. Father of Cozbi (Num. 25:15); he was one of the five princes of Midian who were slain by the Israelites when Balaam fell (31:8; Josh. 13:21), about 1380 B.C.

2. Son of Jeiel, the founder of Gibeon (1 Chron. 8:30; 9:36).

ZU'RIEL (zur'i-el; "my rock is God"). Son of Abihail, and leader of the Merarite Levites at the time of the Exodus (Num. 3:35), 1440 B.C.

ZURISHAD'DAI (zu-ri-shad'i; "my rock is the Almighty"). Father of Shelumiel, the head of the tribe of Simeon at the time of the Exodus (Num. 1:6; 2:12; 7:36, 41; 10:19), 1440 B.C.

ZU'ZIM (zu'zim; only Gen. 14:5). The name of an ancient people dwelling in Ham, who were smitten by Chedorlaomer. The LXX (both manuscripts) has ethnē ischura; the Targum of Onkelos and the Samaritan version also translate the name "strong people." This rendering depends upon some different Heb. reading, possibly āzzūzîm. Sayce thinks it originated in a transcription of a cuneiform rendering of Zamzummin. It is quite generally suspected to be an abridgment of Zamzummin (which see).

ZU'ZITES. See Zuzim.
